"That… is concerning, seeing Her Highness' mood as of now," If she were to be out of options… Indeed, she would solve the issue herself. I suppose, this excuse to arrange the evacuation efforts with the UN will play in my favor.

If I manage to convince Kouzuki, then this little affair will be solved easily indeed. Chuckling, I lean onto my seat. For whatever threat may corrupt the currents my thoughts have devised, it shall be rendered null in front of the STF. After all, it is in the Professor's interest to athwart what is brewing in Ichigaya before her Project begins, as it seems she'll soon announce. Furthermore, her collaboration could grant her the XFJ Project and the Second. A tantalizing offer, if I say so myself.

"And even if she refuses, the rest of the UN won't remain idle."

If the Empire falls, and considering Kamchatka won't last for much longer without any international support, COSEAN would be left in a very precarious position, since the most direct route for supplies and spare parts crosses through the Sea of Japan. And if the mainland is filled with Heavy Lasers… America might feel the heat of becoming the frontline for the first time in… forever? They never had war on their soil against an outside threat, if my memory isn't betraying me. I'm certain that with all the weight of their media, things would spiral out of control in a matter of days.

And with COSEAN gone, we would lose another supply route for the Defense Line on the Suez Canal, they won't last long without the Americans' supplies after all. Like a domino, one falls and all the rest follow. And that's not taking into account what would happen if the BETA decide to start moving towards Oceania after we fall to them.

That's why they need me. To push dear, little Yuuhi in the right direction. To take hold of the steering wheel towards the right direction. Towards the horizon where my ambitions lay hidden.

Well, as much as I respect Her Highness, she isn't necessary for this plan. She does have a twin sister that can fulfill her role if she refuses to cooperate. And the same applies to Kouzuki, who has refused my direct patronage since she was allowed to enter the Imperial Research Institute despite her age at the time.

A momentary pause assails me, gaze drawn to the floor. In image of a blooming flower, revealing its core to the world, my own core reminds me of darkest deeds I've done, considered doing, during these last years.

"… But of course, the sapling that rose from the ashen, bloodied soil could never make peace with such naive ideals," For if the root of our resurgence lays within the war-ridden remains of our old Kyoto, why deny the path we must follow? Why not water that hope instead? Fate gave us an answer… and we are still parading with hesitation.

… Harming my servants, soiling the blood of another Regent House, making accords with foreigners. I should be ashamed of myself, but if this is the price that has to be paid to bring stability to the Empire, to turn us into a world power, then I'm willing to bear all the sins proudly.

It's not like I can turn back now, after all the innocent blood I spilled. I'm honor-bound to those who died to further my plans to succeed in my ambitions, no matter the cost.

A knock on my door snaps me from my documents, my inner clouds.

"Who is it?"

"Makabe, sir," He announces, composed as always.

"Come on in," He enters and gives me a salute. Smiling, readjusting my position on my seat, I nod his way, "What is it, Captain?"

"Sir, we've received word from the advisors. Her Highness won't allow the recruits to be fielded to this location," He informs, voice low, expression sober.

"That is… unexpected. Did our men not try to dissuade her?"

"No, it seems she met solely with her fellowship's advisors," Brows lowering, he tells, "Our men had to inform their opinions through said advisors first."

"Interesting… Interesting, indeed," Yuuhi has rarely erected such fortifications over her person. Has she found motives to suspect me? However… the lack of troops is distressing, yet there's no point in letting others handle this matter, "I shall speak with her myself. Let our men know. So, anything else?"

Quick to nod, his complexion does not relax, "On another matter, Ichimonji's squadron came back from his scouting. He found no clue or trace about the aliens. We have already covered an extensive amount of ground, he said he doubts we'll find those stray BETA at this rate."

"That is truly worrying," This will also sour Yuuhi's mood. Perhaps this anger is her way of showing her displeasure without inciting an argument.

In any case, my thanks should reach Kurechika. Prideful might he be, yet he's honest. He immediately asked for my support in this matter, I could not allow these news to reach the media. I can't let the people turn against the UN, not until I've confirmed whether or not Alt. IV is still active.

"I suppose, that is yet another matter I must discuss with Her Highness," I conclude, resting my hands on the desk, "Any other news?"

"There is one last report I have for you sir." Makabe informed, voice lowering further, clear apprehension permeating him fully. How unusual, you're so relaxed and confident most of the time.

"What is it?"

"The UN notified us that the Cheorwon Hive seems to have reactivated," A sudden cold shock, I shift my posture on my seat. Gesturing at him to continue, he nods yet remains stiff, "According to them, they had to perform a culling operation along COSEAN and American troops stationed at the Far East Defense Line during early morning when a herd surfaced and seemed to be making its way towards us, they lost the equivalent of a TSF Battalion during it, many tanks and ships, and managed to destroy up to 90% of the herd. There were a total of 30000 BETA, with a 3% of Heavy Laser Class and Fort Class each. They requested us to reinforce our western defenses, in case another attack happens shortly."

… I cannot have such an accident now of all times. If the MDF redirects its troops to Kyushu, the numbers to hold Sagiri off… Closing my eyes, resting my chin on a hand, my lips twist, my eyes squint, my feet entangle as the numbers I envision do not portray a favorable outcome. I must act, now.

"… Makabe, arrange a call with the Takatsukasa House. Seems like I'll have to use that favor they owe me. Also, do you have any news on the medicine?"

"No, they still haven't replied. They did accept the new terms after you agreed to send some Type-97 to them, but it seems they're still doubting how to send it."

"Nothing we can do for now," Standing up, I pace towards the door, "Did Maya arrive to relieve you of the office?"

"Yes, sir. Despite some delay, she answered our first call to her post near Her Highness," Smiling and nodding, he answers as he follows close.

"That is good to know. Perhaps, we could have a talk with her during the evening, to test her opinion on these recent developments."

"… If you so order," Makabe replies, clearly not amused with the idea.

"Haha, worry not, my retainer. My right is always reserved for you."

"Milord, please do not start joking," Frowning, he scolds, "Until Tsukuyomi proves her loyalty, I am of the opinion that we should have her at arm's lenght."

"So… Perhaps we could make a trial out of today's dinner…"

"Sigh… Takatsugu-sama, I implore you, please restrain yourself for the time being."

"Oh? Well, if so suggest. In any case, Maya should grant us quite the insight into Her Highness' mood," Willingly or otherwise, "So, do prepare a table for three tonight."

"As you will, milord."

"Then, let us focus on what's at hand for the moment," Hastening my pace, I so command.

Luckily, we obtained this intel with enough time. All that's left is devising a way to make everything fall into place. Yet, for the BETA to act up now of all times…

Sigh… What wouldn't I give to have a proper field commander in my fellowship. A warrior which everyone respects, a champion who strikes carnage upon the enemy. Yet, me and my retainers must remain here in vigilance, and the rest in the force… they do not resemble the image my dreams envisage.

Still… Little I can do, except to keep moving forward. That's all I can afford, as the Regent and Head I am.

Downtime in the Masquerade

Chapter 61: Downtime in the Masquerade

---

December 2nd, nearing 5 PM.

(Audience Room, Imperial Palace.)

---

"… Therefore, you shall be stationed near the Niigata frontline for a week, at the least," The Shogun retold to her guest, who nodded shortly after, "Once you contact Hikami-san, I shall do as much as I can from my position to gain Kouzuki's support towards these… scouting operations."

"Understood," Amato nodded once again, "Will we be stationed in the same base?" She inquires, delving into the Regent's eyes, unblinking.

Her Highness sighs, shaking her head, "I require you to expand the area of our patrols. And doubly so for Hikami-san. Also, do recall that she is not formally under the IRG at the moment," Quietly, she returned the firm stare.

Thus, Amato relented a nod as she fiddled with her spiky hair, sheathing the embers, the wish to debate any further, "As you will, Yuuhi-sama."

Neither pleased with the other's reaction, a moment of silence extended in the audience room. While Amato finished her cup of tea, repining within at her Regent's adoration for passivity, Her Highness chose to have her sight flee to the balcony. A deep breath relieving the hollow, parched heart, she fought the intrusive echoes, the heaviness, the damp and cold sweat on her back to regain her usual composure.

It took her a few seconds, hands slowly interlocking away from her neck, "… Well, and everything else has been detailed in the reports you've been informed on. Do ensure you are able to depart in less than three days, Cpt Amato."

Straightening her posture, she bowed down deeply, "It so shall be done, milady," Returning up, however, an inquisitive, frontal and unmoving stare she forwarded towards the Shogun, "However… regarding Takeru-uesama's affairs… I must insist that you devise a plan to bring him back in the short term. I do not believe a mere exchange in words during this coming mock battle could do much for our wishes, and I doubt that vixen fox would release him easily if she believes Takeru-uesama to be a valuable pawn."

"… I was clear enough. Due to the current unknown circumstances, we must tread carefully," Voice lowering, she leveled a stare towards Amato, "To suddenly rush our hands or to disclose much intel to Takeru, or to Kouzuki, could backfire greatly. Steady steps, Raiko-san. Mana's report of the mock battle shall be enough to steer towards the right path."

"… Would it be allowed for me to learn of Mana's report tomorrow?" Never letting Her Highness' eyes leave hers, subtly leaning closer, she asked.

Which made the Shogun close her eyes momentarily, before giving a brief nod, "Very well, you may be present. However, if you incite an argument-"

"I shall not," She affirmed, fuming slightly, "I am merely wishing to have you act sooner."

"Sigh… Believe me, I desire nothing more than to bring him here, to see him again. However… We know Takeru's presence couldn't have gone unnoticed and that Kouzuki has found some value in his services, and thus, we must endow caution. Not only to ascertain Takeru's return, but to prepare for what could occur should he ever grow adusted once more," She reminded, cold and stoic. While inside, it teared and scorched, it ached oh so much, "I truly… do not wish to see such an expression on you ever again. This time… I shan't fail you, Takeru," And once again, one of her hands ran over her neck, two fingers diving, digging into the skin as if a gold vein had she found.

Upon the silence, slight doubt festered within Amato. The Shinpan's posture tightened, lips folding inwards for a moment, and an inquisitive counter seemed to be imminent. However, again running her hands into her lily hair, eyes closing softly, inhaling into the vanilla scent of her perfume, holding it in dearly before allowing a sigh, she merely gave a nod in agreement.

Deciding to fold for this time, Amato bowed once again, "Understood. Did you require anything else, Yuuhi-sama?"

Back to reality, gulping to relocate her mood and breath, she shook her head slowly, "No, that shall be all. I'm certain you've many duties on your shoulders, both with the outpost and the child, so I shan't hold you any longer. I hope… we can once again debate in such a peaceful atmosphere as we did today, Raiko-san," Her Highness smiled earnestly, truly relieved at the day's meeting.

So Amato nodded quickly, also returning the gesture, "As do I, milady. Well then," Standing up swiftly, once more she bowed down, "I shall be taking my leave, Yuuhi-sama. I pray that you may remain strong in the face of the adversity we face."

"Thank you kindly. And… I also pray that your missions can be fruitful, both the food plant and these scouting tours," She admitted, darkened clouds covering the prior cheer, doubting, hesitating on whether or nor the Shinpan still placed reservations upon her shoulders, "Do remember to remain alert, I am certain many eyes shall fall upon you when you sortie."

Yet, Amato shook her head hastily, and as someone would say, fire blasted from her eyes and lips, "There is nothing you should concern yourself with, milady. I will deliver auspicious news to you, come what may."

"That is reassuring to hear," And slightly concerning, s he finished within, "Still, do take care while in the field. The teams fielded shall belong to different fellowships, as well as the UN and the MDF, so exercise caution at all times," She reminded, ordered, "For if any disputes over the areas of operation or the chain of command while on the field were to occur-"

"Worry not, such trifling matters shan't hamper my mission. I won't allow anyone to spur an incident during the scouting," Eyes blazing, she held Her Highness' gaze, "No one will bring you further setbacks. I shall cleave a path forward by myself if I must to ensure your wishes are safeguarded."

"… And if such actions spawn dissidence with the other members of the IRG? What if such a stance causes further friction with the UN?" Her Highness asked, reminded Amato of the state of the board they could not risk upsetting.

Many trials awaited if they wished to regain their beloved and, as I'm certain you know, quite some hurdles were at the ready to obstruct their efforts. For much is what they don't know, what they assume as correct, which could then separate them from their goal, his safe return. Without mentioning all that was riding on keeping this frail peace safe from all the machinations that were brewing and boiling behind curtains, behind bolted doors.

And such pondering, such reservations again ignited a stillwater displeasure from Amato, "Hmph… My duty is to fulfill the orders you've given me, so maintaining appearances for the moment is a priority. You've already been clear, caution is our ally. However… That does not mean we must remain still. Please, do not worry so, Yuuhi-sama. I won't let my temper flare up and burn away our efforts," She insisted, ascertained, extending a torch, a faint ember to the Shogun.

"However… if a discussion were to happen… and if the threat of the BETA stragglers is confirmed…" Eyelids cascading gradually, apprehension emanating like just unearthed petrol, her breath stopped cold. For Her Highness knew that one small incident could spiral out of control, incite the wrong people into the wrong decision.

"Then, we shall pierce forward with all our might," Amato stated, louder and closer, beating a fist onto her stomach, still staring, or trying to, into her Regent's eyes, "Our inner clouds shall not obscure this mission. Trust in your vassals, Yuuhi-sama," She affirmed, holding the unfaltering dry ice wall that the Shogun's complexion had turned to, " And please do look up," S he then ailed inside as she clawed softly at her palms, "That bright smile of yours, the knowledge that you were looking after the Empire was what always kept many enduring for one second longer. Even when it became but a distant memory for some…"

Sighing yet again, still wearing the stoic mask, she gazed at her guest, "… Then, what would you do should an incident were to occur during the scouting?"

"Me and my fellows shall find a solution, do not forget that you are speaking about the remnants of your brother's former unit," She reminded, quiet but harsh, insulted to some degree.

Slightly, Her Highness corked an eyebrow, her lips shrank, curled onto themselves, "… Yet, you cannot act as you used to. No swords need to be broken, we cannot allow them to be broken. Cooperating with the other fellowships is a must at the moment."

"That does not mean we have to alter our methods, even if we must practice patience. Such fears are unfounded, Yuuhi-sama."

"… How can you affirm such a thing?" She asked, shifting between curiosity and confusion for Her Highness had rarely, if ever, seen Amato willing to sheathe the clashing stride of hers. That was one of the reasons why they had grown distant, as their visions did not align.

Yet, the guest smiled confidently, embers once more roving in her eyes, "Because I've no reason to hold onto such thoughts, I shall despair after I perish. Rather than isolate myself within my mind, I'll soak myself in the adversity and break through it all. For I must be the guiding light you require me to be as of now," Amato stated, sobering further, her heartbeats near the base of her neck and rising, blazing along her barely composed breathing, "If you are willing to use me, this blade is ready to serve. And if endowing in moderation could aid you in recovering Takeru-uesama…" A small chuckle leaving her lips, she looks towards the balcony, "I suppose I should finally learn how to slash the mountain without harming the fish that within the river swim."

"Pfft…" Unable to hold the quiet laughter, the reminiscence the words brought, Yuuhi allowed a chuckle to leave her lips. Easing up her posture, another sigh in between, the Shogun again managed to smile, seeing the resolve of Amato's veneer, hearing such a resolute oath, such nostalgic words, "… I see. I suppose, you have some plan on how to proceed?"

"An idea, that is. However, I swear upon my honor that we will not breach your commands, milady," Kneeling swiftly, she bowed once more.

Which dispelled the twister, the clogging air within Her Highness, "… Then, may the tailwind remain at your back, Cpt Amato. I pray that these fears and concerns are unwarranted, and that the scouting can be performed without issues."

"As I do, milady."

Smiling towards her guest as she rose back, Yuuhi gave one final nod, "Well, I shan't hold you further. I suppose you shall be visiting tomorrow near noon to hear the report?" Amato nodded, "Then, I'll leave word on that. Now then…" A momentary glance at the surrounding area, at the pillars and furniture, caused a slight cross in her brows as she once again could not detect anything, "… Tsuhi?" Yuuhi tentatively asked.

And a small step echoed right behind a second after, "Did you call, Yuuhi-sama?"

"Yes…" Blinking fast, she withheld her amazement and shock, "Please escort our guest towards Fujikagi. Cpt Amato shall be visiting tomorrow as well, so please do make a note for that."

"As you will, milady," She nodded slowly, sounding almost half-asleep, "Now then, should we?" She asks, Amato nods.

"It has been a pleasure, Yuuhi-sama. Thank you kindly for having received me. Until tomorrow, milady," One last bow, one last exchange of pleasantries, and thus Amato turned around and went towards the door.

Both the guest and the Regent having found some respite amidst the reports, a pleasant air was left in the audience room at the departure. As slowly as Yuuhi moved to the balcony did Raiko pace towards the stairs. In equal measure, both were also reminiscing of days past. Yet, whereas Yuuhi's smile flourished, bloomed wildly upon the sunshine that still dared to linger in the sky, Raiko couldn't help but to sigh deeply, hunching over slightly as she folded her arms. The same person they were recalling due to their talk, yet the feelings spurred were clearly in stark contrast.

Which caused intrigue, curiosity in the gray dressed attendant that walked besides Amato, "Raiko-sama, what would be the matter?"

"Hm? Oh, it's nothing. I was merely pondering something," She says, dull and composed.

"Is that so?" Doubtful of the veracity of the reply, the shinobi remained staring, "Did Yuuhi-sama say something you deemed… inappropriate?" Thus, she insisted.

"Sigh… That would be too strong a word," Raiko relented, caressing, treading her hair as her gaze lost itself towards the faint, frail threads of light that filtered through the fluttering curtains, "I simply… I knew our Lady Regent favored passivity as of now, and I am aware of the reasoning behind that choice. Yet… to also apply those actions towards Takeru-uesama's retrieval…"

"So, you oppose leaving him in Yokohama?"

"Perish the thought, I am not blind," She scolded, arms folded, "I know caution is a must when dealing with the UN Farces. However, to dally to this extend… And if that weren't enough, Yuuhi-sama is still referring to him as before," Grimacing, steps dragging onto the floor, she slowly, oh so slowly, shook her head, "She still hasn't learned a damned thing…"

A minute moment of surprise, of suspicion, Tsuhi treads her chin with a finger, "What exactly are we speaking about?"

"Do not feign ignorance, Tsuhi," Raiko again scolded, "Not only she still relies on the Tsukuyomi, not only she still wishes to parley with the other forces instead of holding her ground, but she still is mired by hesitation when ordering me to act. If she fears conflict, why even send us to the field?"

"Huh… I was under the impression you favored the orders, however," Tone lowering even more, almost growing to a halt, Tsuhi asked as they descended the stairs.

"I do, which is why I insisted this much during the briefing, to no avail," She admits, swiftly stomping her way down, choking the railing as she did, "I'm just… I cannot reach a reaction to all I've learned in these few hours, truth be told," Allowing her eyes to cascade onto the floor, she admits.

With delayed and petite steps as her hand slid along the railing, Tsuhi finishes her descent as she observes Raiko closely, "Yet… You still agreed to her terms. Will you start supporting her commands, then?"

"… If she remains resolute. Frankly, I cannot tell how can you remain composed in the face of this board. Being ordered around by Tsukuyomi, left in the dark about Takeru-uesama's survival…" A deep breath as they began walking again, Raiko held her gaze, weighed Tsuhi's complexion, "… Why don't you return to the Chains? With some work and the right results, perhaps we could gain Yuuhi-sama's authorization to visit Yokohama at one point."

Her eyes closed, slowly as her steps. Ceasing her breathing, both hands interlocked. A tiniest shiver ran down her back, yet Tsuhi again met Raiko's gaze head on. Sharpening her glare, the shinobi allowed a small dose of venom to drip from her lips, "… I shall remain loyal to the order I was entrusted with. Remaining rooted deeply at the shadow of the blossom, I dream of the skies no longer."

"… My apologies, I did not meant to imply anything," Raiko relented a small nod, lips narrowing at the sudden hollowing weight in her stomach, "Yet… If so you decided, how can you remain in such stillness?"

"Well… there is little I can do, but no matter how little, it is important for me. However…" Looking away, she threaded a few curly strands of hair behind her ear, "… I do admit working under Maya-sama has been rather exhausting lately."

Reigniting the curiosity, Amato stared, "… Is she… truly acting as she was during the invasion?"

"I won't accuse her of anything, yet I do find it odd that she departed to Kitanomaru so hastily upon the very first call," Tsuhi stated, still twirling her dark hair.

And knowing what the words implied, as well as how it would mean Maya departed despite knowing a report about Takeru was inbound, made Raiko's breath stop cold as another blaze fumed out, another combustion filling her eyes.

"However, something urgent might have come up," Tsuhi says, trying to douse the welling anger in the guest.

"… Has Tsukuyomi done anything else that warrants suspicion?"

"Well… She did fail to report Takeru's identity to Yuuhi-sama some mere days after his arrival to Yokohama."

"… Excuse me?" Taking a step closer, the nod the shinobi returned sent further shocks into Amato.

"I said Maya-sama did not-"

"No, not that!" Amato repined at Tsuhi's usual reiteration, "Are you saying she met him in the base and did not notify anyone of it?"

"That is the case, yes. It seems Maya-sama also advised Mana-sama to remain quiet, to avoid Takeru's presence to be compromised. It wasn't until Mion and Shion met him during the CCSE that Yuuhi-sama was notified of his presence in Yokohama, despite how… well… both of them tried to gravely injure Takeru during their encounter," The shinobi told slowly, Amato's expression gradually tightened into a faint frown, "Also, I do have to note that both the Tsukuyomis and Yuuhi-sama did not notify me of this affair until… much time passed," She quietly complained, lips shrugged.

"I see… And you still believe Tsukuyomi to be worthy of being Yuuhi-sama's personal retainer?" Fuming an explosion out, she stared.

"… See your enemies as your allies, for the moment when they bring you an opportunity to act," Tsuhi reminded calmly, nodding to herself, "Even if Maya-sama could… be swayed back to such prideful approaches, there is no proof of such a thing being true. She very well might be deceiving her allies first, to ensure nothing athwarts Takeru from our hands."

"… I suppose we shall see in time. However… I suppose I can leave her to you, should the need arise," Raiko affirmed, smiling faintly,

"Still… Regardless of that four-eyed traitor… I cannot believe Yuuhi-sama remains so fixated on 'binding his ire'," Sharply shaking her head, again she fumes, "I cannot believe she still believes such."

"Can we truly blame our Lady for the confusion she's feeling?" Tsuhi asked, looking up into the vast, hollow hallways of the castle, "Did we ever understand his motives to choose the path of the shadows?"

"We did not, that's… true… However-"

"Do we even know today?" She continued, expression darkening, arms joined behind her back, "It's been two years… and I still cannot understand his words nor what compelled his actions, nor the logic on which he operated when he was our Leader."

Grimacing harshly, light vanishing from Raiko's complexion as it the afterglow was on the skies, a fissure dragged down the resolute voice into a whisper, "Siiigh… Believe me, I also am bereft of explanations on that end. Yet… yet he was not deserving of the brand, of the word they brought onto him."

Sighing, softly biting her lower lip, Tsuhi again shook her head, "That was all they saw. The monster that brought down an entire base to ashes and smoke in a single night. And even if we were by him, to this day I cannot comprehend his decision, what those echoes whispered to him on those nightmares…"

And then, silence.

Only their slow footsteps resonated in the empty hallways, where even the flimsy light that remained hesitated to enter.

A set of stairs, the passing of a few Guards on duty to their offices. Still no words from neither.

"… Do believe he might relieve those accursed dreams?" Amato hesitantly asked in a whisper.

"Perhaps, it's a possibility," Tsuhi then nodded.

"And the date of his arrival…" The Shinpan eyed her sideways, Tsuhi slowly nodded again, "So, if he does fall prey to those nightmares, do you plan to do something?" Inhaling sharply, her purple eyes fixated onto the shinobi's composed stare.

"… There is little this humble shadow can do. And few are the actions we could take, even if our Lady decides to move."

"So we can't even try to do anything, is what you're saying?"

"Well… it is something to ponder. I wonder, where is our burnt and feeble present heading to?" Slowly looking to the windows, the sinking afterglow, her steps slowed down, "Yuuhi-sama wishes to safeguard the peace, if we can call it that, which we enjoy today. Yet, in the end, will everything sink within the rising fear and paranoia?"

"… Tsuhi, I don't believe such words are warranted," Amato repined, and was met with a small smile in the shinobi.

"Why would they not? I believed you thought the same. That it is time for action and not words."

Grimacing slightly, Amato shook her head, "True that might be, yet we seem to be bound at the moment. And a careless action…" Looking down, memories of a scorching day of summer came back. Thus, her grimacing intensified as she started wringing her hands.

Yet, Tsuhi tilted her head, still smiling, "Truly? Isn't there a small glimmer of hope shining through for us?"

Holding Tsuhi's gaze, Amato pondered the words for a moment, "So… you're saying we have a way to approach Takeru-uesama without hampering our duties?"

"Well, Yuuhi-sama was clear. She does not approve of us approaching or revealing much intel at the moment," Taking a small pause, a faint gaze towards Amato, the shinobi's steps slowed down, "However… there may be a method that could help our current predicaments, perhaps," She told, again twirling some strands of that black hair of hers.

"What do you speak of?"

"If our Lady wishes for us to remain quiet, if certain eyes would fall upon us and him if we move carelessly… perhaps, something could be delivered to Takeru? I believe we both know who Yuuhi-sama will send to meet with the Vice Commander about the scouting missions. He could ensure the item reaches Takeru's hands safely."

"… I see," A small twisting of her lips in sympathy, knowing Tsuhi was speaking of Chief Yoroi, Amato slowly nodded, "Well, that option is something I hadn't considered. Still, I rather not betray the trust Yuuhi-sama placed on me by acting behind her back," Folding her arms again, she mulled over for some moments.

"… Perhaps, you could mention this during the report tomorrow?" Tsuhi suggested.

"Oh, of course. How did I miss that?" Lightly hitting her forehead, Amato sighed, "Indeed, we still have one last report at our disposal. Still, making haste would be in our best interest. Meiya-sama might be by him, yet little does she know about him."

"… So you believe she can aid Takeru if he were to grow pained once more?"

"Well, who other than her could, in that base?" Amato concluded, convinced of the idea.

Yet, the shinobi's lips narrowed as her gaze veered away. And so, nothing was else was said. Descending another set of stairs as the beams above lighted up, showering warm light onto the hallways, Tsuhi slowed down even further to point at a door.

"Fujikagi-kun is reading here. He has remained quiet for the most time," She notified, slowly as always.

"I know. Give him a picture book he favors and he won't tear himself away from it for no reason other than for dinner," Sighing again, she then chuckles, "I hope he did not gave you much trouble before you found a fitting book."

"No, not at all," Smiling, Tsuhi shook her head, "He was no trouble."

Opening the door, Raiko called for the child. Fujikagi looked up, and upon seeing her quickly paced towards the pair, hugging one of Amato's arms tightly once he reached them.

"Did you have fun, Fujikagi?"

"Yes, Tsuhi-san gave me a nice book to read," Smiling much, he nodded twice.

"I see," Ruffling his light brown hair tenderly, Raiko smiled back, "Well, it's time for us to go back. Say your parting words," Patting his back as she guided Fujikagi out of the room, she whispered.

Looking at Tsuhi, taking one small and hesitant step towards her, the boy gave her a bow along a smile, "Thank you very much for the book, Tsuhi-san. See you later."

Nodding and returning the smile, the shinobi petted his head softly, "No, it was my pleasure. See you later, Fujikagi-kun," She gave one last rub to the boy's head, allowing herself to breath in deeply the vanilla aroma of the perfume, relaxing from the prior discussions.

"2nd Lt Yasomaga, I shall be seeing you tomorrow," Amato said, saluting her fellow.

Who then returned the gesture, swiftly standing in attention despite the usual slowness of her voice, "Indeed. Until tomorrow."

"Are we coming back tomorrow?" Fujikagi asked, curiously staring as he pulled Amato's sleeve.

Who then chuckled, patting his head, "No, I have a small report to hear so I'll be coming here on my own," A minute cross of his brows, he noted his displeasure with a faint groan as she again chuckled, "Well then, we shall be going. May the tailwind remain by you, Tsuhi."

"Likewise, Raiko-sama," She nodded, firmly.

And with that, the Amatos turned to leave. Fujikagi waved one last time towards the shinobi, who smiled as she returned the gesture. As they went further into the hallways, Tsuhi's hand remained still and risen in the air. Looking at it for a moment, she allowed the arm to limply fall and sway by her side.

Eyes closing, slowly exhaling, then taking into the words, all that occurred on just a few hours, Tsuhi couldn't help but to feel a shiver on her sides. Despite going towards the windows, catching the very first stars glimmering in the distance, all she could feel was the compacting pressure on her shoulders. Gaze lost itself on the nearby greenery that surrounds the castle yet Tsuhi did not lighten her complexion, feeling as if she were staring down a tall wall of pure pitch-black mystery.

"… So this is all I can do as of now, huh," She repined, scolding herself as she scratched the glass, "Yet, it will have to suffice… until the time is right…"

Folding the sigh and dulling the small cracks, the hints of annoyance, Tsuhi once more strode back the way she came. In rather fast steps for the gray shadow, if you'd allow the observation. Now free of company, her feet traced the shadows, swift and unseen as a gentle breeze. Steps but a distant noise to the others, following the hidden pathways of the palace Tsuhi quickly found herself standing before the door to the audience chamber once more.

The lascivious golden, all the overflowing opulence, the imposing ornaments, the fine details engraved onto the wooden doors. The deep red of the carpet, a faint smell of incense. As fleeting as a shooting star in the dusk, she understandably allowed herself to frown for an instant, her teeth slightly raking her bottom lip.

An olden ruin devoured by moss and disdain falling, crumbling to an earthquake. A vast, open temple now growing hollow, losing its last standing candle. The cries of the gust as it had no more grass to caress on the barren fields. The silence of a forest abandoned by all wildlife. Such was the expression of his she had engraved onto her mind, rising back to the surface now due to the circumstances.

Not of war, not of hatred. All the contrary to the brand he endowed.

Her throat ached, her shoulders burned. As they did during that time.

Inhaling sharply, she shook her head. Opening and closing her hands for a moment, looking up in silence for another, Tsuhi managed to, faintly, smile earnestly this time.

"… I wonder, who fell prey to who back then? And… who will fall to who this time?" Moving her neck in half a circle, she couldn't help but to smirk, "Or perhaps, the question should be… who has already fallen in your clutches?"

Chuckling for a second, brushing her dress with both hands and regaining her habitual composure, the shinobi then opened the doors slowly and readied to resume her duties in looking watching over the Shogun with renewed spirits, you'd understand.

---

A/N: So, originally, I wanted to end this chapter right before the mock battle. Turns out holiday season isn't exactly the best time to write much, what with alcohol and sweets being everywhere. At the least, I decided to put this out here to finish the 'Imperial' side of the build up before we return to Takeru's and the other's side.

I know the story is dragging on, that many would rather jump into the action and the good stuff, that people want the coup, the XM3, Sadogashima, some smut and the rest of the cool shit.

But.

From here on in is where the main efforts of this rewrite have gone to, where the fic will diverge from the prior version of it. And it's where the story takes a different road than the VN took. So, yeah, don't expect as much mecha action as Alternative had to be present in the fic for the foreseeable future. The coming conflicts will be more… let's say… close and personal than that. Or at least that's the ideal outcome. And no, not all of it will be pure undiluted angst. Though, the overall tone won't change much to be honest.

Between juggling the sidestories, seeing what to cut and what to keep, I decided to again try a minimalistic approach with this chapter to keep my long descriptions at bay, mostly. I dunno whether I'll upload during January, I wanna take some time 'off' the fic to not get burnout on it and get some fresh air. I'd like this rewrite to be the final one for the story, despite some adjustments I could make here and there, otherwise I'll be stuck in a perfectionist loop and never finish the damn thing. I might screw the execution, but getting something done is better than to keep mulling over whether I'm writing the cast as OOC or not for so goddamn long. And I do want to get some of the sidestories done, and finish the ones that are already posted.

TL; DR: Last update of the year, probably won't post on January. Story will diverge from Alternative, and epic mechas won't be the focus of the fic. Cue in Rain Clouds BGM.

So well, that's that.

As always, thanks for having read thus far. I wish you all a happy end of the year and a good start of the next one.

Keeping staying safe. See you later.

Zuoriel

Behind the Mask

Chapter 62: Behind the Mask

---

December 2nd, near 3 PM.

(In the elevator.)

---

"… I believe I had told you to keep your composure," the Vice Commander fires off as soon as the door closes up and they begin the descent.

Leaning on a corner, he closes his eyes as he hunches over, "I did what I had to do."

"Shirogane, we both know what could happen now that you reacted rather aggressively towards the guards," Swift and cold, she counters immediately, then sighs, "I'd like to believe you made a convincing enough act, yet I can't deny they might not stop in their attempts to ascertain your identity."

"… What are you getting at?" He asks, low, still looking down.

Rolling her eyes, she shakes her head, "Regardless of what they choose to do from now on, I can't have you growing emotional every time you go through a memory recovery. I do compliment your idea to use your rising displeasure at the last recovery session to push for answers and fish out their intentions, but in the end, you only delayed the inevitable. I don't know what you saw, but-"

"I didn't lose my cool. All I did was put up a front," Admitting it only serves to hollow his insides again, those echoes reappearing on the back of his head.

"… Wait, you were faking it?" Her curiosity piked, she stares right at him, unblinking.

"Not everything, no. But that's all I know to do, fake being upset when my back's against the wall," Shrugging, Takeru heaves a sigh.

It is very much alike to when the scientist left on his first experiences. Grin and bear it, keep a stoic mask as he argued with the new authorities, as he shielded his squadmates and young Yashiro from the hostilities born from ignorance. That's all he could do then to truly keep himself in check, to not end up contributing more problems to those he cared about. And it's all Takeru can afford to do now.

Shrugging as the scientist didn't release him from her gaze, he scratches the back of his head, "I did get pissed off for real once, but I managed to stay cool in the end. I know I can't place you in more problems, I'm not that stupid."

"I did not refer to you in that way," She states, gaze blazing up a bit, "So, care to enlighten me on what exactly were you aiming to do?"

"… Nothing much. Test the waters, see their reactions. Considering how I used to be, there's no way I'd have kept my temper in check after seeing… those memories."

Yuuko sighs, leaning against the wall on the opposite end of the elevator, "Well, the plan worked and they should have no other pretenses to be hostile to you. Still, it was a surprise to see you were right. You really think they erased you when you were little?"

"Sigh… Feels that way, at least," He admits, as Tsukuyomi's reaction to Takeru's words had only made the soldier more convinced of his suspicions, "I dunno why they had to do something like that but… I don't see him leading a good life after that night I saw," Softly biting his lower lip, his gaze crashes down further below. "I had thought Maya-san had grown attached to him, I had thought Yuuhi did earnestly favor him… But those other memories I saw must have been from before Mom and Dad died. And as soon as they saw this world's little me had no skills they could exploit…"

"I know you said that before but, how can you be certain you wouldn't have wanted to stay under their care?" Yuuko asks, stare unmoving from Takeru's face.

"… It's how I am, Sensei," Again he shrugs, again he sighs, "I can tell that… if he didn't have anyone who remained by his side, in the middle of all that mess… All I could feel and see was that sadness enveloping him, and I know what I tend to do when left alone in such a mood."

Grimacing a bit, I believe it is quite fair to affirm his heart was split in twain right now. Not only for the pain he had just inherited from the memories of that night of solitude… but from certain similarities they had with a particular moment of his life, well before the soldier found himself trapped by causality.

" Just like when Meiya took me to that damn mountain and I had to endure her grandfather's trials. Before I ceased to be a Shirogane in that world, when our marriage became official and I started my life as "Takeru Mitsurugi". The difference is, I had Meiya with me back then when I could have gotten in a foul mood. I had her unconditional support and love, so the struggle didn't feel pointless and I could push through."

His throat closed tight, as if it were a security door during a BETA alarm, and that cold, piercing feeling started skinning his nape, cruising over his entire back as if a scalpel it were.

" However, he had no one to rely on back then. Maya-san seemed to have grown cold again, that old woman who I assume is Yuuhi's mom seemed so… distant in the memory, and even if that young man whose name I believe was Masahide did try to cheer him up… In the end, this world's me didn't have anyone by his side as I did. And the words of that moment, the clear echo I can somewhat still hear without even meaning to, they tell me all I needed to know. That feeling of being inadequate, the fear, dread at the thought of becoming a burden to those you care about… I know how it feels all too well. And what would I do without anyone to rely on or get me out of my head."

"But, if that is the case," Yuuko slowly ponders, inching closer to the sinking shape of Takeru, "why is the Shogun so intent on learning of your identity? If he was sent away after this moment you speak of, I doubt he would have been allowed to join the Guard as well. It doesn't line up, your assumptions with their insistence."

"… I mean, I dunno what happened to him after that day, but chances are they had him be a servant or something. Maybe they left him as Yuuhi's attendant or something."

"… Is that so," She dismisses, "In any case, I won't insist on learning of what happened to you back then, but if you recalled so many memories, won't you truly reconsider the option to have them confirm you're actually Takeru Shirogane?"

And for a second, he felt as if he were underwater, pointlessly reaching out towards the rays of light above like a plant stretching through a canyon. Only to fade to the dark, and sink further beyond the sea.

"… I can understand his feelings, and I can relate to what he went through. But I can't be him, Sensei."

"… Yet, your security needs to be assured. Assuming they do grant us the folders of your father's service in the IRG, and that you can retell the memories you regained, we could form a defense for the identity theft claims that might come your way," Directing a finger at his face, she smiles, brightly, "You could even become a bridge between me and Her Highness, and with your new identity I wouldn't have to keep tightening your cover every time someone tries to poke their nose where they shouldn't."

"Wait a sec, Yuuko… were planning to link me to his memories to… solidify my existence in the mind of the guards? Does this have anything to do with how you said you wanted to stabilize me here?"

"Oh? Wow, I didn't expect you to figure it our. Bravo," She slowly claps, he groans a bit, "Yes, that was the idea. I believe we discussed this before, right? How other people's awareness of your existence is what ties you here, since you're an unstable existence. So by making more people think about you as someone who exists today instead of someone who has passed away, the pull of this reality on the Nucleus would increase, making the stabilization process easier on both us. I had believed that was your goal as well?" He nods, leaning on the sofa. So, she continues, "I admit, I expected more… tangible results from you today, to have a solution ready, but the meeting went well enough, I believe."

"… And why didn't you tell me about the meeting's true goal? I told you… I don't want to deal with the guards."

"I merely acted how I saw fit to safeguard my protegee, that's all. It's on you for not noticing my plans earlier. If you don't want to be merely strung along my plans, could you start trying a little harder to make yourself useful?"

"… What's with that question?"

"Hm? What about it?"

"Is… everything I did for you until now not enough for you treat me as an equal? To have you take my wishes into account?" He asks, voice low for the moment, as he stares into her eyes, coiling his hands.

"Your efforts thus far only matter if you can bring yourself to finish the job, Shirogane. The same applies to me, doesn't it?" She shrugs, sighing, "Did it matter in your first experiences how far had I reached? Did it matter at all when Alt IV was canned?"

"W-Well… But, even so, this isn't like-"

"It will get to that point, if we do nothing," She reminds, sharp and venomous, returning his stare, "So… What do you plan to do from now on, Shirogane?"

"… I already gave you my answer, Yuuko," Unblinking, the soldier return her cold stare, in full force, "This is all I'll remember and I don't want to go to the Capital."

"And you won't reconsider your position?" She stares, he shakes his head, she folds her arms and groans for a second, scanning his face and overall posture, "Then, what do we do if they do press charges against you? I need you alive and well when the 00 Unit is awakened, let me remind you."

Looking away, eyelids gradually closing, he again sighs heavily, "The intel I learned should be enough to prove my identity, if anyone stupid enough tries to screw with you through my issues. All you have to do avoid the Guard from growing suspicious of you is to talk amicably with them, I'll remain declining their offers if they insist. And moreover, you have a pact to uphold. You haven't told me anything about how you plan to fix the ripples of my world, have you?"

"Even if I told you, you wouldn't understand," She says, rolling her eyes, "But solidifying your self in this world is the first step to have all the causal ripples of your existence attach themselves here, to prevent any further risks of you vanishing away. And for that… I need you to stop running away from the Guard, because without the 00 Unit, I cannot fix the disturbances of your experiences."

"I'm… not running away. And I told you just now, I won't let this issue get in the way of Alt IV or Sumika's recovery," He nodded, firmly and enduring the silence of her stare.

Determined to no way in hell let these issues obstruct Yuuko's research, a small hint of embers resurfaced in his eyes. Despite not feeling a bond as tight as they shared in other worlds, the soldier felt his insides ache at the prospect of the Shogun growing to believe the scientist to be manipulating him. It reminded him of days long gone, when he did an effort to support her after everything was over. In fact, you'd understand if he also was quite upset at the Guard's overall conduct, as it reminded him much of the setbacks he endured in his first experiences after Alt IV's failure.

Inhaling sharply, the soldier folded his arms and again rested his weight on the wall, "But I also can't have others doubt Sensei's motives for having someone with such an uncertain identity in the base. If it comes down to it, I'll use what I learned of his life thus far to prove who I am even if I have no intention of meeting with anyone from the Guard. This is my problem, and I'll deal with it myself if it comes down to that," He concluded with a nod, relaxing his features.

And as he looked up, his eyes found Yuuko staring silently. Squarely in the eye and closer than before, to the point that he could see a small reflection of himself in her eyes as they scanned the soldier, as he gulped the breath he was about to release.

"… Sensei?" He managed to ask, after a moment.

She remains saying nothing, poker face in place. Lost in the maze of her gaze, a shiver ran down his back. The motion of the elevator stops, the door opens and she moves away quickly. Sighing slowly, the soldier follows after the scientist to the office, as they had done so many times before. Navigating through the papers and books, Yuuko preps up the coffee machine while shooting a finger at a sofa, indicating for Takeru to merely sit down and wait. While she made the coffee, the door opened and Yashiro paced into the room, bringing a small folder with her. Smiling at Takeru, she walked to Yuuko's desk to leave her report of the morning duties. The scientist quickly readies a mug with cocoa for the small bunny, handing Takeru his cup as well before going back for hers. For a moment, they merely drank and relaxed on their seats, enjoying the silence. But then, she starts to spin, faster and faster.

Looking up as she keeps drinking mid-spin, Yuuko then rests her cup on her legs, trying to keep the soldier in her field of vision despite the spinning, "Do you still think past you was in bad terms with the Shogun before? Are you absolutely certain of it, Shirogane?"

"Sigh… I told you, I think he felt that way, yeah. It's… disappointment, regret… heartache, kind of. I think he was… hurt a lot, and not only during that time where he was adapting to the life of the nobles."

"And how exactly are you sure he was made to 'adapt' to the life of the nobility?"

"Well, some of his trials and the words some people told him kind of…" Slowly tracing his bottom lip with the tip of his tongue, hands quietly come together into a lock as he looks up. As the sweet smile and the kind azure eyes caresses his mind for a second, Takeru hunches over and sigh, "… It all reminds me of something I went through before."

"… Takeru-san?" Bunny ears jolting up and remaining standing, Yashiro too felt a jolt on her back. As it was the first time that the claret aura that signals affection was mixed with the deep blue of sorrow, wondering if that was the reason why the soldier had, once more, cut off the recovery session today.

Halting her mug as it was right by her lips, Yuuko corks an eyebrow as she sees the twisting expression Takeru had endowed, "What does that mean? Did you… have to deal with the Guard before in one of your prior experiences?"

"Huh? Oh, yeah. That did happen, yes," Scratching his head, he slowly sips at the coffee, trying to regain his composure, "That was when I… had to give you the pass for the migrant fleet in that memory I showed you, and other times when me and the guys were sent on salvage missions," Yuuko nods, taking her time to drink, eyes veering away, while Yashiro had her eyes glued to the soldier's back, as the colors swirled, "But that wasn't what I was talking about, though."

"Then, what happened between you and the nobility?" Fixing Takeru a frontal gaze, the scientist hurries.

"Well… It's… Sigh, really, it doesn't matter," He says, low, and goes back to drinking.

"The one who decides that is me. Shirogane, why are you being so rejecting towards the IRG all of a sudden?" She presses, halting the spin, staring at him.

Yet, he stays silent, and drops the empty mug on a table to then hold his face, obstruct his eyes from all around him. Yashiro quivers as his aura darkens, as he starts gripping his hair.

Yet, the scientist force palms her desk, the onset of a frown lurking, "Shirogane, we can't keep pushing the issue to tomorrow. Alt IV requires you to tune the 00 Unit, and regaining your identity and citizenship is of utmost importance for the plan, for humanity's victory," He remains unmoving, it felt as if a twister of rusted metal had spawned in her stomach, "… And it's also for your own goals, isn't it? If you wanted to forge a peaceful world, and you have to remain here after we stabilize your self, then you have to face this head on. You're the only Shirogane in this world, and like it or not, you'll have to deal with this sooner or later. And I rather solve this in the short term, if you wouldn't mind cooperating."

"P-Professor, stop pressuring him, please," Yashiro pleaded, almost in a whisper.

"What? I'm just stating the obvious. I can understand him being reticent to see more… painful memories, but that doesn't change what we have to do to ensure our plan bears fruit," She shrugs slowly, shaking her head at the dejected eyes of Yashiro, who hung her head and remained still, "Surely, you don't plan on staying hidden under my skirt for the rest of your life, do you Shirogane?"

"… It hurt, hearing his grief," He relents, barely a whisper.

"Yes, I am aware. You were about to start bawling your eyes out after the session, after all."

"Professor…" Yashiro gave the scientist the scariest, darkest glare she could muster, still trying to comfort the soldier, to rid those dark colors from his aura.

"Our situation has not changed, however. All we did was delay the confrontation," She reminds, staring at the hunched posture of the soldier, "If you do want to stay in this world working for me, you'll have to to find a compromise to offer if following my orders isn't to your liking. Failure to manage this situation tactfully will mark an abrupt end to our partnership," Forcing the frost out, firmly looking at him, at his stillness, made her frown a bit, "And let me remind you, your world is-"

"I don't need a fucking reminder," He let out, lashing out. Yashiro flinched away, her skin crawling at the dark hue of blue enveloped the soldier, "But thanks for the brutal honesty, Yuuko. I'll… think well what it is I can do."

"Takeru-san, don't take this so hard," She reassured, hesitating for a moment before again reaching out for his shoulder, "We are your allies."

"Sigh… You're even making Yashiro worry. Can't you see that it's for the greater good, to heed my words?"

"Hehe… Hehehe…" The soldier lowly chuckled, through a hoarse throat.

"… Shirogane?" Yuuko looked at him, who was subtly shaking as he chuckled to himself.

"… It's all about the greater good, isn't it," Shaking his head, a twisted smile raises in his complexion as his eyes squint and narrow, as if he were in front of blazing fire.

"… Is something the matter?" Yuuko frowns, leaning forward and interlocking her hands, "Do you have a… Huh?" Stopping cold, she could only remain silent as Yashiro moved away from Takeru while shooting the scientist a firm glare, for her anyways you'd understand, "Shirogane, what's the matter?"

"Nothing… Just…" Inhaling sharply, he remains silent. The scientist sighs, standing up to serve herself more coffee. Slowly smiling and thanking Yashiro, Takeru then shot a gaze at Yuuko, a neutral expression on his face, as she also observed him well while filling her mug, "… Yuuko, you're dead set on having me talk with the Guard?" She nods, immediately, "Then, do you… know of a mission… called Shura's Dance?"

And her eyes widened, as did her mouth. And a shiver ran down her spine, along a buzz in her ears, suddenly tasting metal in her mouth as the memories of that day, that accursed day of defeat returned to her mind.

"Wh-What did you… Ouch!" The shock loosened her hand's grip, and so her mug fell and shattered on the floor. The warm coffee hit her leg, burning her momentarily, having her hastily step away from the mess.

"Hey, are you alright?" The soldier asks, standing up only to freeze in his tracks as Yuuko drove a blaze of a gaze into him, gritting her teeth.

"You… You just said Shura's Dance, didn't you?!"

"Y-Yeah… I… heard that name, in the middle of the memories. So you do know of this mission…"

"… I may, yes. So… Wait, I have to clean this," Shaking her head, frowning at the scattered pieces of the mug, she heaved a sigh. But before she could move towards the locket where she stored a few cleaning supplies, a small mop rubbed itself against her leg.

Somehow, the young Yashiro had changed into a cleaning form, a small white cloth covering her forehead, a small mop at the ready to clean, and a small plastic bag and a broom to pick up the broken shards. As she diligently cleaned the spilled coffee and broken mug, in small and slow movements, Yuuko couldn't help but to remain staring, blinking in quick succession, her brows corking in confusion.

"How… did she even… Where did she got that broom from?"

"Eh, from the Hammerspace, probably," Takeru said, chuckling lightly as Yashiro was finishing her cleaning.

"… Hammerspace?" Yuuko shot him a look, "What is that supposed to be, Shirogane?"

"The way in which a pirate can shove a dog into his pockets, or a young elf boy fit a bow, a dozens of bombs and arrows, as well as a grappling hook on his backpack."

"… What?"

"Don't worry, it's just a gaming term."

"But… But how did she even-"

"Professor," Yashiro said as she tied the plastic bag, "Where do I leave this?"

"Just… Sigh… Take the mop to one of the service areas and have it cleaned, the staff there can dispose of the broken mug, too," Shaking her head, deciding to not think too hard about this, she nods towards Yashiro as she turn around to leave, giving the soldier one last look as he waved away.

And for a moment, both merely sat down again, sharing the quietness. Seeing he was not willing to speak up, she leaned on the desk and stared.

"Shirogane, I do share the displeasure towards the more… extreme elements of the IRG, to an extent. I did have a few allies in the IRG before, and they were rather… ruthless, truth be told. But this… attitude isn't making you any favors. If it is for your own good, is it that hard for you to share one dance with the devil?" He remains silent, closing his eyes, gripping his clothes. She shakes her head slowly, tapping her chin with a finger, "If you are not willing to make a compromise, I believe you know fate will force a sacrifice out of you."

"… Is that a threat, Vice Commander Kouzuki ?"

"A word of advice, from your boss and legal guardian. So, I am aware of the… pain that you felt during this last recovery session, but if you keep delaying the decision, they will only grow more distrustful towards both of us."

"I know…"

"Then, why are you running away?"

"I'm not."

"Then, what's this pouty attitude of yours?"

"I'm just… trying to calm down, before I snap," He then sighs heavily, she noticed he was clawing at his knees.

"… Shirogane, talk. Now."

"Sigh… I am not running away. If he made it out from that night, and became a surface pilot at such a young age, I won't… dishonor his struggle. But… I never had such issues with the IRG, not on such a personal level. And… it echoes in me, the pain he felt," Looking up, he met her eyes. She didn't find any of the usual cheer, only a poker face, a tight expression she saw in the soldier's face, "So Yuuko…" He started, clasping his hands together as tight as if he were praying, "You do know about this…" Lips shook, as did his knees, "mission called Shura's Dance?"

"Sigh… Yes, I do. What about it?"

"Do you have access to the casualty list?"

"What? Why do you want to know that?"

"Do you or not?"

"… I do, yes. What do you want from it?"

"… Can you search for the surname 'Kurosawa' in it?" He asks, staring into her eyes.

And she could only wonder why, why were his eyes firm yet wavering, where was his prior fire he had during the talk with the guards. So she sighed, and started typing on her computer, bringing up the UN's report on the mission, "So… Who exactly am I looking for?" He tells her the correct kanjis, she nods with a hum, narrowing her search.

"… Are there… four people with the same surname?" He asks, low, his face again covered by both hands.

And Yuuko flinched slightly, as she arrived at their names a second after he asked that, seeing that there were, in fact, four people in the report with the surname and kanji the soldier had asked. Taking a second to gauge his expression, she leaned back on her seat, "… Do you think these people's deaths affected… how past you saw the IRG?" And gulping hard, folding her arms, Yuuko asks the conclusion, "Were you deployed to Shura's Dance, then?"

"He was sent to fight then, I think," He nods, still holding his face tightly, "And that's why… I can understand now the anger I felt in the CCSE."

"Sigh… Why? You didn't have this kind of reaction to-"

"Remember the day you threatened me with your gun?"

"… What about it?" She asks, low, eyeing him sideways.

"Remember what I showed you, those fuzzy memories of Iceberg?"

"Wha… Are you saying…"

"Shura's Dance was to him… what Iceberg was for me, Yuuko. It feels that way. But…" Lodging his nape on the sofa, looking up as he sighs, Takeru felt as if all warmth were leaking through his legs, through his back, enveloped by the coldness once more, "It's crushing… like my nightmares. That's why… I can understand, why he would hate, despite the Guard. And… that's why I don't want to see anything else, or get close to the Guard or Yuuhi."

"If you have these memories… Shirogane, we can confirm your identity now!" Rising from her seat, hitting her desk with a hand, the towers of papers shaking and about to collapse, Yuuko couldn't help but to smirk, "It's all a matter of presenting in the right way, and you can regain your-"

"Didn't you hear? I want none of that shit in me anymore."

"… Excuse me?"

"I… don't want to be near them, Yuuko. This was enough."

"… Then, what do we do if they press charges? No, even if they don't and we prove your identity, do you really think Her Highness will simply desist in her insistence to see you?"

"… I don't care. I'm not meeting with them."

"… Alt IV requires you to remain safe. Shirogane, what is it with you now? You… wouldn't happen to be getting cold feet, are you now?"

Frowning, he returns the glare, yet sighs again as he shakes his head, "There's… a few things I really do hate, Yuuko."

"Huh?"

"Not just dislike. I mean, really, really hate. You know what I mean?"

"I suppose… What has this to do with Her Highness or your identity?"

"Sigh…" His teeth start grinding each other, tension boiling over in his stomach as he hunches over, resting his elbows on his shaking knees. And all the while, his eyes were blazing again, as the soldier he once was, "That it's really, really hard for me to keep my cool when in front of shit I don't agree with. I can try to keep a poker face, try to grin and bear it… but there are a few things… that I just don't vibe with. And… if I snap… the one who pays for it is you. So I don't want to force a situation where, most likely, I'll lose my cool."

"Nice way to dodge the issue entirely, Shirogane," Yuuko slowly claps, rolling her eyes, "Why do you not want to meet with the Guard? Out with it."

"Because he felt back then as I feel about Iceberg now," The restrain is scorched, the fire roars alive, and his words shoot out as fast and roughly as a cannon ball would, "Those bastards filled their mouth with the preaching, saying it was all for humanity's victory… but in the end, it was only for their own benefit. They left us to die, holding out pointlessly against hordes of BETA. They could have deployed the G-Bombs faster, they could have saved many lives back then. But they didn't… they let us all die as meat shields."

Lips twisting, a cold shiver ran down Yuuko's back, a soft twinge of pain below her ears as she curled her hair behind them, "The military has to do what it has to, Shirogane. You should know that well. Humanity's salvation comes before saving a few lives, I'm sure… that the HC of Alt V also thought the same. And the same goes for… the authorities that planned Shura's Dance."

"Yeah, but that doesn't mean abandoning your subordinates to a cruel death just because. They had options… and they chose to do nothing."

"… And what does this has to do with you not wanting to regain your identity?"

"Because… after that night where he was left alone in his room… I saw glimpses of that mission, that's why… I cut Kasumi off again. But…" Clutching his head, clawing at his scalp, the frown intensified, "I can still hear that, the sounds, the voices… it was buzzing in my ears for a long while, even during the meeting. That's why… I can understand why he grew to despise them… It reminds me of my first loops, and… it makes me upset, frustrated."

"… Your first loops?" She asks, leaning on her desk.

"Yeah. That pressure, that struggle… kind of reminded me of my own trials when you left the base and I tried to keep the squad afloat, when I tried to keep Kasumi company. And…" Silently hugging his elbows, he shook his head.

"… And, what?" She presses, tapping a few papers with a finger.

Looking at her, looking away, he licked the inner side of his mouth time and again for a moment, sensing that lavender perfume again for a second, "And it reminds me of… the time when I married Meiya, of all I had to do to be… worthy of standing besides her. So I can share that dejection, that cold trickling on my back, that… hollowness in my chest that he felt back then. That's why… well… I'm still kind of shocked, trying to keep my cool."

And again, those memories came back, and for as much relief and warmth they gave to the soldier, it also caused his fingers to bend, to clutch his sides as his heart was piked over and over.

" It wasn't easy, on me or Kasumi, to hear that night's echo. All the while, his other struggles, the dismissive nature of the tutors, it all cemented that loneliness that was seeping in his heart. Of course they would only find disdain for little me, as the outsider he was, just like me," He reasoned, frozen hands poking his sides as he shook his head, " And as crushing as his feelings were… recalling those days with my Meiya, both the good and the bad, leaves those memories of him so, so lacking in comparison. Of course he'd grow so distant, so disappointed in the IRG as a whole. In this world, where the old values are upheld as if a sacred treasure they were, anyone who doesn't follow that to a T is seen as a stranger. And in our nation… those who stand out, those who are different… only receive disdain and scorn."

The smile by his side when waking up, the advice she always had at the ready, and the insistence to have him duel with her, it all made the soldier lose more and more tension, as the nostalgia hit his heart and hollowed his insides.

" Even amidst the coldness of that mountain, the silent disapproval of Raiden-san back then, I still had something to cling onto to make it all worth it. And as much as I miss my Meiya, I had her then. I remember her. I was blessed to be with her. But… going by the crushing sadness he felt then…" And for a moment, a glimpse of a young Yuuhi's face flashed in his mind. It only made his heart shrink, his breath cut in half.

"… What does that mean?" Yuuko's sharp question, low voice, yanks the soldier out of his mind. She was in the act of walking to the coffee machine, yet she had stopped cold in her tracks, the mug held in midair and frozen as her expression.

"Hm? What is it?"

"Shirogane, you said you… married Mitsurugi?"

"Yeah?"

"… In your world, I assume?"

"Oh, no. In both worlds, actually."

"… Are you being serious?" Yet, the scientist still remained still, her brows corking more and more in confusion.

"Well… if you must know, we never got actually married in my first loops. There were some issues back then, what with Alt. V being enacted and all, so Meiya had her head elsewhere at times. Still, we did get engaged… but thanks to Iceberg we didn't get to, you know, put the rings on," Sigh… She was just my fiancee back then, but from my eyes it's all the same. I loved that Meiya, and nothing will change that, he concluded, allowing himself a small smile.

"Huh, is that how it is then," She grumbled, eyeing Takeru sideways as she, very carefully, filled her mug this time, "… And you didn't mention that until now because…"

"Huh? What's this about?" Squinting his eyes, he stared in confusion.

Yuuko merely sighs, pinching the bridge of her nose, before grabbing her mug and drinking as she slowly sits down, "Ahem… First, are you certain you're not being… led astray by your own emotions?"

"Sigh… I'm not. On the contrary, remembering my old lives… kind of lets me figure out what he'd have done. If we're truly similar, being the same entity but in different worlds, then… chances are he'd have been super crushed by having to endure all that pressure on his own. I don't think little me would have wished to stay there, and being so young I don't think he'd have… well, any restrain to not react badly against Maya-san or someone else," I'd be surprised if he didn't yell at them or said something hurtful. Even back in my world I had somehow gotten mature enough to not snap most of the time, but still, he was just a little kid .

Yuuko nods, silent for a second, drinking her coffee and enduring the urge to scratch her ears, "I see… And you don't suppose that, perhaps, Her Purpleness could have been for him what Mitsurugi was for you before?" She inquires, eyeing the soldier sideways.

"Well, it's true he did seem to like Yuuhi back then…" And they did knew each other since they were little… I don't think that sweet little girl had any malice towards little me back then, no. But the core of the matter isn't what Yuuhi did or didn't do, he reasoned. And then, the smell of gunpowder, the explosions surrounding him, singing on his ear as they had during Iceberg made the soldier wince, release quite some air from his nose, "The real problem here is… I can't wipe that feeling creeping on the back of my head, that he and Yuuhi didn't stay on good terms."

"Care to elaborate?"

"Sigh… You won't let this go?"

"Shirogane, if you want my collaboration in halting the Guard's attempts to file a demand of identity theft on your neck, I expect you to do your share. To properly analyze the data from each recovery session, I need you to tell me everything you think is worth mentioning, no matter how inconsequential it might seem. Both for the tuning of the 00 Unit and your own stabilization, let me remind you."

Yet… as you'd understand, those words were poorly chosen by the scientist. After all, she did not truly know how the soldier operated below his determined and driven demeanor.

"Still… I want nothing to do with these people. I'm sure… they don't have any good intentions towards someone like me. We can prove my identity, yeah, but I won't… be talking with them or seeing anything else. Let's… leave this at that."

"Sigh… Look, I cannot shield you if you refuse to cooperate. You'll have to stay in this world, and like it or not, you're the only Shirogane here. I cannot risk this issue to grow any more than this, it is quite fair to assume Her Highness will be notified of the meeting and your answers during it," She nods, arms folded. Takeru gives a nod and a sigh in agreement, relaxing his posture as he again crashes his back upon the sofa. She shakes her head, sits down, and starts to slowly spin once more, "If the Shogun even hints at being displeased with me, or… if any eyes are directed to you… We will have to take extreme measures to prevent that from obfuscating Alt IV's success, as I'm sure you'd understand. The shock you're feeling is noted, yet I expect you to regain your composure by tomorrow. I'd like for us to reach a zero risk solution."

"Haha… Heheheh…"

"… What's so funny, Shirogane?"

"No, you see… Someone said the same in the memory I saw," Again, the twisted smile, again the sinking of his shoulders, and a small, minimal watering of his eyes, "When I… When he tried to hold his ground to help the nearby settlements, someone told him that their goal was to halt the BETA at all costs. No matter the casualties suffered. That so long as they secured a zero risk solution for Tokyo and Hakuryo Base, the mission was a success."

Yuuko looked away, her insides freezing over for a second, eyes squinting at the reminiscence took her to days she'd rather forget. So she crossed a leg over the other, and after inhaling sharply, she looked back towards her soldier, that she expected to still be grieving.

Yet, she found a scowl, a cannon ball of pure fire rushing into her eyes, "And, wanna hear something crazy, Yuuko? Within his heart… there wasn't just anger towards the authorities of the IRG that refused to move from their positions or to the MDF that refused their aid…" He said, low. And the scientist could tell where he was going, and she, too, could smell gunpowder around her, sticking to her face, to her hair and lab coat. And returning himself fully upright in the sofa, their stares met, "There was also… quite some anger towards a particular name, the one person who requested the mission, the one who ordered to hold the line regardless of the cost in lives… Care to take a guess who that someone is?"

"… Are you seriously going to do this?"

"If you want me to pass as him, if you want me to keep recalling these memories no matter what… if that's what it takes for you to devise a way to stabilize me and help my world with the ripples of causality, then I demand to know what you truly know of this mission, that broke him in half as Iceberg broke me before. As the one who devised it, I'm sure you can see… why it's hard for me to hold it together," He admitted, and Yuuko then took notice of the shaking of his knees, and why his voice and eyes had lost so much luster.

Sighing, finishing her coffee yet tasting metal and smoke, she grimaced for a moment, "I can… understand the anger towards the Guard, considering your… prior experiences with them going by what memories you showed me before. Yet, I believe this… animosity towards your only ally is unwarranted."

"… Considering how you get when backed into a corner, I'm not so sure."

"What are you trying to say? That… I'm not worth your trust?"

"That I know you wouldn't doubt to… crack a few eggs to make a good omelet. Just like how you risked the base's crew during the XM3's test before, or sent the Valkyries in secret to Niigata despite the warning I gave you."

"And those decisions gave us the XG-line, if your memories are to be believed," She leans forward, rising her chin, bolstering the fire. And in doing so, the orchestra of destruction flashed over her eyes for a moment, and forced Yuuko to look away. From the soldier's eyes, from the broken cities, from the burnt ribbons and plushies, "It was… quite a profitable exchange, and it delivered us to the ultimate victory at Kashgar, didn't it?"

"… And exactly that, is what both he and me despise about you."

"Oh, I'm sorry. I was not aware I had to appease your own morals when handling the salvation of the entire human race."

"It's not about morals, Yuuko. It's about the future, about the world that'll come after the war. I… don't want to go through that suicide again. I… don't think I can take it. Not again."

"It gave us enough time to devise a counterattack on the BETA. The perfect timeline does not exist, Shirogane. Sacrifices are unavoidable," She says, louder, more to herself than to the soldier, you'd understand.

"… And just because of that, you rather surrender our future to those pigs?" Looking up, the fuse of his temper about to light up.

"The authorities only did what they thought was best. Lingering on hatred will do nothing for you."

"It's not hatred… at least not from me…"

"Then, out with it. What is wrong with you? Because, if you're going to be this unstable… I won't let you get close to the 00 Unit, you're useless to Alt IV as you are now," She redirected the conversation, to douse the echoes that lingered in her background hearing.

"I'm just-"

"And don't forget, the more unstable you are, the harder it'll be to stabilize you. Your world is on the line too, isn't it?" She pressed, slamming her mug against her desk, as she did with her head after that mission.

"You… don't have to remind me. Siiigh…"

"So? Are you going to give me an explanation, or will you keep rambling?"

"… I'll keep it simple then. I won't be assuming his identity, because that comes with me involving myself with people which I hate. And… I don't trust in my ability to remain composed in such a situation, so I think it's for the best to give up on this line."

"If you hated them in this world, yet still worked with the Guard until the end, what's the difference?"

"That, since you want me to mingle with them, you plan to negotiate with the IRG for support. Using me as bait."

"And why would you be against that? You said it before me, we need all the allies we can gather," She reminds, waving a finger.

"Because I… don't want to support those kind of people. You've seen how this Empire is in this world, and that's when it's at the brink of destruction. What will they do when they regain their power?" He says, frowning a bit, folding his arms and looking away.

"And why do you care so much about that? Do you have a… particular sympathy for a faction in this nation?" Holding his gaze in silence, she stares unblinking.

Yet, Takeru shook his head, shrugging, "No, that's linked to the second question. Yuuko, do you… plan to go through Ouka?"

"Ouka? Oh, you mean the assault on the Original Hive? Well…" Leaning back on her chair, doing a short spin as she grasped her chin, she hummed for a moment, "It depends on how Sadogashima is handled, but we will have to nullify Target One sooner rather than later. You told me why, since the Reactors can grow stronger and that… entity in Kashgar could become a hazard we cannot remove. If you have an alternative plan, I'm all ears."

"… We need time. I told you before that-"

"Time is a luxury we do not enjoy. One thing is for you to be… in denial about the options you possess, after the shock of these memories, but the handling of the war is another matter entirely. Do you have a concrete reason to oppose a raid on the Kashgar Hive?"

"… I don't want to go through that again. I won't accept that future," Feeling his skin peeling off by heat, as it did when firing the cannon on Mitsurugi, feeling that cold embrace as he did when the power plant blew up, the soldier again held the scientist's gaze, enduring the silence.

And seeing his veneer not bending, Yuuko folded her arms, frosting over, "Your emotions matter little in front of reality. I can see how a… younger version of you might have taken the cruelty of war in quite the negative light, but you're supposed to be a veteran by now. You once worked by my side in one of your loops, did you not? Compromises are required to reach our goals, you'd understand."

"… Sorry, but my emotions matter to me. They're what guides me forward, what is keeping me from lashing out in anger towards the Guards, what makes me who I am instead of another mindless dog . My goal is to save people, I won't surrender to that suicide. The world after Ouka is not a solution."

And then, something teared in Yuuko's heart, as the echoes of that mission kept playing in loop on her ears,"What… What are you saying? Are you hearing yourself? Defeating the BETA is not a solution for you?! Then, what? What are we supposed to do, huh?"

"… I don't know yet. But that road is not a solution," He says, holding himself firm in front of the towering tsunami of her wrath.

"Defeating the BETA is the only way for us to reach victory and save this planet. Neutralizing the enemy before we pass the point of no return is our shared objective, do not forget that Alt V is still looming over our necks."

Licking his lips, crossing his legs, and his eyes too for a moment, instead of coldness… He could feel fire, fire running through his spine, through his veins, "… Once we defeat the BETA, I wonder who 'the enemy' will be."

"There won't be a tomorrow if we don't defeat the BETA, and you should know that well," She says, hitting the desk lightly, spinning as she folds her arms, fumes and groans, then releases it all to regain her poise, "You should know it better than me, perhaps, as you lived through a detonation of a G-Bomb."

"Exactly," He replies, firm and seeking her eyes, who squinted upon seeing his fixated stare on her features, "There won't be a 'tomorrow' if we don't take actions that will bring about a true change to our situation, beyond the BETA threat. There has to be something we can do. I… I can take accidents in the field, I can understand a sacrifice in a mission… but to surrender so many lives… when we could have done something to save them… True peace won't come about by building it atop pillars of corpses, and you should know better than me that… the real war starts after Kashgar is taken down."

"… Was there an incident regarding G-Elements in your prior experiences you haven't told me about?"

A cold shiver on his back, a warm one in his heart, the soldier twisted his lips as he scratched his head, looking upwards, "No, it's not that. It's more like… a background noise, an uneasy feeling… Even without the BETA, if you keep pushing for this kind of compromises… things will get out of control again."

"Do you have any proof to back up these 'hunches' of yours?" She presses, frowning.

"What, besides the fact that humanity will get loads of G-Elements and start mass producing XG-like machines? My world had it tough with terrorism, and… I showed you what happened during Sadogashima in my last loop. We cannot leave the G-Elements in the wrong hands, or something worse than that collapse will come to pass. And last time… I didn't help at all with that, so I don't want to leave that disaster behind me again. I… won't be leaving that mess behind, never."

"… Without the support of the current governments, we are bound and gagged. Without compromising on certain topics, we won't make any progress in our plans," Yuuko states, sighing for a moment, before re-locking her gaze on his, running a hand over her hair, ignoring the echoes, the taste of metal, "I… do understand your concerns, however it is not your duty to handle those matters. There are no other alternatives left for us at this stage of the game, I am convinced that your last experience was, quite possibly, the best possible outcome. I'm sure that world's me was also content with the result of her struggles."

But then, he hunched over. And this time, he didn't fight the impulse and his eyes watered.

"… Then, why did you bring Kasumi along when you asked me to kill you?"

"… Huh?"

"If that future really was the best outcome we could forge, if you truly were satisfied with that result… Then, you wouldn't have tested me like that, you wouldn't have dared me to stay there."

Like a petal landing on her skin, a raindrop of cold hit Yuuko's nape, "… I don't follow what you're-"

Hands shaking as they tightened, his gaze remained crashed down, burning on the ground, "If you wanted to die, if you really wanted me to kill you… you wouldn't have brought Kasumi along. And even if you did want to die, I don't think you'd ask. You know your genius is necessary for the progress of humanity, to make sure the BETA never bring us to near death again, and to protect the research you worked on for most of your life, to ensure it was not used to destroy the planet you fought so hard to protect. Even if… you were screwed for sure, you wouldn't have ran away from the consequences of your actions. But then, if there was nothing else left to do, if you were content with how things played out, you wouldn't have brought Kasumi along."

"What… What are you getting at?" Gulping slowly, the shower of petals drizzled over her, a small yet continuous collapse.

"… I don't know if that Yuuko knew what would happen to me once I got back to my world, and I'll probably never know," Smiling, yet biting his lips, he shook his head, "But what I am sure of… is that she wanted me to stay. That's why she brought Kasumi… because if I killed her then and there… Kasumi would have been left all alone. But I… already was aware Sensei would be made responsible for what we did during Ouka. I knew… Kasumi was going to end up alone…" Hitting his knees, closing his eyes, his eyes burn and burn, "… and I still left."

"And what… does this have to do with-"

"I didn't see it, I didn't recognize the signs. Even when I remembered my relations with my squadmates… I remained in denial about having been with her… so I couldn't see it… The last card Yuuko played, the last thing she tried… was to see if I wanted to stay, if I had the will to keep struggling… After all, most of her allies would have forsaken her once she was of no more use. At the very least, I could have shielded Kasumi for her. But I… a-abandoned them…"

"I… I do not… think you're correct. Even if you stayed in that world… as the sole human to have communicated with a BETA, you also would have been-"

"I'm sure I would have been too valuable to kill. Even if I was useless during Kashgar as I sat down firing missiles, I learned to handle an XG in record time. And you credited me for the XM3, too. And… if I had stayed, I'm sure you would have done everything you could have done to shield me. You always do, even if it goes against what I want most of the time," Sighing, he again hunches over.

It made her feel a blade of fire thrust into her gut, the petals bombarding the back of her head as if she were under hail, "However… You're merely assuming she wanted you to-"

"I'm not assuming anything. I'm sure she… wanted me to remain by her side, as I did in the world were I chose her over the squad. Up until the end, I was Sensei's wildcard during last loop. And I left her hand empty when she needed me the most."

Spinning away from his sight, she took in a deep breath, "And… you're convinced of that because…"

"Because, Vice Commander, you don't allow yourself to be Yuuko… unless you're about to jump into the abyss."

"What? That's… quite the odd assumption you've made," Ruffling her hair, she fakes a smile, shrugging, "Sadly, I don't know what-"

"Did you know that you chased me away the first times I tried to reach you in Sendai?"

"I don't… see how that-"

Smiling again, chuckling as he kicks his legs off, relaxed and stretched, Takeru places both hands behind his head, looking up, looking back, "You were like you're being right now. Poker face in place, stone cold tone, barely even moving your body, not even meeting my eyes. Took me a lot of insisting to even get to meet you in person, only for you to shoo me away. Do you have any idea how much trouble I got into, trying to get pass the air-tight security of the IRG in Sendai?" He sends her a bothered glare, she merely looks away, "But I kept at it, until one day… you allowed me into your lab. The day I brought you the pass, and you allowed me to help you get out from there. And while you remained as you always were most of the time from then on… there was one occasion in which… you asked me something similar to when you handed me that gun a second time…"

His breathing halted. Rubbing his eyes, cleaning the water in them, he could only shake his head, run a hand over his neck. For as pleasant as remembering those days was, they also came with their fair share of poisonous spikes. For as much as the storms he had endured had cleansed the bitter feelings from his heart, the wound… still remained, open and aching.

She, however, couldn't see it. And merely shrugged, slightly frowning, "… You're speaking of other versions of myself. I have nothing… to do with those individuals, don't expect me to behave as they do."

"Yuuko, I'm sure you know Kashgar isn't the end," He immediately countered, she relented a small nod as he stared, "And… I can understand his anger at Shura's Dance, as I was during Iceberg, because it meant… the annihilation of the life he so much loved. And you don't have to tell me anything about it… but the you I know, both the XO and Yuuko, would never, not in a million years, have abandoned Yokohama like that. Not without a good damn reason."

And her hands shook. And her eyes blazed. And running a hand into her hair, burning away the petals, wanting to spit away the metal and the poison she tasted in her mouth, she faced his stare, everything else blurring for a moment, "… So you say you understand my thought process? That you understand what I went through then? Then, come on! Say it, why did I order that 'inhuman' mission?!"

"… Because you were gambling on the BETA making a Hive. Because by showing the military that they were fucked ten ways to Sunday, it would make the Empire stop refusing UN aid. And I'm sure you knew Yuuhi was not going to leave Tokyo once she was appointed as the Shogun, so you used that to your advantage. So by sacrificing northern Yokohama… you crafted a scenario that would force the IRG to cooperate with the MDF, that would make the defense lines more compact, more efficient for the amount of troops the Empire had at its disposal."

"… Huh? How… How do you-"

Pointing a finger up, he continued, never letting go of her stare, "This also would let you move to Sendai, where the government was located. To let you operate there yourself, and possibly have the STF monitor any… insurgent desires within the more fervent members of the Empire. You created a path that would lead to fewer deaths in the long run. You did what the IRG and the MDF did not want to do, you forced them to act in unison, to let everyone see… that Japan's days were numbered," Sighing, he then eases up, doused and cooling down, "And even if you didn't know… your actions forced him see the… r-reality of the shelters, of the madness that was to not evacuate our civilians to another nation. You were the fire that burned away the pointless hopes they harbored, and pointed them to a real solution. You woke them up from the daydream, into a dark reality that still could be saved."

"… Is that so. So then, if you think this about the mission, why do you refuse my idea? If you know what I do is truly for the best, after all your loops, why do you refuse?"

Again smiling in a twisted way, barely raising his voice, "Because that's why he hated you, just as I despised you after the XM3's test. Because he did not understand what fueled the orders, the cruelty he saw, and many used your… evacuation to fuel their own agendas. And I'm sure you know… you're facing a similar board right now. And you didn't surrender back then, when you had nothing close to a working 00 Unit, when the downfall of the Empire would have meant a direct shift to Alt V."

"… Get to the damn point, Shirogane," She threatened, barely enduring the smell of burnt steel that came from the city, the image of the assault, of the downfall of Hakuryo. As well as her own inner devils, which reminded her of how she abandoned her family's lab, the streets she walked every day, the parks she visited. The city she swore to protect, the dream, the duty that pushed her forward… reduced to ashes, as the hazy dark blurred her surroundings. So she gulped as took a deep breath, before she shifted back to those days… before Yuuko sealed herself away…

Seeing her well, Takeru nodded, returning her stare, trying not to focus on those old days of war under gray skies "I… I can fight well, but I can't negotiate. I get upset, I care too much. But… this can't be the only option we have in our hands, because I'm here and this world is way too different to my last loop. And I know it's unfair, to keep pushing everything onto your shoulders but… Can you really not look for a better solution that doesn't involve a massive suicide, Yuuko?"

"… And if I do, and the answer does not please you, what happens?"

"… I help you out for as long as I can. Then… once the 00 Unit is working at full output… if I'm a hazard, you're free to erase me or send me back the way I came."

"… Excuse me?"

"You heard me. If our goals don't align… if my hopes have no worth in this world… I'll just leave. Once the 00 Unit is in working order, all you gotta do is prep Model D to 100% power. I… wasn't even of much help during the Kashgar raid, to be honest."

Uneasy as she saw his fire whisked away in a flash, watching his dejected posture, Yuuko took a moment to herself, "Just to be clear… What are you expecting from me?"

"… For you to stop trying to shoulder everything on your own, and to not rush Kashgar again. The world needs you strong after the end of the BETA war. And you can't… you can't chase the fastest solution all the time. You can't take on the curves if you're blasting the accel all the time," He affirmed with a nod.

"Quite the request, coming from someone who has given no answer to what a solution would entail," So, she spew a bit of the venom that was brewing.

"Come on… I'm just trying not to get negative right now. Of course I can't come up with an answer on the spot now. And anyways, you can't let yourself get locked so easily, Yuuko. You told me why that was bad yourself, didn't you? That when you focus too much on one kind of feeling, your vision grows narrow, the link you establish with other worlds pulls only one kind of data. At this rate… all you'll do is attract the tachyons of the worlds where you can only win by sacrificing everything. We can't keep let that result to come to pass now!"

"… What?"

"I mean, if you're not even handling the tech of the 00 Unit now and-"

"No, not that. What did you say before?"

"That you can erase me if you-"

"No, no! Right before!"

"You mean the stuff about the tachyons?"

"… Pardon me?"

Staring at her, Takeru couldn't help but to recall the talk he had with his world's Yuuko in the restaurant after the incidents, and how shocked she was when he told her of the 00 Unit. Only this time, I believe it is quite fair to affirm the scientist was at least ten times more flabbergasted at the words he so casually uttered.

"Yuuko, what's up?" He asked, raising a brow.

"You said… tachyons right now, didn't you?"

"Yeah?"

"… Why?"

"What do you mean, why? It's as you told me before, those… faster-than-light thingies that disrupt causality and junk?" He asked, raising a brow.

It only made Yuuko gape for a moment, "I… told you about tachyons? What did I tell you again?"

Squinting his eyes, blackboards full of strange annotations and long ramblings filled the soldier's mind. Shortly after, he shook his head and gave up in understanding it at all, "Uh… You know, how the grandfather theory was all wrong because all worlds are parallel… so it was like the idea I had during the CCSE about the trees and the worlds. I remembered your words back then, when I thought of the branch theory and how my memories related to it, and is how I realized a few things about- Uh… Yuuko?"

Eyes twitching, lips shaking, eyes blazing, the scientist made an effort not to raise her voice, "… You never… told me of this 'branch theory' you had. What is this about?"

"Come on, now. You know, don't you? Since any changes to causality spawn a different branch in a timeline, the grandfather theory was flawed. Uh… let me remember how it went… If A sends, like, a warning to the past to B, then that creates a rift in the timeline. But since tachyons ignore causality, that spawns a branch where B did receive the intel and another where B didn't. So the future where A sends the data to B still exists along the past where history was never altered, but there's another branch in which the B from the past receives the warning from A, thus changes the future to another outcome," Stopping for a second, scratching his nose and shifting his posture on the sofa as Yuuko silently stared, he then coughed, "You see, I was doubting if had used the boat or not during the CCSE during last loop. There was a world where I solved literally everything perfectly back there but… I didn't take that route last loop. But the data existed, and the possibility is out there, somewhere. And the same is happening now, right? Since I'm a strengthened Nucleus, I'm basically a tachyon magnet since the fact that I can draw memories from other worlds is a big middle finger to causality, right? That's why I can even remember stuff from other timelines, and why the girls got so negative so fast."

And then, silence.

For a moment, then another.

With only the clock on the wall and the buzz of the computers lingering in the air.

"… Shirogane?"

"Yes?"

"Since when did you knew of all this?"

"What do you mean, since when? Uh… I, um… Since always? You told me… Well, not you, but, you know…"

"And… And why didn't you tell me before?!" Blasting away from her seat, Yuuko erupted in shock and elation, and a bit of anger, towards the words she just heard, "I've been racking my brains to understand the Nucleus' theory and… and you're telling me… I was right all along?!"

"To be fair, when aren't you?" He asked, eyeing her sideways.

Still blazing, her words shoot out faster than bullets from a Gun Sweeper's raid, as she started hitting the desk over and over, steam spewing from her ears, "Praise won't save from this! Do you have any idea how much this changes my research?! Do you?!"

"No, but-"

"Everything! It changes everything!" The babel towers of papers fall apart, she keeps blazing, "If there is something that can actually disrupt causality to such lengths, and the Nucleus is the state in which a human can become a vessel for the phenomenon to occur… Then, that explains the difference! How did I not see it?! Yes, yes… They are two different anomalies, so if the oracle tries to devise a solution to an impossible setback… then, it is through it that the sharing occurs!"

"Uh, Yuuko? Could you come back to Earth, please? We kinda need you down here," Again not understanding anything she was blabbering about, he could only stare and wait.

"Shirogane!" Clipping through the desk, she approaches her soldier, grappling his shoulders.

The closeness made him flinch, stand still and frozen, "Y-Yes?"

"Is there any other secret that I wouldn't tell anyone that you know about?"

"… Your three sizes, for example," In his nervousness, he blurts out.

"… Do you want to die?"

"Sincerity is a virtue. Also…" Scratching his head, he looks away, "I don't know what qualifies as a secret for you. You… did kinda like to rant when we were working together as I made you coffee, there's lots of those crazy theories you've told me," She groans a bit, releasing his shoulders, restoring the soldier's personal space. He sighs, oh, so heavily "And… anyways, are you sure we didn't talk about this already? I could swear we… discussed this before, when dealing with the papers of the Nucleus."

"No, you certainly did not mention anything of this importance before. I would remember it if that were the case."

"I see… Must have slipped my mind after the CCSE, I guess. Anyways, those tachyon thingies are why I… well, would like you to calm down and clear your mind. I know I tend to get super down when something serious happens, so that's why I don't wanna meet the guards. I'm not doubting you or anything, it's just… Since I'm a stronger Nucleus, well…"

"You claim I could be… influenced by my own desire to see Alt IV to fruition, being locked into chasing only one possible solution?"

"Yeah. I think you're the most fitting person to be susceptible to causality, being the main researcher of it. Like when you were researching the theories before I even appeared in this world, both this time and in the other loops. Being so close to the answer yet failing to get it… I think you got set in your ways, in… what you thought was the correct path, and couldn't break the link to the data leak of a wrong approach," She groans, folding her arms in frustration at what was a fair guess, you'd understand. Waving a hand, he rose his voice as he nodded, "I mean, my world's you tackled the theory from a completely different angle and that was what allowed her to complete it, right? I know it's easy to say, but… you didn't allow yourself to doubt on your theory, and that's why I think you're doing the same now. Don't you notice a difference in your mood, in your way of handling your work now compared to before I arrived or gave you the papers?"

Caressing her hair, she breathed in. Easing all the swirling feelings, exhaling slowly, she nodded yet didn't meet his eyes, "I suppose… that holds water. The theories do… go to places I didn't think of, and I've been more productive in these months since you've been here than in the rest of the year, I'll give you that. By the by, how did the me of the prior world react to this? What did your home world's me said about my methods?"

Chuckling as he recalled, Takeru allowed himself to smile, "Oh, you choked me when I told you I recognized the formulas. It got worse when I told you the methods you use were outdated, stale and obsolete."

"Excuse me?!"

"Your words, not mine," He then swiftly takes a step back, raising his hand as Chief Yoroi does, "The thing is… After what happened in my world, when I ran away and… Marimo-chan and Sumika paid the price, I can tell when I'm about to crack, since I get hyper-focused on only one thing. Happened all the time with Valgern-On, with my training, and with… my lover. That's why… Sigh… I'm trying to calm down, because I know that when I get set on something, I won't stop thinking about it. Just as my world's you told me, I'm trying to halt the link before I get sucked into that twister of negative feelings he felt during and after Shura's Dance," He affirms, looking straight into the scientist eyes, to let her see his honesty.

Yet, she merely nods, running a finger over her chin, "I wonder, why the first data that he absorbed is of such grief? How did he even keep on fighting in this world if the war had crushed his spirit so much? And… why are these memories we're forcing out having such an effect on Shirogane… Maybe…"

Seeing her silence made the soldier uneasy, so he coughed and took a step closer, "That's why… besides taming the fire of his anger… I think we both need to play our next cards carefully, we cannot make a mistake. It might come out as me being indecisive or passive, but if I only have one bullet… I gotta make it count. And two worlds are on the line, I cannot screw this up. That's why I rather wait and see, what's ahead, what's around, to then make my decision once I'm cool and the gears of thought are oiled again."

She gave a nod, fixing her eyes back on him, "So if I want you to regain your identity, you first want to ensure your… wish for a peaceful world with zero wars can be reached afterwards?"

"Yeah, I will not give up on my goal to reach a ze… a world without wars."

"… And is it only about your memories? Or, is there something else you're concerned about?"

"Well… After seeing how this world is, I know it might sound odd, but… Believe me when I say that the third incident I told you of may end up happening even if we do everything perfectly until Sadogashima, or even after Kashgar," He said, his throat again shutting up after he sighed, "Just that… it might be a quiet thing, and we won't notice it until it's too late. This world is far more nationalistic than any of the prior ones I've been to, so… it's possible the UN won't get to even act, that something… real bad happens while we're busy elsewhere. You know this world's political situation better than me, we gotta be careful."

"Then, why not… use your prior identity to gain a foothold into the IRG? If you believe the threat to be this high… you could be my eyes within the Guard."

"Because… I may end up surrounded by enemies."

"… Do you truly think you were all alone back then?"

"I told you before, he felt isolated in the Guard. I… showed you, what I saw, how I felt at the end of Iceberg. Now imagine that… but you're surrounded by faces you once trusted in, and now are out for your blood. I… don't know if I can take any more memories of that, to be honest," Running a hand over his clothes, clutching his heart, his gaze again crashes and burns away, fading, "And I won't lie to you, dealing with the Guard is something I'm awful at. It brings… a few bad memories of my own."

"… I see. Perhaps… we can take a few days, see how they react to the mock battle," She relented, and it took him to see her nod as she sat down again to believe the words. Yuuko spun for a moment, then directed her usual cold gaze at him, fingers entwining, "However, I will need you to remain in top form. If you do want me to look for another path… You will have to be willing to do different actions as well, Shirogane. If you ask me to compromise, then you will have to join me in the struggle."

"… And that means… you want me to take on his role?"

"It's a possibility. But first, let's dispense with the intrigue," Going to grab her notebook, she turns it on and starts writing something before addressing the soldier again, "I want you to detail all you can about what you effectively saw thus far in the recovery sessions, everything."

"Sigh… It might take a while."

"Do you want me to heed your warning or not?"

"Fine, fine. Just… wait a sec if I get emotional, okay?" Voice lowering as his gaze, Yuuko gave him a firm nod, in honest support.

And so, the soldier started telling the scientist of the recollections he had gained in these recovery sessions. Despite the small pauses he had to take at times, and how she had to convince the young Yashiro to go tend to the XM3, despite her insistence to remain by Takeru's side.

"… And you're absolutely certain he was residing in their house?" She asks, staring at him.

"Yeah? I think he was. That's what… Yuuhi's mom, I believe, had told him on the day where he got the letter."

"And if you knew that, could you kindly explain to me why did you insist so goddamn much on how you were never adopted in this world?"

"… I was gauging their reactions, that's all. And trying not to lose it, while I was at it. Tsukuyomi-san wasn't in the memories so… I wanted to see what they thought of the claim. And I think their reactions told us much," He asserts with a nod.

She shrugs, "Fair enough, I suppose. That does… bring up an interesting question to the table," She says, expression sober, "Do you think this world's you stayed in the Koubuin House after that night?"

"… Or was sent as a vassal somewhere else, I dunno."

"Sigh… Look Shirogane, I can sort of make a case on why this world's you could have been erased, if it brought issues to a Regent. Problem is, for that to be the case, it equals that he was far, far closer to the Shogun than we thought."

"I know… I know that. I told you, he was living with them, even being friendly with the Pickles at times. It's just…" Licking the inner side of his teeth, it tasted like rusted metal.

"You think that, at some point, this world's you grew dejected at the Shogun, and that's why you're assuming they threw him away?" She presses, noting something down in her notebook then in her computer.

"Well, yeah. Think I'm wrong?"

Spinning slowly, she shrugs again, "I have no leads to claim otherwise. However," Sharply stopping, fingers locking together, she smiles, devilishly, "What we do have are your hunches, Shirogane. You did say that his situation reminded you of your… marriage with Mitsurugi, correct?" He slowly nods, raising a brow, "Then, could we assume that he was undergoing a similar trial of sorts? After all, it is very, very rare for a commoner to be allowed to reside in a Main House, let me tell you."

"Huh… So… you think they adopted him?"

"It's a possibility, yes. If you recognize his trials as what happens when someone of common descent is tested to join the nobility, or high society, then perhaps this world's you was tested to see where he would join in their ranks. Are you certain you cannot recall the talks, even if slightly?"

Folding his arms, a small twinge of pain below his ears surges up, as if touching a source of heat. Cowering at the headache, Takeru shakes his head, running a hand over his forehead in circles, "It's all messy. I do think… Maya-san wanted to look after him, and her dad was really insistent on how little me should 'adapt to their ways of life'. But…"

"You still feel that sadness creep up when you try to recall those times?" She concludes, scribbling it down, typing it fast.

"Sigh… Yeah. I know we can't let my presence here make any noise but…"

"I have one condition I'd like you to accept, before anything," She states, looking straight into his eyes, "If anything does happen, I want you to take responsibility for it on your own."

"… Don't worry, I don't wanna let my own issues ruin Alt IV, Yuuko. If you gotta send me back to my world, then just say the word."

"I wasn't talking solely of that, however," She squints her eyes, "And no, I'm not talking of disposing of you either, even if you should take that option into account as well. What I'm talking about is… if having you 'regain' your identity becomes our best choice, I want to hear no complains coming from you. Do remember that until the 00 Unit is tuned, you have to stay alive. Both to ensure Alt IV bears fruits and to fix the ripples of your world."

"I know that well," He sighs, a boulder piling on his shoulder, tearing his skin, "So… you think Yuuhi might press you until she can meet with me, no matter what?"

"Perhaps," She spins slowly, looking away, "Point being, when the time comes where I need you to disclose what you recalled through the recovery sessions, you'll do it without complains. Understood?" He nods, slowly. She smiles, nodding back, "Good. Now then, I have one last question I'd like you to think about."

"What is it?"

She leans closer, a stone-cold blizzard within her eyes, dry ice emanating from her lips, "If this world's you didn't remain with the Shogun, how did he become commissioned under the Guard and end up on that 'special' squadron you mentioned on one previous recovery session?"

"Well… I don't know why, of course. But… what I can tell you is that the disappointment, the sadness felt… stronger during the CCSE," Waving both hands about, as if trying to grasp something fluttering in the wind, his brows tensed and narrowed as the words eluded him, "Like… when everything crumbles down and the ceiling falls on you."

"So, something worse than the night you recalled befell this world's you? And despite that, he remained in the Guard?" Giving him another side glance, lips pursed in annoyance, she shook her head, "Do you have any idea why that might have happened, or are you just grasping at straws?"

Gulping, looking down as another cold blanket falls on his back, the soldier's voice collides in his throat and refuses to leave for a moment, "I… I think… I can make a guess…"

"Oh?" Interest ignited, Yuuko inches closer, "What of it?"

"I think… he had made an oath, and that was what pushed him forward. Being this world's me, I'm sure he had… a strong reason to keep marching forward even when he was alone, and that's what… made him remain in the Guard."

"Hmm… What makes you think that, if I may ask? Another memory you saw of his life?" Squinting her eyes, a stinger aims at his as she doesn't release her soldier from her gaze.

Yet, seeing that confrontational shine in her, that emotion, that drive to keep pressing forward… send a lukewarm pulse into his body, as if basking under a pleasant sun " Even if it is a bit bothersome, that firm resistance… does bring back a certain memory… And if… if his fight was as brutal as that sole memory I saw, if his squad was left on its own in the front lines…"

"Shirogane?" Yuuko was, again, narrowing her brows at Takeru, who only noticed it after a few seconds of dwelling within his mind, "You were saying…"

"Sigh… Sorry, got lost in thought. So… the thing is… well, just don't laugh, okay?" He asks, rustling his jacket. She nods while raising a brow, bumping a hand on her chin. So, taking in a breath of air, he slowly recites, "Ahem… In the silver blossom of a cherry tree, dwells a brave and loyal soul. Rooting itself into the Earth, it dreams no longer of the sky ."

"Was that… poetry?" She asks, tilting her head.

"Yeah, it was a poem someone… important wrote for me at a crucial point in my life."

"… Wait, the silver blossom refers to you?"

"I guess, why?"

"Huh… What an odd thing, to use a flower to refer to a man," She then chuckles, smirking a bit, "Does that mean that you 'blossomed' by that point?"

"Mmgh… I don't know what I expected of you, really."

"Come on, don't get mad," Waving a hand, Yuuko still chuckles at his groans, "So then," Sobering up, she folds her arms, "A brave and loyal soul… that still refers to you, I suppose. And rooting itself into the Earth…" She closes her eyes as she spins slowly for a second. When she's facing him again, a small frown was etched on her features, "This is about Alternative V, isn't it?"

Hunching over, he smiles as he nods, feeling the grasp of those hands, those begging hands on his body again, those wails right by his ears, "… Yeah. There was someone who helped me with… my pass for the migrant fleet. I received that poem when I got the confirmation I could give my pass to my lover, before everything went to hell."

"Bold of you to say that to my face, Shirogane," She smiles, raising both brows up and down for a moment.

"Huh? What are you… Wait! I wasn't referring to you!"

"Oh, you weren't? So you never gave me a pass then? What of that memory you showed me?"

"Ugh… I did give you a pass for the fleet, yes."

"Then, does this have anything to do with how you 'took care' of that me?" Giving him a side glance, she pokes the wound, in a small act of retribution. A small jest, you'd understand.

"L-Look, it… might. But we… we weren't… Sigh…" Hollowed out again, he hunch over.

"Hmm. I was merely poking fun at you, not intending to get you even more down," The scientist stood up, gesturing him to hand her the mug, which she then goes to refill along hers, "So… your point about the poem was?"

"Well… That even if everything is crumbling around me, so long as I have a clear goal to aim for, I don't stop moving forward, little by little," He affirms, sticking out his chest, hugging his hands to dispel the memories of the other hands, that tugged and begged, that kept on pulling, "Back then it was the same, even when I knew what madness I was up against. And the same on last loop, I… managed to keep my shit together most of the time," Then, he looks up, accepting the mug Yuuko offered, " After my talk with Sensei on the brain room , after seeing Sumika was alive… or rather, the 00 Unit that inherited Sumika's memories needed me by her side, I tried to get my shit together to do the most I could do to help. I've always been like that, no matter how hard stuff is, so long as I have a goal and someone with me I rarely give up. I am a stubborn bastard when I'm motivated. "

For a moment, a few things flashed in his mind. Receiving a cake at night. Nursing kitties in a dojo. Preparing some food in an apartment. The sight of his house's table filled with laughter, and a jab about his similarities to Chop-kun. And the feeling of cold all over his body, as he rolled and rolled, embraced by those azure eyes.

" Be it when adapting to my new life with Meiya, learning to compromise on some of my tastes when dating Sumika, when adapting to life as a couple with the rest in my own world. Or when I had to step up to keep Kasumi and my squad safe after Alt IV was canned on my first loops, or keeping myself in check in last loop to always be ready to help out. On the contrary, when I get down and I'm alone… I tend to do stupid shit, like when I was… seriously considering jumping off the roof after Sumika's accident in the gym," Then, he looks up, staring at Yuuko, who raises a brow and asks what's wrong, yet he doesn't answer, feeling a vice grip on choke the life out of his heart, "Until you gave me another reason to look up, to not give up, Yuuko-sensei."

And so, he drank in salutation, of the teacher he abandoned in the reactor along another version of him, both of them who had to endure the charges of his actions.

" Yet… despite the sadness… I don't know why, but this world's me didn't give up, either on himself or the world. Maya-san seemed to be cold again on that night's memory, he was upset a the Pickles on the flash I saw of the Swordbreakers, and his feelings towards Yuuhi… are a mess, I can't even tell what I should feel," Inhaling well, hearing the worried, crushed spiel of the young boy as he fell asleep in the darkness of his room, Takeru could only sober up, drag the blazing blade he held somewhere in his gut, dragging it out, forcing himself to return Yuuko's stare, "But… if he kept moving forward despite everything, it means he had something worth protecting. What that was, I have no idea. But going by the dread… Well, I showed you what I remember of Iceberg already. I suppose you can guess what this Shura's Dance did to him."

"Fair enough," Yuuko nods, frowning for a millisecond, "Considering the how invasion happened, I suppose I can see how he was faced with… something like that memory you showed me. Still… You're certain that you do not wish to claim his identity?"

"… I can't be him, Yuuko. I think… it's for the best that we keep this as is. After all, I doubt Yuuhi or anyone else could actually come after me with what I recalled already. Since they erased him, to claim he existed would give them lots of trouble. One thing is you making up an entry but… if they don't wanna erase me again, and they actually want me to take on his role once more, isn't that more trouble than it's worth for us? I'll become a target, but for entirely different reasons," He shrugs, one eye closed as he goes for his drink.

"I suppose, you're right," Yuuko relents a nod, sipping some coffee, "Still, I rather not be the recipient of Her Highness' wrath. And you're the only Shirogane in this world, so if she asks to confirm your identity…"

"… I'll do what I have to do when the time comes."

"… You're convinced they were harsh to this world's you, huh."

"His feelings are more than enough. Well, is that all?"

"I suppose… I'll analyze the data and call you back if I need you for anything," She affirms, with a single nod.

"Alright. So… Do I go back to my cell or-"

"You need some time off. Go to your office and spend your time as you see fit. Work on the weapons, work out with some weights, or just rest there. It's for the best that you stay away from your cell, in case anyone tries to interact with you in your current state."

"Sigh… Yeah, you're right. Well, I'll be going then," Standing up, not even waving back, he moves towards the door in slow steps, dodging the papers and books as if he had spikes stuck on his feet.

Something tugged at her nape, something didn't let her look away. So, going for another spin, she didn't unlock the door. When Takeru realized he couldn't leave and looked back, he found her staring, fully focused on his figure.

"Are you truly completely against reclaiming your identity in this world?"

"Yeah."

"Why? Because of the pain and fear of the memories?"

"Well, that too…" Inhaling well, hiding his hands on his pockets, he looked up, away, "There are a few things I can try to understand, that I can stomach even when I don't fully agree with them. I am a soldier, so I have had to follow orders I didn't agree with at times. But… pushing someone into a corner, after exploiting their trust in an hour of need… I don't think I have it in me to look past that, Yuuko. Even if I can dull the pain and endure the meetings, I cannot forgive that kind of thing."

Scanning the lines of pain, the lines in his words, Yuuko blocked her mouth as she interlocked her hands again, waiting a second to see if he would return her gaze. He did not, so she sighed, "Did something like that happen to you in your loops?"

"… Not to me, no. You did manipulate me at times, but… you never really threw me away, even when I was more trouble than I was worth."

That turn of phrase would mean that… " Then, something resembling that did happen, to someone close to you."

"Yeah…" And meeting her gaze, he winced, creaking apart, "To you."

"… What?"

"After that Christmas…" He began, nibbling at his bottom lip, feeling heated charcoal hit his gut, "one faction of the IRG offered you some help, it seems, when the UN was dunking on you," His words, although slow, ignited the petals, the hail back onto the scientist's nape, "Yet, you saw how you were imprisoned in Sendai. You even had to wear their black dress at times, when I went to try and talk to you. And you kept it together well despite…" Again, something pierced his veins, wringing his hands at the powerlessness he felt back then. He was looking down, trying to keep his composure. So he couldn't see it, how she was compacting upon herself, supporting her head with a hand, leaning on the desk, "despite everything they said, despite how dead and empty your eyes looked, how dry your hair and cheeks were, how more thin you were getting with every visit."

"I… got it. That's… enough, Shirogane," Just a whisper, that did not reach his ears.

"And you stayed there by choice, in the end. You had some support to get out, you just needed… a safety net. But…" Frowning, his voice picks up, shaking his head in rejection, "Doing that to a little kid? After they took Dad to his death? No…" Breathing deeply, both of them met the other's gaze, regaining their composure, their masks, "I know myself well enough, Yuuko. I can hold it in, I can try… but this, this is something I want nothing to do with. Sorry… I cannot be him."

"And… what happens if and when they come after your, or our, neck? What if they do try to strike at both us before you reach your answer?"

"Hmph… Let 'em come, then. I'll despair after I'm dead."

"… Huh?"

"I ain't letting them ruin my efforts. And this is, in a way, payback for what they did to him. So Yuuko…" Straight ahead into her gaze, her poker face, he looked, pausing for a second as she tends to do, "you better keep your end of the deal. I want my reward, and then… we'll cross that bridge when we get there."

"Sounds fair, I suppose. I will… be waiting for a report on your activities at 1900 hours. Until then, stay in your office and do as you like."

"Understood," He nods, she unlocks the door, and he leaves. Without waving, without a salute or a gaze back. Simply leaving, in silence.

The scientist stands up, again making herself more coffee despite the lack of any food nearby. Reading the notes she had taken during their talk, rubbing her temple as that intrusive feeling which struck her like a thunderbolt a moment ago tried to rise back up, Yuuko then pondered the readings she had scanned from the recovery session.

"It is surprising… He did endure a large recovery, despite how he piloted the Mind Seeker along Yashiro first thing in the morning," Swiping the pages of the notebook, the images in her computer, she took a few moments to align the graphs.

To think on all he had told her, about the theories, his pull as the Nucleus, and the… tachyons she hadn't told anyone about. Not in a decade, at least. Recalling his own reaction, his choice of words, what he revealed about the other experiences he had lived… what she had seen during the meeting within the guard's complexions… and above all else, even beyond the tidbits of her theories…

"So you'll despair after you're dead, huh? Hehe…. Hehehe…. Hahahahaha…"

Downtime in the Masquerade (II)

A/N: The start of this chapter picks up after the end of Ch. 49, instead of following right after the end of the prior one.

---

Chapter 63: Downtime in the Masquerade (II)

---

December 2nd, a bit after noon.

(Yokohama Base. Valkyries' Hangar.)

---

The whirring of gears, the clanking of tools, the whispers and jokes of mechanics and the beeping of computers was all that could be heard in the background of the ample space of this hangar at the moment. Alongside a sharp and firm smacking sound, which drowned all idle chatter in the place.

As wide as the reddening of her left cheek were 1st Lt Hayase's eyes becoming, standing still, frozen in place as her hands wrung tight. Equally petrified were the younger members of the squad, as if they had caught a glimpse of Medusa having intercourse with the Basilisk through the crack of a door. Static and jolts ran through the older ones, caught off guard by this sudden action.

And so, with a stone-cold facade which betrayed no emotion, save for disapproval in this occasion, the slender shape took a step closer to Hayase as her most delicate voice aimed to pierce through, "I believe I had already given you all a most thorough briefing on how to handle the Takemikazuchi units you were bequeathed with," Mst Sgt Kazama calmly said as a single finger cruised her chin, the hollowness in her gaze betraying her tone, "Could you kindly explain to me what idea caused you to perform such an idiotic maneuver at the end of the battle, 1st Lt Hayase?"

"… Excuse me?" Hayase glared at the woman, whose complexion did not waver, "I already told you, I was aiming to shoot down that-"

"Your unit collapsed on top of the aggressor you were facing," quietly lashing out, holding the Lieutenant's glare, "Not only you employed quite barbaric maneuvers throughout the entirety of this mock battle, you also put your own unit at risk of being severely damaged. Let me remind you, even if they have been loaned, these Type-00C units belong to the Shogunate. And as the Chief of their maintenance crew, I'd like you all to take proper care of them. I won't accept another excuse as an answer for your mishandling of such an asset."

One of her brows twitched as she inhaled sharply, "Listen here, you… Ahem… I understand your concerns, Master Sergeant," Sheathing the anger, Hayase gave a minute nod, feeling the pressure of her captain's glare skinning her nape, "However, as I said before, I was not expecting such intense output from the Takemikazuchi. It was vastly different to the sim runs we have been doing as of late. And if you watch the battle, I am sure you'll realize most of my 'idiotic' maneuvers were done to counter the eccentric patterns of our aggressor."

A single finger treading her short jade green hair, the Chief frowned slightly, "I do not believe it proper for you to place blames on other pilots for your own failings."

"W-What?! I am not-"

"Regardless of your foe's dexterity, 1st Lt Hayase, weren't you the one who chose to face that pilot on your own? Am I correct in that she dismissed your support nearing the end of the battle, 1st Lt Munakata?"

"Eh? Ah… Well, yes, that is correct," She answered, low.

Unabated, the Chief continued, "Thus, I am expecting no more… recklessness from your mock battles, Valkyries. To think the A-01 STF would be made up of such novices…" Shaking her head, Kazama allowed a sigh to escape her slim lips.

"… Bold words, aren't them," A minuscule shaking on her tight fists, Hayase's lips twisted in, bit by her teeth, "Then let me ask you something, Chief Kazama. Compared to other units, how was our performance with the Type-00C? I believe we piloted them far better than most in the IRG would, for a first sortie with them," She ascertained, in part due to her frustration at the woman's conduct, on the other due to the excitement that was still rushing through her veins after her very first time piloting an XM3 machine, after her bout with the Viking that had just ended but moments ago.

Taking a second of silence to consider her words, the Chief treads her chin slowly, "The younger ones were not even up to par to our fresh recruits in the IRG, no," The calm assessment sent Asakura's gaze and mood to crash down a ravine, whereas Takahara's frustration came out pouring in ample quantity. The other three of the newest members could only wring their hands, look away. Uncaring to the overall stiffness and emptiness in the younger ones' eyes, the Chief continued, "Cpt Isumi and 1st Lt Munakata performed at an acceptable level of aptitude, in my opinion. However, despite the difference in the OS, your skill in close quarters is very lacking," She stated, firm, grabbing a wrench from a nearby supply crate, spinning it in her grasp, and doing slow, precise movements with it in the air, bending her wrist just slightly, "I did not see you employ any such parries. And I believe you'd be accustomed to wielding something more delicate than a wrench."

"… May I ask what exactly do you think our piloting is lacking, Chief Kazama?" Touko asked, rather dryly for her own person, as she stared straight into the other Kazama's eyes.

She brought the wrench to her person, bumping it slightly on the base of her chin, "Surely you should know. A seasoned member of the Guard wouldn't have been bested as Cpt Isumi was."

"… In my defense, the reaction time of our adversary was like nothing I've ever seen," A small dose of embers shot out, looking straight into her eyes, "Even with the XM3's superiority and the technological advantage a Type-00C grants, I still am in disbelief that my firing line was so easily predicted and avoided," Michiru commented, taking a step closer to the Chief in an attempt to ward off her crew's rising animosity, "I believe you'd agree that such sharp dodging techniques are not commonplace in our doctrine, or in any combat doctrine as far as I'm aware. Our rival on this occasion was… an outlier," Descending to a whisper her voice, descending onto her throat a pair of knives, she then coughed to clear the stagnant frustration of her defeat at the hands of the 'Vikings', "Ahem… While I would welcome your advice in how we should handle the Takemikazuchi from now on, I don't believe this battle in particular can form a fair judgment of our abilities, Chief Kazama," Stoic and sober, she stated.

A small nod afterwards, the Chief dulled her disapproval, placing the wrench back in the crate, "Yes, perhaps such final judgments are too early to be spoken. However, I was led to believe you were the cream of the crop, the elite within the elite, the mighty sword of the Fourth. And yet…" A narrowed gaze towards Hayase, a shaking of her head, the Chief sighs, "… all I see here is arrogance, recklessness. And immaturity, above all else, for your second-in-command to have chosen such a barbaric end to this mock battle."

Brows twitching, Hayase ruffled her hair to try and calm down. It was not very effective, you'd understand, "… Look Chief, I merely wanted a one-on-one with those pilots. I admit it was… childish, almost, but I had no intention to cause my Takemikazuchi to collapse like that. I was answering to the display of my aggressor, testing the limits of my new craft."

"Excuses don't create solutions, 1st Lt Hayase," Chief Kazama dryly said, Hayase flinched slightly as she again bit her lips, "I am not allowed to know how exactly does the XM3 function, thus I cannot judge your dexterity with this new OS. However, what I can offer are my critiques on your overall movement patterns. Which, to be frank, seem to not be anything new besides this supposed ability to bypass the shock countermeasures. Compared to the aggressor you faced… I found you all lacking tempo and dexterity, 1st Lt Hayase in particular. Remove the advantage this new OS gives you, and I can't say you're a fair match for the IRG's elites, save for your captain," She nods, placing both hands behind her back, finished with her small piece of advice.

Putting a hand over Hayase's shoulder, gripping it, Michiru forced her subordinate to bow down alongside her, "Thank you for your words of advice, Chief Kazama. We shall take them to heart for our next training drill. On that regard, was 1st Lt Hayase's unit damaged?"

Brows furrowing, lips shrinking, she nods, "Slight damage to the head visor, and we are still evaluating the state of the cockpit's outer armor. Sigh… I know I am repeating myself, but do take care to not hurt these units. Spare parts are very scarce, and expensive. Should you continue to abuse the craft in this savage a manner, I will have to notify this on my reports to the Shogunate."

"Alright, we'll make sure to redouble our efforts from now on," Michiru affirmed, hoping to end this discussion here and now, "If there's nothing else you'd wish to tell us, we shall be on our way."

"Excuse me, Captain?" The younger Suzumiya stepped up, still petrified, unable to meet the gazes which fell on her person.

"… Suzumiya? What is it?" Michiru asked, blinking fast for a moment.

"I was… wishing to ask a question to Chief Kazama, if you would allow me," Barely squeezing the words out, she said.

"Well… I suppose you can, go ahead," She nodded to her subordinate.

Who took another step closer, stealing glances at the immutable ice wall garbed in the white attire of the IRG, "Chief, you had mentioned before how our performance was lacking to your eyes. To what exactly are you comparing us? And, what did you make of our rival's piloting?"

The questions reigniting the interest, the honest curiosity in the Valkyries, most of their members stared in wait. Hayase took a step back and shrugged as she saw Haruka's nervous smile, both awaiting the answer as anxiously as their captain did. All the younger members were also eager to hear this reply, as their adaptation to the XM3 has been rather… dicey, to say the least. Touko was the only one who closed her eyes and sighed, wishing to be able to divert the talks or halt the answer.

After a second of pondering, the minute, delicate movements as she caressed her hair once more betrayed the harshness of the equally tender voice of the Chief, "You have been lauded as the top squadron of this base, of none other than this base. Thus, I am comparing you to what is, in my honest opinion, the most formidable squadron in the IRG I have seen. And as I said moments before, save for Cpt Isumi and 1st Lt Munakata, none of you are deserving of such a title. I highly doubt the young ones could fend for themselves on the battlefield should the need arise," A quiet collapse, the crumbling of concrete against towering waves of Destroyers was caused on the newest recruits' complexions by the words, yet the Chief continued, "I would suggest them to return to the Shiranuis, they do not deserve to pilot a Takemikazuchi with such meager skill. And should you fail to restrain your recklessness, I advise the same to you, 1st Lt Hayase."

"… Oh, really? It's a shame we have orders to field test all these units, though," Hayase replied in full venom, ignoring the hand Munakata placed on her shoulder and Michiru's warning glare, "And just so you know, all of us here were trained by one of the best pilots in the whole Empire. I can get that our approaches may not mix but, you know what? All the Valkyries were forged by the one known as the Reaper, a veteran like no other. You won't find a better crew than us in the Empire, no, in the whole world, I bet," Endowing the entire blaze yet restraining it barely under her skin, she affirmed as she returned the frontal gaze of the Tozama.

Who dismissively shook her head, "Such arrogance will only lead you to an early grave, 1st Lt Hayase," Or perhaps, you're shielding your ego behind this anger? She mused momentarily, "Anyways, failing to account for the difference in skill between your crewmates will only serve to beget an incident on the field," Chief Kazama coldly ascertained, Michiru and Munakata grimacing at the prospect, recalling failures of the past, burnt hopes and dreams, "Furthermore, it would be in the best interest of the newest members to not form their skills with the Takemikazuchi as their baseline. Such power and performance can be… limiting, addictive. I do earnestly suggest you try to perform some trainings with the Shiranui again, either live or in the JIVES," She said, giving a minute bow.

"Huh?" Hayase recoiled at the mixed signals, void of words for a moment, "Wait, so, how could that be? I don't think using a better machine up to higher standards could backfire on us. Isn't that why the Fubuki was made as our training craft?" She asked, rhetorically, as she looked back at her squadmates. Munakata nodded with a perplexed expression, the newbies were also as lost as a penguin in a desert, whereas Michiru had folded her arms and words inwards as she pondered the Chief's suggestion.

So another tender voice rose in answer, as Touko took a step, feeling acid on her throat, "In the reality we live in, shortage of units and spare parts is something we as pilots must always take into account," A hand swimming through her long hair, she states as she looks at the ground, continuing as if on a monologue, "Adaptability to the field's conditions and the availability of crafts is a must for all surface pilots. And while our circumstances as the STF are vastly different to most other units, there is certain risk in allowing our new members to blossom under the Takemikazuchi, as it differs greatly from the Shiranui in many aspects," She concluded, softly.

Chief Kazama nodded in agreement, a small smile on her face, "Precisely. For example, 1st Lt Hayase would not have performed such savage maneuvers at CQC had she been piloting a Type-94, I'm certain," She stated, giving a minute glare to Hayase, which she returned, "Which is why I suggest you to allow the newest members of your crew to continue training with the Shiranui, so that they don't grow complacent under the Takemikazuchi's specs. There might be a time when you won't have access to such a machine… and your habits as pilots will make you take wrong lines of thought, and may lead you, and many others, to an early grave."

Michiru nodded, thankful for the insight, "I see… You're right, I hadn't taken that into account. If I may, is this how the fresh recruits of the Guard learn to pilot before receiving a Takemikazuchi?"

"Well… Sadly, this procedure is not always followed upon," Frowning a bit, she taps her ear, looking away into the swirling cables and rows of crates, "As I'm sure you're aware, the IRG does not have access to the Fubuki due to…" Lips twisting, eyes closing for a second, "… bureaucratic decisions. However, even if it is recommended to train at least half a year with a Zuikaku, there are those who receive a Type-00 as their first unit, due to their House's… connections. Seeing the performance and attitude of such individuals is what makes me think you should not discard the Shiranui just yet, as it has advantages that the Takemikazuchi units do not."

"Um…" Akane again stepped closer, "What would those advantages be?"

"Figuring that should be your first priority, 2nd Lt Suzumiya. As well as those of your same generation," Chief Kazama nods, sheathing her ill mood. Hayase and Michiru share a gaze, both sighing and shrugging, wordlessly deciding to relent on their arguing wishes.

"I see… So, well, about our rivals…" Akane insisted, gulping slowly, awaiting the answer, "… What did you think of their performance?"

Eyelids almost closing, expression dulled into another poker face, the Chief remained silent for a moment, then another. As she looked up into the vast hangar, into the colossal shapes of the Type-00Cs of the Valkyries which reflected the bright glare of the overhead lights, she quietly began, "While the… adusted impulse of its stride was rather concerning, I must admit that said pilot's skill was… exquisite," The smile, the small smile as she threaded her hair, that surged forth shocked all Valkyries, but Touko in particular, who felt something acid, unpleasant swirling and twisting in her stomach. The feeling only worsened when Mst Sgt Kazama continued in a slower, calmer tone, still smiling, "Despite the… odd craft they were made to pilot, all of its movements were connected through purpose, and the execution of them was near perfect, to boot. As Cpt Isumi mentioned, I believe the greatest point in favor of your aggressor was not their eccentric movement pattern but… its ability to foresee your movements, to predict your attacks and counter them with swift precision. And even then, they still contributed to the learning experience of the mock battle by not neutralizing all of you from a sniping position, crossing strikes with you all despite the advantages available. If you might forgive the rudeness, I believe that pilot to be more skilled than any of you, truly fitting of the reputation of your unit."

Michiru and Munakata frowned at the words, very strongly so. The younger members shared a surprised, flabbergasted round of gazes, while Hayase begrudgingly nodded in agreement as Haruka tried to appease her friend, gently patting her arm. Touko had remained composed, her gaze squarely on the Chief despite the stomachache, and slowly looked away as she saw the words to be genuine.

Taking a moment to gauge their reactions, the Chief then asks, "If I may, where is your comrade as of now? I… would be liking to share some words with them."

"Huh? Oh…" Michiru coughs, "That pilot is not a member of our unit, sadly. They are working under the XO's personal orders, and not even us have ever met the person."

"… Is that so?" Chief Kazama sighs, dejectedly, "Well then, I believe there are no further questions?"

"Actually…" Michiru's tongue lashed against the back of her teeth, half of her wanting to ask, the other wanting to stay quiet, "… You had compared us to 'the strongest unit' of the IRG. To your eyes, how does our aggressor fit in your ranking?"

"Mmh…" Veiling her sight, she pondered for a moment. Again looking elsewhere, arms cradling her elbows, the Chief's voice barely rises from her lips, "… If it were up to me, I'd say that pilot is worthy of an induction."

"W-Wha…" Touko was struck by harsh lightning, as if Thor himself had delivered his hammer through her chest, "S-Surely you're joking?"

"Why would I be? You saw it yourself, the most polished control of the jump units, the careful evasive maneuvers, the decisive yet not blind charges. Had the pilot been on equal grounds with a Takemikazuchi, I do not doubt all five of your squadmates would have been bested soundly, without any sniping support on their side," She concludes, nodding in serenity.

Which salts the wound on Michiru's neck, reminded of her failure when arranging the members for the battle. The newest members' gazes crash across and beyond a ravine, yet manage to keep their cool as Munakata smiled at them, shrugging. Despite how she, too, bit her lips as she turned around.

"That's… taking it too far," Hayase said, her chuckling creaking at times, "I mean, even with a Takemikazuchi, there's nothing a single pilot can do against five of us. They… had luck on their side, because we didn't know their tells that well."

"I see you severely overestimate yourself, 1st Lt Hayase," Chief Kazama noted, low, "Yet, there is no reason to debate. I believe we both can agree that pilot was truly skilled, regardless of our personal assessments," The quiet tone appeased the wish for conflict within Hayase, who took a step back as Haruka pulled her arm, "I suggest you rewatch any available footage of this sparring, and see for yourself the minute detail of that pilot's movements."

"That we shall do," Michiru states, nodding, "Well, I suppose that is all?"

"If you have no further questions. All that's left is this report. 1st Lt Suzumiya, if you may?" Chief Kazama approached Haruka, who immediately solidified herself into a statue. Extending a folder towards the operator, who remained stiff and moving as if bolted to the ground, the Tozama then briefly brushed her hair as she looked to Michiru once more, "Then, I shall be overseeing your units during the afternoon. If you wish to ask anything, come back here and I should be available."

"Understood," Standing in attention, they shared a salute, along the rest of the Valkyries, "We shall endeavor to truly master the Takemikazuchi from now on, I assure you."

"I expect as much from the fabled Valkyries," Once more gazing at Hayase, she noted, "Well, if you'd excuse me," And with a faint bow, Chief Kazama turned around and approached the crew working on the Type-00Cs that had fought with the Vikings moments before.

Taking a second of pause as the Tozama paced to the other end of the hangar, Michiru breathed a heavy, oh, so heavy sigh. Combing her hair backwards as she shook her head, feeling a needle poking her forehead, she then turned and faced her crew, expression sober and firm.

"Well, you heard the woman. Looks like we're not even worth a dime in comparison to the Guard," A wry smile, she commented.

"Uh, Captain?" Hayase asked, a step forward, her eyes narrowing quite tightly, "Should we really let her trash talk us like that?"

"While I'd normally ask for some peace in the talks, don't forget that woman is the one in charge of the new units. And the Professor made herself clear, she wants us to take good care of the Type-00Cs. Whether or not they are adopted as the Imperial branch of the UN's top craft will be decided by our performance. So we all have to redouble our efforts from now on, you hear me!?"

"Yes, Ma'am!" All replied in unison, even Haruka.

"Good. However, just making an effort isn't enough. We got our heads handed to us some minutes ago by a pair of unknown pilots using a much inferior machine, after all."

A chuckle as she leans on Hayase's shoulder, Munakata smiles with an eye closed, "And when we had the chance to subdue the Vikings, someone got so needy."

"You raise a valid point, Munakata," Michiru smirked, arms folding, "Hayase, what do you have to say for yourself?" She inquired, piercing her sight into her second-in-command's own gaze.

She then stood in attention, grimacing a bit, "I fucked up the battle, Ma'am! My own selfishness made us lose the chance to subdue the Vikings without any damage to my unit!"

"You're goddamn right you screwed up," Michiru plays along, chuckling. Then sighed, raising a brow, "Really, why did you try to end on a one-on-one? You're not telling me you actually had an org-"

"No, Ma'am!" Frowning, she retaliates, "I merely was wishing to spar with the Vikings, to test their strength. I… was expecting them to join our unit, so I wanted to see for myself the ability of a possible partner as a Storm Vanguard," She admits, sighing at the end.

"Uh, Captain?" Akane asks, voice as frail as the step forward she took, "Is the Viking truly not going to join our unit?"

Sighing, ice down her throat and filling her stomach, Michiru shakes her head, "It seems so, for the moment. There's nothing we can do about that, so don't waste time worrying about it," Smiling a bit, she nods at her subordinate before glancing towards her 2IC, "However Hayase, I expect you to rein in your mood from now on. I won't tolerate another tactless comment towards the mechanics from the IRG while we're testing the Takemikazuchis. Kazama, could we rely on you for when we need advice on formal speech?" She asked instead of ordering, guessing right at the ties that bound her squadmate to the Chief.

Touko then nodded, forcing a smile, "Of course, Captain. Just ask when you need anything."

"Touko, are you sure?" Munakata inquired, "I know you're used to Keigo and the formal etiquette, but-"

"Misae, it's okay. If I can bridge our point of view with the Chief's one, that's what I should do. So don't hold back and rely on me whenever you need," She smiled at the rest, who eased up on the tension that permeated them ever since they saw the similarities between both Kazamas.

"Alright, that's much appreciated," Michiru smiled in approval and thankfulness, "Now then, we have the rest of the day free of duties. Does anyone have any proposals?"

"Yes, yes!" Hayase immediately rose her hand, Munakata and Haruka sighed.

"What is it, Hayase?" Michiru asked, rather resigned.

"Could we gain approval to train with the WMTS later in the afternoon, Ma'am? There are some patterns I want to try before our night sim runs with the XM3."

"Hmm… Do you all want to have another practice run today as well?" She asked and immediately received firm nods in answer, even from the hesitant Tsukiji, the eyes of all Valkyries blazing with motivation, driven by frustration, "Siiigh… 1st Lt Suzumiya, could you try to contact the Professor for the approval?" Haruka swiftly nods with a smile, Michiru returns the gesture, "Well, waiting on that is all we can do. After we eat, you can go train with the WMTS if we're allowed. However! I will be taking this as another official training session, so don't think on slacking off. For now, though, our duties are finished. Dismissed!" She declares, her crew returns a salute and all of their postures loosens up, "Alright, let's be on our way to the PX. Kyouzuka-san must be waiting for us."

"Oh, hell yeah! I really need some of that good shit right now!" Hayase said, stretching her arms upwards, cracking her shoulders, walking to the exit of the hangar.

"Sigh… Mitsuki, could you at least mind your tongue around the mechanics?" Haruka admonished as she followed her friend's lead.

"Don't worry Suzumiya, not like she'd listen to us," Munakata said with a wink, to which Haruka groaned in disagreement.

"… That's right, don't worry too much about it. There's nothing to be done, after all." Akane reassured, lowly, walking side by side with her sister.

As the rest of the crew moved towards the hallway, relaxed and refreshed from the prior talk's issues, Michiru felt a tap on her shoulder. Turning to her right, Touko was hesitating on whether or not to meet her gaze.

"What's the matter, Kazama?"

"Captain… Would it be okay for me to approach the Chief?"

"… For a personal talk, I assume?"

"Yes, Ma'am. I won't disclose any sensitive intel, I merely want to… ask some questions, is all."

"Relax, Kazama. I wasn't implying anything," Chuckling, she pats her squadmate's shoulder, "Just don't try to defend Hayase too strongly. She was at fault for dismissing the Chief's earlier points."

"Yes, Captain. I… do think the slap wasn't deserved, however."

"Well… I agree, but at the same time, I do think Hayase needed to come quite a few steps down from her high," Shrugging, she then ruffles her hair, "Anyways, we'll be waiting at the PX. Don't take too long, Kyouzuka-san will get worried."

Touko smiles and nods to her captain's words, watching her depart along the rest. A moment of silence around her, when she gulped down and all other noises around blurred against what laid within, she found her knees quivering.

Slowly turning around, pacing towards the crew servicing the Takemikazuchi units. Long steps, hesitant steps. The smell of oil, the clanking of the tools, it all vanished from her perception. Focused only on the jade green hair, on the dismissive and neutral expression her older sister made when they crossed gazes.

"… Chief, do you have a moment?" Touko asked, bowing down slightly.

"Do you have an inquiry regarding the mock battle?"

"No… I would like… to share some words with you."

"As you can see, I am in the middle of work."

"… Please?"

"… Sigh. Onimura, I leave the check-ups to you," She says, nodding towards the young mechanic that she was tutoring, who gulped hard at the words, at the responsibility.

Both Kazamas then move away, walking over the sprawled cables, the echo of their footsteps on the bare metal of the hangar growing more and more as they grew distant to the work area. Reaching a corner filled with crates bustling with simple supplies, bolts, cables, tools and other equipment, the Chief remained looking at the wall, upwards.

"So, what do you want, Touko?" She says, low.

"… Are you still upset at me, Sister?" Hanging her head, a hand clutches her elbow.

"I do not reproach your decision, no," Turning around, still calm and collected, the Chief shook her head, "There is no blame on you. Just as you chose to walk your own path, I chose to remain serving our family's traditions. However… If we are seen talking, people will reach a wrong assumption. Thus, what did you need?"

"… How have you been as of late? You… haven't answered my letters."

"I cannot disclose such information. As you surely know, my duties are tied to the businesses of the IRG. And you… are a key member of the UN's STF."

"… Please, Sister."

"I am fine, as you can see. Considering the state of our nation, even when I find some displeasure in my line of work, I don't have it in me to complain," Her eyes lower along her shoulders, "These last few months have been hard on me… but I am well. And I know… you're in good care in this base, with the people you chose to live with."

"I see… That's… good to know," Smiling, sighing the pincers out of her chest, the acid still remained. So, clutching the edge of her BDU's neck, Touko took a step closer, "Sister, I know you take your job seriously but… Was there a reason for you to be so harsh to us? I… do not believe the slap was warranted."

"Holding back on my critiques won't aid anyone. Without listening to the maintenance crew, pilots will grow complacent, arrogant, reckless," She nods, fuming a bit, releasing a puff of air from her nose.

"Sister, you could have worded your answers better. Why… did you say such harsh words to us? Are you… displeased to be here?"

"No, I merely believe sincerity to be a virtue, is all," She nods, Touko sighs, "By the by…" Staring, she interlocked both hands, hiding them behind her back, "have you found your answer yet, Touko?"

"Eh? Ah… Well, I've been… busy with my duties in the Valkyries. I have been meaning to try, but I haven't found the time to."

"… As dull and hollow as always, I see," Shaking her head, she sighs.

Causing a flinch, a tear in Touko's heart as her breathing hiccuped, "W-What?"

"Must I remind you of my advice again, Touko?"

"I… I have been trying, Sister. It's just… the missions keep coming, and I don't… find the drive to-"

"No, you're just refusing to," She affirms, causing all words to vanish from her sister's lips, which clamps shut as her gaze crashes down, "Regardless of how skilled you are, if hesitation resides within you, you will never be able to shine."

"T-That's… not true."

"Then, what of Munakata's and Higurashi's own struggles?"

"Huh? Why are you bringing them up?"

"You know. Munakata parted ways with her family, she cut her ties to it. I don't know if… she has found some measure of peace, however… she still hasn't come to terms with her failure, has she?"

"… No, Misae is still… But this has nothing to do with-"

"It does. Take Higurashi as an example. She, too, turned her back from her issues, using your and Munakata's departure as an exit."

"Don't… talk about Eiko in that way…" Gritting her teeth, her hands tightened.

"I merely speak the truth. I… didn't see her today, by the way. Is she injured or…" Touko grimaced, moistness in her eyes as she bit her lips, shaking her head frantically a few times. Short of air for a moment, Mst Sgt Kazama bowed her head, "I'm sorry."

"… You didn't know, it's alright. But… But Eiko… did try. No one answered her letters… no matter how many she wrote. So that's why…"

"Sigh… My apologies, I have been busy," Leaning back, she rested against a crate, grabbing a wrench and spinning it.

"No… It's fine. So, Sister…" Wiping a hand over her face, regaining her composure, "Why did you… bring them up?"

"Because their issues limit their viewpoint for the war, there is unresolved chaos in their hearts. Remember the code," Pointing the wrench at her sister's face, she slowly recited, "Within the warrior…"

"… Dread must not make nest. Nurture your own valor, to luster your life and mind," Touko softly sang the answer, sighing at the end, "Sister, no one in the Valkyries allows fear to impair their decisions. We also have a motto to uphold. To carry out our mission at all cost; to fight to the very last breath; and to make our death count, above all else. I know you take pride in our traditions, but please, do try to not bring the honor code up. Your words may end up misunderstood. I can only do so much to keep my squadmates' temper in check,"

She reminded, snatching the wrench from her sister's hand and throwing it back into the crate.

"Then, why are you unable to answer my query?" She asked, stepping closer, breaching Touko's personal space.

"I… I did answer. I haven't had the time to-"

"When was the last time you played the violin?"

"I… well… a few months ago…"

"And why did you not simply answer that?" Upon her sister's silence, Chief Kazama shook her head as she stepped back, allowing her heel to get caught on a cable, falling back and resting her hips' weight on a crate, "If you cannot endure the shame, you're merely using your duty to douse your mind. Then, you won't be able to truly perform at your best. Or in the worst case… you'll overload when your allies might need your aid."

"I just haven't… It's heavy, on my hands, on my chest," Touko admits, hunching over, walking and resting by her sister's side, kicking the cables softly, "I got many unpleasant looks when I played it last time on the roof. Just holding it… makes my hands burn."

"Pay them no mind," She reassured, again spinning a wrench, "If any Japanese sees your talent with the violin as "treason", then they're only narrow-minded fools."

"… It just hasn't been the same… since everyone died…"

"… Was Higurashi the last one?" Touko nods, looking down. So the Chief sighs, looking up at the beams and machinery, and the light that filters in between the cracks, "Then, won't you honor them with a performance?"

"… I can't. I just… can't. How did you… manage to keep serving amidst the war? When everything started crumbling…"

Looking down, coldness in her neck. The smell of intense oil, the feeling of sweat mixing it in her hands, smearing her entire face. And the nights that turned to days, the hours that blurred in a flash. Chief Kazama frowned for a moment, until a particular day came to mind. A day of intense heat, the sun reddening her skin to the point where she could peel it off without much effort. A day of battle, a sleepless night. The day she was forced to stop, catch up with her stress and drown in cold. And it is quite fair to affirm, Touko could again feel the acid crawling up her throat as if an ant army it were. Never had she seen her stoic and composed sister wince or shake, not even in front of her Father's admonishing belt whips.

"Sister?" Placing a hand on her shoulder, whispering in concern, Touko brought the Chief back to reality.

And sighing, a hand in her forehead, she took a moment to catch her breath, "Those days were… arduous to endure. To this day those echoes linger in my ears, if I'm foolish enough to recall them. However…" Clutching the crate, pressing the wrench to her stomach, a small ember rose in her eyes, "I saw a small glimmer of hope shining through."

"… What was it?"

Coughing, halting herself before she spoke words she had sworn not to disclose, she merely spun the wrench again, "A lesson on how to see the war, and my own struggles. Someone… set a good example for me, for all of my fellows, and we… could do little else than to follow in his footsteps. That is why, despite my own reservations, I am here in this base. That is why I will remain honest on my criticism. To honor his death, his life besides me, and all he taught me and I could never fully repay."

"I… Sister, were you… in love with that person?" Touko asks, a few fingers tracing her lips, eyes wide at the words she just heard.

"Huh?" Equally wide were the Chief's eyes now as she gaped.

"I've never heard you speak of another, much less a man, in such fashion. Did you…"

"Wh- No! Why must you always equal respect with romance?!"

"No… Sister, you never, ever, have shown such… light in your eyes, graced another with such praise. Who… Who was that person?"

"I… cannot tell you," Looking away, standing from the crane and throwing the wrench back in, making it bounce a bit, she sobered up, "But he showed me what… true tenacity is."

"… I see," Twirling her hair, Touko was left bereft of words in front of the development, you'd understand, "To be honest, I did find it odd that you'd welcome the order to work in a UN base. Was this person in favor of the UN as well?"

"… No, at all."

"Eh?"

"He did not… favor the UN Farces in the slightest."

"S-Sister… Why must you still use those words?"

"Because they are true, to an extent. However, herein this base lays a path to the victory I long to see. That is why I am here, and in aiding your squadron to adapt to the Type-00C the war efforts will certainly benefit. The Empire will benefit, our people will. Thus, even if it is against my better judgment, chasing this superior alternative is what I must do."

"I didn't… think you'd be so resolute about this," Licking the back of her teeth, watching her sister's back, she couldn't help but to ask, "Have you found your answer, then?"

"Yes, I now have no regrets. My path… lies in the Imperial Guard," Smiling, nodding back to Touko, she held her sister's gaze, her own eyes blazing, "I merely… have to keep moving forward in caution, to honor the lives of those who aided me during the invasion. Thus, in their stead will I work towards our shared dream, so that this war ends in our victory. No matter what trials might lie in wait… I have a duty to uphold. I've already pondered, doubted enough. It is now time for action and not words, for me to carry on the fire which I inherited within the shadows. I've a goal to achieve before I vanish, so I shall despair after I perish," She finished, bumping a fist into her bosom, looking up sharply at nowhere. Feeling that blaze of a gaze enveloping her once more, from the top of her head to the tip of her toes.

Touko felt the acid recede, replaced with a dense confusion at her sister's display of raw emotion, "Despair after… you perish? That's… an odd turn of phrase."

"No different than the motto of your squadron," She countered, arms folding as she twisted her lips.

"Our words have a rousing effect. To make our death count, to fulfill the duty we're entrusted with. Why would you mention despair?"

"It's simple, Touko. Despair and dread must not make nest, they do not belong with the living. Therefore, since it is a waste of precious time to dwell in regrets, I shall despair after I perish. My time alive has better uses than to wallow in such negative, self-destructive thoughts."

"However… I can see what you mean, Sister. However… to ignore your regrets?" She bit her lips, the last moments of the Niigata battle, the beating of her head, the buzz in her ears, Eiko's broken, teary voice, her own frantic and manic concern as she saw the Viking's machine swarmed by Tanks while she was recovering her friend, whose lower half was limp and unresponsive, having to be forcefully removed from the seat, "… Just marching on through the pain? I… am not convinced that is wise, Sister."

"Let it be a reminder."

"Huh?"

Her eyelids slowly fell, a hand firmly planted in her chest. And so, she chanted the mantra he had made for himself, which she recites as gospel, "Let the voices that don't stop serve as a reminder of all you failed to achieve, all you still wish to accomplish. Let it take you to your feet, let it drive you forward. Take it all in, and break through the dread of today. And when the time to strike comes," Eyes opened wide, a cold feeling creeping up her back, the piercing stare again in her nape, so Chief Kazama couldn't resist and her sight crossed, "we shall crush the fangs of any and all obstacles that stand in our way."

"… Sister?" Touko stared, frozen, at the tightened expression, wrathful gaze her sister had endowed. Taking a step back, hitting herself on a crate and sending a wrench and a few bolts to the ground.

The echo startles both sisters, and Chief Kazama runs a hand over her face and into her hair, sighing heavily as she regains her composure while Touko lifts what she had tumbled down.

"In any case…" She begins, breathing deep, "I merely decided to further my career in the IRG, even if I still do not agree with Father's desires to have me married to someone from another fellowship. I do not regret everything that has happened, even if… some nights are harsh to endure. I am certain this is what will lead me to see my objectives to fruition, which is why…" A step closer, a stare into her eyes, "Touko, you should also reach a resolution. Soon."

"I… am trying, thinking. But my role in the STF-"

"Clinging to your duty doesn't make you stronger, Touko," Smiling wistfully, she then sighs, "If you had decided the UN was your path, you wouldn't have remained so silent at my questions. No, you wouldn't even have approached me. Are you pleased here?" Touko looks down, hands fumbling about on her arms, before she nods, "In that case… don't let my presence disturb your progress. You and me, we're merely working in the same place, nothing else. Go back to your squadmates, they must be waiting for you."

"… I see. I will do just that, then. I suppose… we'll be seeing each other in our next training?" She didn't mean to ask it, but couldn't even hold her gaze.

"Of course. If you do have something to tell me, wait until my shift is over. Let's not… force any rumors while we're on duty. And… I hope you let me hear your violin at least once before my duties on this base are finished," Smiling again, she patted her sister's shoulder.

"I… will try. Um… Ahem…" Taking a step back, standing straight, she rose a hand in salutation, "We shall be seeing each other then, Chief Kazama."

Returning the salute, back to a neutral expression, "Until then, 2nd Lt Kazama," And with a nod, the Chief returned to her duties.

Watching her sister's back, Touko remained thinking on the words, the new expressions she had seen. The advice, the decision her sister had taken. As she saw her aiding the young man she had left in charge, her soft yet serious voice echoing in the hangar, Touko couldn't help but to smile. Turning around, she slowly paced towards the hallway, dodging the working crew, the crates and machinery.

The smell of oil subsiding, the pristine and sterile scent of the hallways replacing it instead, she tapped her hair, grasping it, closing her eyes and dragging her feet. Recalling the weight on her hands and shoulder, the sounds of her instrument in her ear, the shiver on her back right before a performance. The booming cheer of the crowd at times, the tapping, slapping of a long baton of her instructor. And the imposition that with her talent came, the cage she did not want to live in.

"Sigh… And yet… I can't even play anymore…" Pressing the button of the elevator, gaze firmly planted on the bottom of its steel doors, she sighed again, hollow.

Once the doors parted, she moved to allow those inside to leave. Throwing herself onto a wall once the ascent had started, she hugged her sides.

"Still… Sister's words do have much truth behind them. I… shouldn't be second guessing my decisions so much," A small smile, a relaxed leaning of the back of her head against the wall, "But… to think she'd praise someone to such lengths…" A brow corked, she then giggled, "I wonder who that someone was, to leave such an impression. Someone gallant, brave, perhaps cold and logical… Yes, that does seem to be the kind of person Sister would favor. Still… That last expression was… completely out of character for her, even the wording was far more aggressive than I've ever seen her be," Touko pondered, massaging her chin for a moment, "Hehe… Imagine if he was actually a brute, uncivilized and reckless, daring and temperamental. Oh, Father would faint at the news. Who would have said you'd favor such savage a man, Sister?"

---

Same Day. Near 6 PM.

(Takeru's Office.)

[Takeru]

---

"Achoo!"

Ugh… Dammit, what the hell. Rubbing my nose, I look for a spare tissue or anything to use. Damn… I hope I'm not getting sick. Either that, or someone is talking shit behind my back. I bet Sensei is chuckling at something I said back then.

"Sigh…" Sitting back after grabbing a handkerchief, I reread the graphs, redoing the math.

The business on Hangar 90 seems to be going well. The Shin is not anywhere near done, so luckily my calcs about the extra armor helped the crew. Especially since we can make the fins turn and bend, to give the craft a boost in the air instead of leaving them locked in place. Shame we can't make the chainsaw blades faster… Everything else is going good, though it seems like we're gonna have to talk with the Guard's crew before we can mount the machineguns on the last Type-00C. And most likely… since the idea is mine, I'm gonna have to be the one asking the questions…

"Thank God I can use the punishment as an excuse for being involved in these projects…" Even if it means working nonstop even on Sundays like I'm doing now, "Still… I hope the crew of mechanics ain't the prideful type. Just imagine their reaction to the questions…"

Hey! I wanna put more GUNS on the IRG's best machine! Would you tell me how to vandalize your pride and soul with large doses of More Dakka?

And then, they slash me in half and I gotta restart the loop. Sigh… if they don't start openly calling me an American sympathizer, I'll take it as a victory.

"Maybe I should ask Sensei for some support… Nah, can't back down. My idea, I gotta stand my ground. I'm the only one who can explain it in a fitting way… since everyone from the crew thinks I'm nuts, heh," At least, the mechanics here are still as chill as always.

Leaning back on my seat, shielding my face from the light with a hand, I take a breath with my nose. And keep inhaling. Until my stomach can't take it anymore. Partners… Did you have them in the Guard? Your squadmates… why were there with you? Did they agree with your views? Or…

The cold pokes at my sides, pressing itself onto my back. The quietness of the room, the blinding white of the walls, of the furniture, even of the tower PC…

" No, I don't wanna be eaten!"

Chewing sounds, on metal, on bones. And something… a squelching echo…

" Shi-Shirogane… Uugh… Please… It burns!"

Bursting bubbles, as if someone had thrown a dozen mint candies inside soda. But along the slick, burnt feeling on my teeth like when stuff got stuck on a frying pan. Stuck to metal, reduced to liquid… boiling and melting…

"… The only thing a dead soldier can do…"

And a sudden explosion. The rumbling of the shockwave. And then… silence.

Pain, on my cheeks. A hand was clawing at my mouth, covering it with the cloth I had used moments before. It now was drenched in…

"Blergh… Cough… Fuck it…" It really is the same… Fuck, I can't… No, calm down… Breathe in, exhale… Feel the air coming to the stomach, hold it it, hold it… and let it go… empty the lakes… calm down… "Haah… Haah… Fuck… I almost lost it again."

Throwing the dirty handkerchief away onto a small trash bin, I support myself on the desk with a hand. Wobbling, my ankles shivering as a jolt tries to rouse them from the slumber, I approach the coffee machine. Preparing the brew, I lean on the wall.

It's the same. The feelings are mirrored, and only serve to rouse my memories of Iceberg… of every one of them… every death… of my beloved…

Then… Wait… if these feelings are mirrored… Someone who was irreplaceable… Who was…

"Ugh! Kgh… No… Fuck, no…"

Legs shake, knees feel weak. Throat closes up, I can feel the acid burning its base, my chest hiccuping as I claw at it, to try and breathe in. Hunching over the desk, a ringing in my ears grows louder and louder.

A strong slap on my cheek, burning as if I had been hit by a laser.

" Farewell, Shirogane…"

A heavy weight on my hands, crushing me. Cold… and fading…

"… Goodbye, Bro."

My eyes hurt, gouged by needles in slow motion. I might not be about to drown, yet my heart suffocates with every breath I take.

" A small compromise it is. Rid yourself of this excessive empathy you have. It binds your actions."

The echoes continue, I hit the desk with a coiled fist. Gritting my teeth, breathing through them, panting through them, I cough and cough to calm down. Easing up my breathing, running a hand over my chest, I blink, touch the desk, become aware of what's around.

And taking one last deep breath, sighing and screaming the air out at the end, my eyes water.

Because… his answer… it's the same as mine… when I lost it during Iceberg…

"… I guess we really are similar, you and me," Grabbing the mug, I slowly trace the rim as I sip, sitting down slowly.

But I can get it together… because I had someone there for me. Marimo-chan, even if my stupidity got her devoured. Sumika, even if being near me sent her to a fate worse than death. And Yuuko… both of them during last loop, and before I came here, too. I have an oath… a hope I chase after…

Even if it is only to mend my own mistakes, that difference lets me draw the line. I… don't have anyone to direct my frustration at. I did hit Dad back then… but only because he talked shit about Meiya. Same for when Meiya herself pushed the wrong buttons… and I almost raped her.

"But now… I've nowhere to send my frustration at, save my work."

It's all just a matter of giving myself time, since I don't have anyone to hate for my fate. But… I wasn't always like this. Learning to grin and bear it during the CCSE as we shared our rations with Mikoto, learning to make a little of daily effort to make large progress down the line as Tama tutored me in sniping… and so many more things…

"… Why did you fall in that rage then? Wasn't there… anyone with you?" And… why are you so different to the me from the other world's loops?

Well… I don't really know anything about him… But Her Highness didn't recognize me during the coup, and Tsukuyomi-san was only suspicious of me due to my lack of data. I had thought this world was just another branch of the BETAverse I traversed in my loops… but stuff is so different…

"… Well, to be fair, compared to my world, this one is fucking crazy. The differences aren't that big with the other worlds. I mean… yeah, I have already seen two completely different timelines. Some small changes aren't that surprising."

Meiya didn't knew me either in this universe or in my first loops, nor did anyone else from the squad. Chizuru wasn't the daughter of a politician back home, either. And Mikoto is a guy over there. I guess this timeline just has its own unique aspects and that's that. Just that, for some reason, this world's me was actually made to fight… and just like me and Meiya, he and Yuuhi knew each other.

" You did say that his situation reminded you of your marriage with Mitsurugi, correct?" The XO's question floats back up.

Yeah… I'm sure he was getting tested to join them. But in the end… Wincing, I finish my coffee, gulping all that remained in a single go. Sigh… At least his feelings are enough to tell that's not the case, they ended up falling off, drifting away for whatever reason. Imagine if this world's me was actually Yuuhi's love as I was for Meiya in my world…

…

… Then, his feelings would make sense, I guess. The hurt, the anguish, the disappointment… would line up. If he were the one who held those feelings, if they had a similar relation… No, how did he even remain near her? I… can't see that being the case, with all this sadness.

"Sigh… No point in dwelling over this. Let's return to- Oh?"

The door slowly opens, two small bunny ears walk in. Her gaze hesitating as she approaches, Kasumi was holding her hands together.

"… Good afternoon, Takeru-san."

"Hey, Kasumi. Feeling better?"

"Eh? Yes, I'm fine."

"Really?" She nods, her eyes shining clear like crystals. Looks like me cutting off the recovery session didn't harm her this time… Sigh, "So, what's up? Sensei wants her report now?"

"No, I was free for the moment and… Would you have some time to give me your opinion on our mock battle of this morning?"

Ah… Right, after we came back the XO had us do the recovery. We couldn't talk about the fight, huh.

Flashing her a smile, I pat the desk, "Alright, bring a chair closer. My PC should have access to the footage, I think."

Blossoming widely, her smile grows as her eyes spark to life. Quickly procuring a chair, even faster she gets to my side, making sure to bring the chair right besides mine. Her bunny ears flap a bit, she sits down and stares at the screen while I was getting through the confirmations.

"Oh? Takeru-san, what's this?" She lifts a paper, with my drawings of the weapons.

"That's a Drive Blade."

"Why does it have spikes?"

"Because it's supposed to be a chainsaw."

"But… the motor has an odd… vial-like chamber here. What is this for?"

"Oh, that? A small idea I had, to place a small bullet or something in it."

"… Why?"

"To shoot out the HM-Cloud ammo from it during NOE flight," Clicking the mouse, tapping it as I wait for the slow OS to do as I tell it to, two of my fingers from my free hand tap some papers scattered about the desk, "Saves us the need to load it, or lose the 120mm rounds of a rifle to deploy the cloud. If that one rifle has to be discarded, we lose much by no longer having the HM-Canister with us."

"But why did you put the vial inside the blade?"

"To shoot it with the force of the motor. Also, having a gun-chainsaw-sword sounded metal as fuck in my head!"

"Takeru-san, I don't think this is how weapons are designed. All the small parts might fail at the most crucial time."

"That's what the self-des button is for! Pop the blade, spray the cloud, hit 'em in the confusion. Better yet, you can thrust the blade into a BETA and use them as carriers before detonating it," Waving a finger, I smile. She groans a bit, picking some pages to read, "Most of our swords end up unusable after a BETA skirmish, even when being careful and precise with the amount of CQC battles we engage in. I think the versatility of the design is worth considering. You can keep using regular swords, it's not like they're gonna disappear or anything," Checking a few pop-ups, I reach out for the keyboard to input my ID and junk.

Kasumi groaned, resting her arms and chin on the table, looking at the drawings, "Takeru-san… What does 'MMM' means?" She asks, pointing to one of the papers.

"Magrozzo Missile Massacre, basically spamming enough missiles to sink the moon in. It's kind of like what we did in Niigata, use the air assault as bait to then rush at the Laser-class. And it also works against other TSFs, very few units can dodge as I do."

"I see… You did use some of those odd terms when we were fighting," She leans on my arm, some of her hair falling inwards, "Is how we fought today your ideal way of fighting?"

"Yeah? I mean, I never had the sniping you do nor the larger radar," Makes me understand why so many players picked the Frei back in the tournament, the extra reach is too much of an advantage, "Still, having some more options in weaponry wouldn't be a bad thing. Hard to believe we've been using the same model of blade since the start of the war, actually. With how different current TSFs are to what the Gekishin was back then, one would think someone would have devised a lighter sword, with a better center of gravity. I dunno, maybe even have it share the pylons with our rifles. You know what I mean?"

"Yes… The Professor also complains about old stuff that's outdated from time to time," She then sighs.

"Haha… Yeah… Yuuko does not like things to stay static for long. Sigh… Still, I'm not asking for much with these designs I believe. It ain't like I'm telling the crew I wanna make a lasersabre or anything."

Just imagine it. Dual wielding those red lasersabres, shooting lightning out from your hands, choking them with the Flow's power… the BETA wouldn't stand a ghost of a chance!

A shake of my arm, clinging tight. The tingly feeling on the back of my head, remaining there. Still, unmoving, merely there… as if watching.

"Kasumi?"

She was staring at me, blinking slow from time to time. Her bunny ears move, remaining up, "Takeru-san… What were those swords of light?"

"The lasersabres?"

"Is that what they're called? Are they… from one of your other lives?"

"Ahahaha! No, no. They're from a movie, Galaxy Wars."

"A movie?"

"Yeah. You see Kasumi, in another timeline, in a cluster of stars far, far away from Earth…"

Telling her of the movies, she forgets all about the training. The tingly feeling covering the back of my head, falling like a warm blanket at night, remains there as she grabs onto my arm with both hands, staring as I tell the story, remembering the details.

"… But why did he became bad? If he protected his son in the end… Why?"

"No idea. The prequel movies didn't get to that part yet back in my world. But there's a lot of cool stuff in the movies, and more in the games and comics!"

"There's also games of this?"

"Of course, Kasumi. You get to shoot out lightning from your hands and wield a sword of light. Who would not want to play a game like that?" I chuckle as she curves her brows, "Imagine if we could actually make the lasersabres in this world… That would be so hype," Well… the XG is kind of like a mini Doom Moon, so maybe we could?

"So…" She pulls my arm, "In the end, does Lucky have a happy ending?"

"Yeah. The last scene is with him seeing the ghosts of his mentors and his father, as energy beings united to the Flow, as everyone else is celebrating. It's a nice ending for the first three movies, though I still like the second one more."

"I see… Those Shedi Knights sound like good people," She smiles, making a doodle of Master Iota in a paper, wielding five lasersabres for some reason.

"Of course they are. They follow their teachings at all times, trying to not tip the scale of balance in the galaxy. I mean, it's a tossup between them and the Zith. Can you imagine a world where the authorities hold everyone by the throat under the threat of the Doom Moon's beam?"

Shivering, the tip of her pencil breaks off, "Don't say that, Takeru-san. That's…"

Petting her head, some hair strands in between my fingers, I smile at her, "Don't worry. That's not going to happen in real life. It's just a movie, Kasumi. And anyways, no matter how dark life gets, the Shedi will always be there to restore the balance."

"They're like a light of hope, kind of," She smiles, going back to finish her doodle.

"Heh, yeah, I guess."

Looking at the drawing, she nods, pleased, "So Takeru-san… Why do you like the second movie more?"

"Oh, because you get to learn what the Shedi are. Or were, anyways. Lucky gets to train with Iota, and he teaches him about the Light and Dark currents of the Flow. It's where you get to see the difference between them and the Zith, besides the color schemes."

"… I see. You seem to remember much of these movies," She says as the tingly feeling got stronger, as she again rested her weight on my arm, "Did you watch them with Sumika-san?"

"I mean, yeah, but Sumika liked Kaiju movies the most."

"Kaijus?"

"Giant monsters. Like… Kingzilla, and all of its movies, Slothra, Reykong, you name it. If it was a giant monster, she would get super hype about it."

"… Why? Sumika-san doesn't seem to like that kind of violent things."

"Oh, because she liked rooting for Kingzilla, most of the time. You have no idea how many times she made me watch that thing…" Even when we got together, she'd drag me to the cinema, or to the rental shops, to watch them over and over again, "And somehow, she'd find new details with every rewatch!"

"Really? I see… So Sumika-san liked that…" Nodding with her eyes closed, her shoulders sunk a bit, "So, did you watch the Galaxy Wars movies with her?"

"Yeah, but… the time I watched them the most was with Meiya," I lean back, hands behind my head as I lift the frontal legs of the chair, swaying in the air, "When we… got married, I showed her a lot of stuff so that she could enjoy her free time, however short it was. But since playing games was kind of hard for her, we settled for watching movies together as we cuddled each other," Closing my eyes, I can almost feel the lavender scent of her perfume, her grasp on my shoulders, over my knees, her breath on my neck… those small, short, quiet moments where we just held the other… and nothing else…

"Takeru-san," Kasumi pulls my uniform, brows furrowing and almost touching, staring unblinking at me, "what does 'cuddling' means?"

"… You'll understand once you grow up," She puffs her cheeks a bit, and they enlarge more as I chuckle, "Anyways… Meiya really loved Galaxy Wars, the second movie the most as I did. I think even my parents loved the saga, what with the Shedis and all the homages to some old films. The Shedis are basically space samurai monks, so you can imagine how much Meiya liked them."

"Yes… That does sound like something she would enjoy…" She says, low, as she looks away.

"Yeah… until I jokingly told her it would be cool to have a laser version of the Minaru Kamui. We had a goddamn blackout thanks to her crazy idea. Sigh… Ahahaha…" I keep on chuckling, remembering her pout as her face was smeared in dust and oil, complaining much about how me and Tsukuyomi-san dragged her out of the place before she tried something even more stupid. So innocent yet so bright… compared to her, this world's Meiya is just… Sigh… "So… Me and Meiya would usually rewatch the movies before going to sleep, or as we were in bed. She got really into it, lemme tell you. Before I knew it, half of the master bedroom was filled with figures of the series, and she even bought most of the games and comics."

"Really?" Kasumi's bunny ears flap up, the tingly feeling intensifying, "That… looks fun. She seems…" Kasumi pursed her lips, eyes squinting, voice creaking, "happy."

"… Yeah. She was. Sigh… You have no idea how much she always insisted me to be like Lucky, to follow the right path. She even started trying to do the handwave thing during the meetings, too. Can you believe it?" Worst part is, it worked for some fucking reason.

"… The handwave?" She tilts her head, moving her bun ears. Only to twitch as I tell her about it, puffing her cheeks, "That makes them sound kind of bad."

"Well, some deception is unavoidable, Kasumi. Intrigue is necessary to achieve your goals," I nod, petting her head.

"You sound like the Professor," She counters, still pouting.

"Huh? No, get real. Yuuko would be a Zith, no questions asked," I can clearly picture her zapping everyone while laughing like a madman, screaming like 'Unlimited Processing Powah!'.

CHOP!

"Takeru-san, the Professor wouldn't do that."

"My world's Yuuko totally would, just for the kicks of it. And… I don't see her agreeing with the Shedi's code."

"But she wouldn't use her powers for bad things. She wouldn't be like that old creepy man in the cloak."

"Yeah… That makes her a gray one, then."

"Why don't you think she'd be a Shedi?" Her shoulders drop as do her bunny ears, looking at some of the doodles she had made, then back at me, "The Professor isn't a bad person."

"… I know. But the Shedi are kinda too passive. Yuuko wouldn't be like that."

"What do you mean?"

"Oh, the things Iota tells Lucky as he trains him in the swamp. Meiya loved that part, she actually made part of it a slang for our attendants."

Clearing my throat, readjusting my posture on my seat, inhaling slowly, slowly as those days come back. Kasumi brings her chair closer, hitting mine, as she leans on me, the tingly feeling spreading. And it's… as if she were right in front of me…

The perfume coming from her hair, the light seeping through it as she walks hurriedly from one corner to the other, aligning her figmas with utmost care.

The rapid stream of words, the sun that she emanated with her eyes when she used to tell me about the new comics she read at night, as I massaged her back and shoulders, or her feet at times.

The smile… the gentle caress that covered me, that enveloped me as she brought me closer, brought herself closer, until my shoulder was made into her pillow and her hair into mine. As we watched the movies, simply… spending the night… together…

"… Takeru-san?"

"Hm? Oh, sorry. Ahem… Well, let me remember that part…" Petting the back of her head, that scene, those scenes come back… as did the grasp, the pull on my sides, the weight on my right shoulder, "So… the lesson goes like this… Iota tells Lucky about how the Dark current of the Flow is easier to link with, easier to gain power from, but that once it seeps into you it'll never release its grasp, and you'll basically become a vessel of the darkness."

"… Like Dersh Blader," Kasumi says, her bunny ears moving as she groaned.

"Exactly. So Lucky asks Iota how can he tell which current to follow, and that's where the line comes. Iota tells him 'You will know when you're serene, calm, at peace. Passive. A Shedi uses its knowledge and power for defense, never to attack.', and that… stroke a chord in Meiya, with all her samurai teachings and all. She took it to heart as if it were another line of the honor code," And… I think there was a game or a comic, I can't remember well, where she could actually train in a Shedi academy. Those latter years are more fuzzy than the ones closer to that day when I had to choose between her and Sumika, but… Yeah, I don't see Meiya falling out of love with that franchise.

"I see…" Kasumi smiles, releasing my arm, "But yes, I don't see the Professor agreeing with staying quiet."

I nod, smiling back, "See? I mean, just imagine Yuuko having Flow powers. Reading emotions, psychokinesis, shooting thunderbolts from her fingers…" A shudder ran down my back, cold, "That'd be real bad."

"But then… Um, Takeru-san, do you think I could be a Shedi?"

"You? I mean…" Suddenly smirking, I poke her forehead with a single finger, then part her hair away, "I dunno, Kasumi-kun… You're always dressed in dark clothes and you're so close to Yuuko…"

"I'm not bad," Pouting, she protests, her feet lightly hit my legs.

"See? You're falling to anger, young Gadawan… to the Dark Flow…"

"Uhh… You're mean, Takeru-san. I would never be a Zith."

"But think about it, you could erase all carrots from existence! Who would oppose the reign of Dersh Bnnuy?"

CHOP!

"Takeru-san, stop it!"

"Ahaha… I'm kiddin', I'm kiddin'," Blocking her hand as she kept chopping while I chuckled, her cheeks puffed and puffed, "But, you're right. You're too good to ever be a Zith," She flinches, her hand stopping cold, and as I pet her head she can't hold my gaze.

"… Thanks."

"I mean, if you were to become a Zith… you'd have to become the complete opposite of you. Like… wearing only white clothes, getting all assertive… and eating carrots."

A large flower field comes to my mind, the plants waving as the wind blows. The sun shines, down at the grass, at the giant carrots that bounce back and forth like dancing. And in the middle of it… Kasumi, dressed in all white, swaying in circles, dancing along the carrots, wearing a smirk as evil as Yuuko's one.

Stopping cold in her tracks, crouching and plucking a carrot from the ground, she chuckles, " The world belongs to me… and the carrots… Mmfh!" Biting into it with gusto, the carrot is devoured in a second by the bunny.

"Takeru-san…"

"Ouch! Not my ear! Kasumi, stop!"

"Then stop teasing me…" She lets go, pouting.

Rubbing my ear, closing an eye, I chuckle, "Why did you even look into my thoughts?" She just holds my gaze, silently, "I get it, I get it. Sorry… So… Right, what were we talking about?"

"Hmm… I think about the movi-"

Beep!

A sound comes up from Kasumi's pockets, she quickly fumbles in there until she takes out her comms.

"Yes? Eh? No, I'm with him now," She says, nodding, "Yes… Takeru-san," She offers me the comms.

Sigh… Now, what? Grabbing the thing, I bring it up close, "What's up, XO?"

"Shirogane, what is Yashiro doing with you as of now?" She asks, sounding confused, curious.

"Nothing productive, that's for sure."

"Huh? Then, why is she there?"

"She merely came to talk, that's all. Is there a problem with that?"

"… No. So, are you done with your work for today?"

"I mean… Yeah, kinda. Did you need me for something?"

She coughs, seeming to take a sec to drink something, "The Valkyries are having some… difficulties with their training session in Valgern-On. Isumi called a moment ago, asking for advice on how to handle this… 'Hard Mode' setting of the software. If you're done and feeling up to it, can you go train with them?"

"… As the Viking, I imagine?"

"Of course," She sighs, I can practically see her shaking her head with a hand on her hair as always, "You can send me your report now, I'll be setting up a separate room so that you and Yashiro can practice against the Valkyries using the ethernet connection. Once you're done in your office, come to mine and I'll take you to the room."

"… Roger. Just so we're clear, I won't have to talk with anyone, right?"

"I'll leave a comm so that Isumi can speak with you, but it's going to be distorted too. Don't worry, they won't have a way of knowing who you are."

"… If you had prepared everything, why even ask me if I'm up for it?"

"Because it's no use to send you to them if you're not capable of offering them a challenge. I also thought you'd welcome the change, to enjoy some time in that game after all that happened. If you're not up to it, I'll tell them you're busy for-"

"Nah, I can do it," Cracking my neck, I reach out to the keyboard to start closing up stuff, saving what I had worked on, "Just… What did you have in mind? Do I go serious against them?"

"I mean, if you wouldn't mind…" I bet you just rolled your eyes.

"Yuuko, let me remind you I'm better at Valgern-On than I'm at piloting," Mostly because I don't get subjected to any G-Forces as I play. And we have lasersabres in there, too, "If you want me to give them a training session… I'm gonna go at 'em seriously," And also, I'll probably end up enjoying myself, so holding back is gonna be out of the question.

"That's fine by me. Do let Yashiro practice as well, and try to teach her whatever you can."

"Got it."

"Good," She takes another sip, "Then, that's all."

"Oh, one thing."

"Hm? What is it?"

"Eat something with the coffee."

"… Shut up."

The sound cuts, leaving only static coming from the comms. Sigh… I bet she hasn't eaten anything substantial since the meeting, too. Goddammit, Yuuko…

Looking to my side, Kasumi had arranged all the papers already. Sorting my drawings and schematics in folders, she was taking them to the nearby bookshelf. She even put all her doodles in a neat folder too, left it besides me.

"Takeru-san, are we leaving right now?"

"No, I gotta send a report. Lemme write it down real quick. Hehe… I guess this is gonna be the first time I'll show you my skills in Valgern-On, right?" Smiling at her as bring my chair closer to the desk, I wait as the OS lags when firing up a doc while I close everything else.

"Ah… That's true," She again sits by my side, grabbing and clutching her folder to her stomach, "Is it going to be as shaky as a battle?"

"The camera? Maybe, depending on how fast you move. But don't worry, I'm sure they must have not yet gotten very good."

"Why?" She asks, resting herself onto the desk.

"Because if they're having trouble with Hard Mode, then they're still fooling around. The game has four difficulty modes: Beginner, Normal, Hard, and finally, Maniax. And, honestly? Even on Hard the AI is kind of bad at times. So I don't think you're gonna get steamrolled or anything."

"I see… So, what mech should I use?"

"Hmm… Maybe the Xao-Myun, to let you get used to both melee and ranged fighting, and since it moves fast it's good for you to learn well in it," Mikoto did say he thought the Xao was better for new players compared to the base Kaizer, who was a jack-of-all-trades mech with average stats across the board. Sigh… Stopping my typing for a second, his face returns, his shock and fears during the tournament. Heh… I wonder if I'll be able to teach Kasumi as well as we did together when we just started.

"I hope I don't crash…" She says, hiding her eyes into her arms.

"Did you… have problems piloting before?" She nods, bunny ears cascading down, "Well… Don't worry, Kasumi," Petting her head slowly, I smile as she raises her sight up, "Let's just work slowly, one step at a time. Okay?"

"… Yes," And then, another of those precious, shining smiles. She truly is too good for this world… "So, um, Takeru-san, what will you be using? The Raioh?"

"The what? Oh, right," We had to edit lots of stuff in the games, namely the credits, and also the Takemikazuchi's name and look. Now it's called the Raioh, and has three horns instead of one. How did Yuuko manage to hack into the game and replace the model, I've no idea, "No, the Take would expose too many of my tells. It's literally what made me shift my style to full-blown hyper-offense in the first place, with the machineguns I wanna put in the Type-00C and all. So…" Smirking, I drown a chuckle, "I'm gonna have to bust out the secret unit of the game…"

Her bunny ears move, tilting her head she stares at me, "… Secret unit? What's the secret about it?"

"You see… once you clear the game in Hard, you unlock one secret mech. It even has a special campaign mode that's different to the rest of the other mechs in Oratory Tango. This story follows up right after the bad end of the game, with this unit as the main character. I played through it back home, when seeing if the game could be used to train here. And, not gonna lie, if the Take didn't exist I'd be maining that unit."

"I see… And, what kind of mech is it?" She asks, looking straight ahead into my eyes. Only to flinch, rise her bunny ears in attention, letting out a low, cute squeak.

"Hehehe… It's none other than an improved version of the original main unit, the Skull Kaizer!"

Downtime in the Masquerade (III)

A/N: During this episode, Takeru will start singing as he plays games . The song is basically an in-universe rendition of 'Legend of Kaizer' from Mazinkaizer SKL. P oint being, th ese 20k+ words are the most cringe inducing and self-indulging thing I've written in a long while. It's a complete non-plot related filler mess of a chapter filled with dumb jokes and drawn out interactions , and I will not apologize about it.

Also, some of the machines mentioned during this chapter will be direct counterparts to the playable units of the real life version of Valgern-On, Virtual-On Oratorio Tangram , so I will not be using my long descriptions all th e time by instead pointing you to the source material . If having a mental image of th e machines is not important to you, you can skip the next paragraph.

Takeru's machine of choice, the Skull Kaizer, is basically a fusion between the Temjin and the Specineff. The Tipharet is based on the Angelan, the Ravager Mk-II is the clone of the Viper-II or Cypher , the Colossus is like a Belgdor, the Struggler is a reflection of the Apharmd, and finally, the Void Watcher is equal to the BAL-series.

As an aside, after the next chapter, we're sinking back into the meat of the plot. I recommend that any readers that have not yet read the sidestories I've posted to go do so before going into chapter 66. While most of them are not yet complete at the time of posting this chapter , all those stories hold some importance for the events going forward . Or you can save yourself the intri g ue and try to figure out the plot twists without the aid of the extra material.

E njoy the light filler chapters to cleanse your palate, assuming you don't die from the cringe. A nd if you have the time check out the other stories, as they'll help you understand the core issue of the Paranoia arc without forcing me to do so through text walls of info dumps or never-ending inner monologues like in the OG chapters 50-51 of Reversal .

As always, thanks for reading and commenting. Keep staying safe.

Zuoriel

PS.: To that one commenter who asked me about Project Mikhail, sadly my dedicated GPU-less PC can't run the thing. And after seeing the grindy nature of the game, I don't have much interest in it due to a lack of time. Writing is hard, and time consuming.

---

Chapter 64:

Downtime in the Masquerade (III)

---

December 2nd. A bit after 6 PM.

(Yokohama Base, B17F. Training Room.)

---

Sparks flying off as it traded paint with a building, a Ravager Mk. II kept on boost jumping away in regular intervals. This new version of the Ravager is sporting a pointy and defined look resembling a Shiranui if it were to receive stealth-based armor like that of the Raptor, coated in vibrant blue in this occasion. As the machine kept on boosting away into a desolate landscape, as a few pixelated clouds came and went up into the sepia-tinted skies, it had to fire off a few of its homing missiles to deflect the incoming assault that chased after it like cat would to a mouse. A beeping rising in a flash, some of the enemies missiles broke through the homings. Hayase groans as a veers the analog, making the Ravager perform a tight crouch which allowed the machine to squeeze itself through a crumbled bridge, trying to do a power slide, as a few missiles missed their mark.

However, the Ravager and its operator had little to no time to relax under the few threads of light that waddled through the clouds to shine on the ruined city. Another round of missiles, another round of the beeping, which forced the boosters to activate, to dash away through the tilted buildings.

"Shit… Someone's on a bad mood today, huh," Hayase complains, clicking her tongue.

Sitting right besides her, Touko lets out a small chuckle, "Why, to me it would seem like you are not in top form today, 1st Lt," Using her Tipharet's larger boosters, shaped as wings to go along the angelic motif of the slim unit, Touko's machine clears the buildings, locking onto Hayase, firing off the Neige Cannon, a twister of ice shards joining into one final beam towards the enemy unit.

Yet, a smirk rises in Hayase, who presses both shoulder triggers as she did half a tilt. The Ravager jumps backwards and remains in the air, hovering over the beam, rising towards the now attack-locked Tipharet. It was not remotely close to Takeru's backflips, you'd understand, yet the movement was nimble and fast enough for the Ravager to clear the distance before the attack animation ceased.

"And now, you're done!" Quickly pressing the combination, clicking noises echoing about, Hayase's unit's proceeds to do a sharp dash, morphing into HSST-mode and ramming itself into the Tipharet.

Piercing through its chest, oil is splattered around, pieces of metal and cables start flying about from the gaping hole left in the machine. Its wings are clipped, torn from the body, a few cables and fuel lines stretched before being torn apart, splattering sparks and fuel before catching on fire. And as the wings burn, as that mantle of fire and smokes gently falls upon the angelic mech as if someone was tucking it into a bed, the S.L.C. combo of the Ravager shaves the last remaining health Touko's unit had. A shriek, pained and high pitched, comes from the speakers as the explosion occurs, the small detail added for when a mech is defeated with a hit to the cockpit.

As the victory pose of the Ravager Mk-II played out, pointing a thumb to itself as a prideful prince would, Hayase snorted as she rose a tight fist up. Touko sighed as she shook her head, shrugging as she looked back at Munakata. By their side, the quick clicking of the joysticks could still be heard, frantic and hurried. Sweat beginning to be noticeable on their foreheads, lingering as a small veil on their controls, Tsukiji and Takahara were also having a duel.

Amidst a carrier ship's runway, littered with cargo and hooks swaying about, the large pixelated sea and clouds on the distance, their two machines played tag as they circled around the map. Tsukiji's Colossus, a machine that resembles more a Wadatsumi than anything else, slowly but surely evaded the incoming attacks, sharp cornering at times to dodge the reckless, fast and unidirectional charges of Takahara's Struggler, a machine colored with a camo pattern covering its compact and simple frame, perhaps comparable to the austere design of the first Tomcats and Eagles.

Hands shaking, aware of her breathing, of the air slowly coming into her nose, squeezing itself down to her stomach, Tsukiji tried to no avail to reach long range, to use the missiles of her unit to end the match without risking damage to her unit. Sadly, Takahara's superior speed and weapon combination did not allow for that and, as you'd understand, this only stockpiled anxiety over nervousness on the girl's shoulders. The Struggler did not have an easy time, that being said. It is quite fair to say Takahara also was at her wits' end. Not releasing her bottom lip from her teeth's grasp, her heartbeats clanging against the base of her neck, the pressure, the grip on her joystick became all the more harder, vicious. She was very, very upset that Tsukiji had managed to both elude her charges and keep her in check.

Usually, as I'm sure you'd know, matches in Valgern-On did not go for more than a minute. Perhaps two at max, if both players were being extra careful. However, when the skill ceiling is raised, the matches start to drag on and on. What usually would be surefire shots now became misses, what was a guaranteed starter towards lethal was a risky maneuver that would leave one exposed to counters. Sadly, in this case, it was not due to sharper dodging techniques or the dreaded stun-lock some units could cause, or the issues and mind games that take place in a team fight which caused this scenario. I believe it is quite fair to affirm… the reason was a more simple one.

"Shit, Tae! Stop spamming those damn grenades!" Takahara repined, quickly pressing the shoulder buttons like a child playing with a bell at a counter. Her machine again rushed forth, only for its animation to halt as the small explosion of a grenade played again, causing her to groan and huff in frustration.

"You're always right on my trail, I can't do anything else!" Tsukiji cried out, her hands cramping up as the claw-like grip she had to take to always be on the move while also firing the grenades away started to hurt. A small moment, she eased up her grasp on the controls, her wrists wailing in pain. In that instant, Takahara dashed forth, landing a strike with her machete, tumbling the Colossus to the floor.

Tsukiji softly groaned, both at her inability to finish her off and at the pain in her hands. She didn't know what else she could possibly do, as lost a penguin in a desert. Takahara, on her end, also fumed a bit, as when her unit had to land it was punished by a grenade, which prevented her from pushing her advantage. And so, as the rest of the Valkyries stared at the chase, the two playing grew more and more frustrated.

Tsukiji's Colossus is a slow unit yet has above average defenses, only truly threatened by beam-based weaponry. Most of its available weapons are not particularly decent at close- and mid-range, as they're more effective in the story mode against the BETA due to their AoE despite their light damage. That being said, the napalm missiles that lay hidden in its large shoulder pads would wreck havoc upon the surrounding area if launched, anything but the heaviest machines taking more than 50% damage. However, Tsukiji's own nervousness, the ingrained patters she had learned, and the restriction of the time limit only served to unnerve her will, lessen her performance as she failed time and again to put enough space between her and Takahara's unit to fire off the napalms without risking damage to herself. Her own shields were lower than Takahara's, so her best weapon might actually knock her out before her enemy.

However, Takahara is on the other end of the spectrum of emotions. The Struggler is a decent pick, I suppose, for most players. It counts with the largest weapon selection in the roster, and can play a variety of roles. It also has good speed and defenses, nothing too remarkable but solid enough. However, this machine comes with one limitation: It has no beam-based weaponry. All of its guns use shells, its missiles are on the light end of the damage spectrum, and, while decent, its machetes do little against a tank like the Colossus.

And as I'm certain you'd understand, since this match had already been going on for nearly two minutes, the beeping of the alarm had started to chime in, notifying that less than sixty seconds were left before a timeout. Each Valkyrie only managing to shave a small percentage of the shields of the other at a time. Unable to break away from the conventions they learned from, they cannot break through the other's defensive patters, no matter how many jumps they chain with the hooks that linger up above, no matter how precise their cornering around the crates is. Health bars getting lower and lower, only by small amounts at a time, neither can manage to get a lock on the other, not without risking serious damage. And while in another world, in another timeline that would have been just another aspect of a game, for the Valkyries… this was no game. Losing came with its fair share of consequences.

Which is why, Takahara circles her thumb on the stick, pushing it forward, her own breathing blazing as the thrusters of her virtual machine were, "Damn… I won't let you win by timeout again!" Frowning as she switched her weaponry, one hand of the Struggler aims a rifle, sending a downpour of bullets towards the Colossus' left, making a few crates explode and forcing Tsukiji to strafe to the right, to the outer side of the runway.

And as Tsukiji again deployed her grenades, to try and stun the Struggler's assault to let her get to cover, Takahara grinned, pressing the analogs, activating the special finisher of her unit. The Struggler's Force Skill, Blitzkrieg Amp, doubles all the damage the unit does and grants it unlimited dashes for the duration of the skill. It also makes it glow in a blue hue, which looks pretty awesome in all honesty, as it shines along the clear skies of the open sea the virtual arena had as its background.

"Eat this, Tae!" With a triumphant smirk, she drives her unit forward, determined to smack the life out of the Colossus.

Which only forces more panic into Tsukiji's heart, her button presses growing manic, rushed, "Awawa! No, there has to be-" Her machine tumbles over, near the edge of the ship, her erratic fire hitting a few poor virtual seagulls instead of the Struggler, the roasted chickens falling into the ocean as failed divers would, "I can't lose… I won't lose!" I won't be subjected to that torture again!

And with desperation as her fuel source, she starts spinning her analog stick, faster and faster as if a spinning top it were, to force her machine to stand up faster. But once she does, as she saw Takahara's unit was already in the air, boost jumping with the machete at the ready, Tsukiji couldn't help but to press a specific combination of buttons.

The trigger of her own Break Skill, Last Gambit Assault, which releases the restrictions of her beam-based weaponry for ten seconds, allowing the Colossus to fire off those type of weapons without charging. It would make the overall armor of the mech to expand, emit quite some steam as its system releases all limiters, and give it a decorative aura of translucent marine green along the cape of steam that pours from the shoulders.

And Takahara started to feel the coldness of sweat tickling her nape as she sees in her TV how the shoulders of the Colossus retract and expand, readying the napalms. So, she commits to a full dash, to try and tumble the machine and prevent the attack. With a sharp step back, the Colossus avoids the charge of the Struggler at the last second, the machete scratching, scalping the steel. Quickly igniting both jump units, Tsukiji then aims her cannon at the floor, firing it off. The beam comes out pouring like a newly discovered petrol well, sending her unit flying off into the skies. Quite the clever move, I'm sure you'd agree, to use the intensity of the beam to propel herself upwards. Into long range, to be specific.

Knocked back by the shockwave of the beam as she did a last minute backboost, Takahara's Struggler barely has the time to stand up and re-lock onto the Colossus as Tsukiji fired off the napalms while still in the air, with the pillar of destructive light as her support. Like hail to an unguarded garden, the missiles ravish the dock of the ship, destroying the environment, large splashes of water rising as the explosions continued.

As the aquatic chorus of the sinking parts continued through the speakers alongside the beam's screeching and the stock explosions, the Struggler starts using its large ammo supplies to shoot down the missiles before they explode upon it, hoping to endure the assault as it hovers in midair, to avoid the shockwave of the beam and the missiles that do fall on the carrier.

And for a few seconds, that's all that happens. The beam drilling its way down into the carrier, the myriad of missiles flying down, some shot down by the Struggler, others falling and exploding on the wreckage the ship had become. Until a beeping appears on both sides, the signal of the end of their special skills. And as the beam suddenly shuts off, as the Struggler's own ammo supplies returned to normal to shoot down the last napalms… the Colossus started to fall down, crashing onto the Struggler. As both machines plummeted onto the carrier like a falling meteor, the damage done by Tsukiji's assault caused the impact to tear off a part of the ship. And thus, both units ended up taking a nosedive into the pixelated sea of the arena.

"Huh?! We can fall to the sea?!" Takahara started button mashing, trying to get her mech to swim somehow. Sadly, there is a drawback that comes with her Break Skill. The Struggler cannot dash or boost jump for a few seconds after the skill is used up. Many curses come pouring from her mouth, her machine keeps sinking and sinking.

"No… My unit won't even move!" Tsukiji wails, as the aftereffects of her own skill were showing up. Once her skill was used up, the Colossus was left unable to move for a few seconds and all of its beam-based weapons became unusable as well, "How are we supposed to fight underwater? Are we- Huh?"

A timer appeared in the center of both TV screens, shaving closer and closer to zero as they started to button mash like crazy. Once the clock reached zero… both machines stopped moving, only to then convulse as jolts of electricity enveloped their metallic bodies. As it were, the game has a particular mechanic in which, if a machine falls into some areas, failure to escape them results in the destruction of the unit. And for the first time since they had started their training sessions with the Stallion machines, the Valkyries were all silent at the end of a match. For the word 'DRAW' was all that remained on the screen as it slowly faded to black.

"… Huh, so you both lost?" Akane comments, arms folded as she raises a brow, "I didn't think we could make draws in this way."

"What the fuck?!" Takahara swings her arms in the air, fuming a flamethrower out, "How come we can die if we fall? Why is that even a thing?!"

"Come on…" Tsukiji tries to appease, tapping her fingers after she slowly rested her controller on her seat, "It's the same as that map's rain of debris, right?"

"Yes, Rigulla's wreckage could create a similar outcome," Asakura nodded, brows furrowed, "I didn't think the destruction of the arenas could be so severe, however. It stands to reason your units would short circuit if they fall to the sea, though. Not only that, but if your boosters do end up submerged, you won't be able to rise back to the surface anyways."

"Oh, shut up!" Takahara whips back, arms tightly folded, the anger cracking the shell of her composure, "This is all Tae's fault for playing like a chicken and then doing that stupid assault."

"Huh?! I was… I was only doing what I always do." Tsukiji couldn't hold the blaze of a gaze Takahara had endowed, so she again lowered her own to the ground in silence.

"Takahara, this kind of attitude won't help you improve," Munakata reminded, resting her arms on the back of the seat, poking the fuming pilot's cheek, "You could have done better, right?"

"Uh… But there's only so much I can do if Tae keeps running in circles. If I let her go, she uses the missiles or snipes me, but if I chase her I can't clear the distance in these cramped maps!"

"And that's what you should learn to do," Munakata reminds, sobering up, now poking the tip of the girl's nose, "You can't keep relying only on the speed and power of your machines. If you're only an arrow, you'll end up hitting yourself against the wall all the time, right?"

"T-That's… I can't do much else with these controls," Folding her arms, she looks away, putting up pitiful excuses, "My hands are so cramped after pumping this thing for so long, and the stick gets so hard… it's so sensitive, reacting to the minimal push, I have to barely press the tip all the time."

"Yeah, I know," Munakata, smiling a bit, ran a hand over Takahara's long hair, "It gets so hard… your hands are so full of it, tired of the constant gripping…"

"Yeah…" She nods, sighing, relaxing her anger, "Yeah, I'm a bit tired of this small one. I rather have the usual, the extra size makes it so much easier on my hands," She smiles, as Takahara had quite many setbacks in using the analog stick as opposed to the lever stick that's on both simulators and cockpits.

"I see. So, you like your sticks on the… bigger side?"

"Yeah, the bigger the better in my opinion. I can't see myself getting used to anything other than-" Halting her words as she heard Hayase let out a drowned snort, a slight pink fire starts to spread on Takahara's face, "1st Lt Munakata…"

Smiling, winking, she gestures in circles, edging the girl to continue, "No, no, please do tell us about how bigger you like your sticks."

"Not like that!" Rising from her seat like a geyser, she tried to take a swing at Munakata.

Who simply danced away in a short spin, giving the furious girl a slap on her bottom, "Come on, don't get so upset. One would think you're… hiding something, otherwise."

"Shut up! You and your damn sex jokes… I'm not interested in that kind of stuff!"

"Then, you don't swing that way, Takahara-kun?" Hayase asks, a small smile as she caressed her hair, staring right ahead into the shocked Takahara's eyes.

"Eh?! Ah, uh… well… It's not that I don't, you know, want to someday… you know…"

"So you do like 'em big, huh," Haruko comments from a corner, smirking at the gaping expression of her comrade.

"N-No! It's not like that, dammit!"

"So she says but…" Hayase chuckles, making a stroking, slow gesture with her hand, "Now that I think about it, she always kind of stares a lot at us when we're changing, right?"

"I'm telling you, it's not like that!"

"It's alright, Takahara," Munakata pats her shoulder, nodding a few times, whispering again as she leans closer and closer to Takahara's ear, "It's alright to be curious of that kind of thing at your age, to want to explore all the roads. But you know what happened to Goldilocks. She wanted to have a taste of every soup so badly that…" Licking her lips, she chuckled.

"Shut up!" Moving away, face red in anger and embarrassment, Takahara's fists again tried to lunge for Munakata's face.

"Calm down!" Akane grabbed her by the waist from behind, barely managing to hold the rush of her comrade, "You can't hit your superiors, Takahara!"

"Hehe, I think the lady protests too much," Hayase pokes the wound, chuckling alongside Munakata. It only makes Takahara fume more blazes out, as you'd understand.

"But, you know," Munakata winks back at Takahara, freezing her anger solid, "If you ever wanna taste the other side of the street… Just knock on my door whenever."

Takahara's growls and stuttering voice made the aggressors start laughing, unrestrained. Akane, Tsukiji and Asakura desperately cling to the swinging arms as they, pointlessly, try to appease Takahara's desire to indulge in bloodshed at the moment. Yet, the chuckling of the older ones is halted as they receive a sharp folder to the face, which also freezes Takahara and those that tried to keep her in check. The soft groaning, the narrowed gaze of Haruka met their eyes then.

"Mitsuki, Munakata-san, please do not use those words against Takahara," She says, waving the folder at their faces, "I can't believe you'd so shamelessly utter such things… You're horrible."

"Wh- Haruka, we're just messing around," Hayase counters, feeling a dart in her heart.

"It didn't look like that to me," Akane says, low, giving her a side glance as she released Takahara, who then sighed as Asakura places a hand over her shoulder.

"… Come on, it was just a joke."

"Those vulgar matters are not a joke, Mitsuki!" She scolded, pointing a finger at her friend's nose, "And… A-And… It's so embarrassing to hear you say such things," Face flushing, she starts lightly hitting Hayase's shoulder with the folder, "Don't go talking about pe… those things so lightly!"

"… She's right," Tsukiji braves, still looking down, "I mean, there's so much more to a relation that just… that ."

"Well, I'll have to agree," Touko nods, smiling a bit, "Love and companionship truly are more precious than… the pleasures of the flesh."

"Yes, exactly that!" Takahara nods repeatedly, pumping a fist, "Even if I'm… curious… those kind of encounters aren't what I want. I'm not some sex crazed thing, I want more than mere meat."

"… Well, what did we expect?" Akane shrugs, smirking, voice low, eyes colder, "They seem to enjoy the fabled 'touch and go' approach, after all."

"HUH?!" Hayase recoiled in shock, gaping.

"Suzumiya, what are you saying?!" Haruko scolded, hands quivering as the breaths she took in.

"Oh? Weren't you the ones suggesting to Takahara to indulge in superficial relations?"

"It was just a joke, come on," Haruko rushes to deflect, yet Akane groans in disagreement.

"Really? Who was the one whose brother was… a little bit too handsy again?"

"Grr… Suzumiya…" Haruko tightened her fists, losing her easygoing smile as they stared at each other.

"I cannot believe you all," Asakura shakes her head, appalled and eyes losing light by the second, "I didn't think you'd be like this…"

"Yes, everyone's different but…" Haruka groans, yet her eyes and shoulders cascade down, quite saddened, "For you to mock romance and love in favor of such… lustful things. I thought you were different, Mitsuki…"

"W-Wait just a damn second! Haruka, it was all just a joke!" Hayase waves her hands around, only to be left breathless as she met her friend's dejected eyes.

"It didn't sound like one," Takahara counters, Akane nods.

"Sigh… Come on, you all," Haruko ruffles her hair, leaning back onto a desk, "It's all just a teasing round. And I do agree, there's more to an encounter than mere sex."

"Could we please move on from this talk?" Asakura asks, face flushed while she facepalms.

"Yeah, let's just let it go." Tsukiji sighs, Takahara doing the same along Akane.

"Sorry, didn't mean it as an insult or anything," Munakata nods towards them, scratching the back of her head. But then, she smirks again, "But just so we're clear, there's nothing wrong with liking 'em bigger, you know," She winks their way, Akane groaning as she taps her forehead, Takahara seething through clenched teeth.

"To hell with you, Munakata," Folding her arms and looking away, Takahara shakes her head, "Coming from the one who… seduced the cyborg, are you not just projecting your preferences right now?" Smirking, she says. Munakata remains gaping for a second, quite shocked as you'd expect.

"Oh! Got her good!" Akane cheered, sharing a high five with Takahara.

"W-Wait a moment… I only did what I did for the sake of the mission!" She immediately counters as she steps forward, hitting a chair, her heart leaping as she recalls the talk by the hill, the kiss engraved in the hand she was coiling.

"Even the… intimate stuff by the pool?" Akane asks, smirking a bit.

"Why, Suzumiya, weren't you the one who endowed the Brasilian carnival's attire, in two separate occasions too?" Touko mentions, a hand on her cheek as she smiles and giggles.

"Wh- I only was following orders!" Face reddening, she yells.

"As did everyone else," Haruko sighs, one eye closed, "But seriously, those uniforms were kind of cute, right? If the skirt wasn't so skimpy, I wouldn't mind wearing them during summer," Smiling bright, she says.

"Oh, that's true!" Haruka claps her hands, nodding, "They were really well designed, too. It felt nice, to not have to always wear the tight and restrictive formal dress."

"Yeah, to have clothes that let themselves breathe was a nice change of pace, as opposed to our usual here. But that skirt was… you know…" Asakura looks down, a single finger scratching her cheek, "I still can't look at the mechanics in the eye after having to wear those things for so long."

"Y-Yeah." Tsukiji nods, tapping some fingers together, "At least they understood our situation and why we had to wear those… uniforms for so long while we patrolled the base when the cyborg was here.

But the Royal Guards…" Eyes crash down, she runs her hands on her arms as if she were trying to dispel the chilly air outside as her chuckling cracks at times.

"Ugh, don't remind me!" Hayase shakes her head, a cold shudder down her back, "Just recalling the nasty gazes they gave us when we crossed in the hallways, their comments under their breath…"

"Yes, that is… true." Touko chuckles then heavily sighs, relieved that her sister did not have to see her endowing such tight and revealing clothing, "Still, it was indeed a nice piece. Perhaps, we could attain permission to actually make some simple pants or a more… formal skirt for next summer?"

"Well, I guess we'll have to ask Cpt Michirun what she thinks," Munakata says, shrugging.

"If the Captain hears you saying that again, you're as good as dead," Hayase reminds, shaking her head, fiddling with her hair, "But anyways, we strayed from the topic at hand. The training must go on!" Chuckling, she hurls a finger at Takahara's face, then at Tsukiji's, "And, you two lost the match. Which places you two at the bottom of the scoreboard."

"Huh?! W-Wait a moment, please!" Tsukiji bolted up, hands gradually closing, "Let us have a rematch!"

"Yeah, yeah!" Takahara agreed immediately, blasting forward like boiling bleach.

"You two, this part of the session is already over," Haruko reminds, showing everybody the scores she and Haruka had been tailing, "And you two ended up in the bottom, which means-"

"You take the punishment!" Hayase announced, smirking widely as she again rose a finger to the ceiling.

"No, anything but that!" Takahara shook her head frantically, "I won't survive that a second time!"

"I… I don't think I can endure that again…" Hunching over, Tsukiji's voice torn to shreds, she could do nothing but shiver in place.

"Come on, Tae," Akane patted her friend's arm, shoulders sagging heavily at the prospect, sighing in sympathy, "It can't possibly be worse than before."

"Oh, why don't you join them in the duty then, 2nd Lt Suzumiya?" Touko suggested, giggling as Akane froze over in shock.

"N-No… I mean, we have a tally for a reason."

"Huh… So you're going to forsake your friend, Suzumiya?" Haruko asks, giving Akane a side glance and a smirk. Which made Tsukiji stare at Akane, like a lone puppy would.

"Come on, all of you," Hitting a desk with a folder, Asakura grumbled as they kept teasing each other and chuckling over the matter, "The results are absolute, and we need to continue the training session."

"Shut up. Just because you got lucky with the grenades…" Takahara shot her a bothered glare, host of quite the amounts of envy and anger.

"I only followed my plan to the letter, adapting to the flow of battle. It's not my fault you find the recklessness of the aggression pleasurable."

"At least I'm not a coward who hides behind cover all the time."

"Sigh… See?" Asakura again shook her head, "That attitude won't help you at all, Takahara."

"Yeah, jokes aside you need to relax a bit," Hayase says, staring squarely at the fuming pilot, "If you're always in such a rush, you won't be able to survive in the field. You all saw how Niigata was like." All five of the newest members look down, losing their smiles. Touko and Munakata grimace, also sending their gazes into an emergency landing, "And not to mention, you and me got done in quite badly by the Vikings today, right?" Smiling, patting Takahara's shoulder, she held her gaze, hoping to send some vigor into her soul, "So we have to step up our practice, until we're at the level where we can make the most out of the Type-00C. Got it?"

"Yes, Ma'am!" Standing in attention, spirit replenished, she replied in full force.

"Same to you, Tsukiji," Hayase continued, nodding firmly despite the serious tone and face she made, "You did a damn nice move at the end there, but if you keep waiting until the last moment to bust out your best moves, you…" Closing her eyes, she folds her arms inwards, along the poison she was about to inadvertently release, "might be blindsided as you got during the match by Takahara."

"Yes, Hayase-san." She whispers, deflating like a balloon untied.

"Sigh… I told you honorifics aren't necessary. Well, anyways, you gotta face your failures head on to truly learn something from them. And that means, you gotta deal with the punishment."

"All that talk just to go back to this…" Takahara grumbled, Tsukiji nodded in agreement.

"You can't break your word, now," Touko reminded, "So, it's the first time we have two people assigned to aid the Captain with her paperwork, correct?"

"Yes, I think so," Munakata nodded, winking at the two slumped figures of the girls, "Maybe she can give you some advice regarding your taste for big sticks ?"

"No!" Takahara shouted, as Tsukiji lowers her gaze further below after stealing a glance at Akane, "Like I would ask the Captain for romantic advice. Do you want me to die or what?!"

"Yeah. I suggest you to not do that, ever," Haruko relents a nod, a weary sigh, "I was only trying to lend an ear… and the complains just never ended."

"Sigh… Anyways, hang in there, you two," Akane nodded to them, using a firm tone coming from her stomach as she did when she was their squad leader, "Don't let this get in the way of the rest of the session," She holds their gazes, they nod back even if they also sigh as they do, "So, should we return to the training or-"

The door opens and slowly, so slowly, Michiru enters the room. Lips compressed into a line, she shuts the door close without making any noise. Sighing, she ruffles her hair, and when she looks up she blinks fast and corks and eyebrow, meeting the curious gazes of her crew.

"What is it? Did you finish your matches already?"

"Yes, Captain," Hayase informs, saluting, "Did you receive word from the Vikings, Ma'am?" And immediately presses on her curiosity.

Which causes Michiru to pinch her nose for a moment, "… Yes. The Professor just notified me both of them agreed to lend us a hand just a moment ago. Let's prepare the simulators, the Viking requested to watch some of our runs in Hard Mode."

"Huh?! Is that possible?" Akane asked, feeling a quiver, a few waves hitting the back of her head.

"Apparently," Michiru shrugs, "By using the ethernet connection, we can share replays of our runs it would seem, and the scoreboards can be shared as well. Before fighting against us in these sims, they want to see how we're measuring up to the challenge. Now, as you know, those two made short work of most of us quite easily during this morning. I want you all to give it your best during this part of the training, you hear me?!"

"Yes, Ma'am!"

"If you make any rookie mistakes… I'll tell Kyouzuka-san to withhold your weekend dessert for a month." She threatens with a smile, all their complexions tighten, answering again in unison. "Good. Also, for today only, I won't need your aid for my paperwork."

"Huh? Really, Captain?!" Takahara asked, eyes sparking alive.

"Yes. It seems the XO arranged someone else to lend me a hand, so that you all can stay well rested. With how much you've been training with these things while testing the XM3, we don't want you losing sleep. So then, let's decide which five of you do your runs first."

"Ma'am?" Akane raises a hand, slowly.

"What is it?"

"Will we also spar against the Vikings with the WMTS?"

"Yes, that's the idea. I have a communicator here to link me with them once they arrive at where the last WMTS unit is. We'll coordinate to link up the software."

"… Huh? So, we don't get to see them?" Munakata asks, brows and eyes narrowing, "Might I ask why the secrecy? I believed we were the base's most secret unit. I know we may not need to be read on at the moment, however…"

"Sigh…" Michiru's shoulders sink, lips narrow as a bit of acid rises in her throat. All of the Valkyries wince at the tight expression, dejection seeping through the cracks of the facade. "I tried, believe me. All I got from the XO was a 'You'll meet the Viking soon enough!' and then she simply cut the connection after telling me to return here while she contacted the mystery duo. So!" Coughing, straightening up, she stares at her crew, who also stands in attention, "I want you all to perform at your best. If we impress the Vikings, perhaps we can make them request more trainings with us, or to hasten their arrival to our ranks."

"Yes, Ma'am!"

"Good. 1st Lt Suzumiya, do you have the report for the trainings thus far ready?"

"Yes, Captain," She steps forward, offering the folder.

Michiru takes it with a thanks and a smile, which Haruka returns, "I assume no one wants to change their unit of choice?" She stares at everyone in the eye for a second, no one replies, "Alright. 1st Lt Suzumiya, the arrangement was?"

"Ahem… Most of our newest members will use the Struggler, 2nd Lt Tsukiji will use the Colossus like you, 1st Lt Munakata and 2nd Lt Kazama have chosen the Tipharet, and 1st Lt Hayase will use a Ravager Mk. II."

"I see. Hayase, you won't change your mind to use a normal machine?" Michiru asks, arms folded, only to feel more ice down her throat as her subordinate shook her head with much vigor.

"It is the only machine which moves to my liking, Captain, ma'am. The Raioh could be a decent second option… but I believe its beam weaponry to be more of a detriment than the HSST mode of the Ravager, as that attack is similar to a frontal charge."

"Fine, fine," She shakes her head, not wishing to argue any more, "I know the Professor joked about how we'd have railguns and beam rifles in the future, but please try to keep the usage of those unrealistic weapons to a minimum. We won't know what the Vikings will be piloting until we fight them, so you all better be ready for anything!"

"Yes, Ma'am!" And again, a unison as they all saluted.

Michiru then opens the folder Haruka had handed her, shifting through the pages to arrive at the results, "Let's see… The top five of the prior training get to tackle Hard Mode first. I'd like anyone to at least get past the tenth mission this time."

"Uh, Captain?" Touko asks as the others were already turning around.

"Hm? What is it now?" Michiru asks, eyes widening slightly in surprise.

"If it isn't much trouble, could we ask the Vikings to go through Hard Mode as well? In that way, we also can observe their maneuvers as they will while spectating on our runs. If our own runs can be shared to them, then theirs also could be shared back to us, am I correct?"

"Oh… Yes, you're right. I hadn't thought of it. I'll try asking once they contact me," She nods in thankfulness, which Touko returns with a smile.

"Nice one, Kazama!" Hayase returns a smirk and a thumbs up as she crashes onto her seat, excitement coursing through her arms like a bolt at the prospect of watching the Vikings try and clear the setting that had stumped their progress.

"Why, it is nothing. However, I assume you and Misae wish to make amends for this morning, right?" She chuckles at their sober expressions, at the fire in their eyes, "Don't worry, I'm sure you'll be able to defeat this mystery pilot in a one on one."

"Yeah. And not just for today. that mock battle in the Gekishins…" Hayase groans, tightening her hold on the controller as she rested her back onto the seat.

"That, too, is a debt we have with this pilot," Munakata nods, crossing a leg, leaving an elbow onto the armrest, "We'll be in equal footing for the first time. So, let's play ball and see how they react."

"… I hope they don't knock us out as quickly as this morning," Asakura says, slowly sitting down.

"Don't worry, think positive!" Takahara reminded as she leans on the back of Asakura's sofa, "They won't have that weird machine with them now after all."

"Yeah… Still, we already saw their skill. Viking One's, in particular," Akane says, eyes unmoving from the swirling patterns of squares and lines of black and green, the loading screen that was reminiscent of a system as it booted up, "It won't be easy, at all."

"Best of luck, Akane. I… I think you can do it!" Tsukiji nods and smiles, encouraging and bright.

"Yeah, no point in getting all stressed out about this," Haruko winks at them as she brings a few chairs closer, so that everyone can sit down, "It's a training course in the end. And I'm sure we'll learn much from the Vikings' performance. Maybe they'll clear Hard Mode even?"

"Ha! I'll eat a sock if they do!" Hayase chuckles, severely underestimating the soldier's prowess in her blissful ignorance.

"Change the first letter to a C, and we have a deal," Munakata whispers, poking one of her cheeks as she chuckles.

Yet, Hayase simply raises a brow as she squints her eyes, "Huh? What are you talking about? To change the letter to a C… Then it would make-" Eyes part away as clouds after a storm, only to allow a meteor rain to follow as she groaned, "Mu-na-ka-taaa…"

"Could you two stop being all over the other for one damn second ?" Michiru says, slamming a folder onto a desk.

The rookies chuckled at the matter, as Munakata also did while Hayase slowly hit the arms of her sofa, oozing bloody murder intent from her very being. Business as usual, as you'd expect.

A beeping in Michiru's pocket, she holds her comms close to her lips, whispering for a moment as everyone else stared. She then nods towards Haruka, who starts a timer as she readies her pen to write down the events of the session. All the Valkyries accept the prompt to have their run shared through the 'multiplayer' scoreboard before starting up the challenge and preparing their units and their loadouts, and their preferred color scheme. Taking one second to accept the plastic cups with water Tsukiji and Haruko had just filled, another moment to hydrate and relax, roll up their shoulders or make circles with their necks, the first five nodded towards their captain.

"Now then… Valkyries, start the course!" Michiru barked the order, and all five of them fired off the confirmation, starting their runs of Valgern-On's Hard Mode.

---

A few minutes later.

(In a nearby room.)

---

Sparks and explosions flowed in the TV screen, twisters mixing into vortex as the beams are fired and the special skills triggered. Yet, the stages repeat themselves, the scenarios are left uncleared. As the last Struggler of the final round of four falls to the ground in flames, Takeru sighs and shakes his head.

"Just what the hell are they doing?" He says, resting comfortably against the sofa, stretching his legs.

"Takeru-san," Pulling his arm, the young Yashiro that was seated besides him asks, "why are they having so much trouble?"

"Because they're still moving within the conventions they learned from. The rules of airborne warfare still hold some water in regards to TSFs, especially for Anti-TSF combat. But you saw it yourself, they're still jumping and dashing as if they were using the old OS. Not even trying to strafe, to do simple power slides… I wasn't expecting them to try out my acrobatics as if they were naturals but after playing so much in Valgern-On, they're still only doing some basic jumps and stuff. Sure, they're more nimble than with the old OS… but that's all." Folding his arms, he simply shakes his head.

"So, they're not training well?" She asks, tilting her head.

He shrugs as he grumbles, slowly crossing his legs, "I won't say they're bad. But, they really are not making the most out of the game. If they limit themselves to what they have on their hands today, they'll never make any real progress. To try out things that may sound dumb, to try and defy the current status quo is what they should be doing! What good will do to them to refuse to use the system's liberties for airborne maneuvers? Or for them to get used to newer long range weaponry? Really, they're just stagnating in their comfort zone…" Frowning a bit as he tapped the sofa, he nodded with much impulse, speaking his fair judgment.

"… You sound a bit like the Professor," Yashiro says, smiling at his flinching.

"A-Anyways… I wasn't expecting them to change their style overnight, but they've made very little progress. It's like they don't realize which moves are best suited for each mech, and they've barely used the combos at all. Not to mention how to do anything besides Nairs while jumping… Sigh, they're still playing it safe instead of using the freedom of movement the game has," I know you can't spell success without succ, but they're sucking harder than a drunk Santa Claus, he complained, twisting his lips as a certain image flashed in his mind due to his poor choice of words, understandably spurring a blush in the soldier's face.

"… Takeru-san, what do you mean?"

"That I was thinking they'd be doing some more air dodges and stuff, and trying out different combinations as opposed to them just… playing at the surface level," He answers, leaning further back onto the cushy sensation, placing both hands behind his head.

"No, I wasn't talking about that," She moves her bunny ears, still staring into his eyes, his swirling aura, "You just thought about a 'drunk Santa Claus', but I heard from the Professor that he was a nice old man that gave presents to the poor. Why do you think he's bad?"

Choking on empty air, face flushed slightly for a moment as he struggles to not think of that night, "Don't… Don't worry about that, it was just a turn of phrase."

She held his gaze, seeing a strange tint of colors swirling around him, near his face and lungs in particular. Not understanding, she tilts her head, leans on her sofa to stare closer, "Do you dislike Santa Claus, Takeru-san?"

"No, I don't. Sigh…"

"Was he mean to you? Did he give you a bad present?"

"No… all the contrary, actually…"

Her bunny ears perk up, she stares in confusion at the swirl of colors, reminded of the lights she sees when she closes her eyes very, very tightly, "What do you mean?"

A beeping from the comms saves him from further questions, further reminiscence. On the other room, the Valkyries laid hunched over their seats as they once more failed to clear level ten of Hard Mode. Only Hayase had actually reached a point where she could say victory was close by, but for the rest, they hadn't shown any improvements as they were concerned.

So, Michiru called out in a whisper, so that only her could hear the answer, "Vikings, do you copy?"

"Viking One, loud and clear," Takeru replied, crossing a leg, sighing as young Yashiro remains staring, peeking as she rests her head on the sofa's arms.

"I assume you have already watched all of our individual runs?"

"Yes, we were just done with the last one some seconds ago."

"So, may I ask what did you think of them?" She politely said, as she was unaware of the rank that the mystery pilot had. The small groaning on the other side of the static-mired line only served to make her nape feel overflowed by said static itself.

"I found some… drawbacks to your approach," He began slowly, breaking the ice tenderly as he leaned back onto the seat, a hand resting by his ear to support his weight, "While your overall strategies do have much work put into them, I find your… insistence on using the old movement patterns a bit baffling, truth be told."

"Could you elaborate?" She asked, low, the tip of a knife pressed against her chest.

"While the tactics we use won't change drastically, you have not been using the advantages the XM3 offers. Your jumps are as short and sparse as they would be on the old system, the stride of all of you denotes a lack of… valor, might I say. You could employ dodges to evade most attacks, and then counter when you would normally be under the cease of inputs. Since the increased sensibility gives you far more options for three-dimensional movements such patters are easy to achieve, more so to perform multiple changes in direction in quick succession, yet you all have stuck to the tried and tested ways. If all you use the XM3 for is to bypass the shock countermeasures as you did during our earlier bout today, you're better off just switching back to the old OS," He concluded, covering the comms as he sighed heavily. For the soldier knew that, even if he raised valid points, speaking the truth and nothing but the truth, Cpt Isumi was not going to receive the words well.

And the groaning that came from the other side of the line, the deep and sharp inhaling she had to do to keep her voice as a whisper should tell you the effect his words had on the leader of the Valkyries, "Viking, with all due respect, such movements would only worsen our performance. We are required to be the spearhead of the Project, as you should be aware," Stopping for a moment, dousing the fire she was breathing, Michiru then coughed, "Employing newer, untested tactics will only make it more difficult for us to complete our mission, which is why we stick to strategies we know are successful. Furthermore, the risks of losing units by employing such… reckless piloting as you did during our battle is decidedly high. Not to mention, the tear such approaches would leave on our machines could backfire on the field, rendering a TSF unusable or putting the pilot at risk should a limb cease to work properly due to the abuse. Basing our trainings on methods proved through years of experience is what I believe is best for my crew."

"Still, you're fighting with the ways of yesterday, when you should be adapting to the strategies of tomorrow. You're going to get blindsided if you don't even take a few training sessions to try out new things," He nods to himself, clear and resolute, also truthful, "I understand your duty as the leader of the STF requires you to look after the safety of your crew and the success of your mission," Inhaling softly, he lays a cold blanket over his voice as he frowns, "however, there is much to be gained were you willing to truly break the conventions you're being chained by."

"… Chained?" Michiru couldn't help but to raise her voice a bit as she frowned, enough for the rest to hear her well, "With all due respect, I do not find the tactics available limiting in any way. There is no need to resort to such endangering maneuvers when the ironed out patters already benefit much from the XM3. You speak as if you… had plentiful experience in the field, Viking. Yet, if you did, I believe you wouldn't be casting such doubts towards the protocols crafted with the sweat of many through decades of warfare."

His eyes squinted, inhaling sharply, softly clawing at the cushioning around him, "Putting the protocols you were taught with atop a pedestal will only narrow your field of view, when you should be seeking new alternatives to turn the tide of this endless battle, to prevent more sacrifices . And… In a way, you could say I have many lives worth of experience, yes," He replied, low and harsh at the anger Michiru displayed, rightfully countering despite the welling displeasure in his own words, "Which is why I believe newer tactics are required. As we are, we will end up extending the stalemate and losing this war. So, with all due respect, I believe our duty to the people is more important than safeguarding the 'honor' of these protocols you're clinging onto, Captain, ma'am. " He releases acid and pure blight, twisting the sofa in his crushing grip.

Recalling figments of Iceberg, of how Michiru herself allowed an exception during 21st to let him clear the Forts so that they could dispose of the Laser-class present made the soldier wince. Hearing her harsh, serious words of rejection had sent another small dagger into the open wound the soldier had, another dejection. Yashiro pulled his sleeve, staring in worry at the darkening hue of his aura, at the thickening fog that surrounds his body. He then smiled, petting her head and relaxing back to his usual way of being to not burden his psydekick of a bunny.

"I… I see…" Michiru, on her end, remained dead silent.

Thinking on the words, the tone that came through the static, the sword aimed at her throat. What at first was indignation towards someone who dismissed her efforts, those last words, the tone that spat venom, told her something beyond what the words meant in the sole sentence, making her tongue regress into her throat. It reminded her of days long gone, of days of intense battle and emotion. And with those thoughts, the sensation of being drenched in drying sweat came back to her arms. The smell of humidity mixed with the buzzing of the flies, and the stench that with them came.

So, as you'd expect, her whisper descends even further beyond into the sea, "However… I cannot risk my newest members to learn under untested methods, or for them to suffer an accident during a mock battle while testing these movements you apply. We already received quite a reprimand from the mechanics due to our encounter this morning. While I'll admit the XM3 is indeed surprising-"

"It does not have any tangible results in the field." He fired off, scratching the sofa as if skinning it, making young Yashiro flinch and wince at the color of his aura, while he was reminded of what he and Yuuko had to go through to get the OS accepted. And what those issues made Yuuko do… and the ripples his weakness caused back then. "I know you'd rather repeat trusted methods than to risk employing an unknown plan. I know that, when you're deployed, there is no room for failure. And I know that asking you to practice such precise maneuvers at high speeds sounds like madness, more so with the maintenance cost they come with. However, if it's clear results you want, if you'd like proof of the XM3's real superiority…" He chortled, smirking for a moment, until young Yashiro pulled his arm, groaning in disagreement to his scary expression, "Well Captain Isumi, why don't you and I make a bet?"

"Huh? A bet?" She rose an eyebrow, as the incognito chuckled behind the veil of static.

"Yes. If me and Viking Two manage to perform better than you Valkyries in Hard Mode, you will heed my advice and start practicing with the methods I suggest. Both in the WMTS and in the sim runs you do every night with the XM3. You can then continue your usual approaches in live mock battles or in the JIVES trainings… and see for yourself the difference in results you get."

"Huh? Excuse me, how do you…" Turning her back to the others, leaning onto a desk, whispering even lower, "Why do you know that we're testing the XM3 at night? That's a top secret matter only my unit and the XO herself knows about." She paled, thinking she had made a miss, that somehow the intel had been leaked or her unit's movements noticed. She was aware the Viking was also given the OS for their battle at morning, yet she had thought her nightly trainings had gone unnoticed thus far.

"… I know many things about your unit, Captain," Takeru said, cold and low, unnecessarily countering Michiru's dismissal of the XM3 a second time, quite foolishly so.

"… What are you trying to say?" So she asked, tense as a small quiver appeared on the back of her head.

"That you have my sympathy for having to shoulder the drunken stupor of your 2IC," He nodded to himself, smiling as Yashiro started to chop his shoulder lightly.

"Huh? You… know of…" Yet, Michiru felt cold water run her back, over and over. She did have to tend to Hayase's drinking sessions at times, and it is quite fair to affirm it was distressing for the Captain when that occurred. However, Hayase hadn't gotten that wasted in the last few months, so her shock, her widening eyes and mouth are justified, I believe.

Takeru, however, was not done yet. And chuckling as he stretched his legs, crossing them over as he rests a hand on his chin, he whispers back, "And I also can sympathize with the… rivalry, let's call it, you have with your sisters over the love of a dense guy."

"HUH?! H-How…" She gaped, gripping the comms, that hand shaking as veins popped up in her eyes. The rest of the Valkyries stared in wonder, in worry, as she hurriedly paced to the other end of the room, tightly pressing the comms into her person as if she had received a call from a lover right before dinner, "How… do you know that?" She whispers, and then she frowns, "And… why are you bringing this up, Viking? Surely, you're not trying to blackmail me, are you?"

"No, I would never do anything of the sort to you, Cpt Isumi." He smiles, rolling his eyes as he lightly shakes his head, "I'm just letting you know, that I know many things about you Valkyries. Secrecy aside, I am your ally, even if my words might sound harsh or hard to believe. My advice comes with no ill will attached, ma'am. As I said during our first talk before Niigata, all I want is for us to bring Alt IV to fruition, and reach a world with ze… without wars."

"Is that so? Then, how did you find out of… such personal matters?" She asks, frowning harder when he chuckles again.

"I am the Professor's bodyguard, Captain." He nods to himself, smiling, "You'd do well in… keeping my words close to you," He said, chuckling at the end, pleased with his performance and delivery as he blocked young Yashiro's relentlessly chopping hand.

Michiru blinked quickly as she took a deep breath, running a hand into her hair, "Is that how it is, then… And if you fail to perform better than us, what do we gain from this bet?" She asks, turning back, sitting on the desk, crossing her legs.

"Well… Is there anything you'd like from us? So long as it isn't something the Professor would forbid, that is."

"Let me see…" Grasping and treading her chin, Michiru doubts, thinks on what she could ask. The chance was unexpected, but now she found herself void of answers. After all, the last thing she wants is to overstep her boundaries and risk angering Yuuko, you'd understand, "I suppose you're not available for more mock battles?"

"Sadly, no."

"Does that also apply for practice runs on the WMTS?"

"Hmm… That might be possible to arrange. Is that what you want if we, somehow, lose?"

One of her brows twitched, she suddenly wanted to be able to have the person at arm's length, "Yes, that will suffice. I accept the bet, then."

"Good to hear, ma'am. So, should we start our own run of Hard Mode?" He asks, Yashiro already standing up to look for the controls and set up the match in online mode.

"If you could. I… am expecting you to put on a good show, Viking," Smirking, clicking some fingers together, she said.

"If that's what you'd like from me, I'll gladly give you the time of your life. Let's see if the fine painting we'll draw in the skies is fitting to your palate, ma'am."

"H-Huh?! What do you-"

"Please enter spectator mode, so that you can see our runs in real time. Well then, I hope our performance pleases you, Cpt I-su-mi."

"Wait a mome-" The connection dropped, static miring her hearing. Clutching the comms, she fumed momentarily, "Damn it…" How did… I haven't painted or visited a gallery in years…

"Is something the matter, ma'am?" Haruka asks, head lowering, slowly walking towards Michiru.

"No… It's nothing. Alright, you all. Pay attention." Once everyone was, indeed, focused on her, she smirks as she shrugs, "It seems lady Viking was not pleased at all with our performance so she's gonna give us 'the time of our lives', in her own words." A few raised brows, a chuckle or two, and quite the confusion and displeasure brewed within their shifting, tightening postures. "So, make sure you watch their moves closely. The Viking made her point clear enough, she doesn't believe we're using the XM3 to its fullest potential, so she'll show us how to handle it best. She proposed a bet to me, and if either of them manage to get past level ten I agreed to employ their suggestions."

"That's… unexpected," Touko notes, bumping a hand onto her chin, "Do you believe their words to hold some merit, ma'am?" It is very odd, Cpt Isumi rarely backs down from her plans, unless the one suggesting a change is the Instructor or the XO .

"Sigh… I think so, yes. At the very least, the Viking's words lent credence to the experience she possesses in her shoulders. And, well, five of us did almost lose to a single unit this morning, outlier or not," Sighing again, her gaze falls momentarily.

"But… Speaking of, why was that machine different?" Tsukiji asks.

"Didn't it have better radars?" Takahara answers, arms folding, looking around.

Asakura nods, tapping one of her brows as she tries to recall, "I believe that model was… a derivative of the F-14 Tomcat, by the looks of it. I don't recall reading of such a model, but I suppose those odd features on its shoulders and arms were extra sensors. Which is what allowed the unit to snipe us from such a distance, thanks to the increased processing power of the XM3."

"Sigh… It's crazy to think about," Munakata nods, running a hand into her hair, "An old dusty prototype that was discarded as a failure might very well see a revival to its full glory with new tech at one point. Perhaps, those radars might become commonplace if the Professor's testings are successful," She concludes, the younger ones nodding in agreement to her, oh, so correct words, despite her not being aware of the Mindseeker's true purpose.

"Captain, what if they can't beat our results?" Hayase asks, sobering up and returning the talk to the point.

"Well, it seems they're willing to spar with us more frequently in these sims," Michiru nods, only to flinch at Hayase's sparkling eyes as she squealed.

"Really?! We'll get to train with them regularly?!" She steps towards Michiru, holding her gaze firmly, waiting and holding her breath close as if she were a little kid asking for candy.

"Captain, is this true?" Akane stares at Michiru, gulping slowly and trying to mask her equal excitement at the prospect.

"Only if they fail to clear level ten. Now, let's set up this spectator mode they mentioned," She says as she walks up, smiling again and waving to dismiss the formality.

And so, the Valkyries hurried to connect all five of their Stallions to spectator mode on the only signal available. As they huddled closer, chairs squeezed in between the larger sofas, whispers and opinions, bets and expectations start to be shared as if they were relaxing in a bar after an arduous day of work. Except for Michiru, who remains collected, absentmindedly playing with her hair, as she tried to make sense of what the Viking had told her, of the cold and acid tone which told the mystery pilot indeed had 'many lives' worth of service on its shoulders.

" Just… who are you supposed to be? Why does the XO trust in you to such degree? And… where did you even come from, to know such things about me?" She so mulled, until Munakata wrapped a hand over her shoulder, joking about how she had been charmed by the Viking, which spurred another round of jabs and teases as they had done before with Takahara and Tsukiji.

On the other room right besides, however, two bunny ears flapped up and down quickly. Almost as if she were trying to use them to fly away, young Yashiro kept her stare firm upon the soldier's worry.

"For real, let me go at it first," He insisted, resting his hands on his waist.

"No. I want your opinion on my piloting."

"It's not like I ain't gonna give you pointers after you finish, Kasumi."

"But if you win first, the Valkyries will start asking you lots of questions…" She again flapped her bunny ears, "I can sense it in their auras. They're feel as pushy as your comrade was when we worked on the consoles."

"Sigh…" You really do not like Meiya, for some reason, "Fine, alright. At least we got them to wait a bit before we watched their runs, so you did get to play for a while. But, you're sure about your pick?" Folding his arms in worry, he stared, "I think the Xao-Myun is still better, since you're not used to the controls."

"No, I like the Watcher. It's not that hard to use," She insisted, puffing her cheeks a bit.

"… You just like it because it also has bunny ears, don't you?"

"That's not it." Bunny ears dropping as her gaze did, her hands join slowly, "I, um, find it easy, to tell when to move with it. With the other units, I have to worry about the range and all… but with the Watcher I can stay away from danger, observe things from afar and attack when I think it's best." Nodding once, she looks up at him, hands joining even harder, "Do you think I'm wrong?"

"No, if you like that one, go for it, Kasumi," Petting her head, he smiles, "So, ready?"

She nods, sitting down and grabbing her joystick. He sighs, chuckling as he shrugs. Going to make sure everything was right with the cables, he then gives young Yashiro a thumbs up. She softly presses the confirmation button, preparing her unit with the soldier's help as he sits again by her side. A few seconds later, they were all ready to go.

So, grabbing the comms, Takeru calls, "Captain, do you copy?"

Startled a bit, more so by all the gazes and smirks that fell on her person, Michiru answers in a whisper, "Loud and clear. Are you ready to start, Vikings?"

"Indeed we are, ma'am. As it were, Viking Two requested to take the first shot, so you'll be seeing their skills next."

"Can we expect 'the time of our lives' from this run?" She asks, smirking as she leans on the armrests of the sofa.

"Well, Viking Two has had little training under me. However, there may be something worthwhile in their piloting for you," Grinning, he shares a nod with Kasumi, "You'd be wise not to blink, ma'am."

"… Very well. We're ready on our end, too. You may start whenever."

"Roger." Cutting the connection, he smiles, "All yours, Kasumi."

And with a small groan and a faint flap of her bunny ears, young Yashiro began her run through Hard Mode. Yet, as her unit appeared in the Valkyries' televisions, as most of them stared in wonder or puzzlement, Michiru felt her knees quiver, her insides twist. I believe you'd understand the shock, for the unit that young Yashiro had chosen, the Void Watcher, has a particular identification code: XB-80E.

The slim machine was nothing like a TSF, looking truly humanoid except for its large shoulders which bent backwards, making it seems as if the Watcher was always sticking its flat chest outwards. The armor of its arms and legs had a triangular, curved feel to it, and its head was an inverted triangle, sharp and pointed with two antennas like those of a Shiranui, which the soldier compared to Yashiro's bunny ears. Coated in the default overall white paint, with undertones of blue and red in its inner armor and underside, the machine seemed alien enough to surprise the Valkyries at first glance since they had not trained with it, not even once, since it was rather hard to control. And for Michiru, it was unrealistic in its patterns. And she also wanted to avoid her crew speaking of the code of the unit in the game.

The small bunny, however, merely swayed a bit, softly holding her controller, as the opening stage appears in the TV. The same ship carrier where Takahara and Tsukiji were duking it out moments before, her rival on the first mission being a base Kaizer.

"Here we go…" Gently tapping the triggers, Yashiro causes the shoulders of her machine to splinter off it, flying about towards the Kaizer.

Controlling them with the D-Pad, as one would command the AI partners during single player mode, she switched offense to area control to defense, the droid turrets her shoulders had become keeping the Kaizer at bay, preventing all movement. The Watcher was rather slow on the ground, yet the Kaizer could not dash carelessly without hitting the turrets or the nearby containers. So, Yashiro is now free to gun at it from a distance along the floating shoulder turrets.

In a similar situation to what the soldier had encountered during his match against the Frei at the tournament, the Kaizer found itself tumbling and unable to move. Small enough to dodge auto locks, more so with Yashiro's conservative and reactive playstyle as disruptive cover, the shoulder turrets kept running circles over the machine once favored by Takeru as the AI struggled to neutralize them or get out of their firing lines. And yet, Yashiro kept a poker face, tapping the buttons in a rhythm while gently curving the tip of the analog, in the pace she had learned through scanning his mind, swaying her head as if she were listening to a pleasant song. Having fun, I believe.

However, I cannot say the same for the ones watching the bunny's performance.

"Hey, isn't this situation… a perfect control of the flow of battle?" Akane asks, a hand almost covering her half-open mouth.

"The constant firing of the turrets… and their movements as they sway back and forth… It's very well handled," Asakura notes, equally surprised.

"But this kind of thing is unrealistic. Stuff like that doesn't exist in the battlefield," Takahara says, sulking as she rests her frame on Asakura's shoulders from behind the sofa.

"No, I do not believe so," Touko says, leaning forward to look better.

"Yes, that's true," Michiru admits, "Attack copters can do that to TSFs. If they use AL-missiles, the heavy metal clouds will interfere with our aim systems greatly. Not to mention, if they support a TSF element from the sidelines while constantly on the move, and at high altitude, hitting them might prove difficult."

"Not to mention, fighter jets could easily run circles around even the newest TSFs," Hayase nods, twisting her lips as slowly starts to dig her nails on the sofa, "Their speed, the altitude they can reach… TSFs are not the end-all be-all of warfare, we all know that. But…"

All Valkyries then stared as the odd machine did a singular dash forward once the Kaizer had made the mistake to try and clear the containers to rush it. Stumbled by the firing support from the shoulder turrets that remained in midair, the Kaizer was left wide open as the Watcher dashed at it. Holding two blades that closed in on the enemy as a pincer, the vicegrip of Yashiro's attack starts crushing the Kaizer, slashing it in half.

A victory fanfare was played, longer than usual, as the Watcher struck a pose which the soldier would describe as a hundred-years old vampire screaming the 21st tarot arcana to the winds. The word 'Perfect' was etched in golden letters, a few sparking shines glittering around it, one or two fireworks blasting right behind for a moment. As Yashiro smiles widely, sharing a highfive with the soldier, all the Valkyries were left in utter silence. They had never, not a single time, had achieved a perfect victory in their time training with the game.

"Cpt, did you know we could score 'perfect' victories?" Munakata asks, low, as the next stage began.

"No, I was not aware. I wonder if they'll manage to keep this up, however," She chuckles, yet still feels the cold air of winter on her back. More so when the Watcher kept dodging fire, countering swiftly on the screen.

"Hmm…" Yashiro groans, bringing her controller closer to her chin, as her machine dodges fire in the airport stage, "This… is a bit bothersome." So, she slightly pouts.

"You don't have to stay so much on the defensive, you know?" He suggests, leaning on the sofa, almost meeting her bunny ears.

As the three Strugglers of the map tried to blindside the Watcher, all of them coming from different angles, forcing her to retreat into the empty runway, Yashiro called the shoulders back, closer to her unit. Sensing something in his aura, a few images blurred into her sight. Before she knew or was aware of it, she pressed the analogs, triggering the R3 buttons, alongside the shoulder bumpers. A small combo was executed, as the turrets opened fire incessantly upon the charging Strugglers, and a clear input chain made the Watcher rush forward, do a backflip, and send a wide slash at the chasers. All three Strugglers fall to the floor in flames, the Watcher taking its victory pose as the shoulder turrets kept firing on and on.

"Sigh… That was scary." She admits, resting the controller on her lap as she sighs.

"Wow, didn't think you'd go for a combo breaker like that. Nice one, Kasumi!" He beams, she smiles back. It was a simple three button combo, dash, jump and attack, which caused the simple combo to occur, and yet…

In the other room, gaping and silent, all of them stared in equal shock.

"Hey, that was… that was one of the moves they pulled during the mock battle this morning, wasn't it?" Hayase says, giving the sofa small punches.

"It was, yes," Munakata says, leaning forward, roughly resting her chin on her coiled hands, "Did you see the timer, though? They got a faster time than any of us in this mission."

"And no one had managed to strike down three TSFs in one single attack, either. In these sims or in our usual trainings." Michiru admits, wincing. "You weren't kidding, Viking. And if this is how Two performs… Just where do your limits lie?"

"W-Well… This is still the start of the course, they might have gotten lucky," Takahara shrugs, Akane and Asakura give her a side glance.

"Anyways, the next mission is starting," Touko reminds so that they make silence, her eyes unmoving from the screen as the next opponents were shown. Two Colossus and two Kaizers.

"And this time, it's in the Valley Waterways," Haruko says, crossing a leg over the other, one eye closed, "I wonder how they'll tackle this stage?"

"But, are the movements in the water accurate?" Tsukiji asks, as she had many troubles in this particular stage.

"Believe me, they do feel real, the controls," Hayase remarks as the fighting starts, the Watcher again deploying the shoulder turrets, escaping into the surrounding greenery over a lake, near a waterfall, "The machines slow down, your dashes might be impaired if you fight too close to the water, the footing near the sand or damp ground becomes unstable. And if you don't get close to the water, if you try to stay away from the valley-"

As if following on Hayase's words, a few missiles descended onto the Watcher fired from atop a large rock formation, like an arrow rain of the olden times. Yashiro furrowed her brows, very tightly, as she leaned forward, as her fingers gained haste to play the clicking song. Since the valley was deep and the surrounding mountains large, refusing to approach the waterfall would leave one vulnerable to the Colossus' napalms, you'd understand. However, as the impact hurt the scenery, burning down the nearby forest, as the scorching, creaking sounds of the woodlife filled the speakers…

"… That's horrible." Yashiro frowns, lips shaking, "That's horrible. Why would they hurt the forest like that?"

"It's what happens when you fight near nature," The soldier comments, sighing hard, "That's why… sometimes, you have to employ more aggressive approaches, before collateral damage happens," He finishes. "Though, chaining a few boost jumps would let her close the distance with the valley. Maybe skim the surface of the water for a while, before doing a double jump and bouncing off the wall, then she can cream the Colossus up there, since they can't shoot at her if she's hugging the valley's mountain …" He nods, grasping his chin. But then, he groans as one edge of his lips sinks, "Yeah, that's a tad bit too much for the bunny as of now."

Bunny ears perk up, she pouts a bit. Shifting her grasp on the controller, the shoulder turrets shift to defense mode, blocking both Kaizers from approaching. Amidst the fire, the pixelated trees fading into a burnt model, the Watcher takes flight, making small waves surge forth from the lake.

"Oh?" He corks an eyebrow, recognizing the patterns.

When the alarms beep, she moves sharply to one side or the other, cutting a diagonal slice upon the lake. Her thumbs hurt a bit, wanting to stop. Yet, Yashiro keeps the analog in place, the shoulder trigger of the dash sunk in, evading all incoming missiles, dancing atop the water, painting faint traces and ripples above the calm canvas of the lake.

"Oh!" Both hands coil and raise, a warm smile decorating, casting brightness upon the soldier's face.

Unable to hop and bounce off the rock formations as Takeru does, Yashiro had to make due with a chain of boost jumps to reach the top of the valley, then opens fire in close range at the Colossus, dashing in mid air with the blades extended and closing in a deadly embrace.

"Ooohhh!" Wagging both arms quickly, almost blurring them due to the speed, he couldn't help but to squeal like he did when but a curious kid he was.

No damage was inflicted upon the Watcher as it spun and slashed about, drawing a sphere, a radiant glow with her patters upon the slow and clunky Colossus duo as they stumbled down, only to follow it with her unit's short beam rifle directing a shot at each enemy. Once the long range support was disposed of, Yashiro merely kicked back and relaxed onto the sofa, smiling as she sniped the Kaizers that couldn't clear the lake to even attempt to reach her.

"Kasumin, Kasumin! Naal ok zin los vaahlrin!" Singing the Wyrmborn's song from The Olden Papyrus VI: Merrowgale as the last Kaizer crumbles in defeat, Takeru raises a hand as if aiming to offer a chalice of wine to the sun. As the victory tune chirped to life, she giggles when the soldier pets her head and smiles, congratulating her efforts.

The Valkyries, on the other hand, were again left lacking any and all words. Quite befuddled and incredulous, tight postures keep shuffling on the sofas. Simply put, they didn't believe their eyes.

"… Um, are those kind of jumps actually possible?" Tsukiji asks, feeling as if her seat were vanishing and she'd fall on her butt any second now.

"Yeah… They did that and more drastic maneuvers this morning," Munakata says, biting a nail, "Hayase, they had… bounced off the buildings, right?"

"Yes, they ran circles all over me in less than a few seconds," She clicks her tongue, resting both arms behind her head, "If not for the Takemikazuchi's better radars, they'd have offed me then and there. With a modified Tomcat, too," She spits out that last part, grimacing as her tongue traced the back of her teeth, drying her mouth.

"They also did something similar during our battle in the Gekishins," Touko says, curling a strand of hair, "I believe they had done an Albright Turn as we were cornering them?"

"Sigh. Yeah, I think so," Haruko hunches over, scratching her head, "I didn't see that one coming at all. And again, they're clearing our records without much effort," Grimacing, her feet hit each other for a moment as she shifts, sinks into the sofa, into stillness within her thoughts, "I can't believe this. Those movements… Are they truly so easy to achieve?"

Meanwhile, in the other room…

"Man, that was so awesome, Kasumi!"

"Thanks. I just tried following your advice," She looks down, he ruffles her hair for a moment longer.

"Still, you creamed those Colossus real good. I had trouble with this stage at first back home, not gonna lie, but you aced it like it was nothing."

One brow twitched for a second, "… Back home? Then, what are we to…" Shaking her head, flapping the ears, she sighs. "No, it was thanks to your tutoring," She insists, tapping her fingers, stealing glances at him, "So, do you think I'm doing well so far?"

Winking at her, he smirks, "You're doing perfect. Just try to reserve your fuel better next time. Aside from that, just keep a steady pace and you should be golden." Again petting her head, again making her blush as she stutters words of thankfulness, he smiles in support while giggling at her embarrassment. Which, as you'd expect, made the girl give a chop to his shoulder.

As usual, always offering honest advice, always trying to motivate those around him, to light their mood up however way he can. To be a spark for those who need it to start their own fire, to be that small nod, that faint smile which dispels cold shackles, untying the iron ball. That small sign which still shines in the sky. His trusting gaze and nods, his honest and happy reactions bolster young Yashiro's spirits, which drives her to further her performance, now ridden of fear and self-doubts. Acting as a tailwind, a warm blanket of support, he keeps giving her tidbits of data without interfering with her runs, minding his words but always ending on a positive note to motivate her to keep at it. I believe you'd agree, Yashiro couldn't possibly have asked for more, or anything resembling the soldier's friendliness. Which is why the sun would be left blushing in envy were it to be put besides the young girl's shining smile as she practiced, heeding his advice, basking into his supportive gaze. I think he'd be a good father, one day.

The 'training' session continued, Yashiro proving herself quite capable of improvising on the spot against the AI TSFs she faced. The Valkyries remained as surprised as Viking Two continued to best their times, even if the difference began closing more and more. Even when the first BETA strains appeared in the campaign mode, she managed to best them easily despite her initial hesitant and fearful approach.

"Kasumi, you sure you wanna keep going?"

She nods immediately, "Yes, don't worry. I'm not tired."

"No, that's not it." He sighs as the Watcher skewers a Grappler in half, raising it so that the shoulder turrets can fry it into quite the outlandish brochette, "Level ten has lots of Tanks, and is where there's a jump in difficulty."

"I can do it," She says, flapping her ears again.

"Sigh… Fine. Go and show them the might of Dersh Bnnuy, my young Gadawan!"

CHOP!

"Takeru-san, don't start," She complains, pouting.

"Ahaha… Well, good luck in next level." He nods, and she smiles as she leans back into a comfortable position.

As the opening area played out, as the usual timer ticked closer to the start of the mission, both Yashiro and the Valkyries gulped down, licked their lips as they wait for the signal. Fingers diving into their forearms, tracing the outer side of their muscles. Their breaths very much conscious, regulated, as the air filters in, out, from the stomach to the nose. A small shiver on the back of their heads, spreading down to their shoulders and the rest of their bodies. The second it took for the level to start felt so, so much longer for them.

Level ten, as it were, was the turning point of the story mode. As humanity was fighting among themselves over Tango's remnants, a certain meteorite fell down to their planet. The adversaries thought to have been kept in check away from the planet surfaced from the ground, a rumbling of dread announcing their march to war. As the scenes the soldier had seen during the opening sequence of Oratory Tango play, the ones which spurred his full rebirth, level ten of story mode begins… in the stage called the Fallen Frontier.

A large and expansive desert of white, as far as the eye could see even when the machines performed boost jumps. The relentless, freezing snowstorm raging on and on over the frozen tundra, working against the player since more fuel was needed to engage full boosts, and the overall speed and visibility was severely hampered. Some would say this level was prey of lazy design, as it's simply a large expansion of ice.

However, I believe the simple, minimalist approach works perfectly for this level. Not only it drives importance away from itself towards the introduction of the BETA to the Valgern-On universe, but it serves to sell their danger. In a harsh environment, they thrive where we struggle. Under inhuman conditions, they march on where we retreat. And, even when the snowstorm recedes, in the open, even field of the frontier of pure ice, in a bare bones map which gives no advantages, where both sides stand in equal footing… they score a definitive victory whereas we crumble away under their assault.

Said reason was why the Valkyries were having so much trouble with this mission, since they could not endure for as long as the map required. The winning condition was survival, to remain alive until the timeout. And while they could have cleared this mission were they used the multiplayer functions, in single player's Hard Mode they had not yet been able to endure more than two minutes.

"Damn, it's always the same with the Destroyers." Hayase clicks her tongue, grimacing as the monsters appear from below, digging through the elevations of snow. "I swear, this mission is even worse than the first stages of the Volk Data."

Munakata nods, arms folding, a hand grasping her chin as the Watcher manages to elude the first waves, the shoulder turrets keeping the Destroyers in check. "I cannot imagine how it must have been, to fight for hours on end in the middle of such a snowstorm."

"And that is not all," Michiru says, taking a moment to drink some water from the plastic cup she had, "The terrain in this mission is firm, when in real life the snow would give away under the weight of our machines as they land from a boost jump." She drinks some more, eyes narrowing as the lone machine drags itself through the snow as a few stray beetles rush after it as the Tanks and Grapplers appear.

"I believe there should some data based on the fall of East Germany, correct?" Touko asks, choking a strand of hair as the Watcher manages to dance and spin away from the wave, turning the many Tanks into mere stains in the snow.

"There should be, yes. Perhaps we could request the data, to train under these harsher conditions." Michiru answers with a nod, not moving her eyes from the screen as the fighting continued.

As the Valkyries held their breath, surprised that the odd machine was withstanding the assault as well as Munakata, Michiru or Hayase had, in the other room a faint groan echoed.

"… There's no end to this," Yashiro grumbled, her fingers hurting as she continued to spin that analog, to dance and dash, to slice and dice above the snow as the blizzard whipped against her unit.

The turrets in defense mode near her, away from jumping Grapplers, managed to shield her unit from the Tanks that swarmed, surrounded the Watcher. Yet, the three minutes of the clock seemed to extend more and more. And the beetles kept appearing, rushing forth and giving her barely any time to move away. And the spiders kept jumping, extending their many arms to deter her movements. And the crabs kept waddling towards her, wanting to pierce the life out of her machine. All of them uncaring of the strong winds and piling snow, all of them rushing forward like the mindless beasts they are.

"You just gotta keep on moving," The soldier says, resting his arms on his legs, giving her frightened face a smile, "Short bursts of speed to escape, to let you maneuver well."

"There's too many of them." She counters.

"Pierce through, slash the Tanks apart. You have the turrets with you to get you enough space." He nods again, she grumbles as her lips purse.

"But… I don't know if… Ah!"

In the moment of hesitation, Tanks had managed to swarm through her turret's covering fire. Holding tight onto the legs, the spiders climb over each other, stomping their fellows' arms and squashing their eyes in their quest to sink their teeth into the machine's frame. The arms of the Watcher bend, their joints twisting outwards as the Tanks pull on them, the wiring within exposed and torn apart, leaking oil and sparks as if someone had taken the first bite of a juicy beef steak. The turrets cannot hold back the tide, cannot clear the swarm in the main unit. As Yashiro hastily presses more and more buttons, trying anything and everything as her breath picks up speed when the 991 alarm starts to beep, as her heart clangs against her frail skin the more she sees her inputs are pointless, all she can do in the end is watch.

Biting her lips and shaking a bit, she looks down as her machine is tumbled over, devoured by the BETA, as the screen fades to black.

Only to be followed by a splatter of blood, tainting part of the 'Game Over' message in deep red. Her hands relax, lose tension as if she were but a puppet with its strings cut, her joystick slips from grasp and begins to fall. If not for the soldier's reflexes, it would have ended exactly where the girl's gaze was. Tumbled over the floor, unmoving.

Softly patting her head, he whispers, "You did well for a first run, Kasumi."

"… That's not true. I… lost so badly. I couldn't even last a minute."

Pressing his hand onto her hair a bit, he laughs, "Don't forget that you're playing on Hard. Sumika and Tama had a lot of trouble dealing with Normal back home, you know?"

She looks up, eyes wide and unblinking, staring at him. When the colors didn't recede or change shape, when he smiled back at her and she saw it was no lie, Yashiro felt a small shiver in her back as his fingers traced her hair, massaging in circles as if he were giving a pizza its circular shape.

So, she could only whisper as she edged closer, "Really? I did well?"

"Yeah. And just between you and me…" He leans closer while covering his mouth with a hand, filling her view, "I also wasn't that good when I started."

"Eh? Really? But… but you're so good now."

"But I wasn't at the start, everyone starts from somewhere. Keeping at it despite how much I sucked at the start is what has gotten me this far. Time and effort, Kasumi," And many nights without sleeping, too, he says with a smile.

"Takeru-san, missing sleep is not good," She admonishes, grumbling as he laughs when he leans back.

"That might be, but you must be ready for when Lady Luck comes knocking at your doorstep. Without that practice, I wouldn't have been able to win the championship back home," And maybe I wouldn't have recovered my memories in time to avoid a calamity… "In any case, daily small efforts are the key to reaching an aptitude level you're happy with, be it in your work or your hobbies." Shaking his head a bit, he brings a fist to his chest as he puffs it, "With the will to keep pushing upon the first failures, the desire for knowledge to keep looking deeper, and a complete disregard for one's sleep schedule, humans can accomplish anything!"

"… You sound like the Professor," She scolds, eyes narrowing.

"Who do you think taught me that line?" He smiles, moving his brows up and down a few times. "But anyways, you did great for a first time. Don't be so down, Kasumi." Again smiling as he nods, Takeru pets Yashiro's head. She looks down, stuttering words of thanks. A beeping on his pocket, he brings the comms to his lips, checking the distortion was still active, "Viking here."

The sliver of a whisper that came through sent a few nails into Takeru's throat, reminding him of a certain moment, one of the last moments of Operation 21st.

"… Viking, was that truly Two taking on the missions?" Michiru asks, dull and low.

"Yes. Why, is there a problem?" He counters, fuming a bit, raising a brow.

Michiru grimaced, looking at the stone-cold expressions of all Valkyries, the open shock of the start of the session having turned into a quiet, sober pondering. The newest ones could not hide the dejection of their sinking shoulders nor the paling of their complexions. While the older ones had endowed a serious poker face, silently awaiting the answers. After all, young Yashiro had reached a comparable performance to their own trainings. Reaching a final score and lasting more or less the same as the newest members in the mission, the apparent fresh trainee had tied their efforts after quite some time training with the WMTS.

Obviously, Yashiro could not yet reproduce these results inside a cockpit by any means. But they did not know that, and even if they did, I believe it is quite fair to affirm that all of them were sort of humbled, raising their plastic cups in salutation towards the unknown pilot. Since not only did she manage to equal their results, which meant the mysterious pilot would make a decent addition to their starved ranks, but that she did so with the odd machine that was too hard to control for all of the Valkyries, and employing the maneuvers the soldier preaches for.

So Michiru sighs, heavily, and for a second she stares at nowhere while clamping her lips. "Let Viking Two know we were all pleasantly surprised by the performance. It was a very good training run." She says, allowing a smile as the others relax and begin chatting, debating over the matter, "I know it is beyond your control, but we cannot wait for the day when we can welcome you into our ranks comes."

Takeru nudges Yashiro, smirking as she looks down in embarrassment, "The compliment is appreciated. So, I believe Two did not manage to best your times, right?"

"Huh?" Michiru flinches, as she was willing to lose the bet in front of the impressive show of skill of the bunny, "Well, it is true the older members have scored higher numbers… Are you saying you can surpass them, Viking?" She asks, gulping as she waits, as she hears the others, namely Hayase, whistle behind her back.

"… Well, why spoil the surprise? I suppose it is time for the main dish." He chuckles, rolling his shoulders to dispel the stiffness. "Also, we're still having a few matches afterwards?"

"Yes, if you'd be so kind," Michiru immediately replies.

"Then, could we have the newer members of your units spar against Viking Two, while I spar with you and the olders?"

"I suppose…" One of her brows twitched, not pleased at the soldier's lack of tact and poor choice of words, "Well, it would save us quite some time. Very well, let's do just that. However…" She leans back on the sofa, looking at her crew with a smirk and speaking louder while distancing the comms from her chin, "I expect you to fulfill your words, and give us that show you mentioned before."

"Oh, don't you worry, ma'am. I'll give all you want and much, much more…" He then licks his lips, chuckling as Yashiro stars chopping his shoulder yet again, "In any case, I shall be getting ready. Please return to spectator mode," He then cuts the connection, blocking the chopping as he goes for his joystick.

"So… What is this about 'all you want and more', ma'am?" Hayase asks, smirking and chuckling.

"Wh- It's nothing. They're merely teasing us, is all," She fumes, looking away with a slight frown.

"Oho… I wonder why are you so upset, Cpt Isumi? Don't tell me…" Leaning closer, tip of a finger on her chin, she chuckled as Michiru groaned.

"What is it? You wanna join in their fun, Hayase?" Munakata shot an arrow at the opening, placing a hand over her mouth as if embarrassed, "I didn't knew you were into threesomes…"

"What?!" Haruka shouts, face paling, "Mitsuki and the Captain… doing… doing…" Unable to bear the image her imagination crafted, she covers her eyes quite tightly as she squeals in embarrassment.

"My, I didn't knew you favored such encounters, 1st Lt," Touko says with a smile, stockpiling pressure.

"I cannot believe you…" Akane says, low, as she shakes her head alongside most of her cadet squadmates.

"Come on, now." Haruko hits Akane's shoulder as she chuckles, "They were just kidding… R-Right, 1st Lt, Cpt?"

"Of course it's just a joke!" Michiru blasts away, face as red as her hair. "Don't mix me in Hayase's and Munakata's sexcapades!"

"Wha- Captain!" Hayase yells in complain, also blushing, "What are you talking about?!"

"You know what I'm talking about," Michiru glares, both hands on her waist as she levels a stare at both of them.

"Pay her no mind, Hayase," Munakata leans on her comrades shoulder, playing with her hair, "She's just jealous of our pure love…"

"Mu-na-ka-taaa… This is all your fault for getting drunk!"

"Oh? You didn't send me away, though."

"I was half asleep! And you even ended up stealing my sheets," She folds her arms, shaking her off. "It ain't my fault you can't tell where your room is. I couldn't just have you sleep on the floor, you stupid idiot. You say I'm a drunkard, but you can't go back to your own room when you're wasted."

"Mitsuki, you can't even stand after you drink," Haruka counters, hitting her friend's weak point, making her gape at the unexpected stabbing.

"Shots fired!" Takahara smirks, laughing at Hayase's tightening expression along the rest of her cadet comrades.

"Sigh…" Michiru couldn't help but to rest a finger on the bridge of her nose, shaking her head. "Anyways, if you don't want people assuming the wrong thing, could you tone down the steam?"

"And here I was, merely supporting you after Hayase's teasing…" Munakata brings the back of a hand to her forehead, shivering dramatically, before hugging her forearms, "Your distrusts hurts me much, Captain."

"Siiigh." Chuckling for a moment, realizing the small banter had eased up the tension in the youngers' complexions, she merely shakes her head. "Try to keep the teasing to a minimum, Munakata. You too, Hayase."

"Yes, Ma'am. Sorry, Ma'am!" Both salute, serious for a second, before shrugging and sitting back down.

"Still," Hayase puts both hands behind her head, staring at the score and time displayed in the screen, "I cannot believe a novice truly did perform on par with us."

"You can say that again." Munakata nods, ruffling her hair, "I expected this from the Viking, but their sidekick also has quite some skill under their hood."

"It is no wonder they're kept as top secret pilots, then." Touko smiles, handing Munakata a cup of water.

"Uh, Captain?" Akane asks, arms compacted by her sides, "Is Viking Two truly a novice when it comes to piloting?"

"I wasn't told much about it, to be honest," She admits, shrugging, as she truly did have no idea who Viking Two was supposed to be, "Yet, the XO did mention that while they had some prior experience with piloting, they're being tutored personally by Viking One at the moment. But even with that in mind…" She eyes one of the TVs, locked on the placement in the scoreboards the unit named 'Viking 2' had reached. "And with such an odd machine, to boot."

"I don't think you should be so afflicted, ma'am." Munakata smiles, sighing, "While most of those moves do seem very unorthodox, their prowess has been proved in these sims. At the very least, they deserve some testing in an actual TSF simulator before we assume they're that superior to us."

"And even if they are," Touko slowly starts, fumbling with her controller to connect to the one signal available, softly and quietly leaning back onto her sofa, "their aid will greatly benefit our missions. Viking Two bested our times in the earlier stages, and even when they couldn't continue that performance throughout the run, there are many small details that warrant more examination." She then smiles, before reaching out for her plastic cup, "I believe we should be grateful for their presence."

"Exactly that!" Hayase nods with much vigor, arms folded tightly, "I thought One was doing all the work during the mock battle, but it does seem I was clearly wrong. Two's reaction speed was nothing to scoff at, and frankly, I can only tip my hat in front of the results we've seen. If they really are a novice, then I praise their grit to reach that level of aptitude so fast."

"Yeah, all the sharp movements made me a bit dizzy at times," Haruka relents with a laugh, looking over her notes, "I honestly don't know how to describe most of the movements, it was like watching a very menacing pendulum swing back and forth over the battlefield."

"Yes, that's true." Haruko sighs as she nods, her eyes glued to her boots, "I thought we were all decent pilots by now but…"

"It took us so long to even reach level eight, let alone beat it…" Takahara punches a desk, shaking her head and walking away, a crushing grip choking her plastic up.

"And they took very little damage in most missions as well," Asakura points out, her neck resting fully against the sofa as she stared at the ceiling, mind as blank as its paint.

"W-Well… But, but! We can try to see if we can polish our moves with theirs, right?" Tsukiji suggests, tapping her fingers as her elbows sank into her stomach. Her arms relaxed once the older ones nodded in approval.

A beeping echoed about, all of them stared at the screens in unison. Those with the controllers accepted the connection, the loading screen flashing for some seconds, Takahara returning to lean on Asakura's sofa, Haruka readying another blank page for the report, Haruko and Akane sharing one firm nod as they inhaled sharply, Hayase and Munakata staring firmly as a hint of a smile appeared, the rest simply drank some water, awaiting the connection. And once it did…

"… Huh?" Michiru opened her eyes wide, mouth gaping.

"What… kind of joke is this?" Hayase says, barely managing not to start laughing.

"Um, we did connect to the right option, right?" Tsukiji asks as her hands quiver, hastily looking at the other TVs to make sure she did not screw up. Her brows cross and lower as she sees the same sight replicated in all five screens.

"No, it's the same on all the TVs." Akane scratches her head, sharing the furrowed brows and a gaze of confusion with Tsukiji and Asakura.

Their eyes puzzled, confused, open as if they had hit an electro field while they looked at a machine that was not available in their roster of options. Painted mostly in black with a few underlines of white in the outer side, and green in the inner parts. All of its body was sharp, angular, weaponized. The two backwards antennas it had were also sharp and pointy, they resembled horns instead of bunny ears. The clear triangles on its head visor made it look as if it were frowning, while also having a wide smirk on its lower side. But above all, the paint job of the visor and part of its shape made it look like a skull. A smirking, frowning skull with two large horns folding backwards, with its eyes glowing in a deep emerald green.

The fingers were long, ending in sharp points as if they were a homage to vampires. The hands resembled claws more than anything. Its arms and legs were covered by modular plating with a rugged surface that seemed to be folded over and over, giving it a look similar to an old medieval armor. Two small knives protruding from its feet, ready to also slice anything with its kicks. But above all, it had two larger wing-like objects on its back, selling the diabolical motif well. And to top it all of, as if its macabre appearance wasn't enough, it had two large scythes extending from its forearms, as if it were constantly holding two blades in a reverse grip.

"… Skull Kaizer? Was there a unit like this available?" Akane asks, yet nobody answers. "Captain, may I reset my unit to check the available crafts on the sim?"

"Yes, you may," She immediately answered.

Yet, as Akane brought back the game to the starting screen and opened the selection mode again, she could not find the machine that was depicted in the other screens. So, understandably I believe, they all sobered up as they examined the image of the vampire-reaper-tiefling machine.

"So, is it some sort of evil counterpart to the Kaizer?" Hayase asks, grasping her chin. "So it has the blades backwards, huh… Those things look too long to actually be just blade armor."

"I agree," Munakata nods, firmly staring, "They do look more like actual blades attached to the machine. I'm more curious about the things on its back. Are those wing-things extra boosters?"

"They might be, for all we know." Michiru shrugs, only to look back at the screen as the preparation screen ended, establishing the connection.

Showing the usual preparation screen with the loadout of the unit before the starting stage, the name of choosing of the player was displayed up top along the machine of their choosing. Narrowing their eyes, sharing some glances, blinking and rubbing their eyes, the conflict towards the skeletal and evil looking machine did not change. And as the Valkyries tried to make sense of what they were reading as the loading screen changed, Yashiro was again pulling on his arm.

"Takeru-san, you should use another unit," She says, pouting.

"Why? The Skull Kaizer is awesome, Kasumi," He answers, raising a brow. "I mean, look at it. It looks so sharp and slick, it has the chainsaw spinning wings and all, it's all painted in a simple but welcoming black. And don't forget about the scythes!"

"… It looks scary, I don't like it."

"But it has scythes for hands!"

"But it looks scary," She flaps her ears, still pouting. "Why do you have to use this one?"

"Well, first, because it's the only other thing I like in the roster, that can match the Take's speed and damage output. The Skull Kaizer is the best damage dealer in the entire series of playable characters, save for the OTH Railgun of the heavy mechs. Second, because I really liked the alternate take of the bad ending of the first game that was told through the campaign mode of the Skull Kaizer. And last…" He smirks, moving his brows as his voice slows down, "its special moves are awesome. The Sky Rend you can do while its Break Skill is active is one of the most epic things you can do in the game."

"… Why? You can already do lots of amazing acrobatics."

"Yeah, but the Skull Kaizer spins, Kasumi. It's a literal lightning vortex of destruction. Not only it makes it hard for others to lock onto it, but you can also shout 'Let it R.I.P.!" when you score a kill while spinning!" Puffing his chest as he nods, Takeru chuckles as he sets up his machine's loadout.

"Why would you want to shout that?" She asks, brows narrowing in growing confusion.

"For the references, Kasumi."

"Huh…" Mouth gaping, eyes unblinking, she, in fact, did not understand what he meant at all. "But, even with that," She edges closer as he quickly clicked the last arrangements away, "are you sure it's fine, to use a secret unit?"

"Yeah, it's no problem. And anyways, I'm going to end up cruising through this thing, so they're gonna have other stuff to worry about. Don't forget I won a championship, and cleared Maniax mode back home." He reminds, puffing his chest as he smirks, waiting for the loading screen to take him to the game.

"Is Maniax Mode that much harder?" She asks, her shoulders compacting upon her already small frame.

"Yeah. For example, in level ten the snow actually can make you stumble, and there's like double the amount of enemies. The players in the forums didn't nickname it 'Get Raped by the BETA' for no reason." Her bunny ears flap up, eyes wide as she stares in surprise, quivering like an actual bunny before it dashes off in hops. Only she sinks in worry, folding upon herself. He sighs, petting her head. "So don't worry, I'm just going to show the Captain how far above the ceiling of my baby is." Nodding with a huge smirk, Takeru pressed the confirmation button, starting the game.

As the campaign mode started, the Valkyries again opened their eyes wide for a second, sharing gazes as the images did not align with their expectations.

"What's this level? Cathedral of Shadows?" Hayase squinted her eyes, arms folding. "And the opponent is… Two Strugglers? What's going on here?"

"Maybe they chose a different mode?" Asakura suggests, receiving more puzzled stares and groans.

"First an unknown machine, now different maps…" Michiru shakes her head, choosing to replenish her composure as she drinks water.

The stage is loaded, an expansive underground facility with cables strung on the ground. Multiple pillars, obelisks decorate the main hold of the place. Some sort of cylinders with marine green liquid, resembling the one found near the scientist's office but much, much larger, are in the center of the map. And in the starting position of the player, one of said cylinders was broken, wires swinging like an earthworm cut in half, sparks flying about as the liquid substance drenched the floor.

Unlike the usual opening scene of the runs the Valkyries were used to, where two sides would suddenly start fighting in the open sea of the carrier, now the Skull Kaizer walked slowly through the large space colored in ebon dark and marine green. Quickly, the camera shifts, revealing two Strugglers painted in light blue, UN blue to the women's eyes, and without hesitation decide to engage the Kaizer as the usual starting screen appears with its countdown.

"Okay, this is more somber than the other missions, alright." Munakata comments, low, slowly crossing her legs.

And as the piano started to slowly play, as a guitar's riff began to pick up speed, as the adversaries started to grow closer, as the sound of heartbeats started echoing along the BGM in the soldier's room, and as the Valkyries wondered why the machine was not moving…

He chuckles, "… This is my life, a survival that knows no end."

With a precise combo, the Skull Kaizer did a few zigzags around the obelisks and pillars, dodging fire without receiving a mere scratch. Confirming the lock, the Kaizer dashed forward, spinning as it flew NOE, tearing everything apart in its stride.

The obelisks cracked and began to fall, some of the cylinders were crushed. The small lights of green in the floor broken as if a thunderbolt had fallen right on them. And the smoke, the smoke and fire keeps on raising from the exploding remains of the two AI-controlled Strugglers, both defeated by the spinning combination in the blink of an eye, pierced by a cannon ball and torn apart into a pixelated mess.

"… Huh? Did… Did they just win with one move?" Michiru asks, receiving the fanfare with the golden letter of 'Perfect' playing as an answer.

Only this time, the fanfare is slower, more subdued, reminiscent of a classical chorus that would play in a church. Only with hints of metal behind as the riff continued, with the Skull Kaizer taking on its victory pose, spreading its wings and shrieking wildly.

"Takeru-san, what did you say?" She tilts her head, he smiles.

"Oh, I'm singing the intro song of the Kaizer. In the last stage, instead of one of the default BGMs you get to hear a unique song as you fight the last boss." He says, waving a finger, nodding much, "And, guess what? The song is made by no one other than JellyProjection!"

"… And who is that?" She flaps her ears, upset that he teases the question despite knowing she doesn't know.

Yet, his all too shining smile melts her pout, "The band that makes the most badass and awesome mecha anime openings, Kasumi! I think Valgern-On's devs had to lease their houses just to get them to make some songs for the game. There was even an anime coming out in a few months back home." And I'll never get to see it… Fuck you, causality. Just fuck you.

"But why are you singing?"

"What do you mean, why? It's fun, singing along the openings. And the Skull Kaizer deserves the fanfare," He states with repeated, solemn nods. She narrows her eyes, not understanding.

The following stage loaded, the interior of a military facility of some sort. Lifts and supply crates in abundant quantities, the stage had both an inner hangar and an overhead platform to fight in. Again, the Valkyries were left in offside at the unknown stage as the enemies were displayed. Three Kaizers and two Colossus.

"Just the second level and five enemies already?" Touko comments, arms folding.

"And the Colossus start at the top of the level already." Asakura points out, arms compacting onto her sides, "How are they going to dodge the napalms?"

According to their expectations, the machines immediately started blasting the missiles upon the dark knight as the Kaizers sent suppression fire at it, limiting its escape routes, trying to drive it towards a corner of the map. The young Yashiro held her dress tightly, lips regressing into her mouth as she wondered how could Takeru clear the level. Equally expectant were the Valkyries, who already were thinking on his defeat.

Yet, they clearly underestimate the dexterity of the soldier.

Bursting into a sudden jump, the Skull Kaizer flies towards the platform up above. He chuckles, swaying his head as if lightly headbanging to the tune. Reaching the high area is impossible without using the lifts, yet that was not necessary for him. Under the platform, the missiles of the Colossus were unable to reach him since they couldn't lock onto his machine. And since he was already flying up… he didn't need to aim elsewhere.

"… A script that has only anxiety and dread in stock." He slowly starts, only a whisper.

Both wings start to spin, a shower of bolts flying off them as if fireworks they were. Quickly flickering the trigger, the shuriken-chainsaw wings are released, tearing the platform as if it were a paper put atop a candle. The Colossus duo falls prey to the attack, one losing an arm, the other a leg. Inevitably, both machines also are pulled down to the ground as the platform crumbles after the damage. Diving head first and firing off their guns erratically, they end up crashing and losing quite some health due to the fall damage. And as they fumbled about, trying to stand, a shadow was cast over them. A dark twister enveloped the surrounding area, a blurry gale of sharp metal which sent both units recoiling back, blasted away against the supply crates which end up flying about like the winning ball of a baseball game.

"What… How did he finish off both of them, with melee weaponry?" Munakata gapes at the pincushion both machines had become, as if they had given a hug to a bunch of Grapplers.

Short of stopping, the machine started doing zigzags over and over, looming, gliding like a bat for a moment, charging for the enemy's neck at the other. Barely using his guns to force the Kaizers to halt their own fire, the twister of blades approached. Caught in the stride, lifted off the ground, only the fire of the forced death animation remains after the fact.

"… I wonder, where is our burnt and wounded present heading to?" Smiling, his voice raises as he starts headbanging softly.

Bunny ears pointing to the sky, mouths remaining open, eyes unmoving from the erratic and dazzling camera that followed the dark knight. Stage three, the Valley Waterways, only the water is colored in neon green, there is no wildlife around, the ground instead of a healthy coffee is a gray in the darker side of the spectrum, and the sky was already setting. In the distance, the glow of the machines looked more ominous, filling the top of the canyon, awaiting the dark knight's approach.

"Three Strugglers, Two Ravagers, Two Colossus… What is this even?" Akane said under her breath, taking another sip from her water, holding it in her mouth as the camera flashed and an explosion rang out, "They already scored a kill?! But… the map barely started!"

Mechanical limbs fly about, head visors are sunk in. The acidic water melts the sinking remains, merely flying over it damages the units. But the heartbeats keep echoing right behind the BGM, the tornado remains dodging all fire, its spinning and long dashes forcing the enemy to spray and pray, wait for the napalms. Sadly, the soldier already had a solution for that.

"In the end, will everything sink within the rising fear and paranoia?" He keeps singing, now moving his knees along the tune.

Like a tumbleweed rolling under a sandstorm, crouch cancel after dash cancel. Spinning and spinning, altering its speed, its trajectory. Sliding, skiing over the toxic water, the shadow falls upon the Ravagers, using its own guns to shoot down the incoming homings, to sail the enemies' stride to the center of the lake. If he is close enough to the enemies, the napalms won't be fired after all. Quite an unrealistic and honorable choice of behavior, I'm sure you'd agree.

The shuriken wings intercept the ones which thought to take the reign he had over the skies, those who were foolish enough to try and pierce the veil found the end of the scythes buried deep into their frames. Loading a railgun of its own, the camera shakes as it erupts into a full boost, taking aim at the Colossus. In one burst of light, the last remaining enemies were cleared. And without exception, the Valkyries were simply staring in amazement while he and the bunny shared a smile.

"It is now time for action and not words," Slightly moving his chin, as if he actually had a mic nearby, the soldier quickly pressed the buttons to continue on, "for a small glimmer of hope of shining through."

The next stage, the airport level. Armed to the teeth with five Strugglers, a few turrets, and three Raioh units. Michiru thought this level would serve as a deterrent, yet found herself gasping as the vampire blasted the accel, approaching the horde. And her grasp on her cup slip, falling down, forcing her to bend over to avoid the water to be spilled.

"To inherit the fire of the fallen star…" He grins, pressing his fingers onto the analogs, only a few well timed inputs on his end.

When she looked up, half of the enemies were left on the ground, or whatever was left of them, as the camera kept tilting, changing orientation, flickering along his dashes. The purple tint of its shots blurred as Takeru moved faster and faster, dancing along the Takemikazuchi clones, their longswords having a double date with his scythes. Spinning for a moment, shifting the machine's weight as he stood on his heels, the Skull Kaiser sent a kick to the aggressors. Throwing them off balance with the knives in his feet, the reverse grip stance ensured the sharp end of his scythes had an intimate encounter with the cockpit of his enemies. And again, a perfect victory.

"… that burns within the shadows." Making a quick pose with his joystick, he shares another highfive with Yashiro, despite her complains about the scary song which he answers with a chuckle.

"Are you fucking kidding me?" Hayase spat out, forever distorting the shape of her poor, frail plastic up. "What kind of…"

"Come on, now." Munakata tried to laugh it off, shrugging and sighing her own surprise and shock away. "We did face against similar enemies in the later levels of our runs, right?" She gives a small smile, patting Hayase's shoulder. Her face tightened when she realized the 2IC was shaking.

"Mitsuki, what's wrong?" Haruka asks as she stops taking notes, her hand frozen in midair.

"… They were holding back." She says, smiling and frowning at the same time. "This, I dunno, this motherfucker was holding back this morning!"

Quite the fair shock, you'd understand, they were feeling at the results. And yet, as the next level popped up, as the name 'Fallen Frontier' appeared on screen, they all stood in attention, unblinking fixation on the TVs despite the strain of their eyes like little kids trying to stay awake past eight pm to watch their favorite shows.

And as Yashiro huddled into herself, trying to pay utmost detail to his performance in the next mission, she couldn't help but to stare, to leave her mouth open. As a yellow tint enveloped Takeru, who now smiled honestly as he had done in his first days in this world. Images of him playing in an odd location filled with what seemed like TSF sims to her, of two of his squadmates and Sumika, of another moment with him and the flattest one sharing food as they talked excitedly, and other, more blurry, images of him taking the mean and insistent squadmate to the same place filled with simulators, entering into the sim with her to spar against Sumika and one of his friends. Yashiro couldn't help but to also smile, feel her fingers move on their own to mimic his button presses, as she stares away from him and back to the screen, back to the valiant shadow which braved the white snowy desert against the BETA horde.

"When you release the anxiety that's welling up within your cries-" Closing his eyes for a moment, his training with Maya, his talks with his world's Yuuko, his talks by the tree with the memento he shared with his squadmates of another world came up.

So, he pushes the analog forward. And as wide as the eyes of the Valkyries is his smirk as his Skull Kaizer thrusts his arms back, raising the scythes, pouncing upon the BETA in a reversal of roles.

And smirking much, eyes blazing, his voice surges from his stomach as his grip on the joystick tightens. "-then it is when you'll be ready, to reclaim our blue ski-i-ieeees!"

"Takeru-san, don't raise your voice. Your shouting out of tu-"

Mincemeat, the virtual BETA had become. A mirage, was the specter that preyed upon them. And within the blizzard, the hazy figure of the Skull Kaizer flew about, piercing the snow and flesh alike. And the only thing that contested the repeated jet engine noises coming from the chained boosts and backflips was the completely out of tune voice of the soldier, who simply forgot he was training and chose to recall older days. When he had people he could actually count on by his side.

"Turn into an accursed fiend so that you can brave-" Torn limbs form a carpet, inviting the Destroyers. A sharp jump, a quick cancel, only a few button presses, and the charging dive combo was executed without a wasted second, impaling three of the aliens in one shot of its frame perfect performance, "-the ruinous day that lays ahead!"

The shurikens watched his back, all the weaponized armor became a grinder for the Tanks who were touch starved. And he was more than willing to quell their need for affection, closing his scythes over all of them in quite the tight embrace. Tight enough to deplete all air in them, I dare say. His rifle's purple barrages halted the Destroyers that tried to cut in line, yet he was kind enough to forgive them. The soldier still found it in himself to give them a soft pat in the back, a gentle hug of his scythes.

There were still thirty seconds remaining when he had felled the last enemy of the rush. And thus, he cleared the level by elimination as opposed to survival. Not that it had any effect in the sequence of events, the game was not programmed for two outcomes, yet I suppose you can already imagine the ruckus that was ongoing in the Valkyries' room. More did it increase when the next map appeared, a map they hadn't yet seen. A highway, that still had some greenery around, surrounded by a few hills and mountains, as the BETA numbers deployed were larger than before, with the silhouette of the Fort-class in the roster of enemies. Now, the snow no longer worked as a hazard, yes, but still, one could get surrounded easily by quite the number of aliens.

Yet, little does he care. It isn't anything he hasn't done before, as you'd understand.

So relaxed he is, that he keeps on singing out of tune, headbanging to the BGM, "Even if the path you attempt to waaalk-" And as he did when supporting the XG, he dashed about in between the aliens, giving his machine small scars similar to those he has in his back, "-leads only to your downfaaall!"

And the levels were cleared, and the vortex kept swallowing aliens and virtual machines. Unseen, unheard, unnamed, undefeated, only a single unit remained standing with the fire of war as its cloak. Holes plunged into their formations, their bodies and weapons, the cannon ball kept rebounding off and off, diving from the skies to meet the aggro of the tide of enemies.

All the while, he remains smiling as he headbangs, "Because an accursed fiend never ceases to retaliate," Suffering damage for the first time, the vibration of the controller only enlarges his smile, reminding him of his games in the arcade. One of his eyes waters, his voice hoarse as he keeps on singing, a needle in his heart as the once pleasant memories turn sorrowful, "even as it descends to hell aaall by its lonesome!"

While the Valkyries were all silenced, petrified as they watched, while young Yashiro slowly moved her head sideways to meet the tune, even if she was pouting at the words, he grimaced as the next map came up. The Mirraoph Canyon, the map where he had started remembering. A round of ice cream he could not enjoy, a friend he could not protect. Veiling the angst that he had felt for the better part of the day, inhaling sharply, he decided to redo that match. In honor of that friend, his cannon shots became all the more accurate, all the more deadly as they started taking larger chunks of BETA. He bids his time, his fuel, knowing how to quickly end this map.

And dashing under the Forts, he rose in rebellion, ready to rend their flesh apart, to release the acid and melt with it all the BETA he had lured under the Fort. As well as murder all the reinforcements that laid hidden within the Fort as the acid also spills to other inner organs, effectively shortening the map by quite some time.

"Anybody never can stop me! Release the power that lurks in within!" Both scythes slice the Fort apart, as easily as if he were merely preparing some chicken to roast.

An equal scorching comes as the acid falls, as the Fort falls, and as large as the dust cloud are the eyes and mouth of the Valkyries and Yashiro. Yet, as I'm sure you know, there were more Forts still around. And it is quite fair to affirm, the soldier wasn't feeling particularly merciful at the moment, no.

"Destruye todo lo que soy hoy; Déjame renacer en quien debo ser!"

Pressing both R3 triggers, a dark aura surrounds the Skull Kaizer. Its shoulders move up, releasing fire breaths as the small unit overloads for a second. Activating the Break Skill, Pain's Gainer, causes the Skull Kaizer to be impervious to any damage or knockback for thirteen seconds. All of its damage is exponentially increased as well. There is, however, a catch. One those thirteen seconds pass, the machine will die. And with every second, the heartbeats will beat faster and faster, louder and louder, drowning the BGM and other sound effects as the screens goes black and white, hazy and narrow. As if… the pilot within was perishing along the machine, one could say.

Yet, little did that do against him. The blood-soaked specter, tormenting the waves of alien soldiers that can only march forward. The vortex of blades, leaving only a crimson visage in his wake. And the minute detail of the movements, exploiting every jump, every cancel, dodging all attacks despite the invincibility. As he had done during that mission in Sadogashima, drawing arcs above the skies, running circles around the Forts before slicing them apart to use their acids against their fellow aliens. A rhythm, a dance, a pace like that of an orchestra of veterans who played by ear after years of tours together. That is how his movements look, to me at least, despite the fact that he is still merely playing around, even if the vicegrip on his joystick does tell me he is doing some manner of catharsis by proxy as he did when regaining his memories.

"For you're the only one who can illuminate…"

Soaring high, silently sinking into a slicing stance with both scythes seeking slaughter.

"… this enthralling darkness…"

And in the middle of the twister, in the eye of the storm, the meteor rain that were his cannon shots fell upon the virtual enemy before the hurricane he had become ravished whoever had survived, as he had done in a time he did not recall, when alone he was during Iceberg.

So, it is understandable, I believe, that upon that hazy memory resurfacing… he'd choose to mix it, to dull his grief with his emotion, with days of happiness as he screams the finisher when his Skull Kaizer dives in for the kill, right before the thirteen seconds expire.

"KA-I-ZEEEEEEEEEEEEEEEEEEEEEEEEEER!"

One Last Night in Peace (I)

Chapter 65:

One Last Night in Peace (I)

---

December 2nd, some minutes after 8 PM.

(Yokohama Base, B3F. Hallway, Office section.)

[Takeru]

---

Making an effort to bite and chew on the rough dough of synth food, I keep walking towards my objective. It is at times like this that I'd like the food packs to come with something liquid. Look, I like peanut butter as much as anyone else, but my mouth is not made to deal with cement. At least the one back home was a bit more soft, this one is straight up trying to fuse my tongue into my palate.

Gulping part of the mixture, popping a small piece of… something that resembles a cookie to help me deal with the peanut cement, I keep slowly walking on the hallways. A few odd gazes follow me, some whispering behind my back, sometimes about the fight in the sims of a few days back, others about shit and rumors. So, I pick up my pace into a stroll.

Reaching a locked door, saluting the MP standing guard and notifying my business, he takes a moment to speak on this comms. After a while, he nods back at me as he swipes his ID card on the reader. Saluting each other once again, I walk past the sliding door as I clamp my cheeks together, scraping what remained attached to the back of my teeth to clean my mouth in its entirety.

"Sigh… Guess I'll have to leave the rest of the 'dinner' for after I finish this duty." Seriously Sensei, what is it with the random assignments? So much for chill and rest in my office.

Arriving at a familiar room, the sign by the door frame stood clean and shiny in all its pristine glory, reflecting the illumination that comes from above, pridefully showing off the emblem with the valkyrie holding two swords. Inhaling slowly for a moment, feeling the synthetic smell of… Sniff… Yeah, that's the same old pine perfume she always used. Rolling up my shoulders, letting the air go, I finally straighten myself up and knock on the door.

"Come on in," She orders from inside, so I quickly do as told.

Closing the door behind me then standing in attention, I give a salute as customary, "Good evening, ma'am."

"At ease, cadet. Welcome, please do take a seat. First, I believe we have not been properly introduced yet?" Resting the papers she was working atop the desk while she places a pen above one ear, she nods my way as she entwines her fingers, "I am Cpt Michiru Isumi, of the squadron called Valkyrie. It's a pleasure to meet you."

"Likewise, ma'am." Giving her a bow, remaining in position for a second, I rise back up to meet her eyes, "I am Cadet Takeru Shirogane, from the training squadron 207B. Though, I suppose you already knew that, since you came to see our first sim run."

She nods again, giving a small smile, "Yes, indeed. I must thank you for that day, however." She then chuckles, the smile turning into a smirk.

"Huh? Why?"

"As it were, you bested Hayase's record on your first simulation run, did you not?"

"Ah, yes. I think they told me something like that. But, why are you thanking me?"

Slowly grabbing the papers to straighten them, before procuring a transparent foil to place them in, the smirk does not wane, "You see, we have kind of a tradition in my squadron. We bet about when our records will be bested, and thanks to your performance I have been enjoying a few relative days of peace."

"May I ask why? What did 1st Lt Hayase bet, to not drink any alcohol for a month?"

Her hands twitch, the papers left halfway in their descent into the foil as she blinks for a moment. "Yes, that's precisely what she did. How did you know?"

"Eh, I'm kinda good at guessing random stuff." Also, I can totally see Hayase doing that. I wonder if the same happened last loop. Maybe that's why she was so wasted that night, since she couldn't drink anything for so long. Would also give a new light on why she wanted to fight me so much when I joined the STF, as her 'revenge' for me taking her drinks away. "In any case, the XO told me you required my aid for something. What may I help you with, Captain?"

Finishing to place the papers away, standing up to leave them on a shelf, she sits down slowly while folding her arms, a sober and serious expression in her face, "Well, I am sure you must have quite many questions about why you were brought to this side of the base. I am thankful for you aid, even if you're here under the effect of your… punishment," She then gives me a small nod, which I return with a wry smile and a shrug. "So, do you remember how I told you my squadron has a tradition, to make bets on when our best records will be bested?"

"Yes, what of it?"

Cpt Isumi then leans back on her chair, sighing super hard. As if she were cutting a container full of onions, she squint her eyes as she groans. Wow, didn't think I'd ever see her this distressed outside of battle. What the hell caused her to… Oh, fuck. It was me, wasn't it?

"As it were, all of our records in a certain training course were absolutely crushed today," She says, some embers lurking in her words. Resting her elbows on the desk, edging closer to it, she looks straight into my eyes, unblinking, "I believe you were the… ahem, creator of the two smaller simulators?"

"… Yes, I was. However, due to certain circumstances, I am no longer legally allowed to speak of them in that fashion."

"I see. However, I suppose you could aid me in reviewing our approach? Frankly, I'd have liked to have this conversation with you at an earlier date, but the XO did not seem to find you with free time sooner."

"Well, things have been rather hectic lately, yeah. But don't worry, I can lend you another set of eyes, if that's what you require. I am not allowed to claim ownership over the sims, but the XO did allow me to aid in their development until they're finished. So," Coughing, inhaling slowly to dispel the small shiver of jolts on my back at what I know I'm about to ask, "did you want to review your opinions on the sims, or would you like me to speak of the programs made for it?"

I know she takes much pride in her methods, and I did kind of get real angry at her during our talk at one point. Not only I cruised through Hard Mode, but our fights weren't even proper fights. I just did my usual, but no one of the five I faced could come close to besting me. It was such a one-sided battle that Kasumi started chopping me halfway through it as I sang the Kaizer's song, saying my aura was all spiky and scary. But that's the problem, the real one. I was playing around, and they were being serious. Of course, I have more experience with Valgern-On, but still.

She readies a few papers, grabbing the pen she had in her ear, twirling it for a second as she again locks her eyes onto mine, "First, you were the designer of this Valgern-On software?"

"Yeah, you could say that." Sorry, MofuMofu, Andoku. I swear I'm not stealing the rights, this is for the greater good. "I only made a light alpha version of what you see in the WMTS. Most of the heavy lifting was done after my transfer to this base under the XO's commands."

"Sigh… Alright, then, do you know of a unit called 'Skull Kaizer'?"

So it was me what caused her to be this moody. I mean, for the Cpt to call Sensei to request help something big had to happen. "Yes, it's the secret unit of the ga… program."

"Secret? May I ask why is it a secret?"

"Eh… I just thought it would be nice idea, to leave a surprise for after you beat Hard Mode."

"I see," Quickly noting something down, her eyes again lock themselves onto me again, "And, why is its campaign mode so different to the standard? I find it odd that the majority of the enemies have the color scheme of the UN."

"Well, that's…"

No way in hell I can tell her of the prior games, or why the story is so different. Even if Sensei removed all the voice acting, the fact that some, or most, of the enemy units in the Skull Kaizer's route are painted in that same blue was bound to come off badly. In that story mode, the Earth Feds were going bonkers in trying to gain the most powerful tech available after the bad end of the first game. That's why, when the MC of the first game awakens the Skull Kaizer in the Cathedral of Shadows, everybody gets against him to try and gain the most powerful machine available. It is kind of sad, how the Furia System ends up consuming him by the end even if he wins that war against both the Earth Federation and the BETA invaders. The Skull Kaizer's skill, Pain's Gainer, is kind of foreshadowing for that, actually, as well as the name of its standard music theme in the game, Anti-Hero.

But, again, I can't explain Valgern-On's lore to the Cpt without either establishing links to 'a prior game' or risk making lies that would fall apart sooner rather than later. So, I'm gonna take the easy way out.

"I was not told of it, ma'am. As it were, I only had a rough sketch of the Skull Kaizer and an outline of its scenario written down. The one who revamped that campaign in its entirety was the XO, so you should direct this question to her." Sorry, Sensei. I'll make sure to tell you soon, didn't think anyone would actually press inquiries about the Skull Kaizer of all things.

She sighs, nodding slowly, her curiosity forcefully satiated and sealed, "I see. However, was she also who devised the odd choice of weapons for that unit?"

"Well, no. I, uh, suggested to use non-conventional weapons to avoid any issues with other armies trying to claim we used their designs in the software. That's why some things look so eccentric, like the Raioh's Thunder Rifle, for example." Necessary bullshit is necessary.

"Hm, makes sense," She says, scribbling and scribbling, "Are there any other secrets in the software?"

"Yes, once you beat Hard Mode, you unlock both the Skull Kaizer and another higher difficulty setting, Maniax Mode."

"Another one?" Corking a brow, her pen froze in midair, "How does it compare to the previous mode?"

"There is no comparison, Maniax Mode is made to be the ultimate challenge," I say, nodding solemnly.

As if a cloud had covered the sun, her expression darkened as she looked down, taking a deep breath. Leaving the pen on the desk, it rolls a bit until it stops while she rests a hand on her forehead, rubbing it slowly.

"Is something the matter, ma'am?"

"Eh? Ah, no, it's nothing," She immediately straightens up, poker face back in place.

"Is… the software not to your liking, maybe?"

"No, that's not it at all, cadet. It's just…" Blinking fast for a second, she then remains staring. Just looking at me, saying nothing. "By the by, have you ever taken on this training course, cadet? Since you're the original creator. And don't worry, not a word leaves this office." She ends with a smile.

And I know she says the truth, being the leader of the STF she wouldn't go around spreading rumors. Sighing, I give a nod, "Yes, during the early stages. I was alone back then, testing this software. Since I'm not yet commissioned, the XO has kept this as a secret. Uh, she did tell me I could talk openly with you, but please do keep this as a secret, ma'am." I then give her a small bow, which makes her chuckle, quickly gesturing me to rise again.

"I know, I wasn't planning on doing that. It would be a shame for such a… talented novice to suffer further setbacks." Why is she smiling so much? Again twirling her pen, she taps its tip on the edge of the papers, "So then, I suppose you have some sort of guideline to follow for each mission?"

Nodding with a smile, I then start telling her some tips for each mission of the campaign mode. Referring to Sensei when the missions become about the BETA, saying that I only crafted an outline for the challenge the map is supposed to give. And for the most part, she found my words worth something, giving me her own opinion on the specifics of the mission. However…

"I do not believe such line-piercing maneuvers to be the best solution," She states, expression tightening. "They bring more risks than anything else, and the chance of them failing is too high."

"I don't… particularly agree. Having more options on the table is never a bad thing, plus I kind of tested one of those maneuvers during one of my trainings. While I ended up losing that bout, I believe the tactic to have some merit."

"And what happens when you fail in the field?" Narrowing her eyes, a small blaze in her voice as her lips starts to shrink.

"I know of its risks, but with proper time to train and perfect the move-"

Glaring my way, she taps the pencil against the desk, "Allow me to be open with you, cadet. Do you know how many 'hotshots' I've seen die because they think they've discovered some new maneuver that suddenly is the solution to our woes? Many. Too many," She then grimaces, sighing as she she shakes her head, throwing the pencil into a small cylinder. "Such aggressive patters have been dismissed for a reason, cadet. If they were so effective, they would have been adopted after these many decades of war."

"I dunno, maybe the technology wasn't quite there yet to facilitate such a strategy."

Holding my gaze in silence, her face slowly tightens, lines marking on her nose and forehead, as a hand grasps her chin, "Then, let's say these tactics are adopted. What exactly do they bestow the military that other tested methods do not? Those who execute the move are now surrounded behind enemy lines, perhaps low on both fuel and ammunition. And even if the enemy lines are scattered…" She suddenly stops, coughing for a moment, "The battle against the BETA is nothing like what trainings you've had until now. You'd do well in dropping this kind of moves, they'll only worsen your performance," She affirms, solid and resolute. Dismissing my words, not even giving them a second in her ears.

As dry as the pages of the books she so tightly holds onto, as narrow as her view when reading them over and over again. How idiotic, to limit herself only to what others accomplished in the past. I don't even know what I expected of… No, don't take it personally. She must be simply worried about the possible repercussions of the move failing, that's all. I can't get upset at this, but maybe I can try to change her view a bit.

Getting a bit closer to the desk, I look at her as I fold my arms, "Of course, I don't know how the BETA fight just yet but, is it really that hard to ask you to try those moves in good faith at least once, ma'am?" Yet, despite my small nod, she grimaces, real hard, as one of her hands shakes. "Captain?"

"… Those kind of moves only increase the inherent risk that comes with a mission. Vastly, compared to other approaches."

"However, if they're properly executed-"

"How many missions do you think have failed because of one selfish maneuver?"

"Eh?"

"How many missions, how many lives were lost due to an 'ace pilot' deciding they knew more than their superiors and instructors?"

"I… don't know, I suppose many. Yet, I'm not saying these methods are better than yours, ma'am." Giving a small bow, biting my lips as I wait to rise back, I then face her cold gaze head on. "However, not testing alternate moves does seem a bit extreme to me. How are we supposed to improve our tactics if we only repeat the same approach over and over again?"

Twirling the pen as she squints her eyes again, she shakes her head, "The planning of a mission requires a surefire way to ascertain victory with the least amount of casualties. My experiences have taught me that relying on these 'miracle maker' maneuvers only serves to make everything worse. It's a gamble, trusting in an ace pilot, placing all your chips onto their shoulders, into their maneuver being successful. And if they fail, which they do most of the time, the rest of the mission pays for it." Looking down, not even frowning or anything, her shoulders, her arms, her everything sinks as if she were made out of gold, as if she were in open sea. "Following a polished plan yields better gains, without any of the risks that come with these reckless methods. Perhaps they would benefit other kind of army, but I do not believe our approaches require any modifications."

As rigid as an obelisk, unchanging as stagnant water. Outdated, obsolete… What good are these 'trusted methods' if all they do is lead us to a stalemate? You're just shielding your inability to make better judgments in the spur of… No, don't snap. I do think she's taking this too personally, though. Maybe, because my moves aren't that easy to replicate. Because failing to do them against the BETA loses you a squadmate and a TSF while forcing you to retreat and redo your plan. Trusting in these methods, to push forward and be more aggressive, comes with the risk of the front liners failing and being forced to retreat when you're ready to attack. That's why she chose to employ a stationary defense tactic during Sadogashima near those cliffs, despite allowing me to rush into the BETA lines to clear them a path towards the lasers. You did trust in me to hold out on my own, so why are you being so hardheaded now, Captain? Wait… don't tell me…

"Uh, ma'am? Does this rejection towards these maneuvers stem from how you said your records had been bested today?" She flinched, so that's what this is about.

"No, it's nothing like that," She denies it, far too quickly. "I'm merely stating my opinion, as I believe it might be helpful to your growth."

"I see. So, if I may, how were your records bested? I assume a Skull Kaizer was used in Valgern-On by your opponent?"

Slowly, she squints her eyes. Leaning back on her seat, again spinning the pen, she nods, "Frankly, it was a surprise. I don't know how you and the XO crafted this software, but it is… hard to stop training with it. It feels rewarding, learning to control the machines better. It's," Playing with her hair, she looks away as she purses her lips, "entertaining, almost."

Is she embarrassed? How slowly she scratches her head, the slight twist of her lips, even the puffing of her cheeks… Looks cute.

"Well, that is why I warned the XO that you could get sucked into the experience. But, it sounds as if you had been making good use of the sims."

She nods, sighing, "I thought we were. We had other duties on our shoulders, but we did use the small sims regularly. We are impressed by your inventions, truth be told," Smiling, she nods again. Then, her brows narrow as she spins her pen, "But then, today we were bested soundly. All of our records that we polished, all paling in comparison."

"Hmm, I see. Oh, considering your traditions, I can see why a random showing up would make you this upset." I already knew it could be taken badly, but if they have this thing going on it's obvious they'd be super pissed.

"Siiigh…" Hm? Again hunching over as if deflated, Cpt Isumi simply shook her head as she smiled wryly, "Well, that's how it is sometimes."

"Did… something happen during this training, ma'am?"

"Well, I had made a… bet, let's call it, with the pilot who bested our records. And," Frowning a bit, lips plucking, she starts tapping the tip of her pen onto the desk, "I was soundly defeated. Not only in the actual training, but also in this bet. I had thought to possess the advantage, yet to be defeated by such approaches…"

"Huh, so you do have problem with the Skull Kaizer's way of moving."

One of her brows twitches, "Perhaps I do, yes. Yet, I thought I was…" Shaking her head, she sighs again, "Never mind."

"Is it something classified, ma'am?"

"Yes. I… am merely intimidated by that pilot, is all. You can say my ill reception of these unorthodox movements is in part caused by my… utter defeat at their hands. At least it bought me another week of peace," She then smiles, starting to note something in her paper.

"What do you mean, another week?"

"Oh, remember how you breaking her record deprived Hayase of a month of alcohol?" She smiles, I nod as I furrow my brows, "Well, she made a similar declaration during this training. That if our rival bested Hard Mode in its entirety she would swallow a sock."

"R-Really?"

"Haha, yes, she did. However, of course we couldn't have her actually eat a sock, much less to follow Munakata's suggestion," She says as a small blush appears on her face for a second. What the hell did Munakata- No, I don't wanna know. "So, I had Hayase lose another week of alcohol instead."

… I think Hayase is gonna kill me.

"In any case, I was completely defeated today." Inhaling sharply, resting her pen on the desk, gripping it hard, she looked my way again, "And while your words are valid, I would like to first make sure this defeat happened because of my own overconfidence and not because of my tactics lower performance compared to that pilot's methods. So, with that in mind," Coughing, she looks straight at me, "do you have any suggestions for the trainings?"

"First, could you tell me how are you tackling the training? Have you been using only the campaign, or did you tackle the other modes?"

"Other modes? There are other challenges in that software?" Leaning a bit forward, one brow of hers sink as her eyes light up.

"Yeah, there's the time attack missions. Basically, you can tackle any of the scenarios you unlocked and see how fast you can clear them.

It's in the option called 'Extras', haven't you checked that out?"

"No, we only delved into the options to silence the added music, since it was distracting."

"Huh?"

"Hm? What is it?"

"Ma'am, forgive me if I heard wrong but, did you just say you disabled the 'added music'? Are you playing with the game muted?"

"Oh no, the explosions and other sounds are still active. I ordered to disable the odd tunes that play in every mission, since it isn't exactly easy to concentrate on the fighting with those songs playing in the background." She says, smiling for a moment.

"… Captain, you have sinned."

"Huh?"

"How… How dare you to not listen the awesome music of the stages?! Of course you're not winning, how can you get pumped up to fight without listening to them beats?!"

"Wait a moment, I don't understand why are you getting so upset."

Narrowing my lips, resting an elbow on the armrest, I aim a finger at her face, "Look Cpt Isumi, the music is there for a reason. It sets a mood, it builds atmosphere." It's also dynamic so the track changes depending on whether you're winning or losing. "There is nothing more fulfilling than executing a combo right at the peak of the song."

"Combo? What's that supposed to be?" Corking an eyebrow, she asks while leaning even closer. Looking into her firm eyes, I can tell she isn't lying.

"Wait, what? You don't know? Didn't you go through Beginner Mode when using Valgern-On?"

Chuckling, she spins her pen as she shakes her head, "Why, of course not. We're all commissioned pilots already, so we decided to start in Hard Mode. I do not think it'd be worthwhile for my squadron, to linger in lackluster training courses, so I decided to have us tackle the best course available so that we learned through the hardships."

…

"Is something the matter, cadet?"

Unable to hold her gaze anymore, I just facepalm. "No wonder you're having trouble if you're not using the combos. Sigh…" Maybe I should have written a manual or something to ease them up on the game, since we can't use the official one due to the questions about where the hell it came from it would cause. Yeah, that's my B.

"Ahem… So, could you explain what these combos are?" She asks, arms folded as she brings her seat even closer to the desk, her eyes again fully focused on me.

"Yes, but it will take a while. Also, I'll try to explain other common moves you can do with the software that should help you and your squadron." I nod her way, she immediately tenses up as she readies her pen again.

---

One explanation later…

---

"You just have to lightly tap the down button, or push the analog in that direction. Then, you'll be able to do a 'tech', which lets you return faster to the ground," I slowly repeat.

She sighs, brows locked in their narrowing, "How is this any different than the cancels you spoke of before?"

"Cancels null the movement, they free up the machine from the pattern used right before. The teching instead focuses the commands to more quickly return to the ground. It also lets you regain your footing faster if you were to be tumbled, since the commands you input remain in the buffer."

"I… see," Closing her eyes as she inhales, she ruffles her hair for a moment, "So, does this mean that we can execute combos from a cancel and a tech?"

"Kind of. You can deploy a combo from a cancel, yes. But a tech only hastens your recovery, either from a jump or a tumble. You add it to the commands being executed. Since those directives will still happen, you can't perform another combo unless you do a cancel. And if the tech is instead used when the usual cease of inputs would occur, the commands cannot be chained to since you're going to be dodging. What you can do instead is turn the tech into a combo."

"Huh? But, how would you go around doing that? If the machine is already dodging, or descending, there is a risk inherent to activating such an action at the wrong time. Not to mention, the terrain might be adverse to those types of moves."

"Simple. You just use the tech to move where you want to go, and also buffer an attack in the midst. By using the R2 and L2 buttons, you can adapt the maneuvers to your own style and then have the machine move where you want it to. The second analog also lets you control the jump units, if they are not active, so you can safely combo off an evasive maneuver without placing yourself at risk. What's more, you can make the combo into a fully defensive one, focused only on dodging."

"I see…" Her face tightens, and even if she quickly covers her paper with her arm I clearly saw what she just scribbled down. Well, no wonder she'll find it similar to the XM3. I just hope she doesn't link me to the Viking. "Now then, what kind of basic evasive maneuvers could be achieved in the software through this 'teching' you mentioned?" Again looking into my eyes, as if everything else had blurred, she waits.

Coughing, I fold my arms and think for a second, "If the proper mech is used, you can do some interesting stuff. For example, if you're locked onto melee weaponry, you can tech to perform a tuck and roll to then follow it up with a slash. Or at least, that's how it should go." I add, scratching my head and looking up, "The XO was the one who finished the software, to handle that the movements were similar to a real TSF. Now that I'm training I can see what she meant back then, but the rest is up to what she did personally." Sigh… Luckily, just dropping Sensei's name is enough to quell her questions.

Still, it explains why they didn't last that long against me. If they only use the basic attack combos and skills, no wonder they haven't cleared level ten yet.

"I suppose, most of these features are explained in Beginner Mode?"

"Yes. In Normal Mode, you have a prompt asking you if you'd like to review the tutorial. I thought anyone using the software would start there, I didn't think you'd jump straight into Hard Mode without any other practice."

She sighs, nodding and resting her pen, "Is that so. I suppose this is my miss. However, is the background music truly necessary?"

"I think it is, at least. But if it distracts you, you should simply proceed as you're most comfortable." This world is different, and they see this as training instead of a game. Imagine if they knew I was headbanging all the time while I was fighting with them.

"We shall keep training without it, then," She nods, placing the papers away. Your loss, ma'am.

A small knocking on the door, Cpt Isumi allows the visitor entry. The door gently parts open, Haruka-san steps into the room. Her eyes widen for a moment when she sees me as I salute her, but she quickly returns the gesture.

"Good evening, Captain, ma'am. I've brought you the report from the maintenance crew," She then takes a few steps forward, offering the folder she had on her person.

"Thanks, Suzumiya. Were there any issues in the hangar?"

"Eh? Ah, no, nothing major, ma'am." Replying too quickly, twirling her hair, it looks like she's nervous.

"Really? Don't mind the cadet, you can speak freely," She orders, poker face in place as she interlocks her fingers.

Haruka-san then gives me a brief glance, I smile and give her a court bow. She sighs, her shoulders sinking a bit, "You see, they were very insistent on how we should treat our craft more carefully. Especially Chief Kazama, she was truly upset at the damage the head visor received."

… Wait, Chief Kazama? Wasn't she one of the Valkyries last time? Yeah, she was with us in Niigata, after all she did try to save Eiko-san with me. Also, damage to a head visor… that's what I did to Hayase's Type-00C during this morning's mock battle, right? So I did end up damaging it… Shit.

"Well, pay it no mind," Cpt Isumi says with a nod, "after all she would have said the same to anyone else."

"I know, but still… It is a bit upsetting." She closes her eyes, kind of tightly, as she folds her arms, tugging at her dress. Huh, how strange. I never thought I'd see Haruka-san being upset.

"What is it, cadet?" Cpt Isumi calls out, leaning onto a hand as she smiles, "Why the long face?"

"Huh?"

"You looked a bit," She smirks, "distressed, as you heard the reports."

"Eh? Ah, well, you see," Scratching my head, I look away, "my Instructor tends to tell me I damage my machines much during sim practice. I was a bit worried, hearing how the mechanics seem to have a short temper, is all."

"Oh, don't worry, cadet Shirogane," Haruka-san smiles brightly as she nods my way, "Most of the mechanics in the base are actually pretty warm people. Our current crew is merely a bit, uh, peculiar," She says, almost stuttering. I bet she was about to spill how they were actually from the Guard, but recalled she can't speak of the matter.

"I see."

"Well, was there anything else you needed, Suzumiya?" Cpt Isumi asks.

"No, that was all. Should we wait for you at the PX?"

"No, you can start whenever you want. I'll be reviewing some papers for a while longer."

"Understood. Good night then, ma'am," She stands upright, giving a salute. Once she loosens up, she smiles my way, "And good night to you as well, cadet."

"Ah, yes. Good night, ma'am," Giving a quick salute, I nod her way. She giggles before giving her parting words and taking her leave.

"Sigh… Really, it's going to take a long time to review all this," Cpt Isumi slumps into her seat as soon as Haruka-san closed the door.

"Um, do you really have to tackle everything tonight, ma'am?"

Nodding as she straightens up, she then coughs, "Sadly, it's my duty to have the state of our machines reviewed for tomorrow. And not to mention, you gave me quite the amount of homework to tackle," She then chuckles a bit.

"I see," Yeah, when I was the squad's leader I also had to file all these papers. At least back then it was easier, since thanks to using my style our Gekishins ended up requiring lots of maintenance. Coughing, rolling my shoulders up, I look at her, "Did you need anything else from me, ma'am?"

"No, I didn't particularly- Hmm…" Blinking fast for sec, she then eyed me frontally, spinning her pen again, "Cadet, could you perhaps aid me in sorting your words on the software?"

"I suppose I could. What did you had in mind?"

"A simple explanation on the best way to make the most out of the software's properties. Also, which missions should we tackle if we want to see these tutorials you spoke of."

"Roger. That's simple enough."

Smiling my way, she hands me a few pages and a pen. And so, after I bring my seat closer to the desk, we start to write away in silence. Now then… the levels with the tutos for the combos and cancels, as well as the aerial moves, were in…

…

"… I didn't think you'd be so focused," She comments.

"Hm? Why?"

"Well, most cadets are not that used to filing reports. Also," She looks down, peeking at my papers, "your form is actually well polished. That is a surprise."

"Really? I mean, I think it shouldn't be like that. Especially in the Empire, where everybody likes to ask for written reports."

"Ahaha, that is true. However, there is a certain… finesse that comes with experience. It's simply surprising to see a cadet already spacing his words properly, or even doing an apt introductory paragraph."

Well, at this point it's kinda second nature to me. After college, and after getting drilled the proper way of writing by Meiya and Chizuru during my first loops, I just do this all the time now.

"I see," Not that I can explain that one. "You could say it's thanks to my squadmates, since they lent me their notes I've taken a page out of their styles to better my own."

"Is that so. That is indeed a wise thing to do," She nods, smiling as she goes back to writing. "By the way, might I ask how it feels?"

"Hm? What thing?"

"Being the only male in your squadron."

"Huh?"

She looks up, smiling, "Oh, I was wondering if… there was something going on between you and one of your squadmates."

"Wh- I, well, no… No, there's nothing between us." Unlike in the other worlds… when we actually grew closer… Sigh. Back to the page, I reread where I left off before keeping at it.

"Is that so? I assumed they'd at least have made a move on you by now."

"It ain't as if I were a particularly enticing target, what with my punishment and all."

"Hmm. Still, I've heard your training is going well. And that you… did what you did during the CCSE to shield your comrades. That has to matter for them, right?"

"I guess. But, really, there's nothing romantic going on, ma'am. Sorry to disappoint you," I smirk her way, shrugging.

She chuckles as she turns her page around, "That's disappointing. Do they not fit your type, maybe?"

Sigh… You and your talks of romance, ma'am. What did I just get myself into? I'm too hungry for this. "No, that's not it. I do think they're good looking, but my mind is… kind of elsewhere."

And, even if there were a possibility of us being together… Would it even be possible? Nah, no way in hell. Compared to the others from the my loops, to the ones from my world, they're so rough here. Sure, Tama and Mikoto are still as sweet as always, but they don't return my gaze fully. They also kept their fair distance from me before the CCSE. Is that much to ask, for them to simply be openly friendly with me after all that's happened? Kei and Chizuru seem willing to start over, even if their eyes aren't as shiny as the ones I've loved. And Meiya has been a rollercoaster thus far, sometimes she gets all cold and rejecting, other times she acts as serious as the one from my loops was, and very few times she acts as sweet and oblivious as my world's Meiya was. Honestly, I'd like her to settle in one mood if at all possible. My heart can't take so much flip flopping. And this is coming from the dense and indecisive guy, of all people.

Looking up for a second as I thought on how to word a phrase, I noticed Cpt Isumi had remained staring at me, tapping her bottom lip with the back of her pencil.

"Is something wrong, ma'am?"

"… You said you had your head elsewhere, correct?"

"Yes?" Why is she so serious all of a sudden?

"Does that mean you have, well, someone in your heart already?"

Inhaling slowly from my nose, feeling the air come down my throat, filling my lungs, I nod as I exhale, "You could say that, yes."

Back to writing, now my hand stalls the movement. Recalling the finger doing circles as she scolded me, the bitter pout when she got jealous of others, the tears she shed when we had to find a house for the kitties we nursed, the proud voice as she presented me with some new recipe she found online, or her honest joy whenever we spent time alone at night, simply sharing the silence.

… I miss you, all of you. Even you, who always shrugged me off with a smile after your teases whenever I offered you your coffee.

"Ahem… Cadet, if you don't mind me asking, what kind of relation do you have with this special someone?"

"Which one?"

"… Excuse me?"

"Hm?" Looking back at her, she was gaping. Cpt Isumi was, literally, tilted. Still as a pillar or a statue, if not for her widening eyes and quivering lips. What's her deal? "What is it, ma'am?"

"That is my question, cadet. What do you mean by which one ?"

Huh? I'm just talking of how I used to love all of them, all in equal fashion, even if each relation was different. All of them are dear to me, of course. What's so weird about it? Why is she so- Oh, fuuuuuuuuuu -

"What an… odd reaction," She says, flinching back. "Um, cadet Shirogane, I do not want to assume anything but, were you, uh, in a polyamorous relationship?"

"W-W-W-WHAT!? No!" I wouldn't be able to live with myself in an open relationship. I'm too jealous for that kind of thing. That, and I think I have only eyes for one. Even if… the swirling feelings for all of them are a bit hard to handle, when I think about my beloved ones for too long.

She then eyes me sideways, "Then, what is this about 'which one'?"

"Well… Sigh. I just had many people I… loved, at different points in time. So, each of them was different, even if I loved them nonetheless."

"I see. Did you not manage to confess your feelings?"

"… Ma'am, what about the reports?"

"We can easily write them as we platicate," She says, going back to her paper despite being stealing glances at me. "So?"

"Sigh… I'm alone now for a reason, ma'am." Let's hope she shoves her questions with that answer, I'm already sad enough from just remembering a bit. Not to mention, I don't want to end up comparing my relations to his. I'm finally calm again after the recovery, I don't wanna ruin it.

"I see… So, if you know what attraction feels like, do you have your eyes on someone at the moment? Don't worry, I won't say anything."

"Why are you even asking? Sorry, I don't want more rumors going behind my back."

"Oh, no. I give you my word, I won't disclose anything," She nods, firmly, stopping her pencil to look into my eyes. I nod back, returning to my paper. "It's just… if your squadmates have not fit your palate, perhaps there is another someone you fancy? Is there someone tutoring you or aiding you in your trainings?"

"… No, not particularly. The people here… are not what I'd like as a partner, to be honest."

"Hm? Why do you say so?"

"After being in… love with them, I can say what I want now with certainty. And while I appreciate my squadmates, they're… they're not like them." My pencil stops, I sigh as I look back and lean back onto the chair. "There's these little things, these small details that… just aren't there. Not to mention, with all the rumors hanging over me, I don't think anyone would actually want anything with me, to be honest."

Shrugging, I go back to the report. Cpt Isumi does too, scribbling away faster than me. And for a moment, there was only silence, and the sound of a clock tickling the seconds away, and the pine fragrance of her perfume.

"… Aren't you letting your nostalgia blind you, cadet?" She blurts out outta nowhere.

"Huh? Blinded by nostalgia?" Looking back at her, Cpt Isumi's brows were almost coming together.

Resting her pen again to fold her arms while she sighed, she then again looks straight into my eyes, "Do you know how unfair that is? To be compared with someone else?"

"I'm not actually comparing anyone. You asked a question, I gave you my answer, is all."

"Then, let's assume one of your squadmates were to confess her feelings for you, what would you do?"

…

That's a good question.

I mean… If, and that's a big if, such a thing did happen, "I think I'll just answer honestly, let my heart find the answer. While I am, well, happy to be part of the squad again without anything in the way, it… It's hard for me to picture them as my lovers as they are now." They're too different. I know, they might open up in time, yes. But still, their mood and their actions are too different. I still want to protect them, to help them reach their peak, to lead them to a better life. But… I'd like them to open up a bit more, I'm sure that sweet side is in there, somewhere, hidden under all the rough skin they wear in this world.

"And don't you think that is extremely unfair for them?" She says, eyes narrow and blazing away.

"Why? I'm just being honest with myself."

"Do you know how diminishing, how demoralizing it would be to be constantly compared to your prior lovers? How do you think you would feel if your lover was constantly comparing you to her ex?"

"Eh? Ah… Like shit, to be honest."

"Exactly. I, well, don't have first hand experience, like yourself, but I have seen many fallouts, both before and after joining the military. And what little advice I can give you is this. Stop romanticizing the ideal image you have of your previous crushes. Don't expect other women to act as the ones you loved did, it's unfair to judge them against such an idealized vision. Not only for their sake, but for yours. If you're expecting something out of someone, something that isn't natural for that someone, you'll end up disappointed. And your relation will crumble apart, perhaps with your lover not even knowing the root of your displeasure."

…

"… Does it really look like that?"

She then holds my gaze, before nodding with a frown, "Yes, you do look charmed by whoever you were in love with. I, uh, never thought I'd see that glint, that small blush in a man's face, but damn it, you're truly in love with that special someone. Or is it, they?"

"W-Wait, blush?"

She then chuckles, "Did you not notice? Your face has been red since you started speaking of your crushes?"

Gah! Shit, this is so embarrassing! But, well, I guess it's obvious… even if I don't like how she's chuckling at my expense.

"You see, two of my squadmates also have this crush on one of a guy," She starts slow, probably talking about Hayase and Harukasan, "And when talking of him, both light up as you did. But, their… situation is very different." Closing her eyes, she then sighs, "One of them has this… idealized vision of him, which your words reminded me of. And frankly, it is odd to see a man of your age holding onto such affections."

"Huh? Why?"

"Well, males are in limited supply, if you haven't noticed. I'm not saying you have it easy, but I'm sure there are many that would take an interest in you. Yet, here you are, chained to the idealized vision of your crush."

"… With all due respect, ma'am, they were great people. Even if… I'm alone now, we got to know each other at another level. And that's why, there are things I see in my squadmates that just make me doubt on whether we'd work together."

"And that is fair," She nods, going back to her report, "But don't let your 'list of preferences' blind you, cadet. No person is ever the same, and I'm sure even your past crushes had bad traits that you might be forgetting about. Is it that hard for you to look and judge your squadmates for who they are, instead of for who you would like them to be?"

"… For who they are, huh." Picking up my pen, I also go back to writing. Yet, thinking back on all that happened in this world… If I judged them for how they've been thus far with me…

"You shouldn't push those expectations onto other women, otherwise you'll stay alone all your life. You also wouldn't like to always be made to measure up to some idealized ex, right?"

"Yeah, I wouldn't. I'll… give this some thought."

"Good to hear. So… Ahem, if I may ask, did you ever… get to confess your feelings?"

"No, not even once."

"Is that so…"

"What is it, ma'am? Do you also have love problems?" I smirk, she twitches.

Coughing, she rolls her shoulders as she stands up, grabbing a plastic cup from a nearby shelf. "Well, you could say that."

"A coworker, maybe?"

"Ha! Thankfully, no." Drinking some water, she slowly sits down. "But…" Looking my way, then closing her eyes and edging closer to the desk, she whispers, "Do you have any advice you'd like to share?"

"If I may, why ask me of all people?"

"It's easier talking with an unknown face. My squadmates seem to never endure a long talk of these matters. I'm just looking for a new point of view, considering you're not from here."

"Fair. Then, well, I guess the main point to tackle is the way in which they see you. Uh, I'm right to assume we're talking about a men, right?"

"Wh-" Coughing, a bit of water splashes about, "What makes you ask that?!"

"Just making sure." And covering up how I already know who we're talking about, and how 'the Viking' also knows of this.

Groaning as she cleans herself with a tissue, she nods, "Yes, we're talking about a man. And no, I'm not Bi either. I may have had… small deviations but I've only felt romantic feelings for this person."

"TMI, Captain."

"TMI? What does that stand for?"

"Too Much Information. I did not need to know you had… small deviations in your love life." I sigh, she flinches as she covers her face for a moment. "Anyways, there's a simple solution to your woes."

"Oh? And that is?" She leans forward, eyes shining as her hands close up and get closer to her chin.

"Simply go up to him and confess."

"Huh?"

"It's as simple as that. You arrange a nice atmosphere, maybe invite him to a dinner, or to visit some place you like. Somewhere where you can talk as you walk and stuff. If you can cook something for him, all the better. Then, while the feels are still fresh, BAM!" Punching the air as my eyes blazed, "You confess."

"There's no way I can do that! If I could muster the courage I wouldn't be asking you for advice!" She looks as angry as she was back at the cruiser while we were on our way to battle. Only she's blushing a bit.

"But you're gonna have to say it eventually, either as the starter or as the answer. What are you gonna do if he confesses to you? Leave him waiting in silence? We men have hearts too, even if you don't think so."

Just remembering how much I freaked out when Chizuru apologized as I confessed to her is enough to make me mad. I was literally about to cry. You muster the balls to say the words, to look into her eyes, and then… she says sorry. But at least Chizuru did answer, even if she was just nervous. It's better to be clear and frontal with this stuff. But staying silent, dragging out the answer as the other is literally dying of anxiety in wait? That, that right there is a crime against humanity.

"If… If he confesses, I would say yes," She says, coiling a strand of hair. "However, I do not know if, well, I have it in me." Sighing, she hunches over, "I've tried inviting him over to some restaurant in the Capital, I've taken the time to call and congratulate him for his promotions, and I always send him letters for his birthday, as he does for me. But… it's… as if he takes it for granted, maybe. Since we're childhood friends, maybe I'll never be anything else for him."

"… And what if he's scared?"

"Huh?"

"What if, I dunno, something tells him he's not good enough for you? What if everyone tells him that?"

"What?"

"He might be super insecure, for all you know. How many other women actually talk with him? How much does he appreciate you being there? How… afraid is he to ruin it all by trying to be something more than a friend?"

"I… well… I don't… I've tried to show him I'm serious. He hasn't-"

"What are the chances that he's like 'Oh, she's just being nice. I'm just an old friend, that's why she's so nice to me. She's pitying me.'?"

"Ah, well…" She looks down, her shoulder compress themselves upon her figure.

"When was the last time you actually tried to have an honest talk about how he's doing?"

"… Honestly, I don't remember. My missions… leave me little free time."

"Well, try and fix that. Write him a letter, try to get a schedule going. I can say it now, if something is gonna happen, just better to deal with it ASAP. If you want him as a lover but he doesn't, better to stop pining for him and accept his answer. Or vice versa. But, when you're insecure, when you're alone, you just might be frozen by fear. And that's why you say nothing."

After all, that's what me and Sumika did in my world. Did I like her? Yeah. Would I have liked to date her? Yeah. Was I afraid outta my mind of what would happen if she said no? Fuck, yeah. Back then, the sole thought of everyone laughing at me for getting rejected, of losing her company, of not having her to fool around and make jokes with was mortifying. It's just gonna happen, I thought. If she likes me, then she'll make the first move. Guess I just wanted some reassurance or some shit. It wasn't even about being the one receiving the confession, I just… wanted to hear her say it, to rid me of all the ambiguity. To hear her say, 'I love you'.

Little did my idiot young self know, Sumika was exactly the same but worse. If I do so much from him, why isn't he asking me out? Is just using me, or is he scared? And then, as if our own insecurities weren't enough, a certain blue haired samurai decided to enter my life.

… Looking back, at that moment on the hill, at both decisions, I can see why I would choose either path. Either to fully accept that I was comfortable in my previous routine, wanting to truly return Sumika's affection, or to come to terms that for all she did, I couldn't bring myself to love Sumika, as opposed with the connection I felt with Meiya. It wasn't even about the promise anymore. I loved… No, I love that Meiya. Her obliviousness, her direct way of being, the way her eyes spark up whenever she sees something new, even her stubbornness about wanting to cook, despite all the kitchens that ended up exploding when we married.

"But it all comes back to a simple decision, to be honest with yourself. To be able to voice it, without assuming anything on the other end. If you're just letting time slip by, you might regret it one day. And if it's not meant to be, better to face the answer now. It's gonna suck, you may cry, and it may take forever to feel that tingly feeling again. But… life's a gamble, if you want love and affection you've got to fight for it. So, first step, you should think on how you want to portray your feelings, Captain."

Hunching over, a hand rustling the opposite arm, she looks down, "However, I'm out of ideas. Masaki is just too dense to notice all I've done so far."

"Then, just be yourself."

"… Huh?"

"Yeah. Is there any hobbies you have? Invite him to spend some time with you, show him what you like, even if he already knows it. If you know he likes something, tag along with him, show him you're willing to share his joy even if you're not particularly interested in the topic. You have to make it clear to him that you enjoy being with him, and then you drop the confession."

"D-Do I truly have to be the one?"

"What, would you rather see him with someone else? Walking with their arms entwined, laughing under the daylight, feeding each other an ice cream cone, and then kissing as they hug." I ask, raising a brow and smirking. And she gets tilted, an entire bombardment flaring behind her eyes. Reminder to self: Do not upset the Captain, ever.

"… No, I would not like to see that, if at all possible."

"Then, you already had your answer, looks like."

"Siiigh… I suppose being more aggressive is all I can do now, huh."

"Come on, ma'am. Don't be so down, he might be into that for all you know."

"Into 'that'?"

"Yeah, he might like competent, assertive women. You know, the typical older and confident kind."

And again, she gets tilted for some reason. Oh right, she was competing against her sisters for the guy's affections, right? Huh… Yeah, Cpt Isumi does have an older sister, now that I think about it. If this Masaki likes them older and confident, the Captain might be screwed.

"Well, but you won't know until you try. So, best of luck in whatever you decide to do, Cpt."

"Sigh, thank you, truly. Still, I don't know what I'll do, or if I can bring myself to be this assertive. By the by, what about you?"

"Hm? Me?"

"Yes. You never managed to confess, yet seem very… knowledgeable on the matter. From where does this confidence comes from, cadet?" She says as she stares, smirking as she resumes her writing after the tilting.

"Well, it's just, like, my opinion after what I've gone through, is all."

"I see. Do you think you'd be able to confess your love to someone, assuming you get past those ideals you have?"

"Sigh… No, I'm not sure if I'll find someone like that. There's… much for me to do before I worry about settling down into a relationship."

"Well, I understand. Your commission, these rumors, the war, there is much for you to focus on at the moment," She nods, misunderstanding my words. "Still, you should not close that window, cadet. Just as you told me, you might regret it later."

"Haha, I guess that's true. Still, I've enough with my training for now."

And for a moment, we just write our reports.

"Speaking of," Halting her scribbling, running a hand into her hair, she looks back at me, "I had heard some rumors about your training I was wanting to ask about."

"Hm? About?"

"Well, it seems you had some sort of standoff against two of your squadmates in the simulators. However, I doubt Sgt Jinguuji would have normally allowed such a thing." She then remains staring, tapping her papers with a finger.

"Sigh. Yes, it was my idea. I proposed it to the Instructor and she went along with it, is all."

Smirking, she nods, "I see. I heard you put on quite the show back then. It's a shame we weren't nearby, might have managed to have Hayase sober for another pair of weeks."

"Is she that troublesome when she gets drunk?"

"Well, not troublesome per se," Licking her lips, grimacing a bit, she sighs, "She gets kind of down or very angry. It's either endure her screaming and raising her voice at every little thing or, if she drinks something very strong, to have her slumped on a table crying her woes out. Oh, please don't tell her I told you, it's supposed to be a secret of the squad."

"Don't worry, my lips are sealed, ma'am. Not a word leaves this walls." I smile with a nod, she returns the gesture.

Picking up her pen, she begins writing again, "So, were the rumors of the show accurate?"

"I guess, yeah. I ended up losing, but I managed to pull off one of those stunts we talked about before during it, so I'm content with the result."

"One of- You mean those unorthodox line-piercing maneuvers?"

"Yeah, three times in total."

"Wh- Three? How?"

I smile, simply shrugging, "It just came naturally, I guess. What I did was a sudden dive, similar to what the base Kaizer's Break Skill does."

"I see. Still, did you actually do so with the same blinding speed?"

"Of course, there's little point otherwise." I nod, she again gets tilted.

"Heh, I can see why the Instructor sang that praise for you, 'hotshot'. You truly might end up surpassing Hayase's cadet records."

"If it keeps her off the alcohol, you should root for me then."

"Haha, I might, I might. Still, don't get overconfident, Shirogane," Back to a serious expression, she held my gaze with a poker face. "I won't try to dissuade you from using those moves, but don't let the pride get to your head."

"I won't. I still lost that fight, in the end." And I also lost against your squad this morning. Seems the only thing I can win at are games.

"That's a good thing. Hayase herself sometimes gets too reckless, and we did lose to this pilot I spoke of before. Keep your feet on the ground and your gaze on the sky, and you'll become a fine surface pilot, cadet."

"Thanks, ma'am. I'll keep your words close."

She nods back, smiling, "They'll help you much, I'm sure. Perhaps, you may even end up joining my unit once you become commissioned," Chuckling, she says as if joking. She must think I'll be surprised once I effectively do.

"I'll end up ruining the motif of the squad, if you're all females. Can't exactly be a Valkyrie as a male."

"It would be a shame, if we lost such a promising novice due to such concerns," She chuckles and I go along, rereading what I wrote thus far, seeing I'm close to finishing. "But still, I'm certain your future squadron will benefit much from your skills, Shirogane. Just don't try to shoulder all on your own, ace pilots are sent to fight on their own for a reason."

"I know, and I don't plan on becoming a burden." Finishing my read, nodding to myself in satisfaction, my report is done. "Well, my work is done, ma'am," I pass her the papers, which she takes and starts inspecting.

"Hmm… Despite how we were talking, you did manage to keep the spacing well and to choose the proper wording. Very good work, cadet."

"Thanks. So, I suppose I should be on my way."

"Ah, yes. It has been a long while since you arrived." We both stand up, but as I was about to offer her a handshake, she walked up to me, eyes focused on mine as she folded her arms. "Shirogane, may I ask you a personal question?"

"Yes, what is it?"

"Why do you fight?"

"Huh? Why?"

"Indeed. I've heard the rumors. A Japanese that was living abroad, enlisted in the UN, returns to the Empire and shows himself to be an ace recruit. A very promising pilot, as well. And yet, despite the setbacks you've encountered, despite what transpired during the CCSE, you are still here." Leaving the silence hanging, her eyes never leave mine, scanning and delving. "I know you're not obliged to answer, but I'd like to hear your reasons. Why are you here, near the frontlines? What compels you to fight?"

…

"… I want my peace back."

"What?"

"I want my world back. I want to show the children that will come that there is more to life than learning how to handle a rifle. I want a world… with zero wars."

"… That's quite ambitious of you," She says, slowly grasping her chin, treading it with a finger as her brows arc, "Yet, it isn't so simple, I'm sure you know. Perhaps, having a more closer, personal goal would help you?"

"I do, besides the bigger picture." And that's saving my world.

"And that would be…"

"Someone out there… needs my help. I'm here because this is the place where I can make the biggest difference, for their sake."

"And what about you? What do you get from this?"

"… Leaving something behind that isn't flames and debris."

"Huh?"

"I… suffered an accident, before coming here. I couldn't do a thing, to be honest. So, I kind of… want to prove to myself that I can make a difference. That I can save someone."

Not like during Iceberg, where everyone under my command died. Not like the fleet, that also met their doom against the BETA in the long run.

Not like last loop, where my efforts in Sadogashima didn't matter in the end as Model B exploded. Not like during the defense of the base, where I couldn't make a difference, having to leave Hayase behind, failing to protect the others, and crashing my Shiranui in my frustration. And definitely not like Kashgar, where I just was a spectator, where my own squadmates and Sensei didn't think I had it in me to do what was necessary, to the point of them deceiving me with that radar glitch.

Thus far, all I've done is fuck things up. Not this time. This time, I will save as many as I can. I won't be a burden again.

Feeling a pat in my shoulder, I get out of dreamland to find the Cpt smiling, her own eyes clouded a bit. "It's a hard thing to manage, a survivor's guilt. I won't tell you how to handle your feelings, but don't try to do any heroics to make up for your past failings. And, if you need it-"

"I don't need more hypnotherapy, no."

"I see, forgive me for mentioning it."

"No, it's fine. I… just wanna help, as much as I can. There's no bigger meaning, I simply want to leave a world worth living in. Just that." I shrug, sighing then placing my hands on my pockets.

She nods, folding her arms, "That is a worthy goal to aim for, cadet. But, don't forget. You are not alone in this fight. If I may… Would you allow me to tell you a small motto me and my squadmates employ?"

Raising a brow, to fake my surprise, I nod. Smiling a bit she then straightens her posture as she coughs. Business game back in her face, both arms folding behind her back, the fire pouring from her eyes towered over me, as it did during the few times we trained and fought together, despite her not being Walken levels of tall.

And with a sharp breath, Cpt Isumi spoke firmly and loudly, like a waterfall of crystal, "Carry out your mission at all costs! Fight to your very last breath! Make your death count!" Fuming the air out from her nose like a bull, she then chills down, her arms again joining in a relaxed knot. "That's our motto, that we repeat before we march to battle. If you're so determined to see through your goals towards such a wide scope, perhaps you could keep these words close to you."

"Yes… It's a fine motto, ma'am. But…" Looking up, folding my arms, can't help but to twist my lips, arc my brows as that cold feeling covers my back, "I don't think I agree with it one hundred percent."

"Hm? Oh, I see." Far from being annoyed, she smiles as she tilts her head, again playing with her hair. "Then, what do you find it hard to accept in the words? Let's assume you just joined my squadron and heard the motto, what would you say?"

Again with that, huh. She seems a bit too intense about me joining the Valkyries. I thought Hayase was the only one, but looks like I was wrong.

"Well, the first line is kinda iffy for me. While I know there is no easy solution, that we as soldiers must do what we have to, I… I do not agree with that 'at all costs' part. I know it probably means to have us be willing to lay down our lives if it comes to it, but, well," Yuuko's pale face comes back, the lab coat dangling like an overcoat from her lithe body, that was getting thinner and thinner with every visit. The explosions of the XM3's test, the madness that it caused, the result of Iceberg, of Alt V, all of it makes me grimace as the foul taste of rusted metal and acid fill my mouth, "I don't think such extremes are a good choice. Sometimes, the cost of a victory is far greater than it would be to admit a quick defeat."

"A Pyrrhic victory, huh? I suppose, if you had to endure through an accident of this war, your views of the aftermath and its repercussions might be different than ours. Still, there will be times when it's all or nothing."

"… And refusing to truly look for a solution may send you into a downwards spiral from which you might not be able to escape, in my opinion." I shake my head, rustling my pockets. She gestures me to continue, so I do after clearing my mouth. "The last one is… well, I kind of have a problem with it."

"And that is?"

"Replace death with life, that's what it should be. At times, you might not get to decide how you die. And, for all you know, your death," The G-Bombs explosions come back, the blurry wasteland filled with death. How in the end, all of that carnage was pointless. "might not truly mean anything, more than to be a meat shield."

"… I do not think it wise to hold those views. It's true, some missions…" She looks down, holding her elbows tightly, as if they were a crack in a ship, about to burst open to the sea's pressure, "will have many die pointless deaths. However, I believe there is much to gain by reminding ourselves that our deaths are not pointless."

"I disagree. I think that reminding your troop that the best thing they can do is stay alive is more important. Your everyday efforts, what you do for your comrades and people, all of that is more important than the last seconds of your life." I nod, meeting her gaze, feeling my own eyes blazing.

"Might I ask why you think so?"

"Because someone once told me that the best thing a soldier could do is to stay alive. Even if others call you a coward, even if they deem you useless, so long as you remain alive you'll have a chance to make a difference. Changing the present is something only the ones who survive can do." Feeling that same gale, that tornado in my gut, the valor Marimo-chan imprinted into me during my first loops is enough to make me take a step forward and nod, arms folded.

She seems taken aback, perhaps because she sees the similarities of my words to the Instructor's, but holds my gaze as she stays cool.

"That's a fair point of view. It's…" Then, she smiles, "refreshing, to hear such words coming from someone so young."

"Huh? Why?"

"Because most pilots your age are all about their bravado, their over eagerness to prove themselves worthy. A surface pilot fears not death, but to die pointlessly," She tells, sighing and shaking her head, quite strongly. "The fact that you know your life isn't over even if you're a coward tells much about you. And even if I do not entirely agree with your assessment of our motto, I respect your opinion, Shirogane."

"Thanks, ma'am." Taking a step back, I then give her a bow. Sigh, thank God she didn't get upset at my usual speeches.

"So, do you also have something to say about the second line?"

"Well, yes. That's more of a personal thing, however."

"Feel free to speak. So, what do you think of it?"

"I don't have a problem with the 'Fight to the last breath' part. It's just… Again, it kind of implies we're gonna die."

"Well, chances are, once we step into the battlefield we might perish." She notes, raising a hand to point a finger at me.

"Still, I think that's a bit too doomerish."

"Doomer… what?"

"Like, way to pessimistic and negative. I know there's no battle with zero casualties, and that strengthening your mental game for when shit hits the fan is important but… I'm back to what I said before." Shrugging, feeling those hands pull at my shoulders as they cry, those cries as they vanished during Iceberg, I can't help but to frown as a cold blanket covers me. "I want to be a guiding light for the rest-" Just like Yuuko, Marimo-chan and Meiya were for me when I needed them the most. "So instead of basically telling them to do their worst before they die, I rather inspire them to overcome the adversity. To dare to hope for our victory, to howl towards tomorrow. Instead of wasting my time worrying about dying a pointless death, I rather take it all in and break through the pain."

"That's… a peculiar way of thought." She says, arms folded as she raises a brow, looking at me as my mom did when I actually got good scores in college.

"I said it before, I want to make a difference. That's why I favor those 'flashy' and dangerous moves, because they inspire others. They show them that we can pierce through the adversity. Of course, I haven't yet fought officially, so I can't say my ideas hold water. But…" Inhaling deep, recalling my own times of war, the blurry mess I inherited from you, that Shura's Dance mission, the cold hands embrace me from behind as I can't help but to smirk. " Rather than remaining isolated, stagnant, I'll face the adversity and break through it all. I've a goal to accomplish, and such hesitant and negative words won't rouse me to my feet. I'll be the guiding light others need me to be, so I don't have time to think about dying pointlessly or anything. I will carry on, until I reach my objective."

She slowly claps, making a small smile, "Your determination is noted, Shirogane." Getting serious again, she then fold her arms, "However, do remember that we remind ourselves those words for a reason. We follow the surface pilot code to the letter because of that, even if we must force ourselves to smile at times, so that we can keep on marching."

" And is that how you plan to win the war?"

"Huh?"

" To simply grin and bear it? To ignore the madness around you? No, I disagree, ma'am. That's why instead of simply convincing myself that's how things are, I'll struggle to make a positive difference."

"And, what happens when you meet a wall you cannot overcome, cadet?"

" I won't be alone. Even if it might seem impossible, there's always a solution. So even if it's more painful than to accept the cruelty of war, I want to try to inspire others. And even if I'm met with another failure… I'll struggle until the end, not thinking to make my death count, but to live on and help rebuild what's left behind. Life is tough enough already, so I'll despair after I'm dead. I rather try to spread hope than to surrender to dread."

I wouldn't forgive myself if I fuck things up again. This time I'll try to truly help, not just with what's in front of me, but what with comes after the fire dies down. I know that for the other soldiers, they're facing a losing war and that's why they remind themselves not to lose it. But, for what will come, I believe inspiring people to have a reason to dream of tomorrow is more important. There will be a time where the war will end, and the soldiers will return to their homes. If their own personal wars are not over by then, it's up to those who lead them to guide them away from the aggression of the military lifestyle, of this endless battle. They need their own reason not to give up hope, otherwise, if only soldiers remain behind, humanity is fucked. Just as Marimo-chan did for us in my first loops, I wanna teach whoever ends up under me to be more than a mere soldier. Though, that might be my guilt talking.

"Sorry if I rambled too much, I tend to get carried away when I start with a speech."

"… No, it's alright." She says, low, arms folding tight as she takes a step back, eyes veering away as her brows got lower. "So, you're determined to 'despair after you perish', so to speak?"

"Yes, basically. I know it might be presumptuous of me, but perhaps you could try to widen your vision, Captain." I'm sure you'd like to have a life with your lover, and you can't do that if you keep focusing on the negatives. As Yuuko says, you have to focus on what gets you out of the problem. Otherwise, those tachyon-thingies will only lead you to a solution that can only be reached through your death.

"I see. I shall take it into consideration." She notes.

"Well, it's just my opinion, is all." I scratch my head, chuckling a bit.

Yet, she nods while still looking away, "If I may ask, if you're set in this way, what do you think of the protocols that would have you stand your ground for the sake of a mission? Of leaving a comrade behind?"

"… If it is for a fair cause, I will fight tooth and nail until I can't go on. And if it is unavoidable… I'll honor the life of my comrade, to ensure the memory of their life carries on. If it's time for action and not words, then I'll do my best to carry out my duty while not betraying my ideals. And no matter who or what stands in my way, I'll crush the fangs of anyone who dares to harm either me, my comrades, or my goals. I want to see the end of this war, but for the day after it, I want to give others a reason to fight their despair. So, that's why I'll lead by example and despair after I die," Even if I'm doing a terrible job at it as of late.

"Is that so. That's a very firm belief you hold, cadet," She nods, eyes closed. Then, she stands there, not looking at me, not saying anything else. As I was wondering if I should say something, she again fumes as a bull, walking past me, opening the door. "It was a pleasure to meet you, cadet." She says, court and composed.

"No, the pleasure was mine, Captain." Slowly walking towards her, I had started to offer a hand for her to shake.

Yet, she begins to close the door, forcing me to quickly step aside and outside. Standing in the opening left, she nods at me, "Thanks for your aid, and best of luck in your training, cadet. Good night."

"Yes, good night, ma'am," Standing in attention, I give her a salute.

Which she doesn't return, closing the door slowly instead. So I simply stare at it for a while, hunching over.

Did she get mad at my words? Well, I kind of got carried away there. And I again rebuked her approach, and even her motto. After having done that as the Viking, and besting the Valkyries in the game, I should have known better.

Dragging my feet towards the elevator, I can't help but to sigh. Feel again all cold, and heavy.

"Did she really get so upset? I don't think I said anything weird." Sure, it kind of clashes with the absolute obedience soldiers must display to their orders and duty, but go and tell that to the pigs that let us all die instead of deploying the G-Bombs in Iceberg.

Maybe she's also different, like the girls were at first. Maybe she, too, is kind of a nationalistic and hides it under her duty as a UN captain. Or maybe I just struck a wrong nerve, I mean, she did lose two squadmates during Niigata. But really, I'm just following Marimo-chan's advice, the one she gave after I fainted and the poem, so she should understand. Eh, I'm sure Cpt Isumi will see what I mean, either by herself or when I get the chance to work with her again. Yeah! Think positive! Unlike that little boy, I have my squadmates here. Sure, they're not as likable as they were before, but I can still rely on them.

And there's also Kasumi, my psydekick of a bunny doesn't need to see me more down than she has already seen me.

"Cadet Shirogane!"

Turning around, an operator was approaching me, folder under her arm.

"Yes, what do you need?"

"XO Kouzuki is calling for you, to the meeting room, it seems."

Sigh… It's almost 2100 hours, Yuuko. What the fuck? On the plus side, I can make sure she actually eats dinner.

"Understood, I've received my orders." Sharing a salute with the operator, I then pick up my pace towards the elevator, since I'm sure you must be waiting already.

---

A/N: So, originally, this was going to be only the opening scene of this chapter. However, as you can see, it got way too long. I didn't feel like cutting much, despite there being silly moments that could be seen as unnecessary. The other half of this chapter will come later, delaying the mock battle by one chapter.

That's all, thanks for reading. Stay safe.

Zuoriel

One Last Night in Peace (II)

A/N: I recommend you all to read this chapter while listening to the song 'Heroine' from Shin Megami Tensei II.

---

Chapter 66:

One Last Night in Peace (II)

---

December 2nd, some minutes after 9 PM.

(Tokyo, in a hotel near Hibiya Station.)

[Raiko]

---

Relenting a sigh, relaxing and stretching my legs, I rest the papers onto the desk. I am loath to admit, this report of possible BETA stragglers in the main land is far more severe than I previously anticipated. The area that has been scoured is very large, yet not a trace has been located as of now.

This scouting will take me at least a week of leave, perhaps until the twelfth. Even with the secondary mechanic crew, we might face unexpected setbacks since Kazama is no longer with us for the moment. I cannot believe Yuuhi-sama took her from us without notice, and without notifying me of the motive. To think she'd lease the Type-00C to the UN, unacceptable.

Leaning back onto my seat, crossing my legs and looking at the yellowish tint that illuminates my studio, my lips part on their own to sigh yet again. Slow and tense, as if once more showering with cold water, is the shiver which courses through my back, from my nape to the tip of my toes.

"Once more, back to the battlefield. And now of all times, as well." Gently pressing a side of my neck with a few fingers, delving into the knot formed in my muscles, I again slowly sigh and gasp as the massage continues. And yet… it is but a lacking replica, a foul imitation of what once graced my skin, such careful and precise pressure.

Standing up from my seat, returning the papers to the folder, I then place it back inside the suitcase that I was given during my visit to the Shogun's chambers. Leaving the dark metallic rectangle dangling from a hook on the wall, my sight directs itself towards the windows. Towards the distant shape of the hall where the UN's High Council is located, shimmering amidst the dusk.

Obstructed reports, empty message logs. Cut wires, strange footprints. Distant echoes, blurred letters. Secrecy, and deafening silence.

Is there truly someone in the HC plotting against our wishes? Yuuhi-sama seemed to agree on this notion, yet it is hard to believe. For if such is the case, we are surrounded by hostiles. Camp Kitanomaru, the HC and the Diet, all of them surrounding our outposts and Yuuhi-sama's residence. Not to mention, there's that vixen fox as well behind the board. Moving the pieces, perhaps.

"I can only hope nothing occurs in my absence. It may be time for action and not words, yet it does bring me pause. To leave milady's side at such a crucial juncture."

However, at the very least what which once shone within her eyes seems to have been reignited as of now. A small consolation amidst all these setbacks.

Licking my lips, again tracing my neck with my fingertips to then run a hand over my hair as the touch was insufficient in comparison, I lean towards the glass. Closer, until my forehead is touching its cold surface, and my eyes return their reflection's stare. Where she once was solid metal sinking into the undercurrents as she desperately clung onto an olive branch, now that quiet yet burning impulse once more shines in milady's very being. It is far more moderated, modest and composed than the prominence she once was during the invasion. Scorching, defiant, undaunted light uncovering a darkened map. Now, however, it is but candlelight. Yet, that is how it starts. Slowly, so slowly, just as dawn. A small kindling foretells the rise of the sun every day, and this rediscovered mental fortitude might as well be that for my Regent.

Gulping the sigh I was about to release, nibbling at my bottom lip, my sight decides to veil itself. And feeling the breaths I take, the current into my lungs, the pressure on my underbelly, only to then release it all and begin again. The cold of the glass grows, expands on my scalp and forehead, the minute twitching of my neck as I massage it, the turn and curves as my fingers reach my nape. Drifting off as if suspended in lukewarm water, my inhaling calmer with each repetition, I then open my eyes.

And my reflection returns my stare. And the suitcase is still as I left it. So, this truly is no dream.

Allowing myself a small smile, trapping a few fingers under my chin as it lowers, my other hand reaching for my shoulder to counter the slow descent of cold shivers on me, merely sway a bit is all I can muster in this tranquility.

"You truly… are still alive? Sigh. If only I had been notified sooner." Mana better handle this mock battle tactfully, otherwise she should ready herself for quite the retaliation. Still, how are you as of now?

Alone in that base, under the UN Farces' clutches, commanded by that vixen fox of all people. If as Tsuhi said you're still calm and collected, perhaps there is no reason for me to ruminate in this manner over the state of affairs in such negative a light. However, if you do grow adusted, if that calmness is but a facade…

" U-Um… So, what do you think of today's dinner, Captain?"

Static, ashes. A jolt on my nape, further embers on my ears.

" It's nothing. I just… I just tripped as I was patrolling. It's just a scratch, Raiko-san."

I look back, despite knowing you're not there. So I can only sigh.

" We're going to… No, we already lost the war, didn't we?"

No shelter to release my anger to, the rope of a well teared and stranding the water away. No sounds echoing behind my steps, the silence that has become a cloak ingrained to my back for over two years, since that August 5th of treason.

" You don't have to apologize, for real. You were right, I should have been the one who died that day."

Nothing lingering in the shadows, no spark to light up a fire in this so confusing board, this so lonesome night.

The torn pages, crossed out words. The wreckage after a typhoon, or BETA corpses after a bombardment. Cold, no, frozen. No, freezing into stillness, sinking into the depths. Just three words after the tattered visage, the lines of ink quivering as if he had written them during an earthquake. Three blurred words, assaulted by pouring teardrops perhaps, I'll never know.

Please help me

I choke, moving away from the window. Constricting and coiling upon itself, no air can filter through my throat for a moment. Ringing far away, echoing, that accursed beeping reaches my ears. I know there is no way that is the case, so my hands clamp on both of them, pressing softly the palms onto the ears, my fingertips massaging the start of my neck. Softly pressing, slowly massaging, fifty times in total as you had taught me. No ringing is left in my ears as I remove my hands from them. Yet, once again, the wound has been reopened. And knowing you're out there, somewhere, I cannot help but to scratch the glass, a frown engraved in my reflection.

I have grown used to your absence. Yet, I am loath to disappoint you, Takeru. For I am unable to truly rein in my displeasure at this turn of events, after all.

"… Mother?"

Twitching at the intrusion, quickly turning around, Fujikagi slowly squeezed himself into the room as he opens the door, eyes fixated on me.

"Fujikagi, what are you doing here? It's past nine in the night, you should be sleeping." Going up to him, I ruffle his hair, perhaps a bit too strongly. He groans and pouts as he raises both hands upwards. Relenting to his demand with a smile, I embrace him and take him off the floor. "So, what happened?"

"I can't sleep."

"But you have to."

"But you left the lights off. Then I saw you were still up."

"You need to get accustomed to it, dear. There is nothing in the dark, you don't have to be afraid."

"Uh," Resting his head on my shoulder, his protesting continues, "can you stay with me until I fall asleep?"

"Sigh. Fine, however, you have to stay in your room at night, Fujikagi. Otherwise, if you keep doing this, I will have to scold you," Smiling at his wide eyes, my fingers pincer the tip of his nose gently for a moment.

"Are people that don't sleep early bad?"

"Yes, for real. Boys that do not fall sound asleep and stay awake until late are very, very naughty," I say, slowly and distorting my voice, faking a small combustion in my eyes. His squeal, the strengthened hold on my shoulder only causes me to giggle. "So, let's go back." Exiting my office, closing the door with my free hand as I lift him slightly, shifting his weight, to then go towards his room.

Walking past the small living room of our apartment, opening the door, the sheets barely even moved, the light now turned on despite how I had switched it off before leaving him here. Having him sit on his bed, before tucking him under the sheets, I crouch by Fujikagi's side, playing with his bangs as he grabs the blue shirt you had always used to halt his wailing. Almost like a mirage, it feels as if it was yesterday that you were such a small thing that was still learning to speak properly.

Turning under the sheets, Fujikagi looks at me, "Am I truly bad for not going to sleep?" Clutching the blue close to his face, brows slightly furrowed, he keeps staring.

"I was merely jesting, Fujikagi. However, you do need to get used to falling asleep on your own."

"… I don't like it."

"I am aware. However, as I told you, I will have to leave for work. You need to start behaving well while I'm away," I remind, tapping his brows, running a finger over them. "You promise me you'll be good?"

Groaning for a moment, he then nods, "I will. But, why do you have so much work today?"

"It's just how it is, that's why we visited Her Highness."

"But if you stay up until late, you're going to be bad, Mother," He counters, eyes sharpening as he rustles behind the blue shirt.

"It's alright, I was almost done in fact." Caressing his hair a few times, simply looking into his eyes, I allow myself to rest onto the bed, our foreheads touching. "So you be a good boy and close your eyes. It's very, very late after all."

Trying and failing to restrain a yawn, he edges closer, "You won't stay up?"

"No, I promise." Smiling his way, my hands go down to his cheek, tickling him with a finger.

Slowly, he turns around some more, trying to find a position he's comfortable in. Once he does find it, one hand reaches for my sleeve while the other hugs the shirt to his chest. And for a moment, I allow my eyes to close and enjoy the silence, the small and tender warmth by my side, and the scent of vanilla that lingers in Fujikagi's resting place. I swear, how much do I miss the days when enveloping you in that same shirt, in this sweet perfume was enough to douse your cries. Simply having you feel that company was enough to lull you back to slumber. Now that you're properly aware of your surroundings, however, attempting to deceive you is proving to be quite futile.

Furthermore, if you do rise up at night, I alone have to look after you. At least you're no longer wailing loudly when you do wake up at late hours, even if I sometimes find you snuck into my bed somehow. Opening my eyes, his breathing now looks steady. His face relaxed, slow and calm like a lake fish swimming to its leisure. Yet, upon my arm retracting, his fingers dive into my sleeve, his brows furrow in complain. Little choice do I have but to remain by you then, until you're deeper into sleep. Perhaps I should have left the lights on when bringing you here earlier.

After a few minutes, his fingers slip from my sleeve on their own. Ruffling his hair softly, kissing his forehead, and slowly standing up to ensure I made as little noise as possible, I turn off the lights and leave his room, taking one last good look at him by the door.

"Sigh… At least he's sound asleep now." Pacing to the kitchen, I serve myself a glass of water. I then return to my office.

Placing everything in its proper place in the shelves, the folders, the books, my desk is left in proper form. Now, the suitcase is already filled with all the docs I require, the mails to the maintenance crew have already been sent, so that they could start the preparations for our machines to be readied for the sortie. The reports of the day have been reviewed, the necessary paperwork for my House's affairs has also been handled already.

"I believe no pending duties are eluding me at the moment." So, having confirmed that, I open my drawer and take out the small transparent foil out. The papers within having the small notes I was bestowed after Mana's call, the papers that have the intel we possess about your situation.

Inhaling sharply, for a moment my hands stall a reaction. My eyes merely scan the first page over and over, despite it being only a fake title in case anyone placed their eyes on it before I read and dispose of it. Almost as if I had been buried in sand up to my waist, my limbs and joints stuck and rusted, despite a deep exhalation which reaches my hands I cannot stop pursing my lips, shifting my legs as I stare. As if someone was pulling my hair downwards, my nape tickles. Resisting the urge to look back again, to bring my hands to my neck in an attempt to subdue the illusory tickling, two fingers drag the papers out. Leaving them on the desk as I barely rise from my seat to bring it as close to the wood as possible, I again sigh as I send the first page away.

…

So he arrived on the 22nd, right before all of these… 'advancements' were announced. Merely a coincidence? No, I think not. If Mana's words about a secret mock battle between Gekishins at late night is to be believed, it's almost as if Takeru was the perfect subject for these testings. To further improve the potency of our boosters and to favor such finesse in dodging is something only his eccentric mind would concoct.

"To be honest, if this is you, I cannot help but to feel a bit dejected. All these years and you have not tamed your liking towards those flamboyant maneuvers. Sigh…" I cannot help but to smile, picturing him folding his arms as he would then rise his brows, ballooning his cheeks much. "It truly is very much like you, to axe all of their records as you did to ours."

Still, moderation is a concept you should already have apprehended. Perhaps, the lakes in his memory are impeding his skills from truly flourishing? If so, it is a blessing. Otherwise, he would have been found out as a commissioned pilot by now.

However, I cannot deny it is odd. I had thought Mana was merely jesting, but I can now see why Tsuhi looked so distressed. To think Meiya-sama would be hostile to you, how regrettable. Perhaps, I have overvalued her intelligence. I certainly hope she saw reason and has begun to treat you with the deference you deserve, after you saved her from these chasers despite her betrayal. Which, conveniently enough, have been shielded by the UN going by what my sources in the HC have told me, which has been granted credit due to Mana's own words about the affairs in that base. Apparently, Yokohama will pay for their… silence, I suppose.

"How convenient, isn't it vixen fox?" Fuming a bit of air through my nose, I rest my chin on a fist.

Frowning as I continue to read, finishing my water, the remainder of the report is not as auspicious as I would have desired. Not only Takeru is under the surveillance of this Takamura, who belongs to the Takatsukasa fellowship, but also has been made to remain in the detention cells and enduring some sort of punishment despite him safeguarding both Meiya-sama and the Prime Minister's daughter. I had thought milady was being melodramatic on purpose, to not have me act then after the shock of the news, but to think she was being serious about all that has transpired. It's almost as if this scenario was crafted only to have him lose his temper.

"And yet, you seem to be oddly calm, for some reason." You even were willing to face off against your 'squadmates', in what Mana referred to as a window to his own graduation battle.

… Just remembering how you began to make your Zuikaku spin on me, while you were singing might I add, is enough to cause a void on my lungs, the ground to quiver under my feet as I stomp it lightly. Those young women have my sympathy, if they are now the recipient of his long essays about 'frames' and 'spacing'. From where did those eccentric terms come from, I don't have the faintest. However, in the end, you were most certainly right, Takeru.

Coldness, contrasting with the humid heat. Stillness, where once overflowing cheer made nest. And then… pain, screams, thrashing and rabid insults. Only to fade, fade to tears.

If only I had listened to his advice before it was too late… perhaps you'd still be alive with us, brother. Perhaps, Takeru wouldn't have fallen to those nightmares, he wouldn't have maimed himself in his struggle to be a spark upon my disdain, my indifference. Hellfire wouldn't have seared through the cracks of the broken iceberg his heart had become.

Yet, it was his insistence, his pull what effectively gave us a new road forward in our investigations. A soft whisper at first, right by my ear, then a firm declaration as the fire met my gaze. Before I knew it, we were working in synchrony towards our goal. And I don't even know how you did it, how you managed to stage it so well, for it all to burst open like popcorn above the fire.

I can't help but to wince, bend the papers as I grip them. How they called you, how you were erased, the anxiety you were made to endure, which only further bolstered your own adusted wrath. Not to mention, my own failings to notice your pain. If only I had actually looked at you, if I hadn't refused to listen…

"Sigh… No, this is not what I should be doing." Pounding my stomach, filling it with air, I rest my nape on my seat, lock my eyes upon the cream-colored ceiling. "Focus on how to attain victory, to cleave a path towards future peace. Our endeavors are arduous enough, there is no need to clog my mind any further. Dread must not make nest, does not belong with the living. So, I shall despair after I perish. Siiigh…" The exhalation again reaches my hands, making the papers flutter momentarily.

Yet, I find myself slumping onto my desk, onto the wood falls all of my weight. Try as I might, I suppose today I cannot deceive myself with mere wording. To work more would be futile, to continue to ruminate would only serve to unnerve me further. Remembering your words only serves to bring much disquiet to my breathing, and now I cannot help but to frown as I crush imaginary rocks with my tightening hands.

"… I cannot remain like this." Rising to my feet, shooting away towards a bookshelf, my heels hit hard and in a rhythm, for what little this march lasted. "Just as Tsuhi said, there is something we can still employ to our favor. To show you undeniable proof of our link, while not risking any ill nightmares to impair your judgment again."

And if it's a letter what is required, perhaps employing your own eccentric wording might aid in showing you we are being truthful. Slowly, as a tender and isolated rain, my hand rose towards a book. Merely touching it for a moment, becoming aware of my breathing and heartbeats, my arms stalled the action. My fingers grip the top of the book, softly pulling at it until it came off the shelve, into my hands. An unassuming green notebook, a normal office notebook issued all across the Empire.

Opening it, taking my time to tread each sentence over as I walked back to my seat, a small smile rose in me, all those clouds which mired my mind vanishing, parting open like a sky after a storm. Once I was back at my desk, I procured a pen and a few empty pages. Rubbing my legs together for a moment, taking a brief glance towards the report of your condition and what it told me, my hand starts its nightly duty while my eyes scour the dictionary I once made, to explain to our fellows the supposed meaning of your odd words.

---

Around the same time.

(Yokohama Base. Yuuko's office.)

[Takeru]

---

"-and then I told her you were behind the whole plotting of that mode, to avoid any more questions."

Sitting down as she drinks some more coffee, despite how there's no food anywhere nearby, Yuuko then rests the mug on the desk as she looks my way, "I see. I'll think something up to cover that small detail, don't worry. However, why does that unit have different missions?"

"You know, since it is a continuation of the bad end of the first game. Tango isn't completely defeated during that ending, so the remains are sought after by all the armies of the setting."

"… Tango? You mean that dance thing from South America?"

"No, no. Tango is the name of the quantum supercomputer of the game that-"

"Cough!" Hiccuping for a second, coffee again dirtying her lab coat, a blaze of a gaze drills into me. I feel like I've been here before. "What was that?"

"Uh, I was saying, that since Tango is a supercomputer like no other, all the armies in the game are after its remnants, trying to scavenge anything from the wreckage," I say, scratching my head and looking up.

"Shirogane, why did you not tell me about this?" Leaning forward, she slowly rests her chin on a hand, unblinking.

"I mean, didn't you modify the game yourself? You should have seen the cutscenes and the voice acting, right?"

"Do you think I have so much free time on my hands?"

"Considering you once stole my Game Guy to play in my first loops, yeah, kind of."

Grumbling for a second, a wild frown appears in her face. "Well, I simply saw the first few missions, dismissed it as unimportant dialogue and just limited myself to remove everything. So," Inhaling slowly, arms folding, her mug rises to her lips yet her eyes still do not leave mine, "what is this about a quantum supercomputer, and why didn't you speak of it until now?"

"I mean, it's just a game. It didn't really help you much in my first loops, to play the Game Guy port of Valgern-On, so I didn't say anything because of that."

"So, I did play that weird looking game? Despite how fast it moves?"

"Yeah, for real. Your eye bags were as marked as you have them now, and somehow you cleared the game faster than my squadmates." It was a surprise, and she did it without any of my tips to boot. Still, to binge the entire campaign in one sitting… I know that once you get rolling there's no stopping you, and that the original story wasn't that long to begin with, but still that was overkill as fuck.

Spinning for a moment, eyes almost closed, Yuuko then simply sighs. "I see. So, is there anything you believe is valuable in this special campaign of this 'Skull Kaizer' of yours?"

"Well, not really. It is revealed that Tango wasn't actually an omnipotent machine capable of distorting reality, but that it needed help to properly fix the world. That's why the makers gave it that name in the first place." Don't you love it when foreshadowing is right there in your face and you get trolled by a red herring instead? I still remember how much Mom laughed at me, since she loved that music genre.

"What do you mean?" Staring frontally, fully focused, Yuuko holds my gaze. That glint, the hand bumping on her chin, she's way too serious for some reason.

"Because it takes two to tango, Yuuko," I say with a shrug, putting both hands behind my head as I lean onto the sofa, smiling as I recall those last peaceful days I had back home. "There were limitations to what the machine could see from the future, since its cold analytical mind didn't take human emotions into account and it was, like, restricted in what it could do. But when it was paired with a human, seeing the future through the possible actions of that person, Tango's real abilities start to shine. In the Skull Kaizer's story mode it's revealed that during the first game the AI was convinced humanity was done for, since the only human it could link with was the tyrannical leader of the Earth Fed. But when meeting the main character, as they do battle Tango can see the motives of their fight, and what the world would look like if they won. That's why the hero is spared from the explosion in the good ending of the first game," I nod to myself, smiling a bit as I recall my days of playing through the updates of Valgern-On with Mikoto in the arcade, the days of theorizing during lunch break.

"And, what happens on the software we have here?" Yuuko says, tapping her desk with a finger non-stop, eyes narrow as they remain staring.

"Well, the main character kind of tries to help the world, but by choosing to awaken the Skull Kaizer he becomes a target. By that point, Tango only wanted a human vessel to finish the purge and the main character only was seeking power to end the struggles. But when they meet, if you don't screw up your choices, the hope the hero still has will echo in Tango, letting the machine see a solution to save the war-torn world. That's why they put the remnants of the core unit into the Skull Kaizer for the final level, and why you can use Pain's Gainer for thirteen minutes instead of seconds according to the lore." And if you add up all the timers of the boss rush battles of the ending, you end up with literally thirteen minutes. Those little details are what I like the most out of the series. "There isn't much technobabble, so I didn't think I'd be worth your time to bring this up."

One of her eyebrows twitches, she says nothing for a moment, then another. Leaning on the desk, her eyes don't move from me. "There wouldn't be any other 'secrets' you're keeping from me, Shirogane?"

"Huh? It's not a secret, it's just the lore from a game."

"Lore that, quite conveniently, deals with what my research is handling."

"I mean, does what I told you help in any way?" I ask, raising a brow at her, casting a side glance.

Her lips twist in, "Any idea, no matter how small, may be useful at some point. If you are to stay in this world, I expect you to report everything to me, Shirogane. No matter how small and unimportant a detail might be."

"Sigh. Fine, I know. Didn't think you'd have the time for the game, considering how you looked when I got here."

"So long as you understand. And while we're talking of your reports," Resting her mug on the desk, she crosses her arms again, eyes lightly blazing. Now what? "could you kindly explain to me what the papers you wrote today are about?"

"The weapon designs and the plans to mount the Vulcan on my Type-00C. Why, is something wrong in them?" Don't tell me I forgot to draw a graph, or that I did it in the opposite way again.

"Why, is something wrong, you ask," She shrugs, rolling her eyes. "Shirogane, what does this mean?"

Grabbing the page she hands me, scanning it slowly, my brows curve as do my lips. Uh, I don't see anything wrong here. The graphs are as they should, the calcs should be right, otherwise she would have crossed them. "What's the problem with this?"

Simply staring in silence, she sighs, "Shirogane, what are these signs supposed to be?" She throws an accusing finger to the markings in the graph and the text, almost puffing a cheek.

"Oh, those are just the shortcuts."

"Shortcuts for what?"

"For the equations and calcs. What, you want me to write everything every single time I have to check the numbers? So, I use those signs as shortcuts to know which equation goes where. You know, the heat test, the endurance of the barrel, the weight distribution and the possible impact on the frame as it flies. Stuff like that. I also have the shortcuts in the PC you gave me, so that I can automate the calcs instead of doing them manually."

I love my scientific calculators as much as anyone else, but redoing all the equations gets tiring real fast. Thankfully, now all I gotta do is put the numbers in the brackets, hit enter, and I get both the result and the progression of the calcs. Blessed be the bunny, I needed a program like that while I was studying. Just thinking on all the writing I would have saved myself from is enough to make my wrists cry a bit. Maybe I should have bought myself a laptop while I was in college in my world.

"And, why is that not mentioned anywhere?" Again tapping the desk, she shakes her head. Why is she fuming over something as small as this?

"I mean, I thought it'd be obvious, since there are some references to stuff with the same sign across the report."

"Is that so. So, and what of the eccentric words you used?"

"Huh? What are you talking about?"

Frowning a bit, she points to the bottom of the page I'm holding, sharp as an arrow, "Could you kindly explain to me what 'more dakka' even means?"

"Oh, shit. I actually wrote that down?" Yeah, I did. It's in the notes, sure, but it's there. Well, in my defense, it's easier than explaining why the machineguns are a good addition to the Takemikazuchi in complex terms. It just has More Dakka, and that is never a bad thing. "Sorry, I was kinda stumped by the end of the thing, before Kasumi came to visit."

"That is not the sole problem, Shirogane. There are other terms used throughout the report, like this consecutive three m letters you wrote here," She complains, waving a page about. "What's the point of you handing me reports with words and signs only you can understand? What is this even supposed to be?"

"People tend to refer to this as 'karma', Yuuko." Come on, you do the same all the time. And I never complained once.

"Ha, ha, ha. Very funny," Tying her arms into a sailor's knot, her gaze blazes away. "I expect you to cease using these eccentric words from now on. You didn't happen to employ them in the papers Isumi asked of you, right?"

"Of course not, I was focused back there," Returning her gaze, a few embers towards her blaze, I nod as I sober up. "Don't worry, that went well enough. Though, the Cpt seemed to get a bit pissed off by the end."

"Can you blame her? Not only you almost bested her tactic this morning with a vastly inferior TSF, not only you surpassed the efforts they obtained in their trainings with the consoles, but you then proceed to, in Isumi's words, decimate them without mercy in the sparring." Standing up to leave her mug in a shelve, she turns back to look my way as she wipes it clean, "By the by, I do not recall asking you to send the Valkyries' confidence to the gallows, Shirogane. Why did you crush them so thoroughly? Some sort of repressed anger, perhaps?" She asks, eyes again unmoving from me.

Yet, I smirk a bit as I chuckle, which curves her brows down in confusion. "Nah, I just did my best, as I told you I would. I was having fun and played as I would normally would. The training was a fucking disaster, and I loved every second of it."

"… You were 'playing'?"

"Yeah. I told this to the Captain too, that their moves were a bit rough. Looks like they hadn't gone through the tutorial of Valgern-On, so they weren't teching or comboing at all," I shrug again, one eye closed. "That's why even Kasumi could stand up to Akane and her squadmates, despite not having much practice with the game at all. By merely following my advice, she got a huge advantage in her matches." Which made her smile a lot, and I'm glad she could enjoy our session despite losing a few fights.

Yuuko merely nods, eyes back to the mug. "Is that so. Do you have any ideas to have them adapt faster to the XM3?"

"Maybe I can write a manual or something. It doesn't matter if my data is in the system if they don't think to use it, after all." I don't think they'll get to my level of crazy stunts, but once they see what moves they can pull off I'm sure Cpt Isumi will change her mind about my ideas.

Then, instead of them being a gamble of a lone soldier, they could become polished tactics of an entire squad. Imagine if all the Valkyries had been near my level during last loop, instead of only me eviscerating all those Forts it would have been the entire squad doing that. Maybe Kashiwagi's unit wouldn't have ended up damaged, maybe we could have held out to allow the Captain to escape the XG.

Sigh…

"Sounds like a plan. Make sure none of those odd words are in it when you write it," She says as she sits down, looking at her laptop's screen.

"Roger," Moving my neck in circles for a moment, I then stand up. Eyes focused on the floor, my feet cruise through the papers and books. Looks like she's holding up alright, so let's peace out.

"Shirogane?"

"Hm? What is it?" I look back, balancing my weight as I stop in the middle of the rows of papers.

Yuuko's brows were making a small V, she was again bumping a hand on her chin. Then, a single finger hurriedly shoots out like an arrow, pointing to the sofa, "I do not recall giving you the order to leave yet."

Sighing as I again walk back to the sofa, I rest my arms on my knees once I sit down. "So, what else do you need? I already told you of both the training and what I helped Cpt Isumi with."

Ruffling her hair for a moment, she starts to spin. Playing with a strand, coiling it around a finger as her eyes wander to nowhere in particular, she speaks up, "Can you tell me who was the one who wrote you the poem you mentioned before?"

"… Why?"

"Just a thought, could be important," She says, barely audible, as she stops spinning and folds her arms, eyes closed.

"It won't be important, believe me."

"So, you refuse to tell me," Then, her eyes open. Fire, all over again.

"Sigh. There's little to tell. Don't worry, it really has nothing to do with either Alt IV or the issues with the Guard," I nod, returning her stare, enduring the silence.

After a moment, she looks away, "Is that so. Well, it is rather late and you have a mock battle tomorrow. On that regard, how are you feeling now?"

"Fine, better than in the rest of the day, to be honest. The cold feeling hasn't left me entirely, but I can keep it in check."

"Do you think you're in form to face off against the Royal Guards?"

"It won't be a real battle, and I'll try to keep myself in check. And as you said, if worst comes to worst, I'll slip up and get knocked out before anything happens. Do you think things will be ready to intercept the guards if they try anything after the battle?" I ask, leaning a bit forward.

She immediately nods, spinning again. "Of course, all the preparations for this are ready. Just remember that you'll be responsible for your actions during the battle, Shirogane. I cannot shield you if you lash out against them," She says, a localized blizzard.

"I won't."

"Good. Now, off you go. It is late already," She then grabs a few stacks of papers, dropping them to the floor to make room in the desk.

She does this very slowly, her lips curving as she lifted the stack off the wood. Tired, almost strained. Looking at her well, the pink under her eyes is stronger than it was at morning, lines clearly visible in the skin. And pale, her face is getting pale too. Well, Yuuko doesn't come out to the ground level too much, that's for sure. But, was she like this lately? How was she during last loop? Now that I think about it… I don't see any dishes or trays nearby. Chances are, she hasn't eaten since… since when?

Softly biting my lower lip, I can't help but to sigh with my nose. Her habits haven't changed at all. I know she says it gets easier to spill her ideas on paper, but the amount of babel towers of papers that are here is just staggering. And if she's making room in the desk, it means she plans to revise some more stuff tonight. She's braving through everything again. Should I really leave her alone?

"What are you looking at?" She says with a frown, realizing I was staring.

Tugging at my pants for a second, I looked down. Standing up, shaking my head, my eyes scanned the gaze she was giving me. You're truly a bit too pale right now.

"Just thinking that you could organize the room a bit, maybe take a short break to eat something."

"I already took a break, while talking with you. Take your leave, Shirogane. I have work to do."

"… You're not planning on staying awake all night, are you?"

One of her brows twitches, "And what if I am? My research requires me to finish this, now," She shoots out, narrowing her eyes.

"A small nap won't hurt you, Yuuko. Forcing yourself to keep working, on an empty stomach, when you look this tired won't-"

Force palming the desk, her voice blasts away, sparks flying off her clenched teeth, "I gave you an order, cadet. As you should know, there are many matters I must tackle as of now." Words zooming like a race car, short of stopping to take a breath she instead folds her arms and looks at the whiteboard, at the jungle of calcs she had there. "Many preparations and negotiations are in the timetable, there is little time left to idle. I cannot waste any more time in explaining something you should already know, Shirogane. Thus, as the veteran you are, abide by your orders and return to your cell for the night. You are required to rise early tomorrow, after all."

"That's true, but you don't have to do everything in one sitting."

"I ordered you to leave," Glaring at me for a moment, she the hurries to the shelves to pick up some books. "You are no longer required in my presence, so return to your cell."

"But why can't you- Hey!"

Her heels caught in the papers, Yuuko staggers and almost stumbles to the ground. Yet, bracing for the impact of her falling on my arm, instead a soft sensation hits me as she falls, as I rush to help her. She's… light. Way too light.

"Let me go," Clawing at my arm, trying to stand straight again, she shoves me away, again reaching for the books. As she grasps at an encyclopedia, her wrist bends, the book falls.

Reacting as I did when Kasumi dropped her joystick, I catch the book in midair. Fuck, this is a heavy one, too. Despite my training, I do feel the weight, the tensing of my forearm as I lift the thing in a single hand. As Yuuko sighs heavily while squinting her eyes, extending a hand for me to pass her the book, all I can give her is a frown.

"Shirogane, hand me the book."

"… Yuuko, did you have dinner today?"

"What? I told you- Sigh. Give me the book, cadet. Now."

"Answer the question, Vice Commander. "

Lunging at the thing like a cat after a mouse, her fingers meet empty air as I sidestep away. "Shirogane, stop this stupidity. Hand me the book, I don't have the time to waste on this stupid pouty act of yours!" And again, her words fire off faster than our bullets. Almost as if she had forgotten oxygen was a thing.

"All you have to do is answer the question. Did, you, have, dinner today?"

Crossing her arms as she heaves a sigh, another blaze in her gaze as she spits fire, "No, I didn't. Happy now?"

"When was the last time you slept?"

"Wha- Shirogane, if you don't stop this-"

Throwing the damn book onto her desk, making a few papers fall off, a few small gadgets to bounce up and quiver, I shave the distance between us, returning the fire. "It ain't normal, to not have an appetite this late into the night. Much less with the kind of stuff you gotta tackle."

"Leave, now. I'll call security if you don't."

"And you also seem to not be sleepy. Looks to me like you got sluggish, but that's all."

"God, what are you getting at?! Out with it already!"

"By the by, what's up with your voice, Yuuko?"

"My voice?" The fire cut down, she flinches in confusion.

"Yeah, you're talking real fast. Like, what? Are you the new Enimen?"

"Eni-what?"

"You know, the American rapper. The one with that catchy song, 'Now this looks like a job for me!'," I say, waving both hands as the guy does in the music video. "Have you heard that one?"

Pinching her nose, she inhales sharply as she shakes her head. "Sigh. Are you making fun of me?"

I shake my head, grimacing as I rise a hand to count, ants marching on my back, biting and scorching. "No. I'm not messing around here. Lack of appetite, distorted sleep cycles, hastened speech, and the ill mood you've been in the last few days." Hands shake, I inhale through clenched teeth. Because it's the same, the same as she was when I met her for the first time in Sendai. "You wouldn't be abusing some… 'powder milk'-like substance, would you Yuuko?"

She doesn't return my gaze, she doesn't shake her head.

Instead, the cold blizzard of the XO comes from her lips, "My duty to humanity takes precedence over whatever small concerns you may have. I have plans to tend to, deadlines to meet. What small side effects I have to endure for now are nothing compared to what I'll gain from my efforts. There's nothing to be done, I just have to power through this until it's over. It's for the sake of the Project, you'd understand."

…

As if a wire had been cut off, something screeches in the back of my head. Feels as if I were under the downpour of a storm, the water hitting me like paint rounds, the wind blowing against me, my eyes closing in pain. My feet heavy, everything getting colder and colder.

The paper towers in my sight started to double, to multiplicate.

"Oh, really now? There's nothing to do about it, huh?"

"Hm?"

A small ringing started sounding on my ears.

"Then, next thing you know, there's Sadogashima and other shit coming our way. And you're going to, again, continue this way of doing things. Because you never have enough time, according to you."

"S-Shirogane?"

Jaw's quivering as if I were in a pool at night. A small black dot appeared in my vision for a second.

"But you ain't gonna stop. Fuck no, you won't. Because then there's the XM3's test, the development of the tech, the coming operations, and who knows what other shit else."

"And what do you expect me to do? This is my duty, my responsibility. As the leader of the Project, humanity's fate rests on my shoulders. I am bound to-"

" No!"

"W-What?" She takes a step back, eyes widening.

" You are not pulling this shit on me again! I am not going to stand by and let you destroy your own health just because you refuse to take a fucking break. "

"Who do you think you are to- Eek!" Deciding to not listen anymore, I shave the distance and crouch by her side. Grabbing her legs under her knees, another hand supporting her back, I lift her off the ground, carrying her and storming off towards her room. "S-Shirogane, let me down! I'm going to call security if you don't!"

" I don't give a fuck. You are going to rest, Vice Commander. " Closing an eye as she started to thrash in my hold, having to restrain her right arm with mine, wrapping in under her armpit. Still leaves her left punching at my chest, bumping her elbow into my jaw.

But unlike what I thought, she isn't entirely light. There is weight to her body, beyond the bones. And her hits do hurt a bit, there's impulse behind them. Phew… She didn't get to that point yet, thank God. But if I let her keep walking down this path, I know what's gonna happen. And I did nothing to actually help her last loop, I ain't gonna stand watching a second time. So, I pick up my pace, ignoring her threats and punches.

"I told you to let me down! I need to finish reviewing the equations of the 00 Unit before the final tests! Are you even listening?!"

" Again, you're going to rest. You cannot keep compromising your health, much less if you've been forcing yourself to stay awake for who knows how many days now. " I look into her eyes, her own features distorting and doubling for a second. Yuuko stalls her thrashing for but a second.

She frowns, her left hand grabbing, clawing at my chin, "Let me go now, and I won't hold this against you, Shirogane. My research also has ties to how to stabilize you and your world. You'd rather have me finding a solution for that quickly, wouldn't you? How to balance the tachyons you mentioned before?"

" Yeah, that's true. But I refuse. " Again closing an eye as she tries to break free, I keep walking.

"You should know how important this is, Kagami's digitization is also on the line! Stop walking, dammit!" Her legs start kicking up and down, as if she were making the butterfly in the water, as she sees we're almost to her room. "Shirogane, this is my last- Don't kick the door!"

Once the way is cleared, I enter the room in stride. Quickly moving to the bed, I drop Yuuko towards it. A small bounce of her weight on them, the sheets flutter and bend. Walking backwards to block the exit, I stand there, receiving her blazing gaze.

"I don't know what exactly you're planning to do here, but I will not stand by it!" Rising to her feet, I don't even have to move to stop her. Her own feet staggers as she tried to rush, one eye tightly closed as she holds that leg, sitting down again, groaning through clenched teeth.

Sighing hard, the screeching of fire subsides, the heat in my chest recedes. So, I simply grimace, looking into her eyes, "… That's my line, Yuuko. You have to rest properly." She groans as our eyes met, bloody murder oozing from her glare, from the tightened expression. "No matter how dear your project is to you, no matter how much is riding on your shoulders, you know you need to take a break. Otherwise, you are going to break."

"Do you think I don't know this? With what authority are you-"

"What's that, by the way?" I say, pointing to a small white plastic cylinder in a corner, near her bed.

Squinting her eyes, she sighs, "It's just a trash bin."

"The most advanced base in the world has a half cut plastic thing as a trash bin? In the room of the XO?" I roll my eyes, raising both hands in fake surprise. She again stares murder into my eyes, the veins now visible in the whiteness that surrounds the fire. Just like back then. "Did you know that I'm very good at guessing random stuff, Yuuko?"

"What is this about now?"

"I dunno. That small cylinder there wouldn't be in your room for when you… can't take it anymore and end up puking your insides out?"

Flinching, slack-jawed for a second, her hands coil and shake. Slowly standing up, step by step she shaves the distance. "That has nothing to do with you. Move aside, or I will call security on you. If you do not obey, our partnership is as good as finished!"

" And what happens if you end up fainting at a crucial time, Vice Commander? Do you think you can tend to your duties in this shape? "

"Since when do you have the agency to tell me what to do?" Grabbing my collar, still frowning, "I could erase you for being this stupid, you know?"

My hand rests atop the one that grabbed my collar, she tried to pull it away hastily. Yet, I don't put any pressure on it. Taking it off my shirt softly, running my fingers on her palm, her dry and pale skin. Cracks marked at some places, reddening at others. She stalls a reaction, her hand doesn't release itself from mine, nor does her gaze.

"You cannot help anyone if you cannot take care of yourself first. You taught me that, Yuuko. And I told you before, I'm not your pawn. So, as your partner in the our shared goals, I'm going to have you resting, for both of our sakes."

"You have no power over me, Shirogane. I am your boss, and the one with the knowledge to save both your and this world. Knowledge I could be polishing as of now, if you weren't wasting our time."

"I don't think it's a waste myself. Any time you get to rest is worth more for humanity than anything else. Just because you can endure the grind doesn't mean you have to commit to it every time," I say, low, looking down to her hand, which I still hold as if a tender glass of porcelain it were. From how pale she looks, Yuuko might actually be made out of porcelain at the moment. "What you wish to accomplish with these hands won't vanish if you take a short nap. I'm not even saying you should actually sleep like the rest, just take a short rest. That's all."

"My time awake is too valuable. Who would do what I do, then?"

Smiling, I nod towards her, "I can help you out."

She raises a brow, "You? What could you possibly-"

"I cannot operate a machine like you do, no. I cannot understand the calcs you do, either." Then, I grasp her hand a bit tighter. "But I do know how to sort your reports, how you choose to automate your tasks. I can arrange your papers so that you can tackle everything else once you're all rested up."

"Heh, do you think you're able to actually be useful to me? That I can rely on your 'help'?" The same frown, the same venom that leashed out back then. That night, that accursed Christmas of defeat.

So, chuckling, I remaining smiling, "At the least, I don't believe I'm completely useless, no. I'll be enough, to let you rest for a moment."

Yuuko's face sobers up, expressionless as she scans me. Saying nothing, not moving her hand away from mine.

"You're operating on an assumption, nothing else," She whispers. "Your concern is noted," She looks down for a second, slowly pulling her hand off mine, "and appreciated, however I am fine for the moment. I do not need to rest."

Shrugging, I chuckle at the dry ice wall she mounts in defense. "Yeah, just overload yourself and faint in the middle of work, why don't you."

Which of course makes her frown. "Are you insinuating I'm-"

"Why have you not being eating your dinner? What was up with your speech? Why were you wobbling so badly when grabbing the book? You must have been taking something that's not exactly helping you out. Oh, and 'powder milk' is not a valid answer, by the way."

"And why not?"

"I know you only drink your coffee black, and the only thing you add to it is liquor." I affirm, arms folded and nodding.

"… I may be different to the other Yuukos you met."

"Oh, really? Want a cup with cream and sugar, then?" I ask, smirking at her twitch, the slight purse of her lips she does when repulsed by something.

"Ugh… Why are you being this bothersome today of all days? I don't have time for this." She places a hand on my shoulder, trying to force me to move away. I don't, she doesn't have the strength to push me away, so we're again staring at each other.

"You need to rest, Yuuko. Even if only a little."

Rolling her eyes, ruffling her hair, she takes a step back. "Convince me, then. What is the pressing matter that has you being this obnoxious?"

Giving her a side glance, I lean on the door frame. "Besides the fact that I need you to look over the guards tomorrow if the mock battle goes wrong, you mean? Besides the fact that if I hadn't been there you'd have given quite the smooch to the ground or getting an encyclopedia to the head?" She frowns, fire arrows seeking the ground. Yet, she says nothing. Sigh… "Yuuko, you need to start taking proper care of yourself. One thing is min-maxing your schedule and staying up to finish something urgent, but you have to delegate some projects and reports. What's half an hour at first is then one full hour, then it turns to two, then you're not sleeping, and then we have today. Is a short nap that much to ask out of you? Don't you deserve that little?"

Eyes close, her voice again freezes over. "I believe you should know there's much only I can handle in this base."

"Yeah. And what happens if you're out cold? You do know that if you pass out, it will only hurt you more? Come on, I'm not asking you to sleep four hours or six. Just a little nap and that's it."

"And why, again, should I listen to your suggestion?"

"It's for your own good, as well as for the future of the children that will come."

Raising a brow, she then smirks for some reason. Then starts leaning a bit closer, tapping her lips with a finger. "So, we're having kids now? Because last time I checked, we aren't fucking each other."

"Wh- It was a turn of phrase!" In the second I flinched, she moved forward. Almost squeezing past me, I had to throw myself against the door to block the exit.

"Tch… Aren't your reflexes top notch, Shirogane?"

"Sigh… Damn it all, Yuuko. Do you have a death wish or what?!"

"You're literally keeping me here against my will."

" Because you can't neglect your health !" Shaking my head, I sigh. Emptying everything, a void in the pit of my stomach, in my heart. As it did when I had to leave, despite how you were as you are now, barely hanging together, forcing your strings to move. "You can't do your best in your work to save humanity if you're constantly relying on coffee and… those substances to keep you awake through the day. And I know part of your extra duties are because of me this time. Because of that, I'm not leaving this office until you do go to sleep." I then nod, planting myself on the door frame again.

She takes a step back, arms folding. "And what if I call security?"

"What if you fall on your head due to a lack of sleep?"

"What if you fail the mock battle due to a lack of sleep?"

"Then, you can go to sleep now, so that I can also go to sleep later."

"… I could go back to work as soon as you leave the office. I still have much work to do, you'd understand."

"And I can help you with some of that, even if it's only the simple stuff. Two hours you sleep are worth more for humanity's future than two hours I lose of sleep today, right?"

"And, again, why should I listen to you?"

"I dunno, to ensure you tackle the 00 Unit's matters when you're properly rested. What if you miss something due to a headache, and that ends up spiraling out of control like in my last loop? Are you at the top of your game to handle humanity's salvation? Because the 00 Unit needs you at one fucking hundred percent, you know. If there's any leaking of data, the base is going to get thrashed again, let me remind you."

I know Yuuko wouldn't normally drop her game, but if she's this tired and so focused, almost desperate, to reach her goals, she might just force herself to stay awake until she sees it all bear fruit with her own eyes. Fuck, that might have been why the data leak happened last loop. Maybe Sensei didn't review everything as thoroughly as she would have if she had enough sleep, and that's why she missed something in the equations I brought from my world.

"Are you… saying I could… Oh." Her eyes again widen as she brings a hand to her face. Shortly after, her eyes fall down like an avalanche, it's as if she were about to erupt alive. "That's… true, I suppose."

"Can you at least rest for a while, just a short while? Please, Yuuko?"

Staring at each other, feeling water trickling down my nape as she says nothing for a long while, I gulp and hide my hands on my pockets. Eventually, she sighs, shrugs and ruffles her hair.

"You think you're able to be of use to my research, then?"

Sigh… Thank God, she didn't refuse. "Again, I don't believe I'm completely useless. I can cover your back while you take a short rest. It's… the only thing I can do to repay you for all the trouble my presence is making." That, too, is taking its toll on your shoulders. And in this more radical world, too. She did once say… that me being here made her life hell, when she snapped and threw her papers at me. There's little I can actually do for you, but I'm enough to give you a few hours of rest.

Holding my gaze again, she then rolls her eyes. "Fine. But if you make any stupid mistakes-"

"I won't, XO. I'll limit myself to do what little Yuuko taught me in the other loops."

One of her brows twitches, "I… taught you stuff?"

"Well, just how to help you with the reports and other stuff. Nothing too complex, some simple assistant training is all it was. I'm no Kasumi, but I can defend myself." Puffing my chest a bit, I nod to myself.

Her eyes narrow as do her lips, which also quiver a bit. "And why didn't you mention that until now, Shirogane?"

"Because you never asked me to help you." I eye her sideways as she groans.

Slowly walking away, she takes off her lab coat, leaving it in a hook on the wall. "I want a report on what you learned then, also coffee when I wake up."

"… And something to eat with it, right?"

Recoiling a bit, she pats one hand into her waist, eyes blazing again. "Shut up. Just do… I will accept your offer, this time. If you don't handle this well, I swear I'm-"

Speaking from my stomach, I take a step forward and stand in attention. "I'll simply arrange the reports for you and note down anything that might happen while you rest. I'm not stupid, I won't mess with the programs you're leaving in the background."

"… Fair enough. Don't make me regret this decision, Shirogane. Now, off you go."

"Sigh. Fine… Just rest well, okay?" Can't help but to wince a bit, turning around slowly as if I had an iron ball tied to my feet.

"Why are you upset, again?" She asks, sounding sour. I turn back, she's sporting a small frown and her arms are once more folded, "I don't recall since when I gave you permission to look after me, so you should be grateful I'm accepting your offer instead of calling for security. Clean that expression off your face." Fierce as always, despite the minute quiver in her lower legs. Trying too hard to stay strong, despite how she must be far beyond exhaustion.

"I just-" No, don't be stupid. She isn't who you remember her as, it's obvious she'd only have scorn to return your worry . Just take the loss. "Sigh. Whatever. See you in a few hours, XO."

"Why are you so upset, again? I am going to be resting." She says, pacing towards the bed, starting to unbutton the uniform.

"… A simple thanks was enough, you know. Just thanks, and then I leave the room." I shrug, shaking my head.

"It's your fault for placing such expectations on me." Then, she again taps her chin, chuckling for some reason with a smirk. "Oh, you wouldn't happen to miss that other me you 'took care' of? Don't tell me… Is that why you're so antsy and worried now?"

Standing by the door, not facing her, the door frame might have scars when I lift my hand. Head keeps lowering, as if I again were under the cold shower. So, I can only whisper back, " If I said yes… Would you laugh at me? "

"… Huh? W-What did you-"

"Nothing, forget it. Later." Stepping away, I grab the knob and start to close the door.

"Shirogane," She calls back from within the room, out of sight.

"What?" I answer, standing still a few feet outside the room, not closing the door fully, not looking back.

"… Thanks. Look after the paperwork, and direct any calls to a later hour. You're too tired to handle anything else properly."

"I know, I won't put your research at risk, XO. Anything else?"

"Feel free to order some food if you want, put it on my name."

"Ha! That's rich, coming from you at this time," Chuckling, I look back with a smirk.

"Wh- You have some nerve…" She says, choking the tie as she frowns, her skirt falling on its own.

Nodding her way, I rise a hand to salute her lazily, "I'll be fine, XO. I still do have some leftovers from my rations."

"I see. That's all, wake me up in one… two hours."

"Got it. Sweet dreams, Yuuko."

"Shut up!"

Smiling at rising lava, I simply close the door before she chooses to throw something at me. Turning around, I slowly walk away back to the office.

Dragging my feet, my gaze. Opening and closing a hand, the one that grasped hers. Feeling the lingering warmth on the fingertips, the faintness of her touch. How pale she was, and she still was willing to keep on hacking at it. Were you always doing this, Yuuko? Was that routine in Sendai your usual life all this time?

At least she accepted to rest. Hopefully, she won't keep punishing herself in this way. Sigh… Again, on the things that matter the most, I can't really help. Just sort some papers, do small things. I guess I should be thankful she gave me the benefit of the doubt, even if it was only because she knew how exhausted she really is.

"Well, I've work to do, I guess." Cracking my neck and knuckles, rolling up my shoulders and taking a deep breath, the cold blanket falls off me. Let's get cracking.

---

Around two hours later.

(Yuuko's room.)

[Yuuko]

---

"Yuuko, can you hear me?"

Mmgh… Rustling under the sheets, something grabs my shoulders. Who the hell is bothering me now? Ugh… What hour is it, even?

"Yuuko. Earth to Yuuko. It's been two hours."

Slowly, a circle is drawn on my shoulders, reaching for my neck. Mmh… Feels nice. When was the last time I got a massage again?

"Come on. Vice Commander, don't blame me if you don't wake up, okay? It's been two hours."

Why did the hand stop? Ugh… Right, work. What was I doing before sleeping? There was the mock battle, the papers of the research… and then, Isumi's call. And…

Shirogane.

Blinking fast, stretching my legs, feeling the stiffness in my ankles, something reaches me as I yawn. The smell of coffee, close by.

"You awake now?" Shirogane asks, at the edge of my vision.

"… Yes. What hour is it?"

"2339. Oh, scratch that, it's forty." He says as he looks towards the clock. Taking a few steps towards the door, he looks back at me with a smile. "I'll be cleaning up my work."

"Wait."

"Hm? What is it?"

The smell, the color… He made the coffee just as I prefer it. There is a slight problem with that, though.

"Shirogane, did you use liquor in the coffee?"

"Yeah, the one that's in your safe."

"Wh- How did you open it?"

"You told me the code. Well, not you, but, you know what I mean," He says, shrugging. "I thought you'd like that after the nap."

"… Thanks. And," Looking by, there's a tray with toast, a fried egg, some rice, and diced chicken, "you had this done?"

"I called the PX, told them you wanted something simple to eat, and had them bring it here. Told them I was helping out due to the punishment when they asked why I received it, so don't worry, they won't ask any questions."

"I see."

"Anything else?"

"No, go back to the office." He nods, turning around and closing the door.

Now that I'm alone, I rise both hands upwards. Loose and stiff at the same time, I yawn strongly enough to move part of the sheets for a brief moment. Simply laying on the bed as I drink the coffee, as the slightly bitter taste fills me and a tender fire burns my throat, is like floating along the clouds. Rubbing my eyelids as I eat what he left me, my ankles do circles onto themselves, the small knots still hurting a bit as I do. Yawning again, slipping off the bed, I fill my lungs with air. And as I dress up, leaving a hand on the base of my neck, I no longer feel my heartbeats echoing and echoing. It is rather…

"Refreshing." I conclude, running a hand on the back of my head. The heaviness that lingered there is no more, and at the mere thought I can recall what I was doing before going to sleep, throughout the evening.

There's nothing clogging my throat, no cold sweat, nothing sounding in the back of my hearing. Yawning one last time, cleaning a tear that comes out, my neck moves in circles, in circles. Calmness, focus. Merely bringing a thought back causes the numbers to surge forth. Clear as the sky, still as a lake. No counterweight attached to my back, I'm… calm, I suppose.

"I suppose, you were right, Shirogane. Sigh… I should be over this kind of mistakes."

Despite not noticing it myself, the more tired I grow the worse I'll perform. I may be a genius, but I have my limits. Perhaps, his idea of how tachyons are also affecting me does hold some water. And, he did ready a meal I'd favor despite my words towards him. I had thought he merely admired that other me he gave a pass to, yet those reactions tell an entirely different story.

I suppose I should start taking into account his emotions and how could he react to my own actions. I'd be a bother if he tries something like what he did before a second time. Plus, it's for my own benefit, to appease him so that the Nucleus stays undisturbed. Considering what's ahead, I shouldn't have lashed out so much. Sigh… Proof enough that I was in need of rest.

Putting on my lab coat, walking back to the office, something echoes in the distance. Is he… humming? There is some rhythm to the noises, he is humming a song. Don't tell me he isn't taking this seriously. Speeding up, reaching the door that connects to the office, I find Shirogane tidying up a few stacks of papers.

And the rest of the office is also now tidied up. The books organized by the walls, the papers on the opposite end in stacks of different heights, which are divided by small walls of cardboard. Even my desk has half the amounts of papers I left in it.

"Baa bariras… latititi rastis…" And he's still singing, slightly swaying as his hair flutters. When did his hair grow so much, though?

"Shirogane?"

"Oh, hey." Giving a pat to the stack, he nods my way. "Feeling better?"

"Yes, thanks. However, I'd like you to never again pull something like that, Shirogane." I remind, low, glaring his way.

He merely gives me a side glance. "Start taking care of yourself and I won't have to."

All I'm willing to do is roll my eyes. Sitting back, noticing the papers I was going to start reading are right besides me, that the supplementary material is also close by, and that the right books are right where I would place them, I simply blink at the state he left my desk in. It's almost as if I had cleaned it myself.

"Uh, is something wrong?" He asks, brows curving, a hand rising to the back of his hair. As he always does when he's nervous.

"No, I was merely seeing you tidied up my desk well enough." Straightening myself, interlocking my hands, I then look his way. "Shirogane, report your work thus far."

Standing in attention, he looks to the shelves nearby. "I prepared all the reports that you had lying around. They're all in a proper folder, with the right sticker and destination. Those who were for you, I stashed them in the upmost rows of the shelves. Is that alright with you?" He asks, lowering his head a bit, making his fringe flutter alongside him.

"Yes, it's fine." It's where I always leave them.

"Also, as you can see, I rearranged all the papers you had lying about."

"And, what did you do with them? Some of those papers hold key intel for my research, you know."

"Yeah. I just filtered them with the signs and called it a day, didn't have the time for anything else."

"The signs?"

"You know, those odd doodles you make."

"Wh- Those are not doodles! They're symbols of my-"

"Yeah, whatever. I put them all in order, there's a mark in the cardboard to show you which stacks are from what." He takes a step back, letting me see the markings he put in the cardboard walls that separate the papers. He even nailed my signs, too. "Really, why are those things so weird? Even my world's Yuuko did those doodles."

"She did?"

"Yeah, for real. She once had me print her thesis, and those odd things were everywhere in the pages. That's how I actually recognized the theory during last loop."

"Huh? Why?"

"Because only you would use those doodles alongside the equations."

Inhaling sharply, I lean back onto the seat, clamping my lips. "Fair enough. Did anyone call while I was asleep?"

"Yeah, your other sister did."

"Motoko-nee? What did she say?" If it's from her, then it means it's tied to the 00 Unit. I… I needed to answer that call!

"Don't worry, Yuuko. I told her to send you a mail with all the details since you were resting." He says, waving his hands down as if trying to put out a fire.

"Is that so?" Quickly restarting my laptop, a few clicks open my inbox. And there it is, after some scrolling down. 'Take care of yourself, Yuu-chan' is written on the mail. Siiigh… This is the last thing I needed. Wait, if it was she the one who called… Looking at Shirogane, he stands there, returning my gaze. Furrowing his brows when I say nothing. "Did she ask you anything, by the way?"

"Huh?"

"Motoko-nee, did she ask you anything?"

"Oh, yeah. Why was I answering the phone, she then chuckled when I told her you were tired and needed a second to rest."

"And nothing else?"

"No, I told her you forbid me from speaking of anything not related to work and she dropped the questions," He says, nodding to himself, puffing his chest out. How silly of you, to feel proud for that.

Still, you made the right call. Motoko-nee wouldn't have stopped the questions if she had the chance. "I see. Is there anything else you want to report?"

"Actually, there is." He says, folding his arms, the prior cheer melting into a serious expression. "I took a look at the Valkyries' trainings in Valgern-On while I was tidying up the papers and the books, and I think I know why they're having so much trouble in the Stallion."

"You do? What is it?" Leaning my chin on my interlocked fingers, I stare at him. Shirogane then points to my PC, to something that was running. Bringing it to the front, a few lines with some sort of letters fill the screen. "What is this supposed to be?"

"The inputs of the games. See, these are the button presses they made during the course of the trainings. Took me a while to get them from the shared files on multiplayer mode, thank God the controllers are made in image of the TSF's ones."

"So, what is the issue?"

"What I just told you." He shrugs, sighing heavily for a moment. "When I compared 'em to my own control logs, I found that there was actually not much of a difference between some of my movements with theirs. But, for some reason, the joystick I brought from my world is more sensitive than the controllers we made here."

"And this means… you can perform more movements than them?"

"Not only that, but faster as well. There might be even some moves I can pull off, thanks to the config of the Stallion's original joystick, that they cannot execute. That's why their techs are slower than mines, why I could dodge and attack better. The small difference was giving me an edge." He concludes, covering his mouth as he seems to yawn.

"I see. Is there something you believe can be done to mitigate this?"

"Why not abuse this, instead?" He smirks, slightly leaning forward, fired up.

"What did you have in mind?"

"Well, if the sensitivity of the controller is what allowed me to best the Valkyries despite being playing around, what if we replicated this with the TSF?"

"… So you'd like to have the liberty to customize the sensibility of the controls, to grant you more freedom of movement?"

"Something like that. The XM3 does this through software by reworking how the inputs are taken, but what if we also made a control scheme that would benefit from the XM3 to its fullest?" He asks, raising a fist, shining eyes. "And you don't even need to rework much, we can implement this through the feedback interface by having the machine adapt to the pilot's quirks and adjusting the controls' sensitivity during training. All we'd need is hardware that can support that function. Of course, we'd have to rework the inner motherboards of the controls, and make sure the extra sensitivity doesn't send anyone flying away into a building, but-"

"It's not that hard to achieve, what you speak of." Quickly typing on my keyboard, the files appear in my monitor. He remains gaping for a second, surprised into stillness. "Take a look at this unit."

"That's just a Shiranui with different paint, Yuuko." He says, low, arms folding as she gives me another side glance.

"No, this is a Type-1C. It's the latest Shiranui model available."

"The latest? Are the ones we have on the base older?"

"Yes, the ones we have are from the fist batch, Shiranui-1A. The rest of the Empire probably has B models by this point. There aren't great differences between the first and second batches, only fixing some minor design flaws, polishing the connectors or the jump units. But the 1C is different, it has an OS that sort of does what you have in mind now. It allowed the pilot to regulate the output of the craft, even during live battle."

"Huh?! For real? Why haven't I heard of this?"

"You haven't? Truly?"

"No, not even on my other loops." He then groans for a moment, scratching the lower end of an ear. "I think… there were talks of another TSF from the Empire at times, which I guess is the Shiranui Second you mentioned before, and how they didn't want to lease it to the UN. But I haven't heard of the 1C or this special OS. Why isn't it the standard unit?"

"Because the quirk was too hard to adapt to. Only a few veteran units managed to tame it. Disabling the shifting made it easier to control, but at that point it was better to just build B models, since they were cheaper. It was a test bed for the technology, and due to bad reception it got canned." Kicking the floor, I start to spin. Slowly, a smile rises in me. "However, perhaps there is a way in which we can gain access to one of these."

"Really?"

"Yes. After all, the 1C is the basis from which the Shiranui Second is built upon. The leader of the XJF Project is already here, working on the railgun. Maybe, we could convince the Empire to fork over the 1C as well."

"So, you think we can feasibly have adaptable hardware options like the ones in the 1C?"

"In time, yes. We do possess many things which the original dev team of the 1C lacked. An OS with the processing power required to make the spec shift shine in the XM3, many test beds to bring the controls up to modern standards thanks to the ongoing developments we have going thanks to the intel you brought. And, most importantly," I stop spinning, smirking his way as I place a finger on my chin, "we have a fitting test pilot that not only understands the quirks but can bring them to life with ease."

"You really do like to send me on hard missions, do you?" He scratches the back of his head, looking up. Hesitant or embarrassed? Matter not, I only spoke the truth about your skills, ace pilot.

"Well, you are a veteran, after all. Is the man who bested all of my Valkyries scared of his own ideas?" I ask, giggling as he closes his eyes.

"Sigh… No, it's just, you know, kind of daunting after this morning," He says, or rather whispers, as he leans on the sofa.

No, he's supporting himself onto it. Eyes half open, only now do I notice the redness below them. Of course, he also must be exhausted. He did plenty while I rested, let's send him to sleep.

"It's just an idea for the moment. Don't think about it too much. You did enough today, Shirogane. You may return to your cell."

"Yeah… I think I'll do just that." He then yawns widely, letting me see the end of his throat as he stretches his arms up. Was he this tired all this time? Then, why did you insist on letting me rest? You idiot. Saluting me halfheartedly, he turns around and waves, "Well, I'll be taking my- Oof!" Instead of walking straight, he drifted left, hitting his feet on the shelf.

"Hey, are you alright?"

"Y-Yeah. Don't worry, just- Yawn. Just a bit tired." He nods my way, yet when he begins to walk, he drags his feet. Wobbling, holding his head, slower than a snail or Yashiro when carrots are on the menu.

He's the one exhausted now, huh. Perhaps, having to use his pull to recall what that other me taught him caused such tiredness in him? No, I had him going from one place to the other all day long. A mock battle first thing in the morning, the recovery session, the meeting, then his work in his office to later be sent to the Valkyries. No wonder he's ready to faint.

And despite that, he insisted I slept first.

… That aside, he looks truly out of energy. Well, nothing he can't shake off with proper sleep.

What if he runs into the guards on his way back to the cell? That might be a problem, but then again, it is late already. I don't think they'd be up and about at this hour considering there's a mock battle tomorrow. On the other hand, some spiteful idiotic soldiers could ambush him.

Siiigh… He's in no shape to do anything, that's true. And considering what's coming up tomorrow…

"Uh, Yuuko, could you unlock the door?" He asks, scratching his head as he looks back at me.

… A small mercy, as thanks for letting me sleep and handling his work nicely.

Standing up, I point to the sofa. "You're sleeping there tonight."

"Huh?"

"You heard me. You're clearly exhausted as of now, and if the guards or any hostile soldiers run into you, it could get you into quite the problem. So, I'll have you rest here."

"Um, you can just call an MP to escort me back to the cells, right?" He says, looking up, away from my eyes.

"It's too late, and I don't want to deal with any explanations right now. I have work to do, so shut up and lay on that sofa."

"Are you sure?"

"What did I tell you to do?" Grasping my chin, squinting my eyes, I take a few steps towards him.

"Fine, fine," He shrugs, sighing. "Sorry, I'll try to wake up as soon as possible."

"Don't worry, I'll have you up early enough. Now, lay there. I'll be back in a second."

"Wait, where are you going?"

"To get you some sheets, of course."

"Huh."

"… What is it with that reaction?" Can't help but to frown, taking a step towards him.

"No, it's that during last loop you had me sleep here once, but you didn't give me a sheet or anything." He says, nodding, rubbing one of his eyes.

"As I've been telling you, I am not those other versions of me you met before. Remember that well." Holding his gaze for a moment, once he nods back I go towards my room.

The nerve of him, to try and refuse my offer. He's been nothing but help to me, despite a few moments of annoyance. Giving him some cover is not even a grand gesture. And, I need you in full focus tomorrow. Otherwise, all the preparations will be for nothing. If you stood your ground against me, despite also being exhausted, then all the more reason to have you well rested for tomorrow. Plus, he deserves the reward. Shirogane did a fine work while I slept.

Twisting my lips at the foot marked on the door as I open it, my hands reach for the switch. Opening the closet, crouching and rustling the things a bit, my hands bring out a simple standard issue sheet. Well, this should be enough. It isn't particularly cold, after all. Yes, I suppose this shall suffice.

…

But perhaps a second one would be welcomed, considering he's been sleeping in the cells for a while now. Also, do I have a spare pillow? Standing on the tip of my feet, I do find one in the back of the top row. Alright, this should prevent any odd cramps in his neck or anything of the sort.

Slapping the doors closed, once I turn off the light I return to the office, carrying the three things.

"Shirogane, I brought- Huh?"

As soon as I sat foot back in the place, I heard a small, drowned sound. Snoring, quiet yet constant. Walking up to him, tapping his shoulder, Shirogane doesn't react. Slumped on the sofa, one hand dangling to the floor, he was already asleep.

"Sigh… And then you have the gall to tell me to rest when I'm exhausted. You didn't even take your boots off." Seriously, you were planning on walking back to the cell like this?

Shaking my head, I slowly place a hand on his chin, lifting his head. Pushing the pillow under him, he barely even moves. Crouching by his side, untying his boots, I grab both feet and tuck them into the sofa. Standing up, the sheets envelop him whole, and my hands press on his side to ensure they won't fall off. Bringing that runaway hand under the sheets, making sure his feet were well covered, I finally sigh, seeing that he was made into a comfortable cocoon.

His breathing steady, his face relaxed, Shirogane sleeps without a care in the world. I wonder, will you also dream of memories from days past? I hope not, at least enjoy one night in peace. You did enough today.

Twirling his hair, coiling his bangs on one of my fingers, I hadn't noticed yet how much his hair had grown. He isn't even taking care to maintain a proper hairstyle, I bet. Such a powerful performance, to endure the toll of an ESPer in the Mindseeker. Such resilience, to have kept your cool during the meeting despite what you remembered. Even in front of me, since you saw parts of that mission. And looking around, you truly did a good job in so little time.

Even managed to present me a better breakfast than I've had in quite some time. Maybe, I should have you doing my coffee from now on. Heh, there are more important things to handle, however.

And yet, you're sleeping soundly. I thought he was going to snap at me, perhaps demand something ridiculous, yet you keep on surprising me despite the change you made me do to my schedule.

"I swear, you're such a high maintenance unit," I let go of his hair, smiling. Tapping one of his cheeks with a finger, I lean over to whisper to his ear, "Have a good night's rest, Shirogane. You're gonna need it. Hehehe…"

Nicks in the Edge

A/N: Instead of following the end of the prior entry, this chapter starts back with the rest of the cadet squad, whose last appearance was in chapter 47. Don't worry, I won't take twenty chapters just to detail the events of a single day again, in the short term.

That's all for now, so I bid you welcome to the Mock Battle Mini-Arc™. Hopefully, both old and new readers will find things to look forward in this rewritten version of this part of the story.

Also, thanks to all those who commented on last chapter! I was really on the fence on Yuuko's part in it, on how to have her rest well while not having her react OOC, so it was a relief to see I didn't mess that up. I've been busy IRL, so I couldn't reply to anyone yet. Also, to that one commenter who said Cannonball might play in the fic at one point… (͡° ͜ʖ ͡°).

As always, thanks for reading. Stay safe.

Zuoriel

---

Chapter 67:

Nicks in the Edge

---

December 2nd. Around 07:30 PM.

(Yokohama Base. Library.)

[Meiya]

---

"Then, you'd prefer us to engage in suppression efforts?" I ask, leaning onto the table.

Tamase nods, her shoulders compacting slightly as she points to a book, "If Takeru-san starts moving too erratically, I won't be able to shoot him down. His constant changes of direction and speed make it hard for the auto-lock to pinpoint his position accurately, after all."

"And missing your shot will expose you to the other team, huh," Yoroi then sighs, placing both hands behind her head. "Do you really think we could hold him down for even a second?"

"Just tumble him down," Ayamine nods to herself, not lifting her sight from the book she and Sakaki were reviewing. "Special-kun is terribad when it comes to regaining his footing, so use that to screw with his moves."

"Terribad?" I can't help but to fold my arms, stare at her firmly. Why would Ayamine be using such odd wording?

"I guess it means being horrible at something, I dunno," she then shrugs.

"Sigh… We really need to tell Shirogane-kun to tone down those odd words he always uses," she says, tapping her glasses as she frowns ever so slightly. "In any case, we won't know which formation the Instructor will decide to employ until the last moment. Regardless of our own individual progress, the match will be decided by which team can support or neutralize Tamase and Shirogane-kun the best. So, why don't we reread the notes we took during our prior session?" She asserts as she runs a hand over the book, looking at all of us in the eye for a moment.

Of course, I return a smile as I nod back, as does everybody else. Thus, once more bringing books and lone pages to the center of the table while we huddle and lean closer to it, we start rereading the notes we have been taking so far.

Yet, my sight veils itself momentarily and I have to take a deep breath. The talk I had with Master and Tsukuyomi a few days ago had revealed that this coming mock battle won't have us pitted against each other, after all. Knowing that I shall be facing mine own old retainers tomorrow is enough to cause delays in my breathing, it makes my knees quiver in anticipation yet it also brings forth stillness and doubt. If all of us are to spar against Tsukuyomi and the trio, then Tamase might become a target, Sakaki herself also might. My lips simply shrink and twist inwards, merely pondering the outcome of any grave unpleasantries being hurled to them is plenty enough for my stomach to shudder. Almost as if I had stepped outside barefooted, running my feet onto the cold soil of the track field. Not only my presence will impair our training, but also place my squadmates in quite the precarious position. But, above all else…

Slowly moving the pages, where what he had imparted to us after his bout with Sakaki and Ayamine laid written, I can merely stare at the words. Not reading them, not even trying to, I only look at the paper, running my fingertips over the ink amidst the silence of the library. Crossing a leg, resting my chin on a hand, it does little to ease the minute, faint numbness on my back and neck.

What will be of you, Takeru? Despite your aid to Tamase, despite your efforts to bridge the rift that separated Sakaki and Ayamine, there are still whispers speaking ill of you. Yesterday, you were most certainly absent during the lecture despite being physically present. He does tend to lose his gaze towards the clouds at times, yet I've never seen Takeru absorbed into his inner thoughts to such extent. Whatever this punishment is forcing upon your shoulders is starting to show its mark, I'm certain.

However, Tsukuyomi did warn me. You may not be an ally, but a spy instead. Yet, that tired smile as you referred to Ayamine by name, the focused gaze on the floor as your steps didn't wane upon the whispers that followed us to the hangar, and even Tamase's words about how you tried to aid her overcome her fear, all of that tells a different story.

Reaching out for a pencil, gripping it too tightly, my strokes are too strong, too thick, and I have to erase them and sigh, start over again on my notes as we debate lightly while reading the manuals and control logs.

Tsukuyomi would never lie to me. Daizaburou-sifu would never try and deceive me over some petty misunderstanding. Then, what has made their gazes lock onto Takeru's back? Tsukuyomi did admit she was not aware he possessed a Minaru Kamui, and that she only acted as she did when she found me and Takeru arguing because she thought he had earned the favor of a member of the Guard. Apparently, she was not aware of the fact that his databases were lacking so much data then.

Hands stopping short, I rest the pencil and stand up. Excusing myself, I pace to a corner, grab a plastic cup and serve myself some water. Slowly drinking, leaving it in my mouth for a second before gulping it, feeling the coldness seeping through my throat, then I start taking a few deep breaths. Holding the air, counting the amount of inhalations, trying to move my neck and fingers, try as I might the distant shiver refuses to leave me. A small sound of static far in the background, a faint moment of blankness, an answer does not come forth. Dragging my feet back to the table, again I try and continue my notes despite Yoroi's concerned comment about the slowness of my movements. Which wanes as I say I am fine, replaced by her habitual smile as she asks me something about Takeru's jumping patterns.

Sigh…

If he's a spy passing as someone else then, what causes that glint in his eyes when speaking of his past? Could he be lying? No, how could I think such a thing of Takeru? If I agree on th e s e view s , wouldn't I be the same as those who would hurl defamation behind his back? He has had the temperance to forgive my misgivings, my shameful attitude. Certainly, he must have been very upset at my words after our first flying run, yet Takeru still was willing to let it slide. Unless, of course, he does so due to a mission as a spy.

Again constricting the pencil, again having to erase and redo my notes, answering Tamase's questions as her eyes couldn't fully meet mine, despite how she had the right answers all along, does not facilitate the pondering in the slightest. Even as Sakaki leans closer to ask me some pointers about CQC, even as I remind her to use the flat side of the blades when parrying, even then the shiver does not vanish from my nape.

It is my duty to the Empire, to remain ever vigilant. UN attire might I endow as of now, yet my heart has not forgotten who I must serve. I am forsworn to Her Highness, above all else. So, if Takeru truly is an enemy to my people, then little choice do I have but to strike him down. I have a duty and an obligation to fulfill, regardless of my personal views of him. Takeru has not yet shown any aggressive signs towards the Empire, even if he did murder those soldiers. Tsukuyomi, Mion and Shion went to have a talk with him when he was resting on the track field, yet he didn't seem tense in the slightest when I inquired about it. Concerned would be fitting to his complexion at the time, perhaps. And if he were a spy, would he truly be so relaxed around my person or Sakaki? Despite all that transpired during the CCSE, he's still being as friendly as when he had just arrived, even the odd chain of jokes he shares with Yoroi have not diminished at all.

… Uh, I'm going in circles all over again.

They might have asked me to keep an eye on him, yet I cannot find an answer. If he were to display signs of aggression towards the Guard, towards our values, then I'd have to notify his wrongdoings. Yet, he has maintained a composed attitude thus far. Tamase's relaxed and bright complexion, how Sakaki and Ayamine are studying together is proof of that. That we are discussing a possible mock battle in itself is a reminder that, had it not been for Takeru's actions, me and Sakaki would not have passed our test. Have I repaid him for that gesture? No, I have done nothing to that end, to truly pay back the debt I owe him. Even when he is suffering an unjust punishment I'm still thinking Takeru might be an enemy. I should be ashamed, I do not deserve Takeru's trust. As if what he asked of me was sufficient in any way to truly forgive what I did, what my weakness forced his hands to do.

" It's a beautiful name, that's all. I just think it suits you well."

Ugh, not again. Why did you have to ask such a thing of me? I cannot comprehend the reasoning, nor why is he still as composed as usual in my presence after all that has transpired. Do you possess nerves of steel or are you just oblivious?

… But, what if he were a spy? What if all this as just a ruse? Even if I am indebted to him, I cannot compromise my duties as someone who is supposed to safeguard Her Highness. The fact that he might have stolen a Minaru Kamui should be enough to have him executed. However, how does Takeru know of the Mugen Kidou? Then again, if Tsukuyomi says he isn't worthy of the blade, can he explain that himself? What could possibly have him refusing to speak of the matter? If Takeru indeed was… infatuated with the member of the Guard that gave him the blade, why is he showing such reticence towards Tsukuyomi and the cousins? He did mention that he had remembered something about his past, and was quick to smile and forgive my doubts. And… he also allowed me to refer to him by name, as well. Yet, I cannot deny that this could all be just a castle of lies.

And yet, were it not for him… I look up, at the calm exchange of whispers, at the pleasant string of scribbles. When was the last time we all could sit down and study together in this way?

"Just look at the radar. The battlefield doesn't follow a script," Ayamine says, sighing.

A finger makes rounds on the air as she leans back on the chair. "However, breaking formation would be even more dangerous. Especially against Shirogane-kun's acrobatics. Our radars can scan different distances and sounds for a reason."

"We're just gonna be sitting ducks against Special-kun's air jousting, better to be on the move just in case," she insists, pointing a finger to the control logs Yoroi had on her hands, where Takeru's sky diving maneuver was detailed. "And it prevents Tamase from locking onto us, too."

Tapping her glasses, she sighs, "I know that, Ayamine. But not all of us can move as nimbly as you do, and we have to stick together to keep him down. Also, we need to account for Tamase's marksmanship if we fight with Shirogane-kun. If we scatter, we could be easily fall to a pincer tactic." Shaking her head, she then lightly pats a small stack of papers, "I don't want any of us getting shot down carelessly during this mock battle. As the squad leader, I have to ensure our tactics of choice can let all of you perform at your best."

"Well, that's a first, alright," Ayamine says, smirking as she gradually brings a hand to a cheek, as if flabbergasted.

"Wh-Why, you-"

"Sakaki-san, she was just joking!" Tamase quickly speaks up and waves her hands frantically for a second, dropping her pencil in the process.

"No, but Chizuru-san has a point," Yoroi comments, still reading the pages she has monopolized. "If we don't take this seriously enough, our scores might suffer, right?" She then looks at us, Tamase nodding as she bends over to pick up her pencil, Sakaki brushing her hair as she calms down, Ayamine and me merely nodding slowly. Yoroi's eyes dive down into the page, scratching one cheek. "So uh, well, considering Takeru's score during the CCSE, maybe we could let him, Meiya-san and Chizuru-san take center stage?" She says, voice lowering with each word, elbows and shoulders growing closer to her person. "Of course, it' just an idea…"

"Nah, I think that's fine," Ayamine smiles, giving a thumbs up.

"Yes, I agree," Tamase also nods.

"Not like we can do much to actually neutralize Shirogane-kun in the first place," Sighing, she raises both hands in defeat.

I can't help but to chuckle along Yoroi at our squad leader's dejection. Nodding her way, I rest my hands on the table. "Well, while I do agree to some extent, are you certain of this? You three also must tend to your own scores," I ask, delving into their eyes. "Also, I do not wish you to hold back against me nor give me any advantages."

"W-Well… Sorry, it was just a thought," Yoroi whispers back, hiding her chin and mouth behind the papers.

"No, I was not faulting your proposition. It is just, purposefully lowering your own performance won't truly benefit us, in my opinion."

"We triumph and fail as a unit, right?" Ayamine says, low, as she folds her arms and nods. "Everybody has to do their share, but we can push you to show off what you do best. Plus, I'd be boring to have you three lagging behind in the scoreboard. What would that say of our squad leader?" She then smirks again, Tamase's and Yoroi's eyes widen as they flinch, wordlessly screaming once more, while I simply sigh.

"… Exactly, we must prioritize the victory of the squad," Sakaki nods, inhaling sharply through her nose despite how one of her brows seems to be twitching for a moment. "If you're all willing to let us show off a bit, I don't have any complains. But don't miss obvious shots just because you want us to get good scores. The Instructor will certainly notice that." And again, her finger draws a nebula on the air.

The others nod, and we go back to reviewing everything together, bringing our own notebooks to the center of the table this time while Tamase and Ayamine stand up to bring some water to the others.

But, Sakaki's words do right true. We must prioritize the squad as a whole, the good of the team above all else. In my case, that equals the Empire. So, if Takeru shows signs of being an enemy as Tsukuyomi said… Again, my fingers slowly veer away. Again, my strokes are mistaken and I have to erase and restart, sighing as I do.

"Are you alright, Mitsurugi?" Sakaki asks.

"Yes, pay me no mind. My fingers are prey to… anxiety for the moment, it would seem."

"Yeah, I can totally get what you mean," Yoroi also sighs, finally releasing the papers as she accepts a cup of water from Tamase. "I can't believe it's finally time for us to fight our first real mock battle."

"Doesn't feel real, right?" Ayamine smirks as she hands Sakaki a cup.

"Yes, I suppose that's true," Brushing her hair behind her ears and the glasses, she nods.

"D-Don't worry!" Tamase loudly says, braving a smile despite the shaking of her hands. "This is just the first practice run, right? We have time to mend any mistakes we do tomorrow."

"I agree," I nod with a smile towards her, her shoulders lower and relax as she nods back. "We shall be making many beginner mistakes, I'm certain. Still, that does little to assuage the anticipation."

"Yeah, same here," Sakaki nods, and all the others follow suit. "Well, let's not focus on that too much, alright?" She orders, arms folding. We again nod and resume our studying.

It is almost surreal, to think we can now share a table in this manner. That we can debate over what we fear might happen tomorrow, that I myself can be honest with them now. All thanks to you, Takeru. To how you always tried to support us, how you never bragged or ridiculed our efforts. Always smiling, only trying to fit in and aid us with what he had already learned. And yet… all of that might have been a lie. It makes my heart feel parched, my mouth dries up at the thought and my pencil again stops and once more Yoroi asks me if I'm tired. Shaking my head and inhaling sharply, I blink a few times before refocusing on the papers we're sharing.

Or at least, I try to.

… Did I not see Takeru's own pained face during the CCSE with my own eyes? He was clearly crying when speaking of whoever that 'someone' is. Whoever gave him the Minaru Kamui, whoever imparted him with such lessons, who has kept his gaze captive to this very day. Lips twist in, my feet entangle for the moment, and I support my chin on a hand as I explain to the others how I prefer to parry and counter while employing the melee halberds.

And yet, the shiver does not leave my nape in peace. What if he grows distant due to this doubtful attitude? Takeru did ask me and Ayamine to ignore him once before as I again grew suspicious of him. He has trusted in me, confided in me… Why am I hoisting such reticence towards Takeru when he has always been accommodating to my inquiries? Never has he looked at me differently, never has he tried to take advantage of me. All the contrary, he refused my aid when we met again after the CCSE, and he didn't take as much offense as he should have when I barged into his privacy and then confronted him over the Minaru Kamui. Perhaps, he only wanted to avoid any tensions by having me of all people defending him after the CCSE's incidents. Yet, that only shows his awareness, his determination to shoulder the blame on his own. I should be praising, supporting him, then.

But, Tsukuyomi and my own master in the art of the sword harbor doubts towards him. I suppose, despite my own afflictions towards it, this coming mock battle shall be a fitting test of character for Takeru. Under the pressure of the fighting, of their words, your true self will shine through.

Once we had all shared our own thoughts on the notes and discussed some more about possible tactics, we start tidying up our table. The manuals returned to their shelves, our notes safeguarded under our arms, we bow down and thank the clerk before taking our leave. The hallways are as quiet as the library, since it is almost time for the usual curfew to end. Yoroi stretches her arms up, her shoulders crack as she does, Ayamine yawns as she massages her nape while her steps slow down, and Tamase and Sakaki remain debating on some tactic to bait Takeru that they couldn't finish. We already had dinner, there is little left for us to do save rest. Eventually, we arrive at the barracks as per usual, giving our parting words when we do, Sakaki reminding us not to stay up too late before entering her room, again waving a finger in circles. We all nod to the others, and with one last word I open the door and enter my room.

And in it, in the silence of my privacy, I finally sigh and grimace as I flick the lights on.

I suppose, everyone is going to review the notes regarding Tamase's sniping and Takeru's eccentric maneuvers. Yet, as my boots drag themselves on the floor, as I lower my books onto my desk, my lips part to sigh once more. I cannot possibly sit to study in the shape I am now.

"And it is far too late for me to go for a jog outside." Not to mention, I might exhaust myself if I do. I couldn't even meet with Takeru today, Yoroi also said she wasn't allowed to visit his cell before we started our study session.

Still, to continue to repine over this matter overlong will certainly give me a headache. If I trust in Takeru, then I simply have to stand and watch. He can certainly clear all these misconceptions on his own accord. And I have to focus on my own trial, depending on how this battle plays out Daizaburou-sifu might choose to bequeath me with an opportunity to cross strikes with him and earn the title of Mugen Kidou Master.

Sigh… Inhale, deeply. Feel the air filtering into your stomach, feel it enlarge as you do. Do not tense your abdomen, let the air leave gently through your mouth.

Running my hands over my ankles, I sit on the floor. Crossing my legs, resting my hands on my lap, I look upwards while closing my eyes, while inhaling deeply once more. A small shiver, a stiff twinge of pain, a sign of tension on my shoulders as I move them up and down for some seconds. Tranquility, silence, peace as I breathe in, relaxed lips as I exhale.

"Within the warrior, only two roads are seen…" And while surrounded by this stillness, I chant our code.

For I must nurture my honor, to be able to distinguish which path I must take.

For I must nurture my valor, to bring luster to my mind for the trials that lay in wait.

For I must nurture my compassion, to safeguard Tamase and Sakaki should an issue arise.

For I must nurture my poise, to not lose myself to emotion were something happen regarding Takeru amidst the battle.

For I must nurture my honesty, to be truthful with myself should I be required to take action to shield my squadmates. Or face Takeru in these doubts my retainers hold.

For I must nurture my judgmental mind, for I am a blade and a shield, for I am to be Her Highness' guarding shadow.

"Pheeew…"

All that distorted my hearing, all that crawled on the background is no more. No ripples in my breathing, nothing interrupting the breeze as I exhale, no quiver anywhere in me. I am at peace, at least for the moment. I've done all I could, so I suppose I should be taking a shower and retiring to sleep soon.

As I begin standing up, my gaze wanders to my desk. A small hesitation, an infestation of doubt on my fingertips as they grab the small knob of a drawer and pull at it.

"Sigh… There is still one oath I must honor before I rest for the night," I take out the envelope, smiling as I do, as I sit down and bring the chair closer to the desk.

The vanilla scent it once had is no more, the pristine white now succumbing to a yellowish tint, and rugged edges meet my fingers as I run them over the envelope, where perfect flatness once was. I've treasured this letter with all of my soul, yet time has found its way to harm it. Again sighing, the air reaches my hands that barely hold the edges of the paper. My heartbeats echo within as I gulp, as my fingers gently part open the envelope, gently remove from within it the lone page, all I have left.

"… Two years, huh. Time certainly has passed quickly." And yet, here I am. Still unable to do anything substantial, to truly contribute to my nation and people.

However, rereading this letter once again, my legs rub against one another on their own accord. Smiling as I read, the words echo in me. While taking my time to traverse each paragraph, walking the terrain as opposed to taking a train, the turns of phrase and what they rekindle in me makes my heart leap momentarily, my stomach tenses on its own. Folding it slowly, as carefully as if I were sheathing my blade, once the letter has been safeguarded inside the envelope I bring it to my chest, holding it with both hands as I simply close my eyes and sigh once more.

"You were most certainly right. Even if it is time for action and not words, one must always be on the lookout for any small glimmer of hope that shines through. For those who aim to become a sword that smites evil from its root, our own veneer must remain undaunted.

Clear and sturdy as truth itself, as the light that always shines up above."

Smiling at it one last time, I safeguard the envelope in the drawer and seal the wood slowly. Sighing while standing up, I then rise both arms up as I start removing my jacket. No lingering shivers nor static is left in me as I continue to undress or as I walk into the bathroom, under the shower. It is not that a fair amount of sorrow hasn't returned with those memories, yet I refuse to allow that caustic venom to mire one of the few treasures I've been bequeathed with.

"Because it always made so, so happy to receive your presents and letters." So, I refuse to lose you to this poison.

Enjoying the relaxation that pours from above, I massage the back of my head, now free of the ponytail, as I rise my face to meet the shower. And so I stand, simply basking into the lukewarmness as I smile, as I repeat the words of my code, and that personal oath I made so many nights, so long ago when this letter, this last letter of yours reached my hands after that accursed August 5th. That faint light you gave me, when everything looked so very grim.

"… After all, if I am to safeguard Her Highness, if I wish to bestow a smile upon our future, I myself must be ready to do what's necessary, come what may."

---

Next Day. Around 7:30 AM.

(Yokohama Base, Ground Level. Changing Room.)

---

"So with that in mind, would you be willing to follow my plan? I know I'm imposing, however-"

Sakaki raises a hand, sighing, "It's alright, you don't have to explain anything else. And don't take this too hard, I don't think you're the only cause for this arrangement."

"What do you mean, Chizuru-san?" Yoroi asks as she sits down, starting to untie her boots yet not looking at either me or Sakaki in the eye.

"That it's clear our training course is meant to be harder, so I don't think it's odd to place us against commissioned pilots on our first mock battle," she notes, again tracing circles in the air. "Anyways, don't start thinking this decision was made solely because of you, Mitsurugi."

"I shall not," I answer, nodding back as I remove my jacket and open my locker. "However, please do let me take the vanguard. It's the least I can do to shield you from any… strong worded opinions the Imperial Guards might harbor."

"I'll be leaving that to you, then," Sakaki shrugs, taking off her glasses before unbuttoning her own jacket.

"So, um," Tamase asks, her gaze veering from me to the ground to a wall in quick succession, her fingers delaying the untying of her boots, "what should we do during the fight? All of our tactics were based for elements of two or three units."

"Can we split in two elements?" Ayamine asks, throwing her tank top into the locker, taking out parts of her suit. "Mitsurugi can act as bait for the Guards, to let another team strike at them from a blank point."

"I do not believe they'd be so easily deceived by such a simple tactic," I say with quite a dejected nod as I take off my own tank top. Not only we will have the trio, but Tsukuyomi and both cousins to contend with. They might be using Zuikakus for the most part, yet the experience they have will give them a clear advantage against us, even if we pilot Fubukis.

"We do have Tamase to keep them busy, until Special-kun can whack them with that air jousting thing he does," Ayamine asserts with a smirk, giving Tamase a thumbs up.

"Eh?! Ah, well…" And she again looks down, gently folding her clothing into her locker, lethargically taking off her suit as if a snail she had become. "I don't know if my skills are up to par with Royal Guards."

"Worry not, we shall be by your side, Tamase," I smile her way, nodding. "Why don't you cover my back during the battle?"

"Huh? B-But… But, you know, being who I am, they might take offense if you choose me as your partner."

"I assure you, there is nothing you should worry about. I shan't allow them to hurl any unpleasantries towards any of you."

"And if they do anything against you, we have the recordings to back our words up this time," Sakaki says, sitting down and putting the thin cover over her legs.

"I do not believe they'd try anything, yet I concur there is nothing we should concern ourselves with regarding them acting in a foul manner. So Sakaki, may I have Tamase as my backup?"

"Yeah, let's go with that. Yoroi, you're with Mitsurugi as well."

"Eh? Me?" Yoroi's hands freeze as she was pulling her arms into the suit, eyes widening. "But, you know, uh, wouldn't it be better if you cover her, Chizuru-san?"

"What are you saying? Your mid-range is more apt to cover Mitsurugi's charges. And if I go with her, then Shirogane-kun and Ayamine will lack a deterrent," She says, nodding to herself as she again spins a finger, then bends over to place her leg guards on.

"Sakaki, I do believe Yoroi's concerns are valid. Why don't you… place Takeru alongside me? I can ensure he does not employ any of those reckless maneuvers while keeping the guards silent, if need be."

As soon as she returns herself upright, Sakaki shakes her head. "Considering how they reacted against Yoroi when she touched… that unit, I don't think it's a good idea to put Shirogane-kun besides you. While all of us are Japanese, remember that he comes from America. After how those two were towards him during the CCSE, I think placing him with you will only serve to make him into a target."

"How can you ascertain that?" I ask, a small frown on me as the arm guards click into place, as each finger locks under the armor.

"I… do think Sakaki-san is right," Tamase notes, hunching over as she puts her shoulder pads in place. "Remember how those two were back in the island?"

"Yeah, they did come asking for Takeru, now that you mention it," Yoroi nods, running her hands over her body as she checks for anything out of place.

"Looked really pissed off, for some reason," Ayamine comments as she locks her shoulder pads firmly, then also checks all her joints and pieces.

I do the same, yet find nothing wrong with my setup. So, pushing the trigger, the suit tightens on me, the small startup sign projected into my eyes. Yet, I sigh and fold my arms. "That was only due to what transpired back then, nothing else. Still, if you deem it as an issue, I shan't object your decision, Sakaki."

"Thanks, really," smiling, she nods my way. Tapping her own trigger, her suit constricts onto her figure and she puts her glasses on once more. "So, since Ayamine is the only one who can match Shirogane-kun's antics, she'll be in his team alongside me. Is that okay with you?" She asks, tapping the rim of her glasses.

And receives a smirk and a thumbs up. "Don't worry, I'll keep watch over Special-kun's ass so that he doesn't get in trouble."

W-What? What did she say? Has she no shame?! To even hint that she'd be… No, focus on the battle. It is no time to be embarrassed by these petty discussions.

Turning around, closing the locker, I sigh one last time, then start inhaling deeply, slowly, until my stomach is full and I have to release all the air, the tension in me. "So Sakaki, you'll form a team with Ayamine and Takeru, while I lead Yoroi and Tamase?"

"Yes, sounds like a plan. Let's discuss this in more detail in the hangar with Shirogane-kun, though. Is everyone ready?" She asks, we all nod.

Closing the last lockers, we exit the changing room. Yet, the Instructor is nowhere to be found nearby. Instead, a slim woman with long hair, garbed in a formal dress with the insignia of a 1st Lt was platicating with Takeru, who had finished preparing before us as usual.

"Um, excuse me," Sakaki slowly says, taking a step towards the woman. Then, she seems to flinch. "Haruka-san?"

"Oh my, Chizuru! It has been so long!" The woman smiles widely, brightly, as she joins her hands and nods. Soft as silk is her voice, and her complexion is also most welcoming unlike most other soldiers I've seen. "How are you all? Faring well, I hope?" She asks, tilting her head.

"Yes, we're fine. But, uh, Haruka-san… No, 1st Lt Suzumiya, where is our Instructor?"

Did… she just say-

"Suzumiya?!" Yoroi shouts, blinking quickly, then rubbing her eyes, then again gaping at the furrowed brows of the woman. "Um, Ma'am, are you a relative of Akane Suzumiya, by any chance?"

The 1st Lt then giggles as she nods. "Yes, I am her older sister, actually. Thanks for having kept Akane company since the start of the year," she then gives us a small bow, still smiling.

"… Doesn't look like her, at all," Ayamine comments, arms folding.

"Yes, the Suzumiya we knew was far more…" My tongue traces the back of my teeth as I search for a proper word, "assertive and intense, one could say."

"Hehe, yes, Akane does tend to be a bit too energetic for her own good." Placing both hands behind her back, she then looks at us in the eye, one at a time. "Now then, are you all ready to depart for the hangar?"

"Uh, 1st Lt, where is the Instructor?" Sakaki asks again.

And 1st Lt Suzumiya flinches, then scratches one of her cheeks. "You see, I wasn't told that. It seems Sgt Jinguuji was called suddenly to a meeting, my captain had to come and take her personally. So she ordered me to guide you to your machines in the Instructor's stead. I was supposed to be reviewing some reports of some long trainings my squad did yesterday, so I'm honestly as lost as you are."

Sharing a gaze with the rest, the arched brows and twisting lips, the tension in their arms tells they too believe this is too odd.

"Well, are you all ready?" She asks, smiling bright once more.

"Yes, we are. Shirogane-kun, how about you?"

"As ready as I'll ever be, I guess," Takeru shrugs with one eye closed, leaving the wall.

"Then, please follow me," 1st Lt Suzumiya says, turning around and starting to walk.

We follow behind, silent. Tamase's gaze is locked onto the ground, Ayamine's straight ahead. Sakaki seems to be answering some questions from Suzumiya. In just some mere moments… my first true battle…

"Kinda feels like a dream, to finally have a real test on our Fubukis," Yoroi says, running a hand into her hair, sighing.

"Don't sweat it, Mikoto. It's just the first step on the stairs," Takeru comments, low, his gaze lost upwards.

"Yeah, I guess. But they sure chose to pit us against an impossible enemy," She forces a giggle, quivering as a tree in front of wild winds.

"I do agree. Facing off against the Imperial Guards in our very first fight does seem inappropriate," I say, arms folding. Time is of essence, I know, yet I believe they could have waited a few days to spar with me and my squadmates. Or they could have requested for a one-on-one with me, to avoid any eyes from noticing.

"It's how the dice rolled, can't do much 'bout that," He then sighs, lips contracting into a small circle. "Let's just do our worst, and whatever happens, happens."

Yoroi nods, yet the hands that caresses an elbow tells me she is still distraught. Even as she takes a few steps forward when Sakaki calls for her, Yoroi is still as stiff as the rest. I cannot blame them, considering how my retainers conducted themselves when unveiling the Takemikazuchi. However, unlike the others, whose fingers find no serenity, whose gazes remain almost vacant, lost in their inner currents, Takeru walks with strong steps instead. He seems to be again gazing upwards as he always does, yet as I come to his side I find brows molten near the quiet kindling within his eyes, causing markings to appear on his forehead. Redness under both eyes, the relaxed smile, the minute sway of his head is gone. Frozen as he walks, serious and tight is his posture. As he was during the CCSE, when we were about to face off against the cousins. Almost as if he again were enduring the pouring rain, his eyelids are almost closing.

Yet, his eyes… something in them… that glint… it's the same look he had, when he almost began weeping upon my questions after he had rescued us when we talked by ourselves.

Slightly, I take a step closer as we walk, tapping his shoulder, whispering, "Takeru?"

"Hm?" He merely moves his eyes to acknowledge my voice.

"How are you faring? Are you feeling well?"

"I'm fine, thanks for asking."

"Is that so."

… And yet, he keeps looking forward, saying nothing.

"Right, we had debated our formation while we were changing. Sakaki proposed for you and Ayamine to fight alongside her, while Tamase and Yoroi shall be with me. Are you in agreement with the arrangement?"

"Yeah." Again, merely nodding, still looking elsewhere.

"I see. Are you truly alright, Takeru? You look, well, rather worn down today." Half a step closer, half a step forward, I look at his face.

Yet, his eyes do not meet mine as he shrugs once again. "Yeah, I'm just a bit tired, is all."

"Were you overworked yesterday, perhaps?"

"No, nothing like that."

"Lack of sleep, then?"

"Nah, I slept enough."

"So then, is something the matter? You did manage to eat your morning rations, right?"

"Yes, yes, don't worry. It's nothing."

"Truly?" I stare, he looks at me for a moment.

Sighing as he scratches the back of his head, he again looks up. Yet, his eyes squint, constrict as he holds his breath. "Yeah, for real. It's nothing you should worry about."

Nothing I should worry about, hmm. Obvious it is that you're conflicted over something, yet you had no negative reaction when the Instructor informed us that we'd be facing Tsukuyomi and the rest before. Could he be concerned that he'd be made into a target? Or, exposed as a spy?

"Takeru," taking a step closer, again tapping his shoulder, I look into his eyes, "if there is anything you'd like to speak about before the battle, feel free to do so."

His gaze meets mine for some seconds, his nose move and twitches, as if inhaling, smelling something carefully. Yet, his bottom lips recedes inwards, as if he were biting it, while his upper body seems to grow stiff, solidifying into pure stone. "I'm fine, really. I'm just a bit tired since I had to rush out of my cell and hurry the breakfast, that's all." He then shakes my hand off his shoulder, his steps growing in speed, his heels crashing against the floor.

"… Was it something I said? Why are you upset now, Takeru?"

"I'm not. We should be focusing on the mock battle, Meiya." He looks back, that glint, that creaking light encrusted deep into his eyes once more. "Don't sweat it, I'm well enough to do my share."

… Why? Where is your usual cheer, Takeru? Why do you wince when I grow closer to you? Why do you refuse to talk? Is he simply nervous the Guard might believe he's using me as a shield? No, I said I'd believe in him and let Takeru prove his worth on his own if anything does happen.

Looking up again, the entrance of the hangar was already visible at the distance. Once we reached the open space, 1st Lt Suzumiya informed us we'd be riding our TSFs now, and we'd remain in them as they're taken to the ruins of the city in the support vehicles. It seems it's done in this way to acclimate cadets to the feeling of the rumbling and shaking, since that is how we'll move out for future missions on the sea by using a carrier, by remaining in standby within our own units right before an operation begins. She then tried to give us a small rundown of the mock battle's goals, the time limit we'll face, as well as the restrictions on the area we can move in. It makes sense, since once we're commissioned we'd be assigned to cover specific areas during a mission. Being aware of your surroundings and the limits of your task is crucial during battle.

Yet, no matter how slow she took the explanation, how she included other details or gave us some moments to debate our strategies, the Instructor did not return to the hangar.

"Well, the time is coming up. I suppose you should be boarding your units now," she says, giving us a salute. "Best of luck in your first skirmish, cadets."

"No, thank you for your time, ma'am!" Sakaki says, all of us saluting in unison. "Alright, squad! Let's get in the cockpits and start up the preparations."

"Roger!"

We all nod to one another, and everyone is quick to move to their Fubuki. Yet, again, my eyes veer away to the other end of the hangar. Where he stood, merely gazing at his Gekishin. Gripping the edges my unit, gazing into the cockpit, my heartbeats again clang against the base of my neck. I sigh, shortly and strongly, before hopping back onto the railway. As I walk towards him, Takeru doesn't even react. He's merely there, arms folded as he stares at his Gekishin, which seems to now be painted in a stronger hue of blue. Striking and imposing, as your aggressive stride.

"Are you feeling nervous?" I ask, once I'm close enough.

"… You could say that, yes."

"Takeru, are you truly fine?" Taking a step closer, turning to face him frontally, I stare.

"… Yeah." He answers slowly, barely moving his lips.

"Please, you do not look well in the slightest. What is the matter? Is it… related to how we're facing the Guard?"

"Huh?"

"Well, it would not be odd for you to, well, hold some anxiety as of now since we're going to be sparring against 1st Lt Tsukuyomi, after all that has happened."

"… Yeah, I guess." He shrugs, scratching the back of his head. "I ain't saying that doesn't worry me, it is a concern for real. But…" His arms fall, slow and apathetic as the last leaf of a tree, signaling the start of winter. Fitting, since his complexion seems to have frozen over. "I'm just feeling a bit down, is all."

"Why? Are you exhausted, perhaps?" Yet, he then looks my way, straight into my eyes. Holding my gaze, not even blinking, simply staring at me in silence, as if observing my every feature. Such fixation is frankly… a bit embarrassing.

"Sigh…" He then grimaces, hunching over. "I just had a weird dream, that's all. Don't worry, Meiya. I'll be fine."

"Is… that so?"

What is it with that reaction? Why was he looking so intently at me, only to then sigh in such manner? What does this even mean?

Slowly, he steps towards his machine. Tapping the button to open the cockpit, he steps back as the whirring echos and the compartment rotates until it's fully open. Yet, he doesn't enter immediately, he seems to be taking a deep breath now.

"Takeru?"

"Hm?" He looks back, raising a brow.

So I take a step forward, raising a hand and a smile towards him, "I shall be relying on your support today. I know not what plagues your heart, but know that you're no stranger here, Takeru. Let us do our best effort together, my fellow!"

He simply stares, in silence.

At my hand, then to the floor.

And as a frown appears in his face, he turns his back on me.

" Yeah, some fellow I am. They didn't care about him, imagine what I am to their eyes."

"Huh?"

It was only a whisper, words uttered under his breath. They weren't all that clear to my ears, yet… I've rarely heard him this upset. No, it isn't some meager animosity. It feels as that moment when he gripped my face as I had just awoken, when he reprimanded me. But, I heard it clearly. He referred to 'him'.

"Takeru, what is the matter? I… I do not remember doing anything to upset you."

He puts a feet on his cockpit, supporting his weight onto the steel with a hand. Refusing to turn back and face me. "Thanks for reaching out, Meiya. But I don't think the rest would agree on you calling me a fellow, and I rather not get in trouble with the Guard. Can you just let this be?"

"Why? You've done me enough favors to deserve the words."

"… Please, drop it. Let's not force any altercations today, alright?"

"If you so wish, I suppose. But, well, in any case, I shall be relying on you so do not hesitate to rely on me, Takeru."

Merely nodding, he enters his unit. Closing it without even sitting down, he does not turn back to look my way, or wave at me, or smile, or… anything. Vacant as a new moon night, dejected as he was during our first day together in the CCSE, after I reacted aggressively when we argued about the blade in the track field. What made him show such cracks?

I sigh and jog back to my Fubuki, to begin the preparations before the order for us to be ready arrives. He was fine, it seems. Takeru is only concerned with giving the guards any wrong signs, is all. Yes, that's all there is to this.

Entering my unit, bolting myself to the seat, the habitual checkups appear in my view.

Yet, I lean back onto my seat, folding my arms. Gripping my arm guards, crossing my legs, squinting my eyes tightly, so tightly my vision grows blurry and a warning comes into my sight. A reminder to keep my eyes open so that the laser projection remains visible during the startup sequence of my TSF.

Sighing, I can only allow myself to choke and bind my controls.

" Why did you refuse my handshake of fellowship, Takeru? Why were you so distraught at my presence? Don't tell me…"

---

Same Day. Some moments before.

(Yuuko's Office.)

---

"XO, I demand an explanation!" Sgt Jinguuji shouts with quite the searing frown hewn into her face, slicing the air with a wave of an arm.

"I just told you," Yuuko messes with her hair, shrugging. "I need those reports right now, and you have yet to present the detailed papers on what transpired when the HSST fell down."

"Why now of all times?" She takes a step forward, eyes blazing. "Not only you notified me of the Guard's involvement minutes ago, you plan to have me away during the battle? The reports can certainly wait."

Yuuko folds her arms, freezing a frown into her face. Firmly forwarding an icy blaze into her friend's gaze, she speaks from her stomach as she stands, "I am the one who decides whether they can wait or not. Thus, I reiterate my order to you, Sergeant. I want those reports in my desk by the 1000 hours mark."

"Then, who tends to the cadets during the fight?" She retaliates immediately, backhanding the air once more as a windmill hitting a small pigeon. Quite upset she is, you'd understand.

"Cpt Isumi here will take your place, don't worry. I've arranged everything beforehand, there is nothing you should concern yourself with," Yuuko asserts, simply and immutable upon the unchanging, unmoving frown in her friend's complexion.

"Yuuko, be serious! You can't simply take me off the training, much less when they'll be facing the Guards!"

"It's an order from your superior, Sergeant. Are you casting doubts on my judgment?" She asks, interlocking her fingers, her own small blaze meeting Sgt Jinguuji's.

"Guh… Come on, at least give me two hours to finish the reports. I can deliver them myself here if you want, there's no-"

"Marimo, can you please stop this?" She stands up, shrugging as she rolls her eyes. "I have deemed that Isumi should be in the mobile command post today for a reason. So, could you go tend to the reports? Thank you, I'll be waiting for them." She then grabs her mug and goes to the coffee machine, without waiting for her friend's answer or grabbing anything to eat. "Your unusual overprotectiveness is not required today. There is much riding on this battle reaching the port I desire it sails to, and your binding worry is only a deterrent to that end, Marimo. I do wonder how you'll handle this arrangement on your own, Shirogane," she muses within as she takes a sip of coffee, the smallest hint of a smile in a corner of her lips.

Jinguuji shares a look with Isumi, who simply sighs and shakes her head, standing still and expressionless as a mannequin. The Instructor then merely sighs while still frowning, standing upright and saluting her friend before stomping her way out of the room, arms knotting together into quite the tight lock. Once the door slides close, Isumi herself heaves a sigh as she walks up to the desk of the scientist.

"XO, is this truly for the best?"

"Are you going to start a speech, too?"

"No, it's just…" Isumi's starts coiling her hands, her brows begin to cross, "I believe both of us could have been present in the command post, ma'am. My presence will incite questions from the Guard."

"I'll simply say Sgt Jinguuji had to tend to some urgent matters, and that I requested you to take over. I already briefed you on what I expect you to do if things don't turn out well, so be on your way. The Fubukis are about to leave the hangar, after all." Yuuko sits down, drinking more coffee, focusing on her monitor.

Yet, Isumi remains in position. Her legs cramping up, tense and alert, almost as if she were about to fall onto a pit filled with spikes. Something tugs at her nape, makes her coiled hands tighten further. It is quite fair to affirm that in those eyes, that sober expression lays something that the Captain hadn't truly felt in many moons. The shrugged lips, the hesitation in the step forward, I believe you'd allow the conclusion that the woman was afraid, fearful. Of both asking the question she harbors and of the possible answer the scientist might give.

Still, she takes a deep breath, and with it summons the impulse to walk up to the desk, meet Yuuko's eyes.

"XO, there is something I must report to you." She says, speaking from her stomach, standing upright with both arms folded behind her back.

"It can wait. Depart for the vehicles now, Isumi," Yuuko waves to the door, not even looking at the captain.

"It is an urgent matter, ma'am. There is something I… need to know before departing."

"Oh, you need to know?" Yuuko narrows her eyes, focusing the fire upon her subordinate as she leans forward, resting her chin on a hand. "If I haven't notified you of it, what makes you think you have to know whatever this is, Isumi?"

"You have ordered me to monitor Shirogane's condition throughout the battle, so I believe I should notify you of… what occurred when he was aiding me last night," She says, looking down, voice and face cracking down like unguarded stone in a desert.

"He already reported that, be on your way."

"However, there is something that occurred while he was with me which I believe I must inform you of, ma'am."

"What, did you fuck with him?"

"Wh- Of course not!"

"Then, what's all the fuss about? Shirogane already told me he lent you a hand on some paperwork, and I don't see how anything could be grave enough to warrant you wasting our time as of now." Shrugging once more, Yuuko then ruffles her hair as she does a lazy spin.

Isumi chokes on acid, bending her nails as her hands tighten even more. It takes her quite the deep breath to quench the impulse to fall to emotion and unpleasantries. "It's not about the aid itself. The cadet used some… eccentric words during our talk."

"Hmm. And? He does tend to do that, quite often actually."

Slowly, she gulps. Even slower she breathes in, recalling the words as her eyelids begin to cascade down. And what comes out is but a sliver, a whisper of her usual voice, "I had thought to be mistaken at first, that it was just my mind playing tricks on me, but I couldn't get the feeling out of my head. So I checked on my old notebooks, and it wasn't just a hunch. The phrases he used, and how he pronounced them most importantly, make me believe that… perhaps, I know of the cadet's situation before he supposedly lost his memories." Yuuko simply holds her gaze in silence, never releasing Isumi from her piercing stare. So the captain coughs, bolting her composure in place despite how her knees were wishing to bend and crack. "After all, the words Shirogane employed were the same the members of that squadron of the IRG we mingled with during the invasion frequently used. I am of the opinion that Shirogane is either a relative of a member of that unit, or perhaps… one of them himself."

"… And?" Yuuko answers, almost forcing the words out in boredom.

So Isumi simply gapes for a second, lost as a penguin in a desert. "Huh? What do you mean, and ? XO, I'm telling you he-"

"Yes, I am aware of that already. So, what of it?"

"What… You… You knew?!"

"And why do you think I'm sending you to watch over Shirogane, Isumi?" She then starts spinning, eyes almost closed.

"However, if you know and have confirmed this intel, then we should report this and-"

"Captain Isumi." Stopping the spinning, Yuuko glares in full force towards her subordinate. Quite angered yet composed, the surface of the sea where dangers swirl deep in the trenches, if you'd allow the comparison. "You were not notified of this for a reason. As the leader of my personal task force, I expect you to not start spreading any ill rumors about my protegee or to treat him any differently from now on. Was I clear?"

"Your protegee?" Hands, knees, teeth, all of her trembles like a glass would when a stampede approaches. Only instead of water, sparks and acids filled Isumi to the brim. "If Shirogane is related to that squadron in any shape or form then-"

"Then, shouldn't you be happy, Captain?" Yuuko asks, chuckling before taking another sip of coffee. "You should be glad, that we regained one of our old allies."

"How… How can you say that, XO? Ally? Those damn extremists were nothing short of a-"

Hitting a book, she then stares straight ahead into Isumi's eyes, blazing and combusting. "You've seen how Shirogane is yourself, I don't believe he deserves your… strong emotions. Furthermore," Yuuko stands up, a finger tapping her chin as she slowly approaches Isumi, never releasing her gaze nor blinking, "if you do or say anything that might bring harm to Shirogane either directly or indirectly, his past will be the last of your immediate concerns. Are we clear, captain?"

Biting her lips, her hands shake as she looks down, as the hail which hit the back of her head forced her to look down. Still, Isumi sighs and nods, slow, resigned. "Yes, ma'am."

"Good. Now, off you go. You have a mock battle to oversee."

"However… Why are you sending me to watch over Shirogane?"

"Let's just say I want a small bumper, to send this battle into the right direction. You already have the codes and your orders, if things stray from the outlook I briefed you on, apply the sedatives immediately."

"Even if he is operating his machine?"

"Yes, there should be no risks since their jump units are still locked down, them being cadets. So… I shall be leaving my protegee in your hands, captain." Yuuko then smirks, resting her chin on interlocked hands. "I hope you do not disappoint me."

Inhaling deeply, exhaling the venom, Isumi once more stood upright and salutes. "I shall do just as you ordered, ma'am."

And without any more words, she turns around and also stomps her way out of the office. Her feelings were in stark contrast with those of the Instructor, as I'm sure you know. Yet, within the office, spinning in the chair, chuckling to herself, Yuuko again smiles. Smiles and spins, chuckling for a moment more.

---

Near 9 AM.

(Ruins of the City, inside a Fubuki.)

[Meiya]

---

The initial shaking faintly disappears, the visor activates and the crumbled edifications fill my view. Gently moving the controllers makes the head gyrate, granting me the sight of what surrounds me. Tumbled buildings, a lone tilted bridge in the distance, the paleness of our soil after the war. A few more taps makes the arms move, grab my shield and sword. Another beeping in my ears, another light in my vision signals the pylons and jump units have also been safely connected. A small test shows they're operational at perfect condition, no errors come up in their test or in any other checks I run.

So, I tap the button to our frequency, "02, all green."

Sakaki's face quickly appears in a corned of my vision, nodding, "01, roger that. My unit is also at the ready. Everybody, report your status."

The rest also report that everything's fine, their respective ID bumping up in my vision as they do. Sakaki then sighs, taking a moment of silence before gazing forward once more.

"Alright everyone, let's review our plan one last time. 02, 03, 05, you'll take the vanguard and move out to meet the first force of the aggressors. Me, 04 and 06 will circle around your position as you fight. We'll scout the enemy's formation and react according to the development of the battle."

A small marking then appears on my radar as Sakaki fiddled with her controls, a location to our Ten, seemingly in the middle of the city.

"This location seems to have multiple buildings tumbled down close to one another. If we manage to drive the Guards to this area, they won't be able to use their full speed to escape it. Then, 05 can snipe them as we keep them down. In the worst case, 06 can perform a high altitude maneuver to strike some of them down, but that shall be our last resort. Did you hear that, 06?"

Takeru's face comes into view, one eye closed as he shrugs. "Yeah, loud and clear, squad leader. I'll keep myself in check, don't worry."

"Good. Now, if anything comes up or we're countered immediately, please report your ideas before acting. 04, 06, that goes for both of you."

"Roger that." Ayamine's face appears on my view as she replies, staring blades at the screen.

Hm? Takeru hasn't responded yet.

"06, can you hear us?" After Sakaki called out to him, his face appears on the screen again.

"Yeah, sorry about that. I was double checking the systems. What was it?" Takeru looks odd. Tense, serious, none of the glee he usually displays when we train on our machines.

Sakaki sighs, again spinning a finger. "I was telling you to not act on your own during this battle. I know that you usually are right, but please notify us of your plans before you rush ahead."

And I can only nod in agreement with her wishes, her worry of how this will turn out. Chances are we'll lose terribly against them, we are mere novices against the elite of the Empire. However, I did ask them to let me challenge Tsukuyomi. I swore I'd took the vanguard and safeguard their advance. My comrades shall be covering me so that I can measure up to this trial, so I shan't let their trust down.

"Then, I'll tell you what I'm gonna do now." He says, shrugging with an eye closed again. Again, as if he were in pain, shifting in his seat.

Takeru, what's wrong with you? Why are you so tense? You wouldn't be… truly a spy, would you?

"06, what do you wish to do?" I address him, sending my image to his visor. Takeru, I believe in you. So, please.

Again sighing, he nods as he once more endows a cold, composed expression. "I'll follow the plan you guys came up with, I've nothing against it. But, if things go south, I'll take action on my own to distract and nullify the enemy if I can. I'm sure they're gonna freak out when they see my acrobatics, so you can use that to snipe 'em away." He gives me a smile, yet it is small, forced, fake. As all the ones I've seen in many meetings, as if he was merely saying the words.

"Then, with all the more reason, notify us when you choose to do that. I concur we need a distraction, something to break the mold if we hope to do anything during this battle, but keep us posted on your plans, 06." Sakaki tells him, tapping her glasses, frontal as an arrow.

Takeru then returns the nod, the poker face. "Of course, 01. Anything else?"

"No, anyone else have anything to say?" Nobody answers Sakaki's question. "Alright then, I'll notify the command post we're ready to begin." She then takes a short pause, breathing in. And once she rises her chin once more, she smiles. "Squad 207, let's show them what we're made of!"

"Roger!"

And thus, once more I'm alone in my cockpit. Thankfully, Sakaki seems composed enough to measure up to the trials. Perhaps, she's somewhat resigned to the outcome and has decided to make the most out of it regardless. Ayamine and Yoroi are understandably nervous, but I believe they shall do well. Takeru… I said I would stop.

However, there is someone else who might need some words. Looking at my controls, passing a finger over them as I try to recall, nodding to myself as I remember my fingers click on the right command, opening a private channel with Tamase's unit.

"05, do you copy?"

"Y-Yes, loud and clear. What is it, 02?" Look at those quivering eyes of yours. You won't be able to fight properly in this state.

"Please, do not be so tense. This is just a mock battle, you're not truly fighting against the Royal Guard. All of us are here by your side." I say, smiling. Then, inhaling slowly, I nod and raise my tone slightly. "And I shall be there, so no one will treat you unfairly."

Like charcoal creaking under the fire, her tension crumbles away. A small smile she gives me, a nod as she tries to bow down. "Thank you, Mitsurugi-san. Sigh… I can't stop thinking that they'll target me, and start saying hurtful things like when they smacked Yoroi-san the other day."

"I see. It is a fair concern, but you've no reason to worry so. I'll be there with you, I won't let them insult you. Can I count on you to cover my back, Tamase?" I stare at her, unblinking, waiting for her reply. And she gives me a nod, despite the obvious nervousness in her not fading, the trembling of her hands as she raises both for a moment.

"Y-Yes, I'll do my best. I will cover you as best as I'm able, 02." Forging a resolute stare, her veneer does not bend upon a moment of silence. On the contrary, the luster of her inner steel shines through again, despite the small quiver of her retracting lips.

"Thank you kindly, Tamase. Let us do our best effort together," I nod at her and, unlike Takeru, she does nod back with quite the light in her eyes. So, I cut the connection. And I sigh in relief, for she truly will be fine, I believe. "I only hope no one does hurl unpleasantries her way, however."

A moment of silence passes me by, until a small beeping reaches my ear. Shortly after, a woman's face quickly appears in my sight. Crimson hair and eyes, I believe we had met this woman during our first simulation run?

"Here, CP. Squad 207, do you all copy?"

"01, we're all in standby. Ma'am, may I ask where is our Instructor?" Sakaki inquires, curving her brows.

The woman sighs, her own brows cascading down quite heavily. "Sgt Jinguuji had some urgent matters to take care of. I was then tasked with overseeing your training in her stead. Now then, are you all ready in position?" She asks, Sakaki replies an affirmation while sending our data, I assume. The woman nods, a small green message surging into my view. "The countdown has already started. I'll explain this in a summarized way, you're all free to move out once the timer reaches zero. I don't think you'll run out of time, but do remember not to stray too far away from your designated area. Best of luck, cadets!" She says, igniting some resolve in her own voice.

And so, for the last time, silence in my cockpit. Silence as the timer runs down, down into the start of my trial.

My first mock battle, and my last test under Tsukuyomi. After this, I may finally be allowed to spar with Daizaburou-sifu. One step at a time, let's not get ahead of myself. Inhale, exhale… Peace, all in due time.

Though… I can only wonder what must be going on in his heart. An odd dream, he said. He mentioned a male, even if I failed to distinguish the rest of the words clearly. Takeru will be face to face with the Guards once again, after the CCSE. Are you truly a spy? Or, perhaps, you're truly who you claim to be? He did say he was recovering his memories, and I'd be overjoyed to truly welcome you as my fellow.

However, his own complexion today, what Tsukuyomi told me… I suppose, he also must be mulling over the matter. I should focus on my own battle for the moment. Five Zuikakus, a Takemikazuchi piloted by Tsukuyomi, amidst the ruins of this city. This city that once was my home, back when I lived with Grandfather in the mansion. These skies are the same ones I watched for so long, this land is what I wished to traverse back then. To see it restored to its former glory, no, to bring it to further heights, to have the greenery reclaim its rightful ownership over this wasteland, to bestow a smile upon the future of my ruined hometown… This battle is just the first step towards my goal.

A beeping in my ears appears as the timer grows closer and closer to single digits. Sakaki's ID bumped up, her voice barely audible.

"01 to all units. Are you all ready?"

"02, I'm more than prepared. Leave the vanguard to me."

"03, all good on my end. My trigger finger is ready to go."

"04, fully prepped up to cross some real strikes."

"05, I'm all set as well. Guns and sensors ready to cover you all."

"06, ready to rumble."

"Heh, didn't expect anything else." Sakaki chuckles dryly. "Squad 207," and thus, the beeping starts again as the timer reaches zero, "march forward!"

"Roger!" We all reply in unison, our machines blasting off towards our arranged formation.

I dash ahead, running through the broken streets, the abandoned cars and fallen stoplights. Gritting my teeth and tensing my abs, I gradually increase the speed of the running. My arms are jerked around by the shaking despite the bolts, I can feel the impulse coursing through my entire body with every step. And again, Takeru was right. The shaking is truly far more intense than in a sim, it has a certain, how to say it, strength is all I can find to describe it. Luckily, I'm sort of used to such shaking thanks to my endeavors to keep up with his eccentric maneuvers, but still.

Slowing down, I bring my machine to merely tender steps as I walk closer to the buildings. Nothing in sight, nothing in the sonar, nothing in the radar. Yoroi is to my Four some meters behind, Tamase is some more meters behind. The other three are already out of my reach, so I suppose they must be laying low in order to detect any sudden movements.

I do wonder how will they approach us, knowing Tsukuyomi I wouldn't put it past them to simply come meet us frontally. Yet, it would be quite odd for them to-

"01 to 02, heat signatures detected to your twelve!" Sakaki says, startling me.

No sooner does her warning end, that a loud beeping bursts into my ears. Three heat signatures in an arrowhead, slowly moving towards our position.

"02, hostiles detected. 01, did you find the others?"

"Guh, yes, they're coming our way."

"What?!" I see, so they aim to split us up. "We'll proceed to face our aggressors, do you think you can hold out?"

"Yes, don't worry. We're still simply exchanging long range volleys with two Zuikakus. Proceed as we planned!"

"Roger! 02 to 03 and 05, hostiles detected! Get ready to intercept!"

"Understood," Yoroi says, her unit quickly dashing closer to mine, in a street that runs parallel to the one I'm on.

"Got it. I'll stand some meters behind you two, try to line them up on a street or make them jump high," Tamase requests, her voice fading by the tail end.

"Copy that. 03, onward!" Readying my blade and bringing the shield closer to the cockpit, I dash further into the city, Yoroi following close by.

Circling to our two, we move towards the few tall buildings left standing. From this position, their fire lines should be obstructed. If Sakaki's facing off against Zuikakus, then by seeing who we're up against here will tell me where Tsukuyomi is located. My visor moves, Yoroi's Fubuki enters my view. The machine nods, gently waving both rifles up and down a few times. Smiling, I make my Fubuki return the nod.

Now then… Inhaling deep, testing the pedals with my heels, in one simple and strong motion I step on them while thrusting the controls forward. As my machine moved from my cover to another, fire opened onto it. Two gray Zuikakus spotted, both using a single rifle and a blade. The current distance with them, the angle of fire they should have available, the reaction time of my unit… Hmm… You called this a boost dash, to run and use the rockets at the same time. Instead of short jumps or merely backboosting or doing so barely above the ground for some seconds, to continue to boost away and use a single foot, or both, to change directions. Can I safely perform that maneuver in a real machine?

…

You're out here, fighting as well. If this is enough to halt my steps, then I will never get anywhere.

"03, cover me. I'll dash into their range, and try to force them to move out of cover."

"Roger, leave it to me!" She says, almost giving out a creaking laugh.

In a simple jump, Yoroi's Fubuki flies away. Looking her way from behind cover, our aggressors were about to step our way, before her suppression fire forced them to hide once again, to not be soaked in paint as the buildings were as of now. Now's my chance!

Again stepping on the pedals, the force of the boosters courses through me. Remember the timing, just barely activate the booster, release it to reposition it later and then-

One jerk on the controls, a soft pressing of the pedals with my feet, and I'm seeing the buildings pass by in a blur. More shaking tosses me around, yet my Fubuki manages to continue dashing. The alarm beeps, I bring my shield up to block the shots, groaning as the impact eventually sends a tremble through the feedback. Yoroi lands to my Nine, almost tumbling down, yet she managed to buy me enough time. Their hiding spot exposed, they're just a short boost away!

Repositioning my rifle under my arm to shoot, my first volleys meet the concrete as my enemy dances away, almost as translucent as a curtain by dawn. Yet, thanks to forcing them to move, I noticed there are three heat signatures here. But, all I could see were Zuikakus.

"03, did you spot the Takemikazuchi?"

"Negative, only Zuikakus." She immediately replies before groaning, more echoes of gunshots echo nearby.

"What is it?! Is that all you've got?" I hear Kamiyo's voice on the common channel as the Zuikakus' dots turn and charge towards our location.

Yoroi crouches near a building, firing off at them while I rest my blade on the ground to join in the suppression. Yet, the twists, the turns, the way to circle upon oneself, the finesse of their patterns is that of… It's the Mugen Kidou. Of course, they're facing me in earnest. I could expect nothing else of my retainers. Yet, when it comes to evasive maneuvers, I do not think we could best them.

"03, can you use some 120mm on them?"

"Do you think we can get them with it?"

"No, I want you to delay their movements for a moment. I may be no match for them in long range, but in CQC… I believe I can stand up to them, with you covering my back."

"Okay, I'll give it a spin!"

"Thanks. 05, do you have us in your sights?"

"Yes, I've a lock on both of you, but the buildings don't let me get a good view on the enemy. Try to make them jump or move to your eleven, I should be able to land some shots from here, I think."

"Copy that. By the by, have you spotted the Takemikazuchi nearby?"

"No, there's no sight of it and no other heat signatures. 01 hasn't called back, so I suppose they might be dealing with it as of now."

I see… So you went after him personally, Tsukuyomi. And alongside Mion and Shion, I assume.

A blast brings me back to the fight, a nearby building had its few remaining windows blasted apart. If this is what stands between me and my retainer, then there is no need to hesitate.

"03, on the count of five."

"Copy that."

I lock my rifle on the pylon once more, grabbing my blade, sighing and gripping my controls. As soon as Yoroi's Fubuki rushes out of cover to send a volley towards our aggressors, I dash towards the Zuikakus, drawing my blade. Just before they were able to reposition, I twist the controls, my Fubuki doing a sidestep like Takeru taught me, allowing me to avoid the aim of their rifles. Raising my blade, it falls like an avalanche upon the closest enemy. I feel the shock coursing through the arms, the rumbling on my controls, the confirmation of the hit. Having disabled one of their hands, a rifle starts dropping cold to the ground.

I quickly push the controls backwards, performing a backboost as Yoroi's cover forces the other two Zuikakus to retreat more and more. As one opted to boost jump my way, raising its sword in midair, my own surges forth to meet it in a parry. Circling the controls, my Fubuki slides away on the ground, and the Zuikaku has to immediately improvise a boost to not tumble down. The place where it stood was soon drenched in paint as Yoroi opened fire indiscriminately, forcing the machine to jump away in a rush.

However, I can only chuckle as a small beep fades into my ears. Shortly after, the jumping Zuikaku was submerged into a vast ocean of yellow, falling deep into the ground, knocked out by Tamase's expert sniping.

"You hit the mark, 05. Well done!" And from such a distance, in between so many buildings to boot. It took only a second for her to lock on and dispose of the aggressor.

"You pest! Do no interfere in our fight!" Tomoe's voice lashed out in the common channel, hoarse and truly acidic.

My throat again is constricting itself, a twister of dryness where joy had just been. Why must they act in this way? Do they also hold some ill will towards her?

"Hmph, that one was the daughter of that coward, right? Ebisu, let's take care of the bothers first." Kamiyo says, as the two machines nearby turn away from me, doing a sudden boost jump.

"Roger!" Ebisu replies, and quickly both shifted their movements, boost dashing away from me after landing to my six.

A quick turn and a press, my volleys fired from the pylon all miss their target. Their dots grow close to Yoroi's. "03, be carefu-"

In a split second, a violent wave of paint fell onto Yoroi's cockpit. Her Fubuki falls backwards onto a building, drenched in orange, as the muzzles of her rifles was still leaking some smoke and heat. They avoided all of Yoroi's shots, at such a short range? Is this how good a commissioned surface pilot truly is? No, Tamase!

With a sudden jerk of my controls and a stomping on the pedals, my jump units flare to life unchained and my Fubuki rushes behind them. One Zuikaku gradually loses speed, turning around and preparing to engage. As our paths cross, so do our blades. A faint, a riposte, we cannot outmaneuver the other. Still rushing as we cross strikes, my volleys find no target yet my shield becomes the recipient of most of my aggressor's heat. She's moving quite nimble, however… compared to Takeru, you're nothing I can't handle!

How was it? Crouch cancel, he had called it. Briefly gazing at the altimeter, at the speed I'm moving at, and at the map ahead, I quickly pull the controls back, turning off the boosters. Landing with a single feet, sending me into another direction as he had advised, the Zuikaku has to reposition itself to follow my trail. Yet, I took another street, so the buildings are my shield as of now. And now that the boosters have cooled off, once more my feet sink and remain sunken onto the pedals, sending my machine into quite the charge.

And I cannot help but to smile as the dot in my radar shows that my rival has taken the bait, the heat signature also rushing to find me and block my path. So, again, I let go of the controls, decelerating quickly. And tensing my abs, retracting my tongue, my Fubuki sidesteps into the turn, into the curve I must take, crouching while boosting after the window of cool down expires. Paint scatters above me, fluttering like a rain of shooting stars, as I slid just below the aggro. And in this juncture, without being able to use your boosters-

"You're wide open!" One firm extension of the controls sends my already damaged shield to crash against the cockpit of the machine, the fake reactive armor exploding and showering more paint all around us.

The Zuikaku collapses, falling to its knees. The dot vanishes from my radar yet my heartbeats are still echoing, blasting on my chest as I gasp with my mouth open. I did it… I bested my first opponent. Sigh… Peace, this is far from over. Even if I am proud of my maneuver just now. Now, how are the rest? Wait, what about-

A loud beep makes me look at my radar. Three enemy signals are attacking another three, which are forced to retreat further away. Tsukuyomi… Why are you targeting him instead of me? Did you confirm he's a spy?

"02, I need help!" Tamase's shout returned me to my sense.

As soon as I move out, her dot reappears in the radar. She is not that far away, nor are there many buildings obstructing her moves. However, why didn't she shot the Zuikaku down? She shouldn't have much problem with a single enemy, I believe.

"What is it?!" Kamiyo's voice roars on the common channel as I grow closer, almost as if she were a wild animal defending its turf. "Is this all traitor can do?! You don't deserve to be Meiya-sama's comrade!"

And again, how dare they. Even if you're my retainers, I shan't allow these actions to go unpunished.

"05, retreat to my position this instant!"

"I can't lose her! I'm…" Her voice cracks, letting out a pained whimper.

The two dots continue to circle and avoid each other for a moment, until I can bypass the streets to cut down the distance. Once they enter my view, Tamase's unit was shooting in erratic intervals while taking short backboosts, and had managed to hit one of the arms of her rival despite the Zuikakus tight maneuvering around the different toppled buildings. However, the gray Zuikaku continued to press her escape routes, all the while Kamiyo keeps taunting and badmouthing Tamase, daring her to answer back.

Inhaling sharply, I ready my gun and blade, do a boost jump, and shoot one 120mm at Kamiyo, forcing her to retreat. I shoot another one as I land to make her move even farther away, away behind a building. Once the dust settles and we gain a second of calm, I quickly take a step back, opening our frequency.

"05, report your status."

"I'm fine. Still have enough ammo." She looks completely apprehensive right now, her eyelids imitating a rock slide, her tone lacerated by a thousand blades. I know she must have taken those insults very, very badly.

"Do not worry. Let's regroup with the other two while we-"

"Aren't you a little overconfident, Meiya-sama?" Kamiyo taunts me on the common channel as I have to hide behind a building to avoid the bullets she sends my way.

"I believe you're the one who's underestimating us. 05, can you snipe her?" I know she can, she took down that HSST so a single TSF should pose no problems for her, much less with my support.

"I… I'll try." Yet, it's as if her eyes had frozen over, void of light and vacant, as the whisper barely makes it out of her quivering lips.

"What was that? Why don't you speak up, coward?! You're nothing more than dead weight!"

"Kamiyo, I will not tolerate such behavior towards my squadmates." Why do they resent her so much? Did they knew her when she was still a servant of Sister?

"Meiya-sama, that sewer rat doesn't deserve to fight by your side. She'll run away like the coward she is when you need her most. Traitors such as they should not be forgiven!"

Her unit quickly shoots out towards us, a few loud explosion of the 120mm drizzling the area in paint. I move backwards to avoid the heat, clenching my teeth and tensing my arms while I have to take a turn, however Tamase is slightly lagging in her response. Wobbling, her Fubuki is almost unable to follow behind me.

"05, you have to shoot!"

"I-I know!"

Kamiyo catches up to Tamase, who starts shooting at her. The crane dives into the blizzard, ice dust scatters in the air. Both TSFs start painting the street with green and yellow splurges as they spray their shots, as I halt my boost to send some of my own volleys in support. However Kamiyo was already too close, she had Tamase cornered against a toppled bridge. And I could only look back as both raise their rifles at one another, as Kamiyo shrieks and insult, as Tamase simply yells out, as the crane's wings are clipped and its feathers flutter about and burn to ashes, as the blizzard is cut short and silenced, turned into just a tender breeze. Both cockpits receive an unending shower of an unreasonable amount of paint, the chaotic bursts of the muzzles filling the air for a second. And when everything calms down back into silence, the Fubuki and the Zuikaku are frozen in place, drenched in a new paint job from head to toe.

"… Tamase, are you alright?"

"… Y-Yes, I'm alright. But don't worry about me, you have to go help the others." She's holding back tears, hugging herself with both eyes tightly closed. Forgive me Tamase. I promise I'll have a talk with these three later.

"Copy that. 05, you did great today. Thank you kindly for your support, Tamase. 02, out."

Cutting my connection with Tamase's unit, I dash towards the heat signatures. Taking care to always stay behind large buildings, to not enter the range of what I assume are the enemy dots, my ears pick up on the beep of the common channel once a few clouds of dust appear in my view. And as my finger presses the activation of the connection, pure noise floods my ears.

"Damn it all! Ayamine!" Sakaki shouts as one dot vanishes from my radar. "How did they even-"

"01, calm down!" Takeru shouts back, hoarse and almost upset. "They're expecting you to lose your cool! Get out of the common channel right now!" He says, or rather orders, as his dot stands its ground, forcing two other dots to retreat for a moment.

I see… So Ayamine fell prey to the cousins, huh. All the more reason for me to rejoin their element, as soon as I'm able. So, quickly activating our frequency now that I'm close enough, I bring my Fubuki to the ground and continue to distance running.

"01, 06, do you copy? I'm approaching your position, from your Four."

Sakaki's face appears on my view shortly after, her brows arching as her lips twist inwards, allowing me to see part of her teeth. "01, receiving you loud and clear. 02, how's your status?"

"Almost unscathed, still have enough ammo and my blade, however I have lost my shield. No damaged or disabled parts. How are you two holding up?"

"06 and me are somewhat still standing, but we're being driven to the corner of the ruins. They're not letting us move at all, except to retreat." I see, so they just wanted to take them out of the match by forcing them to go out of bounds. "04 was just pincered a moment ago as the Takemikazuchi blocked her escape route, so be on the lookout as you approach."

"Understood. I'll be arriving shortly. 06, how are you holding up?"

…

Why isn't he answering me? Takeru, did I upset you somehow? Or, are you…

"06, answer 02's question! Did your comms get damaged?"

"I'm done." Takeru's face appears on my view, he's sulking.

"Shirogane, what are you saying?"

"That we're just wasting our time. The Zuikakus have always focused on me so far, and only attacked 04 because she covered me a moment before." He says, expression tight, eyes squinted and quite… adusted, for some reason. "If I charge at them on my own, that should give you a window to strike alongside 02. At the very least, we have to take one of them down with us."

Sakaki's eyes waver as she looks down, taking a few breaths in quick succession. "H-However, we cannot risk it all in a frontal charge. Mitsurugi is just about to-"

"Even if she comes to us, we're going out of bounds at this rate. And the only way for us to break this lock is by separating the Zuikakus from the Takemikazuchi, even if only for a second. Otherwise, we might as well surrender now." He nods to himself, shrugging.

Sakaki you will have to forgive me, for I agree with Takeru. Again. "01, I believe 06 speaks the truth. Also, I did told you I wishes to face off against the Takemikazuchi, so I welcome the opportunity. Would you allow us to employ this idea?"

She then sighs, heavily. "Fine, I'll cover you both. This is your day, so if you agree to it I'll follow you. 06, do you think you can rush in and avoid their heat?"

"Leave it to me, I ain't going down so easily," He snarls, frowning slightly.

"06, I shall be counting on you to distract them long enough," I say, sobering up as I send my image to him, as I can hear the gunshots in the distance as I run through the streets.

"Don't worry, dodging is what I do best after all," And then, a small smirk. "So, the one in the vanguard is the Takemikazuchi as of now. Can you distract it from afar, 02?"

"I believe so, yes." I am no Tamase, but I can gain Tsukuyomi's attention easily enough. "01, if you rush towards it as I shoot, that will give 06 enough time to charge at the other two."

"Copy that. So, on the count of three?" We both nod to her suggestion, my hands gripping the controls as my rifle aims upwards, as I gulp when the red frame comes into view. "Three, two, one… Fire!"

A recoil runs through my arm as a 120mm shell flies away towards the elegant shape of the Takemikazuchi, which again gracefully glides away from the shower of paint that would soil its paint. Yet, before it could land, as the visor turned to meet mine, it had to raise a shield in defense, to take shelter from Sakaki's retaliation. Tsukuyomi can only jump back, before I take another shot at her machine.

"06, now's your chance to-"

Without waiting for Sakaki to finish speaking, Takeru's dot blasts away. I see his Gekishin as it draws an arc in the sky, rebounding off the concrete as nimbly as in every simulation we had thus far. And with a giant smirk etched into his face, Takeru roars as both Zuikakus seem to start frantically running away from his oppressive assault, going by the radar's account.

"Come to Papa, you pair of pickles!" He then shouts right before his face vanishes from the connection.

What did he just say? What does 'Come to Papa' even means? Takeru, you're not old enough to be a parent. And, he's still referring to them as pickles, to boot. I swear, if that gets him in trouble with the cousins, I shan't be shielding him for it.

I see the frames boosting through the streets on my view and the paint flying about as I rush to aid Sakaki. A Takemikazuchi appears nearby, piercing through a cloud of dust along the daylight. In a quick reaction, it jumps while veering to a side, shooting at Sakaki's Fubuki as she tries to take cover. Futile it was, her attempt to escape. And as the Fubuki falls into stillness as the paint drips from the cockpit into the ground, as a cloud passes up above while the dust was settling, Tsukuyomi's unit then stops and, after looking in my direction, the red Takemikazuchi starts coming towards me.

First in slow steps, then readying the blade above its shoulder, and finally marching forward, straight as an arrow, as a ray of light piercing stormclouds. My lips tense and twist as my tongue begins to rebel against the back of my teeth, as it feels as if my stomach was being compressed by an industrial press. Backboosting while shooting non stop, I see how she easily dodges all of my shots gracefully, barely making any dust raise, almost without wasted momentum. Dashing at me, the red machine raises its blade. Mine own blade departs from its silent hold, raising to meet the challenge, and thus we start trading blows as we dance on the ruins.

Our strong steps blast the few windows to pieces, poles and offices are soon crushed on a few missed swings, sparks fly off as we parry each other's slashes, continuing our bout as if we were sparring on a bridge, my visor not moving away from hers, as hers remains locked onto mine.

A small signal appears in my view, a request for a private channel, as the Takemikazuchi gives me some space, deciding not to chase after my unit when I backboost. Once I bring my Fubuki to a halt and heave a sigh, I tap and accept the connection. Her face does not appear, but her unit is linked to mine for the moment.

"Your technique is very good, Meiya-sama." Tsukuyomi says, completely calm and still as a frozen lake.

"Thanks, however, this isn't the full extent of my abilities."

"As I expected. Let us continue our battle, then." So, she once more raises her blade.

"It'll be my pleasure." Thus, my own sword is put into place as I make my machine take the stance I was taught under.

And after a single second of silence, once more the boosters flare to life and our swords cross paths and parries.

Under her precise swings I decide I pick up my pace, doing the zig zags Takeru taught me. I can't move like he does, yet I am absolutely certain now that this style of his is without a doubt the Mugen Kidou, even if it is different than how I learned it. I'm nowhere near as nimble as him, that is true, yet thanks to his teaching I believe I can adapt parts of his patterns to my own style.

And yet, despite the sidesteps, the crouch-cancel maneuvers I employ, my slashes can only graze the candlelight. Make it flutter, bend away, but never extinguish it entirely. It's as if Tsukuyomi wasn't surprised by my methods, unlike the trio. And yet, I can tell. She's going easy on me, she isn't pushing her advantage nor trying to overpower me. Licking my lips, it brings a fair foul taste to me, to see her holding back. As I pounce around her, stomping the pedals, bending and jerking the controls, I cannot find an opening in her defense. It's almost as if… as if she could read all of my movements. Nonsense! I can do this!

I boost dash towards her, veering to my left. As she dodges, I hit the ground with my feet and try to do what Takeru does, and somewhat manage to use the impulse to jump off the ground towards her again, despite the ringing in my ears and how my everything seems to lose color for but a moment.

The Takemikazuchi turns around swiftly, our blades are locked in a struggle as she halts my advance. I never thought a Fubuki could overpower a Takemikazuchi, but this feeling… I don't like it. Only one person made me feel like this during a battle. And he… he's right here, fighting with all he has. Spy or not, what he has taught me is not void of meaning for me.

Tsukuyomi leans back, my hands panic and pull at the controls to avoid falling down. In that attempt, as my Fubuki crouched and took a step back, Tsukuyomi's unit had raised a leg. And my sight went black as everything started to shake again, as if everything in me was a liquid within a crumbling glass.

"Ugh. I did not think she'd actually employ a kick."

Yet, what can I do? I've done all I can, I can no longer think of anything else to gain an advantage over Tsukuyomi. My heartbeats again make themselves known on my neck as I gasp, as I wipe the sweat off my face. How can I possibly best her now? Even when successfully using his maneuvers I fail to land a hit, just how can I…

… Huh?

I blink, the sight does not change.

Then, I rub my eyes. But the sight does not change.

I move the controls, making my Fubuki stand up. Everything is still functional, but the sight does not change.

A broken swing, a collapsed slide, a half-filled sandbox. The broken sign, the half torn bulletin board in the far end. Could it be… Is it that park? The damaged state notwithstanding, it does line up with my memories of the place.

"I see… So it's still rather intact, is it?" Smiling, I simply sigh as I look at it.

To think I had refused to search for it, dreading to find it collapsed, crushed under the BETA's assault. And now of all times-

A sharp sound echoes close, the dot of the Takemikazuchi grows closer. "Well Meiya-sama, it has been a pleasant bout. I believe it is time for me to put an end to it, however."

"W-Wait a moment, Tsukuyomi! Not here, we're-"

"Cease your words, cadet! Draw your blade, and come at me!"

Quickly raising my sword, I barely fend off the first slash. My Fubuki's feet plant themselves onto the ground, yet I can tell my unit is being pushed back.

" Meiya-sama, from today onward I shall be returning to Yuuhi-sama's side. Due to Raiden-sama's health, you shall be sent to some other distant relatives for the time being."

" So… Will we see each other once more, Tsukuyomi?"

" Not for the time being, I'm afraid."

If I fall here… the park will be destroyed. It will crumble under the weight of my machine, my failure.

" Am I being discarded, perhaps?"

" Nothing of the sort, Meiya-sama. I am merely required back at the Main House, and Raiden-sama is too old to safeguard you."

" Yet, I'm still being sent away from you all."

This place, the memory of my hometown, of you… gone, forever.

" However, not all news are bad ones, Meiya-sama."

" How do you mean?"

" Well, you are now allowed some measure of freedom. And if you perform as you're expected to, perhaps… you'll be able to meet them one day."

And I can clearly see it, the small box she produced. The small gift, the aroma of the food, the letter that with it came.

"I've already lost plenty of treasures. I won't let this park to be destroyed, and I won't fall in this test, either!"

A quick volley shoots out from under my arm, forcing Tsukuyomi to retreat. Yet, I charge forward, meeting her warding slash, sidestepping after the contact and countering once more. Breathing in through my nose, I hold the air prisoner within. I cannot let my temper flare up, or else that park will be no more. Tsukuyomi may have the edge on a technological level, but still, I should be able to at the least knock her sword away, like Takeru always does in our bouts.

Only then I'll be able to make her retreat. Remember her words, the words of our style. Closing my eyes for a second, the days we spent in the dojo return, the days when we sparred just like we are doing now, under these same skies. The scent of the violets' incense, the faint creaking of the wood under our steps, and the words that laid in a scripture on the wall. The words Tsukuyomi taught me, when she began to instruct me in the proper form to be worthy of learning the Mugen Kidou.

Be as serene as the moon.

Like a leaf slowly dancing atop a lake.

Let your feet be guided by the winds,

as your blade becomes another part of you.

Sharpen thy mind. Freeze thy heart.

Body and Soul. Moving as one.

To cleave a path forward, with your own hands.

Like the moonlight that pierces the clouded skies!

I know I can do it. I will best Tsukuyomi today, without a shred of doubt!

Opening my eyes again, I readjust my grip on my controls as an exhalation reaches my hands, as the rumbling of the march forward once again envelopes me whole. She's slowly coming towards me from my left, sword at the ready as her boosters light up.

Sister, I will not disappoint you anymore.

One… Two…

I boost dash towards her just as she does towards me, yet I don't linger in the parry. Quickly backboosting, Tsukuyomi now finds herself chasing after me, having to take a turn. My grip my controls eases up, merely gyrating them softly as I release the pedals from my stomping pressure. My Fubuki gradually loses speed as it dashes through a street, I look back and find the Takemikazuchi readying its blade. A valiant crimson rain of arrows, all of them gravitating towards myself.

And then, just as our blades were about to clash, I backboost away. Tsukuyomi's slash met the air, giving me the few seconds I needed. I deactivate one jump unit while fully forcing one to full output, making me spin in place. I may not be strong enough yet to brave through the storm that you are, but I can certainly stand my ground against your gale!

"Have at you, Tsukuyomi!" And with the force of the spin, I strike at her hands. The recoil reaches my body, just as I see her blade flying away into the sky.

I remain still after that, gasping. The Takemikazuchi also remains quiet as the sound of the sword hitting a building reverberates through the air.

I… I did it. I managed to-

BOOM!

"Augh!"

"Looks like you dropped your guard, Meiya-sama." Tsukuyomi notes, again cold and composed as when we met after the invasion for the first time.

My cockpit went red, my sight is off for the moment. She must have shot at me with her gun at point blank, I suppose.

"Tsukuyomi, I had already knocked your sword away! The duel was-"

"This was no duel, the mock battle won't end until the enemy is defeated. Knocking my blade away was not one of the victory conditions, Meiya-sama." She says, and I can't help but to gape and shiver. Did I… Did I ruin it? I got so engrossed in our fight, in protecting the park that I forgot my goal. Did I fail? I… Sister, I-
"However, even if that is the case, our fight has proved me that you have the necessary skill to face Daizaburou-sama. Congratulations, Meiya-sama. Your training is over."

"… Huh? Are you speaking the truth, Tsukuyomi?"

She then giggles, as I haven't heard her do in many moons. "Indeed. You have passed this test. You've grown strong in the time you've been here. Not only in skill, but in mind as well. It was a fine bout, Meiya-sama."

I thought I would feel happy or that I would cry upon these words. Yet, I'm feeling eerily calm, almost empty. Turning the visor on once more, the park is still safe in the distance. Sigh… I slump into the seat, easing all my muscles, my throat relaxes and opens wide as I breath a long breath of relief. Sister… I did it. I finally can proudly say that I am being useful. And, I did manage to both safeguard the park and strike Tsukuyomi's blade away. Had I not lost focus, I could have taken her down.

"Thanks for this duel, 1st Lt. Tsukuyomi. It has been an honor to cross strikes with you," I bow down, despite knowing she cannot see me.

"Please, there is no need for such words. Well, I shall- What is it?" Tsukuyomi's tone changes, growing harsh and severe as her slashes, as she is whenever she scolds me. She must be talking through their own frequency. Without waiting another second, Tsukuyomi cuts the connection with my own unit, and I can tell by the shaking nearby that she just boost jumped away in quite the hurry.

Right, Takeru! How is him? Can I still check my radar? Now, let me see… Only two dots remain on the map. Takeru and Tsukuyomi, I suppose. He… He bested Mion and Shion, at the same time?! Just when I thought I could be proud of my result, you have to go and surpass my efforts once more.

"You truly are special, a peak I can only observe from afar. And yet," Who are you? Are you my fellow or my enemy? Tsukuyomi… She went after you first. And she did take me out when she saw the chance, without hesitation, despite how she acknowledged I passed her trial.

… So that she could face you alone, perhaps? Still, for him to have bested both cousins… He didn't seem particularly upset, and I believe he wasn't looking for a fight with them, either. Sakaki did not repine about his attitude, so I assume Takeru kept himself in check thus far.

… Then, why am I feeling another shiver down my back?

I can't help but to grab my arms tightly as my mouth clamps on itself again. My legs again slowly rub against each other, my forehead is tense even without me noticing it. I try to slowly calm my breath, placing a hand on the base of my neck as the air comes through my nose, squeezing itself down to my lungs. And yet, my heartbeats refuse to douse down, my eyes remain fixated on my radar as the two dots grow closer and closer.

"Takeru… Please…"

Dancing in the Masquerade

Chapter 68:

Dancing in the Masquerade

---

Some minutes before.

[Takeru]

---

"Come to Papa, you pair of pickles!"

One good yanking of the controls sends the Gekishin to the air, drawing an arc above the buildings as if launched by a trebuchet. With a quick flicker of the button, an erratic volley aims at the ground. Both Zuikakus have to jump away to avoid the barrage, to not have their legs disabled. Short of stopping, more yanking of the controls and stomping on the pedals sends my Geki after the escaping duo, shooting non-stop.

Chizuru's face still is in a corner of my sight, she groans as her brows tense down. "06, stay low! The Takemikazuchi is-"

"Distract it and take it to Meiya. I'll try and keep these two out of your hair, so keep it pinned down for as long as you can." I say giving her a short nod, a firm gaze, Chizuru was about to protest, going by how her lips twisted, but she gives a tense nod and cuts the connection.

Her dot approaches Tsukuyomi-san's, delaying its movements for a little while, but in the end she's taken out as well. Thankfully, Meiya is already close enough to engage. Now then, what to do?

I could just lose on purpose, but Sensei told me to keep it real. Good scores are something I'm gonna need to justify my inclusion into the Valkyries after the CCSE fiasco, and my defeat against Chizuru and Kei the other day. We're using similar models, so we might be evenly matched in an individual perspective.

A small sidestep behind a building, a lightpost gets tumbled by a paint downpour. Crouching, doing half a tilt on the joystick, my unit peeks from behind the wall, sending a minimal barrage with just a tender press of the button. Paint, paint everywhere. You know, sometimes I wonder how the hell do we clean the mess we leave behind in the city. It ain't as if we were doing some minimal ammo challenge or anything, we're soaking the concrete as if there were a typhoon of paint closing into the bay.

Sliding the tip of my heels on the pedals, simple and unidirectional boosts through the street followed by sidesteps in erratic patterns, we play cat and mouse in between the rubble. Unlike our encounter in the island, I've more than enough ammo to take care of both of you if it comes to that. And even if you try to overpower me-

One of them moves towards my right, shooting through the buildings, forcing me to crouch and slide into another street. As I did, a small shadow blocks the light from my visor. One of 'em thought it'd be a good idea to try and jump over me, to move past me, perhaps to go fight Meiya, perhaps to pincer me.

However.

Paint arrows fly off towards the sun, forcing the crane to evade and change the direction of the jump. As it lands to my Six, my finger keeps button mashing the trigger. The gun that's on my back keeps on firing at random intervals, my bullets wanting to do a close up inspection of their craft. So, retreat is all they can do, again. If they don't come out and face me head on, I can keep 'em at bay with my suppression.

"I learned from Mikoto and Tama how to do this best, after all. You're not getting past me so easily. Heh… You could say the Pickles are in quite the pickle. Pfft…" I'm such an idiot, to laugh with what's at stake.

A minute beeping makes me flinch, a message appears on my sight, in neon red and blue. Huh… So the pickles want to talk in a private line? Seems like you were right, Sensei. So, what do I do? Is this bait to distract me or are they for real? There must be a reason why you sent Cpt Isumi as the overseer today, Sensei. I bet these two already know of how I reacted during yesterday's meeting, and going by what little I saw of Shura's Dance then-

Ugh! Khhg… Fuck, no. Screwdrivers rotate inside my ears, an acid knot constricts my stomach. "Haa… Haa… Deep breaths, man. Calm down. I gotta do what I gotta do."

Sensei needs more time to fix the equations and find a way to mend the ripples, without exhausting herself or ruining her health. I dunno what they want to talk about, but they haven't attacked yet. Here goes nothing, I suppose. With a few taps on my chin mic and the arm controls, the recording settings start up, so that I can later inform Sensei of this, and with a large sigh I accept the connection. A few windows pop up, registering the frequency, before the ID of both of them appears on my sight, Blood 5 and 6.

Not a second passes that 5's ID bumps up, Mion's voice reaches my ears. "Aren't you confident, Cadet Shirogane? To come face us all on your own." The same cold, shaving voice of the CCSE.

"I just wanna try myself against real pilots. And my squadmate needs the cover, since she wants to face off against the 1st Lieutenant," I say, shrugging and taking another deep breath with my nose.

"So you're being considerate towards Meiya-sama?" She asks, the blizzard still kicking in.

"Just returning the favors she's done to me, is all. So, what did you need?"

"Why, are you inconvenienced by having to speak with us?"

I feel like we've been here before, have we been here before? "We're in the middle of a battle so, what is the matter?"

"Quite formal, are you not?" Shion comments, a short echo of a strong exhalation coming up a sec later. "It is impressive you've actually succeeded in restraining our movements. One would think," then, she giggles dryly, "you truly are a commissioned pilot."

"Sorry to disappoint you, but I'm just a cadet."

"Oh, is that so? Could it be not because of your training thus far?"

"Huh?" What is she on about now?

"Indeed, while your shooting skills truly would seem polished… elsewhere, your CQC stance and patterns truly do belong to our Imperial traditions."

I shake my head, sighing, seeing their dots were not moving one bit. "This again? I am Japanese, you know."

"Oh, my cousin was not referring to that," Mion says, a small ember within the dry ice. "If your movements do resemble ours, then it would mean you received some training in the Empire. It is most odd, that you can fend off two commissioned pilots of the Guard on your own."

"Sigh… Look, I already told all I could to your sister. I don't know anything else about my past, so there's nothing I can tell you. Got it?" I again sigh, giving the controls a slow squeeze.

"Then, why would you not try and visit the Capital? I am certain you could find many answers to your queries."

… Again with this? I'm pretty sure we had this same conversation a few chapters ago, Pickles. And Tsukuyomi-san wasn't entirely pleased when she arrived back then. And, jokes aside, I don't think I'd receive any pleasant answers. All that awaits for me in the Capital is disdain and dejection, after all.

"My personal matters are none of your concern. Could you kindly leave this rest already? We're in the middle of a battle, for fuck's sake."

"And why would you not want to rectify your situation?" Mion presses, one dot starts moving in the radar. "Certainly, dispelling this uncertainty is in your best interests?"

"… Again, this is a personal matter, 2nd Lt Tsukuyomi," Forcing the reply out, air fills my lungs as I grip the controls, feel some sweat trickling down my forehead.

A beep in my ears, a stomp to my pedals, a burst of paint where I was a second ago, and the recoil coming through my legs and up as I retaliate. A blur of buildings and beepings after, my Gekishin is crouch dashing through the street to meet the cousins' aggro, firing off a 120mm before backboosting, then zap to the other way while showering the 36mm muffins in an upward arc. Yet, it only scratches the antenna of the Zuikakus at most, nothing but a gentle headpat. And doing zigzags again, we share a few volleys and shots.

"Would you truly not reconsider?" Mion asks, her voice almost drowned by all the beeping and jet noises as I power slide behind a collapsed building, what few windows remained breaking apart.

"Is this all you're gonna say? I already told your sister all I could. What else do you want?!"

"One could reach the wrong assumption should you refuse to visit the Capital or answer some simple questions, cadet," Shion says, as what I presume is her unit rushes through the jungle of concrete and ruin, thrashing against the vines and wilderness, breaking the a few steel trunks as her slash meets nothingness when I pull back. "Furthermore, we could grant you both support and protection should you choose to accept our offer."

Deja Vu! I've just been in this place before!

Higher on the street, on an elevation, my shots force her to retreat as she rises a shield. Now I know it's my time to go! Hitting the ground with the heels of my machine while my boosters gain heat, my Geki then shoots off, its speed straight into the Red Zone, as I raise my sword. Parried by the shield, my strike forces Shion backwards, descending on the small hill under my pressure. Now I gotta aim my other arm to her legs and she's as good as-

A flicker on the edge of my view, a circle of my controls lets me side step at the last second, avoiding the blade that wanted to cuddle my head visor. More muffins I send their way as I retreat on a street, dashing backwards. Unable to give chase immediately, the Pickles have to remain stationary and I can sigh for a sec.

So, I wipe the sweat off my forehead as I leave my machine walking backwards on auto. "Standing on my feet, it's so hard when I try to be me."

"Hm? What did you say?" Mion asks, losing the cold as she unlocks the shock.

Fuck, I forgot the private line was still on. Well, I rather them hear one of my dumb jokes or songs instead of having to actually deal with their words. Your obnoxious insistence is getting on my nerves, Pickles. Can't you take a fucking hint and see that I'm in no mood to talk?

"… You seemed to be singing, cadet," Mion softly says, the warning of the radar coming up right after. "Do you not deem us as a threat, perhaps?"

"… I'm doing all I can as of now." To keep you both away from Meiya and Tsukuyomi-san, to make a decent enough impression, to not snap despite the acid raising in my throat and the needles falling right on top.

"Looks like that, indeed," Shion then chuckles, and groans a sec later as my shots embrace her shield. "Your sidesteps look quite nimble and precise, cadet. May I ask where you learned such a maneuver?"

Crouching and diving away, a kick I send to Mion's unit, tumbling it down, before I jump away from Shion's paint hose. "I just move as I think it's best, is all. What, is there something you have against my piloting?" If they did find a difference with his and my way of moving, that'll only work to blow my cover, dammit.

Both focus their fire on me, leaving a sticky mess that resembles a murky bog more than a street. Yet, instead of doing so in a straight line, they sway and spray their shots, as if the road were full of small curves. Inhaling sharply, retracting my tongue, once more I stomp the pedals and start to spin and rebound. Erratic zigzags on the ground, I draw sharp triangles with my jumps, firing off one of my few remaining 120mm shells before taking the next street In-In-In, taking shelter behind a few skyscrapers. Thank God Chizuru left the location of the central district marked in our radars, if I can take them there I should be able to at least take one down without showing off too much.

Yet, their dots don't have any hurry in chasing after me. A small chuckle reaches my ears, amused for real. "You truly are very skilled, cadet," Mion says, normal and without anything covering her words. "Almost as if you were trained by true elites, one could say."

"… Thanks, I guess." And I was trained by some of the best soldiers one could find, many times over.

Taking cover in between the buildings, I scan the radar and sonars. Yet, they're barely emitting a sound. From the looks of it, they're walking really slow. As if they had no hurry… as if…

As if their goal was to get me away from the rest, I see. Yeah, just as I thought. They should have more accurate data of Tsukuyomi-san's position, she must still be dealing with Meiya. So, they're playing along with my 'diversion'. Should I take the chance and get shot down? No, they'll just be free to do whatever they want with me until Tsukuyomi-san ends the fight with Meiya. They might try to open my cockpit and have a close and personal talk. I can't simply expect them to play by the rules anymore, there's no guarantee that they won't do something drastic now. I think Tsukuyomi-san was bothered by my answers during the meeting, but I can't deny that they might choose to do something crazy to see whether I'm him or not.

"It would be a crying shame if you were to be placed in court over this error in the databases," Mion says, slow and tender, as careful as if she were sewing.

"Indeed, cousin of mine," Shion replies immediately, low and sober as she does. "Would you truly not welcome our offer, cadet? Regardless of these issues, you might be able to find what was of your relatives during your absence."

"I'd have to agree," The other retorts. "It would be most unfortunate if you were convicted over this contrarian attitude you're endowing. All it takes are a few days, and you could perhaps find some of your relatives still live."

…

In my ears zooms in the static, a rock is cracking. The edges of my eyes hurt, as if something were sinking them into my skull. For even if I know I should not react, I still find my knuckles bending, my teeth tensing. My skin crawls, shaving against a wall, the paint over the steel fading to the crudity that rests below. Rolling over and over, letting out quite the smoke like a tire kept in place, merely sigh and repine within is all I should do. However, I don't feel like staying silent anymore.

"… What do you even know of my family?"

"Huh?"

All that happened in my world, having failed to protect them, not even knowing if mom and dad are safe back there. How she died in this world, how dad was probably forced to keep slaving at the Guard just to keep him safe, how he died and you nobles threw little me away without any care…

"While I can understand your duty as public servants to survey the error in my data banks, you two are crossing a line you should not even be tapping. You know jack shit about my life, you don't even know me, you've no right to say anything about my family, my decisions, or my future. So, if this is all you wanna say, kindly fuck off and shut up."

"Excuse me, well," Mion coughs, dispelling the shock and stutter that almost surfaced, "we meant no offense, cadet. However, employing such hostility shan't give you no boons. I wonder, why are you showing such aggressiveness towards us?"

"You were rather welcoming during our talk in the track field, after all," Shion complains, sour and low.

"Because I already told you enough, yet you keep on pushing. You're not related to me, so if you don't mind…"

Pushing the controls forward, once the boosters regained their fire I blast away into the sky, using a roof as trampoline. In just a few seconds, their frames enter my view and radar, and like moth towards a fire do my bullets chase the Zuikakus.

"I rather continue the battle." So just drop it. I already talked enough, I already asked you to stop.

One of them stands its ground, and with a quick step forward it reflects my aggro back at me. Deactivating a jump unit, I spin away from the Zuikaku, which slams its shield against a poor buildings. The windows sink in, the steel glued to the concrete as all the paint exploded into the deserted offices. Yet, the Zuikaku quickly procures its blade and once more charges at me like a bull seeing red, forcing a parry, starting another dance.

"Quite rude of you, cadet," Shion says, I can practically see the frown through her voice, dry as if she only had lemonade to drink all day long. "We are only extending a fair helping hand towards you."

"And I already asked you to leave it be."

"It is only right for us to do so," she insists as she tumbles a few lightposts, crushes a few cars when chasing after me. "Perhaps, could we teach you how to juggle all these issues you're dealing with?"

Hopping against a crumbled TSF, I evade her slash. Opening fire on her, all I manage to do is fill the torn cockpit with paint. "I'm very good at juggling my own problems, thank you very much." A beep in the radar, a crouch and a dash, the broken remains are filled with more paint while I retaliate with the rifle mounted on my pylon.

Which forces Mion to jump away, circling my surrounding area as she closes the distance. "Why must you refuse us so strongly? It isn't as if we were going to place a voodoo curse on you."

And while I rush out of the street, Shion tails my steps as if it were part of my shadow. Her ID again bumping in my vision, a small chuckle fades in slowly, "You truly would benefit much from listening to us. It's for the greater good that you mend the data banks as soon as possible, otherwise your efforts thus far shall be pointless if you're taken to court."

Deep breaths, stay cool. Zig to the right, zag to the left, crouch and try to stand up immediately after, keep on swaying, keep on running. So long as my machine keeps on wobbling so slightly, they won't be able to lock onto it. I just gotta drag the fight out until Meiya gets shot down, so that the CP takes over once I'm down.

Giving the controls a light rest from the choking and yanking, I sigh and breath with my mouth open. Feeling my heartbeats as I do, feeling the cold shiver on my head, my feet remain set on their rhythm, my Gekishin keeps changing lanes and streets, taking some sharp corners and trading paint with the walls as I manage to keep the Pickles at bay for the moment.

A dot starts to close the distance, another takes a different street. A choke point, huh. Let's take a shot!

Moving my feet up causes the boosters to gradually stop, and with a hop on the ground my unit circles on itself before going back the way I came. Shortly after, the Zuikaku enters my sight, having little time to avoid the blade aimed at its head, sparks flying off when steel meets steel.

"Bold of you to face me head on," Shion grunts, her unit bends its knees for a low strike, which I evade. Her boosters ignite and my own slash meets a building, she chuckles again. "Sadly for you cadet, I doubt you're a fair match for me," She keeps on chuckling as our small strikes keep on missing their target in the cramped space of the ruins.

Dust and pieces of concrete gently fall on the broken street as sparks fly off when we parry each other again. And I suppose she must be as low on ammo as me, if she isn't using her guns now.

"I dunno, I'm keeping up well enough against you two here."

"And that is worth quite the praise. But, you see…" her voice slows down, fades down as her unit remains still, before taking the Mugen stance of Maya-sensei's style, "someone once told me I was awesome with a blade, and I endeavor to be worthy of those words. Do you think you can best me now, Takeru?"

Charging like a rhino, the quick stream of slashes blur in my sight, yet the recoil and shaking runs all over my TSF when I parry. It's like a whirlwind, paired with the polished control of her boosters she's keeping me on my toes well enough, not letting me escape her lock. Pulling the lever and inputting the command, my pylon bends under my arm to rain pain on her. Yet, Shion had ample time to boost jump away from my firing line.

Guh… Closing an eye, I can feel the air seep through my teeth. For a second I almost dozed out of it, a small dojo coming into view. And a small and super pissed Shion also was in sight, pushing me back for some reason. I see… I guess that's how you were when you met him. As I run away from her paint, small images and distorted sounds come into my ears. A pair of hands raising, offering a pouting Shion a slice of strawberry cake. She and Mion laughing at a rather desolate shogi board on his end. And then, as he was drawing a graph in a page, both Pickles were bickering over something in the table.

And then, when I blink, the gray skies extend, looming over me. The smell of gunpowder, the sirens blaring nonstop, the agitation clanging on my chest. And both of them, frowning my way with those lightless, cruel eyes they endowed during the CCSE.

" It is a waste of resources, they shall perish either way. It is more beneficial for the IRG, and the Empire, that the available supplies are used to tend to those who can still make themselves useful." Mion states, with a brush of her hair she then glares at me, eyes blazing.

"… Have some empathy? Do you think these people can protect others? They cannot even tend to themselves as it is. We are only safeguarding the supplies and the correct defense lines to protect those who still would offer flesh and blood for our nation. It is all for the greater good, for the future of our Empire." Shion asserts, slicing the air with the finger which she raises, her lips and cheeks contorting backwards as if smelling rot she were.

Cold, uncaring, dismissive, grayed out. Lightless, ruthless, echoing the same words over and over. Are they even alive anymore?

…

They're not who I once saw them as, I already should know that. Lying and backstabbing those who they don't deem valuable is not beyond them. Why am I even giving heed to their words, again?

I want to build a decent future. I want to hear laughter echo through me, feel the smell of the gardens rush into me. A life of only servitude sucks, there's no happiness to be found there. To discard others when you deem them unusable, to forsake their potential when you yourselves are who send them to the wolves…

Why am I holding back again? Why am I being patient with these two?

I already had to deal with quite the issues regarding my identity in my first loops. If I could make myself useful, invaluable back then without Sensei, then there's little to fear now. I ain't snapping, but I also won't simply let them make fun of me, and him.

Breathing in, moving my controls as I do, my Gekishin jumps sky high. And crashing onto a building, I rebound off it and fire away at the Zuikaku that was tailing me. Shion has next to no time to step back, and my feet come down hard onto the ground in front of her. Never letting the pedals go, using the momentum and weight to my advantage, my slash buries her gun onto a building.

"Aren't you really nimble?" Shion says, grunting again when she retaliates and I met the parry. "I wonder, did you also have an awesome role model to follow after in your sword lessons?"

"I'm done with your questions, 2nd Lieutenant."

"Oh? What is it?" She asks, some delay in her words. "I'm merely curious about-"

"Take a fucking hint already. If this is all you'll say, I'll drop the connection." Taking a step back, I threaten to use my gun, which causes her to jump. Heh, fell for it.

Yet, when I rush forward with a crouch to dice at her legs, the boosters extend their impulse and she lands further away. Instead, my low stance ends up countering an avalanche of a strike as we again dance in between collapsed buildings.

"You're being quite rude, Takeru."

"Sigh. Is that all?"

"Look, we're only trying to help you out, is all. What will you do if you are taken to court? Don't you see how much danger you're in?!" She lashes out, both voice and strikes.

"I know, but that ain't gonna stop me. I'll despair after I'm dead."

"Huh? What did you…" She freezes in her tracks, sword in midair.

"What you heard. No matter what comes my way, I'll face it head on as best as I can. And you're no exception!" Swinging my blade repeatedly at her, I take my Mugen rhythm. Shion's movements are starting to become unfocused the more she parries my swings.

"W-Wait a second, Takeru! We're not your enemies!"

"Yeah, right. Check the radar and give it another go."

"Mmgh… You know what I'm talking about!"

"Can't say I do, no. I'm lost as a penguin in a desert, to be honest."

Her voice chokes on itself, as if water had gone into her lungs, while the parries regain their sturdiness, while I can't press her unit to retreat anymore.

"Aren't you a little too confident. Maybe you need a few hit to that head of yours, to remember who you're dealing with!" She screams, some of her hits grazing my shoulders and outer leg armor. I parry her attacks, also hitting the end of her shoulders, then force her blade to descend. Yet, before I could raise my gun at her cockpit, she boosts away.

Fuck, I thought I'd be able to finish her off by now. I don't wanna risk any of my aerial charges, if I miss my timing I either break my Gekishin or end up skewering them in half. It'd be easy if I bait her and boost backflip behind her unit, but the Gekishin is too heavy. I don't know if I can pull that off on the move well enough. Also, Mion is getting closer again. I have to finish this quickly.

Yet, she's using the Mugen Kidou as well, and a similar style to mine at that, so I can't find an opening in her flow despite me being somewhat serious right now. I'm sure Shion finished her training with Maya-san, so I'm not sure I can actually overpower her in CQC either. I may have some good experience with the Gekishin, but if I keep on duking it out for real my cover will be blown to bits. Sigh… If only I was allowed to use a small grenade…

A high guard she takes, then Shion once more comes towards me. "Is this your limit, Takeru?! At this rate you're gonna bite the dust!"

"Says the one who can't beat a mere Cadet." I roll my eyes, rechecking the map and the sonar. Huh, Meiya's still going at it? Wow.

"Oho? Look at you, being all brave," Shion then chuckles a bit. "Do you really think you can stop my unending waterfall of attacks?" She says as she dashes backwards, raising her blade above her shoulder.

Recalling those days in the dojo, I can only sigh and hunch over.

"Hm? What is it?" She asks, not coming after me.

Inhaling sharply, a small grasp and circling on the controls makes my Gekishin endow my own stance. Shion gasps, but her Zuikaku seems to lower its stance further, as if preparing to counter. Feeling the shiver on the back of my head, I don't bite it down now. Let me see how she fights, lend me your strength.

…

Slowly letting the air go with my nose, slowly pushing the pedals, everything but the Zuikaku in front of me blurs away. My lips move, counting, waiting, and my hands remain quiet even when her machine starts approaching me. Meeting the blade, a step back to repel the follow up, force into the counter to freeze her advance. And now, she should take her step back. And once she does-

The impulse molds my back to the seat, my jump units igniting both modes straight into the overload warning. Carnage and dust fall upon the buildings nearby as my sword runs through them, before hitting the Zuikaku right on the side of the cockpit.

The machine falls down on the ground, one arm then also crumbling in defeat as the rest of the body causes cracks on the street. Dust and pieces of glass shower down the area, and a bit of concrete falls off the top of the poor building I eviscerated, hitting the Zuikaku's horn and bouncing off it.

Sigh… I won.

"Ugh…" Shion grunts, as if running her tongue in between her teeth. "How on Heavens did you… Ugh. Damn it all…" A small sound reaches my ears, she seems to have just hit the controls quite hard.

"Well, I guess this is my win. Thanks for the fight, 2nd Lt," I say, low, as I turn around and start closing off the connection with her unit.

"Wait a moment! How did you anticipate my movement just now?"

"I just read your patterns, is all. Not my fault you always attack in the same way, you dumb pickle. "

"Huh? W-What… What did you-"

Hm? Why is she stuttering now? Oh, shit. Right, I'm not supposed to call them like that. Guess using his knowledge now had a bit of a side effect. Eh, not much to worry about, I guess.

"Hey Takeru! What did you call me just now?!" Shion sounds agitated, and she's again hitting her cockpit.

"You lost, Shion Tsukuyomi. So you should remain quiet. Dead people don't talk." Except me, I guess.

"Screw that! Why did you call me-

"Because your hair is all green and long, and you sound a bit bitter. That's why, you're a pickle."

"What… But…"

"And I guess you could say your cousin is now in quite the pickle, too."

"Takeru, do you-"

"Guess you were no match for my sickle."

"Wait, did you just-"

"Shion, remain silent," Mion joins in, her dot now visible in my radar. "You're no longer part of the exercise, so you cannot talk any further."

"But Mion, those words… Takeru, explain yourself!" She sounds absolutely livid. I better get outta here.

"I refuse."

"What?!"

"I already said all I wanted to."

"Wait, I'm-" Her voice cuts off as I drop the connection.

Simply by moving my head visor, I could distinguish the frame closing in on me. I shoot at Mion, she moves to the left and retreats into a street, then returns the pleasantry of paint from afar. Well, if it's a chase you want, a chase you shall get!

We play chase for a while, trying to get an opening, to disable the other's hands. I try to catch her off-guard with my zigzags, but she managed to avoid most of my shots. Her paint sticks to the edges of my Gekishin as her rounds explode close, too close, as I zigzag and backboost at random. My own ammo is running low, so she can be more aggressive with her long range assaults. So, I dash towards the spot Chizuru had mentioned, using the skyscrapers and apartment buildings as shelter from the paint downpour.

So, after a few seconds of chasing each other in this part of the city, Mion opens the private channel again and her calm and cold voice reaches my ears.

"Your maneuvering is very good, cadet. You have my respect for your dexterity," she does sound commanding like Tsukuyomi-san, but she lacks that… edge? Depth? I dunno, but she's still not at Tsukuyomi-san's level.

"Thanks. Everyone seems to think I'm too reckless, though."

Doing another boost jump, a spiral of paint rushes behind me, yet her Zuikaku merely stops out of range, taking aim and trying to snipe me. A single feet dives into the concrete, the bullet misses me by a hair, as the shaking lets me know. Heh, looks like this pickle has quite the sickle in her hands.

"Hmm, perhaps they are correct," Mion notes, still slow and tranquil. "And what of your technique with a sword? I cannot believe you've bested my cousin, truth be told."

"I think I told you I'm done doing the answering." She rushes forward and so I do, yet I again spin, breaking more windows and lunging for the head.

Crouching, she avoids the hit. Boosting, she evades the follow up. Standing up, she parries the downwards slash. "And why would you hoist such animosity towards us? If this is about the CCSE, I apologize for my behavior then."

"Oh, for trying to make me disappear on the mud, you mean?"

"Uh, well… I was only concerned of an unknown being near the one we watch over. I don't hold any desire to antagonize you, cadet."

"… Yet, you guys keep on bringing up how I could be taken to court. Despite how I already did all I could and asked you to back off."

"There is a clear risk for you with the error in the databases! I know I am reiterating myself, yet I insist you visit the Capital."

"Sigh… You really can't just let this go? Didn't your sister tell you? I'm dealing with this on my own terms, if you guards start mingling in my affairs it'll only bring me trouble later."

"I do not believe that is true," Mion says, losing the coolness and turning acidic, as her machine stops the strikes, takes a few steps back and merely remains in position. "We of the Royal Guard only act to safeguard our fellows, all we do is for the greater good of the Empire."

"… All you do is justified, huh."

"Eh?

Is abandoning a little kid also for the greater good? Exploiting his trust just to have his father keep serving you until his death? Leaving him without dinner, trapped with no choice but to either be erased or become your servant? Were those memories of Shura's Dance also for the greater good?

For the new world that would rise by dawn? For the sake of humanity? It's so easy to justify yourself when you use noble causes to explain your actions. You're not sending your soldiers towards endless BETA hordes with less than optimal supplies while refusing to deploy the G-Bombs, you're safeguarding humanity's victory. You didn't use them as meat shield, they made a valiant sacrifice for the future. You didn't release the aliens in the middle of a training exercise when they had no weapons, you only put the base to the test so that they gained the proper mindset for the battles that would come. It was for the greater good, there was abso-fucking-lutely no other way forward, was it now?

"It must be nice, to have a monopoly on the moral high ground."

"Excuse me?"

"I can understand you being suspicious of someone who comes from out of nowhere, someone with odd intel in his profiles. I get that, and it's reasonable. But the moment you demand to arrange and take control of my private matters, that's when you cross a line you never should be tapping, Royal Guard."

"Uh, ah… I was only expressing my concern towards your situation, and extending a hand if-"

"What's next, then? If I say no again, what comes afterwards? You're gonna call me a dead man? You're gonna threaten to have me die again?"

"Wait a moment, please. I never said anything of the sort!"

"Do you think I'm dumb, Tsukuyomi? You people seem to know who I was, going by how much you're insisting. Yet," I take a breath slowly, trying and failing to douse the heartbeats, the drill that keeps on pounding my neck and head, "instead of accepting my answers, you grow more and more incisive. And ever since I came back to the Empire, you people have been treating me like shit. Calling me names behind my back, spitting on my face despite my best efforts to try to fit in, looking at me as if I were a criminal. You Royal Guards in particular have been real dicks with me, both in the CCSE and back at the base, too. You all act nice and proper in front of the common folk, but you're all nothing but hypocrites who prefer to do things by force!"

"What… did you-"

"My data was wiped clean from your databases while I wasn't here, and you all are accusing me of being some sort of criminal. And despite my best efforts at explaining my situation to your sister, you're still gunning at me to do what you want me to do. Ain't that a bit suspicious?"

"Wait, cadet! Please don't misunderstand our intentions. I do relent that we acted out of place during the CCSE, and that your situation is very delicate, but precisely because of that we are offering you our hand. I apologize for my attitude then," Mion lowers her blade, both the real one and the one in her words, "however, let me clarify something. We are not after your life nor is there any ploy regarding the missing data. We of the Royal Guard are merely suspicious of you due to the state of your profiles, which was only caused by an unfortunate error. If you could come to the Capital to deal with this matter, no further inquiries would be needed."

"The Guard isn't the government, and I already explained to your General what I wish to do. Why do you keep insisting so much on this, to the point of using a private frequency?"

"Your standing should be clarified, Cadet Shirogane. If you refuse us so firmly, we could reach the conclusion that you are hiding something. If you have nothing to hide and wish to mend this error, why not accept our aid? Do you not wish to know who you were before you lost your memories?" She asks, and while Mion's tone is still as imposing as a mountain, now there's also a slight soft undertone in them. Slowly spoken, as if concerned, like a teacher or a friend giving true advice.

And yet, her words only burn my ears, cause my stomach to turn as the small girl choking on cake and the ruthless soldier overlay in my mind's eye. Sighing, I shake my head and lick my lips. "I already told your sister what I plan to do if it comes to that, and I think I'll be fine. Can you all really not simply accept I wanna, I dunno, have a clean slate?"

"… It would be unproper of a Royal Guard to look away when a fellow would require aid."

"Then, if you insist so much, tell me, Tsukuyomi. What do you know about me that makes you insist so much?"

"It's only natural for a Royal Guard such as me."

"Really? Why did you refer to me as 'fellow' right now, though?"

"… I do not know what you're talking about." She's clamping up, freezing over again. "All I know is, you should refrain from making any hasty decisions before seeing what data might remain in the Capital's data banks. So, I once again suggest you pay a visit to Tokyo when you can."

"Then there is no reason for us to talk."

I go at her with my blade and we start to trade blows, destroying some of the buildings to our sides. Dust and cars fly away, I cannot break the ice of her defense.

"You're truly good. I didn't knew Americans were so adept in the use of a blade." She says in a slow, soft tone.

"Sorry to inform you, but I'm Japanese."

"I was not implying anything foul, cadet," She repines, fuming a bit. Our swords locked again in a struggle, two opposite currents crashing against one another. "I was only complimenting your dexterity, and mentioning how it is clear you must have received some tutoring while on the Empire to possess such skill with a blade," Mion says, again soft and slow, composed, as her machine gives me some respite, taking a low guard stance.

Wait, that stance… Right, Tsukuyomi-san's own stance. Think, how can I best her? No, shouldn't I just end this battle here?

"And I can see you have indeed learned in this nation of ours," she says, firmly.

"Why?"

"Your patterns, and your targets. Dazzling and fast, flickering as a candle's fire, yet focused and restrained. I concur that many might deem you reckless, yet I believe you resemble… a chained fire blast, a reveling flare in protection."

"… Huh?"

"You do not fight with killing intent, you haven't truly tried to aim at my cockpit or engines nor have resorted to foul play. And during the early stages of the fight, you safeguarded your comrades instead of chasing after possible vantage points," she tells, softly and rousing, as if she were smiling. "After all, we fight not to further our own interests, but to protect the powerless."

Nibbling at my bottom lip, an image of Meiya, my Meiya, appears in a dojo. When she taught that odd stance on the mountain, before she announced our engagement to the rest of the Group in an official manner. And it was the same for the other, the one from my loops, that still tried to remain with me despite the troubles it must have given her. Yet, his memories tell a different story. You and Shion didn't even spare a gaze his way, didn't even care about the state of that madness so long as you got your way.

Are they guilty now? Is that why they insist so much on having me go to the Capital? But then, what's this void that fills my chest now? This stab on my heart as if I were out of breath, as if I had literal threads of steel going down my throat?

"So, lets us end this duel in a fitting manner," Mion says, firm and sturdy, bringing me back to Earth. And her Zuikaku was again employing the Mugen stance.

… If I refuse, she'll assume I really have something against them. It's either they thinking I'm not him or that Yuuko is influencing me. But, if this is how she chooses to do things… Taking a deep breath, placing a hand over my chest, feeling my heartbeats again, the cold hands again poke my sides. And behind all that mess, behind the gray skies and the war… there's one simple wish, the one wish that I suppose is what we share, what allows me to remember his memories. The one thing we have in common, despite our lives being so different.

Remembering what happened to my world, the feelings I felt when seeing your memories, letting the anger seep out, drain off me. I gulp, grabbing once more the joysticks tightly. Holding my breath, I then point my blade at the Zuikaku.

"Fine. But let me make something clear to you," I say while taking my Mugen stance, prepping up the jump units.

"What are you talking about?" I can feel the nervousness in her, the edge in her voice.

Let's drive the last nail into you, Mion. If you truly were a friend of him, if you truly are as concerned as you claim to be, then you should react to these words. Maybe this will let you believe I'm not a faker, or if you're the enemy it'll only cause me more problems. Still, if I am to stay here, I do plan on keeping my word, on following after that desperate wish I heard during the CCSE.

Because when I cried out for help after light's out, no one was there. So I shall shoulder this task on my own, I'll be the spark they need me to be.

So, taking a deep breath, letting go of the act, and allowing me to be honest for just a second, the fire of those days, those days before Iceberg, those hours before Ouka, and that moment by the reactor right before the transfer.

"Hear me well, Tsukuyomi. I fight not because of some greater goal or some vain motive. To give a smile to our future, to put a stop to all this suffering is all I really want."

"Huh?"

"I am Takeru Shirogane, and what want the most is to have my fucking peace back!" Pushing, crushing the buttons, my jump units flare up and slowly turn into a pair of flamethrowers, ready to send me to high five the sky.

"Cadet Shirogane, please wait! I was just-"

Heel on the pedals, a quick push of the stick, I charge at her. "And if you get in my way," raising my blade, letting it ride the gale that will guide it to Mion's cockpit, I endure the sudden boost and push onward, "I'm going to crush your fangs!"

Mion didn't try to block or dodge, even as I grew closer and closer. Biting my lips, I have to let go of the controls at the last second to not crash into her frozen machine. The sudden shaking tosses me around for a second, yet my training sword still hits her Zuikaku on the head, sending it to crash against the ground, making concrete fly off and dust to spread around. Unable to simply stop, my Gekishin starts to fall over, so I yank the controls in a panic to stop it. So, I end up using my sword to support my weight.

… And the dummy blade ends up resting on the Zuikaku's cockpit, the signal from Mion vanishing from my radar. Did I just defeat her?

Wait, is she alright? I suppose she should, since I did avoid a direct hit at full speed. Sigh… Why did she got so tilted? Maybe Maya-san also wrote a poem for her style in this world? Hmm… I didn't think of that in the heat of moment. Did… I fuck this up?

"Tsukuyomi, can you hear me?"

"Yes," Mion spoke up with a hushed, timid tone. Quiet, like a child trying to not wake up its parents. "I suppose this is your victory, cadet."

"I guess…" So much for getting shot down before things got bad. "I'll be on my way."

Hopefully, they'll lay off for a while. I'm real tired of having to be on my guard all the time. Sometimes, I can't help but feel this is all pointless, sometimes I find myself thinking on how to go to the other world in the Betaverse, to the people I know are my friends. But then, I see Kasumi doing her best to carry all those babel towers of papers, I see Yuuko braving her exhaustion, I see the captain trying all she can to train the Valkyries despite the constant losses of her unit.

And then I dream of my world, like I did today. So I know I can only move forward, but it gets tiring. Especially when his sadness creeps up, like during my fights with you two pickles, and it also spurs the echos if Iceberg in the distance. Sigh…

"Wait, cadet! Where did you hear that last phrase? How do you-"

"I'm done here. Farewell, 2nd Lieutenant," I cut the connection and block her ID, exiting the private frequency they had linked.

I guess Yuuhi must not have taken my words very well. I'd like to think she wouldn't try and erase me, but his memories point elsewhere. Yuuko did say she thought you and her were in good terms somehow, and if you remained in the IRG there must have been something worth protecting there. Maybe Yuuhi and the Pickles changed after the invasion, maybe he had something to do with that. Maybe his death fucked them up real bad, and that's why they're insisting so much.

But that might be only wishful thinking on my end. They kept on pressuring me about the risk of me getting called to court, so that's their biggest concern. That his existence is exposed. Under normal circumstances, I wouldn't mind to go to the Capital and deal with this stuff myself. But my life isn't solely mine anymore, my world is on the line too. Until the ripples are stabilized, I can't take any chances. So, I can only hope and wait, see if my words do their job or end up raising more fire my way.

Now, let's check the radar… Meiya's signal is gone. Tsukuyomi-san is the only one remaining on the field, and she's getting closer. And quick at that. Thankfully, it seems we're gonna cross path right where Chizuru wanted to ambush them. Maybe with the narrow space we'll have I could actually try and fake a fight before getting shot down on purpose.

Running a hand over my face, I move my neck in circles and roll my shoulders up and down. Entwining my fingers and extending my arms forward, I do the same with my legs. Once the stiffness leaves me, I slowly start walking forward.

"Sigh… No use in standing around or running away. Let's go finish this."

Despair After Death

A/N: This chapter contains scenes of blood and violence, graphic descriptions of gore, and death of the brutal variety.

Reader discretion is advised

I repeat.

Reader discretion is advised.

---

"It's always pale and hopeless

The emptiness draws walls on me

They come in and reel me along

It's you who feels the light's goin'

To feel the past you left on me,

just like the stuck goodbye

It's you who d ies, in hundreds

The emptiness inside of me

k eep s you out from my mind

You' re always wrong and rest less

Incessant words draw on me,

' c ause I know what you'll find

Have you heard of ' full-on denial'?

Have you heard that 'one night can change her'?

And, you had the chance to become me?

Ever heard that chances can probe at you?

Take it in, you know you could stop it

Take it in, and you' ll have to stop it

Scream it out, you have to do it

Shout it out, "I have to do it!"

Emptiness strikes you out of nowhere

Emptiness don't need any Heavens

F r ee the longing that's fading out of me!

Emptiness takes you to the silence

Emptiness makes me wanna cry

F r ee the strange you that's holding your heart down !

Emptiness strikes you out of nowhere

Emptiness don't need any Heavens

F r ee the fire that's burning all through me!

Emptiness takes you to the silence

Emptiness makes me wanna cry

F r ee the darkness that's falling down right now!

Stronger Desire! "

Emptiness and, by Takeharu Ishimoto. The World Ends with You, Nintendo DS and Switch .

---

Chapter 69:

Da'at - Despair After Death

---

December 3 rd . Almost 10 AM.

(Ruin ed Battleground .)

[Takeru]

---

A small trembling shakes my legs as my Gekishin treads through the street, the tumbled and half-broken supply crates, the blasted remains of other TSFs, the general abandonment that's a staple of these ruins filling the view. A few shadows cast on me as I walk, a few threads of light squeeze through the tall skyscrapers, some wind roars through the street and makes smallest things flutter. All the while the last remaining dot continues to approach my position, never losing speed.

I'm almost out of ammo, on a Gekishin, and walking towards a Takemikazuchi. How am I not losing it is a mystery to me. I took some damage fighting the Pickles, so, if she wants to, Tsukuyomi-san can easily dispose of me in a matter of seconds. Pulling some insane dodging isn't out of my options, but I rather not expose any more of my skills if I can help it.

"Something tells me she won't do that, though." Licking over my drying lips, the odd taste of the skin and the cracks in it send a shiver down my spine. Short of helping me chill, it's making me more nervous. The silence, the repetition of the shaking as I walk onward, the echoes in the back of my head, I can only sigh while scratching an ear.

As the red frame appears on my view when it took a turn, I stop the motions and take a fighting stance. She also stops some distance away from me yet doesn't assume a battle position, her Take merely stands there under the daylight as if it were posing for a photo session or some shit. A beep in my ears, the same confirmation screen pops up in my view. The lines of neon red and blue, the request for a private line. Sigh… Say no, make them paranoid. Say yes, have to deal with their words. I again tap the controls, activating the recording, as I shake my head and also accept the encrypted connection. I do wonder if Cpt Isumi will do anything about this, even if she can't hear everything they tell me, my answers and the formation of the private connection should be coming up in my status. Maybe she's just keeping watch in case they do something stupid?

The icon of Blood 1 enters my frequency, immediately bumping up as a noise reaches my ears, a bit of coughing. "I never thought you'd be able to best both cousins, cadet Shirogane. Aren't you a gifted one?" Her sharp yet calm tone tells me all I needed to know, she's not gonna let me off easily.

"I merely did my best, 1st Lt. They sought a challenge, and I retaliated in kind. Them pickles were no match for my sickle, their attacks didn't even tickle."

"I see," composed and still as an ice waterfall, she remains serious. "I assume they both have tried to platicate with you already. Have you given some more thought to our previous offer?"

"Sigh… The answer hasn't changed, 1st Lt Tsukuyomi." There go my attempts to keep this light and peaceful, any more puns will be wasted on her ears.

"Is that so?" Small sparks fly off, sharpening her voice. "May I inquire on the reasoning?"

"Look, can you please just drop it? I… I can understand the concerns you must have, to find someone like me in this base, on Mitsurugi's squad no less. But, that ain't reason enough for you to pressure me on how should I deal with my own personal matters. I already told you all I could, please stop insisting."

A small puff of air she releases, groaning softly. "Yet, it is most foolish on your part to refuse our aid. It would not sit well with me, to turn my eyes away from the woes of a son of a fellow Royal Guard. If you have recalled anything about your father, then you already have enough intel to make a solid defense. If your recollections match with the intel in our profile banks, then this whole matter can be resolved at once. Wouldn't that be on your best interests, cadet?"

"That's assuming many things, and ignoring all the risks. Please, stop it." Again raising my blade, my boosters start to heat up.

"I know not of what you speak of, could you kindly enlighten me?" She asks, a whirlwind of dry ice meets my initial strike.

"Well, if you insist," I take a deep breath, giving the controls a few squeezes, licking and nibbling at my lips as we share a few slow slashes, as if testing the other's speed. "There is no guarantee that my claims will be accepted in the first place. In this nation, the second someone is branded as a criminal they're sent to prison for a month, and the only easy way out is for the accused to plead guilty. No way in hell the authorities will simply shrug and accept my words."

I know that's true, there was one time Uncle Koetsu told me of how he had to go bail out dad when he visited a shopping mall for the first time. You have to pay for everything you buy in its respective floor instead of taking everything to a single cashier, and since Uncle thought that to be common knowledge he didn't tell dad about it. Which caused the alarms to beep when he tried to leave a floor, and despite him apologizing and trying to go back to the cashier they called the cops on him.

Of course, no one was actually going to accuse him of theft since the cameras recorded how he instantly bowed down and all, but… dad told me he never looked the same way at cops and the guys at the posts on the roads the same, since those cops he met that day kept pushing him into admitting he was planning to steal something, to force a conviction. They didn't let him leave for a few days, until Uncle went with a representative of the shopping mall to clear things up. That fear is why he and mom always reminded me to not grab anything without telling them and why they asked Sumika to tag along with me, since when I was little I didn't have a particularly sharp attention span, and I was kind of a jerk too.

And that's only for something minor, and with dad apologizing and all, and with him being 'one of them'. I've heard more serious stories of false accusations or people getting detained for almost a month over something they didn't do simply because someone else dragged them into a fight and later accused them of starting it. There's always lots of that kind of stuff echoing on the road, me and Mikoto heard some nasty rumors when we lazed about in the arcade or the shopping district. But it was kind of a taboo to speak about that back home, so I only ever brought it up if the news boasted about the 'perfect security system' we had going on. It's always the same though, everybody simply says that you should plead guilty, accept that you made a miss, bow down and take the blame. And while that is well and good for small mistakes like not knowing how things are sold in a shopping mart…

I ain't planning to find out what they do in this extremely nationalist Empire to people who fake their identity, and 'come from America' to boot. Honestly, if I ever have to restart this loop, I'm telling Yuuko to put I'm actually from the moon or some shit. I think I'd get less nasty looks if I said I'm a BETA or if I openly tell people I'm a time looper.

Small parries, dust kicks up. Fluid currents of slashes come my way, deflected as I stand my ground and recall Meiya's defensive advise, the nine points of contention. "And second, I find it quite odd that you're all insisting so much. One would think you have an ulterior motive." Pressure on the pedals, pressure on the sticks, pressure on my back as the rockets flicker and flare up.

"Excuse me?" Fire within the ice, cracks in the veil, delays in her counters.

"1st Lt Maya Tsukuyomi accused me of being a dead man when we met in this base, you yourself said to Mitsurugi that she should not involve herself with the likes of me and that you also would not do so."

Her Take jumps away, yet the cramped space of the street doesn't allow it to move far away enough. Having more speed is moot in the narrowness of all this rubble, and my slashes keep finding her blade, the simplicity of the Gekishin's patterns allow me to circumvent the limitations swiftly as opposed to her careful piloting. While her Take lightly steps on the road, gliding as if dancing a ballet of destruction when attacking, I simply keep moving forward, kicking cars, lightposts and whatever the hell those rusted metal parts are supposed to be as I frontally charge at Tsukuyomi-san, spinning and spinning, changing the place I strike with every swing.

"Then, the cousins tried to 'make me disappear in the mud' but received no punishment for their assassination attempt on my head. And despite me handing over the sword in good faith, despite how I protected Mitsurugi, you and the General have kept pushing for answers you do not deserve, since you're not the government and have not come with any documents that explains the inquiries."

Reaching the end of the street, she has to take a curve, decelerating to not eat bricks. Yet, I again manage to take it In-In-In with no loss of momentum and again lunge at her. She's easily parrying all of my attacks, but with so little space available Tsukuyomi-san has only a few choices left. She either keeps defending or she attacks me frontally. If she attacks, I lose on purpose, or not since I doubt I could measure up to a Type-00 with a Gekishin, modified or not. Yet, she merely matches my stride, a mirror in perfect reflection. Only that instead of the graceful and precise movement, I simply endow sharper and faster dodges on the curves. My fuel is running low and my leg joints are already in orange, but damn, I can't believe I'm actually crossing strikes with a Takemikazuchi. Isn't as if she wasn't trying entirely, either.

"And, what are you getting at, cadet?" She asks, blazing as my jump units when I boost away from her piercing rush, which instead breaks quite a few windows and rains glass shards all around us, reflecting the light.

"Well, I already spoke with you yesterday and told you my why I'm not reaching out to your organization. Yet, all of you seem to care quite a lot about how I could get taken to court. Is there anything you'd like to reveal to me, 1st Lt? Because I find your actions quite odd."

Choking for a sec, she then coughs again, regaining her chill as she gives me a breather. "You've listed a sequence of unfortunate events, nothing more. All of that was caused by the error that occurred to the databases. And we are trying to mend our mistakes by offering you our aid. While I comprehend your concerns, I can assure you that, if you accept our proposition, no claims will fall on your shoulders."

"And, if I still refuse?"

"… May I ask why would you?"

"I dunno, because something tells me I shouldn't? You already have the blade with you, no one will know of it ever being in my hands. If I get screwed, it's on me. It's easier for you to turn around and ignore me, isn't it? To let me take the fall on my own? Hell, if I go to prison, you and your relatives will get lots of praise for dealing with an outsider in a fitting manner, won't you ?"

"Insult me no further, cadet Shirogane. We're only acting in this way to guard you from any possible repercussions. I at the very least have no intention to leave your goodwill unrewarded," fast and furious are the flames and frost that she speaks, tone raising in bother and threat as much as her sword does now. "We of the Royal Guard are the protectors of the people, after all. It is in our honor code, for we are to safeguard our nation and fellows at all times. We are the Empire's vanguard, the Shogun's sword. To deceive you in such manner would be equal to treason towards the ideals we are meant to uphold, after all. By the by, have you heard of the honor code, cadet Shirogane?"

My brows narrow, my lips shrug as a few cold pokes tickle my sides."… Yes, I have."

"Oh?" She then remains silent for a sec, with only the windy howl running through the ruins reaching my ears. "What do you think of it, then? Is it not quite an inspiring mantra to follow?"

It would be easy to lie. Sighing, I roll my neck.

It would be easy to just say yes, or to move and fight again. Almost closing my eyelids, my lips retract.

It would be even easier to just shut up. But I shake my head, the cold hands now resting on my nape, leaning the chilly sensation over my back.

"No, I don't think so."

"Hm? May I ask why? I believe it is very rousing, and it allows our fellows to march on amidst the adversity," Tsukuyomi-san says with much affirmation, bright and warm as the incoming sunlight.

But still, my lips remain shrugged as I slowly take in some air. "If living with a potato sack over your head is what you prefer, by all means keep following that thing."

"Pardon me? Could you kindly explain yourself?"

"Sigh… I've heard similar codes and credos in my time in the military. All of 'em serve the same purpose, to dull the pain and give everyone a reason to keep walking. One could say they're a necessary part of the lifestyle, maybe of the lives of everyone affected by this long war."

"Then, why would you use such insulting a word as-"

"Because those codes are mistaken."

"… How so?"

"Those codes tell that all you gotta do is to look ahead, to stop looking around. Just move on without thought, until you eventually die. Be it forcing a smile and clamping your woes in the surface pilot code, sealing your troubles away with drugs or hypnotherapy, convincing you and the rest that you can only contribute by making your death count, or taking pride in embracing death as your out to reality."

So that you don't think much of all the casualties, of all the fuck ups the ones high above do, of all the unforced mistakes they make. And it ain't even about the war or the battles, where logistics already give us quite the middle finger on their own. Go and tell me that Yuuko puking her intestines out was justified, that the regime the IRG put her under in Sendai was justified because she was shouldering an honorable burden, because she'd embraced the risks and braved through the pain. Go and tell me my Meiya's struggles were justified, as all the members of the Group dunked on her, had her work deep into the night only to come back and barely manage to hold herself together.

Just because those bastards didn't approve of me they kept on pressuring her, to do what's right and 'make it up to the Group' for choosing 'someone who couldn't immediately contribute' to the business. From bed to work, from work to bed, no time to rest, no time to do anything other then serve and work. Until one fucking day she obviously could not go on, but the fever she had was proof enough it was too late for regrets. Oh, and of course that was my and her fault, due to all the 'stress' she had to deal with due to having 'an unworthy partner'.

And don't even get me started on all the bitching we had to deal with during my first loops after the shuttles were prepared, or in the horrid planning of Iceberg where most of the troops were sent only as meat shields, despite the G-Bombs we had. There was no need for that carnage, all that we required was to clear the lasers as we did in Operation 21st. And if we managed to hold out against BETA that used our tactics against us during last loop, it means that there was no reason for Iceberg to be the massacre that is was when we had the full support of the MDF and the IRG, plus the presence of the US Army. But guess what? Up until everything gets fuzzy, Iceberg was far worse than our offensive on Sadogashima during last loop.

Sighing again, relaxing the iron maiden my mouth had become, the noose my hands became over the controls, I shake my head as I hunch over. "I get it, I'm also a soldier. Sometimes, you gotta stand up, brush your teeth, get a mask in place and trudge on. Sometimes, it's days on end, week after week of meetings and plans that go wrong. Sometimes life's a bitch and keeps rolling you one after one on the dice. But even so, glorifying death as the ultimate solution should never become the standard mantra of any army."

People give their all in the war efforts, they leave their lives wherever it is they're fighting from, from Sensei to the patrolling MPs. So, just a little of empathy isn't such a great trade-off to ask, I believe. A simple small hope, small specks of progress in little details, to deter the constant deteriorating state, the bad news that keep on coming. But what does the system do to prevent all that doom and gloom from taking root? How do those high up protect their pawns? Short answer, they don't give a fuck. Trauma? Get drugs. Too much work? Keep at in even if you puke blood. Lack of supplies? Send a few noobs and bothersome squads as meat shields. Small repairs or little fixes? Deal with them on your own.

And they never pay for it. And those who try to help and make things work? They suffer accidents . Convenient accidents, I dare say.

"I do not believe your judgment to be correct, cadet Shirogane," she says, low and firm, an arrow in warning. "There is much that these codes do for our soldiers. It tells much about a person, they way in which they choose to perish."

"… And you think they want to follow those impositions?"

"Eh?"

"What if they don't get a say in it? I don't think the last seconds of a life can always serve to depict what kind of person one was."

Do you think my squad wanted to die to the Tanks during Iceberg? Do you think Chizuru's death meant anything as the acid dissolved her whole? Do you think Kei exploding to buy us a few seconds meant anything in the end? What did it say about Miki, to die screaming as her refurbished Gekishin failed at the most crucial time? What did the deaths in my world meant? What did it say about them, to die under a lightpost, to be electrocuted to death, to be burned alive, or to disappear in an explosion or in a cold hospital bed? Don't screw me with me, Tsukuyomi-san.

"It is most unproper, to dismiss the sacrifice of your fellows." She retaliates, raising a blade and reflecting some shine, both in real life and in her words.

So I can't help but to frown. "Even if there is no meaning to be honored in their passing?"

"What are you getting at, cadet?"

"Nothing too complex. A squad leader is taught to protect its underlings, and the more you scale the ranks, the more that responsibility grows. Yet, at some point of the chain, those mantras start popping up, people stop looking down, start waving hands dismissively or rolling their eyes. And those codes cannot be the sole answer to every issue we face."

It's always the same. And it ain't as if everyone was just looking elsewhere. Even during my first loops, despite most Americans being douches with a superiority complex who just wouldn't shut the hell up about how they were tired of being 'the international police', there were some who did try to make a good difference.

O'Connor was kind of a prick to Kasumi, but never did he leave his staff without proper supplies or time to tackle any random problem that popped up. And he did try to get us better units to pilot despite the reiterated negatives of the Empire, and did try to back us up when the food menu was changed. 2nd Lt Ziffer also was always trying to mediate between the American troops and ours during all the trainings, and actually used my squad as a role model for the other UN squads of the base that came in after the protection of the shuttles started. And Major Oliver always insisted to have our squad face off against their guys, to silence all the complains the newly stationed yanks had. He was a good comrade, despite being kind of an eccentric gun lover.

And they weren't alone in their struggles, either. Tama's dad kept on trying to keep things peaceful between the UN and the more intense ones in the MDF and IRG with Marimo-chan's help once she went back to being a Major in the Fuji Corps. And the few guards that lent me a hand in reaching Sensei back in Sendai also wanted to collaborate with us, despite the scorn they surely received. And back then, I think you also remained as our ally, Tsukuyomi-san. That's why-

"I think you could understand, 1st Lieutenant. Forging a new future is something only those who remain alive can do, and one day we will return to normality, despite whatever new troubles come our way. That's why I think it's better to part ways with those codes, all they do is ingrain the notion that to have a 'noble death' is the only card left for us. And that ain't true."

Otherwise, people will end up like the newer cadets of my first loops. Children taken from their homes, only knowing how to wield a gun. Having fun? Projects of their own? Hobbies, pastimes? No, their only dream was to pilot a Shiranui. And yeah, I better than anyone get how inspiring that can be, but if they don't gain anything beyond that then they're basically done for once the war is over. Not to mention, if all they can do is aim for a noble death then, what do we do with the survivors? Are you telling me there's nothing they can do to regain their own lives beyond being pawns in a chessboard? That they have no choice but to keep on fighting until they either die or keel over?

It makes me retch, want to spit out, it's as if I had something digging, clawing inside me, hollowing me out. And I know you wouldn't accept a future to end up like that, Tsukuyomi-san. Despite your cold facade, I'm sure you still tried to lend a hand so that things worked out during my first loops. I'm sure that same resolute yet almost motherly side you always showed me back home, be it when we lived together or when I married Meiya, has to be somewhere within you. That's why you're insisting so much, right? If you truly regret what caused him so much pain, if you don't want to have me be erased as he was, if you all are truly feeling guilt over his death, then you should know better than anyone what I'm trying to say.

Yet, I hear her sighing, heavily at that. "Those views may hold some value elsewhere, but in this Empire we must all stand together for the future of our nation." Another blizzard blasts off from her lips, the whip of a freezing bite lurking in her words. "Everyone must contribute something, and watering the roots of hope with one's own blood is nothing short of the greatest honor one could aim for. You stand today because someone sacrificed their life to protect this land of ours, we are still standing today because many bravely offered their blood to halt the invasion. To aim for a better future is remarkable, but you should never forget what you are required to do, cadet Shirogane. Otherwise, you… may lose your path if you wrongly assume everyone else to be against you, the only one who can see 'the truth'."

"… Then, all we can do is nod along and ignore the carnage around us?" Again, choking my controls, her words sink in my ears like viper's fangs.

"I never said anything of-"

" Is that how you operate, Royal Guard? Just discard anyone who isn't useful anymore, just keep sending pawns into the grinder?"

"Cadet Shirogane, do not mock me. I am merely allowing a conversation on this matter, do not test my patience."

" You're free to drop the private connection you yourself requested, then." With a simple jerk of the controls, my Gekishin starts running towards her, blade raising already.

Taking a low guard, she parries the strike. A flurry of slashes, a blurry whirlwind followed by the beeping in my ears, notifying me that my blade is on its last legs. And it's followed by a grunt, a forceful sigh as she fails to hit my legs. "Is this truly how you wish to conduct yourself, cadet? To bite the hand that offers you aid?"

"I already asked you to drop it. And it seems our views don't match, so there's little point for us to keep talking," I say, tensing my abs as I retract a feet of my unit, raising my blade while merely limiting myself to block the strong gale the red beetle sends my way.

"Why must you be this contrarian?" She complains, again sighing. "There is little that can be done at times to athwart dread from one's heart, that is why we hold onto such mantras. I can…" a small grunt as she deflects my strike, our blades locked as our TSFs tightrope on crumbling concrete, "only praise your desire to safeguard your fellows' future, yet there is much left for you to learn. Those who lead us can only do so much, and they too live by example to bolster our spirits. Perhaps, you could learn much by observing your superiors and those who watch over them Empire? I believe that- Ugh!"

Thrusting the controls even more forward, the tip of my blade makes contact with her head visor as my weight topples onto the red frame. As the daggers in the arms come out and meet the light, cutting the air and aiming for my wrists, my feet stomp the pedals, ramming my Gekishin onto her machine. Jumping away is all she can do to break away, to not fall down flat on her ass, yet a quick shot of my gun sends a few cars flying off, a few patches of debris cleared. Landing on now uneven ground, she has to take a second to stabilize her machine and thus can only parry my incoming hack and slash. The Take's arms rise forth like a geyser, seeking to sink into my armor, yet it was obvious she'd do that. So I let go of the pedals, my sword still up in midair in its full deceit, as my gun now has a clear aim at her cockpit, ready to rain pain.

Shaking, much shaking meets my push as my vision blurs for a sec. Orange numbers on my legs, she shot at them and fucked up my balance. I still hit one of her shoulders, that's now dripping yellow paint.

A few gasps and grunts, she fumes in silence as her Take regains its footing amidst the junkyard, the right arm twitching as the shoulder should be no longer fully operational. "What caused such an outburst towards me, cadet?"

"We're in the middle of a battle, it is not my fault you're not taking me seriously."

"… Is this truly what you wish to do, then? To ignore my words and strike at me while I'm extending a hand your way? You may not have another chance such as this, I do not believe it wise for you to spawn rifts with possible allies, considering your situation."

" What's next? You're gonna give me fifteen minutes to reach the correct answer?" Because you're no one to do that, my world's Tsukuyomi-san was someone I knew would give sound advice all the time, except when it came to romance. But, you? You've shown your words to not be worthy of a second in my ears.

"Wh-What?" Silenced for a sec, a few small gasps and chortled words come out of her lips, her verbal gun jammed with an invisible gag. "I… Ahem… I do not recall to have threatened you in any way. All I did was point you to a few examples you could follow."

"And do you think it's fair, to place, to impose all of your dreams and expectations on the frail shoulders of a single person?"

"Huh?"

"How do you think they feel? Do you think they're some sort of supernatural being? That they truly favor those mantras you speak of? How do you think it feels, to be made into an Atlas who holds the whole world on its shoulders day and night?"

Do you think Yuuko truly believed in the Guard's code? Of course she didn't, but she had no other allies to lean on. So she simply nodded, accepted their terms, shielded Kasumi, her friends and family, and simply kept pushing forward in Sendai, in the only path she had to keep working on her research in hopes of finding any new allies. Same on last loop, despite how she only built a perfect hell for herself Yuuko just kept pushing on to save the world from the G-Bombs. And the same for my Meiya, who tirelessly did her best efforts to measure up to the expectations of the Group and the rest of the nation. It makes me choke, seeing parts of those worlds. And maybe, just maybe, he felt the same way about Yuuhi, and that's why he remained on the Guard.

So I cannot agree with your words, to simply discard those who are seen as useless, to drone on while not hesitating on all the sacrifices, to deem them as obvious. To again thro w all of the responsibility onto a single person, without even offering them my shoulder, is a mistake I won't ever repeat. Perhaps I'm being stupid, perhaps there really is no other way than to surrender to this being a cruel, crapsack world and acting in consequence . But even then, I rather be an idiot for the rest of my life if the alternative is to surrender my wish to see change and give others the same happiness I enjoyed growing up. Because our future is crying, and I ain't gonna look aside. It's up to me to make it smile, to endeavor to be part of the solution.

"Still, such selflessness is truly worthy of praise, cadet," she states, submerging herself in a quiet lake, raising her blade once more. "It is their struggle which spurs people to act and not surrender to despair."

"Why not dare them to live? Why insist on everybody having to die to make any progress?" Taking my pose again, I push the pedals, force her to parry and take a step back.

Yet, the counter comes right after me as if an inevitable shadow it were. "It is better to face reality head on than to wallow in wishful thinking or fall into wrath. Only when you're serene can you truly make the correct choices, take the necessary steps towards the quickest solution."

"Then, if Meiya was your leader, would you surrender to sacrificing her if it was the easiest thing to do?"

"What? I- Ugh!"

Eating another slash, to her arms this time, she parries the follow up, and the next cyclone of her blade again hails glass around us as I backboost. Chasing after me, she cannot connect her attacks as I bounce off the ground into a curve while she has to decelerate.

"You wouldn't, would you? Because you care, because you'd rather die yourself than see her hurt, right?" That's why you asked me to look after her, that's why you trusted in me to take Meiya to Sagiri during the coup, that's why you took me to the hill and waited for me and even confronted Takahashi-san at first, that's why you didn't give up on me when I couldn't bring out results instantly after Meiya chose me.

"… My feelings have nothing to do with my duty," Dry as ice, raging as a typhoon.

Beepings on my ears, crouching to avoid the paint, sliding to take a curve and not end up hollowed out like the buildings that meet her blade. "For real? You mean what makes you who you are has nothing to do with what you choose to do with your life?"

"My duty comes before my own selfish wishes, cadet. What a servant like me feels is unimportant when compared to the fate of the Empire at large."

"… Do you really believe that?"

"Indeed I do. A small compromise on my end is preferred over seeing those I should protect facing damnation… or losing their way. Where are you going with these questions, cadet?"

"… Nowhere. I was just trying to see who you really are." Sighing, I hunch over, barely even paying mind to the piloting as my eyelids start to close, blurring the cockpit and the projection.

And I can already see you're nothing like the Tsukuyomi-san I met in my other loops, even she held doubts towards their code. That's why she did support me and Meiya being together, instead of shunning me off like others did, like the Three Idiots. And even in my other loops, I think I remember her coming to the base to negotiate. Despite her cold demeanor, I think you still weren't fully absorbed by that mantra to live only to die for the greater good, seeking honor in your grave, only working for the immediate profit of the Shogunate like a puppet .

Yet, again, there's this void in my chest, this searing pain in my neck, and my heart kind of shrinks a bit. "And I can see you're not someone I would refer to as an ally. So, I'm going to cut the connection. I've said all I wanted to."

"What? Wait a moment, we haven't-"

"Please, stop. You and me will never see eye to eye, 1st Lt Tsukuyomi. It's clear to me now, my doubts towards you guards were right on point."

"Speak no further balderdash!"

She flares up, erupting suddenly into another blizzard. More paint comes my way, the sudden jump I have to make fuses me into the seat, my teeth onto one another. A loud crash tosses me around some more and the response fades from my controls. Sigh… Stupid shock countermeasures.

"I've already told you we are more than willing to lend you honest support, there is no need for you to surrender to facing a trial, much less to dismiss our aid over semantics." Her blazing voice towers over me as does her machine, which slowly paces my way with the blade resting on the undamaged shoulder, hogging all the daylight again. "Furthermore, do you believe this is what your father would have desired? If he was a fellow and worked day and night for your sake, I am certain that he would not wish for you to isolate yourself in such a manner. You should honor their sacrifices, and ensure you also protect something as valiantly as they did to their last breaths."

"… What?"

"I believe your parents must have sacrificed much to keep you safe. Have you ever thought of that? Of how it must have been for them to stand up every day for you? There was little else they could do, yet they certainly protected your future above all else. Their efforts did not go unrewarded. Do you not want to honor their wishes with your own endeavors, cadet?"

"What was that?"

"I said, I believe you should reflect on all your family must have gone through to keep you safe. Sometimes, such concessions are unavoidable. Thus, shouldn't you follow their example instead of showing such scorn to our traditions?"

"What the fuck was that?" Punching the concrete, widening the cracks, my Gekishin stands up.

"E-Eh? Excuse me, did I say something unproper?"

"Do you know how it feels, to wake up drenched in cold sweat every fucking day?"

"What? Wait, what are you-"

"Do you know how it is to know everything would have been better if you hadn't been there? Do you know how it feels to deal with the silence as the night comes?"

The dread that they might die any day, the fear that no amount of training or exhaustion could shake off me. The dread of waking up back home in silence, hearing no buzzing in the kitchen, no noise from the TV or the radio. What the fuck do you know?

Do you even know how he felt when mom was in the hospital, when dad started crying at the graveyard? What worthy sacrifice? You took dad to his death, and then left little me all alone. Almost like what they did in my first loops with our troops, not even appearing to lend a hand when shit hit the fucking turbine.

The IRG wasn't present in Iceberg for the most part, they were reserved 'as a last measure' despite being the ones with the most advanced machines in the Empire. But even then, as my squad died, I saw none of you amidst my memories. It wasn't a sacrifice, it was a premeditated massacre. That's what Iceberg was, and I'm sure that's what Shura's Dance was as well. Yuuko wouldn't have reacted as she did when I brought it up otherwise.

"I… I apologize, cadet Shirogane," Tsukuyomi-san says, sheathing herself, again sinking in the lake, deeper. "Still, I believe you are proof of their endeavors. You are still here, which shows their sacrifice did bear fruit. Certainly, someone worth your father's trust must have ensured you remained in good health, that their efforts truly were not wasted."

"What the hell do you know?" You weren't even there in the memories, you don't know anything. Or you're playing dumb, trying to trip me.

"E-Excuse me?"

"And even then, you don't have to deal with the echoes." The dreams, the memories, and the hope.

The hope that they are still safe over there, that nothing is going wrong back in my world despite me being here now. The hope to try and make everything right in this loop, only to be repeatedly backhanded by a windmill at every corner. The hope he had to make himself useful, to not be a burden, just as I was when I hustled to do anything to lend Meiya a shoulder.

But unlike me, only darkness met his efforts. And unlike me, who chose that path on my own, he was thrust into that and left behind as some useless thing. When that happened to me at the start of the loop, I found people that gave me a reason to stand up every morning besides 'wanting to go home' or 'staying alive'. That's why I'm here, still fighting. But, there was not a single grain of kindness in those memories.

So I punch the seat repeatedly, breathing in and feeling fire on my throat. Failing to calm down, to keep my tongue quiet. "Do you know how frustrating it is? To know you're virtually useless on the important things? To be aware of all that falls alongside you the second you take a wrong step?"

"I… I apologize, I didn't mean to-"

"Everything falls down. Everything can go wrong," so I sigh, rolling my eyes, chuckling for a second. "And it would be easy, you know? To scream and point fingers, to place blames on someone else. It'd be really easy, to just shut up and keep on walking. To take drugs, to drown in a glass of alcohol, to run away." To be a coward, like I was when Marimo-chan died. It'd be so easy, to wallow in self-pity, in how hard I have it.

But then, if I do nothing, who helps my friends, my beloved ones?

No one will.

When will the good times come back?

Never.

If it's just a tomorrow that you want, simply look at the sun rise and fall. But that won't be a happy world, you might as well be dead inside.

But I had people with me every time I stumbled, who helped me see the path forward even by cold and ruthless means.

That's why I'm done with settling for a sacrifice. I'm no longer a simple pawn, even if there is a lot of stuff I don't get. I ain't here just to score a draw. To reach a true solution, to give others what I enjoyed, to be for those who ask for help the same support I was given when I was about to jump into the abyss.

Just because reality is a piece of shit doesn't mean I should be one, too. Just because something is 'impossible' doesn't mean I can't try.

But I know it very well, the moment when you cannot chose, when you can only grit your teeth and push on. And it fills my mouth with that acid taste, with cold shivers on my back, on my feet, all over me.

"There is no joy to be found in martyrdom. Sure, eventually everyone gets a reality check and meets cruelty for the first time, everyone loses their naivety at some point. That doesn't mean I'd surrender to that cruelty being the standard, to simply accept there is nothing we can do to change for the better. And no, I don't think that a father that was sent to a cruel death is something worthy of praise, Royal Guard. "

"What?! Kag- Your father was most certainly not sent to a cruel death, cadet."

"Whether he did or not matters little. He had no choice but to lay down his life, to become a sacrifice. And while there is no victory without death in war, I don't believe holding that in such high regard is doing anyone any favors. After all, when dad died I was left alone, alone in the silence." And I'm just one. How many more lives do you need to ruin to see that sparing just a tiny speck of kindness and empathy towards others can make a huge difference in their future? Just look around at the wasteland that surrounds the base, isn't there enough shit in the world already?

"What are you saying? Honoring our legacy and the sacrifices of our comrades is a given for any soldier! Furthermore, your father's sacrifice, like those of many others, was nothing short of a heroic action worthy of much praise."

"… Even when you're just sending them to their deaths? Even when you're basically abandoning them to their own luck?"

Go ahead, tell me my squadmates deaths meant something in Iceberg. Tell me the deaths in the base's defense weren't just part of a carnage. Tell me dad's death was good for little me's future. You know whose deaths mattered? The ones from the carrier fleet as they jumped straight into the lasers to let the XG land safely, the ones from the orbital divers that cleared the way for us to enter Kashgar. Cpt Isumi, Kashiwagi, Hayase and Haruka-san on their respective moments, when throw against the wall they kept struggling to make a positive difference on their own volition. The deaths of my squadmates at the last stretch of the raid on Kashgar, to keep the XG safe and sound. And even then, we didn't have enough support. A single minute that we delayed in reporting our victory, the same shitheads that went through Iceberg would have started Trident instead, dooming us all to death.

… And not all those deaths were necessary. Meiya didn't have to die back then. If she had only kept her cool, but of fucking course not. Having the last S-11, wanting to honor the lives of her comrades, perhaps of her only friends, of course she would charge forward and not listen to me. And if Sensei had kept her desperation for a solution in check, I'm sure she'd have realized something was wrong in the calcs. Maybe the sharing of data would still have happened, but it wouldn't have caught us with the zipper down.

"Perhaps there is little to be done," she says, low, void and gray as the eternal wasteland the BETA leave behind. "Could you kindly consider how little choice we have? If it is a toss between fear and bravery, certainly you'd agree with me that facing death with honor is the better alternative?" Running shortly, our blades meet, more windows crack, more glass hails about.

"Never have you thought about why you see the world in such a black and white tint? Why are the only options available death and more death? How can you ever hope to inspire others if you don't try to generate pluses for the people you wanna protect?" Concrete falls down, cars are compressed under our feet.

A localized typhoon could have struck the place as everything is sent flying at one point, or is scorched by a sudden boost. Small fires remain behind the wreckage, the buildings left torn open like a watermelon on a beach. And despite my best attempts at actually putting up a fight, she keeps me in check at all times, deflecting my strikes as if she had a guarding gale all around her, as if my best attempts were just a frail leaf waddling on the air.

"Not everybody has that choice, cadet. Hoisting such animosity will only poison your mind. If you do refuse to see the good points of what had to be done, how do you plan to move forward?" Tsukuyomi-san says as she chases after me, closing the distance despite my precise power slides on the curves.

"And if the ones who lead others refuse to search for better solutions, thinking of making trades with death, then nothing will ever improve. You always have time to do something else, even if it's only a little."

"In some regards, nothing is better than something. These views, while noble, could create rifts into our ranks. And, they could certainly spawn much animosity towards our rulers, to send impossible impositions onto their shoulders."

"So, all we can do is play along and die?!"

"I did not say such a thing! All I'm saying is, sometimes there is no time to do anything else. Honor the bravery of the fallen, value all that they've left you so that you can also display such fortitude when it is your time to do battle. Do not allow yourself to fall into such a septic hole of anger, sometimes we lack the time to do anything except endure the adversity, to bask in the required tenacity to fight to the last breath."

And, guess what? Why did Sensei have no time, why did she push herself to the point of sicking the BETA on her own troops? Why did Meiya not listen to me, why did she shut her eyes away from other paths and charged at the Superior? Because of these views, that there's only one way forward. That any sacrifice is permitted so long as you reach your goal. After all, they're valiant concessions from brave souls who strived towards a noble and meaningful death.

Gripping the controls, my Gekishin starts walking towards the red again. Something starts hitting the back of my head, shivering in cold as we trade strikes, as I shoot my last remaining bullets. And it bangs, and pounds, and slams, and cracks, and hurts, and it hurts. It hurts, to know there was something else I could have done. To hear you all refuse that, to insist that you can only make yourselves useful by dying.

"So their deaths are justified, is that what you're getting at?"

Come on, say it. I fucking dare you.

I dare you to say it, that dad dying could not be avoided.

I dare you to say I had no choice but to kill Meiya, that it was 'right' because it was an 'honorable and valiant death'.

That what was left behind was worth all that was lost, despite Sensei getting sent to prison or worse, despite how the same bastards that had no concern over ruining our future were the ones who remained in power, most likely. And it's even worse in my first loops, since the BETA must have reached the planet of the fleet, assuming they made it safely of course. My lover, my heart, my everything, they all died too. Kasumi died too, along everyone else. Just think on how they must have felt, to reach their destination, only to try to see how the Earth was faring and see it half submerged and the other half probably killing itself. And you say that's a decent future, a good outcome for all the struggles of this war? Dad died to protect the future of someone you abandoned first chance you got, that was worth it? For a future that'll only lead to more death and hopelessness?

I dare you to say it, Tsukuyomi-san. That all the cruelty is warranted, that all this tragedy is the only logical conclusion. Come on, now.

"I can understand your grief, to recall your parents' passing," she begins, slowly and softly, as if whispering to a kid by the bed, while one of her arms threatens lethality upon my blade, "yet, there were few options available at the time. I believe that they lived nobly until the very end. You should be proud, to yet live and remember their shining bravery, to be able to impart such lessons to another."

…

"After all, I believe you must have had someone who looked after you then. Someone who ensured you remained safe and sound, that their sacrifice wasn't-"

"Don't you fuck with me…"

"Huh?"

"How dare you say…"

" Auugh! It burns, it burns! S-Shirogane… please, kill me!"

"How can you say… I should be proud of their deaths…"

" No! I don't wanna be eaten! Takeru-san, help me!"

"I did not say that you should-"

Inhaling sharply through clenched teeth, I yank and bend the controls, hacking and crashing my rugged blade against her defense. "What the fuck… do you even know?!"

"… Pull the trigger, Takeru."

"What the fuck is wrong with you people?! What the hell could possibly outweigh all the sacrifices you plan to do?!"

" I love you, Takeru. I only hope that all I left behind is enough to give you as happy a life as you deserve."

"Are you saying there's no other way? That having everyone die for your supposed honorable future is all we can do?!"

Deflecting my strikes, taking step back after step back, the Takemikazuchi lunges forth, binding my arms. "Cadet Shirogane, please calm down! I never said anything of the sort, nor am I trying to antagonize you. I merely believe your parents did a noble sacrifice for your sake!"

"What noble sacrifice?!"

" Burden. Trouble. Eyesore. Bother"

The red alert comes into my view, the overload chime raging on my ears.

"As if you have any right to talk about them!"

" They're gonna make me go away, or send me to some distant role."

A beep in an odd rhythm, a pair of crimson eyes zoom into view. And a frown, followed by quite the shaving voice. "Cadet Shirogane, I will have to ask you to regain your composure. Otherwise, I will have to-"

"You stay outta this!"

"W-What? I am your superi-"

"Shut up! You didn't speak up during all this time, despite how the connection to a private frequency should've been coming up in my logs, so do me a solid and go eat some dirt!"

I can let go the rest of Tsukuyomi-san's words, but those last ones are not getting past me. She either retracts them or apologizes this instant! And if she doesn't, then I want nothing to do with you fuckers!

"… I guess they really are not the same anymore. Almost as if they had died, or changed completely. They… are gone, aren't they? They changed because of all this mess, right? We're going to… No, we already lost the war, didn't we?"

"Cadet, I will not allow another outburst!" Cpt Isumi warns, hitting something, quite the venom spouting from every word.

Followed by a still, frozen voice from the private line. "Please, there is no need for such words, cadet Shirogane. I was merely-"

"Are you going to take back your words, 1st Lt Tsukuyomi?" I ask, once more raising my sword to the sun.

"I merely expressed my honest thoughts to you, I see no reason to-"

"I heard enough, then. You and your holier-than-thou act of superiority can go to hell. Go and embrace death all you want, you're not even alive anymore. " You're just another dog of the high pigs, another faceless mannequin. I expected more, so much more from you.

Breaking through her guard, my sword again makes contact with the frame. Immediately after, a shock runs through my body, an alarm blasts away. A punch from the dagger on the arm just fucked up my hip block. Tilting, my machine loses balance and wobbles. Change the orientation, use the weight of the blade to regain my footing, and keep moving forward!

"Such an aggressive stance…" She grunts, both arms of the Takemikazuchi again trying to restrain my Geki's wrists, her blade shaving the side of my head visor. "Cadet, this has been more than enough!"

Everything goes blurry as I roll around. Something hits my head as it feels as if a bomb exploded below me. The hiccups of the limbs and engines reach my body as I thrash within the dust, buried into a building. Standing up, repeatedly banging the controls makes my sword rise in protection, deflecting her final blow. I barely parry her strike, that sends me back into the building.

I back boost out of another one as I crush the pedals, making my unit roll and crawl on the ground, hurting the body against the debris left on the street and then go at her seriously. I may not be able to properly cancel, but I can try to do something similar, like I did in my first loop. Like hell I'll just take the blows now, after all you've said.

"Cadet, please allow me to end the battle. I meant no offense with my- Guh!"

My almost broken blade lunges at her after an improvised crouch cancel, she moves back and avoids my attack without problem, and in a fluid motion sends a slash at my head. I barely dash out of the way, again losing my balance and seeing everything in sight spin as the back of my head remains pounding and echoing in pain, my ears ringing as I keep on boosting to avoid the lethal embrace of the dancing blades of the red beetle. But she comes after me with more strikes, and no sidesteps can get me far away enough from the lightning strikes that rain on my shadow.

If that's how you wanna have it, "let's take this seriously, then!"

I dash at her, activating my jump units at the last minute. She parries my strike once more, and manages to hold back the impulse of the attack despite how her Take is bending backwards, cracking the street in twain. Yet, I turn off one blaze, spinning in place, away from her blade. As the inferno from my boosters ceases, a reaping slash aims right at her back. Yet, there's no recoil coming into me. Tsukuyomi-san activated her boosters, jumping sky high as if predicting my move, and as she lands a flamethrower comes out of her rifles, raining upon me and shaking me all over the cockpit. Again, buried my unit deep into a building.

"Augh! Shit, that hurt for real. Haa… Haa…"

"Cadet, please cease your pointless struggles."

"What was that? My struggles are… not pointless."

"Sigh. I am not implying anything foul. Allow me to end this, then we can continue to platicate once you regained your composure. Certainly, you'll see that-"

"Never."

"Please, cease this foolishness. I am only-"

"Hic… Never… I'll never surrender… their deaths were not pointless, nor were they justified …"

"Excuse me? What did-"

Crush the controls, into red alert. Everything flickers, but I'm right in front of the red. Spin, raise the arms and-

My sword flies off towards the Take, hitting its arms. As the red has to glide away, as panic floods her grunts, recoiling in pain, the machine drops its sword. A crouch dash lets me catch it in midair, holding it in a reverse grip. And again, hellfire off my boosters, crashing straight ahead into the Takemikazuchi.

She locks her daggers with the blade in another struggle, with me on the losing side of it as my Gekishin bends backwards under the pressure of the Type-00. I take a step back, the bolts give pursuit and hit my shoulder, making me lose my balance. Another alert, one of my legs is about to blow. It can't move, probably due to the paint.

And as I see the Takemikazuchi raises a second blade from its pylon to strike at me, shrouded in shadows as it carries the sunlight on its back, as a veil of dust speck circles around its frame… A sting drills itself on my heart. A twisting pain sears on my chest, below my ears, on the base of my throat, it makes me fumble with my controls. As the strike sends me into the ground, everything becomes blurry and numb. The cold sensation spreads through me as the slight pain on my chest continues to pike at me as the shaking slowly subsides.

Ugh… What are these images? Everything is blurry, cold and distant. Everything echoes, feeling so far away. Except for a shadow, a shadow that grows closer and looms over me.

" I know not of who you speak. I am merely safeguarding my nation's interests."

Who is… Why can't I breath right? What's this… heat in my neck?

" If you do choose to oppose me, then little choice do I have but to cross strikes with you."

Why does this hurt so much? Why can't I focus my vision? Why?!

Yet, when I blink, I see something highlighted amidst the twisting shadows and threads of light. A shape shrouded in shadow, a machine I've seen many times.

"Shirogane, desist on your foolish actions! If you do not, I will be forced to fight you with all of my might to subdue you."

Ugh! Khh… Gasping, clutching my chest, the pain doesn't recede. Everything goes double, as my back feels all cold, as my sight grays out, as distant screams reach my ears, as the smell of burnt steel envelopes me whole.

---

A/N: It's recommended to read the following section while listening to 'Murder' from Berserk. Also, remember the content warning. This is the last chance you have to turn back.

---

The graphs take a full dive into a crimson lake, a small chime signals danger. Thus, Isumi sighs and shakes her head. Her stomach feeling heavy, as if something were swirling within, all she could do was place a hand on her head. The words spoken by the soldier had startled her, thrown quite the challenge into her heart.

" Yet, some of them are truly too similar to the motto of those incognito soldiers from the IRG we had to collaborate with throughout all of the '99," she repines within in quite the conflict. It's as if she were balancing a set of scales, if you'd allow the comparison. On one side, the doubts and rancor she holds towards that unit, on the other, her responsibility as the leader of the STF and the general attitude of the soldier she had met.

"-with all of my might to subdue you!" Tsukuyomi so says as she raises her blade, seeing the Gekishin's arms flailing wildly amidst the rubble.

In perfect synchrony, the already dire numbers on Isumi's monitor redden and the screen starts to flash. Flinching at the sudden change, she quickly brings Shirogane's data to the center of her personal monitor, seeing that the soldier was enduring quite some strain as of now as his heartbeats skyrocketed.

"Cadet Shirogane, can you hear me?" She asks, hastily opening a connection, only receiving drowned grunts and muffled whiffs of pain. "Cadet, I repeat, can you hear me?"

The numbers do not stabilize, short of it they start to raise and raise. Another warning appears in the monitor, the screens flickers in yellow and red.

" Should I truly go through the orders?" Isumi wonders for a moment, grimacing as she brings a hand to her lips, biting a nail.

"Cadet, if you will not continue to fight, I shall deliver the finishing blow," Tsukuyomi warns, taking a fighting stance, a step closer.

"1st Lt, please wait a moment," Isumi opens the common channel, seeing the Takemikazuchi about to strike at the collapsed machine. "It would seem the cadet is going through some manner of shock, refrain from any actions until I can confirm his safety."

"What?! What do you mean?" Tsukuyomi quickly asks, jolts and bolts running through her arms, lowering the blade.

"You are not required to know, please remain in standby for the moment," Isumi says, eyes almost closing, as she opens the controls for the sedatives.

"That I cannot do." So quite the fierce answer comes from the retainer, as you'd expect. Sending her projection to the command post, a slight frown is engraved in her features. "If the cadet is injured, then I suggest to remove him from the cockpit posthaste. He might have grown nauseous after employing such reckless maneuvers."

"You are not in charge of the mock battle, 1st Lt," Isumi retorts, without even looking at the projection of the retainer. "Simply wait until the sedatives take effect, the battle is as good as finished in any case."

"To use medication on him while he's in such a state could negatively affect the cadet," she asserts with eyes blazing, despite how her obstinacy was what caused such harm to the soldier. "I ask you to reconsider."

"With what authority?" Isumi asks, lifting her chin, imitating the obstinate wall of the emerald glare. "Your words were what caused this, and do not think we haven't noticed the private frequency you set up. Please do not force me to block your ID, 1st Lt Tsukuyomi." And with a simple push of a button, she unleashes the sedatives straight into the soldier's veins.

"I'm merely expressing my suggestions to you, Cpt. I shall not dodge the blame, yet because of it precisely is why I'm asking you to refrain from any hasty decisions. I am close enough to confirm the cadet's state, there is no need-"

And so, they keep debating, debating, crossing semantics and wordplay to avoid a confrontation both were aware would not give either any spoils worth keeping. It is ironic, that due to them both wishing to alleviate the soldier's pain in the quickest manner, they do not notice what's going on as they keep on debating, their words gaining heat, spreading embers.

And right now, at this very moment, a small alarm starts to beep in quick succession in an underground laboratory. Motoko Kouzuki hurries to the monitors, almost tripping with herself as she does while rubbing her eyes under the glasses.

"What now? I thought the tests on the hardware were… Huh?" Her eyes part open as does her mouth, the small cigarette that was bound to her lips falling to the ground and leaving a trail of smoke in its descent.

For all she knew, she may have not even be wearing glasses. So she takes them off, rubs them for a moment with a small cloth, and blinks when she places them again on her person. Still, the sight did not change. Oh no, it not only didn't but it now was growing larger, noticeable on the screen without need to employ any zoom. Part of her froze in numbness as she stood lost as a penguin in a desert, the other forces Motoko to mash the keyboard quite savagely as she runs some quick tests.

Yet, the system shows no errors. And the graph keeps on growing, so I'm certain you can imagine the shock she unlocks as of now.

"Why? Why is the G-Radiation lowering all of a sudden?!" She screams to no one, before blasting towards the phone that was nearby.

The ringing on the receptor of the call, the ringing that filled Yuuko's office caused the scientist to smile for a moment, chuckle lightly at the so awaited news she expected. A bit too lightly she's taking this situation, in my opinion, yet her determination is not easy to disrupt. And in her credit, I hope you understand her predictions were mostly correct. Only mostly, because the scientist could not foresee the cracks that were spawning on her soldier's body. After all, she does not know the sedatives the army employs have quite the negative effect on him. It still does not absolve the blame, nor the truest horror she shall be feeling shortly, you'd agree.

Contorting against the restrains of his seat, as if he were surrounded by needle walls, a hand tore into his scalp, another into his chest. And all the while, as sore screams drown in his throat, as more and more he struggles against the recoil of what flashes in his eyes, a small light sparks up within the cockpit. Cerulean fireflies, that burst and spark up like bubbles. Small will-o-wisps that surge forth from his very being, from the fissures that open up all around the soldier.

A collapsed light post comes to mind, the bloody pink below it. An erratic line in the shape of lightning appears on one arm, splintering a nail in half and almost separate said finger from the hand, the little lights flying away.

Begging screams fill his ears along a melting squelch. Like a nutcracker, his jaw mows up and down as if swallowing raw steel while the cerulean glow runs into his lips, up onto his teeth like a line of gunpowder set on fire.

And a gaze of azure looks up, daring him to shoot. A gaze of red frowns, before revealing in a monotone her tribulations. His eye pupils crack in half as the glass destroyed throughout the battle, distorting his sight even more as the hazy cerulean hue envelops him whole.

Thrashing, screaming, burning, compacting onto himself as the reflex forces him to gag on empty air. Until it all ceases to be, until he starts descending.

Lower and lower, falling down as part of his shoulders seems to dissolve inwards.

Lower and lower, sinking further. Opening his mouth serves only to rain more fireflies on the cockpit, teeth and tongue entangled by the cerulean fissures.

Lower, so lower that pure silence fill his senses. Lower and lower, as eyes and ears, fingertips and nose are fully bound by the lightning.

Until it all stops. And then, there is only silence. And then, there is only cold. And a wound, a wound that should not have been reopened.

"Where… am I?"

Upon opening his eyes, Takeru finds himself staring at a visage he had grown accustomed to. The eternal wasteland, the fire and dark smoke roaring in the vicinity, the gray skies, the smell of gunpowder. Only this time, he can feel them, smell them.

Seeing it all burns his eyes, breathing makes him spit the air out. He only grows more frantic and panicked as he realizes he cannot move on his own, you'd understand.

"A memory? When did I- Is this…" He recognizes the visage, what he saw yesterday morning.

Shards of memories reach his mind, the broken ruins of many towns, the screams begging for help before fading to ashes, the smell of fuel and fire permeating it all. The scornful gazes of both cousins looming over him, fused into the twister in the sky.

" It's all for the greater good, for the sake of the Empire." Mion states, with a dismissive shake of her head and a frown.

Drops of hot wax could be falling all over him, or perhaps it is boiling water. Or maybe, the soldier is burning within, about to implode at the recollection. You'd understand, feeling the haziness, the limping of the little soldier boy sinking into nausea only serves to further ignite his frustration. And each small broken and burnt piece of the puzzle serve to add another cut into his body, his real body. Perhaps you'd allow the comparison, for even if the little soldier boy remains a small spark trudging on its own, even the smallest thing, no, especially the smallest things can spiral into quite the explosion if left near the appropriate fuel. And that darkest mire is already overflowing.

Another gaze, a gaze of strong purple shoots out, sending the walking little soldier into the ground, holding his head with both hands in desperation. " Do not waste my time! You've done nothing worth of praise, anyone could easily replace you without much effort. Do not ever dare to put up such flimsy excuses in my presence!"

Unable to identify Raiko's voice, the soldier can only seethe on his own. "Stand up… Come, on. Don't take all this shit."

Crawling on the ground, bending quivering fingers, the little soldier can only march on while dragging his gaze on the ground. Aggravating words hurled at himself, echoes reiterating incessantly, he continues to walk through the memories, the shelters, the surrounding empty glares, the shadowy figures which don't pay any mind to his presence. So the spectating soldier can only shudder at the sensations and echoes of the recollection, as if he had been tied up with barbed wires, gagged with grenade. As tears fall of the eyes of the little soldier, a voice echoes in the back of his head. And turning back, Takeru sees towering ice piercing the clouds.

" Farewell, Shirogane," an imposing and cold voice spat out in full venom, a gaze blazing blue.

Enduring the cutting ice shards that fall from the reminiscence, the constant lashing of the voices, the little soldier boy keeps on marching through the same hallways, the same rooms. Yet, everything starts to lose color, and Takeru himself cannot help but to also feel the twinge of pain on his head. For the little soldier had become a small scarecrow prey to thunders as his skin blackened, lacerated under the lack of care, the rush to continue to serve. Determined to at least do something to aid another, to not relent on his ideals, you'd understand. And I believe you can already imagine how the cerulean glow conquers the inside of the Gekishin's cockpit, glowing that gains growth when the lone little soldier of the IRG collapses onto the open field, breaking apart into a thousand pieces. After all, mere effort cannot give birth to opportunity. A lone spark cannot light up these darkest days by itself.

And so, he mulls and turns, turning and turning in pain like a worm cut in half then throw into a lake.

"I see… So it really was like Iceberg for you," Takeru concludes within himself, biting back the pain, the echoes. Separating from the fading remains, from the freezing body, the soldier stands and watches the area, and what it reminds him of. "A world that forgot what mercy meant. A cold and ruthless reality. Why did things turn out in this way?"

Slowly, the soldiers paces alongside the fallen that still crawls forward, forces himself to do so. Babel towers of papers, night patrols that know no end, cooking duties, the day stretched for the little one. So Takeru can understand the numbness, the dizziness.

"You're not even sleeping anymore, are you?" He says, managing to frown back in reality.

Numbness overflows his body as the images rotate and blur away. Zooming into his ears, a siren blasts away, a sound he recognizes all too well. So both of them watch the punishing rays of light which burn any and all allies ahead, the same hollowness forming on the pit of their stomachs. With every negative from the commanders, a piece of the young boy falls off. With every outburst of those he once confided in, his very being darkens slightly. With every ally struck down by the lasers, more cracks become visible on the little soldier. It is obvious to Takeru, why did he resonate with the plight of the young kid, with the blight that plagues his sight.

And you'd understand if his insides lurch as he reaches the end of his prior recollections, just as the heart of that young soldier was cracking apart. The sweat dropping, his throat bound by an invisible noose, the tight posture. Desperation, anxiety, a wound that remains open.

" They have to be evacuated! It will only take a single vehicle!" He shouts from the bottom of his stomach.

" The orders we were given are absolute, the defense lines must not move," A piercing slash burns their ears as a gaze of turquoise taps her glasses, frosting to the hearing. "Our orders are to stand in protection of the evacuation route of Hakuryo Base. Leave the city's defense to the MDF."

" They're being overrun by the BETA! They're not gonna make it in time to all the shelters and hospitals! Please, have some empathy!"

And so, another gaze of turquoise blazes up, and Shion counters his words with a glare which burns his. Tears well up in the boy within the cockpit, while cuts and wounds reopen in the spectating soldier.

" That's enough out of you!" The blaze of strong purple from Raiko's gaze admonishes, coming to the center of the boy's view while endowing draconian anger. "You've been nothing sort of a hindrance ever since the operation started, Shirogane. Cease your prattling this instant or I'll have you removed from the field!"

Both frown, quivering concern in the little boy, blazing anger in the spectating soldier. "But… But we have to help the civilians! The MDF won't-"

" The IRG safeguards the honor and future of the Empire, and we are guarding the roads that our nobles and those important to them shall take. If you cannot comprehend that, then you're nothing short of useless filth. We do not mingle with the MDF, it is their duty to tend to city and request our intervention when they find themselves lacking. If they refuse to reach out and admit their inferiority, the blood is on their hands."

" But it won't take us anything to-"

" Utter one more word and I'll shoot you down myself!"

" Sister, that is enough," A calm yet firm voice flows into hearing. Startled, the soldier doesn't feel as if he were fading from the memory unlike before. So this time he can see the sharpened glare of gray which zooms into view, and the minute smile that follows towards the young boy. "A few TSFs and carriers won't deter our efforts. Furthermore, some of our fellows are present in the city. May I request you send some of your men to aid the MDF, Chain One?"

"… Understood," the strong purple of Raiko's glare relents, gritting her teeth.

" A moment, Lupine One," tapping her glasses once more, Maya interjects with a frown. "You do not have the orders nor the authorization to send aid to the cities, we have received no request of any kind from the MDF."

" And the same occurred during the fall of Kyoto, with the sudden cut in communications," Masahide retorts, squinting his eyes in kind. "Also, I do not recall since when a member of another squadron has the authority to tell me how to manage my units, Horn Three."

Dizziness setting in, the soldier felt as if he were spinning, his ears full of water. " What the hell? So Maya-san really was against them, too?" And only then did he see it, the thorns that had entangled around the little soldier and the motive behind his sadness. "I see… So this is why you felt alone These people… they don't deserve the air they breathe."

A few discussions later, blurred in the recollection, the boy and other pilots are allowed to move towards the city. Joining in the rush, in the frantic pace the little soldier endows, it is quite fair to affirm Takeru's mind is focused entirely on the visions, on the pain in his chest, on the rapids that push his back onward.

Only for another blade to be thrust into the soldier's chest when another voice reaches the boy, an image shown to most pilots within the city. The calm, apathetic and disdainful smile paired with an undisturbed an eerie voice of one garbed in blue.

" Hear me well, soldiers. The BETA advance has proved to be far mightier than expected. Thus, since the UN has requested more time for their evacuation, we shall be employing the same tactic of Kyoto's farewell. All units, evacuate the city before the explosives detonate. That is all."

"Ugh! Who was… Why does this voice sound so familiar?" The cracks over his body widen and start to pulsate, to shine brighter the more the tries to recall, the more air that leaves his lungs. "What the hell… They're going to blow up the city when the body of the BETA horde marches into it? But… But…"

" But there's still people that hasn't evacuated! I'm not leaving!" The boy mirrored the soldier's wrath, his breathing hiccuping as he boosts further into the city.

" 2nd Lt Shirogane, desist in your disobedience!" Mion releases her verbal viper as the warning of lock-on appears on the boy's sight. "Failure to comply to this warning will- Ugh!"

" Shut up! Get out of my way!" Without any hesitation, the pylons on his back fire off against the chasing red Zuikakus, which end up almost eating a building as they had to evade. It's as if the soldier's current indignation were fueling the boy's impulse, both of their hearts shrink, holding the same wish to arrive on time.

" Takeru, please stop!" a low voice begs, supplicates, as it gives chase to the little soldier. "You heard the orders, we have to leave the city posthaste."

"Yasomaga-san?" the soldier wonders, his adusted infestation brought to a screeching halt at the unexpected voice. "Is she on your squad? But…"

As the little soldier ignores the pleas, the panting pleas of the girl endowed in gray which follows his stride as dutifully as a shadow, tender raindrops fall on the soldier, almost translucent become the fireflies which surround him like a cocoon. Fleeting eyes, always descending as if to avoid gazing into the sun. Slow gestures, a curling of a strand of hair, the minute and almost inaudible voice, the finger pointing to a book, the pointers upon his queries on his efforts. The steps which always followed his, the guarding steps which guided the soldier when he had chosen to share his days with the Mitsurugi of his world. Little, his maid.

Takeru's attention returns to the visions as blankness mires the little soldier's mind. A caravan of evacuation vehicles run on the street, paying no mind to no speed limits. Escorted by a few humvees, the procession went their way in their escape, never stopping, never hesitating. Yet, both of them felt a knife twist in their gut. From their position in the air, they could see that boxes and machinery is what lies within the vehicles. Not people, not a single person was aboard them. A small beeping shortly follows, the radar registering quite many TSF signals ahead of them.

" This is Horn Two speaking," a relaxed voice thus spoke, again eliciting a sharp shaving on the soldier's ears. "Unidentified craft, report your allegiance."

"20th Squadron Chain, Chain Eleven, sir," young Tsuhi replies as low as she accustomed.

" Chain Twelve, here. Sir, what has happened with the evacuation?" The little soldier asks.

" You are not required to know, inductee," Makabe so answers, clicking his tongue. "As my lord Regent has ordered, all units must leave the perimeter of the city posthaste. Turn around and commence the evacuation."

" Where are the civilians? What happened to the hospitals?" He insists, his every fiber rumbling in anger at what he thought could have occurred. And sadly, his intuition was not failing him, you'd understand.

The squadron of Zuikakus enter their view, commanded by a singular red unit which was escorted by two yellow ones, the rest were a mixture of gray and black ones. Spreading in threat, they surround the little soldier's machine and Tsuhi's one. Rifles aiming up, a mere gesture from Makabe stopping their trigger fingers from confirming the lethality.

" Perhaps you didn't hear well, but I ordered you to retreat from this area, just as my lord Regent did."

" Forgive us, sir," Tsuhi quickly bows down, knees and stomach shaking. "We shall be-"

" I don't belong to your fellowship, so you cannot enforce any 'orders' on us," The little soldier counters, despite the cold shivers which claim his back the small match has been lit. And slowly it grows, as if wanting to match the soldier's twisting fire. "I was tasked with confirming the safety of the civilians sheltered in the closest hospital. D o you know if they've evacuated, sir?"

" Do not make me waste my time. Those stationed there have valiantly asked us to evacuate, since they saw they wouldn't make it in time," He says while smirking at the matter, heartless and uncaring. "Do not soil their sacrifice, and evacuate at once."

" I don't believe you." Uncle Koetsu should be in the hospital, he wouldn't have given up on the evacuation.

" I won't repeat myself. Turn around and evacuate."

Frowning, contorting in a desire to choke the light out of Makabe's eyes as the spectator was, the little soldier starts to heat up his boosters. "I've got my orders to ascertain their wellbeing, and you're neither my squad leader nor part of my fellowship."

"Damn bastard, who the fuck would believe your lies?" He blazes, almost reprimanding the little boy for not opening fire on those sons of an eldritch bitch. A minute shiver he feels, as slow as the scars over his body quiver and distort, encompassing his body as the fireflies do, as if trying to bind and restrain the soldier.

Raging like a storm in open sea then he yells when the little soldier's Zuikaku is tumbled by the incoming fire of the surrounding guards. A moment of disorientation blurs the little soldier's mind, which he quickly replaces with seething anger as he tries to make his machine move, yet the limitation of the system keeps him stranded.

" I've no time to waste on a filthy baseborn. You, tozama," Makabe speaks, low, towards Tsuhi. "I advise you to follow my suggestion, evacuate this instant."

" H-However, my fellow-"

" Hmph, he can do what he desires with his worthless life. Do not let a peasant fog your vision, there are certainly better fellows awaiting your trust. Now then, all of you!" Taking a step forward, his Zuikaku then raises its blade towards the sky. "We have loitered long enough. We shall rendezvous with the triumphant escape of Takatsugu-sama, the hero of this evacuation. Let us make haste, for we need to catch up with the detachment that's on the road."

With a loud cheer, all those present revel in the orders as their boosters heat up and they begin to fly away. Without any speck of hesitation or regret, might I add. Yet, delaying his departure, Makabe sends his projection to little Tsuhi, employing a thin smile.

" Please do not dally in joining us, miss. The detonation is not too far off."

Tsuhi merely nods silently, quickly looking at the thrashing Zuikaku that struggled to stand up on its damaged legs. The plating burnt and tearing off, its almost as if it had been cuddled by a Destroyer, if you allow. Blinded to the surroundings in the memory, the soldier simply shares the frantic jerk of the controls, the crazed inputs in the system to try and find a way to stand up once more. Yet, where the one spectating finds a void, a moment of silence where he would have clenched his teeth were he corporeal at the moment, the little soldier's eyes watered and slowly shed tears. The one seething red in anger found his eyes sinking in deep blue, in mourning and a continuous collapse of frustration as the cerulean lightning courses through him, the one sinking blue in desperation instead finds his eyes swelling red by the tears, tears that drop with deepest hate. Fire does not bend the knee against no adversary. On the contrary, this desperation is but fertile soil for it, I'm certain you'd agree .

" Takeru, please. We must retreat," Tsuhi once more pleads, flinching in the projection at the frown, the glistening venom within the little soldier's eyes.

" You are free to leave if you want to. I ain't leaving until I get Uncle out of here," both echo the same impulse as the machine stands up, once more firing off his jump units to aid in the balance required for the Zuikaku to stand upright again.

" However, we may not have enough time. Please, we should not linger in the city."

" And leave them behind? Do you seriously believe what that bastard said?!"

" I… well…" Her eyes descend for a moment before relenting a sigh and a nod. "Then, let us make haste. We can carry some survivors in our TSFs' hands, but there won't be room for everyone."

" I know that! Come on, let's go!" Without waiting for his machine to be properly aligned with the street, the little soldier blasts away, closely followed by the watchful fellow.

And despite wishing to fade away, the soldier was unable to return to lucidity. The collapse continued, sinking into darkest depths, everything towering and falling onto him, so does he feel at the moment. For he already knows of the fate of his Uncle and his family, and the tension in the young man's chest, the heartbeats pressing on his neck serve only to unnerve the spectator.

It took only a few minutes of full boosting for the reality of the situation to reach them, for the radar to start flooding red as soon as they adjusted its parameters to scan the surface area. And all three of them felt sick to their stomachs, burning within. While the spectator had already seen his fair share of carnage, plagued sights such as this serve only to have him wish his eyes to be gouged open with a rusted needle. And while the other two already had their trial of fire, Tsuhi couldn't halt the reflex when her stomach grew upset. While the young soldier merely stares, gaping, shocked into silence as he's unable to compute what his eyes see in front of him.

Burning land and concrete, a mountain melting to its own eruption. Munching sounds, chewing sounds, separating joints and cartilage as if their prey were boiled chicken, tearing the skin off the flesh as if it were but an envelope of plastic. Retracting their heads as they tear into the upper parts, removing chucks of it with the jaws as if they were eating an entire serving on their own. Twitching and recoiling as they gag, before puking a mixture of meat, bones and hair, melting along the rolling sight which sinks onto the atrocity. A few were impaled as if a renowned vampire had been the leader of the invaders, some having the small treasure which waited within pierced by the impact, entangled in the inner vines as the rest of its progenitor slides off the charging spears.

The collapsed machines, splintered as its pilots. Each petal off the torsos plucked off crudely. Some perhaps yet live, and whether they're laughing in madness or shrieking in terror is hard to distinguish anymore.

It is then that both soldiers see something in the corner of their vision, within an apartment. Three little ones, and two women covering them in protection as the entrance succumbs to the pressure. As the wide monsters slowly waddle into the room, waddling like drunkards seeking further red wine, one of the women looks outside, to the Zuikaku.

Her voice could in no way be heard, from within the small room and amidst all this chaos. Yet the soldier could tell, in the hoarseness of the scream, in the contortion of her face, what the woman was begging for. Perhaps, part of the young one also did. A simple volley would have sufficed. Just a flicker of the trigger.

But when the dust finally settles, both the building and the one behind it were crumbling away. Despite having eviscerated the concrete, the young one felt as if he had been on the receiving end of his slash just now. There are no words Tsuhi can think of, and the soldier finds himself recalling those echoes once again.

Hollow, sinking, opening the lips wide to scream, tensing the jaw to crush a rock, and yet no sound comes out. There is only silence, tears, and a wound that remains open. In perfect reflection, the young one wails as his breathing hiccups, as coughing assaults him. And yet, he still stands up, he still moves his controls. Whether there is hope or despair in his heart, I cannot fully tell. Yet, the soldier does find himself frowning, frowning much as the fissures threaten with splintering his jaw in half while the fireflies scatter and regroup, a thin cloud shrouding his body as he groans and wails to the vision, unheard and unseen by the two who still debate, for who only a few seconds have passed.

While a few explosions ring out in the distance, as the MDF tries and fails at restraining the advance of the enemy across the required defense line, the soldier behind the young one screams and thrashes against his ethereal restrains, reminded too much of the fogginess which he could never distinguish, never desired to distinguish of his dreams of Iceberg. As he once did during the cruel trial of the XM3, the younger Takeru rushes forth, gunning at the monstrosities. Yet, more take their place in a manner of seconds. Volley after volley, yet the same shapes return from behind the smoke and the smear. At some point, the young one wonders if he truly is even shooting anymore since the procession of decay never wanes in their steps.

By the time they made a difference in the horde, by the time they made it to the hospital, there was only more munching to welcome their arrival. Blackened spots in the concrete, lines of fire burning across the street, vehicles and trenches cracked wide open.

The young one quickly put his helmet in place, opening his cockpit without waiting for his Zuikaku to land properly. The older, however, shivers inside, the lights forming a cocoon over him. His heartbeats and only his heartbeats can he feel, the sight of the destroyed and abandoned hospital, of some of the damage being done clearly by TSFs or other armaments causes one of his hands to stretch outwards. Raising up, like a vine seeking the sun's warmth, raising as it trembles and emits that tender glow.

"Why is this port destroyed?" He asks himself, to the images that overlay with the vision of the young royal guard who frantically rushes through the carnage and the fire, seeking his uncle as Tsuhi reprimands and is quick to follow.

For the sight of the hospital brought up certain images, certain words.

" We ordered them to seek shelter in the mountains. Thus, it is our duty to safeguard the ports from these subversive elements." A voice similar, perhaps too similar to the one of the red guard that had shot at the young soldier's feet says.

"Don't fuck with me… You just murdered these civilians!" Seething over the rim, the glass begins to crack as the glow does, too.

" Please, do think on the future. It is imperative that the equipment is shipped posthaste. Furthermore, are you not aware of the Professor's research? As the rulers, it is our duty to safeguard our people. In this case, we're sparing them the pain of this reality that will soon fall upon us. This is nothing but a mercy kill, 1st Lt Shirogane." The apathetic and stoic battering ram shattered the last rampart of composure of the soldier, whose head began to heat up and feel a vicegrip upon hearing the voice of the trickster garbed in blue.

So his eyes blaze, distortion corroding the lightning lines. "Where's the mercy in that?!"

" You just left the people to die all on their own!" The younger finishes the adusted response, both bursting alive at the respective sights.

Only to fall in utter, complete silence.

Under the rubble to their right, there was someone collapsed, a Soldier-class taking some munches out of it. They both immediately recognize the orange hair, and as the BETA's head explodes upon their bullets is their stride towards the rubble. Not listening to Tsuhi, who snipes a pair of Soldiers that had taken an interests in the rushing young guard, they both smack the dead weight of the BETA with a kick.

Frozen into a scream, part of the face was missing, bitten off. Cold to the touch, petrified in its posture forever more.

" Takeru… Takeru, please. There's no one left," Tsuhi gradually closes the distance, equal apprehension when trying to touch his shoulder.

No tears leave the young man's eyes. There is, once more, only silence in his inability to comprehend what meets his eyes.

Standing up slowly, breathing heavily, he dashes to the vehicles, ignoring Tsuhi's arm. Shooting the Soldier-class that were loitering about, using more bullets than he should have, kicking and punching them repeatedly when removing their remains off the transportation, the same massacre meets his eyes. While the spectator can muster an inner salute to the remains of a single MP who stood in front of the civilians before being brutalized, the young one starts taking steps backwards, laughing dryly as he looks around and about. Small twinges of pain can the young one feel, small echoes that even reach the soldier. On his arms and legs, sudden heat only to then meet a blanketing cold.

"Come on, get out of here," Takeru begs, feeling the creeping coldness on his own being, despite the vision. That same void in his chest, that same crater which still burns at the mere thought, the emptiness which follows after Iceberg for him as he looms over the wasteland ravaged by the G-Bombs. "Turn around, you don't have to see it. Get out, get out, get out, get-"

Too little, too late.

Hanging against a decorative pillar like an old toy left to abandonment, there lays Koetsu's wife. Her lower half is still burning, blood oozing from a purple spot, prey to an inner injury, crushed against the stone.

" Takeru, we're leaving!" Tsuhi tries to twist his arm, to drag him back to the TSF. Not even employing her special martial arts can lift his feet off the ground or even move him an inch. So she wraps her arms from behind, tightly, tightly. "Please… Let's go. There's nothing we can do… please…"

One step, two steps. He breaks free of her hold, walking as if in a daze. A few Soldiers waddled their way out of the hospital, blood drizzling down their jaws. Unblinking, he shot them dead. In silence he crouches near a trampled vehicle, in silence does the soldier weep along the young guard. Tsuhi slowly follows, yet immediately recoils what at what they are staring. Once more, unable to fight the reflex, bile and saliva, and perhaps some drug residue as well, splash on the ground as she fails to regain her breathing.

Shards of glass had pierced the thin skin of their small bodies, and part of them was also burnt to some degree. For some odd miracle they were spared from the BETA, perhaps because they faded away before being found. Lifting them both off the puddle of blood and who knows what other tinctures, the minimal weight felt like sand slipping through his fingers. Mere paper, paper above a candle. Cold as bark which cracks away, their smallest hands that once held one of his fingers when they met now are bent inwards at an impossible angle. And where once two shiny and curious lights had been, where the smallest of smiles took root, now the features are sunken in, a result of the vehicle being intercepted by the Warriors.

So, quivering amidst the ashes, the young guard cries, cries and cries as he hugs those two little weights to his chest.

Cold.

Silent.

Stiff.

Dead.

"… So this is why." Takeru concludes, rabid ants feasting on his insides, feeling faint yet furious at the same time. "So this is why you despise them so much. The same as those ports, abandoned to their luck…"

The cries of the young one begin to fade, the vision reaching its end. The swirling visage turns into a twister, a cyclone of fire and ashes, of red and gray as the surroundings fade and mix, the eye of the storm showing a narrow image of the young guard's sight, the lingering feeling of those two weights on his body.

"… almost as how I lost you."

A spark.

A spark in the fissures, a spark from the fireflies.

"… You?"

The fire rises in his sight, the soldier… feels a bolt coursing through his body. His fingers begin to twitch, the lighting lines focusing all over them, chaining them. A spark, then another. Like a ripple in a water surface, only instead of losing impulse it keeps on gaining strength. And for a moment he sinks in that feeling, yet as I think it all will soon cease as every other recollection.

Another spark, and another. And the shock makes him spasm, the weight becomes concise upon his fingertips. His sight descends, and there he finds… a lithe body, resting in his arms. A body garbed in white, a quivering hand struggling to raise to his cheek.

…

And he wraps himself over it, as if shielding it from pouring rain. And the hands run frantically over it, seeking injuries. Yet, they find coldness, stiffness. A mirror, a reflection of old moments, moments of solitude, moments where the stars were the lone solace a seeking gaze could find.

But it will collapse, as all times of reminiscence do. And so it does, the arm falls down as does the full weight of the body onto him. Sparks fly off as the lightning lines close, the cerulean hue fading back into his being. Yet, the collapse continues, the star falls down. Not in actual actions, but… within your heart, as the sparks keep on reverberating, more and more, more and more in that electric blue of yours, the sparks foretell of fire.

"… Why?" You ask, unable to understand. The sand fades from your hands, which soon start to shake and grip. Coursing like a snake through your arms is the engraving fire, the forging fire which makes you frown so.

The fissures all become small lines, mending the damage as if it was never done. Yet, it is still there. The echo in the background, the rumbling in the surface, the wound that remains open in your heart. But once again…

"After getting so far… so far from what? For what? I don't… Failing… again… Another time."

Your senses return to the cockpit, yet that is not what you see. Gritting your teeth, compressing them to the point of pain rushing through their roots, the lingering fireflies continue to spark, to swirl around you. The tachyons refuse to leave you, reaching for your body once again. Your resolve is sturdy indeed, and your own wrath instills fear in many, I know, yet even in front of the oceanic collapse your fire would not be doused. Twitching as if you still were enduring the jolts of the visions, the jolts which burn you as if a soldering torch had been thrust into your abdomen. Yet, even that pain does not dissuade you from recalling, it does not seal the lines which still run through you. The visage grows hazy, distorted, yet your voice still echoes firmly.

"We haven't even… talked? No, nothing. I still know nothing of you…" Crying, your sight grows blurry, still feeling that weight on your body.

Yet as you look up, the gray sky is not what should be there. There is no ruins or Takemikazuchi, but the mirage of another vision. And as more sparks come off you, dazzling enough to make anyone nauseous, that electric blue engulfs you whole. Yet, watching is all I can do as of now.

Upon the ignition of your jump units, those sparks, those lines of light run through the cockpit. Exhausting the stockpiled radiation, forcing the outcome through sheer will to power, yet still recoiling in pain at the burns, at the whipping on your body, both from your current injuries and those you are recalling.

"1st Lt, I already told you, this is UN protocol. You've done enough during this exercise," Isumi sighs, shaking her head.

"Still, it wouldn't take me anything to ascertain his status. I ask you to- Huh?"

The sudden rising of the Gekishin shocks both women who were still debating. Before either can form words, you push both controls forward, enduring the kickback from the shocks, the towers of fire that surround you in your vision.

And in your daze, you still cling to that weight. "There's so much we have to talk about… I ain't failing again… Move! Move, Kusanagi! I ain't done yet!"

A frenzy of roots discharges from your feet, onto the pedals, and the correct alignment of the jump units sends your Gekishin flying off towards the red frame of the retainer. Despite the damage and the lack of fuel, and even how the tachyons' sparks subside, the impulse of your patterns does not halt. Despite the crazed screams you release, the memory does not stop, the wound refuses to close, and so you continue to burn away.

"Cadet, please regain your senses!" The retainer begs as she parries the blurry frenzy, finding it hard to block, to meet the parries. "What's with this recoil? This savage form of piloting…" Her eyes widen, gaping at the answer, correct answer that she arrives at. The composed facade you once endowed, when a shadow you chose to be.

Almost failing to follow the speed of the dots, losing sight of the machines for a moment in her cameras, Cpt Isumi quickly opens a line with your machine. "Cadet Shirogane, cease your attacks this…" Yet, the image feedback comes up empty. Or rather, it is no longer usable after being on the receiving end of the sparks for even a minute. Still, the grunts she can hear as well as the readings on the monitor allow her to reach a conclusion, erroneous in this case. "1st Lt Tsukuyomi, I believe the cadet is having a recoil from the sedatives. Subdue his machine immediately!"

"It isn't as if I weren't trying!" She immediately replies in full blazes, feeling her own stomach sink at the task. "If I miss my strike, I could harm you even further. And how on the Heavens are you still managing to move so fast with the damage of your unit?!"

Counters meet the steel, a kick sends the red frame to eat some dirt. Violently as usual, there are no wasted secondsin your stride. However, even when the markings of your machine are flashing red, there is no change in the choking hold over the controls, on the stomping of the pedals.

And within your eyes, that same visage repeats itself. Surrounded by fire, by those shadows, it is only natural you'd remain steadfast in your aggression. Yet, today you've no rapier in your hands, and your heart feels as if it will burst from your chest at any second now. That cold feeling, that cold metal, lurching its way into your heart. That heavy weight, the burden twisting the inside of your chest.

You see no red frame, everything is fading to dark. Lungs begin to shut down, sight starts to black out. Yet, as you trade slashes with the retainer and paint with the bricks, a small jolt echoes still. And I can clearly see it, one tiny little spark shining in your eyes.

"Rise!" The fuse is set off in disdain, scorching away all your restrain.

A spinning jump, bouncing off a building. As if trying to high five the sun, only to retract your blade backwards. The retainer shivers, recognizing the start of the dive, taking a defensive stance, shrieking in a panic, begging you to stop.

Yet, your feet still find the pedals. "Aim!" Gunpowder and smoke corrupts the skies, obstructing the light from your eyes. "And… dive, Kusanagi!"

Descending into spiraling rage, ready to blast away all that lays ahead like a cannon ball, the warped impulse launches you off towards the retainer.

Out of fuel, the Gekishin simply rides the gale of the warped impulse. The impact shatters the street as both blades clash, both flying off their holds. Both TSFs end up toppled on the floor, the Gekishin with both legs heavily damaged and its head visor cracked due to the violent smooch it gave to the concrete. Trails of smoke still come out of the jump units, and only a screeching sound echoes as the machine loses all tension and completely collapses onto the rubble, in equal fashion as you do, now knocked out cold within the cockpit. The Takemikazuchi still stands, proof of its exquisite engineering, unscathed save for some small damage to the lower end of the legs, which were put to the test under your assault.

"Cadet, can you hear me?!" Tsukuyomi calls out, repeatedly. When nothing comes up, she bites her lips and hits her seat. "Cpt, I'm going to check on the cadet's status."

"Please desist from that course of action, 1st Lt," Another voice, imposing and cold, answers the retainer. And soon, the violet eyes of the scientist enter her sight. "I've already been notified of what has transpired on the mock battle. I'll have to ask you to remain quiet, and not get any closer to my protegee."

"Excuse me?! He could be hurt gravely, we have to-"

"Must I remind you this was your folly? Your words and actions incited this incident, by using a private frequency no less. Let me remind you of what we agreed yesterday, and do not test my patience," So she minutely squints her eyes, brushing her bangs softly.

"A moment, XO," General Daizaburou enters the common channel, despite how he has tried to remain as merely an observer. "I do not believe it wise for you to say such words. From what I can gather, the cadet had an adverse reaction to the sedatives that were used on him without need. There was no need to resort to such methods, so I'd have to ask you not to shift the blame to the members of the IRG which participated on this exercise."

"Oh, that's your angle, General?" Sharpening her eyes, she taps her chin. "First, you were the ones who employed a private frequency. Second, it is clear your interactions caused much distress to my protegee," she highlights the last word, eyes blazing slightly. Tsukuyomi frowns while Daizaburou merely sighs. "And third, after the meeting we shared yesterday, one could reach the conclusion that you have something against the cadet. Thus, if the 1st Lt moves one inch closer to the cadet's machine, I will consider this incident an aggression against UN personnel, and will act in line with what the protocol suggests for such cases."

"Wait a moment!" Once more, the retainer blazes forth, endowing the menacing frown of the guardian. "We did nothing of the sort, this is only an unfortunate accident and nothing else."

"Then, if that is the case, abide by the request of the XO of the base and remain still. I already sent a team to recover Shirogane's TSF. We will continue this conversation in the base, in a private room fitting for the issue."

Daizaburou flinches slightly, wincing at the prospect. "XO, wait. If you recover the TSF as it is now, the cadet could be hurt. Not to mention, we should try to keep this under wraps. Were you to order the Gekishin to be taken to the hangar then-"

Yuuko then sighs and ruffles her hair. "The sooner we retrieve the Gekishin, the sooner we'll know what transpired. I need to know what caused this outburst my protegee had, and how much of it was caused by the sedatives," she then frowns, biting her lower lips for a second. "Regardless, to retrieve Shirogane alone would raise suspicions, to delay the end of the mission also would, and to have the Gekishin missing by the Fubukis' side would also raise many questions. We have the rest of the cadets awaiting the final call, and considering my protegee should be marked as down, they must be growing quite anxious. Isumi, anything to say about this?"

The woman stood upright, color fading from her features. "Yes, they have attempted communication with the CP a few times already." She then sighs with her nose, her sight still caught on your numbers, which detail how weak your disposition is as of now. Of course, you just endured a forceful inheritance of memories as you haven't felt since that day in the tournament, so it is understandable you'd be lacking any and all energy. Yet, she cannot possibly know that, so I suppose you'd be able to imagine the pungency of the currents of her thoughts, at the miss she allowed to pass.

"Then, as I said, let's call this mock battle to an end. General, call your members back. I want you and the 1st Lt standing in the medbay in B5F as soon as possible."

"Please reconsider, XO," Daizaburou insisted, hitting the command post where he was, feeling his throat constricting shut. "There was no ill will from us, this truly was only an accident. If you take the Gekishin as it is to the hangar-"

Yuuko then chuckles lightly, masking the venom which brews in her tightened hands at the sight of your numbers. She then smirks, to not bite her lips, such a wide gesture that I am certain you'd agree would freeze hell over. Such a slow, inner cackling, it is quite fair to affirm it could break the sturdiest of facades. Taking a second to see the cracking complexion, the twitching eyes and lips of the retainer, and the sober and sharp glare of the General, the scientist simply taps her chin.

"The end result won't change regardless of what actions we take from now on. I'll have you take responsibility for this incident, both you and Shirogane. The sooner we can discuss the consequences of this, the better. I will not repeat myself, return to the hangar at once," and so, she narrows her eyes, unblinking she stares at the projections.

"… Very well, so shall we do. Just let me remind you, this was nothing but an unfortunate accident," Daizaburou says, sheathing the concern, the wish to remain arguing. "After all, his safety takes precedence."

"Fair enough. We'll talk soon, anyways. Isumi, you know what to do," Yuuko orders, receiving a nod from her subordinate.

And with a click, all the projections fade from her monitors. Slowly, she paces to her desk, brings the mug to her lips and finishes the now cold coffee, still having nothing to eat alongside it nearby.

Slamming it onto the wood, she heaves a sigh, clutches her forehead. "Just what on earth went wrong? I expected some backlash, but you were supposed to fall unconscious assoon as the drugs were injected. Sigh…" Ruffling her hair, she shakes her head and hurries out of her office, to the elevator. "You better be fine, Shirogane. Otherwise, all of these preparations will serve no purpose, for my and your goals," She says as she bites a nail, throwing her back onto the wall as the elevator starts its ascent. And yet, little is the shock she feels for much is what she not yet knows. The sapling of guilt is there, yes, but it has not yet blossomed.

And, seeking you, gasping in your unawareness, there are no further sparks coming out or into you. There is, however, a frown etched onto your features, a twitching on your fingers as if they were struggling to grasp onto something, and the disturbance in your breathing. And the wound, the wound that's open once again. As concerned as Yuuko is, she can not know of what she has unleashed. Chances are, you won't even remember it when you return to full consciousness.

And again, as your machine is taken off the ruins towards the hangar, as the scientist continues to debate within herself, as the guards argue among one another, as the cadets keep on asking about your whereabouts, all I can do is limit myself to watch you, whatever is still left of you, of your echoes within the soldier.

To watch and pray that it isn't yet time for you to burn away, my shooting star.

---

A/N: This chapter was pain. It took me hours of staring at the screen to get the dark parts out. I know it isn't as cursed as Dead End Aegis or Rasen Kairou, but showing the deaths of infants was pure pain. I can only hope it turned out decently enough. Writing this wrecked me, so that's why I put a second warning mid-chapter. Sorry if it broke the immersion.

Now, I know this chapter will most likely lose me some readers, what with the "fantasy-like" aspects, the return of the angst and the stuff with the narrator. For the narrator, there are enough hints and breadcrumbs to figure out who it is. The "sparks" are basically Takeru using the causal pull of the Nucleus on his own. just like how the Valkyries can take actions to make the better future, Keru can force the best outcome of his wish in exchange of the aforementioned G-Radiation. And as for the angst, get used to it. The next five or so chapters are going to be heavy.

Originally, I was planning to put a flashback arc about Iceberg somewhere around here. But thanks to seeing a story of hartman762, I decided to expand on it, and said story became Before Light's Out. That's why I had to put a flashback here instead. So, this angsty arc is going to last a while, until Komoro for those who read the prior version.

If there are things left unclear about this chapter, go read Forgotten Fangs and Waiting. Otherwise, I think there are enough leads to see where this is going to go before the actual reveals happen. That's all for now.

Thanks for reading. Stay safe.

Zuoriel

Rumbling Hearts (I)

A/N: Seeing the responses last chapter got, I have three things to say.

First, thank you all for the honesty. Second, sorry for the confusion of the last scene. I had thought the state of Takeru's Gekishin after the long fights was obvious as well as that he was not fighting with a clear mind would make his self-KOing crash understandable. Same for the switches in the narration and the warning, when I finish this batch of chapters I'll go and revise that closing scene.

And third, since I don't wanna string along those who are disappointed or bored with the angst and the flashbacks, I made some additions to the disclaimer at the start of the story. Simply put , I won't change the plot because otherwise I wouldn't enjoy writing it, and this fic won't become a retelling of Alternative. There won't be a carbon copy of the 12/5 Incident, the fights against the BETA won't take the same direction as they did in canon, and I plan on riding the angst to its conclusion so that it, hopefully, reaches a good payoff instead of just solving Takeru's anguish with hypnotherapy as it happened in the VN. As I said before there are a few angst-heavy chapters coming which revolve around the issues of both our Takeru and Native, and without those the story simply wouldn't work for me. If the mix of light fluff and angst the fic has had thus far is not to your liking, know that its overall mood won't change going forward .

Thanks for reading, and for the honest comments. S tay safe.

Zuoriel

---

Chapter 70:

Rumbling Hearts (I)

---

December 3 rd . Almost Noon.

(Hangar.)

[ Meiya ]

---

Deafening whispers overflow the hangar to the rim, only matched by either the befuddlement or consternation found in all the gazes of those present. A jest it is not to affirm that even the most seasoned mechanics are now certainly bereft of all words.

I am merely a cadet, that is true, yet I am no stranger to witnessing the damage battle inflicts on our equipment. Be it when I left my previous residence before enlisting in the UN or when arriving at this base, the metal once bright left scarred, the firm shapes bent and bruised, steel wings forever clipped. All the abandoned machines looked like that to me through the windows as I gazed at the scenery. And now, such an image lies in front of me.

"Look at it," Yoroi whispers, holding both hands close to her body as if it were freezing. "The paint is almost fading from the plating."

"You think he crashed?" Ayamine asks, pointing with a thumb to the Gekishin.

"Either that, or the machine was sent to collide against a skyscraper or a tumbled bridge," 1st Lt Suzumiya says, curling a strand of hair, a few onlookers nodding to her words.

Just what manner of brusque maneuver did he employ to leave his Gekishinwith this level of damage? The more it's lifted to dock into the hangar, the more it screeches as if enduring torture. The joints refuse to move even slightly, which causes the crew to make the docking cease momentarily to avoid damage to the railway or the machine. To have the bare metal showing from under the paint, to have such a sturdy machine bent at places, for the limbs to be stuck in place, what in the Heavens could have caused this outcome? Why would you abuse your machine so, Takeru?

"1st Lt Suzumiya," Sakaki begins, slowly turning around towards the woman, "can you tell us anything about what happened?"

Her expression sobers up into stillness, only to then shake her head as she rests her back onto the wall. "Sadly, I know as much as you do. I was left waiting here while you battled, yet Sgt Jinguuji did not appear. I frankly have no idea what's going here, either," she then gives us a small nod in sympathy, not breaking eye contact.

"You've heard no word from your captain, either?" I ask, she sighs and shakes her head once again.

"No, nothing at all."

We all share a momentary gaze, left with nothing to do but to stare at the repining mechanics which finally manage to align the TSF with the railway, giving word for the docking to proceed. Yoroi and Ayamine look at each other, as if gauging whether to step towards the machine or not, before Sakaki taps Ayamine's shoulder then shakes her head in silence.

"Let's not, give the crew some space," she orders, and both nod despite looking down, tightening hands in response.

"Shirogane-san isn't injured, right?" Tamase finally speaks up yet low enough for the whirring of gears to almost drown her voice, not moving from the crate she was resting her frame on.

"I do not think we should hoist such concerns," I say, slowly inhaling, slowly opening and closing my hands a few times. "At worst, he has motion sickness and cannot move his machine for the moment."

Tamase looks down, lips retracting, unmoving from her position as if she had become part of the crate itself. Sakaki and Yoroi merely look away, Ayamine sighs as she goes to rest against the wall by 1st Lt

Suzumiya's side. So, once more the silence around us is permeated by all the whispers, by the shouts of the mechanics near the railing.

According to what I saw on the radar, Takeru continued to fight despite having been almost bested at one point. The others also seem to have seen the same patterns. And at blinding speeddid he retaliate, for my radar had quite the issues keeping up with the pace of the last moments of the fight. The only possible explanation for the state the Gekishin is in would be that he failed to connect with one of those aerial charges of his. So, it would be natural for him to be left nauseous after that.

Yet, for him to have resorted to such a method, and for it to have left his machine in such a state… Are you truly a spy, then? Why would you decide to endow such aggression towards Tsukuyomi?

"Come on, move along!" A strong yell, which is followed by hasty footsteps. The crimson haired captain, whose name was Isumi I believe, who was in the command post during the battle enters the hangar, followed by a few nurses who bring a gurney with them. "This is no spectacle. If you've no business here, get out of the way."

"What is going on?" I look around yet the others seem equally shocked at the sight, even 1st Lt Suzumiya.

"Why is the medic crew here?" Yoroi asks, eyes wide and unblinking.

"So he really is hurt?" Tamase says, looking around then down when the rest of us remain silent.

Coughing softly, Sakaki looks towards 1st Lt Suzumiya. "1st Lt, could we approach the Gekishin to ask Cpt Isumi what has happened?"

"I do not think it's a good idea," she affirms, again shaking her head. "If Cpt Isumi brought a gurney, then approaching them now would only have your questions refused."

"So you say that there is something that cannot be disclosed, is that it?" Otherwise, why would a mere question on Takeru's state be refused?

"Eh? No, just that if your comrade was hurt, then asking questions now is-"

"Why would he have been hurt? He was wearing the fortified suit, furthermore our units' boosters are limited so that we cannot injure ourselves in the first place."

It makes no sense, all this secrecy. How they sent us five back on our own before his Gekishin was brought to the hangar, how the battle wasn't declared over as soon as he was marked as down, and now we can't even approach the machine or ask any questions. It makes no sense. Unless, of course, there is something to hide.

"Mitsurugi, come on," Sakaki sighs, grabbing one of her elbows. "Shirogane-kun must have failed one of his charges, and perhaps he's unconscious now. This is just standard emergency protocol, isn't it?"

"To the point of leaving his machine in such a state? Sakaki, do not take me for a fool. Why would have Takeru employed such a risky method when he was the last man standing?"

Why would he choose such a violent end to this battle? Considering how odd his disposition was earlier, and what Tsukuyomi has told me, could he have grown upset at something? I do not believe Tsukuyomi would taunt or press him to such extremes, Takeru did this on his own volition. But, why? Don't tell me… you're truly…

"Stand aside, make way!" A loud bark, a voice I recognize.

Looking to the other end of the hangar, Kamiyo, Tomoe and Ebisu were pushing their way through the crowds and supply crates, all of them still wearing their suits. Severe expressions mire their complexions, as if the alarm was blaring at this very moment. Why would they be coming in person to this hangar? Now the others are who look at my person, yet I sigh and shake my head in equal surprise at the matter.

"Where the Heavens- Oh, there it is!" Kamiyo quickly stomps her way to the Gekishin, people moving out of her way as the other two follow close. She slows down, taking a short breath before facing the ones near Takeru's machine, cold as ice. "Cpt, has the cadet left the unit yet?"

The nurses and medical staff stiffen, sharing looks and whispers. Those around us also indulge in the same curiosity, as us five and 1st Lt Suzumiya do by the crates near the hallway.

"I do not recall hearing you had the authorization to ask for such questions," Cpt Isumi answers, displaying a frown while she rests a hand onto the Gekishin's cockpit.

"The gall," Kamiyo fumes, taking a step forward, making some of the mechanics that were near the docking port scatter swiftly like leaves to the wind's mercy. "Your cadet lashes out against our squad leader and you refuse to even disclose what's going on?!"

"What did she say?" Sakaki says before I could, we share a gaze yet find the rest of the hangar silenced in equal measure.

Cpt Isumi sighs, brushing some hair to a side, then she takes a few steps forward while leaning closer to the rails, as if blocking Kamiyo from approaching the cockpit of the TSF. "2nd Lt, please do not speak unnecessary words. We do not wish to instigate further hostility."

"Please, do not jest," she retorts, frowning much towards the Gekishin. "Why is Mana-sama being treated as the aggressor when the cadet was the one who performed such a savage charge? You're all just trying to shift the blame to us!"

Endowing an ice cold glare, the captain holds their stares, the most adusted ones from the trio, the yet composed of the cousins, and the befuddled of all those of us who spectate the debate. Firm and relaxed, she crosses her arms slowly without moving an inch. "As I said before, you have no authorization to be in this hangar. Your squad leader was requested to detail the events that lead to the state of this Gekishin, nothing more. And I assume you were told that we requested the IRG to not try anything against cadet Shirogane. Leave this hangar at once, or we'll act in consequence." Slow are her words and the movements of her lips, yet the minute furrowing of her brows, the hand delving into a pocket and the unblinking fixation of her stare tells she is not jesting on her threat.

Yet, what is the meaning of this? Takeru truly attacked Tsukuyomi with one of those savage charges, and the UN is blaming her for it? The trio wouldn't be here otherwise, not without good reason to clash so openly with a UN officer. And I refuse to believe Tsukuyomi would have said or done anything to cause this outcome. All the whispers around us, behind the crowds, the crates, as well as the stare of that captain… They're treating my fellows as if they were the culprits? How dare-

"How dare you speak such balderdash!" Tomoe finishes mine own thoughts, a coiled fist finding her chest. "We fought with honor and you dare throw mud at us?"

"Again, we are not pointing fingers at anyone," Cpt Isumi says, giving the three of them afirm gaze, unfaltering in front of their glares, while waving a hand downwards in a slow fashion.

Ebisu frowns as she steps forward, her teeth visible for a moment as she hits the railway when she sways a hand to the air. "Why should we lower our heads and accept this without question? Furthermore, we are only here to see if the cadet is conscious at the moment. If Mana-sama is being sent to a questioning, then Shirogane also should be."

As the whispers thicken in the air, Cpt Isumi remains still, expression tight and never lifting her gaze from the trio. Seeming to stick her chest out, raising her shoulders, not a single ripple could be seen in the surface of her composure. "And I already gave you an answer. Until this situation has been clarified, you were asked to remain either in your hangar or your quarters. 1st Tsukuyomi agreed to this petition and yet here you are."

"With all due respect," Kamiyo says, still frowning as she waves a hand upwards, "a mere positive or negative answer would suffice. Simply removing the cadet from his machine also would. If you truly want to know what transpired, inspecting his control logs or bringing him along to the questioning should be the most logical course of action."

Yet, Cpt Isumi remains undaunted. "Do you think you can do as you please in this base? I will only repeat myself one last time. Desist on whatever it is you're trying to do, this was nothing but an accident. No one is pointing fingers at you, so do not leash out against the cadet. Also,please take into account how your presence here will be taken," she says, taking a momentary gaze at those around, sending quite a frozen deluge their way which makes some turn hastily leave and stumble with a cable or a crate, others merely look away.

"We are only asking for both parties to be present in the questioning. It is most unfair for Mana-sama to be treated as the sole culprit of this 'accident'," Tomoe retorts immediately, acidic and venomous as she scowls towards the damaged steel.

Yet, the captain frowns, heaving a sigh and shaking her head while pinching her nose. "Do you plan to force me to call security? Is that it? You're just trying to force my hand to make you into the victims?"

"What did she say?" Clenching a fist, I cannot help but to frown at the words.

"Mitsurugi, shh!" Sakaki says, hastily grabbing one of my arms and pulling me back.

"However, how could she say such a thing to an Imperial Guard?"

"And what do you plan to do, speak up against a superior officer?" She asks, tapping her glasses and holding my gaze, making my words lose impulse on my throat.

"As if you were the victims here!" Kamiyo once more shouts, breaking our stares. Slashing the air with a wave, punching a crate, a finger then fires off towards the Gekishin while she snarls in hunting aggression. "It was that damn American who attacked Mana-sama with such savage a maneuver. Yet, we are the ones brought into questioning? It's clear as day, that dastard is nothing but a violent element that revels in such brutal approaches. And you are shielding that foreigner from proper questioning, casting the blame onto our squad leader."

"No one is blaming you for anything," Cpt Isumi says as she again shakes her head, the stillness of her complexion an inverse reflection of what burns in the trio's faces. "Yet, you don't have the authorization to receive this intel or to question the cadet, and 1st Lt Tsukuyomi gave us word this accident would be kept to just that, that none of you would try and turn this into a blame game. For one last time, leave before I have to call for security."

The trio seems intent on not accepting the terms, yet once more affliction mires their complexions as they share a gaze and dull the cascading animosity which permeated their eyes. For them to be this upset, and to have come here in person, it means Tsukuyomi truly is being treated as the cause of whatever has occurred. Yet, for some reason, Takeru is being shielded now. When he should have been the one who forced this outcome with his piloting, when it was completely unnecessary as well, when he should have been aware of the consequences due to the punishment that still lies on his shoulders. It leaves my insides hollow, my lips dry and sinking inwards. Why… Why did you do such a thing?

"… You think the American tried to harm one of 'em?" A whisper asks, from within the crowd.

"Either that, or they went too far against the guy and are now covering their own asses," another whisper answers, and Sakaki again grabs my arm and shakes her head.

So all I can do is bite my lips and look away as further whispers prickle my ears. And if the trio continues to argue with the captain, they too shall bear some manner of punishment for these actions. When they're only safeguarding Tsukuyomi's honor in front of an irrational claim. If Takeru was the one who acted out of line, then he too should be questioned. And reprimanded, if his action indeed put Tsukuyomi and his TSF at risk. Yet, if he is injured or unable to leave his unit, then haste is of essence. Only then this will be clarified, whether you truly are at fault or if this was nothing but an accident, as well as the causebehind the state of your unit.

Thus, I sigh and feel a shiver on my nape. To step forward and speak up at this time will only serve to garner all the attention, use my image for my own interests. Dubious it is that Cpt Isumi will simply bow down at my words, yet I must be careful not to cause the trio to flare up further. I still have to share some words with them regarding their treatment towards Tamase during the battle, after all. However, to simply remain watching is not something I should allow myself to do. After all, you truly might be injured or unconscious within your cockpit due to the G-Forces of your maneuver, and all this discussion is achieving is delay your treatment.

Licking my lips when taking the first step, releasing my arm from Sakaki's binding hand as she tries to restrain me, I cough when approaching the debating four. "If you'd excuse me, captain?"

Her eyes narrow, merely moving her eyes to gazemy way for a moment. "What is it, cadet?"

"I believe ascertaining the condition of cadet Shirogane should be a priority, which would easily defuse this argument. Even if he is taken to the medbay, he also will certainly be taken to questioning at a latter moment. I do not believe the presence of the guards here puts your orders in-"

"You're speaking out of line, cadet. Stand back," she replies, another frozen downpour aims at my person this time from within her stern frown.

"What?! You think you can dismiss Meiya-sama's words?" Kamiyo's hands twitch as she frowns. "You're nothing but a baseborn, how dare-"

"Kamiyo," Glaring her way, I hold her gaze. She nods in apology along the other two, taking a step back. Inhaling slowly, I then turn to look at my superior once more. "Cpt, ma'am, I am aware I should not be speaking up. Yet, my comrade's safety, and his image, is being jeopardized by this argument. Whether he is to blame or not, that shall be clarified in due time. But first, ascertaining his status should take priority. More so considering the damaged state of his machine."

She then nods, her shoulders sagging for a moment. "Sigh… I do agree with you. However, the guards here have no authorization to be near the cadet. And I cannot deny they'd try to something against him the moment he exits the cockpit."

Waving a hand their way, my eyes briefly meet the trio's as they say no word yet engrave the displeasure in their faces. I then nod, keeping my head low. "I do not believe that to be a concern, an Imperial Guard would not shame their teachings with such crude a conduct. Please, my squadmate might truly be injured." Even if that is nothing but his fault, considering what seems to have happened.

"Did you not hear, cadet Mitsurugi?" She says, once more firm and frosting. "I ordered you to stand back. I understand your concerns, but this is a UN base. We have a protocol to follow, and 1st Lt Tsukuyomi already agreed on this procedure. So," brushing her hair, a slow drizzle of absolute zero leaves her lips, "if you three do not leave this instant, I will be calling security," she then procures a communicator from her pocket, flickering the switch on.

"P-Please wait, ma'am. There is no need to-"

Another set of voices, loud voices reach my ears as they ask for people to move.

Both the captain and the trioseem startled as well, a minuscule twitch and subsequent lost of tension in their forms as their gazes seek the source of the sounds which were coming from two opposite hallways. Mion and Shion, also wearing their suits, hurry towards us from one end of the hangar while the Instructor slowly nudges herself through the people to get to our position, only to halt her steps in utter shock as she sees the state of the Gekishin.

"You three, what do you think you're doing?!" Shion berates them, waving a finger about with quite the adusted expression in her as she rushes the last steps.

Kamiyo stutters, gaze crumbling to a thousand pieces. "W-We only wanted to take the cadet to the questioning. It is unjust, for Mana-sama to be-"

"Silence," Mion says, shaking her head as she rubs her forehead with a finger. "Sister gave us our orders, did she not? And yet, you defied her and came here anyways. It seems you even caused problems for the cadets," she then gives me a fleeting glance, both cousins subtly nodding my way, cascading lips in apology.

"… Mitsurugi, what is going on here?" The Instructor asks as she walks towards us, a sharp glance towards the guards as she takes care to mind her steps and walk a set distance from them.

"I was merely asking Cpt Isumi to retrieve cadet Shirogane from his unit, in case he was injured."

"What? Injured?!" Flinching back, only to gain a towering tint in her eyes. She gazes at the Gekishin, lips shaking for a second, then looks to me, yet I can only lower my gaze, so I can hear her give out a short yet deep sigh. "Just what on earth happened here? Cpt, what is the state of the cadet?"

"We do not yet know. I have orders to take him to medbay, just in case. But as you can see," she then gazes to the guards, sighing with a delayed gesture towards them, "we had some company."

"My apologies, captain," Shion immediately says, bowing down along Mion, then glaring at the trio who then also bow down, despite how they bite their lips as they do. "Forgive the intrusion, there was no ill will from them. Only their duty to their squad leader fueled their actions and words." Her voice composed, her lips pressed into a firm line, nothing but a forced veil which hides the pressure of her fingers upon her palms.

Cpt Isumi nods, finally dispelling the cold aura in her posture. "Apology accepted. Please, take your leave. Let's not make this accident into something larger than it is."

"We are in agreement then," Mion nods as she rises back up, brushing some hair. "Please do look after the cadet, we shall be taking our leave here."

"However, Mion-sama, why should we-"

"Kamiyo," Shion glares at her, one of her eyebrows twitching for a moment, "we are taking our leave. Do not shame the Blood squadron any further."

The trio bows down in apology, then give a minute nod to Cpt Isumi before turning around and stomping their way out, clearly seething to the rim. Both cousins once more apologize to the captain in a formal manner, giving me a faint gaze before they also take their hurried leave, eyes fixated upwards in their perfect march.

"Come on, show's over!" The Instructor shouts, clapping a few times, glaring at the onlookers that start to disperse. "Move along, you've got work to do, I'm sure!" She then hits a crate a few times, making it shake slightly, the echo hastening the departure of the steps.

And with those mere words, most people that had gathered empty the hangar in but a few seconds. I cannot help but to sigh, as those along the captain do. Looking back, the other four were almost petrified on the spot, Tamase with her eyes barely open and the others unable to look my way, while 1st Lt Suzumiya slowly walks towards the captain.

"Isumi, what happened here?" The Instructor asks, arms folding slowly.

Yet, she shakes her head. "I am not at liberty to speak. I suppose you will be notified of this soon enough."

"I see…" she then looks to the Gekishin, eyes squinting and brows arching, a slow yet extended exhalation through her nose once she veils her sight.

1st Lt Suzumiya stops besides me, giving a court bow. "Um, captain, should I go back with the rest or-"

"You stay with the Instructor for now, Suzumiya. Inform her of what you saw, and then go get lunch with the rest," she orders with a nod, to which the 1st Lt salutes in acknowledgment.

"Excuse me, ma'am?" Sakaki takes a few steps towards us, standing in attention. "Could you allow us to at least see how cadet Shirogane is faring?"

Yet, the woman immediately shakes her head. "No, I'm afraid I've orders to take him immediately to the medbay and I already lost plenty of time."

Standing besides Sakaki, giving a deep bow, I ask as I remain in position. "Please, we merely wish to see if he's uninjured, is all. We won't intrude on your orders nor try to speak with him."

"Mitsurugi, Sakaki," the Instructor begins, giving us both an unblinking, fixed stare, "you've heard the state of things. We shall be taking our leave, and you all have to prepare for the afternoon lectures as well."

"However, we're merely asking to-"

Taking a step closer, further do her eyes narrow upon mine. "Didn't you hear?We're on the captain's way. So, we're taking our leave now. Come on, you'll know what happened to the hotshot later."

Holding my breath and nod is all I'm allowed to do, taking a few steps back, flattening my lips as I gaze at the Gekishin. Why would they even deny us being present? Could it be… he isn't truly injured and all of this was a jest? All a ploy to force Tsukuyomi to be the culprit? I would like to believe that is not the case, yet all of this is abundant in suspicion.

"Um…" Tamase speaks up, bows down and tries to hold the Instructor's gaze. "So, we'll know if he's injured or not?"

"We shall know soon," she answers, low and simple. "Let's not loiter around. You five, to the changing room," she orders, gazing into our eyes as we nod. She then turns around, seeming to sigh as she salutes the woman. "My apologies, Isumi. I should have been the one in the command post."

Yet, the captain grimaced for a moment before shaking her head and heaving a short sigh. "It's not your fault, Sergeant. This was nothing but an accident, I'm sure," she says, before saluting all of us and turning around, walking back to the TSF's side.

After looking at it one last time, I turn around and walk into the hallways along the others, following behind the Instructor as 1st Lt Suzumiya details her what had happened before the battle.

Slow steps, slow inhaling. A badly timed word? A too forceful inquiry? What did Tsukuyomi do to have you do such a thing, Takeru? He has never shown any ill conduct towards us, not even as we kept our distance from him. No, there was…

The CCSE. That moment when his back was thrust against the wall, and when we spoke the next day. The clear affliction when he spoke of that woman who bestowed him with the Minaru Kamui. He had said that those methods were reserved for when he had no other choice. Are you saying Tsukuyomi threatened your safety as those chasers did, then? If she is such a danger to your eyes, then… then could you truly be a spy? All this secrecy would make sense then, to cast a shield over Takeru. The XO must have ordered the captain to come look for him, after all he seems to be deeply linked to her considering he refers to her as 'Sensei'.

Slowly, my arms fold over each other. Falling back, back into the currents of thought leads me to all our talks thus far. I do not see such an aggressive person in Takeru, I do not believe Tsukuyomi would do anything to cause such a reaction in him. Yet, the shining visage he shows might only be the surface, what easily meets the eye. What do I know of the shadows that lay beneath the horizon of his facade?

… Either way, it does not change the fact that Tsukuyomi is being falsely accused of harming him. And as much as I may loath it, waiting is all I can do.

"… See?" A whisper follows us as a few MP pass by our side. "Told you the guy got sent to the medbay."

"Heh, because he tried to attack a guard," another replies, their conversation fading as we march on.

Yet, the whispers and gazes follow us on our way to the changing room. As if their shadow had grown eyes, Yoroi and Tamase start to slow down, to throw gazes around at irregular intervals. Ayamine and Sakaki do not show any signs of inconvenience, yet it is doubtful they are immune to the faint echo that now traces our steps. This, too, is yet another repercussion of Takeru's folly. It is not a triviality for us, to remain with a low profile. Even if he were free of guilt, all the unpleasantry that's brewing around him shall also etch itself onto our backs as well, even to Tsukuyomi's and her fellows. As if they already weren't facing enough hardships in this base to begin with.

It's all because of you. You always spoke of how you desired to fit in, yet once again you chose violence. Perhaps I merely set myself up for disappointment, thinking his words on the CCSE were genuine. However…

"Okay but, what if because everyone says he's a yank he finally snapped at something?" another whisper reaches my ears, causing me to follow those soldiers with my eyes.

A female foreigner shrugs, not caring to lower her voice. "It's his fault for attacking the guards. Even if the guy was right, now everyone is going to assume he's some violent jackass. He fucked up, and now he's gonna have to own up to it."

… I cannot deny that what seems to have transpired does not align for what I know Takeru to be. No, wordplay means nothing in front of his actions . However, if he did not have the intention to harm Tsukuyomi and apologizes, then perhaps all these whispers will be vanquished.

Yet, there is nothing to be done at the moment, and while not everyone is speaking of the matter, quite a few are the ones who grow silent when we approach them, their bodies relaxing oddly against a wall or their eyes evading our presence, only to restart the whispers as soon as we pass them by.

Yoroi has been deadly silent all this time, Tamase seems to be walking as if compulsed by some strings and barely paying attention. Sakaki and Ayamine both halt their steps when another aggravation echoed in the whispers, causing Tamase to run into them. Signs of ignition surface in their eyes, as if ready to take immediate action.

"Sakaki, Ayamine," taking a step forward, I shake my head slowly, "do not be foolish. Nothing we could say would aid this situation in the slightest."

"… Ain't that smart," Ayamine clicks her tongue.

"I am only keeping a level head at the moment, is all. Silence is our ally as of now."

"I agree, partially," Sakaki taps her glasses, taking a deep breath. "For now, let's just stay quiet."

"Cadets!" the Instructor shouts, arms folded and staring at us, "do not dally. You can talk at large in the changing room or during lunch."

"Apologies, Instructor," Sakaki quickly says, bowing down first and us following behind. "We were distracted by… a few foul words."

"Don't pay attention to the whispers, you still have the better part of the day ahead of you," she reminds us, never waning in her imposing aura. "We shall be told what transpired by tomorrow, so do not dwell on the matter. I know it might be a hard ask, but clamp your ears and do as you always do. This won't be the last time one of your squadmates becomes the talk of the base, these things happen for both good and ill motives," the Instructor then heaves a short sigh, shaking her head as she turns around. "Come on, we aren't that far from the changing area."

"Uh…" Tamase speaks up, taking a hesitant step forward, "Instructor, what are the chances that Shirogane-san is injured?"

Blinking for a moment, closing her eyes as she sends a hand to her hair, the Instructor's lips seem to retract ever slightly. "It all depends on how his machine got in that state in the first place. I believe he simply lost consciousness due to high G-Forces, possibly during one of those aerial charges of his. So the Gekishin collapsed to the ground then. I do not believe Shirogane is in any danger, he was wearing a fortified suit after all."

"I see…" her head lowers, both arms loosen and lay limp by her side.

"Please, don't be so distraught," 1st Lt Suzumiya says, giving a brief smile to Tamase. "Even if he received some minor injuries, I believe your squadmate will be fine. And don't worry about all the rumors, I'm sure he was not at fault either."

"Eh? How can you affirm that, 1st Lieutenant?"

She taps one of her cheeks as I stare at her and the others do so as well, a minute moment of hesitation before she gazes at the Instructor, who sighs and nods, so 1st Lt Suzumiya looks back towards us with a firm, serious expression. "Well, it's a simple matter. My captain was sent to take your squadmate to the medbay, immediately after the end of the battle. This is proof enough cadet Shirogane is not the cause of this incident. If there was any speck of doubt of this fact, then either the CO or the XO would have had the cadet taken to the questioning, even employing hypnotherapy were it necessary, to avoid any friction with the Royal Guard."

"So, they called the 1st Lt from the Guard just to know what had happened?" Sakaki asks, a finger on her chin as she looks my way, and I nod in thankfulness for having taken the question from me.

"I think so, yes. Of course, I don't know what actually happened, and since I never had the opportunity to even speak with your comrade I can't really give my opinion on all the rumors about him. But if someone was to blame for whatever happened, the cadet would have been taken to the interrogation room regardless of his state or all the guards would have been the ones called by the authorities. That's why," she then smiles, clasping her hands, "please don't worry, this truly seems to not have been anything other than an accident. If this had happened between you all, no one would be batting an eye at this. It's only making this much noise because you faced off against the Royal Guards."

"Which was a mistake to begin with," the Instructor adds in a low tone, a slight frown in her features which makes even 1st Lt Suzumiya twitch. "It was expected one of you would mishandle a TSF during your very first experience with live combat, it always happens. There was no world in which you were put against the guards and didn't face a total defeat when your actual piloting hours are non-existent. I swear…"

"C-Come on, Instructor," 1st Lt Suzumiya waves both hands down, futilely trying to douse the mood of our teacher, "this was nothing but a chain of unfortunate situations."

She exhales from her nose, giving a nod, which makes the rest of us relax. "Let's just leave it at that, then."

She hastily turns on her heels and resumes her march towards the changing room. 1st Lt Suzumiya sighs while placing a hand on her neck, giving us a minute nod before we all resume our pats Tamase's shoulder, and the rest of us nod at her when she looks back. Me and Sakaki share a sigh, Ayamine simply starts walking with her gaze focused elsewhere. A few more whispers followed us, but the remaining distance wasn't large at all. Saluting 1st Lt Suzumiya before entering the room, as she seems to be finished in telling the Instructor what had transpired, for a moment there is nothing but the rustling of the plastic parts as they come off, of the pressure of the suit fading, the sound of the lockers being opened.

All in all, this battle wasn't entirely a negative experience. I did manage to trade blows with Tsukuyomi, even if she perhaps was holding back on me then. With enough effort, one day I will be worthy of crossing true strikes with her. Although, before I forget…

Barely placing her fingertips on her armor, sitting with her eyes transfixed onto the floor, movements far too slow, far too quiet. As if the smallest shift in posture had her pushing against bindings, as if trapped within a cage. And to an extent that might be right, the cage is merely what lies within her mind as of now.

Sitting besides her as I start to remove my leg armor, I hold her gaze when she seems to quiver. "Are you still mulling over the words they said during the battle?"

"… Yes," the words barely made it out of her lips, once more she compacts upon herself as if sinking into darkest depths. "Sorry, I didn't think they'd take that much offense at my presence."

"Do not apologize, Tamase. You made no miss, the trio simply… have far too much ardor in their hearts towards their duty. You are a fellow regardless of your choice not to chase after your title, and I am grateful for your aid during the battle. It is no jest to say you were splendid today," so I smile in earnest, holding the cracks in her eyes.

After a moment, she gives a minute bow, "Thanks, really."

"No, no. I should be the one thanking you for your covering fire." It is truly a shame this 'accident' took place. Otherwise, we would have been able to celebrate Tamase's performance, which I am loath to admit was superior to mine in the role she played.

"Yeah," Yoroi joins in from a side as she takes off her arm guards. "Miki-san was amazing today! I can't believe you actually shot one of them down."

"Actually, she scored two kills," I say, as I cross a leg over the other and start to remove the heel guard. "While it was a mutual knockout, I believe the fortitude you displayed then was marvelous."

"No… I was so scared," she says, her shoulders sinking as low as her tone. "My hands were shaking so badly, my vision grew blurry, all I could do was spam the trigger."

A firm pat to her shoulder, I nod her way when she looks up. "That means you did not freeze, Tamase. You acted through your fear, and that is an achievement you should be proud of. It was our very first mock battle, after all."

"Yeah, that's right," Yoroi nods, releasing her hand from the gloves, "I thought it'd be easy, to just shoot and all, but when they rushed at me I couldn't fire fast enough." She then looks down, the lone free hand resting on her chest. "It was nothing like when we spar with Takeru and he comes at us, it was like a cold shiver ran through me and my mind went blank. Next thing I knew everything was shaking and the projection got turned off," she then sighs, raising the other hand to remove the armor. Yet, Yoroi makes a thumbs up with it and smiles at us, "So don't be so hard on yourself, Miki-san. You did great today."

"What did she do?" Ayamine asks, in the middle of releasing her bosom from the suit.

"Tamase managed to snipe one of our adversaries, and did not fall to fear when receiving fire at point blank," I say with a nod.

"Really?" Sakaki asks as she turns around, removing her shoulder guard.

"N-No… I just tried my best," she answers, looking down to resume her changing. As modest as always, I see.

"Still, way to go," Ayamine smiles, placing her arm guards on the locker and sitting down to deal with the lower end of the suit. "We couldn't even graze the ones we faced," she notes, a small purse of her lips.

"It was obvious, being against the Takemikazuchi," Sakaki shrugs, already slipping entirely out of the suit. "That we held out for so many minutes is a success in my eyes," she says as one finger once more spins in the air as her other hand retrieves her undergarments from the locker.

"I agree with Sakaki. While I believe they must have held back, your continued survival is a triumph in and of itself," I nod, removing my leg guards, then raise my feet to start taking off the plastic covering my body.

"… That was more thanks to Shirogane-kun, truth be told," she says, raising her legs to put her clothing on.

"Huh?" Tamase looks up, Yoroi and me also stare at her. "Sakaki-san, what did Shirogane-san do?"

"Kept us both in check," Ayamine says as she hastily puts on her tank top. "When they started shutting down our escape routes, he immediately got us close to each other."

"And then covered our flanks as always when we tried to retaliate," the finger still spinning, she enters a leg into her cargo pants. "Frankly, if they hadn't got Ayamine before you rejoined us, I think we might have had a chance to subdue the Takemikazuchi with all four of us working together."

"Well, it is a shame," I nod in agreement, pulling my arms out of the suit, folding it all and placing the plastic and each part in the right compartment. "By the by Ayamine, how were you shot down?"

"They tumbled me from afar as Special-kun retreated, and the Takemikazuchi got me before the shock countermeasure ceased," she says, shrugging with narrowed brows. "Nothing I could do, really."

"Same here," Sakaki sighs as she unfolds her tank top. "I did my best to try and limit the Takemikazuchi's movements, but it was a wasted effort. There was no way we could do anything against that TSF, piloted by an elite too. It's impressive you managed to snipe one of them, though," she nods towards Tamase, a minute smile as she taps her glasses. "I guess you truly are the ace of our original squad."

"I just did my best effort, and Mitsurugi-san and Yoroi-san also did a good job to facilitate that shot," she says, finally loosening her expression, finally gaining some impulse in her arms, dispelling what nested within even if for a moment.

"Still, you landed the shot. It shall be an honor to try and dodge your sniping in our coming battles, Tamase," I smile at her with vigor, before procuring my own tank top from the locker.

"No, on the contrary, I'll do my best to not disappoint," she says, nodding as her expression tightens, shimmering in resolve for a moment.

"Come on Miki-san," Yoroi gently slaps her shoulder, making Tamase squeal, "you clearly were our lifeline today. You fought very well, despite all the things they told you."

Sporting a smile and in an amicable tone as always, Yoroi nods as she sits down to tie her boots. The small retraction of her lips, how her hands fold towards her body tell Tamase is once more brooding over the matter. All my efforts to clear her mind wasted by Yoroi's unawareness. It is hard to believe she wouldn't have read the air, to go and once more mention that.

"What do you mean?" Ayamine asks, her fingers that were holding the string to tie her boots frozen in midair.

And now we have alerted them of it, to make matters worse. Siiigh… "As it were, the trio hurled some unpleasantries to Tamase while we sparred. They didn't hold their tongues and made mistaken claims, while Tamase kept an admirable composure and didn't retort even once," finishing with a nod her way, Tamase rubs her hands together as she raises towards her locker.

"I see, so that happened," Sakaki taps her glasses, closing her eyes momentarily. She then lightly overlaps her arms, looking at me and Yoroi. "Did anything happen then?"

"No, they just started insulting us a bit," Yoroi says, scratching her head. "I think they got mad because we outsmarted them and Miki-san shot down one of them."

"Perhaps, that is true," quickly nodding as I grab my boots, I cough as I continue. "Being bested by cadets surely was quite the strike to their pride as elites, so they decided to stop holding back for a moment. I do concede their words were most unproper, yet Tamase made the right choice by not reacting to them."

"Yes, even if I wouldn't have been able to retort in any capacity had I been in your shoes," Sakaki says, shrugging as she nods to Tamase, who remains silent as she gets changed.

"… So you say that when they get pissed off, the guards start spewing shit to their rivals?" Ayamine asks, voice rising as she slams her locker shut, a frown engraved into her features as she looks my way.

"I said no such thing," I answer in kind, crossing my arms. "The three we fought were merely… a bit too fervent in their devotion to their houses, so they see anyone turning their back to the IRG as a personal offense. They would have said the same to any Japanese in the UN, not only to Tamase."

"Yoroi, did they also talk shit to Mitsurugi?" She asks, Yoroi takes half a step back before shaking her head as she looks away in silence.

"Ayamine, what are you getting at?" Sakaki asks, taking a step forward despite not having her boots on.

She looks my way, grasping her chin, her lips shrinking as do her eyelids. "So the ones we fought against today would insult anyone who they see as a traitor?"

What is it with her? Why is she not letting this rest? Can't you see that lingering in this topic will only bring further unrest to Tamase? Yet, she does not lift her sight from mine. Her habitual poker face betrays her, lines of kindling lay in her eyes and forehead which foretell a small beginning of anger.

"… If provoked, perhaps. I do concede that they were at fault, Tamase did not deserve such strong worded opinions and we should praise her temperance."

"Yeah, that's true," Ayamine slowly walks up to Tamase, again petting her head as she did while she told us of the letters she sent to her father. "You were very brave, Tamase."

"No, I just-"

"No ifs or buts," she enforces her petting, smiling briefly. "Good work." Yet, Ayamine turns to face once more, shifting back to the tight expression, to the combusting eyes. "So, do you think that if the guards got upset, they'd start talking shit about us, too?"

"Why are you asking me this, Ayamine?"

"Don't you think something like that happened with Special-kun?"

"Huh? Wait, are you… Are you saying the guards are behind the accident?"

"If he knocked out those two Shinpan we saw in the hanger, wouldn't the 1st Lt have a motive to be cross with him?" She asks, slowing down her tone, back to her usual frozen composure. "If the guards are known to snap towards those they don't like… I think there is no better match for someone like that than Special-kun."

"Ayamine, be serious," Sakaki sighs, sitting down to tie her boots. "They're elites that have saw many nights of battle. Do you really think they'd be so petty as to instigate a fight like that?"

"But they did that to Miki-san and me," Yoroi adds as she puts her jacket on, closing her locket. She immediately looks down as our sights cross, a hand hastily cradling the opposite arm. "I mean, maybe they said the same things to Takeru? Maybe that's why, I dunno, he got upset and tried his best to win?"

"I do not agree with that assessment. Takeru probably lost his composure on his own, proceeded to execute one of those aerial maneuvers of his, and failed to meet his target," I affirm, arms folding as I nod to myself. In no way would Tsukuyomi ever lower herself to such crude a conduct, she is certainly not at fault for whatever it is that transpired.

"And, why do you think this accident happened?" Ayamine asks, holding my gaze.

"… Again, he must have lost his temper in front of the 1st Lieutenant. Regardless of why, this is Takeru's miss."

"I wonder about that," she says, looking away.

"What are you trying to say, Ayamine?" I ask, binding my voice, not lifting my gaze from her as I stand up.

She returns my gaze, in silence for a moment. Before the traces grow roots, before she slowly shifts her posture away from me. "Maybe you're blaming the wrong person, don't you think?"

"What did you just say?"

"Come on, you two," Sakaki claps a few timesas she gets closer. "Let's not start raising our voices."

"My apologies." The last thing I want is to sow further discord in the squad. Let's just leave this be and-

"So you think Special-kun is to blame, is that it?" Ayamine says, shrugging.

"I said nothing of the sort!"

"But you said the guards can snap at those they don't like, and start talking shit about them too."

"1st Lt Tsukuyomi would never do something of the sort. The honorable members of the Imperial Royal Guard wouldn't lower themselves to such conduct. Take back those words, or else."

"Do you really believe that?" Ayamine asks, unmoving and unblinking.

"Yes, I do."

"Then, are the insults they said to Tamase part of their 'honorable' conduct?"

"Wha- T-That is not what we're talking about, do not switch the subject."

"Ayamine, Mitsurugi, stop it. Now," Sakaki orders, hitting a locker to try and break our gazes.

Yet, the one in front of me does not veer her eyes for but a second. "What about the mess in the hangar? Coming to badmouth a cadet that could be injured, shouting and trying to trample over a captain is 'honorable' conduct for you?"

"Stop trying to shift the conversation! It is not the same thing in the slightest, Tamase did nothing to deserve those ill words yet we don't know what Takeru did to cause such a reaction."

"Why?" A frail voice asks behind me, turning around I see Tamase's eyes cracking as her hands come together. "Why do you think Shirogane-san deserves what happened to him?"

"I did not say that! Stop putting words in my mouth."

"Enough!" Sakaki shouts, clapping again. "Mitsurugi, explain yourself in clear terms. Ayamine, do not interrupt her." She then holds Ayamine's gaze while tapping her glasses, until she nods and takes a step back.

I cough, clearing my throat and mind, licking my teeth as I ponder on my wording. "Well… First, I am not defending the words those three hurled towards Tamase. However, the source of their anger at the hangar was the unfair treatment to 1st Lt Tsukuyomi. And as I said before, I do not believe an elite like her would soil her honor by uttering similar insults towards Takeru."

"Are you sure about that?" Ayamine asks, rolling her eyes as she places both hands behind her head and leans on the locker.

"What are you insinuating?"

"We know those two Shinpan tried to hurt Special-kun during the CCSE, we saw how that same 1st Lieutenant you're defending reacted when Yoroi merely touched that Takemikazuchi," she notes while raising a few fingers, Yoroi looks down, away from me, as if trying to shrink in place. "And today they insulted Tamase without her provoking them at all. So, maybe, they also said something they shouldn't have to Special-kun and that made him lose his cool."

"How dare you speak such words… Take them back this instant or-"

"Mitsurugi, calm down!" Sakaki says, gripping and pulling at my shoulder.

"However, what has her casting such defamation towards 1st Lt Tsukuyomi? She would never employ crude insults, and even if one were to escape her lips, it is still Takeru's fault for reacting to it. Tamase here kept her composure throughout the battle, and he should have done the same."

"Sigh…" releasing my shoulder, she shakes her head. "Look, it's not that simple, Mitsurugi. We both know what kind of… trials Shirogane-kun had to endure, don't we?"

"Well… I am not saying he couldn't have motives to grow upset, but to the extent to crash his machine? What if his attack had connected? He was not thinking, and that makes this clearly Takeru's miss."

Tapping her glasses as she takes a step back, Sakaki licks her lips, hiding her hands in her pockets as she turns away from me. "I don't think it's fair to place all the blame on his shoulders. True, if he reacted aggressively he will be punished for it. However, if the guards' insults were what drove him to act, then I don't think they're exactly free of guilt. Plus, if they truly held no ill will towards Shirogane-kun and only grew upset in the heat of the moment, they wouldn't have screamed as they did in the hangar."

"I'm telling you, that was only because Tsukuyomi is not being treated fairly. If as you say the blame is shared, then Takeru should also be present in the questioning."

"And what if he's nauseous or unconscious?" Yoroi asks, slowly taking a step forward, stealing glances at us. "If he suffered a recoil from the G-Forces, he needs some rest. Maybe they were planning to question him once they confirmed he was in no danger, but the guards took it as him walking free from the battle?"

"I still believe taking him out of the cockpit would have quelled their questions."

"Mitsurugi, the guards can't do as they please in this base. Be reasonable, regardless of what happened in the mock battle their conduct in the hangar was not justified."

"… I disagree, they merely came seeking for answers and Cpt Isumi withheld them unnecessarily. If there were no culprits to this accident, taking him out of the Gekishin would have solved everything. Surely you're not going to say the guards would have tried to attack an unconscious or weakened cadet now, are you?"

"Dull the frown and tone down the anger, no one is insulting the IRG, Mitsurugi," Sakaki says, taking a step forward, crossing her gaze with mine. I nod in apology, sighing.

"Still, they didn't have to make such a ruckus," Ayamine says, one eye closed. "They started screaming, knowing Special-kun's reputation and using it to pin the blame on him. It's because of them that now we're gonna have to deal with more rumors again," she clicks her tongue, kicking back at the locker as she leaves it.

"Again with that? I find it odd that you of all people is saying such things, Ayamine."

One of her brows twitches, shortly after she frowns and coils both hands. "What?"

"M-Mitsurugi-san, please don't fight," Tamase asks, pleads as a hand of hers enters my peripheral vision, yet her feet remain molded to the ground, unable to put herself in between us.

"Kei-san, you too," Yoroi pulls at Ayamine's back, yet is shrugged off roughly as Ayamine takes a few steps towards me.

"What did you mean?" She asks, as low as always, the combustion she once only showed to Sakaki flourishing in my sight.

"It is odd, that you're so quick to ascertain Takeru's innocence when we know nothing of what transpired. Despite how you were the one who held doubts towards him for the longest time. Perhaps, do you hold some… reservations towards the IRG?"

"No, I admire them, actually."

"Eh? You do?"

"Yeah, my…" she looks down, biting her bottom lip as it folds inwards, "family used to look up to the values of the Royal Guard, the honor code they practiced. That's why, I believe the military has to do what it can for the people it protects. A warrior must not waver, for we are the shield which protects our present."

"Then, what has you-"

"They did not act like proper Imperial Guards, and you know it," she shoots out, once more frowning. "Not only today, during the CCSE too. So, all things considered, I don't think we should assume Special-kun is to blame. Since we know nothing, we can't point fingers at the guards, or at him."

"However, I am telling you 1st Lt Tsukuyomi would never resort to such crude approaches. I know she is not to blame for whatever happened. How can we know that Takeru wasn't the cause of this accident?"

Slowly, she looks at me, then at Sakaki. Closing her eyes, massaging her scalp, with a soft sigh the combustion ceases, parted open as the dawn sky. And in its place, narrow lips, sagging shoulders, a quiet whisper as if coming from underwater. "Because when he snapped at me, he didn't crash. He wasn't as aggressive as those guards claimed when we fought, and Shirogane was absolutely livid back then. Not once did he fail those aerial charges, despite how upset he was at me. And I think that… when I asked him if he was okay with what happened in the island, if he really was so aggressive, he was telling the truth." She looks up, straight into my eyes, not a single speck of hesitation or disquiet in her features or breathing. "Shirogane wouldn't resort to a maneuver that might harm someone, not during a mock battle. So I don't think he's the one to blame for this."

"Then, what are you getting at? Are you insinuating the Guards would fall so low as to damage a cadet in that way?" I immediately retort,paying no mind to whatever it is that's pulling my arm.

"Maybe they said something they shouldn't have, something that hit too close to home. Shirogane then got angry and attacked seriously, fighting as well as he did when he faced me and the leader. And these 'honorable' guards took it personally and crashed him into the concrete. And in a panic, maybe he tried to use the aerial move to escape, they shot at him like the leader did in our fight, and he spiraled to the ground and crashed."

"For you to have the gall to spout such defamation towards the IRG…"

"I'm not defaming anyone," she retorts, crossing her arms. "Shirogane was really messed up after our fight, so him getting hit doing one of his aerial acrobatics is the most likely cause of the state of his Gekishin."

"And, how does that equate Tsukuyomi insulting him, spurring him to such reckless methods?"

"Mitsurugi, for the last time, no one is offending-"

"No, she's clearly placing the responsibility on 1st Lt Tsukuyomi's shoulders."

"She was the experienced pilot, though. She should have known what could happen if she landed a hit while he's on the air," shrugging, rolling her eyes, she says.

"Takeru should not have engaged in that maneuver, period. If he did, perhaps he had other motives to grow upset at Tsukuyomi's words, since as I said before, she would never resort to insults." And if this is indeed what happened, if Tsukuyomi's words spurred such an aggressive reaction from you… then, perhaps you truly were a spy all along. While she truly is fearsome when angered, using crude insults is beneath Tsukuyomi.

"So it's all his fault, then?" Ayamine frowns, again shrugging off Yoroi as she tried to hold her arm, and now stumbles back at the force of Ayamine's swing. "Anything the 1st Lieutenant said was justified even if it was something personal for Shirogane?"

"Again, Tsukuyomi wouldn't employ insults of any kind. If she thought Takeru deserving of them, she would have swiftly knocked him out. So the one at fault is Takeru for losing his composure, his poise. Whatever it is she might have said, he chose to react aggressively. I believe it is clear this is his miss, as a cadet and as a warrior."

It is shameful, for a student of the Mugen Kidou to fall prey to such hostile impulses. Yet, this in itself is perhaps bountiful proof that he is no fellow of us. A properly trained warrior of our style would never allow such vicious desires to cloud their judgment. Unless, perhaps, his teacher had been insulted to his eyes.

Ayamine remains frowning, raising a brow when her teeth become visible. "And they spouting shit to our squadmate in front of the entire hangar is A-Okay in your eyes? They talking shit about Tamase is okay with you, then?"

"I am not saying anything of the sort, stop putting words in my mouth!"

"So? Answer the questions, Mitsurugi. If Tamase had snapped at the insults, would it also be her fault?"

"T-That's… different." Because she is under no suspicions, because those insults were born out of a too strong sense of duty.

Takeru, on the other hand, might be a spy. No, this decision he took, how he refused my handshake of fellowship, this is proof enough he wasn't truly trained by a fellow of us. He isn't worthy of the Minaru Kamui, and truly might not be who he claims. After all this time, after showing yourself to be such a capable warrior, such a wise fighter. Why did you have to hoist such wrath within? I truly… wanted you to become one of us, to show them you had been truthful. Was all you have told me thus far nothing but lies? Those sparking eyes when speaking of that woman… did not seem to be lying, however…

"It isn't different at all," Ayamine says, clicking her lips and looking away. "You're just taking it out on Shirogane because you can't accept that a guard you admire might have acted out of line."

"… Take back those words."

"Make me."

"You two, this is enough!" Sakaki shouts, shoving me back and pushing Ayamine away, placing a hand on her chest. "What the hell do you think you're doing?!"

"She's insulting one of my fellows, I shan't allow such disrespect!"

"Shame you don't get this riled up when one of us gets shitfrom others," she says, slicing the air as she takes a step back from Sakaki's hand.

"What are you saying? Stop comparing Tamase to-"

"And what about me?"

"Huh?"

"Yeah. What about when people talked shit about me? Don't remember you getting this angry."

"I… I already apologized for that. Furthermore, it has little to do with-
"

"It's exactly the same," she scowls, looking away as she thrust both hands in her pockets. "You're choosing to preemptively put the blame on someone who you don't trust, despite what they do to earn your companionship."

"I… That's not what's going on here at all! Tsukuyomi wouldn't allow such an accident to occur, so this was clearly… caused by Takeru's own actions," and because if Tsukuyomi chose to act, it means he is not to be trusted.

"Well, congrats on being an asshole."

"Ayamine, stop it," Sakaki says, giving both of us a sharp gaze. "You two, apologize to the other. You're getting dragged in the heat of the moment, I'm sure."

"I'm not apologizing," Ayamine immediately retorts, causing the other three to flinch, petrified on the spot. "I already gave Shirogane plenty of shit, and I don't believe he's to blame. I know very well how it feels, to be followed by whispers and side glances. And I thought we all had seen who he is, what kind of guy he is after all this time." She then looks at me, then spits on the ground. "I expected more out of you, Mitsurugi."

"What did you say? It is clear all he said thus far wasn't truthful, if he chose to endow in such violence!"

"Even if he was provoked?"

"He was not!"

"You don't know that."

"The Royal Guard would never-"

"They still insulted Tamase, one of your comrades. It's the same thing."

"Kei-san, please stop!" She tries to hold onto Ayamine's arm, who starts struggling to break free.

"I'm just saying what's going on here. Mitsurugi is in denial that the Lieutenant might have screwed up."

"You… take those words back this instant. Say whatever you wish about me, however I shan't allow you to tarnish the name of my teacher!"

"Mitsurugi-san, no!" Tamase steps in front of me, grabbing my sides, as Sakaki holds onto one of my arms. "Calm down, please!"

"You yourself said losing one's composure is a bad trait, so get yourself together," Sakaki pulls at me, groaning for a moment.

"See?" Ayamine smirks, chuckling. "Maybe Special-kun was just as you are now, but no one was there to stop him. You, someone trained to be a warrior, almost lost your cool."

"Eh? N-No… Do not try to justify his actions!"

"And what if they said something that hurt him much, something about someone dear to him, and he got as upset as you?"

"Even then-"

"What if that was someone from America? After all…" she then looks down and sighs, the restrained arm growing limp in Yoroi's hold, "we also treated Shirogane as if he were a piece of shit solely because he came from abroad, right?"

"That's… however… Even if that was the case," even if the woman he admires so had been insulted from his point of view, "he should not have reacted aggressively."

"Says the one who was about to ram her fist on my face," she then shrugs.

"Ayamine, enough of this!" Sakaki lets go of my arm, and again stands in between us. "Mitsurugi, you too. I don't want to hear anything else from you two. The Instructor is outside the room, what are we gonna tell her if she enters now?"

"That Ayamine should apologize and retract her insults on 1st Lt Tsukuyomi."

"And that Mitsurugi doesn't give a shit about us getting screwed over by royal guards."

"I never said anything-"

"Stop fighting!" Sakaki screams, truly loudly, from the pit of her stomach. Hands shaking for a moment, all the composure she hoisted starts to crumble in slow motion. In a mere second, the combustion and ripples surfaced in her. "Ayamine, I don't want to hear a single word about this for the rest of the day. I understand the particular issues you have with the way Mitsurugi worded her thoughts, but that doesn't mean she doesn't care about Shirogane-kun. Apologize, now."

Shifting her posture, her eyes don't meet mine. Barely moving her lips, she gives me a brief nod. "Sorry, I got carried away."

"Mitsurugi, you too," Sakaki says, tapping her glasses as she stares.

So I sigh, a void now filling me, something constricting my throat. "My apologies, I shouldn't have grown upset at you," I give her a bow, then run a hand into my hair as the air enters and leaves me in short succession, failing to douse the pressure which now is engraved in my chest.

"Listen, all of you," Sakaki says, pacing in front of us, "at some point, this was bound to happen. When we get commissioned, this kind of issues will arise at times. And while I won't add further opinions to this debate now, let me say this. Mitsurugi, for your own good, you shouldn't take a side so openly."

"What? How could I not? Defending my fellows is-"

"Because you're UN as of now," she says, drawing circles in the air. "You can feel however you wish within, but defending the guards like that will make others think you're blaming your squadmates and taking their side, as Ayamine did. Could you bring yourself to trust in someone who chooses someone from another squad over you?"

"However, that is not-"

"It's how it will look. I know you have…" she closes her eyes and sighs heavily, crossing her arms lightly, "particular circumstances, but Ayamine is right to some degree. We don't know what happened, and you assuming that Shirogane-kun was in the wrong solely based on your own ties with the 1st Lieutenant is a mistake. Not only because of the issues that causes in the squad, but think about your own career. UN soldiers cannot take sides, they must stay neutral."

"Tsukuyomi did nothing wrong, I am certain of it. Believe me when I say this, she wouldn't break her honor by causing such an accident."

"But we don't know that, do we?" Ayamine asks, I glare at her in silence. "The honor code says you can't act on emotion, right?"

"Yes, it does. So, it is clear Takeru was the one-"

"And what are you doing now?"

"Kei-san, please stop," Yoroi asks as she frowns for a second, Ayamine simply shrugs.

"She does have a point, Mitsurugi almost fell to Ayamine's taunts," Sakaki notes, tapping her glasses.

"… Only due to her foul wordplay," I say, looking away.

"And, as Ayamine said, what if that's what made Shirogane-kun react badly?"

"Well… but Tsukuyomi wouldn't-"

"That's what you shouldn't do," she shrugs, again drawing circles on the air later. "Even how you spoke up at the hangar, you should know how risky that is. The same goes for your taunts, Ayamine." She nods back, despite how her eyes are fixated away from Sakaki. "In any case, let's believe in what Shirogane-kun has shown himself to be, that this truly was nothing but an accident with no one as the culprit, and wait for whatever we're told about this. And of course, no arguing. As soon as we leave this room, we're going to have a multitude of eyes on us after all."

And whose fault that is? Had he simply surrendered, nothing would have happened. While perhaps there is a chance of him truly not being, well, a spy, I do not believe Tsukuyomi could have fallen to insults or reckless aggression. And perhaps… I can understand how could he have been angered, considering what he told me during the CCSE, and all that he has shown in his features when talking of his blade or that woman. But then, what could Tsukuyomi have said that would cause you to react so?

"Alright, are you two calm again?" Sakaki asks, I nod back while Ayamine shrugs once more. "Well, let's hope the Instructor doesn't demand an explanation for the screams. Come on, let's go," and turning around, she goes to the door.

Tamase hurries to tie her boots, Ayamine quickly walks past me without even looking my way, and Yoroi slowly follows. As we exit, the Instructor was standing in front of the door, silently gazing at us. Her chin raised, eyes narrowed, simply holding her gaze resembles standing bare amidst a storm, enduring the pouring rain.

"… You had a little chat in there, looks like," she says, looking at me, then at Ayamine. Both brows gradually come down as she stands upright, "Mitsurugi, Ayamine, five laps before you go to the PX."

"Yes, ma'am!"

"Now, as you know, you have lectures on the afternoon in the usual classroom. Considering what has happened, you may have an extra hour of rest. I expect you all to be present at 1500 hours."

"Understood!"

"That is all, you're dismissed."

"Salute!" Sakaki orders as usual, and so we do.

Yet, as I turn to leave, the Instructor waves a hand towards me, "You stay here, I have something to speak with you."

"Yes, ma'am."

The others seem to stare for a moment, before I nod their way and all of them start walking towards the PX, save for Ayamine who I suppose will have to go to the track field. Turning back to face her, the Instructor stood as before, scanning my face in the silence of the hallway.

And the seconds pass, her expression remaining immutable as a mountain under hail. Not lifting her stare from my eyes, not parting the thin line her lips have become, it makes me gulp, feel it going down to my stomach, a slow tension on my back, a minute quiver on my ankles.

Placing a hand on her chin, she leans just slightly forward, "Mitsurugi, where are we?"

"Huh?"

"Where are we? What is this building we're in right now?"

"… Yokohama Base, a UN-affiliated military complex stationed in lands once lost to the BETA."

"That's right. This is a base that belongs to the UN's military. You are here as a cadet, being trained under the UN's logo." Her eyes narrow further, as if focusing all her attention, all her volleys upon mine own eyes. "And if I followed the UN code to the letter, you would have to be sent to be Shirogane's new roommate in the detention barracks."

"What? But I haven't done anything to deserve such a thing."

Slowly, a hand raises to my eyes. Slower, she moves her fingers up. "Instigation of discord and unrest in your squadron, repeated declarations in favor of an external party, and your prior disobedience in the hangar by speaking against Cpt Isumi's orders, to defend an external party as well."

"Wait a moment, I wasn't-"

"Silence, I am speaking," she reminds, before shaking her head and sighing again. "Look Mitsurugi, believe me when I tell you 1st Lt Suzumiya was right. This truly was nothing more than a chain of unfortunate events. If I hadn't been given some last minute orders, this wouldn't have happened." She then takes a step back, reverting to her usual stoic but neutral complexion. "I won't comment on your discussion, you're free to believe what you will. However, as much as you'd want to, you cannot openly take the side of the Royal Guard. You're UN now, and we cannot take any political position or say anything that might hint at that being the case."

"However, I was merely stating my opinion. I do not believe 1st Lt Tsukuyomi to be at fault."

"And I'm not reproaching your opinion. However, as your comrades asked you, why do you refuse the chance that Shirogane was angered as Ayamine caused you to be?"

… Because he might be a spy, an enemy to my people. Because he lied to me, because all he told me, all that he has shown himself to be would be nothing but a fabrication atop clouds. And I know Tsukuyomi wouldn't do anything to spur such aggression. And as much as I'd wish to believe he truly is who he claims, I cannot ignore the facts that lay before me. Wordplay means little in front of one's choices and actions, and today Takeru chose violence.

So I can only shrink my lips, press my hands and lower my gaze, for I have no answer to give.

"Do you still resent Shirogane for coming from abroad?" She asks, starting to cross her arms.

"No, I do not."

"Then, do you truly believe Shirogane used one of those charges against the guards?"

"… The state of his Gekishin should be proof enough. I know not what transpired, however I am a servant of this nation in my heart. Regardless of the uniform I am made to wear, I cannot simply accept that Takeru holds no responsibility for his actions. Even if he held no hostile intentions, now we shall be followed by further whispers and rumors. Thus, I am of the opinion that to forget that fact is a mistake, and that cadet Shirogane should apologize in public to the guards to vanquish all these rumors."

"And, why should he be the one to apologize?"

"Because he chose to use one of those aerial maneuvers, despite the risk they hold. He should have surrendered instead."

"So, even if he used defensively, to escape from the offense of his rival, he is still at fault?"

"That's assuming he-"

"Oh, and what you're doing is not assuming Shirogane is the sole reason behind this accident?" She asks, leaning forward with a frown.

"I am only…" disappointed. Tsukuyomi wouldn't have pressed her advantage, so the crash his machine had to suffer was due to Takeru's own actions. Even if he isn't a spy, I thought you'd be better than this, to resort to such aggression in front of Tsukuyomi when I myself found another way to face her minutes before you. Because, if neither are to blame, and Tsukuyomi's words caused you to become so upset… the only thing I can think of that would cause such a reaction on you-

"Mitsurugi," she pats my shoulder, expression stoic and firm as the mountain she always resembles, "you can believe in 1st Lt Tsukuyomi as much as you want, but using that to shift the blame onto a comrade is not right. If you… well, weren't you, if anyone else were to voice such opinions in defense of the IRG, they would eat a week in the detention barracks for breaking their oath."

"But I'm not taking a political position in the slightest. I am merely stating my opinion, and during a small debate because I was asked for it. I am not forcing my views on anyone, ma'am."

"Defending the IRG is taking their side, when you should be staying neutral since you know nothing of what transpired. All this accomplishes is either cause people to grow upset at you, and at the guards, or for them to take their side against Shirogane, one of your comrades." She sighs again, shorter and heavier this time, as she plays with her hair for a moment. "Do you remember what happened at the end of the CCSE, how you had no proof to defend your supposed injuries?" I nod, plucking my lips at the memory. "Well, this is the same. No one has proof to claim what has happened, not you, not me, not that trio of guards. So you should stay quiet and wait for the official resolution. And again, taking actions that could be interpreted as you taking a political position may either get you in the detention barracks, or kicked out of the army if you do so multiple times."

"… I understand, ma'am," I nod, barely moving my lips as they form a small circle, eyelids almost closing and avoiding her eyes.

"Do you? Acting in a way that may suggest you're discriminating Shirogane, or approaching the guards at any time, could be used as an excuse to punish you."

"Yes, I am aware."

"Then, can you explain why do you so vehemently refuse to accept that Shirogane may not deserve any blame?"

…

"Where is your answer, cadet?" Taking a step forward, raising her voice just slightly.

"I already gave you my answer, Instructor, ma'am."

Bringing a hand to her forehead, she shakes her head. Rubbing the space in between her brows, eyes squinting and making the redness under them become rugged, she then, once again, heaves a sigh. "You say that your actions are driven by your vision that you are a servant of the Empire?"

"Yes, ma'am. I know it might be problematic for me, yet I do see me as a servant of this land first and foremost."

"Fair enough. Then, what kind of servant are you, Mitsurugi?"

"… What?"

Gradually, her composed yet stern features turn tight, lips twist and eyes ignite again. "Are you merely upset after seeing someone close to you be accused of this accident? Or, perhaps, are you one of those who views all who don't follow your honor code of conduct as enemies?"

Feeling my own complexion growing rough, I lick my lips to halt the aggravations that almost blasted away from them when in front of Ayamine. Taking a deep breath, dousing the disquiet in my stomach and fists, I merely shake my head as I return her gaze. "I hoist my values close to my heart. The honor code has much worth for us soldiers, so I do expect others to at least follow its core teachings in certain ways. And, yes, perhaps I am… disappointed, slightly upset even, at this turn of events."

"Even if you do not yet know what transpired?"

"I have no confirmation, but neither do I have doubts. While the trio have acted shamefully, 1st Lt Tsukuyomi would never do so. And as a fellow servant of this Empire of ours, I cannot simply look with good eyes at what cadet Shirogane has done. Wordplay means little in front of the facts that are in front of us, in front of the actions Shirogane took instead of surrendering."

"So, you're one of those who would immediately scorn others for straying from your code, I see." She shakes her head, my palms again receive the pike of my nails as I force the silence. "Yet, you're now on the UN. And you swore to uphold the code of the oath you gave. Surely, you can see the issues that would arise if you continue to act in this way?"

"I believe all this friction has been caused by Shirogane's mistake, ma'am. You have nothing to concern yourself with, Instructor. I have no plans to break the oath I took when enlisting here." Nor do I plan to forsake my morals just because I wear another color.

"I see," she holds my gaze, nodding after a moment. "I do expect you to remain composed, even after Shirogane rejoins you all. I don't want a return to the days before the CCSE, are we clear?"

"Yes, ma'am!"

"Good. Now, since we're on the subject…" she looks around, over her shoulder and behind me, and then takes a step closer as she inhales deeply, "I would like to confirm something with you. Mitsurugi, you said you're a servant first and foremost?" I nod immediately. She remains gazing at me, her lips contracting inwards as she grasps her chin. "Is that so. So, are you one of those who treats the honor code as gospel?Will you, if you allow the wording, despair after you perish?"

"… I have a duty and an obligation to dedicate my very being to my people, Instructor. While I do not treat my teachings as unbreakable facts, I do endeavor to practice the lessons imparted to me. Which is why, I cannot condone cadet Shirogane's outburst, justified or not."

Her expression remains neutral, watching me, so I cough and continue.

"He was who acted aggressively first, he fell to anger and emotion. I do not believe the guards would lie on this matter, and it is not a political view but a personal assessment. 1st Lt Tsukuyomi is not the kind of person who would drive a cadet to such a crash. Yet, Shirogane has shown that, at times, he chooses violence as his out regardless of the regret it leaves in him afterwards. Shirogane himself has endangered the UN's relation with the IRG with his choices, when it was time for action and not words, he acted in violence towards his opponent, or in a way that forced her to shoot him down hastily."

"And, could you now elaborate on how could your comrade be innocent?"

"Forgive me if I cannot find motives to defend him, but I expected more from Shirogane. And I am judging him as I would anyone else, especially considering Tamase suffered much from the unpleasantries hurled her way yet did not chose such aggression as the answer."

And again, for a moment she merely looks at me. Sighing heavily, a long exhalation which reaches me despite the distance, she ruffles her hair as she simply stares at me in silence.

"I see," she finally says, almost drowned when compared to her prior tone, That's enough, then. Go do your laps, and do not disclose anything to your… contacts. For your and their own good."

"Understood!" I salute her, standing in attention.

"Also, you'd be wise to not make such rash judgments, Mitsurugi. Sometimes, there is no one to blame for an accident. And looking for a scapegoat to pin the blame on is not a wise thing to do, much less to one of your comrades."

"I stand by my words, Instructor. If Shirogane truly is free of guilt, we shall know shortly. And if he is, I will hold nothing against him provided he can explain, I will endeavor not to let my personal opinions cause the squadron any further setbacks. My apologies for having taken your time, I'll be more tactful from now onward."

"Good. That's all, dismissed," she then waves a hand in the air, almost apathetically, then turns around and starts to leave, in that same slow fashion, as if suddenly out of energy.

"Instructor, if you'd allow me a final word?"

"What is it?" She turns around, brushing some hair aside.

"Regarding your question of what kind of servant I am…"

"Yes?"

I fold my arms, my lips compact, press upon one another, and feel the void in my stomach and the vicegrip on my throat ease up as my voice flows from that pit. "I do believe that despair does not belong with the living. I know not what kind of preconceptions you hold, yet I believe it is a fine mindset to have. To never falter in one's actions is a praiseworthy quality, in my opinion."

As such, for one like me who aims to be a blade of my people, the protective shadow of Her Highness, to despair after I perish ensures every waking second is free of fear and dread. If I aim to be a sword which smites evil from its root, fortifying my mind with such resolve is required. And in any case, anyone who has to take arms against the BETA should endeavor to follow this teaching, to not fall to fear in one's final moments.

The Instructor's eyes narrow for a moment, yet she licks her lips and folds her arms, merely nodding in silence. "I see. It is admirable, if you can bring yourself to follow through that teaching. Just make sure you don't lose your way amidst the words of that code."

"What do you mean?"

"Exactly what I said, and nothing more."

"Are you… implying there is a mistake in this view?"

"No, not per se. But it's just as what happened in the changing room, Mitsurugi." Looking back at me, there is no roughness nor imposing tint in her glare. Her features are relaxed, composed yet without that thread of anger that always lurked just below the surface, barely visible but visible nonetheless. "You saw how those three acted in the hangar, and apparently they said some harmful words towards Tamase, right?" I nod, hanging my head. "So, you're free to follow your code so long as you're smart about it. But make sure you don't let it drive others away from you, starting with this issue with Shirogane. Am I clear?"

"Yes, ma'am. However, may I ask why do you think so of that line? Did you have an unpleasant experience with a Royal Guard?"

A sudden frown, a retraction of her lower lip, and in the stillness of her eyes it was as if a shadow created ripples, lurking in the depths. She sighs, and shakes her head again. "Unpleasant doesn't even begin to describe it. All I'm saying is, do not let that code be the sole anchor of your life. I met others who had a code ingrained in their heads, and when that's all you fight for," her gaze falls, for the first time since I've met her, as her fists shake momentarily, "it doesn't take long until you either break or radicalize yourself."

"What… What do you speak of?" I do not understand. How could it be seen as a negative thing, to be brave in front of calamity, to keep one's own inner shadows at bay?

"Just try to not rely too much on any code, starting with not shunning out Shirogane from now on. Go do your laps, or you'll miss lunch in the PX," she orders, giving me a nod which signals she is done, and thus turns around and hurriedly walks away in the opposite direction.

And now, I am alone with the silence. Sighing, I turn around and make my way to the track field. Mulling on her words, on what happened in the hangar, before the battle… and all that transpired between the CCSE and now. Not shunning Takeru out… Yet, is there a way in which he didn't cause this accident? Or, perhaps, did Tsukuyomi truly make a miss?

…

That is, assuming he truly wasn't injured. He could be in pain at the moment, and here I am casting doubt on his person. And I cannot ask for immediate answers, and thanks to my prior miss I should not approach Tsukuyomi, lest I give reason to the Instructor to believe I am taking political actions. I would like to believe in you, yet… why did you refuse my handshake? Why did you end up crashing down in such a way? You truly haven't lied to me, right Takeru? You truly are not a spy, a faker, right? You merely grew upset, and you made mistake, it's true, but so long as you've been truthful there should be nothing you should fear. Ayamine is right to a degree, if Takeru properly apologizes and sees the error of his choice, then we shall support him through these whispers as we have been doing since our return from the island.

But, if he endow in violence towards Tsukuyomi, and he truly is who he says he is… And if you grew upset at one of Tsukuyomi's comment, and she was forced to shoot you down when in front of your eccentric patterns…

"Does that mean she spoke ill of that woman to you?"

I cannot reach any other conclusion. It is true, Takeru hasn't been particularly easy to anger. And even then, Ayamine spoke the truth. He didn't endow in such aggression when dueling her and Sakaki. So to push him even further into anger, all I can think of is Tsukuyomi unknowingly saying something Takeru took as an insult to the one who gave him the Minaru Kamui.

Well, I already knew he cherishes that person much. Yes, his expressions were always quite… radiant whenever recalling whoever she was. So, yes, it is understandable he would lose his temper if he believed Tsukuyomi to be insulting his…

… His what?

Light peers through the windows, filling the hallway as I walk through it. Shortly after, I reach the track field's area, seeing Ayamine running from my position.

Grabbing the bars that open the door, my hands merely remain on them without clearing the way. "… So you favor that person to such lengths, to grow so adusted when her name is insulted. For her to have told you of the handguard… Sigh."

At this point, I would prefer you turn out to be an enemy. If only to clearly dispel this pressure on the base of my neck, on my chest, to clear this awful taste in my mouth. If only, to truly be disappointed in you. To not have to measure up against whoever has your heart captive at the moment, whoever it was that caused you to decide to face off Tsukuyomi with all your might, when even I held doubt and fear in front of her strikes.

---

A/N: I decided to try and separate the would be chapter 70 . Originally, this was going to be the starting PoV of chapter 70 but the word count was again shooting past 4 0k words so I split it up in three parts since I didn't felt like omitting anything from this one .

Now, a long optional note for the current chapter. This will turn into a long textwall about Meiya and some personal impressions of canon content , so feel free to skip it if you'd like.

Much like how the prior arc dealt with Tama' s , Kei' s and Chizuru's issues while stuff brew up, the following half of the Paranoia Arc after chapter 7 7 will instead focus on the other two members of the team, Meiya and Mikoto. For Mikoto there is not much to say just yet, but I want to explain some things about the blue samurai.

If you recall, during her arc in Unlimited, Meiya was not punished for her actions which ended up with the crashe d Fubuki after the eruption . We know from Mana's visit to Takeru while he was in the cell that Meiya was sent to a hospital, but, when he is freed from the punishment, Takeru is the only one getting released from the detention barracks . E veryone then come s to greet him as Marimo brings him to the barracks and later on in the PX the girls do say that they missed him as they idled the time . This implies that Meiya did not suffer the same repercussion s for her actions as Takeru , almost certainly due to her royal blood , and chances are she didn't receive more than a reprimand and he was made to bear the brunt of the blame, her being the twin of the Shogun and all .

And we know for a fact that Meiya doesn't change the stance she took during the eruption , in an equal situation she would put her ideals above common sense or reasoning. This is clearly shown in the next talk with Kyozuka-san, and it's just the way she is. And the only time when she doesn't, the only time we ever see BETAverse Meiya waver on her ideals is during the epilogue, where even if she isn't Takeru's lover she still gives him the pass for the migrant fleet instead of safeguarding her traditions by being the Empire's representative in the fleet .

In Alternative, the coup is one of her crowning character-defining moments and she remains as a guiding light throughout the rest of the story . But Meiya never grows, nor are her views put to the tes t . All the contrary, in my opinion the coup only strengthens her views. While in Extra, Meiya tries at one point to change herself to suit Takeru's life, when he says she could never understand what it is to have to make dinner from leftovers, and later on she tries to cook something for him, confronts him in the cave, and eventually does accept him in her route's ending as opposed to submitting to the imposition of the arranged marriage. Extra's Meiya does change and defies the rules she was raised to uphold , even if only a bit, by marrying Takeru and not become nothing but another Mitsurugi in charge of the group .

Alt!Meiya does not learn much from her interactions with Keru by comparison, she doesn't think twice when trying to impose her own code on Takeru when he was cracked after Marimo's death despite seeing how he was, nor does she face a character-defining choice as she does in Unlimited's epilogue . And while her confession in her last moments is impactful, part of me still believes those feelings were ignited more by causality and the memories Extra Meiya forgot than by genuine feelings born in Alt!Meiya. Otherwise, she'd have given him space after Marimo's death as she did right before the Chomp scene. Though, that just might be my own take on it.

So, the point of this wall of text is that I want to give Meiya a challenge. For any surviving readers from the very first rendition of this story , this is the main motive behind the ultra nationalistic themes set in Reversal and why Meiya has been quite obnoxious with her code . To have the twins have their precious honor code challenged and grow from it, or not. Meiya's ideals being put into question, having her do some introspection on her application of her moral code, and eventually acting on her final decision is what her mini-arc will be about leading up to Komoro .

After all, as a wise old woman once said, to believe in an ideal is to be willing to betray it. If you wish to understand the values of the code, then you need the contrast.

To put it simply, I'm taking inspiration from both Atris and the Handmaiden from Kotor 2 for Meiya's arc. Or at least, that's the idea. I know the story may come out as me bashing the Empire and Meiya, but I'm just using the nationalistic vibes Kouki se t in Alternative and trying to put them into question so that the twins can face conflict and either accept or refuse the contrast.

There is a two-hour long video in YT that I always go back to when writing th e s e themes, called ' The Philosophy of Kreia', which I recommend for anyone who would want to put such a conflict in a story focused on the Imperial Royal Guard. The video does spoil the entirety of Kotor 2, and I do recommend to play that GOAT of a game to experience its greatness firsthand instead as it has one of the characters that gives Yuuko a run for her money, in my humble opinion .

Well, this has been more than enough of my ramblings. Thanks for reading. Stay safe.

Zuoriel

Rumbling Hearts (II)

Chapter 71:

Rumb ling Hea rts (II)

---

December 3rd. 12:28 A M.

(Yokohama Base, B5F. Near the infirmary.)

[Mana]

---

"Again, I had ordered them to remain in standby in their rooms. They acted on their own, and I apologize for their actions against you, captain," I give a small bow to the crimson-haired captain, who merely nods to acknowledge the words.

"In the name of the Imperial Royal Guard, I also apologize for my fellows' actions," Daizaburou-sama also gives her a small bow. "We truly are not wishing to clash with any of you."

"That does little to mend the repercussions that the actions of your underlings will cause," Vice Commander Kouzuki says, the immutable ice wall undisturbed. "Under normal circumstances, this would fall into a clear case of aggression towards UN personnel."

"Wait a moment, we aren't-"

"I know, and I'm not planning on going that route," she then narrows her eyes, resting a few fingers on her chin, "if you cooperate with the questions."

All I can do is nod, tighten a fist, briefly gaze at the door to the medbay where Takeru-sama now lays resting. To think they'd go as far as prevent us from being near when he was brought in, as if we would do anything to an unconscious adversary.

In the silence of the hallway, me and Daizaburou-sama share a gaze, the consternation miring our eyes. Regardless of how this talk is resolved, if nothing is done then Takeru-sama might once more grow as adusted as he was during our darkest days. And as if this wasn't dire enough, those three idiots had to go and cause such an argument in the hangar. I should have had everyone under the cousins' watch.

… To make matters worse, he didn't even listen to me during the last moments of the fight. I had thought Maya to be jesting, that she was exaggerating the matter in her ire. I believed Raiko-sama to be lying when she said she was unable to do little against his true wrath, that she was using your anger at the cruelty of war to further her own interests. And I thought you, the shadow you had become, was simply lashing out against those who you believed were at fault for our repeated defeats.

Yet, it is entirely different. To be the recipient of your strikes than to watch them from afar.

A candlelight burning, crumbling everything around it. Tearing the UV, the sheets, the bindings as if a tornado he had become, shrieking in rage, burning and burning. Only to suffocate, be thrown into a trench, buried deep beyond the sea, away from any and all light. The only remnant of you, a small bubble of your final exhalation which will soon dissipate amidst the waves.

I know not what made you react so aggressively today, despite my careless words towards your feelings about your parents' situation now that you lack context. But if we do nothing, again…

The XO shakes her head, the blonde foreigner that stood behind her whispering something. Which causes the fox to slightly frown, then sigh. "Tell her I've no words at the moment, to proceed with the afternoon lecture as always." After shaking her head, she clears her throat and faces us once more. "Now then, let's take a moment to note what we know happened. Isumi, if you would."

The captain nods and takes a step forward, another perfect poker face in her complexion. "Throughout the battle, there were signs that your units repeatedly engaged a private frequency that we couldn't tune in. And not just a standard private connection, but a more elaborate one at that. Our recordings do not have the audio of your line, only the answers Shirogane and Mitsurugi gave you as you platicated. That in itself would be enough to suspect something is off with this mock battle," she notes, casting shadows and doubts our way.

"While I admit it is fair for you to cast doubts and punishment of our shoulders for this," Daizaburou-sama slowly begins, folding both hands behind his back, "we were aiming to share some words in private with Mitsurugi during the fight. Regarding Shirogane, we decided to try and offer our aid once more, now that perhaps the high emotion of yesterday's meeting had passed."

The captain seems perplexed, a slow raise of a brow when sending a gaze to the fox. Upon the burning coldness of the stare, the captain coughs as she rummages through her hair. "Still, I believe you'll agree that your interactions with the cadet are what caused him to become unstable to the point of requiring the sedatives."

"If you'll excuse me," narrowing my eyes, my lips and wording, "if you examine his logs, I am certain you will come to the conclusion that it was the sedatives which caused the cadet to go on a nervous rampage. He was pained after our exchanges, I shan't deny it, yet it was the dosage of sedatives applied to him what sent him into shock."

"Oh, really?" Kouzuki shrugs, daring to even chuckle dryly for a moment. "Yet, the sedatives would not have been required should you have followed the standard procedures for this battle. If you hadn't spoken to Shirogane, nothing would have occurred. Which, let me remind you, you did by employing a private frequency, a method that is forbidden and very much punishable by our code," she threatens, raising her chin as if trying to tower over us.

Daizaburou-sama taps my forearm, shaking his head, so I sigh and inhale deep, deeper until I have to exhale while he clears his throat. "Again, we had no malicious intent, Vice Commander. While I understand inquiries are required, we only employed this method to avoid any sensitive intel from being left in the air. As you know and requested of us yesterday, the cadet's situation is a rather… delicate one."

The captain hints a frown for a moment, as if she were offended, perhaps concerned at the words. Seeing the little care she had when applying the sedatives to you, I believe the woman might not have a particularly positive view of you, Takeru. And while the concerns over us using a private frequency are understandable, there is no denying the one who caused you the most suffering was this crimson haired woman, who isn't even going to receive a reprimand at all, I'm sure.

The fox doesn't even react, merely overlaps her arms, not even a faint ripple in her composure. Truly, frozen to her very heart, frost running through her veins. "I believe both me and my protegee had asked you to keep your distance yesterday," she says, still daring to insist on that wording when referring to you, still steadfast in her opposition. "While I know cadet Shirogane could have come across as being too obstinate during the meeting, you did not respect the agreement we made. I believe you'll agree it was due to his interactions with you Royal Guards that Shirogane ended up suffering a nervous breakdown, sedatives notwithstanding."

"Pardon?" Acid constricts my throat, its base and pit, and I cannot help but to frown. "How could our words be weight the same as the sedatives? Before the dosage of drugs, cadet Shirogane was pained, yes, but in no form would he have fallen into blind violence. It was the application of the sedatives what tipped the scales."

The captain takes half a step forward, her lips beginning to part, yet the XO taps her shoulder and shakes her head. Brushing her hair, she remains immutable as a perfect wall. "Had you not spoken, the drugs wouldn't have been necessary. It was a chain reaction, from which you're the origin point. And while I won't be as foolish as to threaten you with filing a claim against any of you, I believe we can be honest with each other to reach an agreement."

"What do you speak of?"

"It's simple. If you deem Shirogane so high and issue, allow me to offer to you the option to request to have him deported."

Daizaburou-sama coughs, arms folding, expression sobering, tightening. "I believe we had made ourselves clear yesterday, XO."

"And the first thing that happens the next day is my protegee being sent to medbay," she shrugs, rolling her eyes. Before I could retort, the fox clicks her lips, which then retract inwards as she frowns. "This isn't some jest or a play in a circus. Shirogane is in this room," she fires a finger to the door, almost hitting the captain in the head, "unconscious and weakened, after having one of the strongest nervous breakdowns one could have. And no, I am not amused with this outcome, at all. So tell me 1st Lieutenant, how do you suggest we tackle the consequences this little accident will have for my protegee?" Her cold eyes sink right into me, this time frowning in earnest. "Unless, of course, you rather have me filing a claim of aggression towards UN personnel."

I return the stare, the glare, yet find myself gazing at the door. To make a truce with this fox, to accept to debate over this when the sedatives are what sent you into shock would be a folly. However, more foolish would it be for me to neglect my duties to safeguard you.

Taking a moment to inhale, letting the air go softly, my lips part ways with an answer, lightly burning as they do. "I will not excuse myself from my actions, but I had no intention to bring harm to the cadet with our discussion. If you deem me the cause of this accident, I'm at your disposal for any punishment you desire to give me."

I lower my head slightly, clawing at my fists. Her Highness did many efforts to make the accord with the XO, I cannot let that crumble because of this accident. Even less now that I've confirmed he is indeed our Takeru-sama, and after he has once more almost fallen into rage.

Considering his words as we spoke, it is now clear to me. The pit he's trapped in now is perhaps the same one I left in him when we departed from Hakuryo Base, and perhaps what has always fueled his struggles. After all, he never believed the sacrifices to truly were worth the victories, if we can call them that at this point, they gave us.

"Any punishment, you say? I think you're not seeing what I'm talking about here." She rests one hand on the top of her head, sounding bored. "I'm asking you how do you plan to take responsibility for harming my personnel, and to think on how will this affect Shirogane's career from now on." Taking one step forward, she then gazes at me firmly. "Surely you understand, more so after the show your underlings made in the hangar, how others will begin to spread aggravations about my protegee and how that will affect his training, considering the punishment which still lies on his shoulders. At this point, it truly… would be the wisest choice, to send him back the way he came."

"Wh- Please reconsider! We are not requesting such a thing, and neither do we desire to be seen as those who would demand such from the UN."

"Then, I'm all ears."

"XO, there is perhaps a solution, if you'd be willing to listen," Daizaburou-sama says, giving a small nod. "While I understand the cadet's desire to recall his memories on his own terms, and that this accident will make many assume a mistaken view of him, all it truly would take to silence those voices is to-"

"Have him regain his citizenship, go with you to the Capital?" She frowns, crossing her arms. "I believe he was clear, Shirogane does not wish to go to the Capital. And moreover, we already spoke of the possible claims that may fall on his shoulders should we move carelessly. Furthermore, one could reach a wrong assumption. That you did this in order for the cadet to have no choice but to go to the Capital."

"… Excuse me?"

"Mana, it is a fair assessment," he says, holding my gaze, making me heave a sigh. "Yet, we do not have such intentions, XO. If it's not through protection in the Capital or the offering of his father's profile, I loath to affirm we have no solution to propose."

"Well, I appreciate the honesty," she says, reverting to the ice wall. "Yet, I've received many favors from Her Highness the Shogun in the last few months. While Shirogane's situation is a concern, your standing and image in this base is also in jeopardy. I doubt the personnel took it well, to have your underlings trying to force their way to the cadet, or to see the state of his Gekishin."

I bow down, biting my lips. "Again, I assure you neither me or any of the members of the Royal Guard that participated in today's mock battle desired this outcome. Nor do I support the actions of the members of my squadron. If there is no other solution, I will bear the responsibility myself as an individual, for it was my own carelessness which caused this. This was no aggression towards the UN, it was mine own folly." My hands coil and twist, my lips purse as I slightly start biting my tongue within at this turn of events. "Again, I am at your disposal for whatever punishment you wish to place on me. Please do not push this burden of mine onto the Empire."

If nothing is done, the Takeru-sama will be shunned, despised by the more loyal Japanese members of the staff. In the worst case, it might even cause discord between those who see him as a traitor, an American, and those who are against such discrimination. And as the source of the unrest, Takeru-sama himself shall be punished and removed from this base to preserve the order. Otherwise, if we do not reach an agreement and the fox files a claim, if the UN recognizes this as a hostility, this will make it's way into the media. I must not let this reach public ears, for it would raise questions, it may reveal his role and identity. And given his current mental state…

The static of the comms, the shiver on my nape when I did not dare to look back on the hallways, the pressure on the audience chamber. Every little decoration started to resemble an eye back then, an eye which judged my every movement. A gaze which remained squinted yet vacant. A fissure, a wound between us, our gazes.

I cannot allow any more harm to befall Takeru-sama, nor for him to relieve that pain once again.

"Vice Commander, I believe we all know we need each other in this trying times." Daizaburou-sama says as he returns the stare but the woman sharpens her eyes, clearly not intimidated by him. "While I cannot remain here for much longer, the time I spent here was enough to see that we can place our trust in you. There must be something that can be done to salvage this situation, without resorting to deporting the cadet with such a stain on his records." He sounds composed, still and calm, however, his arms are close to his body, as if bound by chains he were.

Yet, the fox again sighs and ruffles her hair. "Let me tell you two something, in case you forgot. Cadet Shirogane was brought to this base by my personal orders, and I am his legal tutor." Then, as a finger taps her the bottom of her chin, her features gradually begin to tighten. "And ever since he arrived here, people have been very harsh on him. Especially you, Royal Guards. He told me of how the other Tsukuyomi confronted him on a day when you received some spare parts, how you, General Daizaburou, didn't seem very welcoming when he introduced himself when you delivered the Type-00C units. And let us not forget, how the younger Tsukuyomis tried to 'make him disappear in the muck' during the CCSE. I believe it is quite fair to affirm that you do have something against Shirogane.

And, if there is no dissuading you, I shall have him removed from this base before dusk."

What?! How could she- No, focus. It is only logical she would draw such a conclusion, when lined up the facts do suggest we hold some sort of animosity towards Takeru-sama. I slowly inhale through my nose, biting my tongue softly again. Little effect does it have against which ails my ears, nor what tears inside.

And for as much as I hold doubts towards her, we also must protect Alt. IV. If the XO decides to deport him, even I cannot tell what that would cause in Yuuhi-sama. Yet, if they refuse the reports on Kageyuki-san's service, if they are understandably concerned over claims of identity theft… Daizaburou-sama narrowed his eyes, the grip of his fingers on his arms intensifying. "I believe we have already told you those were nothing but coincidences. The two younger Tsukuyomis made the same mistake the three Tozamas made today, that is all."

"Pretty unconvincing, when your words do not align with your actions," she retorts, quick to cast a side glance.

I tighten my fists, breathing deeply through my nose to relax my shoulders. The boulders refused to come off them, however. "We are being truthful, XO. I concur that it might look as if we were opposed to the cadet's presence, however that is not the case. We already told you our motives for approaching him yesterday, and why we employed the frequency today. Instead of remaining on this debate, could we instead focus on what can we do to avoid this incident from turning into something larger than it is?"

For some reason, the fox smirks as the captain merely switches gazes from her to us, as if out of the loop. "So you say you have laid out all of your motives?"

"Indeed, that is the case. What other reason could we have?" I say, resting both hands on my sides.

"Oh, I see," the fox dares to remain smirking. "Then, I suppose you won't have anything to say about what's in this folder?" The blonde foreigner that was near passed her a green folder, that she held in front of us. It had Takeru-sama's name written on it. And both us and the captain twitch as we recognize the name.

For a moment, my eyes sharpened at her. I blinked, rested a hand on my chin, and restrained the vile surging in my chest.

"… Vice Commander, could you explain what is that supposed to be?" The captain asks, edging closer to the fox.

Who then shakes her head, leveling a stare at us. "No Isumi, it's the other way around. They are the ones who have to do the explaining," she says, slowly taking a step forward, raising the folder towards Daizaburou-sama.

Is that the report on how he was recovered, perhaps? The key to how he left the Empire… It's just within reach.

Yet, as Daizaburou-sama slowly opens the envelope, his eyes begin to open wide, small brushes of bewilderment betray the stillness of his complexion. Holding the folder a bit too tightly, enough for it to begin to bend, he lets out one loud sigh as wrinkles awaken wide in his face.

"Daizaburou-sama, what is the matter?" Is this about something that happened to him in America?

"Vice Commander…" Sparks, thunders in warning within a sudden storm. "If you possessed this intel, why have you idled so?" He says, low and somber. I've very rarely seen the General willing to openly display such signs of anger, just what is in those pages?

To note, the captain once more seems to be hanging at the end of a rope, lost in either the tension in her features at whatever it is that's in the pages or in questions she desires to ask to the fox. Our gazes cross, perhaps equal in our ignorance and concerns, for different motives, then we both look towards the XO.

Who remains still and firm, arms lightly overlapped, one hand resting under her chin, under the frozen lake of her features. "I have my reasons. So, now that we can be a bit more honest with each other, could you tell me if there truly is no hidden meaning to your interest in my protegee's affairs?" She says as she ruffles her hair looking away, still daring to use that word.

Daizaburou-sama looks at me, I see him gulp as he slightly narrows his brows, stormclouds receding. I give a subtle nod, understanding he wished me to remain calm, and then he hands me the folder. A moment to exhale, to lick my lips and untie the tension in my hands as I brush my hair, then I begin reading the papers. The sight of the very first sentence was enough to make me clench my fists, a searing yet momentary sting hitting the center of my back.

" Found on the outskirts of the hill near the Yokohama Hive, an unconscious pilot wearing a damaged fortified suit, believed to belong to the Empire's Royal Guard, was retrieved during our patrols on the area after the G-Bombs' detonation."

Regardless of how she got this intel… She knows, knew all along that Takeru-sama was one of us.

And the damn fox kept quiet.

When he was clearly in so much pain. When it was her negligence what caused this outcome.

How… How dare she-

A hand rests on my shoulder, he shakes his head. "I believe we should continue this conversation somewhere else. What say you, Kouzuki?" Daizaburou-sama says with stern eyes as he hands the folder back.

"Oh, dropping the rank now? Fine, let's go to my office. But don't think of making any sudden move, I have us being watched by the best soldiers on the base. Come on, let's go." She turns around and briskly makes her way to the elevator.

We follow her closely, switching glances with each other. The captain also observes us as we walk, yet the hints of fire and confrontation which laid in her eyes before are no more. Rather then weapons raised, confusion and inquiries would seem to plague her mind as she marches. I suppose, she was in the dark as much as we were. And even if she was who applied the sedatives, the one who has crafted this scenario… is who walks ahead of us, straight as an arrow.

I cannot believe it, she knew of him being a Royal Guard and she didn't tell him? She didn't consult with us, despite the possible risks? If she assumed he was an exile it makes sense, one could say. Which is why she insists on deporting him, perhaps to avoid his past as an exile from resurfacing. If she so assumes, it becomes understandable why she refuses to send him to the Capital, for the clarification would then have Takeru-sama branded as a recognized traitor. Yet, for her to have withheld the intel, to not have consulted with us in person despite the risks to her project… and to still safeguard Takeru-sama as she does, what could she be aiming to do? For as much frustration as this causes me, the fox did give us a detailed report on his condition before she was notified of the trio's folly at the hangar. She is taking good care of Takeru-sama, perhaps… perhaps truly treating him as her protegee… but, why?

The Kouzuki I know, the cold and analytical leader of Alternative IV wouldn't put her hands over fire for anyone. She wouldn't even allow a situation which caused so much friction with our organization. And if she had been certain of it, there would be no negotiation possible. The fox would send you away, using her power and influence without a care, throwing you away as a mere pawn. But she hasn't, and not only that, she is still vying for your safety.

… It is quite an odd feeling, to be thankful and angered at the same time.

Sigh, had I been more careful this wouldn't have happened. All our efforts to set up that private frequency to be able to talk with him without being listened on, all for him to end up hurt once more. He's remembering, he's coming back. But that also means his shadows are resurfacing once more as well. All my attempts to remind him of our teachings, to calm him down failed just like back when we met again, after Mogami was reduced to ash and blood. I should have disabled his machine faster, or maybe I should have mentioned a book or one of the toys he favored?

"Mana, what do you think about this?" Daizaburou-sama spoke to me in a whisper as we waited for the elevator to arrive.

Covering my mouth, I also endow a whisper. "It all depends on whether she's using him to gain something or not."

"Indeed. I would like to give Her Highness a pleasing report today, however…"

That, too, is a concern. If the Vice Commander refuses to either have Takeru remember his identity or chooses to deport him back to America, I cannot imagine what Yuuhi-sama will do in retaliation. Under normal circumstances perhaps she'd merely compromise in another area, yet according to Maya and Tsuhi she has been more forward in her ways as of late. In no small part, due to the mere mention of your possible survival.

The elevator arrives and all five of us present ride it. No words are spoken on our descent nor on the way to her office. The other two remain outside as the scientist so orders, the blonde assistant sporting a neutral expression unlike the minute displeasure of the captain. Once inside, the fox tells us to sit where we please as she slowly goes to the chair behind a desk and sat down.

After brushing her hair and joining her hands atop the wood, she looks our way. "Now that we're in a secure location, could you tell me why are you so interested in Shirogane?"

I took a glance at Daizaburou-sama, who after closing his eyes for a moment nodded at me. So, I cough and clear my throat. "Before we speak of this, why have you remained silent on the knowledge of the cadet being a member of the Royal Guard until now?"

"Did you know he was one, by any chance?"

"Could you kindly answer the query, XO?"

"… Because I haven't known this for long. In all honesty, it wasn't too long ago that I… requested this report to be delivered to my hands, after some words Shirogane told me didn't exactly line up."

"What do you speak of?" Daizaburou-sama asks, resting an arm on the sofa. "Did he remember something… regarding how he was found?"

"You could say that. You see, Shirogane has mentioned a few times a recurring dream he has. A dream of," her lips recede momentarily, breaking eye contact, "an eternal wasteland."

"A… what?" Was it just a coincidence? Or, did he truly have those nightmares once again?

She shrugs, proceeding to talk while barely moving her lips, still not looking at us. "The mention of how he lived before the lakes in his memories led me to believe he was perhaps just a normal person who suffered from an unfortunate accident. Yet, some details do not align. As he mentioned yesterday, he should have been sent to an orphanage but didn't lose his surname. He should have fought in the war, but there were no records of his training or deployment anywhere. So I consulted with his prior location, to ask for a detailed report on how was he recruited as a cadet while in Yukon and if any contacts had been found in the Empire, or if that was tried at all."

"And the answer was this?"

"Indeed," she says, returning our stares, never faltering. "When he arrived here and I noticed how little intel there was on his profile, I asked someone to double check his intel, and to fix the profiles somehow. While Shirogane's public profile was filled with the leftover data he had from Yukon, my contact brought me some intel as a… warning, he said, shortly after I had received this report I showed you," sighing audibly, she leans on the chair. "It seems like his data was erased, and not only that but he was a member of the Royal Guard, one who engaged in unsavory matters it would seem," she says, almost chuckling as she rests her chin on a hand. Deep inhaling and a grip on my knees, that is all which seals my lips. As if you could ever judge him, damn fox. "Which meant, Shirogane was either an exile or a traitor. If I can be frank with you, I was considering disposing of Shirogane after the CCSE, to avoid any issues from arising."

"Then, why didn't you?"

"Because when examining all facts, I saw he had made the right call during the CCSE," she says, and dry ice would be warmer than her very being as of now. "So that made me think, what if his prior sentence was done on similar terms? After all, he was found unconscious and hurt, unable to legally defend himself for months. And when he woke up, he didn't have many memories clear on his immediate past. So, while it might have been dangerous to keep him here, on Mitsurugi's squad no less, I saw in Shirogane a decent person and a very valuable asset. That's why I've been keeping a close eye on him, especially since the CCSE, and why I am now showing you this report now." Leaning forward, again resting her arms on the wood, her unblinking stare meets ours. "I would like to reach an agreement to have him stay in this base, without any repercussions to either his career or the project. So, could you tell me what has you delving in my protegee's affairs?"

The clarity of her words is apparent, as is the foul mood she is in at the moment. However, the matter of the databases should have been informed to her via Chief Yoroi, who also should have suggested to her that sending him to the Capital would be the wisest choice. Yet, she once more is using her body as a shield. Why would this fox of all people go to such lengths to safeguard anyone? Because then, that would mean that she truly does see him as a valuable pawn, that she won't lift her vile paws off him.

I claw at my palms, my bottom lip suffering the hail of my nibbling. Daizaburou-sama and I share a brief glance, he waves a hand down my way. I nod, once more inhaling deeply.

His brows arch, he lets out some air through his nose. The edge of his lips is retreating inwards, he then coughs. "Well, if you had confirmation that a Royal Guard he was, then you should have contacted the authorities to find a solution to this problem at an earlier date. As his current legal tutor, it falls to you to contact the Shogunate for his missing data, or to mention it to us during the meeting we held yesterday." He thus says, slow yet firm. She slowly looks towards a wall, clearly uninterested. He once more coughs, dispelling the minute tension in his features. "Then, would you be willing to share with us some intel about his time in America? Could you allow us to see the full report on how was he found near the hive?"

"We don't really have much data about what was of him in Yukon, since after that terrorist attack the majority of it was lost. And before I show you anything, I want to hear why are you so interested in Shirogane's affairs," she then frowns slightly, staring at us. "Because if he really is an exile, I'm willing to deport him tomorrow morning." She says with a slight smile on her face.

"Could you kindly stop taunting us, XO? We've already said we do not wish for the cadet to be exiled," I say, hitting a leg as I do, as I frown.

Daizaburou-sama sends a look at me, his eyes narrowed as he leans back onto his seat. I nod and look towards the woman, who remains still, not revealing a single hint in her posture or gaze.

"As it were, I was a fellow of his father while he was in service of the Royal Guard."

"Is that so."

"… And I met the cadet when he was little, as well. So, that's why I've been insisting on a personal level. As fellows of his father, we cannot turn a blind eye to Shirogane's woes."

"You say that, but he was found near death close to a hive and his data banks were erased."

"What was that?!"

"Mana," Daizaburou-sama gives a few pats to the sofa, holding my gaze, "the XO's concern is valid." He then looks at the damn fox, who seemed to chuckle for a second. "You see, we had thought him dead after that mission. So, whenever it is that the database suffered an error, we didn't notice it until he had returned."

"I see. Then, I suppose you do not have the authorization to see the report, in the end."

"… Excuse me, what?"

She holds my gaze, bumping a hand on her chin. "1st Lt, if you're merely an acquaintance, you've no authorization to delve into my protegee's affairs. Only relatives can request such things."

"Pardon me? I had believed we-"

"Only if you clarified your intentions, and had a motive to delve into his affairs. I can understand why would you be concerned with Shirogane's safety, and we can debate on how to avoid this incident from affecting him negatively, but regarding his identity I shall-"

"We do have a justification to receive the report, XO," Daizaburou-sama says, then exhales heavily when he nods back to me.

"Huh, you do? Enlighten me, by all means," she says, resting her hands back on the desk.

"Mana, you may proceed."

"Huh? Are you… certain?"

"It is this or wasting more time. Now that we know that Kouzuki is aware Shirogane was one of us, there is little reason to withhold the intel."

"Yes, sir." Inhaling deeply, a small shiver on my nape, I then look forward, into the glacier. "XO, to tell the truth, cadet Shirogane was put under my House's protection after Kageyuki-san's passing."

"… Huh?" Raising a brow, blinking in quick succession, she then grasps her chin. "So you're saying that Shirogane became a Tsukuyomi?"

"No, I said he was entrusted to our care. In the nobility, when a fellow passes away, it is not unheard of for the patron house to look after the heirs of said person. Kageyuki Shirogane was a good fellow to my Father and Uncle, and while it was debated whether or not we should tend to a commoner at the time, it was decided that Takeru Shirogane would be taken under our care to join our fellowship."

"So… He became a vassal, then?" She asks, narrowing her eyes, retracting her lips.

"A fellow-in-training. A squire, if you allow. Due to his fascination with his father's work, Shirogane accepted to join the training program of my House back then, going as far as to declare he would become an Imperial Guard instead of choosing another profession from the options then available."

For a moment, I stop and lick my lips. The cakes, the books, the ruckus in the gardens, much noise among the trees of a national park we once visited, where he apparently stole my sister's lips in his innocence, the incessant smoke coming from the kitchen when he once challenged Yuuhi-sama by saying she wouldn't be able to even boil an egg, and hitting the nail straight on the head with an industrial press. Recalling those days, the days before the war took your heart from us, before we gave up on it more accurately, brings an odd taste to my mouth as I cross a leg, fiddle with a strand of hair.

And looking elsewhere, I continue. "While it would be impossible for a commoner to be admitted into the Royal Guard with ease, his father's service was appreciated and devoted so Shirogane was given the chance to show his worth. Due to the results he obtained in his efforts, he was formally inducted into my House's training program at age twelve to be instructed along other selected young heirs and inductees to become Imperial Guards."

"So what you're saying is that he was smitten with the Guard, and since he had talent and his father had been a loyal vassal, your House inducted him? When he was just twelve years old?"

"… Yes, that is the case. Unlike what he believes, he was not left alone after his father's passing."

"Is this the reason why in his data it says he left his school without moving away from the Hiiragi district?" She holds my gaze, I nod back.

"That is the truth. We cannot tell you of what trainings he did nor where was he trained, yet Shirogane was under my fellowship's care since then," I say that without wavering or looking away, for it is the truth. "And thus, as one of the highest members of my house, Shirogane is also my protegee, XO."

She then narrows her eyes and lips, small daggers within the ice. "And why have you not disclosed this until now? I would have welcomed this honesty during yesterday's meeting."

"You'll have to forgive me, but I could ask you the same thing regarding the intel you possessed. If you had reached out to us, inquiring on whether he was a fellow or an exile, all of this would have been avoided. Quite careless, coming from the leader of Alternative IV."

"Mana, keep your poise," he admonishes, giving a minute bow to the fox. "In any case, all of this was truly nothing but a chain of unfortunate events. Thus, could you hand over the full report on his departure, XO?"

"Before that, I want you to confirm something. You are not going to do anything that would… be detrimental to the project, would you?"

"What are you implying?" I ask, frowning despite the glare Daizaburou-sama gives me.

She smiles, waving a hand in the air. "Oh, I would rather not end up on the black list of the Shogunate for meddling on your 'private businesses', you see. Because when the UN asked the Empire to treat Shirogane's wound before taking him to Alaska, the Imperial forces refused to do so."

"What did you say?!" Daizaburou-sama shouts, eyes parting wide.

I barely held my breath at the words, the certainly false and insulting declaration of this fox. We refused to treat him? That's preposterous! We both glare at her, she remains as calm as a pond.

"Just as you heard. Apparently, a few UN scouts found him close to the area where the G-Bombs were dropped. As the first page should have detailed, Shirogane was wearing a damaged fortified suit with the helmet and all, broken and burnt beyond recognition. However, thanks to the patterns in the section guarding his neck, they could tell the suit was from the IRG. Not to mention, he was holding a bloodied sword tightly on his chest, and despite being unconscious he refused to let go of it."

"A… sword?"

"Yes, that little and troublesome sword Mitsurugi found on his room. The one Shirogane now returned to you, I believe."

"Wait, are you saying-"

"Yes, he defended himself with that blade, it would seem. What little those who rescued him told me suggests that's the reason the sword had to be repaired, and why it's far less sharp than one would expect of one of our armaments," she notes, wiggling a finger up and down. "By the by, might I ask why did he have that katana?"

I grimace on a reflex, of course she would ask about it. But she shouldn't know of it's meaning. "All members of the Guard are given katanas, Vice Commander. Even the fresh recruits."

"So Shirogane had that blade since he was made into an Imperial Guard?"

"As I said, he was given a katana as all other fresh members do, XO. It is a standard practice you can easily confirm with any Instructor from the IRG." Why is she insisting on this point? Could she know what the Minaru Kamui is meant to represent? No, she shouldn't… unless he recalled it and told her.

Tapping some papers, she again looks away as if bored. "Well, back to the point, when they found him, the scouts immediately tried to apply treatment to Shirogane, but after removing his helmet they realized he was Japanese. After giving him some first aid and confirming he could be saved through his suit's signal, they tried to contact the IJA to send him to them, but they refused."

Taking another moment of silence to gauge our reactions, as I was grimacing at the image of him surrounded by BETA, she then stands up to serve herself something. As she was filling her mug, she looks back and sighs.

"The records indicate that those from the IJA claimed Shirogane was probably a Japanese that was on the UN's side and didn't want to receive him, since the area where they found him was supposed to be covered by international forces." Sitting down, taking a brief sip, the stalwart ice wall without heart resumes her cold monologue. "However, the UN didn't have any data about him on its databases. Since Shirogane's wounds were severe, he was not going to make it without proper treatment. And the UN code forbids any soldier from abandoning a wounded person, if they can be saved. Due to Lucifer ending in a total victory without risk to the scouts, the took him to one of their ships to apply the required treatment."

"And then, why did they not contact the IRG? What athwarted Shirogane from the Shogunate?"

"… Do you truly not remember what transpired after the G-Bombs were dropped during Lucifer, 1st Lt Tsukuyomi? How most of the IRG's men were too busy trying to infiltrate the hive, debating with the American forces and almost starting another bloodbath on the field?"

"T-That's…"

"Look, we hold similar feelings towards the usage of the G-Bombs on that day," she says, nodding our way. "However, as you should know, the state of the UN's relations with the Empire at the time was dire at best. Nobody had the time to lose negotiating for a single soldier, I doubt any person with enough power to speak with the IRG's commanders ever knew Shirogane was receiving treatment at all."

"… Which would make sense," Daizaburou-sama nods, grimacing, darkening as a new moon night. "I myself and Her Highness were in charge of overseeing the operation that day. Anyone who could notify anything to us would have had to do so through our ship and official channels."

"And the officers on the field were all gathered at the hive," I sigh, feeling emptiness setting inside me.

"Simply put, no one wanted to get in trouble over an almost dead soldier," she says, shrugging. "So, since nobody answered the plea that was already forwarded, the officer in charge of the ship decided to bring Shirogane to Alaska since they couldn't just abandon him, waste time negotiating, or at worst get in an argument with the Royal Guard, who was beyond wrath at the usage of the bombs and, as you would recall, blamed both the UN and the US forces for it." Taking a momentary silence to drink, she spins in her chair. "After all, once he regained consciousness, Shirogane could simply contact his fellows and return on his own to the Empire. Maybe it would be a small showing of cooperation with the IRG, how the UN saved one of them amidst the fire of Lucifer's closing moments."

"But when he woke up, he had lost his memory?" I stare at her, she nods back immediately without delay.

"Indeed, 1st Lieutenant. He remembered his name and even how to write it in kanji, it would seem. Despite that, when the UN tried to contact the Empire once more, they said no such person had taken part of Operation Lucifer among the Imperial Troops on August 5th according to their databases, and refused to accept him back. The attempt to contact the IRG went far more poorly, and the report lists it as an utter waste of time," she notes with a nod, once more grabbing her mug to drink.

… Of course, Yuuhi-sama erased his data as soon as she learned of his supposed death. If only we had not tried to enter the Hive, if we hadn't had to deal with those damn Americans that tried to infiltrate the hive, if one of us had been left behind to intercept that call for help… Acids again claw up my throat, lush vines constricting an otherwise sturdy tree. An invisible noose, as the floor feels like giving up on my feet.

Uncaring, the fox continues in her slow telling. "Without relatives, with his nation turning its back to him, the UN made Shirogane sign some papers to request formal asylum so that he could stay in the hospital until he completely recovered. Once he healed, there were two paths available to him. Either become a Cadet on the UN or become a refugee. The UN, knowing he was a pilot, decided to push for the first in hopes of him recovering his memories and then becoming a sign of their good intentions towards the Empire. I can't show you all the documents, bureaucracy you'd understand, but here are a few of them about his hospitalization in Alaska." She stands up and offers the folders, yet when I grasp them she does not release them. Looking at me, her features tighten, "I hope this is enough to prove my and Shirogane's goodwill to you, Royal Guards."

"Worry not, it is much appreciated," Daizaburou-sama says, nodding my way.

When I do, she releases the folder. Opening it atop the small table between both sofas, we treat each sentence in utmost care.

…

Takeru-sama had a broken arm and many broken ribs as well when he was found. His pulse was also abnormally low, even after receiving treatment, and his heart stopped twice on the way to Alaska despite all the efforts of the paramedics on the UN's ship. It was a nothing short of a miracle that he survived long enough to reach the hospital. It took him two weeks to regain consciousness for the first time, but was unable to form words and couldn't remain awake for more than a few minutes. His condition continued to improve on the following days, and on the third week he could finally remain awake and conscious enough to talk and focus on the people around him, that's when he told the doctors his name.

During the months of his recovery, he told the doctors of what little he remembered about Japan and his life, despite having serious headaches when trying to remember some things, and he was prone to suffering panic attacks when asked too many questions about his past. On reiterated occasions, it seems he would wake up in the middle of the night, plagued by abstract dreams. Recurring words on the subject included 'wasteland', 'black fire', 'coldness'.

" What do you mean, why did I change? What exactly do you expect me to do, 'Mana-nee'? The fucking nation is on fire and you'd rather have Her Highness blindly remain drinking tea in the veranda?"

However, what surprised the personnel of the hospital was his demeanor. He was not hostile with them, showing no distrust or anger at the foreigners that approached him. On the contrary, he showed himself to be a peaceful and relaxed person instead.

" No, you have to take a break, Mana-nee. I'm telling Yohime-san if you stay up working so much again!"

After the talks with the Empire had failed and his rehabilitation finished, he chose to enlist in the UN army, on the condition that if the chance arose for him to return to the Empire, the authorities would allow it without question. After all, it would serve as a proof of their goodwill to the Empire.

The conditions of his return were different, however, as he was perhaps transferred in a hurry during the aftermath of the Yukon Incident. Yet, this… this is…

Lips retract and I hold the air it, tightly veiling my sight.

Stings and darts would sooner pierce my flesh before I exhale, exhale and allow dampness to reach my eyes.

This is nothing sort of a miracle. For his body and soul to have healed so in these years, despite what he had to got through. For so long we thought him gone, for so many nights we wept for his death, and yet he was struggling for his life. For fate to have given him the chance to survive, for luck to have shielded him from so many risks. Yet there is one very important matter that has to be addressed here.

Kouzuki knew all this time. And she did nothing. While her concerns over supporting an exile could be justified, these papers grant another layer to her refusal. She should have known of his innocence, yet the project could not be jeopardized by an unknown actor. And even then, she kept him close, safe and sound. Even now, despite her threats of deporting him, she is merely saying that instead of acting on the words, as one would think she would if she deemed this issue such a danger.

So, one question remains. Why?

"This had cleared up many things, Vice Commander. Is it possible for you to give us a copy of this file?" Daizaburou-sama asks as he returns the folder, no longer frowning, his hands relaxed, his voice flowing easily as a downstream river.

"Sadly I can't, since this is a UN document," she shakes her head, resting the folder atop one of the large piles of papers in her desk. "You can consult with the databases or ask for permission if you do not have the authorization. Now then, I believe it's finally time for you to tell me who was Shirogane before this accident happened to him. If he isn't an exile, and you truly were looking after him then, why was he fighting on Lucifer and why is there no records left of him anywhere?" She again entwines her fingers, locking her cold gaze on us.

Daizaburou-sama waves a hand down, nodding to me before facing the fox."As it were, Shirogane had formally joined the ranks of the Imperial Guard after the defeat we suffered on the first night of the Defense of Kyoto. Starved for pilots, his training was hastened and he joined one of the squadrons of my battalion as a 2nd Lieutenant." He affirms, slowly joining his hands. I suppose we can use his former role to deceive her. "He was a most promising member of the Guard, despite his age he was on par with the rest of the new recruits. And it was not an odd occurrence at all, as much as it pains me to admit."

"As you perhaps already know XO, by the time Arashiyama Base fell, the IRG was forced to deploy most of its trainees to the battle, as the MDF did before," I admit, recalling and lowering my gaze.

"Yes, it's reasonable considering the state of our defenses back then. So, you made a sixteen-years old boy a 2nd Lt? Did Shirogane do anything that warranted the erasure of his data banks during his service?" She asks, leaning slightly forward.

"Of course not," he answers, shaking his head. "Shirogane was a most devoted member of our ranks, despite the, ahem, irreverence he displayed at times."

"What does that mean?"

"I believe you should know how he is by now, XO. Shirogane refuses to stay quiet in front of what he believes to be mistaken," He nods, and while at first his lips seemed to curve upwards, Daizaburou-sama ends up sighing and running a hand on the sides of his head.

Yet, the XO doesn't immediately reply. Leaning back on her chair, she was looking at a bookshelf nearby, at a small tray left by the coffee machine. Lips twisting in, composure piked slowly, slowly, cracks surfacing in the minute tension in her eyes.

"I suppose I know of… that trait of his, yes," she says as she closes her eyes. Sighing as she shifts her posture on her seat, a complete restoration of the mask when she looks back at us. "So, you're saying a child became a respected member of your squadron?"

"Pardon me?"

"Mana," he admonishes with a sigh. "It is unbecoming of you to grow upset so easily."

"… My apologies."

Nodding and clamping my lips, I rest against the sofa's cushioning. Were we not on her personal office, on such a dire situation, I would have demanded the fox to retract the insult. Takeru-sama is by far more skilled than the average person, that boy learns too fast. And he had a knack for piloting, despite how much we dreaded sending him to practice only to hear him start to sing. If there is one thing me, Maya and Raiko-sama agree on, is that none of us know how did he apprehend such finesse and knowledge, or why would he choose to use it on so offensive methods.

" But it works! If I spin, people can't lock onto me, the sensors can't keep up with the changes in direction. Then, I can just whack 'em hard from behind or something. What do you mean, I could crash? Heh, just you wait until I manage to pull off a backflip with Watermelon-kun. Now that's gonna be awesome! ATSUKUNARE! YUME MIRU KANATA E-"

I honestly don't know how he did that, or how he came up with all those odd songs, nor why he would nickname his Zuikaku as watermelon. True, 'Suika-kun' does resemble the name of the craft, but it is distressing to recall he refused to refer to his Zuikaku as anything other than Watermelon-kun. Or to remember his adusted shouts, calling the Tank-class as crimson capybaras that would die starving.

Sighing as I shake my head, recalling his blazing eyes of motivation and his darkening glare of fury only serves to further retract my tongue into my throat when coming back to reality. All I can do now is silence, swallow down my venom, claw at my fists and wait.

"Vice Commander, he had an innate talent like no other. I believe his performance on this base is enough proof of that," Daizaburou-sama says, again patting the sofa's armrest.

"So you're saying he was as good as he is now, despite being just a child soldier?"

Hmph, such insolence… Crude taunts as such might work with most, but not with us, fox. We will not trip so easily.

"Of course not, but he was a natural leader," I nod, crossing my arms. "Despite his tendency to speak up, no one can deny the talent he had to manage a Zuikaku on a level similar to a seasoned warrior."

"I see. Then, did he remain under your care all the way until Lucifer?"

Daizaburou-sama's features tighten for a speck of a second, yet he quickly returns to his usual stoic expression. "Yes, though he did not retreat when we told him to do so. Which is why he ended up on the G-Bomb's area, and we lost his signal then. We assumed he was dead, seeing the overall destruction caused by the detonations. And I am loath to admit, little could I do to rein in my troop's ire in front of that treason."

"Is that so," she nods, not pressing the matter, finishing her drink in silence for a moment. "Then he isn't an exile or a traitor, I suppose? Shirogane was a rightful member of the Royal Guard?"

"Yes, however, you made a little mistake Vice Commander," Daizaburou-sama says, low, as closes his eyes, nodding slowly.

"A mistake? What are you talking about?"

"Shirogane still is a member of the Royal Guard, as far as I'm concerned. His records merely suffered from an error after the digitalization we did when restructuring our offices after Lucifer was confirmed to be successful."

And all pressure to have us send our population as refugees to another land were halted cold, might I add. Which is why, we needed a thorough accounting of all survivors and missing papers. It was time to supervise all that was left behind, to once more set root for good in our rightful land. Even if in this case, it is all a lie. What truly erased his data were the permanently weeping cries of Yuuhi-sama on all following nights after that accursed August 5th, after all.

Coughing, he leans forward, looking straight into her eyes. "Now that you we have told you all we can on his situation, I must ask you to return Shirogane to us, his rightful tutors. I'm sure he'll recover his memory much faster back home with us, and of course the UN will receive the proper thanks for saving his life, and for safeguarding him thus far since his return." He bows at her, deeply, and I immediately follow.

Yet, the woman laughed quietly. As I look up, I see she endowed another wicked grin and a curvature to her eyes. The sight filled my insides with ice, rough and jagged, piking at my composure.

"Excuse me Vice Commander, but what is causing you to laugh?" I narrow my eyes at her, yet she just looks away with a smile. What is this woman even thinking? What is so entertaining, fox?

"I suppose you didn't notice, but Shirogane isn't a member of the Royal Guard anymore. He's part of the UN now."

…

"XO, I believe we have made ourselves clear," Daizaburou-sama gestures with his hand at me, his eyes slightly narrowing, unsheathing the inner blade. "Shirogane is one of us, a member of both my squadron and the network of 1st Lt Tsukuyomi's House. Such was the reason which fueled our inquiries, to see if he truly was himself. And seeing the proof you presented, our doubts are no more. Thus, I am asking you to return him to the Imperial Royal Guard's care," He asks with a firm pat to the sofa, leaning forward and slightly raising his voice to his usual loudness.

Still, the fox crosses her arms as she shrugs. Not masking the smirk, the combative tint in her glare. "Then, how about you make a formal request for him? As far as the databases go, he's dead here. Bring the papers with the data of his service, the proof that he is indeed a member of the Tsukuyomi House's trainees, and request us to transfer him officially. Assuming you have the papers, that is."

"What did you say?! Are you insinuating we're lying?!" Hitting the sofa, my teeth clench further when he remains smirking.

"Considering your databases lost so much data, it would not be odd for his records to have been lost as well. I won't hand my protegee in front of mere words, I'd be liking you to present proof that confirms your claims before I allow Shirogane to leave this base. Of course, that's if he agrees to it."

"If he- Are you saying he would oppose the notion of recovering his past?!"

"Mana, please keep your poise," he says, holding my glare with a frown. Then, expression unchanged, his inner sword becomes unchained, its edge brimming through his posture as he looks at the fox. "The same for you, XO. Let's not fall to animosity, we can debate over this reasonably."

"Oh, I'm not doing this to test you or anything," she affirms, sobering up, her brows beginning to cross. "Seeing how he reacted to your talks today, the nervous shock he had to endure, I believe he may not want to return to the Guard. Actually, it might not even be good for his mental health to allow him to return."

"What did you say?! How dare you speak such-"

"Tsukuyomi! Do not say words you'll later regret."

"Daizaburou-sama, how could I remain calm when this situation was clearly caused by the damn sedatives they injected him with? If the sedatives hadn't been forced on him by that-"

"Enough!" He stares at me, unflinching, as he hits the sofa, strongly enough to leave it sunk.

I close my eyes and take a deep breath, futilely trying to restrain the shaking present in my hands. How could I remain calm? Isn't it obvious what's going on here?!

"XO, forgive the screams," He gives her a brief, subdued bow. "However, I must ask you again to transfer him back to the Empire. Shirogane wasn't exiled nor is he a traitor. Procuring the reports would be the more formal procedure, yes, yet I would like to take him with us back to his rightful place in the Royal Guard when we depart tomorrow. At the least, I believe we should tell him the whole truth and let Shirogane himself decide."

"And how do I know you're not lying just to dispose of him?" She says as she again locks her gaze on us, narrowing her eyes.

Such insolence! All I'm allowed to do is grit my teeth, so long as this woman has him under her. To be so close, and yet so far… All because they used who knows what drugs on him, to suggest our presence is harmful to him.

"Please, there is no need for further hostilities. Me and 1st Lt Tsukuyomi have told you all we can within our boundaries." He says relaxing onto the sofa, despite his tightening arms as he crossed them once more. "All we would ask of you is one final talk with Shirogane, to dispel all these misunderstandings that have plagued his return to this land."

"Really? Then, might I ask you another question?"

"Of course."

"Why was he alone on the vicinity of the Yokohama Hive, on an area that was not supposed to be covered by Imperial troops? If you were his leader, why did his squadron not restrict his movements?"

"… Such details are military secrets, XO," he quietly answers.

"Then, can you tell me exactly under which squadron was he stationed? I could easily double check the databases I have available on Lucifer, to see if there is indeed missing data in a team's formation. If Shirogane's data was erased by an error, then even his presence on Lucifer should be missing."

…

There's no way we can tell her the truth. If she knew how important he is, she wouldn't let him out of her grasp. It's the type of person she seems to be. But then…

"Ahem… Have you not checked this data before, XO?" I ask, leaning forward.

She squints her eyes, saying nothing for a moment, before she brushes some hair as she sighs. "There are many holes on Lucifer's ranks, you should know we lost many soldiers to the G-Bombs. And I can't have detailed access to Imperial records, as much as I would like to. Even if I know he was part of Lucifer, I don't know where to look in the squadrons from the IRG that took part in the operation. But now," she then smirks, resting her chin on a hand, "you are here to point me in the right direction. If you are telling the truth then, what's stopping you from telling me the name of his squadron?"

"Isn't the knowledge that he was part of the Wolf battalion plentiful?" I ask, eyes narrowing.

"You had three TSF squadrons deployed, I assume. And on the vanguard as well. If you said Shirogane refused his orders to retreat, and seeing he was found alive and alone, I assume the rest of his comrades followed the command and did not die to the G-Bombs. So, it would be easier to confirm that the blank spot on the formation is him by seeing other collaborations with your unit and finding that same spot missing. If there's multiple members missing from the team, it will grow harder to confirm your story from my position. And as I said before," she leans forward, hiding her lips behind interlocked hands, while beginning to frown, "I won't hand over my protegee until I am certain you mean him no harm."

"Yet, we told you all we can at the moment," Daizaburou-sama says, hitting the sofa once more.

"And you cannot confirm anything else as of now, request some documents to be sent to you?" She asks, low, as she stares. We both share a gaze, I grimace and look down as he sighs and runs a hand into his head.

We cannot, under no circumstances, present the last papers of his service. And the other records have been erased, so to attain what leftovers remain… we would have to request such to Yuuhi-sama herself. And by that point, I might as well have jumped straight into an erupting volcano. Notifying this to her, with how her mood as been lately, would be placing further burdens on her shoulders. Or risk retaliation against Kouzuki, and for as much as I dislike her way of being I cannot deny she has been one of our most important allies. Alt. IV notwithstanding, her favorable reception to Her Highness' requests, her fair treatment to Meiya-sama, and the protection she is extending to Takeru-sama, albeit odd, is enough to earn her my respect. Yet…

"… I doubt we could request such documentation in such short notice," I admit, Daizaburou-sama nods in agreement.

"Is that so? Well, there is nothing to be done then. Shirogane will remain here until you present the proper documentation."

"Wait, you could at least tell him about-"

"I do not believe it wise," she says, a small pursing of her lips as she crosses her arms. "Letting him recall his memories on his own is for the best. It is not unusual, for survivors of wars to lose their memories, to never regain them. Forcing him as he is now would only bring further suffering to Shirogane, so I won't be disclosing anything that he does not ask for."

"True that might be, however-"

"As of now, he is my protegee, 1st Lieutenant. And allow me to remind you, you're in my base, as well. If you truly care about Shirogane, allow him to recall on his own."

Hands shaking as they grip and distort my dress, I look down, biting my lips. To just turn around and do nothing? Is this truly all I can do? Yet, even before the sedatives, Takeru-sama did sound pained. It is true, forcing him to remember might backfire…

"Ahem…" Daizaburou-sama nods my way, sighing heavily. "However, if we can procure the documentation or if he comes seeking answers, you won't withhold him from the truth?"

"You have my word, I have no intention to let this become an issue," she nods, holding our gazes, never faltering, never wavering.

So this is all we can get? No, once Takeru-sama recovers his memory I'm sure he'll come to us immediately. Yuuhi-sama may not be particularly pleased at this outcome, but now we possess confirmation of the path forward. Bidding our time to present the papers should allow us to aid Takeru-sama in his recovery. And if Kouzuki were to be lying… I pity her, for she shall become the recipient of Yuuhi-sama's blue fire.

"I suppose we can agree to that." Daizaburou-sama nods slowly at her, I do so too.

"Well then, now that we got that out of the way, it's time to see how we deal with this little incident. 1st Lt, I would like to ask you to reprimand your underlings, where others will see and hear it, to ensure their previous outburst doesn't cause any rumors."

"… Very well, I shall do as you ask. Is there anything else you'd request out of us?"

"No, nothing else. This was nothing but an accident, and if you're being truthful about this, I suppose I can see why did you go as far as you did. There won't be any punishments or claims filed, let's not make this bigger than it is."

I give her a small nod, sighing softly. "Your understanding is appreciated. Then, would you allow us to see Shirogane before we return to the barracks?"

Narrowing her eyes, quick to she is to shake her head. "No, I do not think it wise. Please give him space, let's not risk any rumors from brewing."

"However, you can't simply-"

"Mana," he shakes his head, grimacing. "Would you be willing to give 1st Lt Tsukuyomi updates on Shirogane's condition, XO?"

"Updates?" She raises a brow, compacting her shoulders. "Look, Shirogane isn't in any danger. He only needs some rest and a detox, a full day at most," she affirms while sounding bored, drawing arcs on the air. "Also, I will limit the movements 1st Lt Tsukuyomi and her squad can do on my base. I know you've been keeping an eye on Shirogane for quite some time, and I think it would be for the best to keep you away from him just in case. You will only be able to be in the vicinity of Mitsurugi's position. If I find you or any of your three partners approaching-"

"They will not act against Shirogane or anyone else from your personnel. I will make sure they understand our position as mutual allies in this base," I say, holding her stare, trying to crack the ice.

Yet, she once more looks away, immutable as a frozen pond. "So long as they do not show any hostile intentions towards the UN, you can proceed with your watch over Mitsurugi as always. Now then, was there anything else?"

"… No, I don't think so," I look at Daizaburou-sama, who shakes his head.

"Well, this shall be all, then. I hope I made my terms clear, and that there is no repeat of today's 'accident'."

"There won't be, XO. I assure you of it," I say, meeting her glare, the seemingly endless dark within the ice.

We give her a small bow, turning to leave and exiting the office. Kouzuki dismisses the blonde foreigner, calling the captain to her presence. So, us two are free to return to the elevator.

Stomping the floor, finally frowning in full force, the myriad of arrows within me are released with each step, each small swing of my arms on the march.

"Mana, please remain composed," he slowly asks, pacing behind me.

"How could I? After revealing so much, after disclosing such intel, she still dares to refuse our petition to see how he's faring? It's unacceptable," I turn away, once more storming to the elevator.

"Kouzuki is merely being overly cautious, I'm certain," he says, remaining calm and composed. "And, even if it isn't immediate, now that she has been made aware of his identity it is but a matter of time."

"Do you truly believe so?" I ask as I press the button, calling the machine to our location.

He leans closer, whispering. "Do you believe Yuuhi-sama would remain idle on this board we face?"

"I'm frankly more concerned with her possible retaliation," I whisper back, sighing as I curl a strand of hair. "It is all so puzzling, however. I did not think Kouzuki would… well, defend someone to such lengths."

"She's merely covering her own trails, in case he was an exile or someone who would be in our 'black list', as she put it," he notes, nodding. Yet, he then sighs as his shoulders sag and crumble. "It is all very sad, however. At the very least he isn't badly injured."

The elevator arrives, we enter it and begin our ascent. In the narrow silence, under the monotone of the whirring of gears, of the changing numbers, I can't help but feel the vibrations spread to my neck, daring to make my shiver on my own, to lose stable footing.

"Daizaburou-sama, do you truly believe my words were what caused him such harm?"

"I believe he was hurt by them, however slightly. Yet, the breakdown was caused by the sedatives, it is clear."

"Then, shouldn't we-"

"Casting blames won't aid us, or him," he says, crossing his arms, a tread of light extending in his otherwise stoic features. "And at the moment, we have a few tasks to tackle. Both the reprimand to your fellows, as well as the report to Yuuhi-sama. We did literally all that was in our reach, Mana. Now, it is time to wait."

"Sigh… Is there truly nothing else to be done?"

"Not us, no. Whether something else occurs today will be in Yuuhi-sama's hands." He then narrows his brows, rubbing his forehead. "I only hope your hunch doesn't prove right and she can keep her composure at the news."

"As unlikely as it seems, I also hope for the same."

Even if that may allow us to reclaim you faster. Sigh… Resting on the cold wall of the elevator, becoming aware of my heartbeats, I can only look up in silence. Look up at nowhere, at all that I recalled, all that we learned just some moments ago.

And in the end, there is only one thing I can think of, one simple wish.

" Please be alright, Takeru. Please get well, and don't let whatever lies within you obstruct your vision again."

Rumbling Hearts (III)

A/N: Lately, it feels as if the author notes have become some sort of justification corner. So, for one last time, here we go again. This next wall of text is more for those guest commenters that are displeased, or for anyone who is still on the fence about this fic.

It'd be easy to shield myself by saying I'm an amateur, that I'm doing this for free on my spare time, or to snap and send people to try and write their own stories. But I won't do that.

You see, I do want the plot to move forward and it has been, in subtle ways, despite how long this is taking to take off . While it's hard for me to find a balance in my descriptions and banter, I am happy with the end result of the last few chapters. It sucks seeing a few think my skills are degrading, but I can't please everyone.

I won't be doing another full rewrite, because from my eyes the story isn't dragging on. I do concede some bits were unnecessary, rereading last chapter I realized the discussions on the Minaru Kamui and the rejected report had already been tackled on the meeting and were a leftover of the original iteration of the story. So, I will edit those parts when I do a checkup later on. But everything else, the repetitive and stale conversations included, was intentional and won't be changed.

Reversal might be a dumpster fire, but it's my dumpster fire.

As someone pointed out to me, that people are leaving long comments does mean they do care about the story, or cared enough about it to voice their issues with it before taking their leave . But I don't know how to spell it out, I already said this won't be Alternative 2, that the mood won't change. You all have read thus far, and so know what this is about. Takeru coming to terms with what he has lost, and eventually coming to a decision on what he wants to protect. And more importantly, how does he want to do that.

All this angst has a reason to be, and while I more or lest wrote myself into a corner where I had to put a detriment for Yuuko to not insta-solve everything while not coming out as OOC, so that Takeru could face what will be coming to him after the events of this chapter, and to have a good reason for the sixteen years old Native to have the power and drive it has been told he possessed, all of that has already been foreshadowed and hinted at enough thus far.

We are at the end of the slow middle of this story, as the next half of the Paranoia arc will have Takeru face the differences in this world through the more intense nationalism that Meiya portrays as a mirror . Yes, I know, one million words and it's only halfway through. I like writing long and boring, sorry.

The point is, the heavier ' emotional' angst is coming in the next chapters, and the reason behind all the long-winded detours will be revealed, for both new and old readers, in chapter 76. As I said, it all ties into the foggy memories, why I have an omniscient narrator in a story told in first person, and where was I going before the rewrite took place. Chapter 76 was meant to be the next chapter of the original version, and now that I expanded it and took the time to put the hints in place I can only hope it doesn't come out as shock value or an ass pull.

But regardless of how it comes out, I like what I'm writing now. So to all those who are done with how much this is taking, maybe this story isn't for you. Thanks to have taken the time to leave your complains, to have read on despite what must have been boring chapters for you, but I won't change my writing again to please complains that will never stop coming.

To be honest, one half of me wants the hints to be obvious enough unlike all the previous twists I pulled, while the other wants to go full "You'll never see it comiiiiiing!" at the end of chapter 76. And while I think all the buildup is worth it, in the end every reader can judge this dumpster fire how they see it.

So, as always, thanks for reading and commenting . And sorry if you're disappointed at what this story is now , and goodbye if that's the case.

Stay safe.

Zuoriel

---

Chapter 72:

Rumbling Hearts (II I)

---

December 3 rd. Around 02:30 PM.

(Tokyo. Imperial Palace.)

[Yuuhi]

---

"Ugh… Kgh…"

Tears course through my jawline, which remains petrified upon what it's told through the speakers of the comms.

First, his exchange with Mion and Shion. Then, his talk with Mana. And at the end, the sounds of his suffering.

No longer are there doubts lingering within, this person is none other than my Takeru. Even down to the more aggressive reactions, to the fissure which cracks his cries in twain.

"… Your Highness?" Raiko-san calls, upon looking upwards I find her offering a handkerchief.

"… Sniff. Thank you kindly," accepting the offering, the silk slowly rests upon my skin. Wiping my tears, a moment of silence passes as I inhale once the recording ceases to play. Thus, with one final sigh I release the shrapnel which lays within my flesh, the small hint of pain around my neck he left imprinted in me. "It is alright, I am fine now," I say, resting both hands on my lap, nodding to the three present in my chamber.

"Are you certain, Your Highness?" My chamberlain thus asks, consternation miring her features. "I do not believe it wise for your health, to continue to-"

"Such is my duty, as a Shogun and the Head of my House. Furthermore… There no longer is any fog in my mind, this person is Takeru."

"H-However…" she looks down, her already wrinkled complexion tightening further. "It is impossible, the little lad perished such a long time ago."

And you still refer to him in that way, despite everything. Yet, it is enough to ease, relax my shoulders when I nod and Grandma cannot return my stare as pressure falls upon her lips.

"In any case," Maya taps her glasses, up towards her brows, lips and eyelids narrowing, "I advise you to call back General Daizaburou and the cousins posthaste, Your Highness. We need to devise a few countermeasures before we present any documentation to Kouzuki."

Raiko-san scoffs, folding her arms even tighter as she glares at Maya. "What are you even saying? Yuuhi-sama has to pressure Kouzuki right this instant! Takeru-uesama has been sent to the infirmary, after they employed who knows what manner of medication on him, and you rather dally in his recovery? And I thought you couldn't possibly fall lower, Tsukuyomi ."

Both frown at each other, Maya's lips shrink further. "We cannot allow any further harm to fall upon Takeru, Raiko-sama. Therefore, we must ensure the presentation of the papers does not cause any more setbacks for us. His identity has to be restored, and much has to be done to guarantee his safe return," she then taps her glasses, slowly nodding to herself.

"That can be done while he is under our care," Raiko-san counters immediately. "Not to mention, if Takeru-uesama remains as angered as he was while medicated, he could either expose his own identity or put himself in danger by reacting aggressively towards Kouzuki. And as much as I dislike the fox, I am in agreement with Mana. We must take action to safeguard Alt. IV as well." She then looks my way, bowing deeply. "Yuuhi-sama, considering all that has already been disclosed to the woman, there is little reason to keep up with this charade. Please, you should request his transfer to the Vice Commander."

The comm lets out a small whimper of static, before a coughing noise comes through. "If you allow my audacity, I also would request the same to you, Yuuhi-sama," Mana thus says, a sliver of the rampart she usually displays.

"Is that so? Perhaps… it truly is would be for the best."

"Your Highness, do not allow your emotion to hasten your moves," Maya says, kneeling swiftly, a fist on the wooden floor. "There is much yet to be done before we bring Takeru back, we cannot simply improvise a delivery to Yokohama nor can we disclose such intel to Kouzuki without-"

"One would think someone such as you to be in agreement with the notion," Raiko-san interjects, glaring much as the daylight cloaks over her features. "What could possibly have you refusing the notion, Tsukuyomi ?"

Inhaling sharply, she taps her glasses. "As I told to Her Highness during yesterday's dinner, many are the eyes which are staring her way as of now, due to the rather… forward demeanor she has endowed lately."

"And rightfully so, it was time Yuuhi-sama began to take cards in actual matters," she nods twice, Grandma also doing so in agreement while Maya groans, lips pursing inwards.

"However, such attention would be counterproductive to our goals," she says, exhaling long, treading her hair. "We need discretion if we aim to reclaim Takeru, and restore his identity without arising suspicions."

"Why would you need to do so?" Another voice asks, right behind me, which makes me flinch. Tsuhi was, once more, standing in attention besides the near pillars, sporting her habitual poker face.

"Because he is," she looks my way, then down, "well, you should know how his position could-"

"For all intent and purposes, Takeru is but another fellow," Tsuhi says, then looks my way. "Yuuhi-sama is only looking after one of her vassals, if questions are forwarded. It isn't as if the records weren't truly lacking intel after Lucifer and the digitalization."

"However, even the smallest risk is too large to ignore," Maya ascertains, finally allowing herself to frown as she raises her head, sunlight reflected off her glasses.

"Maya, let us not raise our voices," I order, she bows down in apology. "I… I believe there is something that has yet to be addressed," running a hand over my neck, a short yet heavy exhalation comes from my lips. "Daizaburou-san?"

"Yes, Your Highness?"

"If that man truly is Takeru then, how did he survive? Were you informed on that supposed report of his discovery? Why was he not taken to us when found on the battlefield?" I ask, all those present once more growing completely silent.

"Yes, Kouzuki finally disclosed that document. Such was the reason why I allowed Mana to disclose part of Takeru's past to Kouzuki. I hope you have not been displeased by my decision, Your Highness," he says, composed yet low.

"It is alright, there is no blame on you. Please, do tell me of what said document detailed."

After a cough and a moment of quietness, Daizaburou-san proceeds to explain what Kouzuki told him, what laid in the pages of the reports.

Of how he was found, at the verge of death in a broken suit, along a broken blade.

Of his treatment, which almost he didn't receive due to the chaos that ensued after Lucifer, the ugly relations the Shogunate had with the UN at the time.

And his enlistment as a cadet, after the absolute loneliness which he found himself in. Without memories, without any documents that would even confirm he had existed, left behind by his nation and fellows.

…

But this means that… it's my fault? All of this is because I immediately gave up, isn't it? Takeru needed me and I left him to die? For he still struggled to keep his vow, yet I looked away, didn't even search for him. Is this a mockery of destiny? I cursed his name that night, that so far away night of August 5th when I had to erase his records. Yet, at the same time he was agonizing, praying for my helping hand to reach him.

"Then, you're telling me… I abandoned him?" I couldn't keep my voice from creaking.

"No, Your Highness, I never said-"

"The Imperial forces didn't tend to him, we refused to even extend a helping hand his way. We left him to die…" What had been dried once more dampens, my throat beginning to constrict and coil down. "And I erased everything as the tradition told me to. And that's why he had to remain abroad." Yet, I do not possess the strength to weep, nor to repine against the wood. All I can afford is this emptiness in my chest, as if my heart had faded away. "I did this, I caused all of this. I left him all alone… when he needed me the most. I… I…" Slowly, the tears fall down again.

Both of my hands claw at my chest, my neck twists itself shut in opposition to my eyes who release the gates of my tears. Weeping in silence, the images of what could have happened to him torment my mind and breathing. What if there were still BETA around? He would have been devoured alive. What if he were captured and tortured for information? What if he had died alone on the vicinity of the hive? And yet, I didn't… It's my fault, I caused him to suffer greatly. Takeru… forgive me… forgive me…

"Your Highness, please do not cry anymore!" Grandma comes to my side and slowly rubs my back, then grips my chin and lifts it so that she can bring another cloth to my eyes.

"Please calm down, Your Highness," Maya asks, and when looking her way she isn't returning my stare. Her own eyes are sharpened, fixated on the ground as her lips keep on narrowing, folding inwards in equal petrification as the rest of her posture. "We know he is safe for the moment. And to ensure no further burdens fall upon Takeru's shoulders, we must tread carefully."

"Yuuhi-sama, please do not listen to her," Raiko-san implores, bowing down and remaining in position. "You must take action as soon as possible. You have to safeguard him from that fox, and her from his possible ire."

"Speak no balderdash," Maya immediately retaliates, frowning, tone frosting over. "His safety has to be-"

"Silence!" I slam a hand against the wood a few times, both of them grimace as they reiterate their bows of apology. "Sigh… Raiko-san, you had promised you were not going to incite an argument."

"Little else can I do in front of Tsukuyomi's lack of care towards Takeru-uesama's future."

"And why do you insist so much on your proposal? I… do share you feelings, all of us here present do. Yet, to rush our steps could place him in further danger. I… I cannot allow that to come to pass. I already failed him once, my actions cannot compromise Takeru's safety."

"… You're not the only one who abandoned him."

"Huh?"

A small frown, a small tone. Yet, a large pyre of combustion lays now in her eyes. "I, too, abandoned him, didn't even pay any attention to his wellbeing when he needed me the most, when I could have prevented his ire, protect him from Tsukuyomi's claws."

"Again with that?" Maya raises her glare, teeth visible and ready to sink towards Raiko-san. "It was you who-"

"Maya," saying nothing else, I hold her gaze. Wringing her hands, she once more kneels. "Raiko-san, we all… desire the same as you. Yet, there are many eyes, many shadows who could bring harm to him or use his mere presence to our detriment. And as the Shogun, I cannot-"

"If you fold your hand, I myself will bring him back then."

"… Pardon?"

Glaring up towards me, her unchained fire fills my vision. "If you refuse to move, if you would forsake him just to placate the interests of others, I shall bring him back as the Head of the Amato House I am. He was under my care during the latter half of the invasion, and I myself placed a burgundy lotus on-"

"Excuse me?"

"I am- I said that-"

"Yuuhi-sama," a small noise by me, Tsuhi moved to be in my vision, slowly bowing down when she does. "Perhaps, Raiko-sama brings a fine proposal. If you cannot move as of now, to have another pressure the XO would be our best alternative. And considering our long stay in the Chain squadron, it would be easy to procure-"

"Enough."

"Eh? I was saying-"

"I am bringing Takeru back myself. Even if there are many steps required beforehand, he shall return as who he always was. And this is an order, Cpt Amato, 2nd Lt Yasomaga, 1st Lt Tsukuyomi." I glare their way, who solidify as gargoyles.

"Then," Raiko-san says, lowering her head yet not breaking eye contact, "you shall take immediate action?"

"Daizaburou-san?"

"Y-Yes?" He replies, with some delay.

"What are the possibilities that, despite the reprimand Mana issued to her underlings, Takeru's image will worsen in Yokohama?"

"Very high, Your Highness," Mana answers instead, allowing herself a sigh. "Despite my harsh words, and the apology the trio gave to Meiya-sama's squadmates, prejudice is a vile beast. It is perhaps too late to change Takeru-sama's reputation with mere actions on our end," she admits, fading, and Raiko-san nods to the words, Maya tightening her expression further.

"Tsuhi, what do we know of our available records?"

"That there is a small justification already being prepared," she slowly says, giving a small nod. "Our duties in the shelters and offices can be used to mask our… operations, yet the restoration of the data banks on the IRG's servers is still required."

"Maya, what are the chances such moves will be noticed?"

"Decidedly high, milady," she immediately says, voice still frozen. "Ikaruga-sama has been rather insistent on keeping me in Kitanomaru as of late, and fellows to be trusted are in short supply in the offices which oversee the records."

"Nothing a small diversion cannot break," Raiko-san counters, scoffing once more. "Perhaps you could finally prove your loyalty to Yuuhi-sama in this way, Tsukuyomi ."

"What?"

"Could you not use your position in Kitanomaru to divert Ikaruga's attention?" She smirks, despite the sudden shift in disposition. "Of course, one has to wonder. Why is it that their faction is growing so interested in our affairs as of late?"

One of Maya's brows twitches. "What are you implying?"

"Enough," again slamming the wood, both look away and bow down in apology. Sigh…

"Still, Raiko-sama raises a valid point," Tsuhi mentions, her eyes not veering from mine. "Precisely because we are starved for time must we take immediate action. Of course, if Yuuhi-sama could be placed in a compromising position, perhaps Raiko-sama could-"

"Silence," I raise my voice, leaning forward as I bite my lips. Tsuhi returns a smile my way, and I cannot help but to claw at my dress.

"However, whatever would we do should he grow adusted after this battle?" She asks, still smiling. "Mana-sama," then she raises her voice, lifting her face to reach the comms, "you did say his TSF was seen by many in the hangar, correct?"

Another heavy sigh comes through the comms. "Yes, the cousins so told me. And while Kouzuki does seem to be looking after him, I also must mention that all of this occurred due to those sedatives."

"Regardless," Maya looks up, tapping her glasses as she inhales, "you should mind your steps, Your Highness. Patience, milady. Only when serene can you discern the path forward."

"Yet, as much as I would favor discretion…" once more, I tread my neck, pressuring it, holding it, "if Takeru remains upset, or if he is further pushed towards anger, this situation will only worsen." And even then, now that I am aware that Kouzuki knows he is an Imperial Guard, now that I've heard his voice, his frail voice when shrieking in pain, his vigor when once more engaging in those word puns he so much loved… Stillness has no place within me as of now. "Thus," licking my lips, inhaling slowly, my knees, feet and leg quiver. Palpitations rise to my neck, barely below the skin. "Daizaburou-san, please go to the Vice Commander. I shall request the transfer myself."

"Wh- Your Highness, please reconsider!" Maya implores, both hands resting on the wood, eyes beginning to collapse.

"I must agree," he says, low. "Your Highness, there is perhaps an argument to be made in favor of passivity for the moment. You cannot-"

"While I cannot disclose Takeru's full identity to her, it is a simple matter to request the transfer of one of my vassals back to my command. And worry not, I shan't demand an immediate transfer. Yet, I believe Kouzuki could aid us in safeguarding Takeru while we arrange the required preparations. We do need to coordinate with her for his departure from Yokohama, eventually." I will not allow his life to be put in any more danger. Precisely because we are starved for time we must make the most of every passing second. "Daizaburou-san, please make haste. I wish this matter to be resolved immediately."

"Your Highness, allow me to tell you that she told me she would allow him to return to us only if he himself wanted to. Even if you are willing to present some documents, to act in such haste could backfire. And I believe we shouldn't-"

"Daizaburou-san?"

"Yes?"

"Do you remember who are you speaking about as of now?"

"Eh? But of course, 1st Lt Shirogane is one of our most valued fellows. As a distinguished trainee and pilot he-"

"Are you dodging the issue, General ?"

"N-No, I am at a loss on what you're asking, milady."

Nibbling my lips for a moment, gazing at Raiko-san for another, I place a hand on the base of my neck, a finger delving into the triangle as I inhale. "Then, allow me to remind you. Shirogane is not his true surname, General. Takeru Koubuin is my trusted right hand, my irreplaceable shadow, and I aim to have his rightful title restored to him upon his return to my side."

"His rightful… Yuuhi-sama, are you…" Mana's voice fades to dark in the comms, subtle noises indicate the sentences would be stuck on her throat.

"To have him return under your surname… that's…" Maya gapes, eyes wide and unblinking.

"It is quite drastic and daring, yes," Tsuhi nods, not showing any emotion in her features, as clear as they sky is today.

"… Are you being serious, milady?" Raiko-san asks, in equal befuddlement to Maya as she runs a hand over her hair.

"Why, is any of you inconvenienced by my desire to honor the vows I exchanged with my fiancee before those accursed bombs took him from me?" I ask with a tilt of my head, smiling as I interlock my fingers yet squint my eyes.

Tsuhi shakes her head with the habitual apathy, yet places a hand on her shoulder and smiles, then gives me a nod.

Grandma covers her mouth with a hand, bowing down my way without delay.

Maya's hands wring for a moment, dampness surfacing within her eyelids, before she hastily shakes her head and bows, remaining in position.

Raiko-san, however, holds my gaze. In silence, with a neutral expression and relaxed features. Upon a moment of clashing, she swiftly bows down to me without altering her facade.

"So General, do take the communicator to the Vice Commander. Time is of essence."

"E-Even so, given his current mental condition, to further debate with Kouzuki could-"

"Takeru will be coming back to me. That's final. And there is no better place for him to recover than his own house, by my side. We all are in agreement on that regard, I'm certain. So please, let us not waste any more time. If at all possible, I would like to… have a talk with the man, just to be certain. And if he is indeed Takeru… then he belongs to me," just as I am wholly his.

"Yes, milady. By your will," he says, heaving a sigh.

---

Same Day. A few minutes before .

(Infirmary, B5F .)

[Yuuko]

---

"So, they then admitted you were part of their fellowship," I say, nodding once then ruffling my hair. "For a second I thought they weren't going to stop insisting on having you leave with them, but for the moment I think everything is going according to plan."

He blinks, and again. Remaining silent, merely looking at me.

"And," I add, now grasping my chin, "they also bought the fake report I had cooked up. Your trails are also covered, so your identity is all but solidified in their minds."

… Still nothing, merely looking, merely staring.

Hiding both hands on my pockets, taking a step forward, "They did refuse to tell me anything of your military training, but I believe they truly are concerned over your health. Yashiro couldn't feel any surface-level thoughts, so whatever was on their minds was something truly personal for them. Don't worry, I'm certain you'll be able to stay here now. It's all a matter of-"

"Why?"

"Eh?"

His brows slowly descend, not into a frown as his tone led me to believe. But into a pained grimacing. "Why didn't you tell me anything? Why did you drug me?"

"I… had to do it in this way, for maximum effect. You had to be in the dark, so that you could shine brighter. I was not expecting the sedatives to have such a side effect on you, I admit. I… apologize for that." I give him a small nod, his expression doesn't move one bit, nor does his cracking stare from mine. "Ahem… So, how are you feeling?"

"Cough… As if I had jumped out of a plane in the middle of a typhoon with the parachute tied to my dick," he whispers amidst his groans, Yashiro takes a step back and hides behind me.

"Well, you did crash your Gekishin into the ground… In any case, do you recall anything from the outburst? What caused you to go berserk?"

Again, he grimaces. "So you don't even remember, huh?" A weak chuckle as he hangs his head, followed by light coughing.

"I… what?"

"I told you before, right? I have lots of bad… memories, and I lost it during the XM3's test last loop when given the drugs. I… I don't mix well with hypnotherapy, or at least with combat hypnosis."

Now that he brings it up… Shit, he did mention that once. Still, the tests he took, and all his data as well, point to the medicine being effective in him, there should be no side effects.

No, a moment… Oh, fuck. Of course, the leaking. It's not a biological reaction, it's a psychological one. Shirogane's conscious mind, his will to power through the adversity is what keeps him steady most of the time. Remove that, weaken his conscious efforts to remain strong…

… and all that's left is the entanglement of guilt and trauma buried in his subconscious mind. Not to mention, the sharing of data between timelines could cause him to vividly recall certain memories with the appropriate catalyst. I didn't expect the sedatives to have such strong an effect on him, Shirogane was fine this morning after all. Sigh… I should have been more careful with-

No, if I had rested well as he insisted I do, this wouldn't have happened, I would have thought of this possibility. And now, he is the one shouldering the recoil.

"Sorry, it slipped my mind."

"… I see."

"In any case, not all news are bad. I believe my plan is going well, if nothing out of the ordinary happens your identity will be cleared shortly."

"I told you I don't want to be near the guards," he then looks at me again, frowning. "And you didn't listen, looks like."

"You need to face this, Shirogane. Didn't you hear? Little you was not abandoned or anything, what you're feeling is the dread of… Shura's Dance latter moments, I believe. The assimilation always starts from the heaviest, character-defining data, let me remind you."

"… For real?"

"Of course, who do you think you're talking to?"

"The person who lied to me, again."

"I… Look Shirogane, we had to do this in this way," I say, placing a hand on his shoulder. His… completely sagged and stiff shoulder. "Now, instead of being on the offensive asking questions and raising fingers, the guards are bowing down in apology, answering every inquiry I raise. Don't you see? It hurt you much, I won't deny that, but now we have a proper shield around you. And if you… insist on taking your time on the decision, we have an excuse to buy us some days."

"… Really?"

"What's with that side glance?"

"You wouldn't be deceiving me again now?"

"Wha- Why would I? You're my ally, Shirogane. I did this to give us the upper hand, you'd understand."

"… You didn't trust in me, you drugged me, and keep pushing towards plans you know I don't agree with."

Inhaling sharply, leveling a stare into him, I lean forward, beginning to frown. "Then, tell me, cadet Shirogane. How do you propose we shield you from the guards?"

"We already had enough, they had no motives to come at me. Now, though? After I attacked them like that…"

"They know it was-"

"It's not just them. What will the rest think? I tried so hard… to prove I'm not some psychotic bastard…"

"Once you receive their blessing, it's all the same, right? Or, perhaps, did you see something during your outrage?"

"I…"

"Yes?"

"… I don't know," he barely whispers, slumping back onto the bed. Yashiro peeks from behind me, going up to Shirogane and petting his head.

"What do you mean? Why are you reacting in this way if you don't remember?" I mean, considering the amount of G-Radiation that showed on the monitors, and the, ahem, odd damage in the cockpit, everything points to you regaining some memories.

"I think," he starts, slow, closing his eyes, "that I saw something really sad. Something… someone…" As if trying to make a circle with his hands, as if grasping at sand, his fingers slowly try to close.

Yet, he sighs and apathetically lowers his hands to the sheets, "I don't know, but it felt awful."

"Well, you just take it easy for now." He does look exhausted, mentally more than physically to be honest. "I'll fill some paperwork so that you can take tomorrow off too, if you need it. Anyways, your efforts weren't fruitless today, Shirogane. Not only they revealed that little you wasn't thrown away, but also admitted you were a Royal Guard and-"

"I'm not a Royal Guard!" A sudden shout, eyes wide open, gritting his teeth he tries to rise, but ended up back on the pillow with a more intense pained face as he flops down. Yashiro glares at me, while petting his head again.

"Sorry, I shouldn't have said that." It seems he was right, trying to make him inherit all those memories so fast did a nasty number on him. "You just rest for now. I'll try to find a way to slow down the assimilation so that you can inherit everything more-"

"No."

"Excuse me?"

"I don't want to gain any more memories of him. This…" he sighs, clutching his forehead, "was my limit, Yuuko."

"Then, what do we do with Her Highness? Do you believe for a single second that she'll simply let this slide?"

"I can't be him, Yuuko. Please… What else do you want me to do to have you listen to me?" He then looks up at me, holding my gaze, gripping the sheets.

"Your safety needs to be assured, you'd understand." I am not letting them take you from here, nor will I allow them to reiterate their hostilities towards you. "And for that, you need to play your part. I understand that you're pained, shocked at the darkest memories of those days. However, that is not all that you lived through on those days. You yourself said it before, that there must have been something pushing you onward despite all the tragedy."

"But… But…"

"And to back down now? When we finally have the guards on the back foot? Can't you see this is our chance not only to ascertain your safety for the future, but to integrate your self in this world as well?" He says nothing, starting to subtly shake. "Shirogane, do you truly think Her Highness to be the source of the dread you're-"

"And what if I can't take it?"

"Huh?"

"What if I snap?" Again, he clutches his forehead, stuttering. "What if… next time, I really hurt someone?"

"Why would you do something like that? I am not going to force any more sedatives on-"

"And what if a mere memory causes that? I don't know what it was clearly, but…" inhaling slowly, he lifts his face, back to the usual business and serious expression he endows at times, "as I told you before, when I hate something, there's no turning back from that. And-"

"You don't think you can control yourself, in the worst case scenario?"

"… Yeah. I mean, you saw how I was at the end of Iceberg. I couldn't stop this, whatever the hell it was, from screwing me over. I dunno if I'll keep it together next time. At this point," he throws himself to the pillow, sighing heavily, "it might even be better to send me back home."

"Don't say that, Takeru-san!"

"I'm being serious. If there's no dissuading the guards, and these memories can make me lose it, I can't risk absorbing them. As things stand, my presence here is harming the proje-"

"Excuse me, what did you just say?"

"Eh?" He blinks, breaking eye contact as he raises a hand to his hair. "I mean, ain't it for the best, that I leave before shit gets worse? If you send me back, then people will forget I was even here to begin with. The guards won't have a reason to antagonize you, and you already have so much more than last loop. I don't think you need me here, I wasn't of much help in Kashgar anyways."

" The one who decides your worth is me, Shirogane."

"But I-I don't know if I can take-"

" Everything will be fine, so long as you follow my orders. I was tired, as you pointed out yesterday, so I share part of the blame for this. Yet, this accident served a good purpose, to force the guards to bow down. So long as everything remains under control, and you don't get negative, there's no need to fear any knockback from the memory inheritance. Or, what? Do you not trust in me? Do you truly want to leave? "

"That's not it but… I dunno how to describe it well," he says, pursing his lips, caressing his arms as if it were cold. "It was different than when I snapped during the trials last loop, or when I get in the machine, or when Kasumi helps me remember. There was something, like, there." He gestures upwards, clawing at the ceiling. "It hurt, so fucking much, to feel it, like, disappear from my grasp. And if you don't tell me ahead of time what you're going to do, I… can't bring myself to trust in you, Yuuko. Because I might ruin this for both of us, and Sumika, if I have another attack. If you don't even let me trust in you, if I'm so much of a bother… just let me go, and all these inquiries will vanish with me."

…

What on earth did he see? I expected more anger, perhaps some shouts, maybe some more strong reactions like he had yesterday. Yet, he's so… deflated. Saddened, but not overly crushed. Lips relaxed, not closed yet not open either, his breathing remains slow. But his eyes are still elsewhere. No, Shirogane is understandably exhausted. Such an absorption of G-Radiation was bound to leave its mark. And this is my miss, for not being at the top of my game to ensure he wouldn't suffer such a recoil.

"Shirogane?"

"What?" Another whisper, without even moving his head.

"If you truly want to leave this world, I will respect your wish. But, I do need you to tune the 00 Unit beforehand."

"I know, I ain't going to abandon you, Yuuko. You… can count on me for that." Trying to sit up, tension comes to his features as his arms shake in effort. "Sigh… I'll do what I have to, you can be sure of that. Just… I don't promise you anything about the guards."

"That is fine by me. However," I step forward, leaning closer, closer, until I see my reflection in his eyes, until he has to move backwards, "while I am your ally, there are certain things I require of you, Shirogane. And you returning to your world might not be a possibility we have available, as you once told me. So, if you are to stay here, I want you to face whatever may come our way head on."

"But-"

"No," lifting a finger, I seal his lips, "no doubts. There is no hesitation to be had. You once told me you wanted me to treat you as an equal, right?" He nods, finally holding my gaze. " Then, if you want me to include you in my plans, face this issue and solve it, show me you can back up your words about wanting to lead this world to a better future than this Ouka mission you spoke of before . Prove me you're enough to stand by my side Shirogane, and there will be no more secrets between you and me. Do we have a deal?"

"And you're not tripping me, are you?"

"I need you, Shirogane. For the 00 Unit, for the battles that will come. The fact that you're awake, only a few hours after the breakdown you suffered, tells enough." I move back, restoring his personal space, then fold my arms. "So, if you show results and we can ascertain no more issues are left in your identity, you'll be my right hand in what matters you can tackle. Does that sound good to you?"

"Sigh… Yeah, it does."

"Of course, we may not have much time left. Yet, the choice is in your hands. For the moment, you simply rest, okay? And if you want anything to eat, give me a call and I'll have it delivered immediately."

"Don't worry, I can take some exhaustion. I just… want some silence."

… Why? What's this lack of… everything in him? There's no anger at me, despite what he could have seen of Shura's Dance. There's not even anger at the guards, either. He's… cracked, saddened, disgruntled. Desolated. What on earth did he see that had this effect on him? I suppose, it is not odd that he found himself crushed before when living through this as a Royal Guard, if my hunch on who he was is right, but for it to have such an impact on his current self.

… Nothing I can do for him, expect for giving him his space.

"Well, if you need anything, you know my office's number," I nod, turning around and going to the door.

A moment to stretch my arms upwards, another to sigh, I go towards my office with Yashiro following behind.

Let's check my PDA, I have… Wow. Double digits, really Marimo? If I don't pick up one, why couldn't you stop calling? Well, little to be done. Mad might be the Dog now, but she's the least of my concerns for the moment.

I was hoping to speak with Shirogane about this, but the guards did clearly say he was inducted at age twelve. Yet, Shirogane's father died when he was ten. What happened in those two years? Testings, trials in his education? And they said nothing of his relation with the Shogun, or about how he had his own squad, the Swordbreakers, who I believe were our old and ruthless allies during 1999, or about why that little blade had its hilt colored blue. This only confirms my suspicions, he was someone very important. Very, very close to them, in fact. I'm certain Her Purpleness won't be able to remain still, it won't take long for them to reach out to us, wanting to disclose his identity. Even if it isn't the full picture, unless she truly was cross with Shirogane, or the feelings have dulled and she'll forsake him to not impair her political duties, in which case I win anyways, Her Highness will request me to transfer Shirogane to them.

And by saying he is the one with the last say in the matter, she will definitely want to speak with him herself. And then, hearing her will let Shirogane regain any positive memories about her, I'm sure. While the possibility of it backfiring was possible, this accident removed it out of the board. He is tired, but Shirogane is still as resolute as always despite the sadness. But if he didn't grow angered, then interacting with Her Highness, when she would be filled with worry for his safety, will allow him to finally regain some good memories of their time together. And with that, he'll regain his usual cheer and won't be as doubtful towards the IRG anymore. Plus, he swore he'd stay, so I don't have to worry about him actually leaving to Her Purpleness' side.

That being said… I wonder what did he see. No, the question here is, why did he see a traumatic memory at that time? Why did he saw something like that when fighting against 1st Lt Tsukuyomi? Did she say something that triggered it? It is a concern, if Her Highness employs the same words he could, perhaps, have another- No, no, he has no drug residue left in him. It was that concoction what caused the accident, if Shirogane could will the memories at any given time we wouldn't be in this predicament anyways.

I wish I could do more to help him, but resting is all he should be doing right now. If what he saw is enough to do this to him, despite all he had to go through on his previous experiences, I cannot push him further. I have to find a way to aid Shirogane's mind, and fast at that. If he cannot bring himself to halt his own negative thoughts, he might-

Beep! Beep!

Pulling out my comms, I quickly press the switch, "Hello?"

"Yuuko, is now alright?"

"Oh, Motoko-nee. Yeah, I'm going to the elevator now. Are you in the office?"

"Outside of it, since you always lock the damn door," she says, chuckling.

"Serves you right for entering without permission and filling it with that damn smoke. So, what is it?"

"I have the report with me," speaking slowly, she sobers up, "there was a giant downwards spike in the radiation. It was localized, though. It only happened in the training field."

"… As I thought."

She sighs, short and heavy. "I don't want to assume anything but, do you think the Shirogane boy was affected by this spike, somehow? The state of the cockpit you showed me would indicate that, I believe."

"I think he caused it."

"Huh?" And she doesn't reply for a moment, long enough to let me reach the end of the hallway and call the elevator, despite pacing calmly along Yashiro. "Yuuko, are you being serious? The boy is the source of the downwards spikes of G-Radiation?"

"So I said."

"But… Just… How? How could it be?"

"I'll fill you in later, I might need your help with something." Motoko-nee is probably the only person who could understand what's going on with Shirogane's psyche, how the G-Radiation is affecting him, and whether or not it's safe to use more sedatives on him from now on.

"Fine, I'll save the questions for later. Guess this means you'll finally introduce me to Shirogane, huh?"

"Don't get your hopes up. This is a serious matter and- Hey, was that a lighter I heard?" She chuckles, I can only groan back.

"Come on, now. You made me drop the one I was smoking before," she takes a small pause, I hear the puff of smoke she releases, and part of that awful, sickening smell comes back to my nose and the back of my teeth. "Well, don't worry, Yuu-chan. I don't know what's going on here, but you can count on me. I can't wait to finally speak with the famous guy after so long, though. Why did Mitsuko get to be introduced first? You can't play favorites, Yuu-chan," she keeps on chuckling, voice light and relaxed as always.

"Shut up. It's how things turned out. And anyways, you already talked with Shirogane yesterday, right?" Or on today's first hours, to be precise. As much as I thank him letting me rest, Motoko-nee is not going to let me live this down, how he picked up the phone on my office as if he were an assistant. Bet that's why she's so joking today.

"Huh? No, I never talked with Shirogane before. Are you still half-asleep? Do you need more rest, Yuu-chan?"

"Ugh, shut it! And stop playing dumb, I'm in no mood for-"

"P-Professor," Yashiro pulls my arm, voice alarmed.

Looking back, Pyatkh was guiding General Daizaburou to my presence. She gives me a small bow in apology when our sights cross. Sigh… Little to be done. Brushing my hair then folding my arms, I step forward as Yashiro hides again behind me.

"General, is something the matter?"

"XO, I am here to continue the talks we had before, regarding the cadet's situation."

"I believe I had already made myself clear enough. And if you're requesting permission to see him now, I must-"

"A moment, please," he says, raising a hand. A hand that has a small communicator in it, the Imperial model. "I am not who shall speak with you. I insist."

…

No… No way. This fast? Shirogane isn't well enough yet. But if I refuse, it's two steps back in our plans. Do I go through with this? The second I pick up this communicator… It's Her Highness, I'm sure of it. Even if she is convinced when speaking with him, if she says something that works as a catalyst…

No, think. Normally, I wouldn't be able to refuse a petition from Her Highness. There's nothing I can do. But Shirogane? That's another matter entirely. If he refuses, or if he hesitates and becomes weakened, then I'll be able to negotiate for more time. And Yashiro is now here, and I know he isn't high on any emotion. He should have exhausted his causal pull as the Nucleus with the recovery in the Gekishin. The risks are never zero, but refusing this will place both of us in quite the compromising position. I'll have to trust in Shirogane to handle this well. W ell, he did seem resolute enough to stay, to be my equal. Refusing has me becoming the enemy in their eyes, in Her Highness' eyes no less.

… Be brave for me one last time today, Shirogane.

"So, who I have the pleasure to be speaking with?"

"Good afternoon, Professor Kouzuki." A silky, but piercing, voice met me from the other side of the line. Just as I expected. "I believe we haven't had the chance to share a word with each other in private yet? I am the current Shogun, Yuuhi Koubuin."

"… I see. And to what do I owe this honor, Your Highness?" But really, who are you supposed to be to have her call in such hurry? Well, considering what he told me of his relation with Mitsurugi…

"I suppose you must already know," she begins, slow and delicate as petals, yet firm and ailing as thorns. "I would be wishing you to speak to this supposed Takeru Shirogane you have on your base. And in the case he is indeed who I believe he is, I will be asking you to authorize his future transfer back to the Royal Guard."

Not even masking her intentions, huh. Short and to the point, and the habitual delicacy she has in most meetings is hiding quite the armory behind the veil.

"… You'll have to forgive me, Your Highness. Cadet Shirogane is exhausted after today's accident, and as I said before to your subordinates, I will only transfer him to the IRG if he wishes to. Furthermore, as his current legal guardian, I would be wishing to receive the formal documentation that proves Shirogane is related to the fellowship of 1st Lt Tsukuyomi, as she claimed."

"Oh, is that so? Worry not, I am planning on sending the proper documents to you, once I confirmed myself the identity of the cadet.

So again I ask, could you kindly allow me to speak with Shirogane?"

"Still… As I said, the cadet is exhausted after the accident he suffered. I hope you are aware of what this means. Even if it's you, I expect you not to bring harm to the cadet with your inquiries. He already has received enough hostility from the nobility, you'd understand."

"Who does she think she-" A momentary yell reaches my ears from the comms, a voice I believe I recognize. Shortly after, the debating ceases.

"Ahem," and the silk seems to be burning as of now, "I have been made aware of the debates that have transpired regarding the cadet's situation, Professor Kouzuki." Also, insisting on that instead of the rank. Showing she doesn't want to clash with the UN, maybe? "Which is why I desire to speak with the cadet myself, as this issue with his profiles is of grave importance. As you should know, 1st Lt Tsukuyomi is also part of my fellowship. So-"

"So Shirogane is also your responsibility, I understand Your Highness. Yet, I'd be foolish of me not to warn you. He was very tired, and not in a particular good mood, either. If you must know, he even talked back to me when we platicated."

"Oh, truly? Is he dissatisfied with the situation?"

Hmm. Quite a change in tone, Your Purpleness. "No, not entirely. He is taking this very hard on himself, however. Which is why I must ask you to be careful, to mind your words. I frankly would like to solve this matter as quickly as possible, but I cannot disregard Shirogane's concerns. So, if you'd allow, I would ask you to tell me if you truly have nothing against the cadet. I won't delve into the Shogunate's affair, but if there is ill blood towards Shirogane and you wish him gone-"

"There is no such thing, Professor," she says, once more dry and firm. "I wouldn't be taking this issue into mine own hands otherwise.

We wish Shirogane no harm, on the contrary… all I desire is to bestow upon him the fair reward we denied him at the end of Lucifer. Of course, the UN, and you more than anything, shall be rewarded for safeguarding my vassal until today. I had believed we had a rather amicable relationship with Yokohama, after all. Thus, I know I am imposing, asking this of you behind curtains, yet would you allow me to speak with cadet Shirogane?"

"… Alright, I'll allow it. However, please note that he isn't emotionally stable at the moment, so Shirogane might scream or curse at you. You will have to mind your words, and please refrain from referencing his past if you would be so kind. He'll certainly react negatively if you try and insist to have him return immediately to the Royal Guard, so I advise you do not purse that line. Would that be agreeable to you, Your Highness?"

"Yes, of course. Thank you kindly for your understanding, Professor," and finally, back to the soft as silk tone. Deep and true, as much as the sigh she releases away from the comms, even if I still hear it well enough.

"No, it is nothing. I am merely doing my part, to safeguard my protegee. Now, please do wait a moment, Your Highness. I shall go back to the infirmary immediately."

Inflection Point - Waking the Dragon

" Curiosity is not a sin, but you should be careful with it. Sometimes, the answers that you seek are not those you would like to hear."

Mana Tsukuyomi.

---

Chapter 73:

Inflection Point - Waking the Dragon

---

Just a few moments later.

(Infirmary.)

[Takeru]

---

"Cadet Shirogane, someone wishes to speak with you," the XO says while handing me a communicator, a different model than ours, with a completely frozen tone, and an even more freezing stare.

"… Who is it?"

"Someone very, very important. So do keep your manners, if you wouldn't mind."

… And what about my resting time? I just told you I can't take this shit anymore, I can't even move my legs well for fuck's sake. All things considered, if it's not a visit in person from the guards then-

Yuuhi.

Is Yuuko cutting me off to safeguard the project? No, if she were doing that, there would be no call or anything, I'd be dead already.

But she might be washing her hands off this whole business, letting Yuuhi draw her own conclusions. If I deceive her, the XO will still find me useful. If I fuck this up, she'll throw me away.

… And it ain't as if I could refuse. Makes me wanna punch something, makes me wanna puke, but Yuuko's just doing what she has to. It's either this, or maybe risking the coup to happen if Yuuhi gets cross with her.

Inhaling deep, I end up coughing a bit. Rubbing my throat as I look up, into her violet eyes, there is no hint of anything. Perfect poker face, she isn't even looking into my eyes. Not a single movement betrays her posture, her composure, and I can practically hear the bustling of fire and sparks that lay in her eyes. The XO's in business mode, and that spells bad news for me. I knew this day could come…

… but it still hurts to see her like this again. Guess that's I'll ever be for her in the end, just another pawn. Don't even deserve some forewarning, she wasn't even telling the truth a fucking minute ago. But, it ain't as if I can't see her angle. I can't receive a call from Yuuhi if I'm nervous or angry, so she was doing damage control. And her words then, about us being equals… She wasn't being serious, it was all to get me motivated for this. Heh, do you think I'm so easy to deceive, Yuuko? You wound me, after all I've told you of my past lives.

… Would be nice to be naive again, to truly believe she was hyping me up for the challenge that is this call from Yuuhi. Guess it's my fault, for even getting my hopes up in the first place.

Raising my hand, I take the small thing from her, nodding slowly. Yuuko, no, Vice Commander Kouzuki returns a subtle nod, turning away and hurriedly leaving the room. Not even a whisper, a thumbs up, a small smile, anything.

Sigh… Thanks for the vote of trust, XO.

I always knew something like this could happen, ever since the CCSE. And even if making me disappear erases the memories of my existence here, the other feelings may remain. And that, is what the XO must be concerned about. Would like to actually be able to snap at Yuuko here, maybe the anger would let me deceive Yuuhi a bit better. But there's only lag, heaviness in me.

And I can't, I won't let my weakness be used to screw Yuuko over. Sumika and Kasumi depend on her, and by extension the better half of the planet if we want to avoid the sea from swallowing Eurasia again. I can only hope my help thus far was enough to make her willing to lend my world a hand even if I fail here.

Lips shake as I bring the comms to my chin, tongue lashing back as if I had drank boiling water. While again feeling cold pokes all over me, another sigh leaves my lips as I rest against the pillow.

"… Hello?"

…

"… Salutations," a slow, silky voice says. "Am I speaking with cadet Takeru Shirogane at the moment?"

"Yes, that's me. Who… would you be?"

"Ahem… I am Yuuhi Koubuin, the current Shogun of the Empire. I am pleased to make your acquaintance, cadet Shirogane," she barely whispers, a monotone that reeks formality and bureaucracy in its docile and welcoming echo.

"N-No, the pleasure is mine, Yuu- cough Your Highness."

"Is… that so. Thank you kindly for receiving my call, cadet. It is most gracious of you, after what seems to have transpired."

"It's nothing, really. So, uh…"

"Yes?"

Fuck it, I'll just be frontal. "Why are you wanting to speak with me? I mean… The Shogun herself wanting to talk with a lowly cadet such as me, feels like I'm dreaming." Maybe that's the case and I'm still unconscious in my Gekishin.

… Yeah, right.

"You are no such thing," slowly, she so says. Even slower than Yuuko, even colder too. "A mere cadet may your rank indicate you are, yet it is no reason to denigrate yourself, Shirogane."

"Uh… Sorry?" This feels like when we spoke during the coup, it's the same imposing tone. Bet there's a bit of fire coming out of her eyes, too.

"There is no need for apologies. And, I do understand your concerns," going back to normal, she coughs. "For someone such as me to be calling in person, certainly you're perhaps dreading the worst. However, all I would request out of you are some minutes to platicate. Would that be agreeable to you?" Voice creaking, she whispers the question.

Get real Yuuhi, like I can actually refuse. Placing a hand on my chest, inhaling and becoming aware of my heartbeats, the coldness rests on my back. The dream of that graveyard, the voice that follows me there. For a sec, Yuuhi sounded like that just now. When she scolded me, denying I was a 'lowly cadet'. And yet, there's this quiet static on the back of my head.

… Am I scared? Are these his feelings? Or, are both of us scared? I mean, if I fuck this up, Yuuhi is going to… to what? The sadness doesn't pierce me as of now, those shaving ice daggers are nowhere to be found yet.

"… I suppose, yes." But I can't back down. And if she is against me, that clarification is more than enough. "What did you wish to talk about?"

"Well then," she says, sounding silky and welcoming again, "how are you faring as of now? I was told you… could have suffered some injuries during a combat exercise?" And again, her voice lowers, delaying the words a bit.

"I am feeling well, Your Highness. Thank you for sparing some worry for me."

"I see. That is good to hear," I think I hear her sighing in the distance, as if she had moved the comms away. After a sec of silence, Yuuhi coughs softly on the other side. "Now then, before anything else, I would like to ask you some questions regarding the blade you possessed."

"… Will a punishment befall me for having a Minaru Kamui on me illegally when I returned to the Empire?"

She laughs briefly, a drowned sound as if she had a hand covering her mouth. "No, that is not my intention. I believe my retainers had already expressed their words of thankfulness towards you for returning to me the Minaru Kamui."

"Then, what would you be liking to ask of me? I had believed to have disclosed all I knew of the sword already," I slowly say, trying to keep my manners in place.

Which seems to make Yuuhi groan softly for a moment, before she coughs. "Could you tell me how you obtained such a treasure?"

"I am not going to-"

"No, I am not asking for the identity of the previous holder of the blade. I am asking of how it came to be in your possession."

"… Why?" Can't help but to raise a brow at the question.

"You see, I believe you said someone at your old base bestowed the blade onto you, but no such person could have existed. I have a well kept record of who have this swords on them, and none of them were outside of the Empire during these years."

"Um… Was the blade a fake one then, Your Highness?"

"No, the Minaru Kamui you possessed was a true heirloom of this nation," she says, never faltering nor losing speed. "As such, I am curious, if you will, at how were you bequeathed with such a treasure. Regardless of your answer, no burdens shall fall on your shoulders, Shirogane."

The image of Maya-san giving me the blade comes back. My last talk with Meiya comes back. Her smiling face, how she sulked when I called Maya-san by her name. How shining she was in her final moments, how happy she was to see the power plant working… only to die a few seconds later. Running a hand on my neck, the air slowly fills me. Licking my lips, I cough now so that I don't stutter later. But if I lie, I think Yuuhi would see through it. If I'm honest…

"There was someone… who was like a teacher for me."

"Like a teacher?"

"Yes, you see, when I was… facing a hard time someone came to talk with me. I needed to get my mind off things, so I asked that person to train me to learn how to use a sword."

"Was she a comrade of yours?"

"No, she… she doesn't belong to the military." In that world, at the least.

"… She ?" Yuuhi suddenly changes her tone, dropping the welcoming silk and giving birth to blue embers flaring to life. "I know of the circumstances which surround the issues of this one Minaru Kamui, yet, would you truly not consider telling me who said woman was? Since, according to my records, none of my House's blue blades had left the Empire in recent years."

"It's just… Sigh…" I entwine my fingers together, sitting down on the bed and looking upwards. "She was someone really important to me. And… she isn't in this world, anyways. I brought the Minaru Kamui here and she wasn't planning on ever using its royal purpose. If a punishment must be executed, then I shall bear it."

Man… Now I'm sad all over again. Even if she is similar, I'll never see my Maya-sensei again. Even if I go back to my world, our relationship will be different. Sigh…

"That is not for you to decide, Shirogane," she said, immediately, emanating quite the sparks. "There is no reason for you to-"

"Please, Your Highness!" I bow by reflex, raising my voice a bit. "If someone has to pay for this offense, let me be the one to shoulder the burden."

I remain bowing, enduring the silence. Until she exhales, quite heavily.

"… Very well, I suppose I can grant you that wish," dousing back to her prior politeness, Yuuhi then coughs. "Allow me to tell you my worry was not because the blade was a real Minaru Kamui. Perhaps, I could have extended words of thankfulness towards that woman for safeguarding the sword, yet perhaps you're right and we should let this matter rest."

Yeah, no. She's super pissed off for some reason. Well, the Minaru Kamui is a symbol of nobility. She's only doing her job as the Head of her House, and if Meiya got so defensive it stands to reason Yuuhi would be even more protective of the affairs surrounding the blue blades.

…

Wait a sec. She must have a record of the people that have this kind of the blades. Yet the records say not a single sword left… but Yuuhi, Tsukuyomi-san and the General accepted the one I had as a 'real' one, despite it coming from my world…

How did the missing blade left their grasp? And, if they're not accusing me of stealing it, if they're not asking me if I know any of the previous owners, you know, like asking me if the last owner they have recorded is who gave me the sword or something…

Does it mean that 'Takeru Shirogane' was given a Minaru Kamui here? Like in my world?

"So, I suppose you won't file any claims at me over my possession of the blade?"

"… Well, that depends on your intentions. Did you ever plan to use the Minaru Kamui for its royal purpose?"

"Of course not, Your Highness. I was merely using it to train in my room sometimes, I did not know of its connection to the royalty. Once cadet Mitsurugi told me of it during the CCSE, I decided to hand it over, to prevent any misunderstandings from occurring. That is why I told 1st Lt. Tsukuyomi of it when we met after I returned from the CCSE. I truly had no idea it held such weight in the Empire, and I can only apologize to you for my folly."

And then, silence.

I can hear her breath in, I lick my lips and gulp nothingness.

She exhales softly, yet says nothing. And it makes a shiver run down my spine.

"I see, so that's what occurred," she finally says, composed and polite once more. "If you had no ill intent, I see no reason to punish you for this. You have already returned it to me, and that is what matters most."

Sigh… One bullet dodged.

"Thank you very much, Your Highness." I say, again bowing to her by reflex.

"No, I should be thanking you for your honesty," she says, in a sweet voice. "You could have tried to gain something through the sword, yet you remained composed upon finding such a treasure in your hands. It is an attitude worth praise, Shirogane."

"… Thank you kindly, Your Highness."

"Please, there is no need for you to be so stiff and formal. There is nothing to fear, I am merely wishing to speak with you, that is all."

"I see. So then, was there something else?" Of course there's something else. So, come on Yuuhi. Get your game on.

"Well, allow me to delve into the main topic. I know it might be unproper yet, do you recall what transpired during this accident?" Stalwart and firm like a rampart, clear and strong as sunlight in summer.

"To be honest, no. It's all just a blur."

"Is that so. Before anything else, allow me to clarify that the Royal Guard has no animosity towards you, cadet Shirogane. Your father was one of us, as I believe you already know, thus there was no ill will behind this turn of events," she says in a matter of fact way, as if she were rehearsing a script.

Polished poker, smooth and pleasant to the ears. And yet, there clearly is a raised shield in her wording, in her tone. Politely menacing, is what she sounds like. Reminds me a bit of my world's Meiya when she tried to argue her position in serious matters when we got together.

Without pause or waiting to take in air, Yuuhi continues in her serious monologue.

"1st Lt Tsukuyomi and her fellows were merely doing their work during the training exercise, driven by their duty as public servants, so allow me to extend their words of apology to you. And as the current Shogun, I can only hope you can bring yourself to spare some forgiveness towards them. All that has transpired since your return to the Empire seems to have been trying to you, and I sincerely hope you can one day see this nation as your home and the rest of us as your fellows again." Voice lowering, composure peeling off, Yuuhi takes a moment of silence. "My sincerest apologies, Shirogane. For it was mine own ineptitude and weakness which caused the databases to be missing your data, which in turn robbed you of your citizenship and identity."

"No, Your Highness, it's alright, really. You don't have to apologize, I understand."

And anyways, I can tell she is sorry for real on this matter since she sounds like little wood sticks thrown in a fire. Like she was when we spoke in the cockpit, lamenting the bloodshed, begging me to not decelerate. But still, so it was you who erased him, huh. Either that, or she's taking it all upon herself like Meiya tends to do all the time.

… But she sounds worried. Concerned, guilty. It's nothing like the perfect pond of composure she was during the coup, like the welcoming but still distant aura she irradiated back then. It's like she were reaching out, kind of, but were hesitating on how to tend a wound, whether to hurry or to first survey the skin with a faint touch. But why? I mean, after he felt so pained at the mere thought of her, after she turned her back on him like in those nightmares I saw.

"Shirogane?"

Hmm… These twisting feelings are pulling in the opposite direction. Like, her soft voice reminds me a lot of my Meiya. And it gives me a nice little tickle on my sides, as even during the coup merely being in Yuuhi's presence was enough for me to chill out. But at the same time, there's this shiver on my nape, the ice ants doing an imperial march on my back, running the Shirogane GP at full speed.

"Cadet Shirogane, are you listening?"

"Huh? O-Oh. My apologies, Your Highness!"

"Is something the matter?" Now her tone slows down, the sun setting in a hurry.

"No, I was just lost in thought. I tend to do that a lot. My apologies, I meant no disrespect, Your Highness," and again, I bow down out of reflex.

"I see. Worry not, I have taken no offense," she says, washing the premature sparks off the silk. "Ahem. Would you be feeling well enough for us to platicate of… what issues seem to plague your citizenship and profiles as of now?"

"I guess that's why you're calling in person, huh." Straight to the point, like a certain blue samurai I know and love.

"Yes, it might be. Yet, I was also… concerned over your health."

"Huh? Why?" Trying to lie? Think that'll work on me?

"It would be most regrettable, for you to have suffered injuries during a training. More so considering what I have been made aware of regarding your situation. By the by, were you told of what 1st Lt Tsukuyomi arranged with the XO after this accident?" She asks, slightly louder, a blade in warning, kind of.

"All the Vice Commander told me is they settled for not blaming me for whatever happened. And that the guards also apologized to my squadmates."

"Hmm," she doesn't sound particularly amused. "Then, if you would be feeling well, may I proceed to forward some queries your way?"

"Sigh… I don't mind, no." She won't let this go, she is Meiya's twin after all. "But first, I would like to ask you to clarify something. If you'd allow me," I add in a hurry, bowing my head by reflex.

"You may speak freely, Shirogane," Yuuhi says, without a single millisecond of delay.

"Then, let me cut to the point. Your Highness, are you suspecting me of having stolen someone else's identity?"

"Pardon?"… Oh shit, I angered her.

"I, uh, considering all that I know, and that, well, you of all people is speaking with me, maybe you had decided to follow on a claim of identity theft after my outburst towards 1st Lt Tsukuyomi. I… really cannot fault you for making such a choice," or Yuuko for not having shielded me this time. If Yuuhi's planning to erase me as he was, let's not waste time and get this-

"I am not considering anything of the sort," she affirms, almost yelling as I hear a faint slamming sound, wood crying a bit. "Were you not told that the guards present in Yokohama do not doubt your words? I was led to believe 1st Lt Tsukuyomi had even offered to aid you with your father's profile."

"So, if you don't doubt my identity… What do you want to ask of me?"

… How much I remember? How do I see you and the IRG? To pressure me until I go to the Capital? Clutching my chest, I inhale sharply. The small girl she once was held no malice towards little me. I don't think he hated Yuuhi, there is no anger towards her. But she did left him behind, and if I piece together the words of that nightmare and what I know of Shura's Dance, and that Yuuhi would have been appointed as the Shogun during the invasion since Chizuru confirmed that the prior one was still in function during the Defense of Kyoto, it would mean she abandoned him in Yokohama, in Hakuryo. That explains the disappointment, the heartache I've been feeling.

But it doesn't explain the harshness, the absolute zero of the words of the dream in the graveyard. She removed him from her fellowship, she threw me- him away. And while she could be feeling guilty at everything that happened afterwards… Why are my hands shaking? What's this cold sweat on my neck?

"Well, it is a simple matter, in all honesty," Yuuhi says, almost inaudible through the speaker, then coughs again and raises her voice, regains her poise. "You see, I called for you to clear these misunderstandings. As the Shogun, I will take it upon myself to mend the errors the databases have suffered. And it is only natural I would wish to repay you, for revealing this error to me. It is also my duty as the ruler to ensure you, one of my citizens, is not punished unfairly for this unfortunate situation you have been made to endure. Wouldn't you agree?"

"Then, what exactly do you want?"

"… Ahem. Simply put, I would like to avoid your issues from spiraling out of control. It would be quite troublesome, if a claim was forwarded against you. Not only for your career, but for the impact it could have on the media."

"… Right," I hadn't thought of that. More bad news, and an error in the databases could lead to a huge problem for the Empire. Could make Chizuru's dad image to take a nose dive, maybe incite a certain someone to take arms in his disappointment.

Or for the wrong people to 'offer their services' to fix the issue, when all they want is unrestricted access to classified documents.

"Thus, mending your profiles quickly and quietly is of utmost importance," Yuuhi says, composed and calm. Maybe she doesn't even care anymore? Yeah, maybe she just wants to focus on her political career. And wants to truly cut her ties with the jester she no longer needs. "Am I right to assume you desire to regain your Japanese citizenship, cadet Shirogane?"

"If I said yes, would you request me to visit the Capital?"

"I would welcome your cooperation, indeed. I shan't demand an immediate departure, yet it would be for the better if you could pay Tokyo a visit."

"However, I believe you should know the risks that has for me. I… I'm an outsider, people won't take kindly to me." Much less now that I went and attacked Tsukuyomi-san like that.

"That is only conjecture on your end, cadet. Not all of us would look at you in disdain for your origins," she says, sighing a bit. "Also, allow me to remind you," and again, fire under the silk, "you are Japanese, one of us. I can confirm to you that you are no exile nor traitor, this was nothing but a mistake, a mistake caused by my ineptitude."

"Still, who would put their trust in me now after this accident?"

"I believe you should have trustworthy comrades in the base?"

"Would they want to put their own reputation at risk by being tied to someone 'violent' like me? No, I don't want that for them. I… don't know if I have it in me to even face them, to be honest."

I can't really expect everyone to turn a blind eye and remain welcoming towards me. They only gave me a chance because they thought I was worth their trust. And I fucked it all up, no way they'll see me the same after this outrage towards Tsukuyomi-san. I always was a stranger here, anyways. And I don't want to bring trouble to Yuuko or my squadmates, it was bad enough when there were only a few whispers. Even if they find it in them to give me another chance, if that old distrust from before the CCSE doesn't return for whatever reason, do I really wanna let my presence ruin our trainings? All it takes is someone like the gray haired bastard or that red haired bitch to come looking for shit, to pin my bad rep on my squadmates too.

What if other soldiers also take it out on them like a few tried to do to me when Takamura lent me a hand? What if they also start being treated as American sympathizers or traitors when they welcome me back?

… I can't do that to them. I won't let my mistakes bring harm to my squadmates. Because I don't know if I can stop those feelings, those feelings he held during whatever it was I saw, that same hatred towards everything I had in the middle of Iceberg when left alone in the carnage against the unending BETA for who knows how long.

"I am grateful for your deference and kindness, Your Highness."

"Then, will you-"

"However, I believe it's for the best that I remain as a stranger here. I should shoulder the repercussions all on my own. Can't exactly push my burdens onto other people, after all." Maybe it really would be for the better to have Yuuko send me back ho-

"Utter no further balderdash!"

"E-Eh?"

"Outsider? You are nothing of the sort," she says, not decelerating nor cooling down at all. "Considering your father was once a vassal of my fellowship, there is no doubt you are a fellow Japanese. Shirogane, you're one of us and deserving of respect. Furthermore," slowing down, sounds like she's taking a deep breath, "whatever it was that caused this error was most assuredly not your fault. Was I clear enough?"

"Eh… A-Ah…" Head hurts, my fingers massage my ears but the light pain only grows.

Ugh… What is this? Eyelids start to twitch, a small dose of heat surging from my throat. The cold etches itself on my back, spreading forward.

" You said you wished to make me and Yuuhi smile, did you not?"

Kgh… Gasping, breathing with my mouth open, everything grows blurry, distorted for a second. Except for a face, a face that comes closer.

Is that… Meiya? No, the hair is different. But that sweet gaze looks just like hers. Familiar, for some reason. Feels like a good wind in summer, refreshing, calming, soothing.

… Smells like lavender, as if the wind were wrapping me all up in that perfume.

" So please rest assured, you are no burden, an I shan't send you away. To me you're someone important, Takeru."

Hiccuping, it's hard to breathe. Ears ring, a chime echoing and echoing. Quiet sunlight in my sight, despite me being underground. Warm lavender all over me, melting the cold.

" Of course. I'm truly elated to welcome Takeru as my brother."

… I could see it, for a second. Like a storm parting open in its eye, sunlight breaking through the cracks in the thunders. It all seeps in, the tender hold over his shoulder, how… large the embrace feels, how pleasant is the aroma of the perfume. It makes his heart leap, as all the ice thorns come off, as he embraces this older woman and gives her a kiss.

As he does the same to Yuuhi… declaring that he loves her after kissing her cheek as well.

And she replies back, returning the words, the embrace, the warmness all over him. The same warmness tickles my sides, heat finding my body as if I were taking in direct sunlight, relaxing like I would on a bathtub filled to the brim with pleasant water and some good salts too. Folded inwards like origami, a tight hold that she returns in kind.

"U-Ugh… Sniff… F-Fuck…" Fumbling about, dropping the comms, I find a tissue and clean my face.

Have to grab another, and another. Can't close my mouth, gotta keep gasping as my eyes just water. It ain't enough to release tears, but everything is blurry. Like a dart to the heart, but of the good kind. Like all the times my feelings were returned, when I spent time with my beloved. Feeling like walking on air, growing wings through the ice, cracking it all away to take flight. Heat surging in my gut, to face anything and everything that might come. Happiness, 'nuff said.

I see… That's why you were so hurt later.

So they actually protected little me? Yes, I think… Cough. Someone talked shit about him, and Yuuhi stood up for him. Or at least, the now distant echoes seem to indicate that. And then, that woman who looks like Meiya… welcomed him into their…

"… Family, huh."

So that's why he kept on fighting. That's why I can link with your memories so easily, because our feelings resonate, because we both miss those dear people we lost to time. I guess you and me truly are more similar than I thought.

"… Shirogane? Shirogane, are you there? Can you hear me?!"

Hm? Ah, right. I was… talking with Yuuhi. An older sister, huh. Maybe that's why they gave him a Minaru Kamui? As proof he was someone dear to Yuuhi? But… Is that still the case? Lifting the comms, a small whisper comes through. Hushed yet rushed words, before she calls out again. Who are you as of now? Are you trying to reach out like you did in this memory I just saw? Do you really care?

… It's completely stupid, to believe she's being serious. It's been two years, and after he became part of the Swordbreakers and fell to that anger. Then, why is there a small pain in my heart with every question she asks, calling for me as I keep staring at the comms?

Despite her faults, despite what she had to do, did you manage to understand and separate the duty from the person? Maybe… just like I do with Yuuko and the Vice Commander. Sigh, all that's left is for Yuuhi to also refuse to eat and sleep properly and we got bingo.

Still, now I'm sure of it. You kept fighting on because you wanted to protect… your sister, that precious friend, while still not agreeing with everything Her Highness had to do. I see, that explains the heartache I've been feeling whenever thinking about Yuuhi, and why I can't muster the same wholehearted dejection and anger towards her as I do when thinking on the IRG.

…

No, it's not like that, is it? Pursing my lips, hearing the voice that still calls out, this shiver on my sides, the palpitations that rise… You loved Yuuhi, didn't you? Just like me and Meiya, you and Yuuhi were close and dear to one another. And it looks like they… were living together, as we did since she moved in that October 22nd. Yeah, that's why he was so crushed. Yuuhi leaves him and then Shura's Dance happens. And despite that, running a hand from my neck to my chest, there's some disquiet in my breathing as the cold hands poke me a bit. You still loved her, even after that.

Rubbing my eyes and nose, I cough a bit, clearing my throat, hearing Yuuhi grow silent again. "… Forgive me, Yuu- Your Highness. I needed some time, my coughing got the better of me."

"Oh," stiff, her voice seems to halt then stutter. She then coughs yet again. "What would be the matter? Would you be feeling alright, Shirogane? Perhaps, would you prefer… to speak at another time?"

"No, it's alright. I merely had trouble breathing for a second, I haven't had anything to drink in a while so talking so much is… hard."

"Are you certain?" Yuuhi asks, slowly, holding her breath.

"Yes, thanks for worrying. I'm fine now, you may… ask away."

"Truly? I am not inconveniencing you?"

"No, I'm feeling fine, for real."

Sigh… I can't even be mad or doubt her anymore. Sure, she might have made some mistakes, but we all do. Even if all she wants is to cut her ties with 'Takeru' and prevent how a commoner was once her brother from bringing her setbacks in her current duties, there's no reason to hate her. So long as you don't want to bring me or Yuuko any problems…

"You may ask anything you desire, and I shall try to answer to the best of my abilities, Your Highness."

She sighs, heavily. "Thank you kindly, Shirogane," she says, oh, so sweetly. Yuuhi then seems to catch herself, coughing once more. "So then, would you truly not reconsider regaining your citizenship?"

Licking my lips, feeling a shiver down my back, the smell of lavender and those hands cloaking over me, I sigh as I scratch my head. Feeling my heart on the base of my neck, I look up. Let's roll that damn dice.

"If I wanted to, would you say it is feasible to do without bringing unwanted attention or setbacks to the Vice Commander?"

"… No, no such thing would come to pass. As I said, I am wishing to solve this matter swiftly and quietly. And if you so desire," she leaves the silence hanging for a second, "then I shall ensure no claims ever fall upon the XO," Yuuhi affirms, louder, and blazing a tiny bit.

"I see. Then, I guess I can consider it. What would you need to ask of me, Your Highness?"

"I will need to inquire about some personal matters of yours. Some may take us to… delicate subjects of your past. Would that be alright with you?"

"Yes, it's fine."

Seeming to inhale sharply, leaving silence again lingering for a second, Yuuhi then coughs softly. "Well then…"

She then proceeds to ask me if I remembered my parent's names and where was I living. Piecing parts of the dreams together, I told her what I recalled and she hummed as I talked. As well as all the fabricated report Yuuko crafted should contain, how I was found unconscious and gravely harmed and that the Empire refused to treat me. How UN personnel took it upon themselves to provide me with medical treatment when they found me. And how, since I couldn't find anyone related to me, I was given an offer to enlist in the UN Army in Alaska.

"-and I know Mom died due to some heart disease," even if she never was sick back home for whatever reason. "After that, I… think I spent some time in a neighbor's house while Dad was away." And I better shut up about Sumika, before I talk too much.

"Yes, that does align with what records we have left," Yuuhi says, now sounding a bit more, uh, normal, I guess. "Now then, I assume you not yet remember what was of you after your father's passing?"

"… No, I do not. And I believe it would be for the-"

"Yes, I was told of your opinion on the matter," she immediately counters, solemn and striking. "However, since I aim to not have you facing any claims, the sooner we confirm your memories align with our records, the sooner this issue will be solved. Do you not agree?"

… She's more overwhelming than Meiya, that's for sure.

"Well, I suppose. So, you… know of who took me in after my father passed away?"

"Perhaps. I would have to delve in certain archives beforehand, if you give me your agreement. Then, once you pay the Capital a visit, we can solve this regretful error in the data banks," she then stops, coughing. "Did the XO not mention anything else regarding this matter?"

"No, she hasn't."

"Hmm, is that so," and again, fire, so quiet yet burning. "Now then, there is something I would wish to ask of you."

"Yes?"

"Before your father's passing, you still were living in the Hiiragi district, as far as the leftover data in the profiles would indicate."

"Well, yes, I suppose that's right."

"However, your father continued to serve in the IRG until his passing," she says, waiting a second before continuing, maybe giving me time to react. "So that would mean someone had to tend to you while he was away, ever since your mother passed away."

"Yes, that… makes sense, yes." So that's your angle of attack now, huh. "But that is my problem, since no records were left you shouldn't worry about it, Your Highness. Thank you very much for your time and the kindness you have showed me." So let's try and have this end here, to see how she-

"Nonsense," she hurries, slashing my words in half faster and harder than Meiya did to me during combat practice in my first loops. And again, I can feel many small embers rise in her voice, as if she herself were about to blaze up. "There is no need for you to thank me, I am only acting on what is expected of me as your ruler. However, to learn of who safeguarded you during that time would be paramount to restore your profiles, wouldn't you agree?"

"Of course. But as I said before, I think I stayed with a neigh-"

"We checked the databases, regarding who your acquaintances could be in your neighborhood," fast counter, raising voice. "It would seem Kageyuki Shirogane had an amicable relationship with the neighbor next to your house, Haruna Kagami was her name I believe, yet there are no records that would indicate she ever took care of you, nor was she hired to look after you."

… It's like walking into a field of mines, except the mines have heat-seeking abilities. Like, what? Does she have a babel tower of papers like Yuuko does at the ready to throw folders and explanations at every turn I take? Yet, if she wanted to erase me, would she go to such lengths? No, focus. The issue at hand here is seeing how much I know of his life. While I… can't deny she might be worried, concerned, she is the Shogun. The chance that she could be considering taking me off the board if I know too much is there.

But if, and that's a big if, she still cares about… him, then she should react negatively if I press on that direction. If she snaps like Meiya sometimes does, she still sees him as family and I can grow to trust in her words. If she gets as cold as I hear her voice in my nightmares, then it'll be proof she means danger for me. Plus, maybe voicing my worries will let me chill out, maybe we could, I dunno, reach some understanding? And, if they were brother and sister, if they lived together just as me and Meiya did, then Yuuhi should know I get really stubborn when something gets in my head.

So, let's roll that dice and start asking the questions here.

"Excuse me, Your Highness, but such an arrangement must have left some papers behind, right? I mean, there has to be some sort of leftover data somewhere of a contract, of someone looking after me."

"Well, as you should have read in the papers," she starts, slow and composed, yet retaining some edge, "your father, Kageyuki Shirogane, was a member of the Royal Guard under my fellowship." She takes another brief moment of silence, before continuing. "Thus, part of his duties, schedules, reports and earnings are in charge of my own vassals. As such, after checking the databases, my subordinates found that not only does the house you lived in still remains to your name, as I believe you were aware of already, but part of your father's reports and expenses seem to indicate he had employed someone to properly tend to you while he was on duty."

"How can you be sure of that?"

"Well, it's a trivial thing, to be honest," she then softly sighs. "It would seem your father did constant transfers at the start of every month to another bank account, to the point that he requested the process to be automated when depositing his monthly wage to an accountant of my fellowship. This would indicate someone was indeed using said money to look after you, and after cross-referencing some data, we did not find none of your neighbors ever interacting with this account."

"… And if you knew this, then why-"

"Because you refused our aid," she says, acid, low, and a bit bothered. "Had you been willing to listen and accept our aid, this intel could have been given to you during the supposed meeting that was hosted yesterday. However, to reveal such intel would be dangerous, so General Daizaburou exercised caution. And yes," she raises her voice as my lips moved, slightly louder as if she had brought the comms closer, "he was already aware you were the son of a fellow, and was endowing caution in case this intel were to be used against you."

"I… see. So, you all were merely looking out for me?"

"Indeed, you are the son of a vassal. Which, let me remind you, makes you a fellow of ours. There is, however, something I must ask."

"Yes?"

She stops, taking in air, "Kageyuki Shirogane was a member of a squadron working under the express orders of my late Father, the Head that came before me," she tells, ice floating in her words now, slowed down to an almost halt. "So, since your father was a guard of the castle, the records seems to indicate you once moved closer to Osaka before your family managed to buy the house in the Hiiragi District. Do you remember anything of your life during those days? Of how your father being a member of the Royal Guard changed your family's life?"

…

"There is… one memory."

"Oh? What would it be about?" She asks, hurriedly as if she were a kid huddling closer in the middle of a story. "If you would wish to speak of the matter, of course," she adds a sec later, tone solemn again, back to her polite and proper mode.

"It was a day, when my mom wasn't home. And I had to pack, since we were leaving."

"I see. Is there anything… you believe is important then?"

"No, it was just… an every day look. Just me putting stuff in place with a friend of my dad." That's all I can clearly remember from his past. The rest, is just a similar feeling to what I had back home before we moved in to our house. I never could find good friends when I was little, since I was kind of a jerk and all. Until I met Sumika and the rest, and Pee Park became our stronghold of fun and games.

… That's why I reached out to Meiya when I saw her all alone. I know how much it sucks, to have no one to play with, to see others have fun at the distance. That's why I liked to mess around with Sumika so much, even if it devolved into us slapping the shit out of the other most of the time once we grew up. In that regard, I can totally get why he likes Yuuhi so much here in this world.

"… And aside from the day he first came in the black dress, when he seemed about to cry, I don't really remember anything else clearly, it's mostly just bits and pieces. To be honest, I think I was a bit too dense growing up, so if there were some issues with dad being in the IRG I probably didn't notice. Well, either that or I got upset and started kicking up a fuss, probably."

"Pfft…"

Hm? Is she… laughing? "Your Highness?"

"O-Oh… Ahem… My apologies, I merely, cough, I found the image amusing, is all," she slowly says, a sweet tint in the words, a light cheer in her tone. "So then," Yuuhi clears her throat, reinstating the composure of the Shogun, "you do not recall who was hired to look after you by your father?"

"No, I do not. However, if you know my neighbors didn't use the money, shouldn't you have papers that would say who used the account?"

I mean, joint bank accounts were illegal back home, and if my memory of my first loops is correct then they're also illegal in the Empire. That's why I had my own money, and why a few people made so much noise when Meiya married me back then since it was outrageous for them that she would give me, a commoner, a credit card to access her own account once I became Takeru Mitsurugi . I never asked for that, and I don't remember ever using the thing, but honey got a bit too insistent and worried in case anything happened so I took it in good faith. Like I would ever need the amount of money the Group could give me access to in the first place. Every time I even tried to buy Meiya a present, be it a painting, a set of clothes, or some Galaxy Wars collectibles, people just straight up bowed down and offered them without hesitation. I didn't even need to use anything other than the money I myself made, if my fuzzy recollections of my marriage with Meiya are accurate.

But, if someone was taking care of little me, and dad made a separate account he owned but someone else used, that means Maya-san should have been given a card to her name to take the money out. And those papers, the creation of the account and the request for the card, have to be somewhere, unless they burned them down to mere ashes.

The thing is, why is Yuuhi insisting on this trail? Trying to see if I am not lying? Trying to get me to remember? I mean, it would be real bad for them to openly disclose this intel, right? If anyone starts asking questions and pokes into my eventual files, they will find a link to Maya-san through the usage of this account. Or maybe they're really trying to protect me. I mean, I… would be Yuuhi's stepbrother in this world, I guess. But, considering the political landscape, what my mere existence could cause for her… keeping me erased might be in their best interests, or at least to ensure I don't remember anything that could compromise their standing. And if I ever do, it's off to the depths of Tokyo Bay.

Imagine the fustercluck that would be unleashed in this nationalistic Empire if it's shown in the media that a no-name peasant has such a close relation with the Shogun. G-Bombs? They ain't got nothin' on public outrage.

"… No, there isn't a clear record of this, sadly," she says, back to the cold tone. "It would seem this, too, was lost during the error your profiles suffered. You do not remember who was looking after you at the time?" Frozen silk, air blades slashing my ears.

"As I said, I don't. However, if you allow… I would like to ask something of you, Your Highness. May I?"

"But of course," she immediately says, bright and warm as daylight.

Alright, inhale deep. Time to step on the gas and try to lift this doubt that still lingers on me. Gulping once, I close my eyes as I speak, "Do you have any idea why the databases lost my data? It seems that, despite the digitalization, only my data was wiped from the servers. My parents still were in there, but they had no data of ever having a son, or of marrying each other. Now there's this matter of whoever took care of me being gone… almost as if I were a traitor or an exile."

You're not the only one who can put pressure on the board, Yuuhi. Let me see what your answer is.

"It is most shameful to see this happened under my rule, and I can do nothing short of apologizing for all the hardships this must have brought you," she quietly says, her politeness as forced as my manners.

"No, please, don't apologize. But, well, do you think I-"

"You were not a traitor, Shirogane," she again cuts me off, sending the blue pyres of flame at me. "Please remember that you were found harmed on a battlefield, you were not exiled."

"But then, why did the Empire refuse to treat me when I was found then?" Immediately asking, arching my brows as I look up, I then hold my breath at the silence.

I need to at least get a clear sign, I need to break through Yuuhi's facade without showing her my hand. Whether I continue to see these memories or not, whether she still thinks of me- him as a brother, whether I can count on her aid to regain my citizenship while not causing ripples that would mess with Yuuko or Yuuhi's own duties… I need to know what I'm getting into.

And you, my dear purple beauty, are the only one who can cast light to these matters. So, why don't you start honoring your name, Yuuhi? Come on, sis . Do me a solid and show me your cards already.

Sounds like she just exhaled from her nose, real hard, as she grumbles for a sec. "While I do not know why you weren't given the treatment you deserved as a fellow Japanese, if you were a criminal, much more data would be missing, and were you an exile, not even a basic profile would be left of you. No one can tamper the databases to such extent without leaving trails, cadet."

"And yet, my data is gone."

"That was only an error, as this Empire has always had a rather… precarious relation with machine and computers. Surely you would understand, that in uploading all of what was once done by hand some documents were bound to go missing, to be omitted," she affirms, trying to dull the formality, trying to go back to the pleasant and sweet voice. "I do not think a person deleted your data with ill intent, Shirogane. Please rest assured, you were not a traitor," and then, fire. "The only way for someone to do that would have been to hack the databases, and as your Shogun, I assure you our defenses are not so frail."

Alright, if this is how you wanna play it out, let's roll. All or nothing, one or twenty. Let's fire that bullet. At the very least, I need to clear something up.

"Yet, you cannot blame me for being doubtful, fearful of this state of affairs, Your Highness."

"There is nothing you should fear, cadet. This was only caused by an error, as I been reiterating plentiful times," she says, sounding sour and scolding.

"But there are no clear records of my life after I was ten, right? And even before that, there's no threads that could even hint at someone looking after me."

"Yes, that… is the case." She relents, after a little while.

"And, you are certain I was not a criminal or a traitor?"

"No, you weren't."

"And, as you said before, my house still is under my father's name, right? It wasn't sold or rented at any point in time, if what papers XO Kouzuki could procure are to be believed."

"Yes, that is correct, Shirogane. Your house is still yours, and there are no oddities in its papers."

"And yet, I'm registered as Takeru Shirogane in the databases?"

"… Yes, your leftover data says as much. Where are you going with these questions?" Raising her voice, sharpening her voice, a banner in warning fluttering in the distance.

"Where am I going, indeed," I say, chuckling a bit, then coughing dryly. Yuuhi groans on the other side for a second, yet remains cool and waits for me to speak. "Your Highness, don't you notice something odd in the facts we've laid out?"

"Something odd? I do not see what you speak of."

"I was ten years old when my Dad died. I should have been sent to an orphanage, since whoever was taking care of me at the time might not have met the requirements needed to adopt a children." That was what both Maya-san and Uncle Koetsu said in that dream I saw. "In that case, the question goes to whether or not I was adopted, right?" But if someone had adopted me, my surname would have changed. But it didn't, so that must mean nobody wanted me."

"And…" almost stuttering, she drew in a sharp breath, "how can you ascertain such a thing, Shirogane?"

"It's simple, when you think about it. If the data being erased was nothing but a mistake, why were the profiles of my parents were also tampered? Why is there no data of where I studied at? Or about whoever took care of me? Don't you think this is odd? If only my profile lacked data, it would be one thing. However, if… whoever took me in wound up regretting that at one point…"

" You shall be stripped off the honor of carrying my House's emblem on your person henceforth."

"… Then, maybe, they took the chance to send me away when I suffered an accident. So they erased all of my data to-"

"Shirogane, there is no feasible way in which such a scenario came to pass," she affirms, the fire roaring alive in her every word, harsh and sudden like a storm in open sea. "I was the Shogun when this mistake happened. And I am telling you, such a thing cannot be. So, for you to make such a claim… means you are accusing me."

"But you did no such thing, isn't that right, Your Highness?" I say, smiling at the rising lava of her tone.

"Wh- B-But of course, I did no such thing," she says, quite fast and firm. Heh, got her off guard. "Where are you going with these questions, Shirogane?"

I inhale deeply, and eyes closed and leaning on the pillow, feeling my heart clanging, I speak slowly. "Your Highness, if nobody adopted me, I would have been recruited into the IJA during the mass recruitment during the '98, being an orphan that was left with no choice but to keep living in the orphanage until I became an adult. I would have been one of the first to be forced to enlist, and if that was the case, there would have been records of my service in the IJA. Military records cannot be so easily hacked, and there would have been papers and documents left of my enlistment. But there are none that could be found, and those documents are not the responsibility of the Shogunate. While the supervision of Imperial troops does fall to the government at large, the basic papers of my enlistment and training should be somewhere."

"… Then, perhaps you were adopted by someone. Then, it is obvious why no such papers can be found. Because they never existed in the first place, since you never had to be taken to an orphanage."

"So, if that's the case, why is there so much intel missing from my profiles?"

"Perhaps, the data that linked you to your… new family was also erased during this error," the fire doused, she whispers. "I can only apologize for what my mistake is forcing upon your shoulders."

"No, that's-"

"However, if you manage to recall something, anything at all, then perhaps you could try and find whoever was that adopted you. If you'd welcome the proposition, perhaps my vassals could aid you in this quest?"

"… So, it's up to whether or not I recall anything?"

"Well, it would be easier if you could visit the Capital, as I mentioned before. Then, we can ensure such a mistake does not repeat itself," she says, suddenly shining as polished steel, back to the imposing, solemn voice she endowed during the coup.

… The same voice of the nightmare, the voice of the Shogun.

"No… This was enough."

"Eh? What are you-"

"Thank you for your time, Your Highness. I truly am thankful for your honesty, and for extending some kindness to this cadet."

"Ah, yes. As I said, it is only just I do so, for I am your ruler. Do you still feel well for us to platicate?"

"Yes… if you want to."

"Truly? I can tell your voice seems distressed, ever since we began speaking of whoever looked after you. Perhaps, are some memories troubling you? If you'd welcome the notion, I could lend you my ear as an apology of sorts for letting your data be deleted under my rule," she says, bright and sweet once more, despite it sounding more like an assertion than a suggestion.

Yuuhi isn't even letting me see a crack in her speech. In a way, this reminds me of my talk with my world's Meiya after all that mess. At first she was like this, not letting emotion show up on her complexion until I told her of what happened at the salon. But, can I… No, should I even mention anything to Yuuhi? I mean, she could take it the wrong way. And I still don't know if I can, or want, to request her help and accept going to Tokyo.

"Shirogane? What is troubling you?" She asks upon my silence, voice fading.

"No… It's nothing, Your Highness."

"Do not lie. I can clearly hear how afflicted you are," quick to counter, she then sighs. "There is no reason for you to hold back, if you so wish I can listen to your woes. Much has been piling on your shoulders, and it is understandable you'd be distraught at what we're discussing. After all, these two years you were away must have been very hard for you, I'm sure," she says, molten back into the Shogun's composure. "As equally trying they must have been for anyone who knew you."

Ouch, way to drive a knife into me. She's conflicted like I am. It's as if both of us were walking on a floor littered with spikes, trying to get on top of the other without screwing things up. Or she could be trying to deceive me, Her Highness has no need for someone like me besides her. However, if he was to her what I was for Meiya, then Yuuhi probably couldn't be 'Yuuhi' with anyone other than him. All she has been for a long time is the Shogun. Yeah, makes sense. No way she'll slip up in front of me, what little emotion she has shown should be proof enough this is hard as hell for her.

I mean, if Yuuhi spent two years away from the one person she could trust in, someone who was a brother to her, while having to face all that happened with the fallout of Lucifer with the G-Bombs… and then I suddenly appear out of-

Wait a second. Two years? That's… just like my Meiya. Just like back in my world. Yuuhi and 'Takeru'… were away from each other for two years before meeting again.

N-Nah, must be just a coincidence.

"Shirogane, are you still there?"

"Ah, yes. I was thinking, Your Highness."

"So, would you allow me to be your listener? If only for a brief moment?" She says, almost pleading.

… Yeah, just like back in my world. If anyone were listening in, they wouldn't think it's the Shogun of an Empire talking with a nobody.

"Well, thanks for offering. May I really impose on you, Your Highness? You must be very busy, after all."

"It is no imposition, for I am offering myself to you. My aid, I mean," she corrects herself, almost stuttering.

… How cute, didn't think I'd ever hear Her Highness be so… human, I guess.

"Then," licking my lips, I sigh as start drawing circles on the sheet, rubbing my feet together, "allow me to accept your kindness." I cough, she gives a hum to indicate she's listening, so I lick my teeth once over. "It might sound weird, but I have been having some very vivid nightmares lately. I don't really remember what I dream about that well," necessary bullshit is yada yada yada, "but it always leaves me feeling awful. Forgive the expression, but it makes me want to puke my insides out. It's… a hollow, crushing feeling that envelops me."

"Is that so? Do you believe this to be tied to your past?"

"… Yes. The nightmares do worsen at times, when… I think of my family."

Yuuhi exhales, slow like a leaf after a gust, softly humming to my words. I wonder what she thinks of this. Well, there isn't much else I can do now. I just gotta wrap this talk up and-

"Shirogane, might I ask you something?" She got all serious now.

"Of course Your Highness, what is it?"

"Have you ever felt as if… as if you had cold hands all over you?"

… Wait, what?

"Excuse me?"

"Huh? Did I stutter? I asked you if you ever felt as if cold hands were all over you. Have you ever felt a sensation like that?" Yuuhi repeats the words, in the usual serious and simple tone, sending me into a downwards spiral of confusion.

Why is she asking me that? How… How…

"How do you know that? Why do you know that?"

"Eh? Ahem… I didn't knew of it, I was-"

"Why did you ask me that question, Your Highness?" I lean forward and furrow my brows at no one, my hand holding the comms shaking a bit.

What is this shit? Why is she asking me that? The cold hands… How could she know of them?

"You see, someone… close to me once described his pain in such a way," she sharpens her inner blade, returning to a frozen silk tone, making me twitch and grip my sheets. "Going by your reaction, I think you have experienced something similar at the very least."

How could she- There's no way she should- Why would she even- No, calm down. Breath in, hold it, count to ten, let the air go. Pheeew… Remember, me and him are somewhat similar. He might have used a similar term to describe his pain, that's all there is to this.

No, wait. The way she said it, someone close to her, and how she specifically mentioned regarding my nightmares… Did this world's Takeru feel something similar to that? Cold hands all over him when suffering from something, from… foggy memories?

… Just like me back in my world?

Chill out, it's just a similar way of speech. We are similar in that regard, we use similar term to refer to stuff. That's all, that's all. Calm down, you can't screw up in front of Yuuhi.

"Yes, I have felt like something of the sort at times."

"Is that so," a faint, sharp whisper. "I believe you are subject to very high stress levels. I advise you not to ruminate with such oppression over these matters, Shirogane. You are a fellow and, would you welcome my aid, you'll regain your citizenship in but a few weeks."

"That might be, however-"

"You have already suffered enough for this unfortunate situation. Do you happen to possess motives not to wish to reclaim your identity, perhaps?"

"No, I'm merely being cauti-"

"I understand you could be fearful, but I assure you of this. You shall be in no danger, Shirogane. After all, as I said before, I wish to mend the data banks posthaste, and as the one who alerted me of the state of the system, you are deserving of my gratitude."

"T-Thank you, Your Highness. However-"

"And also," she stops her stride for a second, inhaling sharply, "I have a debt to repay to you."

"What do you speak of?"

"Certainly you know what I am talking about. You safeguarded… Mitsurugi during the CCSE, and you have been shouldering the blame for that incident all on your own," she says, quick and piercing like a gunshot. "It is truly worth much praise, the poise you display despite all the setbacks you face, Shirogane."

"Ah, no, it's not really that big of a deal… I'm just taking responsibility for my own actions."

"And still, you safeguarded your squadmates most valiantly. And let us not forget, it was mine own folly what caused your data to be missing for so long. Thus, is it truly such an impossible request, for you to accept my feelings with open arms?"

A sudden, brief yet strong, shock runs through my arms, slight pain in the back of my head. "H-Huh? E-Excuse me, Your Highness, what did-"

"As I've been saying, I would be wishing to aid you solve the issues that plague your identity, Shirogane. Would you take my hand and accept my offer?"

It courses through it all, down to my nape, lunging for my heart as I can feel it bash itself against my chest. "Ah… Ah… I, uh, I guess?"

"Was that a question or an answer?"

"I mean…" Shit, I can feel my face is on literal fire. She's so, so much more forward than Meiya. And she's already quite frontal herself. Sigh… Calm down, deep breaths. "Will I really be safe if I go to-"

"I shan't allow anyone to bring harm to you," she says, a hail of light and fire blasting me wide open. "As your Shogun and Regent, believe me when I say you shall be safe. Please, would you allow me to help you?"

Heartbeats clang, clang and blast against my neck. Knees quiver, ankles feel a jolt coming through them and my legs.

"It is only fair, after all," she insists, much impulse in her charge, as if it were my aerial acrobatics. "You were denied proper treatment when you were at Death's door, it is but a small show of appreciation for the fortitude you've displayed thus far despite what has come your way."

"I… I guess, but… I'm not- I mean…"

"You've suffered enough on your own, Shirogane. These two years must have been arduous for you, to survive all on your own without memory of your life. Even if it won't be the same as before," losing ardor, her voice lowers to a whisper, "perhaps there are people awaiting news of you. Ever since that accident that took your memories, ever since that August 5th you have been fending for yourself. And I believe it is time for you to receive the helping hand your nation denied you when-"

"… What?"

Static, sudden static on my ears. Emptiness in my stomach, as if someone had given me a sucker punch and I was out of air.

"Huh? I am saying, it is only fair for you to receive our aid, the aid we denied you when we… left you to die, refusing to tend to your wounds."

"Your Highness… you said August fifth a moment ago, didn't you?"

"Hm? Yes, whatever is the matter?

Hands begin to shake, wires cutting off and making me lose balance. Creeping through the back of my head, that coldness once more surrounds, my breathing becoming bound and causing me to cough.

Why that date?

"Shirogane? Whatever is the matter?"

"No, I just… Why August 5th, Your Highness?"

"Huh? Why, you ask? It was the day Operation Lucifer happened, when you were found- Ah!" She suddenly stops, small groans, or squeals, or whimpers leave her mouth, as if she couldn't close it. Yuuhi tries to speak, but can't. She stutters, halts a word in the middle of the syllables, as if her throat was also being constricted shut.

Did Lucifer happen on that day? And the Yokohama Hive was taken out by the G-Bombs deployed that day, then. But that would mean, if we follow what Yuuko has told me, all we know of him…

This world's me died on the same day I recovered my memories back home?

Well, not the same day, since it's four years in the past compared to when I came back to myself during the tournament in my world, but for it to be exactly the same date… It has to be a coincidence. Yeah… It has to be.

I gulp but I can see how my sight is starting to tremble as the static noise returns to my ears, as everything seems to go double.

"Shirogane? What is the matter?"

No, no, wait a fucking second.

The day he died was the day… the conduit would have formed in this world. When the G-Bombs dropped, the exploding energy caused a reaction with the Reactor, that Sumika was connected to.

Her strong desire to see me again allowed her to somehow 'see' in between the rift between space-time that was formed when the G-Bombs dropped and that created the original conductor, the link between our worlds, which eventually made 'me' appear.

That's what Kasumi said at the end of Kashgar. In exchange for a large amount of G-Elements, my body and mind were slowly brought into this world. I became a physical manifestation of the pipeline uniting both worlds.

… So he died on that day, in that specific place. He died where I was 'born' into this world.

Is that merely a coincidence?

… Can I say it's a coincidence when causality has been screwing me up ever since the loops started?

In a way, one could say my 'old' self died when I recalled these memories of my loops. There was one Takeru that entered the arcade machine and another entirely different being came out of it. If I had never seen the BETA, I might have never recovered my memories or physical state. So in a way, the 'Original' Takeru completely fused with the data of the 'Alternative' Takeru at that point, and since my body was the same since I didn't die at the end of the loop I remembered everything and returned to be how I was back then, with the changes that had happened in those two years. And this world's Takeru died when… the conductor began to flow into this world. His existence was… at the place where the conduit formed.

Color drained from my view as Sensei's words come back to me. I felt as if I had just taken a dive in the sea, as if I were looking into a kaleidoscope full of shifting images of exploding shapes and contracting depth.

… He died at the exact place the highway connecting worlds opened up.

I can tell my mouth is hanging wide open, as my jaw clenches and tenses up as if I were crushing ice cubes with my teeth. My hands shake, everything blurs in front of me, I put a hand on the armrest of the bed to not fall to the floor.

No, no, no, no… Remember what Sensei said. Even if the conductor can bring data, it can't link itself to other versions of himself. Right, right. So this is… just… a coincidence…

"Shirogane! Are you alright? Are you feeling dizzy?" I have not the strength to answer Yuuhi's question.

Bringing both hands to the back of my head, as if shielding me from an impact, it does nothing to halt the hammer of cold that clangs, and bangs, and slams, and hurts, and hurts so much. My fingers claw at my scalp, the root of my hairs as one eye waters and twitches.

" What are you saying? The conductor cannot link itself to other versions of himself. It can replace them I guess, but since it can never receive data from the world it's currently in, there's no way for you to fain any kind of memory from other Shiroganes that existed in that same world, unless you managed to merge yourself with an alive parallel version of yourself. And you definitely cannot have received the data from a parallel version of yourself, you could only receive the memories of parallel worlds you yourself have lived through."

"Ugh… No, it can't be… It has to be a lie…"

"Shirogane! T-Takeru, please, talk to me!"

Yuuko, my world's Yuuko, had told me about it before all this shit began. I can only see clear memories of other versions of myself that are lives I myself lived at some point. It's not a parallel version of me, it's a road I took on another branch that I forgot due to the loops and the trauma of death blocking my memories. And that as the Nucleus I can only share memories 'unconsciously'. So, at most, I'd inherit a fear or a sudden trauma like I had back in my first loop, fainting to the threat of BETA despite not being a native to this world or having ever seen one of the fuckers at that point.

But that means… since I've been seeing his memories, vividly, that-

"No, wait a fucking second…"

I haven't been 'seeing' the memories. Yuuko… Yuuko calls them 'recovery' sessions, doesn't she? And Kasumi is 'bringing them to the surface'.

…

"Ahaha…"

"Takeru?"

"Ahahaha… Are you fucking kidding me? Haha… hahaha…"

You're telling me I'm actually him?

Clutching my face, gasping for air, I close my eyes. And think, on what we spoke of. At all I know. Yuuko did… seem a bit worried when I told her I had regained some memories when I came back from the CCSE, and at first she was very much against me focusing on them. Now that I think about it, she hasn't referred to the affairs of this world's me as 'his' but… has always been saying 'you' when doing so. Many times she said it, 'you're the only Shirogane in this world'.

But that can't be… How the fuck could I be him?! The leaks… The leaks can't change the past! It's all just a coincidence, we're just similar in some regards… and that's it…

… But, Yuuko, the one from my world, did say the transfer of my data would take time. So the highway would remain active. Even now, my world must still be in some sort of space-time position that has it sharing more data with other parallel worlds. So…

I sit down, holding my head as everything came back with the fierceness of a tsunami. All the little details I was ignoring, all the stuff I thought was weird, for some reason, comes rushing out of the back of my head and into my mind's eye. I feel like the cold shower decided to pay me a visit, just that my whole body is on vibrator mode, shaking under the torrent of freezing water. Because, when you line thing up…

He promised to share his birthday with the one who was the 'heir' of the family. Like in my world.

It's been two years since 'we' saw each other. Like in my world.

We lived together. Like in my world.

He was made to join the high echelons of society. Like when I chose Meiya in my world.

He became family to Yuuhi. Like I was when marrying Meiya in my world.

Going by what I saw of his skill on the memory of the Swordbreakers, he knew the Unending Waterfall style. Like I did in my world.

So that would mean Maya-san was his teacher. Like in my world.

And all points to him being given a Minaru Kamui. Like in my world.

No, no, think, Takeru, think! This is all just a list of coincidences! Just another difference to the… to the…

The list of differences, the list of things that are different from this world to the other BETA worlds I looped in.

Tama has an archery dojo. Like in my world.

Chizuru's mom's shaped her life. Like in my world.

Mikoto is a super fan of technological stuff and mechas. Like in my world.

Tsukuyomi-san seemed to have a thing for young boys, going by a few memories I saw of little me. Like in my world.

Kei knows how to make yakisoba sandwiches. Like in my world, despite she not knowing how to do so in any of my previous loops until I taught her.

But this is… This can't be. But then that means… that means… No, it's impossible! The past cannot be changed! And I… And nobody… Back then, nobody forgot about me! When I was in my world, no one forgot about my existence! Or, was that because I'm a stronger Nucleus? Right, this isn't one of my usual loops. If I were to vanish, for even a second, then people would start forgetting about me, starting from the most simple things until there's nothing left.

…

"Wait… nothing left?" No… This has to be a joke.

Because if it isn't…

According to Sumika's story, the Takeru that's native to the BETA timelines dies protecting her from the BETA. But I already know that's not the case this time around, because he keeps on fighting until Lucifer. He doesn't get captured by the BETA.

One could say… he takes an alternative road, disrupting the flow of events. And in that road, he joins the Swordbreakers, which seem to be a top secret unit from the IRG. Almost like… a special task force, one could say.

Like… Like I did last loop, when I joined the Valkyries and changed history.

And then, once everything was over, I disappeared and eventually everybody must have forgotten about me. Maybe Yuuko deleted all of my records in that world to not have to deal with a dead man being in the mission log once Akane and the other survivors forgot I existed.

"Hahaha… It's… the same…" the same that happened to his profiles.

"Takeru! Takeru, pick up the communicator!" Yuuhi begs, the comms lay on the floor, out of sight.

She still remembers. So, that means this world's me didn't 'die' or 'disappear'. If he had been nuked out of the world by the G-Bombs, then I would have absorbed part of him. Had he been another entity altogether, then I wouldn't be able to remember his memories with such clarity. But since I do, that means… a-at the very least he was a strong a Nucleus as me, but no one forgot him in these two years. Because… once the highway opened up, the integration was complete?

…

No, there's something I'm forgetting.

Everybody can be a Causality Nucleus, Yuuko just came up with that term to explain my enhanced ability to sense causality and hold onto my data after all the fuck ups of my loops, after being exposed to G-Elements and the flow of data for who knows how long. So, if my life is being mirrored… when the transfer started… Where did I end up on? And, why would this world mirror mine so much?

Because, on this side of the highway… there was nothing as heavy as my memories for two whole years. While my world had two years of grace while my data tried to flow into me, there was nothing protecting the other side of the highway from sending data from my world to the rest of the multiverse. Scattered, it might have had no place to go to, no receptor to flow towards. But the second I put myself back on causality's rail during the transfer…

No, hold your fucking horses! Why data related to me? No, this stuff isn't even related to me! Why does Tama have a dojo here?! Why does Chizuru's mom suddenly have such an important role in her life?! Why did Yuuhi became close to him, when we never had anything between us in the other worlds?!

"Haa… Haa…" Biting my lips, I taste blood. My sight comes back to normal as a shiver runs on my back, and I keep on gasping for air.

If everything is mirrored, if this is causality trying to balance some leftover data then…

I made a promise with Meiya because she was sad because she had to become the heir of the Mitsurugi Group. And, due to that connection, I received a Minaru Kamui and I got trained by Maya-san. But it was thanks to her deal with Raiden-san that she was allowed to come live with me in the first place, and he was the one who sent the blade to me in the first place. He was also who gave me the final blessing to properly become Takeru Mitsurugi .

In this world, the position of 'heir' is occupied by Yuuhi. So, if a balance has to occur, I'm placed near the heir and everything else follows behind? But why didn't she die? If the data came here… She should have died, to have him make the promise with Meiya! Or is it because I never met Yuuhi, then I couldn't bring her death data here? And anyways, as Yuuko said, the leaks only happen due to an emotional connection we feel. So, Yuuhi felt something similar to what Meiya felt for me in my world despite never having met me, not being affected by causality?

… Then, if his life… if he truly is me, and causality follows me around trying to balance everything, trying to integrate everything into a single timeline…

Why did he became so enraged?

Why did Yuuhi leave him alone?

Does that mean that… Meiya left me… in another…

"Ugh!" Pain, in my chest, in my heart. Shrinking, I bend over while clawing at my chest. My lips part wide open, but I can't bring any air into my lungs.

"Takeru! Takeru, please calm down!" Someone says nearby, I can't hear it well enough.

" I know not who you speak of. Lower your armaments, otherwise I shall be forced to subdue you in the Empire's name," a cold voice says through static, a darkened shadow with eyes of red seeming to stand in the distance.

Calm down… It's all just a mistake, I'm being stupid again. The leaks can't change the past. And I'm nothing like him, I can't be him, there's no fucking way.

… But Shura's Dance was just like Iceberg, right?

No, no, keep it together! How the fuck would- Why would this- I am not him! I… I never had that many clashes with the IRG, I don't hate them as he did. Yeah, I… Ugh…

Crumbled buildings, sinking in a sea of gunpowder. Where once there was a bustling center of a city, now lays a crater filled to the rim with gore and wreckage. A calm voice from far away, a voice ordering everyone to retreat.

One blink, it becomes a port. A port ravished by battle, by battle of TSFs against protesters. And the same calm voice reassures, that it was a fucking mercy kill.

Another blink, a damaged hospital comes to view.

And the corpses, of Uncle, of his wife.

… of his children.

I… I… He lost everything… as I did during Iceberg. But… But I never had to go through his missions, I wasn't some hateful man-hunter in any of my loops. I never had to face losing a little child to the war. I never… I never even…

" I was always… waiting…"

"Huh?"

Weight, on my arms. Too thin, to soft. Like sand, slowly slipping out of grasp.

A strong gaze of dark purple, arms folded and imposing in its compact posture. "Your actions precede you, Shirogane. And whether you favor this or not, you have become a dark armed dragon just as I now that you've tamed the Kusanagi, something no pilot could accomplish. Our views matter little, such is the reality we face. And the war we must wage is not always an honorable one."

Looking down, around, everything looks dim, dark. Narrow and foggy. But in my arms, there's… someone. Looking up at me, lips shaking when trying to smile. And a hand, a hand with all of its fingers extended in prayer, raising to my face.

A small look of cerulean, a very petite and slim figure, an even smaller voice which quivered in place. "Thank you very much, for caring after me. Not all of us are, well, treated as fairly by you Naturals. Um, I know I… may not be very useful a unit, but whatever meager service my ESP can offer, it is at your disposal, Shirogane, sir. Just… please do not medicate me, this unit shall make an effort to remain useful and active for as long as it's able with minimal maintenance required. Eh? Don't sweat it and chill out? What does that mean, sir?"

That hand, that small hand reaches my cheek. The fingertips hold onto it as if it were some old relic or something, despite how it quivers, how the hold seems to be about to break apart. And yet, a single teardrop leaves one of those eyes, those light brown eyes that keep their sights locked onto mine.

A small nod, from a dead serious expression, a gray hand raising in salutation. "Allow me to thank you, for shielding me before in front of the Captain despite my prior… allegiance. I know we have had some friction since we met, but I shall repay these favors one day. And don't worry, I've got your back. You need anyone gone, my rifle and lenses are at your disposal. I'll be leaving the Captain to you, however."

And yet, as I raise my own hand to clasp that frail one clutching my cheek, I find nothing. I find my own cheek, the hand is gone.

" I was always… waiting… for you…"

It falls to the ground, dangling loosely in my hold. The eyes that returned my gaze, unfocused. The head, also dangling, falling backwards. The weight, the frail weight which was on my arms suddenly falls completely on me. Lips which were trying to force a smile, which were sealed a moment ago now are relaxed, barely open.

Cold.

Silent.

Stiff.

… Dead?

Bringing it closer, trying to embrace it, I find my sides as I fall onto the sheets. Running my hands, I only find my own body in the bed. There's nothing here.

Why? Why does this hurt… so much? I couldn't, we couldn't… talk, spend time? Why?

Vanishing from my hands, slipping from my grasp, fading away.

All I did… all the effort… I never even knew you…

No! Don't close your eyes!

I won't accept this!

This ain't over yet!

I can save you! There's still time!

"Guh. Grah…" Yet, no matter how much I claw and twist my arms, I can't move. Stand up… Break all these things that keep me tied, I gotta hurry!

"Yashiro, are you sure he- Shirogane? H-Hey! Calm down, don't throw the IV, you're still weak!"

" No! She ain't dying tonight!"

"Shirogane, calm- Fuck! Why now of all times?!"

I try to raise, despite my legs not responding, thrashing against what doesn't let me stand up. Something binds my arms, a tall shadow towers over me.

"Cadet Shirogane, please come to your senses!"

" Shut the fuck up! Ugh… Let me go!"

Whack!

Bam!

"Ugh! From where do you summon such strength? XO, hurry with the sedatives!"

" Get out of my way!" I can still feel her heartbeats! She's still alive!

"Homura, quick!" Another set of hands, another hold twists and bend my arm.

I can't fail here! You all can shove your salvation and enlightenment up your asses! I'm burning your garden of EDEN to cinders, you'll fall to Nidhogg's fangs! Move, Kusanagi! Take off, dammit!

I thrash and thrash, screaming and bending my fingers, yet I can't break free from whatever is holding me down. It's fading, I can't… I can't hear it anymore, the sound of her heartbeats.

I ain't failing… not after finally… getting to see her! We're not falling down, not while I'm h ere! Even if pure darkness is in the horizon, I will brave through it. I'll endure any hardship, if it's to give you the happiness you deserve. Because if your future is crying, it's up to me to make it smile!

"T-Takeru-san, please calm down!"

"Yashiro, don't get close!"

"No, he's hurting! Takeru-san, look at me!"

A small, tingly feeling on the back of my head. Huh… That face… But, you shouldn't-

Ugh! A sudden pain, in my neck. My throat closes up, I can't breath well. Suddenly losing impulse, everything starts to become blurry, distant, dark.

"Just what on the Heavens happened here? Kouzuki, did you inject-"

"I did nothing! I told Her Highness to-"

"Takeru-san?" The small voice, the voice that shouldn't be here whispers.

Something soft caresses my face, yet I can't see well what it is. The loud sounds keep on echoing, the more they do the more my ears hurt. That same small kindness grabs my face, lets me down on something soft, covers me with more softness. And again, as I groan against the numbness, that small thing ruffles my hair, a small tingly feeling calming down the pulse on the back of my head.

Can't feel my fingers or my legs, everything's slowly… just fading…

Hm?

In the distance, a small spark. A spark of blue, or cerulean. As if tracing the horizon, not daring to get closer. A small star in the night sky.

The more I look at it, the more it seems to get closer. The more I focus on it, the more it feels like it runs away. And as if swayed by waves, everything fades to black as something keeps on caressing my hair, or my face. All except that little light, which gets closer and runs away, which I follow after, as other lights swirl in my vision, as it feels as if I were floating.

Maybe… for just a little while… I can take a break…

… and follow this light, wherever it takes me.

---

" As I wonder if I made the right call just now,

all that's in front of me are things I do not want to see,

but end up doing so anyway

Sometimes, I think that it'd be better to just straight up gouge my eyes out…

Just like how I used to think I didn't have a single person I could trust in

A billion gazes are locked onto me,

too complex numbers I cannot hope to decode

As I traverse this interconnected world all by my lonesome, I try to wriggle and run from it all

However…

My limbs flail and fight, thrashing about to wake up from this nightmare,

but all I manage is to fall even deeper

… And all the while, the devil itself keeps simply smiling my way

Screaming beyond the glass, where is my real self wandering to?

My fake smile twist and breaks

as my tears drizzle the screen, melting it apart

My swirling heart is just like a downwards spiral, that can only gather sadness and tragedy deep within

So take me somewhere far away,

to some distant world and then

Please embrace me, and just let me believe…"

Satirize, by Kotoko. Rasen Kairou 2, by Age.

Mind's Off Matter

5th Arc: Black Moon Lilith

Chapter 74:

Mind's Off Matter

---

December 3rd. Almost 4 PM.

(Outside the Infirmary.)

[Yuuko]

---

"I did nothing of the sort, Vice Commander," Her Highness says, unrelenting in the welling animosity she hoists. "We were platicating amicably, until suddenly Shirogane began to whisper to himself, to speak through his teeth, under his breath, before suffering another nervous outbreak. Perhaps, due to some sort of medication given to him beforehand?"

"Your Highness, I will have to remind you no such thing was done to him. You yourself requested to speak with him in such a hasty manner, there was nothing odd conditioning Shirogane towards yet another nervous breakdown," I sigh, short yet heavy, shaking my head at the obnoxious intensity she refuses to douse. "On the contrary, it is because you ignored my warning and decided to speak with him of his past that this turn of events occurred."

"No, that is not the case," she affirms, not altering her clashing tone. "While we spoke of his past, Shirogane remained most composed. Fearful at times, concerned by what could have been of him, yet never did he lose his poise and manners. It is almost as if… you harbored motives to prevent Shirogane from reconnecting with his past."

"I don't know what you're talking about, Your Highness. Please, let us not fall to animosity."

She briefly scoffs, inhaling sharply afterwards. "Then, why have you not told him of how was he recovered in detail? Why have you refused to inform him of what 1st Lt Tsukuyomi and General Daizaburou disclosed to you moments before?"

Lunging straight ahead, almost like he would during a fight. The usually pleasant and docile visage of a clear sky that Her Highness resembles has been completely covered by clouds, an unending arrow rain coming down harshly.

I suppose, my hunch was correct. Perhaps, more correct than I thought. To ignite such a reaction from her, to not have her revert to a polite approach as we speak, maybe he is far more dear to Her Purpleness than I had anticipated. Her not being in his home world made me think that the parallel couldn't be this strong. But what if, somehow… just as Mitsurugi was his lover in other timelines… Could you possibly have been Her Highness' first love? Either way, whether it is that or if she sees you as a trusted fellow, it is odd that she hasn't lowered the venom in her tongue one bit.

"… I did not deem revealing such intel at the moment to be wise," I say, resting against a wall. "As you should have heard, Shirogane was rather exhausted. Disclosing so much information while he was in that state wouldn't have been beneficial in the slightest. I would have welcomed the opportunity to speak more with him, but I believe you spent more time platicating with Shirogane than I did after he regained consciousness."

"Is that so?" And finally, a slight pause in the aggression.

"Indeed. Also, allow me to inform you that I had revealed to Shirogane part of the report that details how was he found and recovered." Or at the least, I did tell him way back when about how he was a Royal Guard here, and how according to Yoroi he perished in Lucifer. It's not like I'm lying, per se. "And while both us were quite flabbergasted at the findings, he didn't have a particularly negative reaction back then."

"Truly? Was Shirogane… not wishing to delve into what had been of him then, who he was before?"

"He was curious, yes. However, at the time there were other more immediate concerns, such as his training and the coming CCSE, so he didn't press further. Allow me to tell you he was composed when we spoke of the matter, even at the possible prospect of him having been found injured near a battlefield. So," I cough, licking my lips, resting the back of my head on the cold wall, looking up at the illumination for a moment in silence, "I believe it is quite fair to affirm that what has caused this last outburst is directly related to what you chose to mention to him, Your Highness."

"… You wouldn't be thinking on casting blames on my person, would you Vice Commander?"

"No, that is not my intention," even if it is the truth and nothing but the truth. "I want to know what caused him to react in this way since, as I told you, Shirogane has shown much grit during his stay in this base and I find it perplexing that he has suffered two breakdowns in a single day. Certainly, we both wish to avoid this from repeating itself?"

She inhales sharply again, as sharp as her tone remains. "Yes, we are in agreement on that regard."

"Then, do you have any idea what could have caused him such distress to send him into shock once more? Did he say something that you believe is connected to his suffering?"

A moment of silence passes, then another. In the stillness of the hallway, I can only wait.

"There was one particular subject," she begins, voice shattered to pieces, "that brought him much anxiety, it seems."

"And it was?"

"… The date of the accident."

"Huh? The date?"

"Yes, I…" another moment of silence, a heavy and long sigh afterwards, "I made the folly of mentioning Lucifer to him. I had thought he to be aware of that, considering how he spoke of his records. I may have spoken on emotion at the time."

"I see. Was he distraught at the mention of the mission?" Perhaps, another memory recovery? Did he see his final moments and that's what sent him into that rampage?

"No, that was not what caught his attention. It seems… he was concerned more with the date, as I said before. He explicitly asked me why had I mentioned the date of 'August 5th', and that seems to be what brought him much anguish even before my miss of bringing up Lucifer," she says, cracks within the composure she tries to revitalize.

… But what does this mean? Why that date? Shirogane was completely fine when we discussed these subjects. A memory of Lucifer… No, it doesn't look like it. He'd have reacted far, far worse to the recollections of Shura's Dance then, or during our previous talks on the subject of his memories. Am I forgetting something? I do not think so, however. Then, an oversight? Did he mention something I didn't pay mind to? What could have caused him such grief? And above all else, how can I prevent this from happening again? Anyways, he needs time. Even if it means clashing with Her Purpleness for a moment, even if my image in her eyes suffers slightly, I have to shield Shirogane, buy him time to adapt to whatever it is he saw. I cannot lose… such an important asset, after all. He still has to tune the 00 Unit before anything, and I require him in good spirits for that task. It's all for the good of Alternative IV, even if there are inherent risks with denying Her Highness the immediate transfer she would wish.

"Sadly, I can't think of a reason why he'd react in such fashion to a mere date," I admit, ruffling my hair. "In any case, I believe it is clear Shirogane is not yet ready to learn of his past. I suggest we wait a few-"

"I wholeheartedly disagree with you assessment, Vice Commander," she says, once more hailing a banner, raining the arrows. "Shirogane was most welcoming of my inquiries, never losing his composure despite being speaking with me, the Shogun. All the contrary, he even endowed in confidence, forwarding bold inquiries my way at times. If not for my careless mention of Lucifer, I am certain he would have welcomed the notion to visit Tokyo and regain his citizenship, under the proposal I detailed to you before."

"… And while I understand and welcome your support to keep this under wraps, it's clear something must have gone wrong during your talk of his past. I cannot have my protegee suffering from traumatic flashbacks unnecessarily, you'd understand," I affirm, frowning to the overhead lights. She seems to groan softly in disagreement, pronouncing not a word. "Is giving Shirogane some time such an impossibility, Your Highness?"

"… No, that is a reasonable request," she says, low. "However, it is concerning you insist on this trail that recalling his past is harmful for Shirogane. You truly wouldn't have ulterior motives regarding this arrangement?"

"May I ask what has you believing such things?"

"Oh, please. It is but a simple matter," the premature softness then fades, fades as she seems to exhale quite heavily from her nose, "after all the date of his arrival coincides perfectly with the beginning of all these new developments you've been devising as of late. Quite convenient, isn't it?" Thawing the facade, not dulling the animosity, the sting of the arrows. "More so considering I was notified of a certain… training exercise among Gekishins, where one pilot seemed to possess piloting quirks resembling those of my vassal. What do you have to say to this, Vice Commander?"

Sigh… Now of all times she has to bring this up? "It is nothing you should concern yourself with, Your Highness. It is true, Shirogane was tasked with bringing certain intel to me. I can grant you proof of it, of the morning in which he arrived at the base with a peculiar bag filled with precious intel for my research."

"It is truly gracious of you to offer this intel, XO. Thank you kindly," she says, briefly returning to the frequent polite and sweet demeanor I know her for. "However," it lasts only a second, though, "why would you allow Shirogane to pilot, if he was nothing but a cadet at that point?"

"… I am afraid I cannot disclose the motives behind my decision back then."

"Whatever does that mean?"

"That it is tied to… the experiences he suffered from before arriving to this base."

"Huh?! A-Are you saying-"

"Furthermore, he insisted much on taking part in the developments, I'll have you know."

"… How do you mean? I do not believe he could have made himself useful to your project."

"Sigh… Believe me, as the General said, Shirogane can be quite stubborn when he sets his sights on something. Such is the reason why he's currently doing paperwork under his punishment, solely because he refuses to sit still. I do admit, it would be saddening to lose such a promising recruit. Is there truly no way in which we can reach an agreement, to have him remain in the UN?"

"Do you value his services so much, XO?" She asks, low, burning.

" Can you at least rest for a while, just a short while? Please, Yuuko?"

"He has been of much help, and I'm certain you know it were his actions what prevented the CCSE from… taking an ugly turn," I sigh, shoulders sagging. She takes a moment, but gives her agreement in the end. "And despite all the issues that plague him, I do…"

" If I said yes… Would you laugh at me?"

A small pressure on my lips, a hand holds an elbow closer to my body as I close my eyes, "… appreciate his work thus far. Also, to ensure no claims of identity theft fall on Shirogane's shoulders, nor any unwanted eyes fall upon someone who was supposed to be dead, we require time to facilitate the restoration of his profiles. In the meantime, perhaps we could allow him to relax, to not focus on what has been piling much stress upon his shoulders."

"I suppose, you bring up a fair point," she relents, the poison subsiding. "However, as I said before, I would be wishing for you to return Shirogane to the IRG. And he should learn of his situation, in the short term."

"I agree, I do not want to have this issue lingering for long. If you'd allow, would you welcome a proposition?"

"What would it be about?"

"Perhaps you have already been notified of this, I have requested a meeting with both the UN's HC and the authorities of the Empire."

"Ah, yes. I was told of it briefly. Yet, this meeting is for matters related to your research, is it not? I am not certain if I… favor you entangling Shirogane in these discussions," and once again, the viper does not hide. The morning star seems more than willing to fall down to dark aggression upon me.

"My apologies for not being clear, Your Highness. However, allow me to be frank. Shirogane has already involved himself in these developments." More due to the fact that, without him, there would be no news to speak of, frankly. And despite all that he has given me, all I can do for Shirogane is parley for some time.

"XO, I believe I am being clear on my wishes. I do not wish for you to entangle Shirogane to-"

"As I said, I am not entangling him. He insisted on offering his aid, and I merely put him to the test a few times. Honestly, I wasn't expecting him to deliver such results."

Besting the Valkyries with the first prototype of our new parts, and an XM3 that still required much debugging. Then, he finishes the consoles along Yashiro, and later sends the Valkyries to the drawing board while he was merely 'playing' around. All the trial runs for the XM3, his performance in Niigata, his training run with Yashiro, the data that the memory recovery sessions have granted me to both polish the last details of the 00 Unit, to iron out a theory I had almost given up on, and to let me see a theory that I hadn't even thought was possible. And that's still with him not having disclosed what he learned from another me. As well as his constant worry, as tiresome as it gets, over my health to the point of carrying me to bed and tackling my office's papers despite his exhaustion.

I cough, grasping my chin. "So, I shall give you a small tidbit of data. Thanks to Shirogane's odd piloting quirks, I devised an improved OS for our TSF."

"Huh? An… improved OS? You speak of something similar to what was attempted with the Shiranui-1c?"

"Oh, no. It is not hardware-bound as that unit's OS, even if it follows a similar purpose. I shall disclose all the important details in the upcoming meeting, where I also plan to push for a trial run to be held, to gain authorization to use this OS in the future deployments that my project will require." I leave the silence hanging for a brief instant, curling a strand of hair as I look up. "If you support the proposal, then when the trial run is held you could pay a visit to this base under that excuse. And then… you could have a private talk with Shirogane."

"… Is that so? Do I have your word on this arrangement?" She slowly asks, as if holding her breath.

"Of course, Your Highness. You have been most welcoming of my proposals thus far, and I do not wish to sour our relation due to these accidents that have happened today. That is why, I must ask you for time. Allow Shirogane some respite from all the meetings, wait until the trial is held and then you can speak with him face to face." Leaving the wall, pacing in circles, a finger raises my chin as I smile. "Of course, I would be truly grateful if you could give him your blessing to remain serving in the UN. However, in the end, it's his choice. And in this way, we do not have to risk anything with a visit to the Capital."

"… And he can return to Tokyo in our retinue afterwards, hmm," she says, softly yet not sheathing the sword. "An exchange of favors, I see. It is reasonable, I suppose." Sigh, finally got her to- "However, it does not feel appropriate to me. This proposition could be taken as you… abusing Shirogane's condition to have me agree to your petitions in the meeting."

"Excuse me, what?"

"In the first place, Shirogane is an Imperial Guard, a member of my fellowship," back to the storm clouds, back to the venom. Short of stopping, she presses on after a small inhalation. "And while I would normally not waver when it comes to supporting your project, it does not seem proper of you to try and gain something through the pain of my vassal."

…

"… If anything is bringing pain to Shirogane, it is whatever lays in his past, Your Highness," I slowly say, losing the neutrality, endowing a viper of my own. "I am merely looking out for what would be the best way for him to recover his memories without suffering further harm," nodding to myself, my lips curl upwards slightly, " since I am his current legal tutor ."

"So, what you're saying is… Shirogane's current condition is dire enough for you to suggest such a long delay in notifying him of his identity?"

"He is weak, yes. I am taking proper care of him, Your Highness. Even more so now that I know… of his ties to the nobility. Yet, due to what eyes linger on him, exercising caution is a must, you'd understand," I say, she seems to groan for a moment. "And this arrangement I proposed is what comes to mind when thinking on how to facilitate a meeting between Shirogane and a possible representatives of your fellowship. Furthermore, I am not asking you to support my developments. I'm merely requesting a chance to show their worth to the rest of the Empire, that is all."

"Thus, I could refuse the adoption of this new OS you've devised?"

"It would be most regrettable, but I would in no way demand such out of you, Your Highness. And, if it would please you, as a show of support to you from Alt. IV… I am willing to take the XFJ Project under my wing."

"Eh? XO, are you being truthful?" Quite the surprise she now feels. As you tend to say, like a penguin in a desert.

"Yes, I am. Takamura has already delivered results with the railgun, even if a preliminary test is yet to be held." I sigh, the silence unnerving, my steps delaying in my circles. "I am aware of the possible repercussions leaving the project under my hands could cause. Yet, if you request such out of me, I am willing to resume the development of the Shiranui Second." And anyways, Shirogane already gave me a good idea to further refine our units, not only the TSFs, with his revamped control scheme suggestion. If I manage to at least get one Shiranui-1C and have him pilot it, who knows what kind of crazy advancements I'll be able to make?

She remains silent, some hushed whispers coming through the speaker, nothing concise or discernible. So long is the wait that I stop walking, growing dizzy of the circular trail, and again lean on the wall by the door leading to Shirogane's room. Slightly opening it, his breathing is calm again. But it's too slow, and he's paling a bit. Perhaps he only needs some rest, but I cannot risk it. I should notify Marimo that he won't be taking part of the trainings tomorrow.

"Vice Commander?" She calls out.

"I am here, Your Highness. Do you have an answer?"

"Yes, allow me to thank you for your proposition. It is most benevolent of you, to shoulder my nation's developments despite all that you must deal with," she says, finally reverting to the proper and polite tone I know her for.

"It is nothing, I am merely doing my part," to protect Shirogane, the one who can tune the 00 Unit and aid me the most.

"Regardless, forgive my prior words if they were abundant in hostility. Now then, while I would welcome your proposition to restart the XFJ Project, I cannot simply hand it over."

"I understand and agree with your concerns, Your Highness. I was thinking on having 1st Lt Takamura lead the development once more, as she had done while in Yukon, and procure some test pilots from my ranks. Would that be agreeable to you?"

"Yes, it is reasonable. However, would you allow me to make a counteroffer and another petition?"

"… I'm listening."

"First, there were some concerns raised about possible volcanic activity," she says, heaving a sigh, collapsing in true concern. "While I would wish for our own troops to tend to the civilians whose lives are endangered, we cannot meet the numbers required to scour the area in its entirety."

Perhaps due to that rumor of BETA stragglers in the mainland? If their forces are split in two, then yes, it would be impossible for them to have enough hands available. This does sound like one of the accidents Shirogane brought up before, a natural disaster we could use to appeal to the Shogunate. Heh, he doesn't know how right he was about that. Yet another thing to thank him for.

"Are there inquiries coming to the UN's offices already?"

"There should be, I believe. Would you be willing to spare some of your troops to aid the relief efforts?"

"Yes, it is no problem. I assume, two or three TSF squadrons along the foot soldiers would suffice?"

"Indeed. Thank you kindly, Vice Commander," back to the polite tone, clearing away the arrows in threat.

"It is nothing but a small exchange of favors, considering the deference you've shown my project through the years. There was something else you wished to ask, yes?"

"Indeed, regarding the formation of the crew for the XJF Project," she takes in a small breath, a small brief silence. "Would you welcome the two younger members of the Tsukuyomi family to join the team of pilots?"

"I… suppose I could consider it. Would you wish them to be your eyes, then?" It makes sense, she wouldn't lose the chance to have her own people involved.

"Indeed, if you so allow. I believe their expertise will benefit the project greatly. However, I suggest you include other UN pilots, preferably not related to the nobility, to avoid courting controversy with the other Regent Houses," she says, welcoming yet sharp.

"Hmm. You're correct on the last point, and I suppose I'd welcome the proposal, if only to not have to take pilots from other squads."

"And, if you'd allow a petition?"

"Yes?"

"Could you allow both cousins to oversee Shirogane's activities from now on?"

"… I do not believe it wise, Your Highness. He already has a bad reputation on this base, to be tailed by Royal Guards would-"

"They can be some sort of guardians, if you may," she insists, raising her voice slightly. "Consider it my personal apology to both you and cadet Shirogane for my careless mention of Lucifer. The cousins can officially be assigned to watch over Shirogane as he moves around the base during the duration of his punishment, to ensure no one dares to lay a finger on him. If questions are raised, they can immediately answer that they are the apology the IRG is giving the cadet for harming him during battle, and they themselves can dispel any ill assumptions anyone could have," fast are her words, faster the justifications she employs before I can even retort. While I welcome the fortification of Shirogane's shield…

"Your Highness, might I ask why do you propose this arrangement?"

"Well, as you should be aware of, Shirogane was trained by the Tsukuyomi House. He was a good fellow to both cousins, I can only imagine the dismay they must be feeling at the moment," flickering lights come off as she sighs, the slow and honest dejection she feels coming to the surface for a moment. It lasts little, as she coughs and any ripples in her voice are erased instantly. "If it'll take time for us to facilitate a meeting, then the cousins can keep Shirogane safe until then. Also, they might be able to aid in the recovery of his memories while interacting with him."

"Yet, I would expect them-"

"Yes, they shall abide by the rules of your base, XO," she immediately counters. "Were you to grant my selfish request, I shall inform them of the arrangement so that you can debrief them at a latter moment with the way in which you'd allow them to safeguard Shirogane."

"Very well, I can agree to those terms. Consider your petition accepted, Your Highness."

"Thank you kindly for your understanding," she says, a minute pause as she coughs. "I suggest we leave the matter of the XFJ Project for after the trial run of this OS, to avoid rushing our moves."

"I agree. I am too busy for the moment, and procuring the 1C units would take time regardless. I shall move some strings from my position to inform the right people I would be willing to hear a proposition for the XFJ Project, so that you do not have to compromise your standing." A small gesture of thankfulness, lowering my neck a bit is not beyond me if it nets me this many benefits.

"That is appreciated," she answers. "If you'd allow a final query before we end this call, how would cadet Shirogane be as of now?"

"I took a look at his room a moment ago, he seems to be resting easy for now. If there are any updates, I suppose I shall relay them through the younger Tsukuyomis at a latter time."

"Is that so? Well then… I shan't take more of your time, I am certain both of us have much to arrange." Taking another pause to breath in, restoring the bright and polite tone, she then coughs once again.

"Thank you kindly for understanding, Vice Commander. I shall do what I'm able from my position to fulfill my part of our accord."

"As will I. However, there's something I must ask," I sigh, grasping my chin as I look at the door to his room. "I know you said he was a fellow already, however, was Shirogane merely another trainee to them, just the son of a prior vassal?"

"… Why would you be asking this?" Once more, coldness and venoms.

"Curiosity, one might say. I understand he might have been a good soldier when in service of the IRG, and that his father also was a worthy vassal, however-"

"Vice Commander," ailing venom, horns to war, "I know not what spurs these inquiries, but allow me to tell you this. If anything were to happen to Shirogane, if even a single hair of his is hurt while under your care, all of what we discussed thus far will be no more."

"Your Highness, with all due respect, I'm merely inquiring on his situation to avoid further damage to his psyche. It is only-"

"No, there is nothing to debate. Do not think yourself capable of beguiling me. What is it that you truly wish to ask of me? Why am I overseeing his safety in person?"

"… If you wish to get to the point, yes, that it is exactly. I am not demanding vast details, I'm merely… surprised, that you would confront me of all people in such forwardness."

"I could say the same of you," she lightly scoffs. "It is most odd you'd shield a mere cadet to such extents, even in front of the General of the IRG, and myself as of now."

"I am merely returning the trust Shirogane placed in me. It is only obvious I would safeguard someone who has given me plentiful satisfactory results since he has arrived."

"Well, I could say the same," she replies, still very much caustic. "Shirogane was a good fellow, to the Tsukuyomi family, to General Guren, and…" a small pause, another second to inhale sharply, "and he also was a good fellow to me."

"What do you mean? Was he-"

"All I'm willing to say is, Shirogane was a personal vassal of mine at one point, as perhaps you have been notified of already. For me, to have learned that he was left to die is nothing but a mockery. I am merely extending to Shirogane the fair helping hand this nation denied him when he needed his fellows the most. It is only obvious a Regent would look after its vassals, and that is what I am doing as of now."

Not a single opening to interject, no hesitation in the wording either. And not even a hint at dousing the caustic poison that crept up from behind the veil of politeness. Just a fellow? Don't make me laugh. Maybe… No, what maybe? It's clear as day, she… she and Shirogane had something going on between each other. Either that, or it was a one sided thing. He is kind of dense at the most inappropriate times, for some reason.

"… I see. I believe I understand now, why you chose to act as you did. Your Highness, Shirogane is in good hands. I assure you of that."

"Sigh… I hope you are correct," suddenly losing impulse, where did her previous bravado go to?

"Is something the matter?"

A moment of silence, a few drowned whispers on her end, before she once more sighs. "Vice Commander, allow me to bestow you a word of warning."

"… Huh?"

"I am not only directing this negotiation myself due to my worry over my vassal. To be honest with you, Shirogane wasn't particularly fond of the UN Forces during his time serving me. Beyond my wish to safeguard my fellow, there is also a concern towards your safety and the project," she says, with not an ounce of hesitation, again.

"Are you suggesting Shirogane could… harm me or my research? Forgive me, Your Highness, but I do not believe that to be the case," I state, placing a hand on my hip, speaking firmly from my stomach. "He hasn't shown himself to be such an aggressive person, nor has he displayed any discontent with his position or comrades. Shirogane has shown an admirable mental fortitude, for all that he has been enduring not once has he acted out of line or lashed out to anyone else, despite having opportunities to do so. "

"Yes, he is that kind of person, who would shoulder it all on his own," for a brief moment, a slow, sweet tint returned to her voice. "Yet, you must beware his silences."

"His… silences?"

"Yes. Has he ever remained staring at you, saying nothing, for long periods of time?"

"Perhaps, at times."

"Sigh… That was what he did, whenever he was growing anxious, angered. I do not wish to have his presence in your base compromise the project, to have the eyes that might be set on him to use his woes regarding the databases to strike at Alt. IV. It will already be arduous enough to have to restore his data in the first place. Thus, I've no other choice as of now but to leave him to you," she says, once more growing serious. "However, I expect you to handle Shirogane with care, more so if he grows angered or if he comes seeking answers to you. An offense towards him equals an offense against my very person. Am I being clear, Vice Commander?"

"… Of course, Your Highness. Then, I suppose my propositions will receive your blessing?"

"Indeed. I shall do what I'm able from my position to ensure the next meeting is resolved peacefully. You have my word that the required papers are already being prepared to make a reality of what we have agreed on," she says, then sighs. "I shan't take more of your time, for I am sure we both are very busy. I hope our next talk can be held in… more auspicious circumstances."

"As do I, Your Highness. Until the coming meeting."

"Indeed, until the meeting," she says, not lowering the edge until the very end, until the call is ended.

Sigh… Leaning on a wall, I bring a hand to my forehead. Damn it all, this almost got out of control. Well, I suppose I got more than I bargained for now. Shirogane will stay, with enough time to regain his health. The pickles will now work as bodyguards for him, so I don't have to deal with that or any idiotic soldiers trying to pick a fight with him. Her Highness will favor my petition, and perhaps even grant me the XFJ Project so that we can work on that little idea Shirogane had. Now I don't have to negotiate as deeply as I thought I'd have to with Takamura and the Takatsukasa fellowship. And I was already planning on sending Shirogane and his squad to the relief efforts for this supposed accident with the volcano, but now I can use that to prove to Her Highness I am truly on her side for as long as she's in mine. And once Shirogane aids the people in this mission, and takes our troops to victory in the XM3 trials, I'm sure his image will gradually get better and better.

I still should let him rest tomorrow, without bringing anything up until the afternoon. He needs the rest, so that his mind can recover. I suppose it was obvious, he'd have to take a break from the constant work he's been doing since the CCSE. And now I can ensure he'll stay here, as well. I do have to notify Marimo he'll be taking the day off, I have to go return this communicator to the guards, and there are a few papers to tend to still. Well, this took quite the dangerous detours, but now everything is on the rails again. All that's left is making sure Shirogane remains in good health and-

"Yuuko!"

Turning around, Yashiro is guiding Motoko-nee towards me. Her steps lower in speed, she takes out the cigarette she was smoking and throws it in a nearby bin, then rearranges her glasses as she comes closer. Yashiro joins her hands, giving me a bow with a bit of tension in her lips.

"My apologies for the delay, Professor."

"It' alright, Yashiro. I was just done with the call, too. So Motoko-nee, I believe Yashiro should have told you what I need you for?"

She shrugs, one eye closed. "Oversee his status? I don't know why you're so concerned, or if you were being serious before. But don't worry," she then smiles, a subtle nod my way, "in the worst case, it's a matter of doing a blood test to verify which medicine we can give him to aid in the recovery from the shock. I'll work on the assumption that anti-depressants are a no-go, is that fine with you?"

"Yeah, that's a good call." I nod, folding my arms. After what the sedatives did to him in the cockpit, it's for the better to keep him away from those. "At least the injection Homura prepared calmed him down immediately, so you can work from there."

"Roger. By the by, there was another downwards spike in the G-Radiation," she says, business face in place. "This time, it was localized in the perimeter of the base. Do you think this is related to the boy?"

"I see, so that happened." Would explain his outburst, another forceful recovery of memories. So Her Highness ended up using a catalyst, huh. Was it that date in particular, or did his thoughts went elsewhere? "I think it is, for now. When you give him a checkup it should turn out something, anyways."

"Yeah, I suppose. Is there anyone else in the room now?"

"No, I dismissed Homura as well. This little matter remains between you and me, and nobody else can inquire about it." I remain staring, unblinking.

Yet, Motoko-nee smiles and chuckles lightly. "I understand, don't worry. Who would have said you'd be this overprotective of your pawns? Maybe there's something going on here?" She asks, raising a brow, raising a finger on each hand and slowly tapping them a few times.

"Ugh," sighing hard I shake my head, a hand massages my forehead, "this is not the time for jokes, Motoko-nee."

"Ahaha, sorry. You do look a bit too stiff and serious, though," she says, placing her hands on her pockets. "So relax a bit, he's in good hands with me here. It is a bit of a bummer that I won't get to talk with the famous Shirogane, but what can we do? Maybe you can let me ask him some questions once he wakes up?"

"If they're actually related to his condition, you may proceed once he regains consciousness. But, I warn you," grasping my chin, taking a step forward as I frown, my eyes remain fixated on hers, "if you do or say anything stupid in front of-"

"Don't worry, I won't," she sighs, waving both hands down. "Can't believe you let Mitsuko talk with him face to face yet you get so defensive in front of me. I'm just curious, is all."

"Sigh… Just do your thing, Motoko-nee."

"Yes, I will. After all, I can't exactly talk with the guy if he's out of commission. And don't worry, I won't scare him out when we share our first words."

"At least he didn't get a bad impression of you from the call, so just keep it professional, okay?"

"Huh? Yeah, of course, but…"

"What?"

"What do you mean by 'call'? You never allowed me to talk with Shirogane before, Yuuko."

…

Her eyes don't veer from mine, there was nothing impeding the flow of her words. She stands still, raising a brow at my silence, so she isn't teasing me this time.

"Motoko-nee, stop messing around. If you want me to say it, fine, I'll play along. I'm talking of the call he answered yesterday while I was asleep."

She blinks in quick succession, lips twisting a bit. "Yuuko, no one picked up the phone yesterday."

"… What are you talking about? Shirogane told me he picked up the calls you made, and told you I was resting. That's why you sent me a mail, right?"

Again, blinking fast. As she was opening her mouth, Motoko-nee slightly hunches forward while rubbing her forehead with two fingers. Eyes squinting, lips quivering fast as if she were talking to herself. Not meeting my gaze, she looks up as she keeps stroking her head.

"No, I… I was calling you for a report, but you didn't pick up. And then… And then I figured you must have retired for the night, so that's why I sent you a mail instead asking you to take care of yourself."

"… Excuse me, what?"

"What is it? I'm telling you, nobody picked up the phone yesterday."

"But there's no way that's-"

"P-Professor," Yashiro calls for me, she was by the door to Shirogane's room.

Standing still, she turns around. Shaking subtly, yet enough to be noticeable, she looks as terrified as when he showed us those memories of war the day I snapped at him.

"What is it? Is he having another breakdown?!"

"No… I can't…"

"What is it?!" I move past her, gripping the doorknob and blasting the door open. Inside, the same image meets my eyes. "He's still sleeping soundly. What is the issue, Yashiro?"

"… I can't sense him."

"Pardon?"

"There's no… no color. I can't hear him or sense his aura. It's as if…" she then holds her hands close to her chest, looking down, crashing down, "as if he weren't there."

What? But… I look back at the bed, and he's still breathing as calmly as before. Taking slow steps towards him, I place my hand on his chest through the sheets. His heartbeat echoes into my hand. I then grab one of his wrists, and his pulse is still there. Running a hand over his face, near his nose, shows me he is still breathing.

"Yashiro, are you certain of what you're saying?"

"Y-Yes. I… There's no color around him, at all," she insists, grimacing a bit when looking his way.

"But he seems fine, perhaps he's in a too deep slumber due to the medication and the shocks?"

"Yuuko, are the appliances connected to the guy?" Motoko-nee asks, walking to the other side of the bed, looking at what the readings showed.

"Yes, they should be." Looking at the cables on his chest, at the small threads connected to the headband he always used when recovering memories, there's nothing wrong here. "Do you see something odd?"

"… Come here, and you'll see it too."

What has made her be this serious? Slowly pacing to the other side of the bed, brushing my bangs off my face, I look at the… monitors. One has his heart rate, which remains stable along the other numbers shown alongside it. The other monitor, the one connected to the headband… which is supposed to be tracking his brainwaves…

… is coming up empty.

…

"Yuuko, are you sure that thing you made isn't broken?" She asks, leaning closer as she taps her glasses.

He said once, when he gave me the theories before Niigata… about the experiments I did to him on another loop, on how he works as a conductor…

"Yuuko, are you listening?"

That when he started seeing dreams of his world, his consciousness was slipping between timelines. That we couldn't track his brainwaves when that happened, and that I relied on Yashiro to keep his 'self' ingrained to this world while he brought the theories back from his world.

Grasping my hair, feeling my mouth start to open, I look at him. Sleeping so soundly, as if he had already had a good fill of food after a day's work. But the monitor still shows no signs of his brainwaves, and most importantly-

"Yashiro, do you still not feel anything from him?" I ask, staring. She shakes her head, lips crashing down as she touches one of his hands.

"Yuuko, what is going-"

You're kidding me, right?

His consciousness is slipping away? At this time, after I finally managed to negotiate a ceasefire with Her Purpleness?

Something touches my shoulder, shaking it. "Yuuko, snap out of it! What's the problem?"

What am I gonna do if he doesn't make it back? Will he wake up now? But, if Yashiro can't feel anything from him, then there is no way she could anchor him to this world. Yet, he could merely be-

No, wait.

Motoko-nee forgot about speaking with him last night.

And Shirogane said that, if he were to leave, people would forget about his existence.

And this isn't him just dreaming… he was absorbing too much G-Radiation, seeing too many memories at once perhaps.

And if he couldn't break the link, if he couldn't halt the recollection, if he couldn't dissociate the memory from the present…

… What if his consciousness remains linked to that memory, to the link to the timeline of that memory?

"Yuuko, please, tell me what-"

Placing a hand over what was shaking my shoulder, I take it off me as I walk up closer to the bed. The headband is shining in a pattern, recording information. Which means, it isn't broken. Which means, his consciousness isn't here at the moment. But if his aura also isn't here, it means there's no anchor to him in this world. That he simply started to… seep out to another world.

… Motoko-nee had said something odd, that she hadn't talked to Shirogane when she called before. Does that mean he was starting to slip while in the cockpit? Or, is this related to his greater absorption of G-Radiation?

… What if I'm tackling this in the wrong way? What if he's absorbing more radiation to make up for the deficit he's spending? If he's seeing many memories, traumatic and heavy ones at that, he'd be using up his own pull to do that. And the fluctuations of G-Radiation, the physical manifestation of the conductor's and nucleus' influence on the material plane, indicate Shirogane started to absorb more and more out of nowhere. And if he were to deplete his reserves… it is possible his existence could vanish once more. After all, so long as he remains as an anomaly, the only thing tethering him to reality is his own willpower and the excess of G-Elements that should have been used to allow him to exist in another timeline. Not only that, but if he is this world's Shirogane as I think he is, then he truly should be dead.

He's dealing with the pull of another world that tries to regain its Shirogane as well as the data of this world which says Shirogane should be dead. When he's unconscious and after having exhausted his G-Radiation on two toilsome memory recovery sessions.

…

"Motoko-nee, take Shirogane to 22F. Connect him to the device and begin treatment immediately."

"Huh? W-Wait a second, by the device you don't-"

"Yes, you know the one," I nod, her eyes part open wide. "Yashiro, you help her take Shirogane there in a gurney or something. I'll go handle what duties I have left, I'll go there once I'm done."

Nodding to them, Yashiro quickly returns a nod before going to the other end of the room to prepare the equipment to take him to the teleporter.

Motoko-nee grasps her forehead, sighing heavily. "Yuuko, what is going on here? Can you-"

"Motoko-nee, what should you be doing right now?"

"I'm just asking-"

"Preparing Shirogane to take him to the causality sensor, exactly. Could you be going there, right this instant? Yes, thank you very much. Now, if you wouldn't mind, stop staring at me, and get moving already. Yashiro should know what to look for, you connect him into the machine and check his brainwaves as well as his G-Radiation. If it's too low, start the machine and make sure he's taking it in."

"Taking it in? You want him to absorb more radiation?"

"Are you just going to repeat all I say like a parrot now? Come on, you have your orders. Prepare Shirogane to take him there, and make sure you take good care of him . Am I being clear? Good, thank you, now start moving."

Squinting my eyes at her, I nod and fold my arms before turning around and going to exit the room. As the door slides open, I take one last look at Shirogane. He seems to be sleeping as calmly as he was this night in the sofa, just without snoring. It seems as if he still were here, about to wake up any second.

But that might not be the case. Sighing hard, I shake my head and make my way into the hallway, towards the elevator.

This has got to be a bad joke, now of all times. All because I didn't warn him of the sedatives, because I put him in a call with Her Highness…

No, focus! There's a few duties left on my timetable before I can excuse myself to my 'office'. I also have to leave word in case we receive a call asking for our help on the relief efforts. In any case, there's still time. His body is still here, and I still clearly remember what happened thus far.

Yes, we… were talking in the medbay about how I didn't tell him anything, and he was pained about not recalling what he had seen. Then, I tried to motivate him by promising to treating him as an equal.

Phew… I still remember every second we waste puts him in greater risk, and also can make people forget about him. A small silver lining is that this happened during the day, so people being awake and after he made such a show in the mock battle should work as a deterrent to his data flowing out of this world. Sigh… Thankfully, I haven't activated the 00 Unit yet, so Kagami being alive is another safety net we have available. But that only confirms the status of the loop. Damn, and since we haven't made any testings to have him jump to other timelines, I have abso-fucking-lutely nothing on how to halt the memory leaks. Shit…

"Yuuko, hey!" Turning my head back as I stop walking, I see Motoko-nee jogging towards me. "Come on, wait a second here. Tell me what's going on, and why would you do something as crazy as taking the boy to that machine."

"Motoko-nee, what did I tell you to do?" I ask, folding my arms.

"Huh?" And she, for some fucking reason, opens her eyes and stares at me dumbfounded. As if this were an amusing joke, not even taking my order seriously.

"I had ordered you to take Shirogane to the underground causality sensor, didn't I? So, if you wouldn't mind, could you obey your orders and go back to the medbay?"

"H-However, at least tell me what-"

Taking a step forward, raising a hand to a wall, my stomach turns as I frown. "We don't have time for explanations! Shirogane , to the underground. NOW!"

"… Any specific directives you'd like to share with me, XO?" She asks, standing in attention, sobering up.

"I already told you an overview of what to look for. I'll finish my active duties and then join you later. On your way, now," I glare, she nods and turns around to jog her way back to the medbay.

Sigh… Fuck, damn it all. Ruffling my hair, I also pick up my pace to the elevator. Accident after accident, what the hell is today? Reaching the end of the hallway, I slam the button and the light confirms the descent of the machine to my position.

But yes, it was all just an accident. For all I know, I'm overreacting. Yeah, he might just be seeing something in his dreams and Yashiro can't sense his psyche.

…

He wouldn't leave us hanging, after all. Shirogane wouldn't… turn his back on us now.

The door opens, I enter and slam the button to my office and the whirring of gears starts the way down. I throw myself against a wall, sighing hard, covering my sight, feeling my heartbeats clawing up my neck.

He is he even safe now? If he recovers too many memories at once, his psyche could be damaged. Or worse, he might revert to how he was in this world when he served Her Highness. And that's not all, if he somehow ends up in another world, if his mind slips fully from here, what happens if he ends up in a timeline without the means with which to return here?

… What if he ends up in his home world and in the weakness he must be feeling after all the issues with the IRG he chooses to try and stay there? He'll only suffer more, he may not get another chance to remember all of his knowledge if he dies.

"… You better be safe, Shirogane . This is just a little accident, a little slip up. And it was my fault, so I can admit that. You can say it, that I fucked this up for not listening to you. So… you better come back to me. Don't you dare… to be really gone… "

---

Two hours later.

(B22F. Teleporter's Room.)

---

The door slides open as I pass my ID on the reader, and I quickly go inside. The sound of clicking immediately reaches my ears, the smell of the smoke clogs my nose.

"Oh, hey," Motoko-nee waves at me, with a dead serious face. "Did you finish everything already?"

"It's all taken care of, or delegated to the right people. So," I fold my arms, looking at Shirogane. He's still unconscious, fastened to the machine as Yashiro holds his hand, eyes closed, "I suppose there has been no progress."

"No, he hasn't woken up nor have I managed to get a reading on his brain. Sigh…" her shoulders sag, she takes off the thing she was smoking and turns it off. Coughing once into a hand, she leans on the control panel, letting me get closer. "You were right though, once

I made a scan on him the boy was almost pristine clean of radiation. As if he had just gotten to the base."

"What? Was it that low?"

"Yeah, his levels are back to what's normal for those who remain here now. It's… uh, well, really odd to see it happen in front of me," she scratches an ear, tightness in her expression. "Yuuko, now that you're here, can you tell me in the Heavens is going on here? Because between missing brainwaves, G-Radiations sponges and the little girl being unable to sense anything, I think I'm dreaming right now."

"Sigh… Fine, I'll give you the summarized version of it." So I sigh, ruffle my hair as I tell her of the theories, and of Shirogane's status and how is he affected by the anomalies, saying it was due to him surviving an explosion of a G-Bomb on Lucifer instead of the truth.

She rubs her forehead, eyes lost upwards. Within her usually relaxed and clear eyes, only a small thread of light was visible as her features tighten further.

"So," she tentatively starts, licking her lips, "due to the Nucleus' pull, many memories he lost are rushing into Shirogane through the Conductor's link. And to sustain that connection, the G-Radiation he absorbed is given up in exchange of the memories. But, since he should have died for all intents and purposes, if he ever exhausts all of his radiation before you can 'stabilize' him, there's a chance his mind will slip to another parallel world?"

"Correcto, all data points to that being the case. The only thing is, Shirogane was never able to trigger a memory link on his own. So, this has got to be some of the heaviest, most core memories of his past. However, since he is different to how he used to be, he required a trigger, a catalyst for this to happen. I frankly don't know what's going on here to the fullest detail." Because if this keeps on happening, then he won't be able to even talk with the guards now. And that will sour our relations with the Shogun, and perhaps make him more negative as well. Shit… Just what kind of thing did he see? When he was trying to get up from the bed… he said someone was still alive. I wonder what was that about, who was that someone to send him into such a rampage.

"Okay, so, what do we do from here?" She asks, gazing at Shirogane.

"You already tried activating the machine?"

"At minimal levels, I don't want to cut the power line entirely."

"Alright, let's try to use as much power as we can get away with. Yashiro," I walk towards them, towards the paling and sunken shape of Shirogane and the equally sinking shape of Yashiro, "Have you managed to sense anything?" She shakes her head, very slowly while not meeting my eyes. "Very well,we're going to push the machine to almost full power. You focus on him as we do, alright?"

"… Yes."

We both step back from the surrounding area, closing the hatch of the circular shape at the top, where Shirogane is bolted as of now. Looking back, I nod to Motoko-nee and she pushes the first levers.

The shaking starts, the static begins to fill the air, I can feel it in my hair. As the sphere begins to rotate, as the pistons move up and down with more violence with each repetition. The graphs in the monitors don't change, Yashiro's expression remains focused, her hands tightly joined as she holds her breath.

So I grab two more levers and push them forward, activating more engines to feed power to the machine. As soon as I do, the faint cerulean glow begins to appear, but only as dim illumination over the metallic frame of the sphere.

And yet, as the noise of the engine fills my ears and the sphere becomes blurred in its rotation, the numbers don't change. Yashiro's brows begin to twitch, her mouth is partly open and taking small but deep breaths.

Even when I wait a moment, nothing shows signs of changing.

"Yuuko, should we…"

"Use one more, we risk a blackout if we push this further."

"Understood."

More noise, faster rotation, further tension in Yashiro's face as she now gasps with her mouth wide open.

But the numbers don't change, at all.

Despite waiting for a full minute.

Despite how the cerulean brightness now is clearly covering the whole sphere.

Despite being working at almost full output.

… It isn't working, at all."

"Fuck!" Punching the control panel, hunching onto it, both of my hands come to claw the back of my head. "Fuck, fuck, fuck… Why won't this work?! He should be reacting somehow to this!"

"Y-Yuuko, calm down. This is just-"

"How do you want me to calm down?! If he isn't regaining consciousness, if Yashiro can't sense his aura, then his mind really is seeping out to another world!"

Her hands raise, aiming at my shoulder, before they rest on my arm instead as she sighs heavily. "Look, I don't know what's going on here as well as you do, but there must be something to be done."

"Sigh… Yashiro, can you sense anything?"

Opening her eyes, her breathing compromised as she rubs her chests, she shakes her head. "N-No… I can see something… distant, buried. But I can't hear his thoughts or see his color at all."

Motoko-nee folds her arms, tapping her chin, "So not even you can get to his psyche?"

"At this rate, it might truly be… impossible to reach his mind."

"W-Wait!" Yashiro yells, drowning even the rotary gear for a second, while grasping my sleeve, bending it a bit. "Please, give me more time. I can… try harder."

Patting her head, I heave a sigh. "If you're doing all you can and still there's only a faint echo, there's little we can do now, can we?"

"But…"

"Hey, Yuuko," Motoko-nee calls, so I turn around and find her with her arms folded, staring at Yashiro with her eyes narrowed. "I'm just mentioning this, okay?"

"Huh? What?"

"Yashiro can't reach Shirogane's mind as she is now. So, uh, what if…" she slowly raises a hand, pointing at Yashiro's head, "we take off the bunny ears? Do you think that'll let her focus enough on his mind?"

"Ah… I hadn't thought of-"

"N-No, no, please…" the pull on my sleeve grew harder, Yashiro's further pleas are drowned by the machinery. Shaking, lips barely parting to speak her fears, she keeps her eyes bolted on the floor.

Gently placing a hand on her shoulder, she flinches at the contact. "Yashiro, this might be the only way to reach Shirogane's mind."

"I… I don't know if it'll work."

"I know. But it's either this, giving up, or… well… forcing you to scan his mind while inside the submersion mechanism."

"N-No, please!"

"C-Calm down, I'm just-"

"Don't medicate me, please!" Both hands grab my arm, dampness wells up in her eyes. "I don't want to forget, I don't want to forget! I'll try harder, just give me more time. Please!"

"Yashiro, it's okay!" Grabbing her by the shoulders and shaking her a bit, her almost desperate spiel is cut short. She remains still, lips twitching, as she stares at me. "It's okay, I won't… force that on you. I won't have you regress into a silent doll, and I believe I was clear when I said the previous times… were my mistakes. Sigh…" Patting her head, then clearing the lone teardrop that courses through her cheek, she looks up, wavering. "I don't know what could happen, if you try to use your full focus on a mind that's linked to another world. I don't know what Shirogane is thinking, so there are risks with asking you to, well, perform a proper mind dive into his psyche as of now. Not only for him, but for your health even if you fail."

"… I can try," she answers, barely audible.

"Let me remind you, forcefully synchronizing yourself with someone comes with its risks. His mind might reject yours, and without the limiter's safety net, I don't know what harm that might do to you. And still," I crouch, patting her shoulders, our eyes now at even height, "this might be the best shot we have to reach his mind, before he either slips out completely or people start forgetting about him. I won't force you to do this but, are you willing to?"

She breathes in, lips still shaking. Her eyes seek the sphere that still rotates, both hands again clasp together. Looking back at me, she takes in a deep breath, sharpening her features as she nods.

"Yes. I'll do it."

Petting her head, smiling her way, I nod back. "Thanks, Yashiro. And don't worry, I'll stop you if I see it's not working out."

I rise back up again, she closes her eyes as she leans on me, lowering her head. My fingertips rustle through her hair, looking for the clasp of the bunny ears. Merely undoing that causes Yashiro to shake for a moment, trying to calm her breathing. She looks back at me and nods, so I continue to remove the parts of the ESP limiters, she parts her lips as if to say something, but if she did I couldn't hear it through the rumbling of the machine. Which, by Motoko-nee's sober facade, is doing nothing to get Shirogane back here.

I remove the locks on the upper side, helping her slip her hair off the bindings. Yashiro lets out a yelp, grabbing the sides of her head, covering her ears. Slowly taking a few steps back, my eyes remain watching her features, her twitching eyes, the breaths she takes. Gulping hard and still breathing heavily, she removes the base of the sensors, quivering as she does. With one last quiver, as if she were outside under the snow, she then looks back at me as her whole hair flows downwards, her mind now free of the limiter's safety net on her powers. I stare at her, to make sure she's still feeling fine, and she returns a nod despite the frailty of the gesture, of the slow movements of her steps to look once more towards the rotating sphere.

"Alright. Are you ready, Yashiro?"

"Yes. I'll do my best… to reach Takeru-san's heart."

---

[Kasumi]

---

Like a very tall pile of papers falling on top of me when I was younger. That is what resembles the slight pain that surges forth all over my head.

The Professor says something, I can't hear well enough. My feet rustle forward, the blurred frame of the machine entering my sight again after the recoil.

And again, like a sudden fire breaking out, a line of pain comes into me. From my nose to my eyes, as if I had fallen head first into a bathtub full of boiling water. It makes my skin crawl, or as if something were crawling under it. Kind of as if I had many, many syringes draining my blood all at once on my limbs. It is strenuous, the mere sensation of nothingness on his mind as of now.

Gasping for air, it takes my all not to break my sight from the sphere. It is like an abyss, but it isn't hollow. Unlike the scans the Professor requests out of me from gathered intel on the BETA, there is 'something' pushing back against me. As if someone were drawing a line back and forth from my nape to the tip of my nose, it burns and hurts. When scanning the BETA, there is silence but there is nothing. No response, no acknowledgment.

But if I sense something pushing, it means Takeru-san is still here… somewhere in there.

"Yashiro, don't exert yourself!" she shouts, sounding more rough than the pistons of the machine.

But… but just a little more… I can't simply give up now, even if it hurts. Takeru-san might not wake up, or it might take him a long time to do so and people will forget about him. Maybe I'll start forgetting about our games, our talks, the stories he told me, the shapes he taught me in Cat's Cradle…

"… No, I don't want that."

So I close my eyes very, very tight. So tight that a few lights start swirling, and the pain, and the burning grows harder to endure.

That small glimmer, I have to… get to it, somehow. If I focus on what I know of him… on the images from his world… and try to project that into his mind, maybe that'll spur-

"Ugh!"

I open my lips, trying to scream. I can't hear myself, I can't feel air coming into me.

Everything grows blurry, the images I was recalling starting to mix and bend. The sole thought of pushing this into him… caused the images to surface, and spiral into his heart. And the barrier that before was pushing me away… now is pulling me in.

Locked in place, everything spinning. Strained, sore and dry, that's how his throat feels. Whether I'm standing or not, I can't tell anymore. But every image of what he told me, of his games and pastimes, comes forward like a small bubble. Like the light reflecting the colors off it, the images bend and swirl, the table on his home as he ate with Sumika-san and that mean squadmate, the room that looks like a lot of TSF simulators, the classroom where talks with his friends, the PX as he juggles with his comrades.

Each and every bubble come up and up in my mind, as if forced out by the spinning, the spinning that doesn't stop. Blinking a few times, only a small cerulean light I can see. And the bubbles start to burst, to fade away. But the spinning continues, like if I were being shaken back and forth in a twister of water.

But I don't drown, the light simply seems to become more and more dim with each passing second, becoming thin threads amidst the spinning. And the bubbles keep raising up, raising to then burst, to then fade to nothing…

And it keeps swirling, swirling, as I keep sinking, sinking, sinking in the bubbles, the currents of the twister.

Slowly.. slowly… so quiet… so soft…

Like a small bubble raising to the sky, wobbling in the air…

"Hnngh…"

Hurts.

I don't know what.

But it hurts.

Where was I?

I don't recall the specifics.

It hurts.

My eyelids feel so heavy. It reminds me of spring, before the BETA attacked. All the pollen made it hard for my eyes to open well when the Professor took me to take a walk outside.

She always complained the pollen ruined her hairstyle.

Yes, it smelled… like faint grass, with all the flowers fluttering in the air like small stars in the sky.

It was pretty.

Yes… it was…

Hm?

I can't open my eyes, and I do sense… a faint and pleasant smell. It feels odd. My fingertips coil, I can feel my arms and legs start to retract, activating again. But the sensation I'm resting on, it's soft yet hard. Many small and soft things meet my fingers, yet my back is sore and stiff.

Finding my palms on the ground, I raise my upper body and rub my eyes. Slowly, a blurry image comes into my sight as I take a deep breath.

"… Huh?"

A city. A real city. Not ruins, but a real city. I slowly stand up, seeing the… greenery around me. The grass growing wildly, the trees with all of their branches filled with leaves as they're rustled by the wind.

"It feels so… fresh." The air is so clean, is feels so nice. Looking up, the sky looks so… well, blue. A vast expansion of blue and clouds can I see from this height, almost to the horizon itself.

But it's so strong, and so clear. The sun is shining strong, so it looks more lovely.

And as I look behind me, a very, very large tree rested on the place, as if declaring itself owner of the foliage.

"Wait, this place… Is it the hill near the base?" I do recognize the place, the altitude. But…

But where the base was supposed to be, there's a similar building but without the radar dish or any security I also can't see the training grounds, either.

"… Where am I? I was… Ah! Takeru-san!"

Yes, I was trying to reach his mind. Then, when I thought of sending images of his world into his mind… those images went without any impediment into his heart, and I couldn't stop myself from sending more and more images, to sink more and more. And then… And then, what happened to me? Where is this place?

Well, standing around won't give me any answers. I suppose, I should try to descend the hill.

Slowly walking through the greenery, the daylight pouring through the treetops, the air rustling the grass, it feels so… alive. So nice. I don't remember the base's perimeter to be this nice when I was little and we went on walks. The air is still feeling so fresh, as well.

After moments of solitude and silence, I find a small road on the descent of the hill. Shortly after, I find myself on the slope that leads back to the base.

"Should I go there? I don't even know what is happening here… Oh!"

Someone is coming down the street, sporting civilian clothing. Should… Should I try to talk to that person? Uh…

Taking in a deep breath, I try to cross the street to intercept the person, the woman that comes down the street.

"Uh, excuse me. Do you have a moment?" I say, giving a small bow.

The woman doesn't even react, and keeps walking towards me. Maybe she didn't hear me well?

"Uh, excuse me. I do not wish to bother you, but could you tell me where am I?"

The woman keeps walking, walking past me without even looking my way. As she passes me, I realize that I can't sense her thoughts. Or see her colors.

…

I had removed my limiters, didn't I?

Patting my head, however, has my fingers finding the bunny ears in place once again. Even in a reflection of a window, I can see myself with them atop my head. Why? What's… What's happening here?!

Turning around, I follow after the old woman. "Uh, forgive me. But could you tell me-"

I reach out to grab her sleeve, yet my hand slips past it. Staring at my hand, blinking for a moment, I walk after the woman and again try to grab her.

Yet, my hand simply passes right through her, time and again. As if I were a ghost, unable to even touch her. Panting after trying for so long to catch up to the woman while climbing the hill, I rest my hands on my knees.

"What… is going on here? Professor… Where are you, Professor?"

Picking up my pace, I direct myself to the base. Yet, I find the doors closed. Not by the usual guard post, but by a mere sliding door with bars. There is no plaque that would distinguish this place as a base, and there is no equipment to suggest that is the case, either.

Then, what is this place? Why did my hand go through that woman? How did I get here?

… How do I go back?

Feeling something cold down my back, I turn around and run. And run, and keep running.

Even when no one answers my voice, when I pass right through the people walking on the street.

Even when the sun comes down harshly on me, as my breathing becomes ragged and I have to slow down.

There is no one who would answer me here, no one has any color in this place. I can't hear anything. The absolute lack of sounds just makes me run faster, faster, through the streets, through the people.

"Professor! Professor, where are you?! Can you hear me?!"

Panting again, I slow down where I stand, hunching over and grasping my knees, feeling the sweat run down my chin. As I take in air, I hear a small chime. Then, a louder noise. The rumbling of an engine, followed by that awful noise when the exhaust sends lots of smoke out. Looking up, there was a large bus on the street in front of me.

Coming my way. Speeding up. Getting closer. And closer, and-

"H-Hyaaa! A-Ah… Ah?" Opening my eyes, I see people seated on the bus as they pass me.

After a moment, the bus goes its way down the street, other cars also rushing through the asphalt, through me as well.

Blinking through it all, panting and feeling my heart about to leap out of my mouth, my feet drag themselves back to the houses. People come and go, some talking, others hurrying through the lights before it turns red. Yet, everybody passes right through me, not even hearing me.

Like a small shadow, always stepped on, never acknowledged.

Sitting down, I bury my face in my arms. Taking many repeated deep breaths does little to calm myself. Where am I? How did I get here? Why does nobody see me? I was… I was just trying to help Takeru-san…

"Hic… W-Where am I? P-Professor… please, help me…"

How am I getting back to the base? Am I dreaming? Or, maybe, did I get lost like Takeru-san's mind was going to? What if… all that's left of me is this, just my consciousness and no physical body? What am I gonna do?

I won't be able to come back.

If I can't even talk to people… maybe I could use objects to communicate, as if I were one of those urban legends the Professor told me about. But would that even work? I would have to find the Professor, and I don't even know where to look. Maybe she would appear in that building that's in the place of the base, since it should be a school…

But what do I do in the meantime? Will I get hungry? Do I have to sleep? How much time do I have left?

"Hic… Sniff… Professor, what happened to me?"

"Are you okay?"

"Huh?!" My head bolts upwards, I find a small pair of eyes staring back at me. A young boy with a blue shirt looks at me, tilting his head.

"Are you alright? Did you get hurt?" An equally small hand reaches out, as if offering me a handshake.

"N-No, I'm fine. I, uh… You can see me?"

"Hmm? Yeah. Why?"

"I, well, no one seemed to even see me, to listen to me…" Slowly, I stand up by accepting his hand.

"I see. But, are you hurt?" He asks, tilting his head again.

"No, I'm fine, thank you." Dusting off my clothes, I then sigh and join my hands.

Looking at him, the boy is even smaller than me. His light brown hair is made a mess, all swirly and knotted on its own. He has a few things on his person, however. A small pink cat with very long fur on one shoulder, an aquamarine tuna on the other that seems to be opening its mouth to talk non-stop. A brown dragon with a pair of glasses clings to his right arm as it makes a rather displeased expression, a dark dragon to his left one with both eyes closed and its head flopped limply on the boy's arm. Atop his head, two small bunnies lay comfortably as if they were small loafs of bread. One has much black fur, but its face and tail are white. The other is the opposite, most of its fur is a pristine white except for a few dots on its face and the tail, which are dark. Walking by his side, two small puppies were looking up at me. One with a sharp shape to its fur, which seemed to shine proudly in blue, the other with more careful waves to its hair, which took a dark purple tint. And clinging to the boy's back, another small kitty, with strong red hair and a small yellow tie as decoration, meowed at me as it climbed into my sight.

… How odd. Something tells me animals shouldn't have these kind of colors to their furs. Also, I am certain dragons are already extinct.

"Are you alright?" The boy asks, furrowing his brows at my silence.

"Ah, yes. Um, why do you have so many pets with you?"

"Because I like them. And they're not pets, they're my friends!" He says, puffing his cheeks and pointing a finger at me. The white rabbit that was on his head thumps and opens it mouth, hissing at me.

Taking a step back, I look away. "Sorry."

"It's okay. So, are you really fine?"

"Yes, I'm fine. Uh, do you know where we are now? I was… trying to find someone."

The boy purses his lips, folding his arms, the dragon with glasses hissing in complain as it has to shift its posture to not fall. "… I think I recognize these streets, but I don't really know where this is."

"I see…" Of course, he's just a child. He probably doesn't even know anything other than the streets near his house, just as I don't know anything beyond the base's perimeter.

"Are you lost, miss?"

"No, well, maybe. As I said I am… looking for someone." I look at him, and I can detect his aura. A small glimmer of yellow and orange, positivism and happiness, energy and drive.

Why can I sense him just fine and why does the rest of the people ignore my presence? Looking around, I see someone coming down the street, a few young people chatting it seems. Stepping towards them, they don't stop walking as I approach. Standing still in the middle of their path, I close my eyes. Taking a deep breath, joining my hands, licking my lips.

When I open my eyes once more, the people were now walking on their way. They, too, passed right through me. Why?

"What are you doing?" The boy asks, arms folded as he raises a brow at me.

"I was… trying to make them notice me. Uh, can you talk with the people that are here?"

"Why would I?"

"Uh, because… I don't know. Why did you talk to me?"

"Because you looked sad, like you were hurt."

"I see… Thanks. So, um…"

"Yes?"

"Where are you going with those… friends?"

"I'm going back home."

"Oh, I see. Is it nearby?" Maybe I could stay with him while I try to see what is going on here, at least I have someone to talk to.

"Well… I don't know," he then looks down, lips cascading downwards as he kicks a paper that was left on the street. The white rabbit again looks at me and hisses.

"Are you lost, then?"

"I think. I was trying to go back home, but I don't know how to get there. So," he looks up, gesturing upwards with both hands open, "I started walking and walking, but I can't find the right way. Then, I saw you sitting there all alone and called out to you."

"I see. Well, I am lost as well, so I suppose that puts us in the same predicament."

"Predi… What does that mean?"

"Uh… It's another way to say conun… No, problem would be better."

"Ah, yeah. That's right," He nods twice, understanding the simpler term. "Oh, I know!" He suddenly shouts, making fists as his eyes blaze up.

"What is it?"

"How about we look together? Then, if we walk together, maybe we can find the person you're looking for and you can see if we pass through the same streets twice," He says, taking a step closer and smiling.

That smile… Wait, the color of his eyes and hair… the color of his aura…

"Um… Thank you for offering. Let's look together then."

"Yay! Thanks a lot!"

"No, it's nothing… So, uh, my name is Kasumi Yashiro, it's a pleasure to make your acquaintance," I then smile his way, offering my hand. "Who would you be?"

The boy then grabs my hand, shaking it with much vigor, causing me to slowly lean forward, my forearm and shoulder moving along as he shakes my hand over and over. All the while, the intense yellow climbs over me like a vine, like fire spreading over oil as his shiny gaze looks into mine.

And with a bright smile that could rival the incoming sunshine, he nods at me. "I'm Takeru Shirogane. Let's be friends, Kasumi-san!"

Iceberg of the Soul (I)

A/N: To that one reader who asked about the meaning of 'adusted', I took the word from a Yugioh card. Adust means to be burnt, blackened, scorched. The meaning I'm trying to convey is that, despite being burnt badly by the events of the war, Keru's anger is so fierce because it was born from those fires.

That's all this time. Thanks for reading and commenting. Stay safe.

Zuoriel

---

Chapter 75:

Iceberg of the Soul - Lights

---

December 3rd? Time Unknown.

(In a location similar to the Hiiragi District. Near a small shrine.)

[Kasumi]

---

"So, what did she do then?" I ask, minding my footing as we climb the stone steps in a hill, faint light pouring through the treetops.

Little Takeru-san puffs his cheeks, hugging both dragons to his chest, who bite and play with the leaves that sway in the air. "She got upset I showed her the pages, then punched my tummy so hard I went flying to the moon. Really, Sumika is so dumb sometimes," he nods to himself, the red kitty with a yellow tie softly nibbles one of his ears as it groans in complain.

"I believe you were the one at fault, you knew she disliked those pages of the book and you still showed them to her," I say, feeling my limiters move slightly as a hand raises to block a strong ray of sunlight from my eyes.

He pouts back at me, giving me a side glance. "But it was payback for not letting me read that before. And if she hadn't scribbled over those pages, we could have bought another new book to read," he nods to himself, the red kitty still lightly biting his ear, until the white rabbit atop his head stomps its feet, groaning a bit.

"Revenge isn't good, Takeru-san," looking into his eyes, I hold the light twist of his features, and how the dragons and the puppies seem to also stare at me in aggression.

"… Well, maybe it was a bit mean," he says, scratching the back of his head, both the pink and red kitties giving light taps to his hand. Takeru-san then pouts again, once more crossing his arms, causing the brown dragon to hiss in complain for a moment, its glasses almost falling. "But she didn't have to punch me into the moon."

"Takeru-san, don't exaggerate. Sumika-san wouldn't be able to hurt you that much," I say, flapping my limiters as the red kitty meows and rolls on his shoulder, playing with the tuna, who keeps on bouncing as if trying to hit the leaves that continue to gently rain down from the branches.

Yet, as if not minding any of the animals' ruckus, Takeru-san simply keeps on pouting. "I'm not exagge… I'm not lying! She really punched me into the sky!" Slowly raising a hand upwards, towards the sky… that had suddenly started to darken for some reason, his eyes blaze again as the black dragon remains attached to his arm without much care. "I could see the moon really well up there, you know. There was also this really slim machine that was flying, and there was a girl with a pink ribbon called Rina moving it and all."

"Huh? But… No, how could you-"

"It was Sumika's fault. Every time she uses her Drill Milky Punch, I end up in the sky. One of these days, I'm gonna turn into a star for real if she keeps doing that."

As he says that, the red kitty coils on itself, all of its hair growing spiky as needles, then tries to climb onto his head, only to be sent galloping away by the iron wall of the white bunny's hissing. As if munching on air, grumbling like the large machine was doing before I lost consciousness, the small thing doesn't relax until it sees the kitty back in the shoulder area.

"Um, Takeru-san?"

"Why are you still saying that? I'm not adult, Kasumi-san."

"Neither am I," I say, giving him a frontal look.

Which he simply answers by narrowing his eyes. "But you speak weird sometimes."

"… That is not true." I don't want you of all people telling me that, Takeru-san. "Anyways, um, don't you mind how they're always fighting?"

"Who is?"

"Well…"

Looking down at his chest, the brown dragon is trying to move the black one, so that both can rest in between his arms, but the black dragon remains slumped in place, comfortable in its position. While the black rabbit remains quiet and silent, the white one seems intent on receiving its attention, lowering its head and nudging the sleeping black bunny. Upon seeing the refusal, the ears of the white rabbit turn up as it thumps once more, groaning until Takeru-san raises a hand slowly to pet it for a moment. His hand is then caught by the pink cat, who nuzzles itself against it, making the puppies whine and tap his legs with their paws, the purple one standing on its back legs as it tries to lick Takeru-san's elbow while the blue one merely remains with its eyes fixated on his, whimpering as it rubs its face on Takeru-san's leg. And all the while, the red kitty meows loudly in complain, again nibbling his ear, while the tuna seems to enjoy the chaos as it bounces higher and higher. And he doesn't seem to mind, at all.

"… Your friends. Don't you mind that they're fighting all the time?" And anyways, how are you still walking so well with all of them clinging onto you?

"Oh, no, not really. They're always like this," he says with a half smile, stopping his ascent on the stone steps to crouch and extend some kindness to the puppies, letting the dragons stretch their wings. "It doesn't hurt or anything, and it's kinda comfy to hold them close," he says, hugging the puppies for a moment, kissing their heads before welcoming back the dragons into his arms, cradling both with one arm to leave the other free to tend to the animals on his upper half.

"I see… Well, if it you say so."

"You guys better be good, okay?" He tells them, lowering his tone and pursing his lips as he pets both puppies and dragons, who then seem to relax, if ever so slightly, in their pleads for attention. "Well, let's keep looking around. It got all dark now, though," he looks up as his brow furrows, wrapping his arms over both dragons again, rolling his shoulders to make sure the two kitties and the tuna remained in place.

"Yes, it was noon just a moment ago," I sigh, looking up at the dim threads of light that filter through the branches, the small distant stars up above, as we slowly continuing to rise.

It is also odd, despite how long it is taking us to climb these stairs, I am not fatigued in the slightest. There is no burning in my feet nor stiffness which impairs my legs' movements. Glancing his way, in the dim light that remains in the area little Takeru-san remains walking in the same energetic stride as if pushed by a tailwind.

His steps do not wane nor does he show hints of apprehension or exhaustion in his complexion. A simple breeze he resembles as he again tries to placate the puppies as they get too close to his feet, noting their displeasure with some faint barking, demanding attention. The purple one seems more aggressive in remaining close, walking by his side with almost no distance between them. The blue one's steps are more slow, slightly behind Takeru-san, as it walks and remains staring, staring right up at him patiently, firm and shining like a lighthouse in a foggy day.

The dragons are still bickering, the black one repeatedly bumping its head on Takeru-san's chin to get his attention, which makes the brown one spew some small embers its way. The tuna doesn't seem to mind all the chaos, and keeps on bouncing from one shoulder to the other. The pink cat grumbles as it slowly bends forward, lightly tapping the brown dragon with one paw as if trying to pacify it. Its efforts are not very effective. The red kitty simply remains playing with Takeru-san's hair or the leaves that are still falling. And the two rabbits are still curled together on top of his hair, seeming to be sleeping.

And he isn't even showing any signs of anger, despite puffing his cheeks as he scolds the animals. Was this how he used to be? Or, is this a representation of the most childish attributes of Takeru-san's current persona? He doesn't seem to recognize me, and also didn't react to my description of the Professor. All throughout this walking we've done, through that small park where he played with the red kitty and made sand cakes with both puppies as the other animals ran about and chased each other, through the bookstores and shopping malls, he has remained calm and bright.

… And I can understand now, why you want to bring some measure of peace back to our world, Takeru-san. It isn't as if it were completely different to the walks I've taken with the Professor, yet the sweet smell of the food in the shopping, the dust lingering in the air of the bookshops, all the bright and most colorful images on the books which he called 'Daemons & Drakes', and at the refreshing air that still remains now as we climb these stone steps under the moonlit skyline.

There is a soothing aspect to this air, to this pleasant silence, to the faint buzzing of insects. There is no rush, no haste in the steps, in the motions. It is all so calm, so simple, so… peaceful, not too different from that placid numbness that assaults me right before sleep as I hug Mister Bun. Even on the occasions when Takeru-san grabbed me by the hand and sped towards a store with a toy or a book he favored, it is all relaxing and soothing. And not sensing the colors of all those around us only accentuates the brightness of the stores, the multicolored lights, the kaleidoscope of butterflies and cocoons amidst a field full of flowers.

And as the stone steps hold steadfast, as the humidity of the night sets in and a chilly breeze blows through the trees, a small glimmer of lights reaches my eyes from the summit of the hill, beyond one of those large gates which indicate the entrance to a shrine, if my memory isn't failing me. But, why would there be such illumination coming from the shrine grounds? I believed their visiting hours did not extend to… well, whatever late hour it is supposed to be as of now.

"Takeru-san, do you know why are there so many lights in the shrine?" I ask, looking his way as I stop my ascent.

"Hm?" Standing a few steps behind me, one of his hands was stopping the white bunny, who wanted to jump from his head and was once more munching the air, and the other was halting the purple puppy, who was grumbling much as it pulled at its pants. "Maybe there's a festival going on?"

"You speak of a special date to celebrate?"

"I mean, that's what a festival is, right?" He says with a sigh, scratching the bunny's ears, petting the puppy. "You never went to a festival, Kasumi-san?"

"No, I never had the chance. So, um, do you think there's a path to your house close to this place?" I ask, staring at him while he placates the animals once more. If bringing him home is what causes this dreamscape to end, then it is perhaps what I have to do to bring both of us back to reality.

"Hmm… No, I don't think so," he answers, lips shrugging.

"I see. Then, should we look elsewhere?"

"Eh? Don't you wanna go see the festival?" He asks, coming closer.

"… It's fine. We should find your house first, it is dark after all."

"Mmgh… But, what if the person you're looking for is in there?"

"… He isn't, I'm sure. Come on. It'll take us much time to descend the stairs, so-"

A sudden and warm jolt in my hand, a strong twister of orange within my eyes, a faint scent of vanilla filling my nose. A wide smile and a tug on my arm. "Let's go see the festival, Kasumi-san. You never know if you might get another chance like this!" And without waiting for my reply, he starts to rush the way up the stone steps.

"W-Wait a mome- Takeru-san, don't run!"

"Then you start walking faster!"

"F-Fine, we can see the festival but please don't run," I lightly pull his hand, causing him to decelerate.

He then stares at me, in silence, as the two bunnies also do. The black one had raised its ears, apparently waking up from its nap, the white one was once more grumbling in discontent. "Okay, sorry. But you better not run away or-"

"I won't. So don't rush, we could fall."

"Okay. So, let's go! I'm sure you're gonna have lots of fun in the festival!" He says with a strong nod and a puff of his chest, irradiating more of that orange glimmer, warm as direct sunlight.

"… Thanks." So you always were as kindhearted as you're now, even if there is a certain rashness to the way of being of this small representation of your psyche.

Following after the starlight of his smile, we climb the last distance of the stone steps. And what unfolds once we do so is an expansive glimmer under the night sky. Much noise, concentrated brightness and smells. The laughter of most around, the rows yellow lanterns which cast light upon the grounds from above like marching fireflies, the many stands that are aligned and bustling with activity and odd trinkets, so full and noisy that it reminds me of the one time the Professor convinced me to put a mint candy in a can of soda and a geyser of bubbles began to burst from it.

Yet, unlike that time, the constant flow here is tranquil, pleasant as the breeze we could feel from the top of the hill at the end of our walks. As if multiple flowers had blossomed in unison as a strong gust blew, a shower of petals in different colors swirls everywhere I look. Strong, enticing smells float in the air, causing my tongue to trace my lips a few times, saliva building up below it.

It feels so… warm, and cozy, and welcoming. Nothing like the dead silent hallways, or the tense and grayed out meetings. Even if I can't sense the people in this place either, the scenery by itself paints such a radiant image.

"Come on," he pulls my arm, smiling again, "let's go see some stands!"

As I follow after him, as both of us pass right through the people in this place, many different stalls and foods reach my sight. Food I had only seen in blurred moments when speaking with Sumika-san, food I had sensed through the reminiscence of the Professor at odd times, yet now it feels real. As if it truly were in front of me, the small balls of octopus, the fish-shaped delicacies, or even the fluffy cotton candy clouds, the smell grazing me, daring me to step forward and take a bite. Yet, I can only purse my lips and knot my stomach.

As Takeru-san and I walk in, no one recognizes or acknowledges our existence, despite the abundant noise he and the animals are making, rivaling the surrounding sounds and drowning them at times. I can understand it with me, since I am an intruder on his mind. But, why would they not acknowledge his presence either? Isn't this his own dreamscape, his own inner mind? What does this mean, then? Was Takeru-san ignored during his childhood? No, all of our talks do not point to that being the case. On the contrary, he seems very happy whenever he tells me of the games and books he enjoyed with Sumika-san when they were growing up. Is this a reflection of his current self then?

"Kasumi-san, here!"

"Hm? Ah…" Filling my view, a small box with six balls that emanated heat and steam, which I believe are made out of octopus. Slowly gulping the excess saliva that clogged my mouth after taking in the aroma when grabbing the box, and actually feeling its weight on my fingers and the heat of the rising steam on my face, I see that Takeru-san also has one such box with him. "Takeru-san, how did you manage to make them hear you to buy this?"

Slowly, his cheeks puff as he brings one ball to his lips. "I couldn't."

"So, how did you buy this?"

"I didn't. I just took it from the stall," he shrugs, eating another ball.

"Wh- Takeru-san, you can't steal from other people," my lips twists as I frown his way.

He merely eyes me sideways. "It's their fault for not wanting to sell me some in the first place, and I did leave the money in the stall," still pouting, he eats another ball.

… Well, this is just a dreamscape so there is no actual theft occurring. I do wonder if he ever did something mischievous such as this when he was little. But… my lips twist in, traced by the tip of my tongue as I look down, at the food within the box. I wonder if I could taste it or if it will all be nothingness in my lips. Barely grasping the small wooden stick, the minute weight on my fingertips, the rising smell which greets me again as I take a deep breath makes my mouth water once more. And after a moment of hesitation, I lift one of them as my lips part and I bite onto the small meat ball.

"Mmgh!"

Hot.

It's too hot, my tongue is burning.

But it tastes good, and my cheeks constrict inward, and my mouth and palate remain burning softly.

Unlike the synth meat I'm used to, this is juicy but too spicy. The diluted aspect of the taste, of the texture is missing, instead I can sense the firmness, the resistance on my teeth. It doesn't feel as if it would merely disintegrate in my mouth without effort, on the contrary the taste spreads further as I try and gulp. Opening my lips ever so slightly, a few puffs of air aid me tame the spiciness. Gulping the rest slowly, my tongue hangs over my lips as I gasp. "Haa… This is too spicy. My mouth burns, ow."

"Of course it is," he says, not minding one bit as he keeps eating unaffected. "This takoyaki has spicy sauce, that's why I chose it," nodding once, he passes me a small bottle of water… that I assume he took from another stall as I was fighting the heat.

Taking a quick sip, I heave a sigh as I enjoy the freshness in my mouth. "So you like spicy food?"

"Yeah. You don't?"

"It's not that I don't, I just… never ate many things to begin with."

I don't have a complain with the diet the Professor has assigned to me, except her insistence on having me eat carrots. And I never ate, well, food that felt so… natural. Synthetic foods have always been on my plate, be it when under the Professor or… back in the ESP training facilities. Supposedly, all the synth ingredients of my dishes are fortified with the right vitamins to help me grow well and maintain a stable usage of my abilities, and I do not particularly dislike the taste they have.

However, I never tasted anything as intense as this 'takoyaki'. Not only the meat felt, well, juicy and firm, but the added spiciness is still lingering in my mouth despite the water I drank. It's as if part of that burning sensation had left a mark imprinted in my tongue. And I never had anything that carried such a strong, distinct taste in my life, not even after Kyozuka-san became the head cook of the base.

But, this is also so very weird. Usually, I can only 'see' what transpires in the minds of others, for only brief seconds. Unless it is a very clear memory or the person is welcoming to my scans, I cannot feel the sensations coming from the thoughts that they experience during their reminiscence. My scanning can only be detailed with surface thoughts, otherwise there is resistance from the minds of others. I know Takeru-san never feared me, and I never had any trouble to look into his mind, and I once could almost feel the 'fried food' he was speaking about, yet for me to be able to experience this many sensations-

"Ah! No, don't fight!"

"Hm?" Looking up, Takeru-san was trying to… separate the dragons as they hissed at one another. "Takeru-san, what's the matter?"

"The yakisoba, that's the problem!" He yelps, trying to hug the brown dragon. Who then groans as it releases itself, and then scoffs a small flare which engulfs Takeru-san's face.

Yet, as my breathing vanished from my lungs, as the fire spread fully over his features, it all vanished as quickly as it appeared. And I now find myself at a loss of breath, not in fear this time. His face smeared with soot and his hair taking an exaggerated circular shape, Takeru-san coughs a bit of smoke as he pouts, his cheeks puffing as much as they possibly could at the brown dragon who hisses and turns away from him, folding its wings and tail inwards.

"Ha… Hahaha."

"Don't laugh at me, Kasumi-san!" He yells, frowning a bit as he waves his arms up and down.

"N-No, I'm sorry. It's just… I didn't expect you to end up, well, in such a comedic look," I say, taking a deep breath as I place a hand on the base of my neck. "So, what happened?"

Rubbing his face with his sleeves, cleaning off parts of it and coughing a bit, Takeru-san then points to the dragons. "See, the black one jumped off my arms as soon as it smelled the yakisoba. It went straight to the stalls there and stole some of the sandwiches they have." I look upwards, to the roofs of the stalls, and see the black thing happily giving repeated bites to a sandwich, while having at least another three by its side. "Then, the brown one tried to scold it, but then they started to argue," he pouts, crossing his arms.

Indeed, the brown dragon is flying about, giving small shrieks and casting embers, yet the black one remains eating without a care. And it only seems to invigorate the brown dragon, before it flies away, going to try and line up at another stand. And yet, no one even pays attention to the spectacle. Looking further in, both kitties were trying to catch some small goldfish, ignoring the people that tried to do so with some small paper cups. The two puppies are now running around, panting and with their eyes sparkling at every little thing, barking and jumping at what attractions the stalls further in have in display. And… Why is the tuna bouncing so high in between all the stands?

"Takeru-san, why is the fish doing that?"

"I dunno. That one has too much energy," he says with a slow nod. And that was coming from you, of all people. "Well, if they're having fun, then it's all good. But these two sure ain't moving one bit," he looks up, at the two bunnies that remain comfortably sitting on his head, despite the circular shape his hair is in at the moment or the small trails of smoke that from it come out.

If my intuition is correct then, all these animals represent people Takeru-san likes much. The black dragon would be the quiet and shy squadmate, the brown one is the squad leader, the tuna is the loud and small of the group, the pink kitty is the hesitant girl who shot down the large HSST, the red one would be Sumika-san, and the puppies are… probably the mean squadmate and the Shogun? But then…

As I clean the rest of the soot off his face and ears, as my hands flatten and fix his hair, dusting it off, the two rabbits do not move. The white one grumbles when I lift it to clean Takeru-san's hair, while the black one slowly moves away when my hands get close. These rabbits… The black one, is that how this representation of your psyche sees me? Then, who is the white one? The Professor?

"Uh, Takeru-san?"

"Yes?" He coughs, dusting off his shirt, shaking his head and making his hair go back to its usual messy shape.

"Do you know why the rabbits don't leave your head?"

"No, not really," he shrugs again, closing an eye. "I mean, they're comfy there so I don't wanna bother them much. Bunnies are dangerous, after all."

"That's not true, bunnies are cute. Right?" I reach out to the rabbits, to try and hold them for a moment.

Yet, the white rabbit again groans and thumps on Takeru-san's head, eyeing me sideways with its ears flat on its head's sides. Merely placing my fingers on its soft and welcoming fur is enough to make it groan once more.

"See? She's super moody for some reason," he says, eyes narrowing.

"She? You can tell the gender?"

"Huh? Aren't all of these girls?" He asks, tilting his head, to which the white rabbit groans again as it has to shift its posture to not fall.

"But how do you- No, it doesn't matter. So, she's a girl?" Those little eyes lock onto mine, once more stomping its back legs. A small, delicate lowering of its posture, the white rabbit takes a step forward, again biting the air. Gulping on nothingness, my feet retreat on their own, tension in my stomach. "How come something so small and fluffy can be so scary?"

"She has a short temper, looks like," he chuckles softly, petting the moody bunny.

"Uh… Does this white rabbit have a name?"

"No idea," he then shrugs again, which makes the rabbit in question groan for a moment as it folds itself into a loaf again.

"I see…" I suppose this Takeru-san wouldn't know the Professor. But… Eyeing the other rabbit, it remains watching me as my hand approaches. Gradually standing up, a small waddle towards me makes its head meet my fingers. Unlike the other, this one welcomes my kindness. "Do you also not know this one's name?" I ask, he shakes his head. "Can I… take it in my arms?"

"If she lets you."

"So this is another girl, huh." Is this… me, then?

Tenderly wrapping my fingertips against what feels like living cotton, my hands sinking onto the softness, I bring the rabbit to my chest and its nose twitches and scouts my dress. After a moment, it hops and reaches my shoulder, the tickling of its nose sending a shiver from my ear to my back. Standing on my dress, its front paws press my hair, as if trying to climb, before it groans at me. Slowly, I place it on top of my head. And without waiting a second, my own representation in this dreamscape curls up comfortably. It feels… cozy, not heavy at all, and nothing like my limiters. It's as if I had another blanket on top of my head.

"Hehe, I think she likes you, Kasumi-san," he smiles, now having a small stick of cotton candy on his hands, that he again took from a nearby stall.

"I see. Um, do you… do you like the black rabbit?"

"Yeah, she's my friend too. Why?"

"Well, you said rabbits are dangerous before… Are you scared of the white one perhaps?"

And again, the white ears point up, another small groan followed by a thump of its back feet. Which makes Takeru-san chuckle, give it some headpats, which makes the rabbit curl down again. Why is something so cute capable of being so fearsome as well?

"No, that's not it. But Maya-nee once scolded me a lot when I asked her about bunnies. I think she wouldn't like you much," he says, looking down, his lips delaying a munch to the cotton candy.

"… Why? Bunnies are cute, what's wrong with them?"

"I dunno," again puffing a cheek, he sighs and we start walking again. "You see, there was one time we were buying some books, right? So, when we were near the cashier, I saw a grown-up buying a magazine that had a girl in a bunny costume on the cover, kinda like you."

"Me? But… that's not possible," I say, sighing. He pouts, then looks down. Takeru-san seems to stare at my hands for a moment, giving me a silent stare until I resume eating the blazing takoyaki.

"But well, she really looked like a bunny, with the ears, the tail and everything," he says, nodding as he takes a bite of the fluffy cotton candy. "I thought it was weird so I asked Maya-nee about it, but then she got a super scary face in place and grabbed my ears so, so hard! I ended up looking like an elf for a week after that," frowning for a moment, he slowly rubs one of his ears.

I nod, drinking water after the fire, which didn't burn as much as the first time. "I… don't understand. Why would she be upset at someone wearing a rabbit costume?"

"Don't ask me, I dunno either. But these rabbits are not bad, so I don't mind them being on my head," he smiles, rubbing the white rabbit's ears as it closes its eyes, its head softly falling onto his hair.

As we traverse the festival grounds, more and more stands appear in our view. All of them brimming with energy and light, it feels as if my steps were lighter in this place. Despite seeing some games to shoot down prizes or land circles on some hoops, we couldn't make ourselves noticed. Takeru-san seems a bit bothered by this since he wanted to win some prizes, but still, seeing so many lights, so many colors, more and more new things with every turn we take is enough for me. As if every fold of a paper would reveal a visage of a different land, from both the relaxing winds of a prairie under a full moon night to the fields full of flowers and fluttering petals to a quiet vision atop a hill.

"… Takeru-san, have you gone to many festivals?"

"Hm? Yeah," he nods with another half smile. "I usually went with Sumika, we challenged each other to see who would win more prizes in the games."

"And who won?"

"Me, of course. When it comes to games, I am unbeatable," he smirks, pushing out his chest as he nods twice. "But…"

"But?"

He slowly, gradually stops walking. As slowly as his features lose light, as his lips turn into a dim line when he looks back at the crowds. "It's a bit weird, you know."

"What is?"

"I think… I used to come with mom and dad too. But, you know," he kicks the air, his shoulders slumping, "I think that there were times where… they just weren't here, too. Like, I remember coming with them and Sumika and Haruna-san, but when I try and think of the times we came with Maya-nee, it's like mom and dad just… aren't there anymore."

"Oh… Is that so." Is this an effect of the shared memories? Perhaps, is his psyche suffering from the dissonance between his own memories of his childhood and the ones he's inheriting from this world's Takeru-san? "Does it hurt to remember?" Maybe, it's my fault for forcing him to face such memories too abruptly?

He folds his arms, looking up, blinking in silence. "Hmm… A bit. It's weird, because I can remember Maya-nee being with me and Sumika sometimes, but then mom and dad are not there. But it's, like, there are other memories where she isn't but they are with us. And it feels as if Maya-nee was never there to begin with," eyes lower and lower, further into the ground alongside his voice. "It's not that it hurts, but I don't know why I can't remember things well. It… makes me sad. It's also really weird, you know."

"What is?"

"I mean, there's a festival here and all…" he looks around, at all the stalls, at all the lanterns, at the stream of people coming and going in between as marching ants, "… but mom and dad aren't here, Sumika or any of my friends are also not here. Where are they?" His shoulders sag, lower as slowly as his eyelids, as his head.

I see, the confusion he feels is directly related with the erratic memories. "Then… Then, if you want to see them so badly, maybe we should be going back to your home?" Since that is a place that should not only be well defined in his psyche, but is also where this dream will end, as the place he seeks.

"… But why are they not here? Actually… Why have I been walking all alone for so long? It's… weird. They…" lips shake, voice cracks, ice crumbles, nothingness within, "wouldn't just go and leave me behind."

"Maybe they're in your house?"

"… Yeah. Maybe. I hope I really didn't get lost, mom and dad are gonna get really angry if I go back home late. But then…"

"What is it?"

"Ah, no, I was thinking about what to do with my friends. Mom doesn't let me have animals in the house, so… if I go back home, I don't know where to leave them," he says, sighing hard as he pets the white bunny, looking back at the other animals that are still playing in a stall nearby.

But if that's the case, if this representation of his psyche believes such a thing… Takeru-san does refer to his original world as 'home'. Would it mean that he wants to return there? That's why his child self is seeking his house, troubled by the duality of his memories, by having to leave his 'friends' behind if he does? Then, how do I bring him back with me?

… What if that only brings him more pain?

But Sumika-san needs Takeru-san to help her once we start up the 00 Unit.

However, the Professor didn't stop when I asked her to, when he was hurting so much in the medbay. If she continues to push him, if the Shogun would want Takeru-san to be as she remembers him to be… Will inheriting all the memories from another Takeru-san further divide his psyche? Or, maybe, will the Takeru-san I know disappear and be replaced with the scary fire he was engulfed in at the medbay?

Does that mean we are… killing Takeru-san with the recovery sessions?

… But I have to bring Takeru-san with me, or I may not be able to return either. Sumika-san has to be tuned, otherwise Alternative IV will fail and everything will end up like in those horrible memories he showed us when we met.

Yet, the Professor won't accept to have him stop impersonating this world's Takeru-san.

… What would be the best for him? W-What should I do?

"Ah! Kasumi-san, look!" Again pulling my hand a few times, again sending that warm and orange feeling into me, Takeru-san's voice sounds joyful. I look at him, he points upwards as a loud sound echoes.

Lights.

Many, many lights of different colors meet my eyes when I look up into the skies.

A curtain of sparkling shapes, a small trail of smoke raising to the stars only to burst and cause far more colorful stars to disseminate in the skyline. White flowers spreading wide, red twisters flowing outwards, yellow ripples in the moonlit sky's surface, and so many more colors and shapes. And they continue to appear, to rise up to join the stars for only a moment, a mere flash. And yet, these lights have taken my breath away, my heart lodged at the base of my throat and pounding. It is all I can see as a calm shiver envelops the back of my head.

"… It's so beautiful. What is this?"

"You never saw fireworks, Kasumi-san?" He asks, tilting his head, even the white bunny now looks my way as it gives out a faint groan.

"Is that what these lights are called?"

"Yeah. They're pretty, right?"

"But, how is this done?" And why haven't I seen any?

"Well… Uh…" his lips twist inwards, he folds his arms, "I think they always use them for important dates? I don't really know why, but part of me says sometimes the giant robots fly by and shoot them in the sky, but there are other times where they're just, you know, sent from the ground as always," he slowly says, scratching his head.

"I see…" Maybe the Professor kept me close by on such occasions? She never… really took any time to rest, at least not as much as she does since you've been in the base.

"I think they light up a fuse, then send the lights up with that fire. And then they explode. But those are not the only things that shine in these days."

"Really? What else is there?"

Going up to a stand as the petals of colorful fire spread wildly above us, he comes back with a small blue pack. Opening it, he takes out a few really thin sticks. Lightning them up causes many sparks to come out, like the bubbles from that soda I put the mint candy in.

"This is a sparkler, me and Sumika used to run around with them a lot," he says, waving the thing about, the puppies coming close and staring at it in wonder, the kitties also arriving to meow and try to strike it off his hand. "Here, have one for you!"

The almost imperceptible weight in my fingers is nothing compared to the heavy breath I take in as the sparks come out. Moving the stick to and fro above me as the fireworks continue to illuminate us, it's as if I were holding a comet, a sparkling shooting star.

"It's so pretty."

"Hehe, told you there were lots of fun stuff to do here!" He declares loudly, waving some of those sticks further above, as if entrancing the animals with the shiny sparks.

And as we play with the sparklers, we remain looking at the sky, enjoying the shower of colors, the curtain of brightness that defies the night, for as long as it'll last.

A faint rustle on my head, the small black bunny sits up to watch the fireworks as well, giving out a soft groan. The rest of the animals also seem to remain watching, all of them huddling close to Takeru-san, admiring the show alongside us.

There is only quietness, and that faint sense of ease, that feeling I had when the Professor took me on walks to the hill and we would simply remain watching the scenery from there under the sunlight.

Quietness under the faint yet strong echoes of light.

Under the brief yet colorful stars which illuminate the sky.

Some in simple explosions, others in curling and twisting patterns.

Yet, it all makes my heartbeats knock and knock on my neck, forcing a deep breath.

For in the reality I live in, it has been a long time since I could admire such a clear sky, so vivid stars, much less decorated with the apparently unending illumination from each and every color imaginable.

Our skies are far more dull, contaminated by the heavy metal clouds. There is little to no light pollution near the base, yes, but the imprinted foothold of the war still reigns over the night. And the air is far colder, far less clear and refreshing than the one I sense here. Yet, the stark black of the sky serves only to enhance the frail sparks of colors. Coupled with the freshness of the air, it all spreads a numbness on me as if I were taking a dive into a warm bath. Slow blinking, slower breaths, I can only watch and admire.

Admire it all, until the last frail thread of fireworks vanishes from the sky.

"… It was so beautiful."

"Right?" He says, equally low as me. "So, did you enjoy the festival?"

"Yes. Yes, I did. Thanks for letting me see this, Takeru-san," I smile his way, and he returns the gesture. "But… it looks like everyone else is already leaving."

All the people that had gathered were quick to depart, or perhaps we were lost in our admiration, and some of the lanterns are already going off. A few stands seem to… deflate and fold into themselves, as if made out of paper. How odd, I am certain that is not how they are supposed to be dismantled. Then again, this is Takeru-san's mind.

"Yeah, the fireworks do mark the end of the festival, after all. So, do we keep looking around?" He asks, hugging both dragons as the kitties climb up his legs and the tuna bounces right onto his shoulder once more. This all makes the puppies a bit bothered, again rustling themselves against Takeru-san in their demands for attention. All the while, the white rabbit remains sleeping on top of his head, its breathing completely calm.

"Yes, let us go before all the lights go out," I nod, patting the small bunny on my own head. It slowly nuzzles itself against my fingers, before it too slumps back onto my hair.

Talking of the games and foods, we descend the stone steps. Halfway through the motions, light began to pour once more from the branches of the trees on the sides. It's as if the abovegrounds were in a permanent state of dusk, perhaps because that is how Takeru-san remembers them as.

Back to the ground level, what resembles the city that was here before the BETA invaded, yet not feeling any fatigue at all, we once more resume our search without any destination or direction in mind through the clean streets filled with a faint buzz of chatter, some bins and lightposts reflecting the incoming sunlight like a mirror as a pleasant wind follows behind our steps.

"So then, since she was so buried in the snow, I decided to call her Snowmika," he says with a wide smile, the red kitty again nibbling on his ear.

"Takeru-san, it's really mean of you to bully Sumika-san."

"It's not bullying, I was just trying to get her to play with us instead of staying by the side," he retorts, pursing his lips as he pets the red kitty for a moment. "But then she got against me with Jouji, and when they buried me under the snowballs they started calling me Snowkeru."

"I-I see… Did you fight with her all the time, then?"

"Eh? We're only playing around. It's not like she's always punching me to the moon."

"That seems a bit more, uh, intense than mere games to me."

"… You're a bit too serious, Kasumi-san. You may look young but you really sound like an old adult," he says, eyeing me sideways.

It's not my fault you're so carefree, apparently since you were little. And as if in agreement, the small bunny on my head groans back, faintly stomping his legs. "Anyways… What other games did you play with your friends? Were there some you played in your house?" Perhaps, recalling good times would allow him to find his way within this dreamscape with more ease, without focusing on painful memories.

"Hmm… I think we did this kind of contest by Christmas, like a really big snowball fight or something with some nice food as the prize. But…" like the slowness of the clouds which obstruct the sun's rays, his steps wane, "I don't think I played that with Sumika and the rest."

"So, did you have other friends?" Perhaps, he engaged in this game with the Shogun? Is this a memory of this world's Takeru-san?

"No, it's not that," scratching his ear, hugging the dragons, which are now thankfully asleep, he mulls in silence for a moment. "It's neither with Sumika or with the Pickles and Yuuhi. I can't remember well, again," then, he pouts. The blue puppy groans, rustling against his leg until Takeru-san has to pet it for a little while.

… So, a fuzzy memory of those 'other loops' he took? It hurts, remembering the friends he couldn't save, perhaps?

"There's also the games on the TV," he says as he resumes walking, back to his usual cheerful stride. "But, for some reason, I can't remember if we played with them when Maya-nee was around."

"You mean videogames like Magorea's Mask?"

"Yeah, yeah!" Nodding and smiling as brightly as the incoming sunshine, a few sparks return to his voice. "Sumika complained I always beat her in fighting games, though."

"Why? Are they hard?"

"No, but she said me always using the crouch-kick was cheating," he pouts again, the red kitty once more grumbling in discontent, lightly slapping his cascading hair. "It's not my fault she doesn't play to her outs."

Lips shrinking, I hold his stare. "Takeru-san, if you knew she wasn't that good, you should have been nicer to her in those games."

"Her fault for not getting her game on. And anyways, she always beat me in the card games we played. So we're even," he declares with a nod, puffing a single cheek as he looks away.

"… And, what other things did you do with her?" I ask, getting closer as we cross a street.

"I think we read a lot of books together, folktales and later on CYOA stories. When Maya-nee was around, that's all we did."

"… What does CYOA means?"

"Oh, 'Choose Your Own Adventure'. They were role-play books where we played characters in the story, and we tried to make it to the end by using dice to see whether we won or not. Though," his brows lower, eyes blazing again, "Sumika always managed to roll nat twenties at the most weird times."

"Nat… twenties?"

"Yeah, rolling a twenty on the die. It gives you perfect success on any action you take."

"… You mean that dices can have twenty faces?"

"Yeah, there were many dices we used when playing D&D. There was the pyramid-looking D4, the normal dice with six faces, the pointy D20, and a few more," he says, swaying as the kitties keep hitting his long bangs. "So Sumika would always, always roll a nat twenty when doing these stupid actions."

"You're not saying that just out of rudeness, are you?"

"Of course I'm not!" Puffing his cheeks and holding my stare, his eyes blaze. "You're mean, Kasumi-san. Why do you look at me like that?"

"Well, you could be being biased towards Sumika-san's choices, since you do seem to like making fun of her."

"Mmgh… You know, I'm gonna start calling you Kasumean if you keep being bad with me."

"Come on, now. Do not get upset, I was-"

"Fine, I get it. I'm the bad one here, hmph. If you hate me that much, fine, I'll go home all by myself," he then turns away from me, walking faster all of a sudden.

"Ugh, wait please. Sorry, I didn't mean anything ill with my words," I give him a small bow as I place myself in front of him again, which dissolves his puffing cheeks but not his or the white bunny's groans.

"… I'll forgive you, just this time."

"Sigh… Thanks. So, why did you call her actions dumb?" I ask as we walk together side by side again, crossing a street.

"Because she always did these silly things outta nowhere, and always got good rolls for them."

"Could you give me an example of these 'silly things'?"

"Like, there was this really big gate, right? As tall as a mountain, all made of steel, letting out a small heatwave under the sun."

His features turn stern, his tone also lowering as if in threat as he raises both hands, the sleeping dragons still firmly clinging to his arms as if they were vines. I nod, holding my breath, huddling a bit closer as our steps slow down.

"So, we had to get past that door to infiltrate the fortress to help Dennis save Prince Horace from Lysanderoth. But we couldn't find a way to do that, we couldn't blow it up with magic because that would alert the golem army inside, we couldn't climb the mountain because it was guarded by basilisks, and we couldn't try to sneak from another entrance since we didn't have a rogue in the party."

"And, what did you had to do?"

"See, we had to wait until it was night, use a small spell on the lake nearby to make a distraction with a water elemental, since it couldn't be turned to stone by the basilisks and would melt the clay golems, and in the chaos some of us would get to sneak into the fort while the others played decoy."

"That seems like a well formulated plan. I do not see a problem with it."

"Yeah, it was our best shot with what we had. But, what does Sumika thinks would be a good thing to do instead?" He asks as he shrugs, my shoulders compact as do my lips while I remain silent. "She just walked up to the gate and asked the guards to let her in!" He yells, rolling his eyes while shrugging in slow motion.

"And… it worked?"

"Yeah, because she rolled a twenty and had a big enough charisma modifier."

"That seems too reckless. Her idea could very easily backfire, if she enters the fortress on her own. Why would she do that?"

"Because maybe being nice would help us with the guards since they weren't the bad guys, she said," he pouts, shrugging his lips. "So she had to infiltrate the place all alone until she found a way to let us in," he then sighs, pulling the ears of the red kitty for a moment. "She almost got found out twice, and even then she insisted we shouldn't hurt any of the NPCs because they were kind with her character."

"… But she's right, if they did help her then those people weren't bad," I retort, causing the white bunny to grumble again.

"We had to escape by flying! We almost got shot down and all!" He says as his eyes blaze again. "And even then, all the golems kept chasing us. But Sumika made such a mess when we tried to fight them off. We lost lots of XP thanks to that."

"But that sounds… fun," my gaze lowers as I sigh. It'd be nice if we could play like that when Sumika-san wakes up as the 00 Unit. Even if only one time…

"Yeah, it was a bit fun, to try and beat the book without resorting to fighting," he smiles, briefly, "even if we lost a lot of really good treasure," but immediately pouts as he overlaps his arms once more. "Well, at least it wasn't as bad as when Yuuhi gets mad," he nods, which causes the purple puppy to let out a small bark.

"Did you also play this game with her?"

He purses his lips, silent for a moment. "I mean, yeah, we did. But Yuuhi's luck is awful, she always rolls ones. All the time. Also, horses hate her."

"… Why horses?"

He shrugs, one eye closed. "I dunno, it just happens. Like, every time there's a horse nearby, Yuuhi's character gets hurt by it. One time, she had cast a spell to make herself invisible, trying to sneak into some enemies, but their horse got scared of Shion's warrior as it attacked and started to sprint. But since Yuuhi was invisible, the horse didn't see her and just ran over her," his lips purse again, restraining a smile, as the purple puppy softly bites his pants, "and then it scored a crit, which killed Yuuhi's character since it had very low health."

"Eh?! They can die?"

"Of course, it's not fun otherwise."

"I think our definitions of 'fun' are a bit different, Takeru-san," I frown a bit, feeling my limiters move.

He and the white bunny seem to pout in unison, both groaning in synchrony at me. "That's not true. If your characters never died, then you wouldn't need to take care of them."

"… Take care of them?"

"Yeah. Since they can die, you have to think well what you're going to do. And since there's no limits to what you can come up with, it's really fun to try and see what might happen!" I believe this is the same he told me when we played that CryRing game before… just that now he's blazing and sparking, no restrain to his joyful retelling. "Though, we never really managed to beat the games in Steelman mode."

"I suppose that is some ruleset that punishes you for letting your characters die?"

"Yeah, their death is permanent so you can't just make another member for the party. We only did that with smaller books, but even then someone would always die. It sucks, really," kicking the air, he sulks as he scratches the pink kitty's chin, making it start purring.

"I see. That… sounds like a lot of fun." It is understandable, you'd wish to restore some sliver of that to our world. But, if both Takeru-sans wanted the same, why was he blazing so painfully at the medbay? He did say a moment ago that the Shogun would easily become angered. I wonder if that has anything to do with what happened. "Um, Takeru-san? About before, is the Sho- Ahem, this Yuuhi so easy to anger?"

"Well, just a bit," he admits as he chuckles, then has to stop walking and ruffle the puppies' hair as they both barked at him, lightly hitting his leg with their paws. "It's that whenever there's horses nearby, Yuuhi gets run over by them. Since it always happened, she got really bitter about it too. It was so bad that when she was invited to some important meeting or something about how warriors should learn to ride horses, she refused a lot. Her eyes were so full of fire I thought the house was getting burnt down," he says with a nod, the purple puppy groans and repeatedly barks, louder each time, until Takeru-san gives it the attention it demands.

"I would refuse too, if such animals presented themselves as ill omens in our games. If her good characters all die to the horses, I can understand the frustration at the outcomes. But I doubt she'd do something as drastic as burning her residence down." He's again exaggerating much, why do you like to be so dramatic all the time, Takeru-san?"

Rolling his shoulders as if doing a little hop, he raises both arms quickly as he shrugs his lips. "I'm not lying, she did set the kitchen on fire once."

"Eh? How?"

"I told her she couldn't cook anything and she got so mad she tried to prove me wrong. But since she didn't knew how to do anything, the kitchen ended up exploding."

"… Then, it was all your fault?" Hurting a girl's feelings on such sensitive subjects is a cruel thing to do, Takeru-san. Furthermore, assuming females have to be good in the kitchen is also a mistake. Just thinking on handling a knife is scary enough to make me not want to try.

Small embers, a faint pout. "Was not! I only made fun of her because she said the lunch Sumika made me couldn't be that tasty. She was just jelly she couldn't cook something as nice as that," he nods, the purple puppy barks a few times at him, and he has to pet it to get the doggy to calm down.

"I see… You were completely justified, then."

"You're a bit contradictory sometimes, Kasumi-san," he says, eyeing me sideways again, both puppies grumbling as they stare at me.

"I am not. She was who hurt Sumika-san's feelings first, so you were merely defending a friend. Did this Yuuhi do any other mean things like that?" A minute growl, the purple puppy lunges and barks at me, making me stumble backwards and hit a wall. The blue one remains simply eyeing me, as if about to howl.

"Well, Yuuhi can be a bit blunt, yeah," he nods, crouching to fiddle with the puppies' heads, scratching their ears to calm both down. "But she isn't bad, she just hates to lose. Like, a lot. Even more than Shion."

"I see… Did you play any games exclusively with her?"

"Shogi, since Sumika doesn't like that too much. Yuuhi always beats everyone in that, though."

"Hmm, is that so. Then, if you could choose, who would you like to play with? To go look for this Yuuhi or to go back to your home to play with Sumika-san? Or, would you like to go somewhere else to play with the ani- friends you have here?"

"And why can't I do all that?" He asks, raising a brow.

"Well… I don't know. So, you do know where your house is, right?"

"Yeah, of course!"

"Are we going in the right direction, then?"

Scratching his head, folding his lips, he stars to look around the street. "Hmm, I guess? I mean, I think we're- Oh!" Flinching a bit, a smile flourishes forth. "Look! There's an art gallery over there!"

"An art gallery? Oh, is that where there are paintings and the like for show?" I ask, gazing at the tall and completely normal-looking gray building in the other side of the street. How does he knows there's an art gallery there?

"Yeah, I think me and Yuuhi visited one. And… I also went with a very good friend, I think?" Folding his arms, he tilts his head.

"I see. But, back to the point, do you know how-"

"Why don't we go take a look there?" He says, not waiting for my reply as he crosses the street, not even minding the cars that are coming and going. Not that they can hurt him as he still fazes through them, but for him to be so rash.

"Takeru-san, please stop getting sidetracked," jogging after him, my hands meet the air as he rushes me to the building in question. Even the doggies make it to the other side faster.

"Come on, it's gonna be fun!" He says, smiling again in rivalry to the sun.

Sighing as I surrender myself to following after the tornado of impulsiveness, I nod and approach the building in question. In any case, I do like drawing so maybe I could find something to learn a bit more. The Professor hasn't brought me any art books for a long time, after all.

Entering the place, a freshness surrounds me whole. As if a blanket of pleasant winds it were, the AC's caress falls upon me as I step into the lobby. So I can even feel this sensation as well. The rest of the place seems rather normal, a simple lobby with some seats, a few planted flowers, and a few elaborate paintings lay on the walls. The people here are all grayed out, however.

"Did you came here once, Takeru-san?" I ask as I approach him, while he's looking up and around along the animals.

The brown dragon seems to have woken up, taking quite the interests in the pieces left on display, flapping its wings excitedly. The puppies also seem keen on observing the art, slowly pacing along the wall instead. The tuna remains bouncing, the kitties don't seem to be too interested in this building.

"I think," he says, not looking at me as he continues to stare at the paintings. "Anyways, let's go to the place where they have all the fun stuff!" Nodding much, he marches towards the elevator.

And smacks his head against it, despite the light indicating that it's in this… Hm?

"What's with this?" He pouts, clicking the button, making the chime of arrival resonate. "Now that it's here, let's get- Agaah!" Once more, he walks into the wall, the 'door' refusing to part. "What's wrong with-"

"Takeru-san, I believe this might be a painting on the wall."

"Huh?! Really?" He extends a hand towards it, and the flatness of his palm courses through all the extension of the elevator. "Uwah, you're right."

"I suppose, this must be a simple illusion." If the personnel could see us, I believe they would be chuckling at how well the trick worked. It is malicious of them, to also set up a chime and a calling button. This feels… like something the Professor would do, just for fun. Perhaps, this art gallery is owned by a relative of hers?

"Mmgh… Now that I think about it, I think I also fell for a trick like this when I visited an art exhibit or something," he crosses his arms, pouting and groaning along the white bunny, who was awakened rather rudely when he ran into the wall.

Flickering some fire upwards, the brown dragon seems to chuckle in its own way. The puppies also seem to find this funny, rolling on the ground, barking back at Takeru-san, who puffs his cheeks at them. A small rumbling echoes, both the white bunny and the black dragon rustle in their places, fur becoming needles, claws tightening on his arm and exuding a singular ember. Even the red kitty seems about to burst, hissing at the other three animals as a lone hair tenses up into the shape of a thunderbolt. Yet, the brown dragon continues to let out small embers while pacing above him back and forth, the puppies waddle and bounce about Takeru-san, tapping the 'elevator' before looking back at him.

"… I think they're making fun of me," his lips shakes along his fists, pouting much.

"It was rather funny, albeit dangerous," I admit, to which more embers flicker in the air.

A small shiver on top of my head, the bunny was quivering. Soon after, my own knees imitated the small gesture as a blurry shadow coursed through my sight. Blasting away as if performing a boost jump, the white rabbit lunges from Takeru-san's head, hitting the brown dragon in midair and tumbling it to the ground. In unison, the black dragon and the red kitty leap forth, aiming at the puppies. In a matter of seconds, the six of them begin to quarrel in close combat as if they were in a coliseum, scattering a cloud of dust around them as they fight.

"H-Hey! Stop it, don't fight!" He yells, waving a finger. They do not pay much mind, however. "Mmgh… Kasumi-san, help me stop them!"

"What? You want my help?!"

"Of course, you're the older one here!" He says, eyes blazing again, as he throws himself into the cloud of dust, shouting and waving his arms to catch the dragons.

The pink kitty meows softly by my side, trying to become a needle ball in threat, and it is ignored at large by the quarreling animals. The tuna does not seem to mind much of anything, launching itself like a cannon ball to stop the fight instead, smacking the Sumika kitty right in the face. And a blur of furs of many colors with Takeru-san in the middle of it all flickers in my sight for a moment. A small groan on my head, the bunny which represents me moves a bit, as if deciding whether to jump in or not. It then turns to look into my eyes, thumping and groaning as I stay quiet.

Sigh… It seems scary, but even if it hurts this is only a dreamscape. Feeling nothingness on my mouth, my steps waver their way to the loud battlers.

…

Bits of fur float in the air, intense groaning like a stuck engine failing to ignite proper combustion, a few patches of red in my hands, more all over Takeru-san's body as if a zebra he had become. Molding my arms onto my sides as I grasp the tie, I keep the kitty which represents Sumika-san quiet despite its loud wails. The black dragon was simply resting on the floor, Takeru-san was placing the glasses back on the brown one as he pulled the tip of one of its wings. Both puppies had their chins on the floor, covering their noses with a paw in apology. However, the white bunny remains looking away from us, thumping its tiny legs when I approach, groaning and seeming about to rush in aggression once again, like those super fast cars in the game Takeru-san likes so much.

"Listen here, all of you!" He shouts, brows narrowed, waving a finger around. "I don't want you to fight again! You could end up really hurt." Still releasing a few sparks, he points to the dragons. "You two, you can't start setting everything on fire every time you quarrel. I don't want to see you spewing any more embers today."

Small sparks fly off his eyes as he holds their stares, the brown dragon lowering its head and folding its wings and tails, the black one simply rests on the floor, limp and silent. Takeru-san then looks at the puppies with shrugged lips, both hands on his waist.

"And you two, you can't start making so much trouble just because you can. You can't snap at every little thing," both puppies slowly crawl towards him, trying to lick and rest their noses on his shoes, yet he remains firm in his scolding. "Don't think I'm gonna forgive you just because you're adorable. And you, too," he shrugs his lips, tapping the red kitty's forehead, "No more fighting the puppies, look at all the scratches you left me with!" He raises his arm, swollen lightning scarring it. Kitty Sumika growls lowly, trying to make itself smaller in my arms.

"Takeru-san, I think this was enough," I say, petting the red kitty as it tries to curl in my hold.

"No, if I don't scold them they just won't stop fighting each other," he says with much impulse as he nods.

"But do they understand what you're saying?"

"Of course they do, look," he points to the doggies and dragons, all of them with their heads lowered and whimpering softly. "They know they were being bad, and if I don't do this they'll just keep fighting. It's like when me and Sumika were little and broke stuff as we played in the backyard," he concludes, sighing and dispelling the high shoulders and scary voice.

"I suppose you're correct… But they already understood, there's no need for you to remain so angry." He did get a bit upset while we practiced with the games against the Valkyries, but Takeru-san didn't remain this angry back then. Maybe he used to be like this before?

"I'm not angry, I'm just teaching them to be friendly with each other instead of being fighting all the time. So, you're the last one. You can't just go full aggro on everyone else," he says, low, as he walks up and crouches by the white bunny's side. The little thing thumps again and turns away, groaning again, not dispelling its anger at Takeru-san's soft caresses and pats. So he heaves a short sigh and stands up, crossing his arms and making a scary face, his aura swirling red for a moment. "If you all keep being bad, I'm not gonna make you any more food, you hear me? No more yakisoba sandwiches, no more apple pies, no more ramen, no more strawberry muffins!"

As if reacting to the threat, all the animals went stiff. Both dragons let out a small shriek, the puppies wail and again try their hardest in their waddles and wails for sympathy, even the white bunny raises its ears and hops closer, staring right at Takeru-san.

"Um, Takeru-san? Aren't you being a bit too hard on them?"

"No, they need to know that they crossed a line," he says, puffing his chest. What are you, their father?

"But can you actually stop them from eating those things?"

"Well… I can stop making them and that's it."

"Wait, you can cook?"

"Of course I can! I… think?" He then tilts his head, twisting his lips. "I mean, I do know a few recipes but… Mmgh, it gets hard to remember well what else did I knew, though."

… So he remembers that. Takeru-san said he knew how to cook, that he learned back in his world. So, even if his appearance is that of a child, this is a representation of the current Takeru-san. Unless this world's Takeru-san also knew how to cook, for some reason. Which would explain the haziness of what dishes he knows he can prepare.

After a moment of further scolding, he pets all the animals and brings them back on his person, the rabbit to the head, the dragons on each arm, the kitties to his shoulder along the tuna, and the puppies again stand close to his feet. All of them enveloped by that aura of orange and yellow, the blanket of kindness he extends even when he's a bit upset.

We then climb the stairs, the pink kitty purring as Takeru-san praised it and the black bunny for not fighting. Reaching the exhibit, a vast expansion of little glimmers showers my sight. Be it the paintings, the sculptures, or even the small optic illusion trinkets seem to pull my eyes to them, all I can do is look around in place.

The illumination also seems to have been chosen deliberately, as there are no windows in this vast hall and only a single source of light brightens the place and the pieces from up above, a calm and warm white light. It leaves ample visibility to see what's in the other end clearly yet it also is pleasant and kind to the eyes. The spacing of the pieces is also comfortable, which aids to not be overwhelmed by colors and choices.

"… It's amazing, this place."

"Hehe, there's lots of stuff to see, right?" He says, nodding as he raises an arm to allow the brown dragon to take off towards the paintings.

"Yes," I follow the dragon, seeing colorful representations of nature, buildings and flower fields, windmills and small villages. The minute detail of the strokes, the depth of the colors, the perspective of the image which feels as if I were actually looking through a window to the scenery. "It's so beautiful, I wonder how they can make things like this. Especially the monochrome ones." It is amazing, the usage of shadows and varying grades of gray to showcase the depth.

"The mono-what?"

"Oh, it means black and white. See, that painting of the tower? It only uses black, white, or a mix of the two. And the detail of the shadows, of the texture of the land, the falling boulders, the thunder which strikes the top of the building… I wonder how they managed to do that by hand."

"I mean, maybe they just used a black page first and painted over the white parts as they went?"

"Eh? A black page?" I look at him, Takeru-san nods back with a small smile as he petted the black dragon. "Do you know how this is done?"

"Yeah, well, not everything but I did come to a place like this, I think. Look, there are no scribbled lines in the white and black parts, right? That's because it's better to just paint all the shadowy areas first and once the paint dries up you use white on top of it to have things look more clean. Or you use a black page if most of everything is black. Like, uh," he scratches his head, groaning as he looks up, "you do the painting layer by layer, kind of?"

"I see… It makes sense, I suppose. It does makes me wonder how much work and time it must have taken," and how many failed attempts they had to do before completing this singular piece. A small cold shiver runs down my sides, just imagining it all.

"Well, making pretty things takes time," he nods, then his eyes open wide, giving forth a small smirk. "I guess you could say you can't spell painting without pain."

"Takeru-san, don't start with the puns again."

"Tch… You're so lame, ruining my fun. I just wanna make a pun, no need for you to pull out a gun," he then looks away, trying to keep his lips shut despite the quiver of his chest as he drowns the chuckling.

"Sigh…" Must you always try to make jokes about every subject we talk about? "But I didn't knew you liked art, Takeru-san."

"I don't like it much, I just like to learn new things. I can't draw very well but I still find it fun to see how things are made."

"I agree. Let's keep looking, then."

Coursing through the hall along the happy barks of the puppies and the brown dragon, and the small tickle of the bunnies' noses on our heads, more and more fascinating things appear on every corner. Both the fine usage of shadows by contrast, the ample illumination, the variant from showing scenery or people, or merely abstract twisters which leave me a bit baffled on their possible intent going by the name of the pieces. It is all so interesting, yet it makes part of my throat feel hollow.

After all, all of these pieces… probably no longer exist in our world. All of this gallery, of this city, of all the possible marvelous pieces that were in this nation and many others… are simply gone, lost to the BETA.

… It is also very mean of Takeru-san, to never have told me of what he knew of art despite knowing I like to draw.

Both kitties don't seem to interested and remain sleeping on his shoulders, as does the dragon on his left arm. Takeru-san and the puppies go from one place to the other, looking at the pieces without stopping to admire them proper, but I suppose that's just how he is. It doesn't take long for the brown dragon to land on him, demanding attention as well. Yet once more, that small ball of cute white sends everyone else galloping away.

Now that I think about it… Unlike the other animals, however, the white bunny has refused to leave Takeru-san's side for even a second, almost as if it craved being showered by his glowing aura. The one in my head has complained at me a few times during our walks, yet it is my own representation so it makes sense for it to be at ease with me. And the other animals do leave his side at times, as right now where they're roaming freely to inspect the paintings and other offerings in the hall. And yet, the bunny remains as a loaf sleeping on his head.

I do not recall the Professor being so, well, possessive. Could this rabbit be someone else, then? If I am also a rabbit in this dreamscape… but Takeru-san didn't seem to have been close to other ESPers, from what he has told me.

It's also odd, this situation. He took off towards this place, as if to avoid my prior question. I cannot sense his thoughts, which makes sense since I am already within his mind, yet his colors are again fluctuating easily, as opposed to when I bring up his house. Even as we talk of the paintings, as he goes in great detail about the ones he recognizes are about shows and games he favors, there is no hint of apprehension or displeasure. He's merely enjoying his time along his 'friends'. Trying to enjoy days past, embracing the nostalgia, unwilling to return home?

"Uh, Takeru-san? Shouldn't we be on our way?" I ask, getting closer.

"Hm? Well… We did already see everything here, I guess," he scratches the back of his head, looking up. "It's okay, though. If you have to go look for your friend, you can go. I'll be alright on my own."

"Huh? No, that's not true. You were lost when we met, right?"

"W-Was not! I was merely… taking a long walk."

"Do you not want to go home?"

"… It's not that I don't want to, I just wanna stay with my friends for a while longer," he says, rustling the animals' heads, his lips cascading in slow motion, the sparks flickering to nothing within his eyes.

"But you can keep playing with them even after you go home," since your squadmates are still waiting for you in the base. And me and Sumika-san will always stay with you. My hands reaches out, grasping his in my hold, my thumb moving back and forth over his tiny knuckles. "Come on, we've been walking for a long time already, right?"

That is also a concern. As much as I've enjoyed spending time within this dreamscape, if we dally for too long perhaps people will forget about him. Or even me, maybe. It is hard for me to tell for how long we have been walking, and my sense of time should not be trusted during a mind dive.

Pursing his lips, hugging both dragons tightly, he gives me a faint nod, allowing my hand to spur his feet to action. The crawling orange is more subtle this time, a faint warmness or a tender brush all over my arm. While most of the animals do not seem to mind our departure from the gallery, the white bunny's ears perked up as soon as I started taking him to the stairs. And it keeps staring straight ahead into my eyes, drowned growls every so and so. It looks like a kettle of fur in warning of its boiling point. It even keeps looking back to the hall as we descend, did it want to keep looking at the paintings?

Burying the premature shadows of hesitation, Takeru-san once more engages me in discussion of what I thought of the art gallery, if I enjoyed my time there, the energetic and fast stream of questions seeming to be unending. Amidst the streets, the honks of transit, the buzz of the people we keep passing through, we continue our walk as he tells me of swirling rides on roller-coasters and visiting aquariums, of getting lost within the lush foliage while chasing a squirrel, and of his very first failings when it came to cooking, described by himself as turning pizza into charcoal. And even then, he remained stoic and unmoving as a wall in defense, saying this Yuuhi's failures were far worse then his.

As we move on to less populated streets, as the silence sets as a cloak and the sun's glare eases on our shoulders, a tingly feeling appears on the back of my head.

Brief at first, yet repeated. Distant yet constant, until it starts gaining strength like repeated waves reaching the shore, further and further with each repetition.

Needles poking the scalp, tracing lines from my nape to where my limiters usually are. A gradual lowering of the sounds around us, a slow tilting of my sight. The street seems to curve diagonally, as if turning into a spiral. Color fades, yet the warmness of his hand linked with mine does not disappear.

A moment of dizziness, a second of blurriness in my eyes, a beeping echoing in my ears, it all slowly fades away, as slowly as a cube of sugar sinking into my morning tea.

And my throat feels sore, so I cough for a moment. Dampness obstruct my sight, so I rub my eyes softly as the needles disappear from my nape.

When my vision refocuses once more, a large shadow covers the sky. Clouds, many clouds. All of them taking a dark color on one side, glowing on the other where they take in the last threads of the afterglow. The sky is already darkening, a faint orange remains behind distant buildings while traces of yellow and pink overwhelm the rest of what's not yet conquered by clouds. Why did it became this late so abruptly?

"Kasumi-san? Are you okay?" Takeru-san pulls my hand, looking down I see his brows and lips curving down as he stares.

"… Yes, merely a bit tired. Didn't you… feel that?"

"Feel what?"

So he didn't sense that shockwave? The animals do not seem disturbed in the slightest. What was that, then?

"No, it's nothing. It did became late all of a sudden."

"Well, we have been walking a lot," he nods, pulling me as he walks once more.

"That is true. So, is your house close by?"

"Hmm… I think we're close. Ah," stopping suddenly, lips remaining barely open, I follow his gaze on the street.

Down a few meters, there was a house which is a perfect copy of what his own house resembles in the images I could perceive in our talks. Faint, the way in which his fingers slip from my palm. Shoulders sagging, Takeru-san looks down. Quiet, silent, still, unmoving.

"Don't you want to go home, Takeru-san?"

"Eh?"

"That building over there, that is your house, isn't it?"

"… Yeah."

"Is something the matter?"

"No, nothing. Just… Why are the light's out?" He asks, tilting his head, briefly glancing at his home before once more turning away as if recoiling from a source of heat.

My lips twist then retract, about to simply say that's due to no one being there at the moment. Brushing my hair, inhaling slowly, I then reach out for his hand once more. "Perhaps they're merely saving energy. You know, to not have the lights on while there is natural light?"

"But it's already getting dark, though."

"Well, that's true but-"

"And our windows don't face the sunset anyways, so if you don't turn the lights on you can't see anything," he again counters immediately, as stubborn as a mule, as incessant as the snow in winter.

"But anyways, since we finally found it, there's no reason to stay standing here, right?"

"I… guess," he says, rather, whispers as he gives the slowest nod Takeru-san has ever given me.

"Your friends must be wanting to rest, too. Let's go?" I ask, giving a minute squeeze, a slow pull to his hand. He looks up, then nods again, slower this time.

As we slowly approach his home, a cold gale blows. Hitting us right in the face, scattering a newspaper and a few leaves. For every step we take, the wind howls and swirls around, the clouds melt and fuse, covering and blocking the sky, enlarging the shadows of the lightposts and houses, showering us in the yellow glow of the setting sun. Just a short distance separates us from our destination, and Sumika's house is also pitch-dark. The blinds of the windows are down, not a single sound can be heard nearby. Only our footsteps along the howling wind.

Takeru-san remains silent, simply looking at the door, petting the red kitty that gives out a small cry.

And in only two or three steps more, we end up face to face with the entrance to his house.

He doesn't seem willing to take the first step, all the animals huddling closer to him as the wind howls again. Will this take us back to the base? Will he end up returning to his own world? In any case, there is nothing else I can think of to put an end to this dreamscape. So, joining my fingers with his, giving a small smile, I step forward and grab the doorknob.

With a delayed and creaky echo, the door opens and we enter the place. In the darkness, I can see a set of stairs nearby. A door further in down the hallway, an open space to my left. And the scent, the strong scent of vanilla I felt before.

But the fine color of the wood in the floor, the nice cream colored walls, the few paintings that decorate the place…

"It's a nice house, I like it. Where is your room Ta- Huh?" A strong hold onto my arm, his fingers were shaking. "Takeru-san?"

As if using me as a shield, he does not move a single millimeter. Even the animals have gone dead silent, quiet and stiff. Before I can utter another sound, the wind howls again. A loud noise, a sharp slamming, the door closes itself and takes away what little light we had. Further creaking, more disturbances, the windows prey to the gale.

"T-That was scary. Takeru-san, where is the switch?"

"… The lights won't turn on," he whispers, not looking up, his aura dimming more and more with every passing second.

Blinking for a moment, my eyes adjust to the low illumination and easily find the switch. Yet, as I push it repeatedly, nothing happens.

"Maybe it's broken?" I ask, yet he remains silent, only the howling gust from outside answers. "Well, let's go further in. Is your room upstairs, Takeru-san?"

"Yes…"

Wrapping my fingers over his hand, I walk towards the stairs. Not even two steps after I feel myself stopping, my arm bending backwards in tension. As I look back, I spot a small white ball by Takeru-san's feet.

The white bunny was stomping its feet again, yet it was not groaning this time. The deep sound resembles more the beginning of a rumbling, an angered hissing. Takeru-san remains still, his eyes locked forward, towards the open space. The puppies both bite and pull at his pants, the dragons and kitties do the same to the clothing on his arms, and after so long the tuna lowered itself to the floor, somehow standing on its tail yet remaining quiet.

"Takeru-san, what's the matter?" I ask, pulling his hand.

Which slowly slips from my grasp as he starts taking steps forward, into what looks to be a dining room. The white bunny stands up, hitting his legs as if practicing boxing. Yet, he does not stop his slow steps. The other animals follow closely, in equal slowness.

Peeking into the place, all I can see is a table, a few chairs, a rather new-looking television, and a kitchen further in. Amidst the quietness, Takeru-san keeps walking towards the kitchen.

Until he stops suddenly, subtly starting to shake.

And then falls to his knees, all of a sudden.

Rushing along the animals to his side, his chest hiccups as the sound of stuck breaths come from his lips, his arms as vines cling to his shaking shoulders, his eyes unmoving…

… from the collapsed body that laid in the kitchen, a very pale looking woman with long hair in the same color as Takeru-san's.

" It seems this winter was too harsh for her, Takeru."

A voice, cracked and low, echoes in the room. There is no one around us, yet as I look about the place my breathing and heartbeats stop cold. Suffocated by the air, the sudden smell of incarceration, coughing and hacking is all I can do, covering my mouth with a hand, supporting myself on the table with the other.

The contact on my fingers feels odd, as if sticking to my hand. Abandonment and dust conquered the table, which was fine moments ago. As the stagnant air continues to linger, the smell of humidity, of strong yet unpleasant dampness fills the room. The paint starts peeling off like skin after a burn. In its place, crimson moss seems to surge, to ooze from within. Other parts simply blacken as if under constant fire, markings of candles pressed against the walls, at times large stain of humidity corroding it all from inside out instead..

"Haa… Haa… It's a lie…" he says under his breath.

Looking back, Takeru-san is clawing at his head with shaky hands. Cracks spawn in the floor, fissures that seem to extend towards him as does the moss. All the animals are on top of his hunched shape, meowing, barking and pulling at him, yet he does not move, still speaking under his breath.

"Takeru-san, please stand up. Let's get out of-"

"No, no, no, no," he shakes his head, the pressure of his fingers upon his scalp allowing me to see part of the skin. As I place a hand on his shoulder, he continues to shake and quiver.

The same dizzying sensation, the needles pierce my nape again. And as they do, that same stagnant smell grows stronger as a voice echoes once more.

" You see Takeru, mom went on a voyage."

"No! She never left!" He screams, dampness falling upon his cheeks.

" She was really sick."

"It's a lie! Mom never had to go to a hospital!"

"T-Takeru-san, please calm down!" Covering him with both arms, bringing him closer as I crouch by his side does nothing to stop the hands that claw and dig at his head, the slowness of the tears that come out.

It's my fault. If I hadn't brought these memories so suddenly to his mind, he wouldn't be suffering like this. I… I have to get him out of here, before anything else happ-

Static, interference, or something that resembles that echoes close by. The television that was nearby, shaking as if the earth was rumbling, displays a blurred image. Distorted by scanlines of black and white as if the screen was a pond being permanently showered by pebbles, two people in suits sit on a table, perhaps in a news' program.

"… It has been confirmed, in accordance to Mr. Kawamoto's testimony, that the victim was one Jinguuji Marimo, a teacher living in Yokohama, Kanagawa Prefecture."

"No! No!" He thrashes in my hold, the animals' cries louder as they cling to him as well.

The static-ridden voice continues to report the news, distorting like a molten radio, looping over and over. Coughing, short of air, I can't even seem to move him one bit. His legs are becoming bruised by those lines, those cracks that spawn on the floor and cling to him as if they were parasitic roots. Crawling, inching closer, it feels as if I had bugs or spiders climbing on my back, the soft poke of those long and skinny legs, the contraction of my neck in sudden stiffness as the sensation raises to it and the back of my head.

"Come on, we have to leave…" Panting for a moment, I push an arm under one of his, yet its as if he were stuck to the my feet slip and I fall back onto the squishy and humid moss that's coating every corner of the house, the television's screen flickers and another different image appears.

" It seems that the power plant has exploded. The cause is still unknown, and the damage is still being-"

"It's a lie! It has to be! Make this stop!" Leaning onto me, he leaves dampness on my shoulder. He's still clawing at his head.

Knifes which sink for dear life, his teeth upon his lips. A broken exhaust pipe, his throat as he coughs, drowning in his own cries. Little comfort, the licks of the puppies, the nuzzling of the kitties, of the rabbits. Both dragons start spewing embers at the moss, at the cracks in the tiles, keeping it all away from Takeru-san. The white bunny looks back at me, thumping.

Yet, as I stand up, my palms almost slipping on top of the moss, before I can even try and lift Takeru-san, something else enters my sight. On the opposite end of the table, someone was hunched over in the same way little Takeru-san is as of now, both hands crushing the back of his head. But… why are there two different-

" Why did she have to die too?! Sensei, you said everything was going to be alright once I wasn't a conductor anymore!"

Takeru-san, the see-through shadow, screams as it hits the table, shaking the entire house, widening the cracks, dust falling from the ceiling, and making me shiver as I step back. It's as if I had my face right besides a fire, the lack of air, the emptiness in my stomach, the repeated blow with each cry of both of them.

" Cough… Cough… We have to get out…" Slowly walking, I grab the little shoulders, lifting them off, finding next to no resistance. "Takeru-san, stand up. We have to leave."

"It's a lie… It's not my fault…"

" My dear Takeru. If you're reading this, it means Dad has gone to meet Mom and Grandma." Another voice echoes, further choking comes out from his lips.

"Dad… D-Dad never died…"

It's my fault.

Because I wasn't careful.

He was always being tormented by these nightmares, and kept doing his best while saying nothing during the recoveries.

A quiet rumbling, the shadowy Takeru-san that was hunched over the table begins to crack. Small at first, growing larger gradually, pieces fall apart from him. A void where his heart should be, as if he were nothing but an empty statue. Yet, tears keep falling from the cracks in his face, in a slow yet constant stream.

The same voice from before echoes, slower and lower, "We had to take Sumika-chan to the hospital. When your mom went to call her for lunch she was very weak, couldn't even stand by herself."

W-What? Sumika-san was… sent to a hospital? Looking down at him, his fingers cling to my arm, shivering and shivering. Still repeating 'no' over and over under his breath, no amount of caresses to his hair seem to break through the shock, nor does it get easier to move him. His feet remain limp on the floor, both doggies trying to help me by biting into his pants and pulling strong.

" We couldn't determine the reason, but her vitals were plummeting very fast. Her heart stopped just as few minutes ago," a cold voice slowly tells.

"N-No… it can't be… it's all a lie, a nightmare…"

"It's alright, Takeru-san. Don't listen to these voices, just listen to me, okay? Let's get out before-"

" Sumika-san is dead. Your fight is already over."

It hurts, how his hand crush my shoulders. It hurts even more, to see his lips part wide, to hear nothing come out of them, to have his eyes squint so hard they might regress into his skull.

Unable to scream, simply resting on me. From the bottom of my throat, a soreness rises and gags me as I cough. As if a pincer had taken hold of my head, a deep and sharp cutting feeling pierces me. From my nape, through my ears, right into my eyes, barbed wires and shards of glass, stingers at the minimal movement of any muscle, and coughing. Much coughing, as if my heart wanted to be spit out, as if I had to spit it out because it was rotting within me as it beats faster and faster against my chest.

Is this… how you always felt every morning? Were you putting on a front so that I didn't feel this? Why didn't you say anything?

Dragging us both through the moss and cracks, the dragons start cutting and clearing the way to the front door. Taking in a deep breath once I make it outside, my feet entangle on themselves as the freshness returns to my nose.

Rolling for a moment, a momentary shock courses through me as I hit the ground. Softly rubbing my head, I sit on the floor. From the outside, the house looks just as before. Yet, the acceleration of my heartbeats tells this was no illusion. Wobbling as I rise back up, coughing again, my fingers meet the shaky hair as he coughs and fails to calm his breathing.

"Takeru-san, come on. Put both hands over your mouth, take a few deep breaths," I slowly whisper, grasping his hands and bringing them up to his lips.

Eyes still closed, he hiccups as he tries to restore calmness to his breathing. Any more stress and he might start hyperventilating. The puppies whimper, resting a paw each on an opposite leg. Both dragons rustle against his back, the kitties coming to lay by his shoes along the tuna. The black rabbit slowly comes closer to me, simply remaining by my side as he continues to fail to regain his breath. The white rabbit, however, is behind him. Ears up and alert, groaning every so and so as it looks into the open door.

A soft coughing, followed by a dry and faint whisper. "I'm f-fine… I'm okay…"

Letting go of his hands, I start petting his head as he has done so many times for me. "It's alright, don't force yourself, Takeru-san."

Simply hugging him as we both remain on the floor, I start rubbing his back and close my eyes.

The soreness eventually vanishes from my throat, the numbness from my lips. The small jolts of pain leave my limbs, my heart once more calms down into a steady rhythm. Now able to hold the air in my stomach, now feeling his grip softening, I open my eyes again and slowly start to stand up. As we do, I see that the sky is already dark, a few stars visible through the clouds.

"Are you… feeling well?" I whisper to his ear, still holding him.

He nods, sniffing and wiping his eyes as he moves away. "Yeah… I think."

"Um, uh… Takeru-san, well, I… I'm sorry. I shouldn't have insisted to come here so much."

"… Why?"

"Huh?"

"Why is my house like this? Why are mom and dad not here?" He asks, looking up at me, dampness still lingering in his gaze.

"I… I don't know…"

"Is this… really my house? Why is no one here, then?"

"I, well, uh…"

"And… what were those voices? W-Were they telling the truth?"

"I… well… I'm sorry," it's all I can say, rubbing his head. This is all because I didn't see your pain, because I wasn't careful enough.

"… Then, was that the truth?" Upon his gaze, my lips regress and regress until it starts to hurt. "But I can't stay here… If this isn't my home then, where is it? Is there… someplace I can still call home?" He pulls my sleeves, I can't return his stare.

And I take a step back, and another, and another. Unable to look up, all I can do is hear him sob again. And he starts coughing again, failing to take deep breaths. And he keeps asking why, saying it's all a lie.

… What do I do?

I cannot possibly take him back with how he is as of now. But then, how do I return to the base?

Even if we do, how can we let him recover? I don't think the Professor can shield him even further from the inquiries of the nobles. And if he's this hurt, Takeru-san might not be able to keep walking forward as he has been. All this time, he was smiling through it all, doing his best to endure these nightmarish feelings… and now, he just can't anymore.

… What can I do? What should I do? I… I don't wanna hear him cry anymore… I… ugh…

Again, needles pierce my nape. Sight grows blurry, can't feel my arms or legs. Cold all of a sudden, mouth drying up, I stumble for a moment. And as the pain subsides, clutching my forehead I look up.

"… I think I get it," a light and dry voice says, very close by.

A tall shadow, right in front of me. Basking into a glistening halo of moonlight, he remains quiet as he stares at the house.

Long and unkempt chestnut hair, dry and with some strands stuck together. It all falls on his shoulders, on the rather long and worn down red scarf he's wearing.

Lines of orange within the dark of his clothes, tattered gloves that reveal swollen fingers with long and cracked nails, and a skin that was paling far more than my own. It is all a stalwart shadow contrasting against the white and cold moonlight, the dark blue of the skies. An ice wall which does not even flinch or close his eyes as the cold wind howls again, as the clouds swirl into cyclones above us both.

The exhaustion lingering in his voice, in the eye bags left under his eyes, in the hunched and low posture he takes on. Cracks in his lips, like in his mud-stained boots.

Takeru-san, a Takeru-san that was just a bit taller than me, is now standing in front of me, dressed in the darkest attire the nobles of the IRG usually endow. The animals all gather to his feet, slowly touching his lower legs, speaking up softly. Moonlight breaks through the clouds again, showering upon his features, perhaps making him seem more pale than he actually is. And yet it contrasts against the full dark of his dress, the quiet kindling within his eyes which take in the moonlight as the breeze passes and makes both strands of hair and scarf flutter to the wind.

Sighing hard as he sits on the ground, petting the animals, he looks up at the moon, eyelids almost fully closed. "This feels as if I were dreaming, as if I were seeing something that happened a really long time ago. A trip down memory lane. I guess that's why no one sees me, why everything and everyone is so gray."

Unlike what I expected, his voice is so slow, so calm. It's as… it feels as if I were floating on my back atop a body of water, a rather cold body of water yet not unpleasant by any means. Unlike what the Professor and everyone seems to say about 'this' Takeru-san, this is… similar to that day when he told me of Galaxy Wars, right before I entered his office. A calm and silent sorrow, being taken away by the slow current of blue.

"It's simple, when you think about it," he chuckles, giving a cracked gesture that does not resemble a smile despite the rise of his lips. "This isn't 'today' anymore. This is 'yesterday', isn't it?"

"Uh… Um… T-Takeru-san?"

And slowly, he looks back at me. Lips clearly marked downwards, blinking slowly yet leaving his eyelids barely open. Dark, so dark blue. As if it were a net, a cage he was trapped in, that is what his aura now resembles. A strong, impregnable blue. And yet, there are cracks in the ice, there is something flickering within the ice, in the tense expression and posture. As if unyielding against any hammer even if it were the Mjolnir itself, spears risen in defense.

"Hm?" His eyes remain on mine for a moment as only the wind betrays the silence, as his unblinking stare cascades onto mine. "You… were following me as I walked the city, right? Your name was… Kasumi, was it?"

"… Y-Yes. Um, Takeru-san, are you… alright?"

Making that cracked gesture that does not resemble a smile, he shrugs slowly. "I guess. Maybe, kinda."

As he pets the animals, his aura takes on a deep blue of sorrow, as if his features were constrained by vines and roots, as if the thorns were piercing through his very being. There is no anger to be felt in the Takeru-san I now see. Which is… odd, considering the strong reaction he had in the medbay. This feels… like an invigoration of the emotions the little Takeru-san had when that mean noble left him alone without dinner in his room. But this isn't the Takeru-san I know. This is a manifestation of the memories I allowed him to recall, this person is this world's Takeru-san.

… Then, why do the stingers remain in my chest, at the base of my throat?

"Um…"

"Yes?"

"Takeru-san, you're… a Royal Guard, right?"

"… I suppose, yes. A commoner member, a…" he looks down, the rustling of furs growing slower, "baseborn, more accurately."

"So, uh, um… you're, I mean… Do you truly feel alright?"

"Yes, maybe. Is something the matter?"

"No, it's just… well, I heard that, uh, some royal guards are very… angry, adusted at times."

Slow and dry is his chuckle, which shortly turns into more coughing. "Yeah, I can see what you mean, bunny girl. But don't worry, I ain't like the more, uh, intense of our ranks," he nods, not dispelling the coldness which matches the night yet not seeming unwelcoming either.

"So, uh, what are you going to do now, Takeru-san? Your house is… well…"

Remaining inexpressive as he caresses the animals, he whispers back after a sigh. "There is little for me to do here anymore. Not gonna lie, it was nice coming back here, to spend even just a second reminiscing of these peaceful days. But… this isn't where I should be," he then chuckles dryly once more, a single teardrop escaping his left eye, "… even if there isn't anywhere I should be, anyways."

"Huh? What do you mean? Do you not have, um, fellows in the Imperial Guard?"

Grimacing for but a second, his expression tightens as if he had touched ice. "… Doesn't matter. By the way," he slowly stands up, dusting off his uniform, taking a few steps towards me, "isn't the other one with you today?"

"… The other one?"

"You know, the one that's always with you. Dressed in white, with purple hair, and that smug smirk."

"… Why?"

"Eh?"

"Why… do you know… Do you know the Professor?"

"… So she's a professor?" He whispers, grasping his chin and nodding slowly.

"Huh? I… uh… yes, she is. So, you've seen her in… your dreams?"

"Yeah, doesn't she always appear with you? Guess you're alone now, huh," he says, still lacking any and all energy.

The animals hurry closer, the bunnies hopping in between us. The black one sniffs his hand, welcoming the slow caress of the torn glove before hopping my way, asking for me to again take it atop my head. The white bunny does the same with him, only thumping and groaning at the delay in tiredness of his gestures, like a wave retracting back to the ocean after hitting the shore.

"Um… Takeru-san, have you dreamed about these animals before too?"

"Kinda? I guess, at times. It gets hard to remember, everything just spins at times," he shrugs, placing the moody white bunny back on top of his messy hair. If it weren't for his clothes and the exhaustion which lingers in him, it's almost as if I were talking with the Takeru-san I know. "Still… Sigh." His shoulders then drop as do his lips, the blue darkening in his complexion.

"Are you feeling well?" I ask, extending a hand.

He again tries and fails to smile as he shakes his head. "Yeah, I'm… fine. It's just a bit distressing, is all."

"What is?"

"I just wonder what it says about me, dreaming about a loli bunny girl escorting me through the city," he then sighs again as his posture lowers.

"What is wrong with that? Bunnies are cute."

"Yeah, I guess you are… cute. It's just, you know, weird. I feel like we're going to skip the MPs and go straight to the yanks if I gotta explain this one."

"… I don't understand."

One eye closes as he shrugs. "Better that you don't, I suppose. Sigh… Still, thanks for keeping me company, bunny girl," he nods back, starting to walk past me. As he does the animals hurry to follow him, the dragons cling to his arms once more, the kitties and the tuna jump to his shoulders and the puppies hurry as they bark in complain.

As I turn to follow him, a distorted image reaches my sight. Like when I cannot focus anymore, the rest of the neighborhood is becoming colorless, swirling and crumbling apart. So silently, so quietly, as if was never there to begin with, simply crushed like lonely leaves on the ground.

"Why is this all falling apart?"

"Because it's just yesterday, this… isn't real anymore," he says, voice lowering.

Looking back at him, more crumbled buildings were in his path. Yet… the scenery down the street is the same as the one near the base. Almost as if it were a reflection of the nearby buildings, as if a mirror was placed at the next street, the crumbled version of Takeru-san's house was close to us, the Gekishin which fell upon the remains of Sumika-san's house is also visible under the moonlit skyline. And yet, the path does not seem to lead back to the base. On the horizon, a vast wasteland seems to expand, like the one…

that he showed me and the Professor when she threatened him with a gun.

"Um… Takeru-san?"

"Yes?"

"Where are you going?"

"… No idea."

"Then, why are you walking into that wasteland? Your home… I mean, if you wake up now, uh, we can-"

"It'd be nice, to stay chilling here. But this… isn't my home anymore," looking down, the fissures of blue seem to spawn all over her body, as if a shock of electricity they were. Yet, he remains still, inexpressive. "I don't know where I should be, but wherever that is has to be past this wasteland. It's always the same in all of my dreams, anyways."

"So you… you dream of an eternal wasteland?"

"Yeah. I never have managed to make it to the other side yet. Guess all I can do is keep crawling forward on my own," he says, beginning to frown as he turns around, "like every goddamn day since this invasion started…"

"Stop, please!" Rushing to his side, I grab his hand. It feels cold, too stiff and swollen. "You don't know if that's the right way, maybe you can wake up if we go elsewhere." If he follows the same dreams of this world's Takeru-san, then… there is no other representation of his psyche nearby, so our Takeru-san is being affected by the shared memories. And if I don't stop him-

Slow, he places a hand on my cheek. Almost like a towel is the softness which rubs my face for a second, as I'm unable to look away from the cold expression with small candles as eyes. Even slower, he parts my bangs as if they were curtains, ruffling them for a moment. Then, he seems to pet the bunny on my head, that wavering expression again in his face, that exhausted smile.

"You don't have to force yourself to follow me. This is my own burden after all, can't push you to tag along," he whispers, slowly turning around and walking off towards the ruins ahead.

As he does, with every step he takes my limbs grow numb, my sight grows blurry. The shiver on my nape, the jolt through my legs, it's like when I halt a recovery session. Am I… waking up? This opposition, is it like when I was trying to enter his mind and I was rejected? But… But…

Takeru-san then turns back, the wind blows and swirls his scarf and hair. The tired expression betrays the stoic dark of his dress, he gives another cracked smile and nods. Then weakly raises a hand, waving at me as he starts walking with the moonlight as his cloak.

"Later, bunny girl. See you in another dream."

… What do I do? My lips part, no sound comes out.

Should I let him wake up on his own terms? His silhouette grows hazy, I can't feel the wind anymore.

This might not even be the Takeru-san I know, maybe all I did was guide the one I know to the memories of this world's one, to the wrathful guard.

Merely trying to move forward send pain into my soles, palpitations fading as everything dulls and numbs, as moving anything causes pain to flare up under my stiff muscles.

I do not know if it is safe for me, to delve deeper into his mind. If he becomes that wrathful guard, he might harm me. I don't know what consequences that might have. Yet, to leave him alone… when it was my fault he's feeling this shock at the memories…

… But it hurts, merely trying to remain aware and focuses. If anything like what happened in the house occurs again…

A faint groan, a tender pressure. A tiny stomp on my forehead, the black bunny jumps off me. It lands and looks back, staring at me for a second. It groans loudly, thumping its legs again, before it dashes away in hops in chase of the blurry figure in the distance.

…

I… I can't… I have to…

"Haa… Haa…" Frowning, I hit my cheeks with both palms, taking a deep breath.

As the remnants of the peaceful city disintegrate calmly to the wind, turning to ash and dust, leaving nothing but a void in its place, I also rush into the ruins. Through the debris, through the concrete and fallen steel limbs, ignoring the spikes and stones which sink onto my feet, the prickling spider legs that crawl up my back, until his shape becomes recognizable again.

"Takeru-san, please wait!"

He was crouching, playing with the black bunny. Looking up, he raises a brow. Standing up slowly, those calm features merely observe as I gradually lose speed, panting and sweating, until I stop a short distance away from him. As I claw at me knees, bending my dress, something soft yet rough covers my eyes. Forcefully rubbing the sweat of my face, Takeru-san then pets my head, slower and stronger than usual and without the orange aura filling me with warmth. Yet, there is a certain relaxation coming from the slow freshness of this blue aura that kneads my hair.

"What is it, bunny girl? It's alright, you can go back to wherever it is you gotta be. I can-"

"Let me go with you."

"… What?"

"I want to accompany you, until the dream is over. Until… you go back home." Even if you're not our Takeru-san, this is his psyche. And if the memories are trying to be assimilated, then you'll guide me to him. And also, I… don't feel anything bad from you.

He blinks, leaving his hand on my hair. Lips part, close, retract inwards. Takeru-san then sighs with closed eyes, his hand slipping off my head, falling limply by his side. "It's not a good idea. You shouldn't stay near me."

"Why?"

"Well, everyone ends up leaving me anyways, or ignoring me, so you don't have to worry. I'm… used to this, bunny girl."

"I… still want to accompany you. Also, my name is Kasumi."

"You're sure you wanna come with?"

"Yes… for real."

Blinking slowly again, he chuckles dryly. "I see. Thanks, really," and finally, as the moon covers his face again, he smiles, earnestly yet small.

"No, it's nothing… So, um, do you usually walk with the ani- friends through the wasteland?"

"More like they just follow me. I've no idea why, but they give me this sense of deja vu. Can't just leave them alone in this mess," he shrugs, leaving his hand for a small moment on each animal, scratching their heads.

A small poke on my leg, the black rabbit stares at me. Groaning when I don't lift it immediately.

I wonder, if the one in front of me is this world's Takeru-san, and he says he saw me and the Professor in his dreams… Is this because his memories are mixed with the ones from our Takeru-san? Then, what is it with these animals forms? It is all so confusing.

The Takeru-san in front of me shows no hostility, no anger or any violent emotions. He's blue, completely sad and quiet. Not despairing, but unable to lift his good spirits as he always does. Simply… lips pursed in discouragement, shoulders sagging in quiet loneliness, and a forced ice mask in over his face. It's like nothing I've seen in Takeru-san thus far, and it also does not align with that I know of this world's Takeru-san. His quietness is a bit… unnerving, considering the usual loud cheerfulness he displays, both in the base and as he was in his child form.

But that doesn't change what I have to do, for it was my fault your memories are in such disarray. No matter where it is you're going, I'm going to follow you and bring you back. No, wait, is it him or our Takeru-san? If they end up fusing, that will only make things worse, right? Or would it clarify everything in his heart?

… No, I cannot doubt. For now, this Takeru-san does not seem like a bad person. Just like the little one in the house, he's saddened to the core. But instead of crying, he's keeping quiet and marching on… perhaps as Takeru-san was all these days, saying nothing on his pain as we kept doing recovery sessions after his duties.

As I put the rabbit on my head again, we start walking alongside the puppies.

After a moment, Takeru-san looks at me and gives a small nod, his bottom lip retracting fully behind his teeth as he whispers words of thankfulness as we march into the wasteland of cracked dirt and cloudy skies.

So I reach out for his hand, and a small grip returns mine own. The puppies bark once, the kitties rustle under his large red scarf, and both bunnies seem to curl once more into a loaf of bread.

In silence, we slowly venture forth towards the unchanging scenery that extends deep into the horizon under these skies brimming with stormclouds, towards whatever is waiting for us after light's out under the moon's guidance.

Iceberg of the Soul (II)

A/N: I'm not going to bore you with what's going on IRL on this side of the monitor, so I'll cut to the point. One half of me says that to continue posting would be a bad call, that the warning is hanging from the wall, that it's courting controversy, but instead I'll be open with what's ahead. I fear the rest of this story will come out as demonizing the Japanese, as it will go counter to the strong views displayed both in our world by the old Empire of Japan and the mirror that those beliefs have in Muv-Luv's Japan.

I don't think my writing skill can do justice to such topics in a neutral light, so I want to make it clear that I do not hate the Japanese or their culture. If someone wants to criticize this particular aspect of the story, please do point me to either books, sources, or personal experiences that could help paint a less dark picture, to not fall to stereotypes or any possible prejudice on my end.

I do understand th at a flithy gaijin writing of these topics will feel insulting, that perhaps people will get heated about it , and y ou're free to think I'm toxic or that this story is a piece of shit, you're equally free to simply turn around and ignore this fic . Don't start spamming hate to me or the other commenters. T o whatever readers remain , do not engage in debates in the comments . Let people say whatever they want, and ignore the obvious trolls fishing for drama.

This fear of getting bombarded by hate, along other stuff IRL, is what mainly made me want to just delete everything, to avoid becoming more stressed over how to portray this properly, how not to make people angry, and it sucked all the enjoyment out of writing for me.

I do appreciate the honesty though, so if what you read from now on pulls you out of the story and you feel like saying your piece, don't hesitate so long as you're polite about it. Editing and a general lack of time have kind of desensitized me to the contents of this particular chapter, so I admit I might have gone too far with certain stuff.

WARNING: This entry goes deep into the dark and has graphics descriptions of violence, mental anguish, and other disturbing shit, and it's also really long. Due to both the explicit content and the rawness of the material, I've decided to not screw around with any possible triggers so I'll point you back to the list of warnings that are in the first chapter, most of them apply for this entry .

I know my takes aren't as 'based' as many would like for a fanfic that follows the masterpiece that is the trilogy, but I do think some of the most gruesome moments of this chapter can still hit badly despite my lacking skill.

While it isn't enough to send me away from the screen, previous reactions from readers about other similar dark moments, namely the original rendition of chapter 46 and the nurse's scene, make me believe I might have gone too far this time and thus it's necessary to put this large warning here. It's not DEA or RK or MIA levels of cursed, but maybe enough to upset a few sensibilities. I haven't been enjoying the best days over here, and I'm sure my strong negative vibe will permeate all of this chapter.

If I was wrong and the content did not deserve the trigger warning, do let me know. I may be trying to overcompensate here.

Well, enough tangents. I know what lays down there is not enjoyable in the slightest, so tread carefully. As one last suggestion, I recommend reading this entry while listening to the song 'Labyrinth VI' from Etrian Odyssey 3: The Drowned City.

T hanks for reading. Keep staying safe.

Zuoriel

---

" In the days before, many moons ago, decay came to infest

T he path of the wise, the stream to glory

Even those anointed in honor long ago now oppose wordlessly, seal the way forward

S hrouded in hazy dreams, sealed they remain

Those golden chrysanthemums, the choirs of EDEN

Even a mere prayer is denied to you,

pushed always forward by the indifference of time

Can you hear it, that silent whisper that seeks you?

Will you then reach out for it , grasping at the void?

W ill you then cross this filthy stream for it , willingly bring its water to your lips?

Be wrath i ncarnate , Indra!

Fierce enough to melt away the soil!

Embrace thus the dark child who swing s at nothing ness , lost in rage

Be a rampart, Indra!

A refuge for this, oh, ignorant child

Clear all signs of fire; allow calm ness to come forth . "

INDRA, by Susumu Hirasawa. Sword of the Berserk: Guts' Rage (Dreamcast).

---

C hapter 76:

Iceberg of the Soul - Shadows

---

D ate and Time Unknown.

(In the middle of a twisting wasteland filled with broken buildings and debris.)

[Kasumi]

---

"So you were sent to a very snowy mountain?" I ask, sidestepping over the bolt-like shapes of the cracks in the asphalt, from where dried up weeds come out.

"Yes, it was truly a bother," he sighs, again, walking as slowly as his voice through the sinking and rising parts of the broken street. "I didn't mind the permission to train a year ahead, but I really wanted to go to that release."

"Was that book truly so interesting?"

"Yeah, it was. It shows that a warrior's sharpest tool are its wits, not its sword. A friend even told me there was a reference to Lethal Combat somewhere in the story, too."

"… Lethal Combat?"

"Oh, another LitRPG series of books, focused more on the PvP aspect of roleplay. Basically, just a fighting game," he says with a slow shrug, coughing and covering his mouth as we pass a few broken cars, oil and rust filling the air.

"I see… Um, do you remember playing fighting games on a television?"

He raises a brow, his steps waning. Standing still at the edge of a shadow, his fingers absentmindedly play with the dragons as he looks up to the tilted and broken buildings that are half-sunk into the wasteland. "Hmm… It kind of feels like that should have been a thing but…"

"You can't clearly remember?"

"No, like, I think I did… but I don't remember having done that with the Pickles or my friends after changing schools," he nods back at me, taking a second to douse the complains of the red kitty. "Back when everything was fine."

After a sigh his aura once more grows blue, a curtain veiling part of his delayed, almost apathetic gestures. We remain quiet as we walk through the cracked asphalt, under the swirling clouds, bent lightposts and cars decorating the soil with their impregnable shadows. Only eventual twitches of the lights above grant us momentary visibility, which isn't particularly welcome in my case. The erratic pattern somehow turns the surroundings creepier, making the shadows flicker.

It also serves as a gateway to those days of the invasion. Hands which cling to portrays, the shattered glass of the frame sticking to the skin. Bowls broken in half, packs of rations for which my hands are too large scattered through the abandonment of cars and asphalt. The once shining parks I saw moments ago, deserted and quiet, clouds of flies covering their expansion.

And many, many stuffed toys left behind. Some merely left by the road, others ripped apart, a few stuck under the rubble. Observing the area, the lightposts nearby decide to flicker to life. As illumination feeds clarity upon the destruction nearby, my feet suddenly stop, mouth hollowing all air out. The light lasts a second before it again fades, yet I couldn't take my eyes off the tiny, tiny hand that was still clinging to the arm a the stuffed animal, despite not being connected to anything, despite the white beneath the muscle tissue being clearly visible, despite looking like a tightly wrung-out towel as it clings onto that tiny, tiny stuffed toy.

… I tend to forget, how cruel reality can be, how blessed I am to be in the Professor's care, to have Takeru-san by me. And how odd it is, that now I feel my throat wringing, my lips retreating at such sights as opposed to the frozen indifference that lingered in me before. Watching his back, his gaze was locked in other signs of disaster, not showing hints or tells, except for the apathetic drag of his feet. Almost limping, merely walking forward.

The road ends and returns to dust, large craters having blasted the street apart. Hopping back onto the dry soil, buildings arched downwards like some sort of horns, as if sinking into an antlion's den, loom over us both as we keep on walking in silence. The lingering smell of something burnt is strong, dwelling deeply in area, which makes my tongue stick to the back of my teeth at times. And yet, despite the rugged and jagged surfaces we traverse in the irregular terrain, the sole of my shoes does not hurt in the slightest. Not even the little animals show signs of exhaustion, despite their occasional wails for attention to try and bring some cheer to his grayed out complexion.

"Um…"

"Yes?" He asks, not even moving his eyes to acknowledge me.

"So, um, you stopped living in your house since you started studying to become an Imperial Guard?"

"No, I still went back to Hiiragi every weekend, when I didn't have any studies to take care of," he says, shoulders sagging. Lips retracting, gaze focused and unmoving from the ground, slowly dodging elevations and sinkholes, always looking back to help me and the puppies with our steps.

He pulls me upwards as I stomp on a broken and rusted hood, leaning on him as we again reach even terrain. "… But you did manage to become an Imperial Guard. So you passed the test at the mountain?"

"Eh? Ah, yeah. Me and… both cousins managed to be given the approval the same time, more or less," he whispers, gently releasing my fingers, looking forward at the never-changing scenery as light flickers from above again.

Why is he not saying 'Pickles'? Is this Takeru-san upset at them? His aura is… still locked onto that same blue hue. "Um, did you have any issues with the training, perhaps? Something you didn't agree with?"

A minute lowering of his eyelids, he then shakes his head. "… No, not really. I could pass the combat exercise, even if barely, and the written aptitude exams were hard, not gonna lie, but they weren't impossible. Back then, I didn't have any complains, everything seemed clear."

"Clear how?"

"It was all black and white, a world of zeroes and ones. This is good, this is bad, I have to do this, I don't have to do that. Simple stuff, simpler times. Before…" he grimaces, standing still as he waits for me to catch up, his eyes locked on the cloudy skyline under the momentary illumination, "the war teared those words apart."

A small flash of red, a faint mist of black surging from his heart. It makes me shiver, my neck closing as if someone were pressing a hand onto it. "Um… Did you have a confrontation with someone?"

"No, that's not it. Sigh…" shrugging, he chuckles dryly, voice lowering further, "I always get in trouble, thanks to not knowing how to shut up. But it's… kind of like this wasteland, the problem I have," he looks forward, pacing through the dust in the air while wrapping both kitties and the tuna with an arm, both dragons clinging to him, yet their bumps onto his chin or the nibbling to his fingers or ears does not change his composed and neutral expression.

"What do you mean? Do you feel alone in your endeavors?" I ask as I follow, placing a hand on the bunny on my head as I balance my weight on an iron beam, seeking his hand for support.

Which he extends, pulling me to cross the gap as my feet hesitate, when I catch a glimpse of small books, picture books, that were at the bottom of the hole, along the remains, scattered remains, of their owners. Patting my shoulder while I replenish air as my feet hit stable ground, he simply waits.

"It's kind of how you must be feeling right now. You can't really compute what's around, something should be changing soon, right?" Another sigh, heavier, as his aura thickens in blue. "But no matter how much I walk, how much effort I put in my work, nothing ever changes. There's no light at the end of the tunnel, and all this gloom and doom are just, you know, starting to stick," he sighs, kicking the air, hugging the dragons. "And when this scenery loses impact and it becomes routine… it just gets harder to do anything, to find a reason to get out of bed. Get what I mean?"

"I suppose. War can certainly… dull the heart to allow one to survive."

As I've been living, taking everything I was told as the norm, never expecting anything other than what I was given. Until you and Sumika-san came into my life, as it was before the invasion with the Professor to an extent.

"Is this wasteland always like this for you, Takeru-san?" I ask, fingers twitching, hesitating for a second before grabbing his hand again, absence of heat permeating it.

He blinks a few times, the edges of his lips moving ever so subtly before he gives another gradual nod. "Yeah, I guess. There's really not much here other than wreckage and destruction, and nothing to be done about it."

"Do you have any idea why you dream of this? Isn't there even one small glimmer of hope left for you?" I ask, walking closer to him, shivering a bit as his aura enters in contact with mine, a chill into my arms.

"Hope, huh," he looks down, sighing yet again. "After so many salvage missions, it kind of gets ingrained into you, this scenery. It's always the same, there are a few parts that can be recovered but the rest…" he suddenly stops walking, lips twisting in, throat folding down. I follow his gaze, finding a torn plush toy with its filling leaking and sprinkled with red, buried under two masses of bones and flesh pressed together by a falling boulder. "… The rest is always the same shit," he whispers, petting my head slowly as he brings me to his chest, shielding my sight from the cruel visage.

And for a moment, I merely cling onto the somber and quiet blue, feeling it seep into me with its stillness as the rabbit on my head and the dragons ruffle my hair at times. A pat or two on my back, they aid my breathing to return to normal. Slow steps he starts to take, and I follow. A small moment of walking in silence and darkness, I cough and slowly pull away from his gentle grip.

"Are you feeling okay?" He asks, rubbing the back of my head.

"Yes, I'm alright… Do not worry, I am rather used to… such crude images. I can't really avoid them, after all." No matter how hard I try, merely walking is enough to hear or see these cruelties at times, even if it isn't as normal as it was two years ago.

He pets my head, softly nibbling at his bottom lip, sinking further in blue. "Sigh… You really don't have to come with, bunny girl."

"No, I… cough… I said I would keep you company. I… I do know war can cause such cruelty."

It's like all the blurred flashes I've seen in the hallways, the frail but intense memories of anguish of the soldiers marching about, the losses of the Valkyries, the pain of the poor Instructor. But, to see it with such clarity, to feel the putrid stench corrode my lips, to hear the screeches of the flies, what once was brimming with life imploding in decay despite this place being a dreamscape…

"U-Um, Takeru-san, is it really always like that during your missions?"

Shaking his head, sighing short yet deep, he hunches over again as the dragons cry out and lightly hit his chin, as both puppies whimper. "Sometimes it's worse. Sometimes we find all the pieces, scattered everywhere, flies dancing over 'em. Other times…" biting his lips, he looks away, "we find them still alive. And all we can do is spare them the pain, and nothing else. Nothing else…"

He grabs my hand and we walk again, under the rows and rows of wreckage, the rows and rows of rusted TSF parts, of what truly resembles a wolf's maw. And yet, despite a few cracks in the colors, Takeru-san remains marching forward, his sight locked onto the far off horizon as the buildings grow closer, our pathway narrow under the flickering lightposts and howling wind.

Never wavering, never reacting. Slow but constant like the tickling of a clock, yet darkening a little more every second. Just like the moonlight that accompanies us, despite a few thickets of clouds blocking the upper and lower parts of the moon as of now.

Pursing my lips, gripping his hand as the puppies look up at me and softly whimper, I bump my shoulder with his, enduring the prickling of cold blue on my nape. "But… But you did manage to save some people, right? The war was horrible, but your efforts weren't pointless."

"… Save?" A stutter in his voice, a ripple in the ice, heaviness at the pit of my stomach as dark fog covers him for a moment.

"U-Um, is something the matter?"

"… I guess, yeah," he barely whispers, now dragging his feet and making the puppies bark a bit as they gain a sudden lead on us. He sighs again, extending his free hand to tend to the showy complains of the purple doggy, then softly scratching the ears of the patient blue puppy. "I guess… I guess we managed to save a few, just a few."

"Are you displeased in your position in the IRG?" I look into his eyes, giving a squeeze to his hand as he raises back up.

He merely shrugs, leaning his chin onto the kitties that play with his scarf. "I'm not upset or anything. I get that there ain't much else we can do. It's just…"

"That you don't agree with their methods?"

"No, that's not it. It's that, well, I believe small gestures of kindness can do much for us in the long run," gradually coming to a halt, he looks up at the crashing clouds as the wind howls again, the light leaving his features as his complexions softens, "but no one seems to even care anymore."

Despite being covering my eyes to avoid the dust and the strong scents, his aura tells a gash is once more open, in his face and heart. Taking in a deep but short breath, I once more look up into his eyes, that are still scouring the pitch-dark cloak of the clouds above while petting the white bunny. Only to see him grimacing.

"I used to think that day was just an accident… but it turns out that was how we always did things."

"That day?"

He doesn't reply, starting to walk again into the closed-off pathway in between the buildings. The animals stall the motions before following, and I have to jog lightly to reach his side again. As I do however, the burning scent grows stronger, enough to make me cough. Upon opening my eyes, a circling wave of yellow and orange covers my sight.

Pillars set alight, hazy. Petals scattering into a whirlwind of flames, fading to ashes. The heat crawling all over a building, stitched screams echo close by.

"W-What is… Where-"

"I thought this was just an accident," he whispers, eyelids almost closing, fingers slowly treading the fur of the animals. He crouches, hugging both puppies as they start to cry and wail louder and louder.

The stampede of smoke rushes out of the woodwork, winged flames erupt from within the windows in much violence, creating a shower of glass in the periphery. A large house built in the old ways of the Empire burns, not even this garden seems safe from the heat as the rows of ovals with flower offerings are made to endure the falling sparks. Specters of shadow rush through some hallways, some falling, others screaming, yet all stumble and collapse within the smoke.

"What is this? Just what- How did such a thing happen?"

"I told you, I thought this was an accident," he says, and I see him give a faint kiss to both puppies as he lifts both and covers the animals with his long scarf. Both dogs in his arms, the dragons clinging to the inner part of them, both kitties rustling on his shoulder along the tuna, all of them taking shelter in the scarf. Only the white bunny refuses his offer, thumping and insisting on remaining on his head, as does the one above mine. "What you see here is when terrorists attacked the Main House one day, outta nowhere. Or at least what this nightmare twisted it into," he admits, shifting his arms to ensure none of them fell, starting to arch his back at the weight.

"Eh?! Terrorists? When… Wait, did this happen in 1997?"

"Huh? How did you know?"

"Well… A weird agent once came asking for a favor to someone I know, saying they needed help with an unfortunate incident." My scanning ability's help, to be more precise. It was truly the first time I lamented being born with such powers, when the Professor taught me what the words 'disgust' and 'repulsion' meant.

"I see… Well, yeah, this happened back then. And as you can see, it was pure chaos."

"Did… someone you like died during this incident?"

"Thankfully, no. But many good fellows did, and a lot more got badly hurt or got severe burns somewhere. But even then…" he grimaces again, shaking his head as he enforces his embrace, Takeru-san then walks forward while using himself as a shield, crossing through the smoke and flames.

"Takeru-san, please wait! The fire is- Cough! Cough! " Unable to endure the slamming impact of the heat on my features, my feet retreat as I cover my mouth.

Yet, he keeps on moving through the rows of flowers, the rows of burning flowers and into the building. Hesitating at first, until the bunny atop me groaned and thumped, I follow after him through what little space we have. The lack of air lasts a moment, the fire seems to be concentrated in isolated areas unlike the all-encompassing smoke which roams freely through the hallways. A flood of rotting flames, is how the place looks from within, heralded by the stream of dark clouds. That, or this is how his mind remembers this incident. Walking for a moment, descending to a mere step at a time, I end up finding him amidst the current of smoke, coughing as a wall of fire covers the path forward.

"Takeru-san! We should- cough… We have to get out of here!"

"… There's no point in going back."

"Huh?"

"Even if you close your eyes, what's around you won't simply disappear," he rasps, his hold over the animals tightening. For a moment, incineration which would leave the one around us paling shone within his eyes, a brunt stroke of dark in his aura. "There's only one way out of this nightmare, forward. Even if… there's nothing we can do…" he sighs, taking a few steps back and taking another hallway, away from the smoke.

With every step I take, my palpitations rise through my throat. "But you might get hurt."

"… And nothing of value will be lost."

"W-What? Don't say that, please! You're- Cough! Cough!" The reflex seems to remain in place, until I feel his presence pull me away from the clogging clouds. Taking in a sharp breath of heat, I look up into his eyes, his downcast eyes as the white bunny seems to groan and thump. "You should never say something like that."

"It's just the truth, bunny girl," he sighs, again, while wiping the sweat off his face, panting for a moment before turning and walking once more through hallways with walls falling to fire.

"Why? You're always- You're so… Why would you say something so cruel about yourself?"

He stops walking, shoulders sagging. "… You asked me before if I had saved anyone, but every time something happens… no one can rely on me."

"Why? You're… You're always so bright, and are always trying your best… And anyways, what could you do during an incident such as this? If the authorities didn't see it coming then-"

"That's kind of the point," he says, shifting his hold on the animals, making sure they didn't slip through his arms, faint wails coming from under the tattered scarf. "I used to think we got caught with our guard down, that because no one saw it coming things escalated to this point, to the hell you see now."

"Then, what is causing you to deride yourself? An individual cannot be held accountable over such turns of events, much less if you were not holding any authority." With every step closer, the scent of gunpowder strengthens along small sobs, faint crying.

"That every time, every single time, it's always the same answer," he whispers, hanging his head, softly biting his lips. "I can do nothing to help, before or after the fact. And… I hate that about myself."

A sudden gust of wind invigorates the flames, raising beyond the ceiling, sending the heat towards us. After a moment of burning, of veiling my sight, the pain soon fades away, replaced by sharp groans, muffled groans. Opening my eyes, I'm met with darkness and a soft feeling near my nose.

"T-Takeru-san!" He had shielded me from most of it, now groaning in pain before he falls to his knees, features twisting.

As I look around, the walls seemed to have melted away into pure blazes. Rushing through our sides as if they were the rapids of a river, like trains blasting past a station, the yellow and orange light blurs and sizzles by our sides. In the middle of the two ramparts of fire, a small hallway was left for us to walk through.

Takeru-san remains gritting his teeth and groaning as smoke slowly raises from his back, parts of his dress darkened further. My hands flinches away when I try to touch his shoulder, and the animals start to lick at his face or hair, whimpering until the pain seems to leave his features. A thump on my head, I gulp and try to pat his shoulders, offer some respite. Merely touching the fabric is enough to send a quiver through my skin, wanting to release the grip.

"Shouldn't you take off your dress, Takeru-san? You might get burned." Even if this is nothing but a dreamscape, there's no need for you to suffer needlessly.

"N-No, I'm okay, it's fine… I'm used to this… haa… haa…" He slowly raises up, a hand resting on his shaky knee, his complexion wavering as he refuses my hand of support, still gasping.

"Are you certain that we should keep going? You're truly going to end up hurt."

"Yeah…" And slowly, he starts to walk again through the narrow space left to us by the flowing fire walls.

"You won't turn back?"

"There's nothing to do back there, you saw how my house was left. This place, too, is nothing but another stop on the never ending conga line of shit that plagues my dreams."

"But there has to be another- cough… Do you truly have to subject yourself to this torture?" Your dress is blackening further, there's smoke still coming off it as if you were garbed in incense.

"At this point… Heh, it's almost like just another Wednesday," he dryly chuckles, the coarse coughing claiming his throat afterwards, then turning into mournful grinding of teeth which spur further complains from all animals.

"S-So…" considering the change in scenery happened as we talked, perhaps, "was the resolution of this incident something that happened again during the invasion?" Is that why he's so conflicted, so determined to keep moving forward despite the state of this place?

"Every time something goes wrong, it's always the same answer. Just like when-" He suddenly stops walking, his upper body quivering oddly.

Reaching his side, I immediately flinch away. A pond of red that enlarges every so often, pink strands of hair falling into it. A completely slouched, slumped body, features fixed as if a statue it were. The kitty wails, jumping down from Takeru-san's shoulder and rushing towards the limp body, licking the face of the woman, biting her fingers, looking back at us and wailing, wailing.

"Takeru-san, who is… What happened here?"

His lips quiver, stalling an answer before he closes, wrings his eyes shut. "As the attack started, I was with Maya-nee and the cousins, preparing for some duels we were going to have with other heirs. We split up, to cover more ground and alert those in charge, but it wasn't a single group that had infiltrated the House or protesters forcing their way through the main gate," his chin folds inwards, elbows sinking into his sides, breathing picking up speed, short and shallow. "Gun shots everywhere, the smoke raising, everything just came and went in a blur, everything's so fuzzy. But as we were moving towards Yuuhi's room, we ran into some intruders holding hostages. Maya-nee and her group disposed of them… b-but it was too late."

Swirling smoke roves around us, rising to conquer the ceiling. Small flickers of yellow spark up, gunshots reverberate almost by my side. Holding his shaking hands, his cold hands, only serves to enhance the echoes of the screams, of the gunshots, of the burning wood, and I can only grit my teeth to endure the unrelenting sounds. And as the pink kitty nuzzles itself against the slack features of the deceased, everything sinks into place. And it leaves a vacuum in my stomach.

"… Takeru, take the daughter to the central hall right this instant," a sharp and imposing voice so tells, and through his hand I feel the quiver over his entire body.

"I used to think," he whispers as he steps, as he hesitates towards the corpse, "we merely didn't have time that day, that we weren't ready for this fucked up shit happening," he crouches, and that shaky hand closes the eyelids of the woman despite the bite of the pink kitty that he then embraces. "That everything would be fixed as swiftly as this incident, and that that's all it was. A cruel accident no one could see coming. But it seems I've always been in the wrong."

My feet barely lift from the floor before they stop, lips clamping shut as if walking through the thicket of smoke once again. Screams reach the back of my head, crying out for the woman, claiming she is not yet dead, asking why no one would help her mother. Unable to breath in, to even gulp, I can only remain still as I place a hand on his shoulder, shuddering at the sizzling heat that surrounds us, as the walls seem to inch closer.

"This… wasn't your fault, Takeru-san," I say, both puppies barking in agreement and huddling closer to him, licking his swollen fingers.

"But I still did nothing."

"H-However, what could you-"

"If you do nothing, if you achieve nothing… then, you're pointless," he whispers, still rubbing the head of the pink kitty which seems to want to curl into invisibility before hiding under his red scarf. "And it's always the same. Every time something goes wrong, instead of trying to come up with different solutions, it's always the same. Just leave them behind, anyone who can no longer go on already exhausted their potential. Always the same shit, and I never can do anything."

Following after the slouched shape, the fire eventually gives up and the hallways return to a normal form, despite the smell not leaving us. Finding a large door, we end up in a vast hall filled to the brim with wounded people and hurrying guards. Screaming plummeting down to my ears, empty medkits lying on the ground, bags and bags overflowing with bandages dampened red. Suffering, so much suffering.

"Not enough supplies, it's important to prioritize them to those who contribute more value," he spits, beginning to frown, his aura solidifying and sending shivers down my spine as he holds my hand tight when stepping forward. "And there's nothing you can do, more than offer them company in their pain before the end comes," he then sighs again, marching through the distorted place, the bodies that crumble to sand or ash, teeth gritting in imitation of an industrial press at the treatment of unresponsive limbs.

Holding his wrist, almost slipping on our march, my lips quiver as I take deep breaths, the mixed scent of both medication and burnt material bringing an awful taste to my mouth, making my tongue regress into my throat.

"But the terrorists were repelled, right?"

"Yeah. Doesn't make the treatment the wounded received any better."

"Yet, one cannot-"

"Foresee all accidents nor avoid death during battle, I know. I know some 'elite' squadrons should get priority access to the supplies, but," his lips twist downwards as he looks back.

At the twisted bodies, at the cocoon of bandages that shield the burning skin, at the splatters of red, at the hands that rummage, and dive, and thrash, and seek something within medkits and suitcases yet only grasp air, or their own hair in frustration.

"Is this really all we can do? Just throw people in an open room, jammed like fish in a barrel? Sigh…"

… Why? I thought he'd be angry, but his aura remains so blue. I don't even feel any of the usual gale he shows when arguing with the Professor. "You said you thought this…" gulping hard, I look away from the spiraling bodies and furniture, the liquid feeling covering my ankles, "was just an accident. Did another incident resembling this happen again?"

"All the damn time."

We reach the end of the hall, he opens the door and a small garden greets our sight. Growing to a stop, he turns around and presses part of his scarf on my face, cleaning it slowly then petting my back as I take in air. Breathing in deeply once again, exhaling as the echoes recede and stop tailing us, the tension leaves me as he pats my head. The animals are all unhurt, save for the pink kitty which remains hidden under the scarf, unmoving. As he rubs his arms, dusting the burnt parts of his dress, I spot two shapes nearby. Wait, that's…

"And this, too," he says, hunching over, hugging the animals, running his fingers over them in search of burns or injuries. "There's always the scapegoats."

A little girl with pink hair remains shaking, crying, not lifting her face as her father tries to look into her eyes. The erratic breathing does not stop as he embraces her and joins in the weeping, she continues to apologize in whispers without even blinking, without the shaking stopping.

"I know I'm the idiot here, but it really pissed me off, seeing this kind of thing."

"Huh? It doesn't upset you anymore?"

"… I guess I just don't expect anything out of my superiors anymore."

Looking back for a moment, that crying girl is definitely one of his squadmates. Yet, it would seem she doesn't recall having met this world's Takeru-san, perhaps due to the trauma of the situation. The building which melts like wax to the crawling fire is now unrecognizable from its prior shape, leaving only the flowers nearby safe. Truly fading to nothingness as his home was before we started walking.

And yet, despite the sickness, almost losing balance, what I felt in there… was only sadness and grief, what one would expect of anyone faced by such an event. Such a horrible thing… so much fire, so much pain, everyone was still grayed out so I couldn't hear anything, thankfully, but still, I know what it must have sounded, felt like. Burns which expand over the skin like the first rays of sunlight at dawn, unceasing beating in the chest while rushing, rebounding off one patient to the other, wanting to tear one's scalp apart as no amount of searching meets the right solution within the spareness of the medkits. As if looking up at open sea for directions, yet no stars were shining above.

I do tend to forget, how precarious the situation was during the invasion, how miraculous it was that Lucifer succeeded.

A hand on my hair, coldness which roves all over my cheek, a pair of eyes scan me. "Are you alright? You didn't get burned or anything?"

"Ah, no, I'm unhurt."

"You don't look fine, why are you hugging your shoulders so tightly?" He asks, slowly placing his hand on my shoulder.

"I was… thinking, is all. What of you? Are you not in pain, after almost being burned?"

"I'm fine. You can't die in your dreams, bunny girl."

"… But if you're conscious about this being a dream, why can you not wake up?"

"I dunno. It's just how it is, I guess. You can turn your brain off, but you still gotta do the grind. Maybe I'm just coping while sleeping."

You seem… oddly composed for someone so young going through so much cruelty. Perhaps, he truly is merely coping by brandishing a stoic facade. But all of those people, that poor woman in the hallway… A focus on individual suffering can fog your vision. Those who cannot thrive against the indifference of the flow of events are to be disregarded. I know you employ such mantras whenever I tend to hesitate. I know there is little to be done after the fact, that letting guilt become your main source of fuel is only detrimental to one's growth. Yet, amidst such savagery, is such a compressed graveyard the only possible outcome, Professor?

" Tragedy creates opportunity, fear numbs the mind and tames the heart. Only by remaining composed in the face of such approaches will these tactics lose their intended effect on your psyche."

I know, I know this disquiet in my breath is caused by my own limitations. But is there truly nothing else to do? Is this Takeru-san correct in his assessment of those in power? You wouldn't… support such a sorrowful state of affair in that hall, right? Knowing what laid in the hearts of those apprehended, knowing how you reacted when Chief Yoroi came to request that favor out of you, I cannot see how you could-

"There, there," slow rocking on the back of my head, fingers tread my scalp. With nothing but a gentle push I end up resting onto him, an arm wrapping my shoulder. "It's okay, you're safe now."

"I'm fine. I'm not-"

"I can tell you're trying to stay strong. You don't have to," he whispers, running circles on my hair as he makes us both sit down in the middle of the garden, the animals coming closer, bumping their noses on mine.

So I close my eyes, clawing at his dress, at the coldness of the blue. The rabbit on my head descends and nuzzles my cheek, the red kitty licks my hair. For a moment, that is all that happens.

As I try to stiffen my cries he remains drawing circles on my hair, humming some sort of song. Simply laying against each other, surrounded by the ashes which raise and depart, by the rows of flower that still remain intact. I can still her the creaking of the wood, smell the burning mingling with the lavender in the air, even see the searing fireflies that to the moon scatter, yet my breathing returns to normal, no longer do I seek to crush or constrict my own palms, which now lay against his dress.

There is only silence, and, while unsettling, it is also… peaceful. Refreshing, in a sense.

"… Did you used to enjoy being here, Takeru-san? Simply staring at the moon in silence?"

"Yeah," he whispers, still playing with my fringe. "Whenever I had something to think about, I'd come here, to the gardens in the back and stay staring at the moon, at the constellations. Sigh… Even if I only got scolded for it."

"Why? Did they punish you for simply looking at the stars?" How cruel. Why would they do such a thing?

"No, you see, turns out that whenever I go stargazing I end up falling asleep. So, well, Maya-nee and Yohime-san worried that I could get sick when I did that," he says, scratching the back of his head. Smiling, for the briefest moment.

"I see. Did you ever truly become bedridden due to watching the stars?"

"No, dumb people don't catch colds. One advantage of being really dense, I guess," he chuckles to himself, to the groans of the animals which retaliate against his falling strands of hair. "But I also came here, after…" he looks back, sobering sharply, "the accident. I really liked this place. Really…"

"… Was it lost during the invasion, I suppose?" He nods, eyes closing, saying nothing while petting both puppies that whimper and rest their heads on his thighs. "But you could… try and rebuild a place like this, right? Certainly, someone in the IRG would favor such a proposition."

"… No, I don't think so."

"Why?"

"Most parks have been turned into shelters, and even the gardens and parks of the palaces are scheduled to be demolished. Kitanomaru has already been turned into a military camp, and chances are the rest will be next on the chopping block," he spits, frowning, resting his chin on my head.

"But isn't there anything you can do?" Is this why he slowly grew more and more angry? Yet, he's still so cold, so blue. Sturdy as a glacier, icy as one could be.

"Nothing a commoner like me can change. No one even thinks I'm worth my rations…"

"Eh?! Why? You're…" grasping his dress, leaving his arm's hold to stare into his eyes only sends further frost into my lungs. "Do you… truly not find yourself useful to the IRG?"

"Sigh… Again, if you accomplish nothing, it's worse than if you were not there. People are counting on me, and I'm always letting 'em down."

"Do you not try your hardest to support your comrades?"

He looks at me in silence, before sighing. "Matters nothing if they're not happy with my performance. It do be like that sometimes, I just can't seem to stop screwing things up," he sighs once more, the white bunny groaning, both puppies barking, the others rustling in his hold.

The clouds start parting and bathing us both in ample moonlight. Beckoned by the breeze, small firefly-like ashes scatter to the sky. Amidst the silence, the scent of the flowers, we stare at the skyline. Simply resting against one another, simply enjoying this momentary and unlikely peace.

As the butterfly wings rise and fold upon themselves, ashes finally losing luster.

As the threads of moonlight defy ramparts of clouds.

As the breeze rustles armies of flowers, their scent giving no quarters to the burnt smoke.

As I rest my head on his shoulder and close my eyes, tending to the red kitty with a hand, both dragons curling in the space between our faces.

In the silence of this better dream, we remain in place. Simply resting, relaxing under the moonlight.

"… Well, guess I should keep going," he says, slowly standing up, taking the animals on his person once more.

"Do you know where you should go now?" I ask, fingertips still lingering on his dress.

"Eh, forward. Thanks for having accompanied me, Kasumi," he says, again petting my head, placing the black bunny on it again. "But you really should turn around, this is-"

"I won't."

"… Things won't be nice to see. I know you're also part of the dream, but there's no need to-"

"You don't have to worry about me. I will be fine… if you're by my side. Would you rather me go away, perhaps?"

Again roughly rubbing my head, playing with my bangs afterwards, he shakes his head. "Thanks, really. You too, little bun," he then pets the bunny on my head, who rolls on its side to welcome the kindness, almost sliding off my hair. "Well, let's go then. Just… please turn around and leave if things get dangerous, okay?" I nod, stepping forward, grabbing his hand.

And so, he takes one final look at the house which fades to the blaze. Sighing again, taking in one deep breath of the fragrance of the flowers, slow steps he takes towards the gate. Back to the wasteland, to the flickering lightposts and almost abstract patterns of machinery and buildings.

"Um…"

"Yes?"

"Well, I wanted to ask, were you living in that house before?"

"Ah, yeah," he smiles faintly, again looking back for a moment. "I was lucky enough to be allowed to."

"May I ask why? If you're a commoner and that's a house belonging to the nobility, why were you there?"

"Well… It's kinda complicated to explain. Basically, Yohime-san made an exception and allowed me to live with them after my dad died," he says, the purple puppy barking much and hopping about, clinging again onto his leg, biting his dress until Takeru-san pets it for a while.

"Were you… happy back then?"

Again, he smiles briefly. This time, tears are set adrift for a second. "Yes. Those years were probably the happiest of my life."

"Then, do you not have any friends that still care about you? I understand that… the system does not care for one's woes, that anything that hampers the cycles should be discarded, and this may be taking its toll on you, however, surely you still have someone to trust in, right?"

His hand slips from my grasp.

Halting his steps, the hold over the dragons and kitties grows stronger.

A slow shake of his head, a slower descent of a single tear to the soil.

"No, there's no one. Not anymore…"

"Huh? B-But what of the cousins? There's also the Sho- I mean, this Yuuhi you're friends with."

Again, he shakes his head, bottom lip regressing completely behind his teeth despite the barks then whimpers of both puppies, that are met with hissing from the red kitty and white bunny.

"I… I see… Did you have an… argument with them?"

"… Doesn't matter. I'm a nobody for them at this point…" And dragging his feet, he resumes the walk.

The purple puppy whimpers, intently staring, barking. Ignored. So does the blue one, that chooses to remain silent as it walks right beside his feet. The other animals try and huddle to his face, he absentmindedly caresses them. The white bunny on the other hand is now staring at me, and when our eyes cross it gives a slow munch to the air.

"… I'm sorry, it was insensitive of me."

"You don't have to apologize. I'm at fault for letting this get to me. A warrior must not push his emotional burdens onto others," he wipes his eyes, sighing again, a completely neutral and stoic mask shielding his complexion once more. "I'm just a weakling."

"That's not true, Takeru-san. Being open about your pain doesn't make you-"

"A warrior must never falter, must never surrender to despair's freezing grip. Those of us in the IRG have the duty of the Shogunate on our shoulders, so we can't waver or show weakness," he repeats, as if he were an announcer in the radio.

"But being pained about losing people you like isn't weakness."

"… It is for those who must fight."

"I do not agree. It's because you like those people, because you want to give others the peaceful days you enjoyed that you keep moving forward, right?"

"… I guess," he stops, looking up as the illumination flickers on around us. "But someone like me doesn't get the leeway of being bratty. If I talk back, it's more shouts and reprimands. I don't wanna know what's gonna happen if they find me moping about."

"Um, you are assigned as a surface pilot, correct?"

"Hm? Yeah, why do you ask?"

"Well… You said something horrible like what happened in that building occurred all the time, right?" He nods, slowly. "Then, I was wondering if you had other duties on your shoulders that are making your duties harder on you. I know casualties are unavoidable," even if I disagree with the Professor's prior claim that those who perish had nothing of value to offer to humanity's cause, "and that your comrades need you ready for the time of battle, yet, there is no need to punish yourself needlessly, to the point of bottling up your grief. There is only so much that can be done, and you are already a decent enough pilot. I think you shouldn't be so hard on yourself."

"… For real?"

"Huh? What did you… that wording…"

"I think there's more we can do, things don't have to be as shitty as they are," he kicks a rock, sending it crashing against a car, breaking its only sane window. "Sigh… It all feels so pointless…"

"Don't say that, please. There are people that you've helped, right? Like that girl before, you protected her to the best of your abilities."

From what the echoes told me, you shielded the girl after her mother perished during that terrorist attack. "You should be proud of being so brave in the face of danger, Takeru-san. There are people that do thank your companionship, I'm certain."

"I guess… I guess you're right," he nods, not sounding very convinced as he pats the pink kitty. The white rabbit thumps, looking back at me.

And for a moment, neither of us says a thing. Looking around, the stormclouds claim the sky, the desolate wasteland extends again everywhere. That veil of sweat, that heaviness inside me that was clogging me while inside that building is no more, even if a slight burning pain remains on my mouth.

It is no wonder he lacks so much energy, to face such cruelty at an early age. I know you've said that thinking on the individuals only hampers one's thinking process, yet I believe you wouldn't deride Takeru-san for taking this as hard as he is now, Professor. Even if in the bigger picture the situation was solved, those who hold the bigger picture on their shoulders were made to suffer quite much. However, if what has him in this shape is reminiscent of what we saw on that building then, was his anger born out of the required harshness the people had to endure during the invasion? It would seem he is dejected at the lack of empathy and care his superiors display, and at his own lacking results. While it is true that those who cannot contribute would be scorned and replaced, the Takeru-san I know already tries hard enough to make himself useful. But then, if he shows how willing he is to aid others, what could possibly have him being so-

A sudden yelp, an acute bark echoes, almost like primal cackling. Flinching and looking around, I spot a pair of eyes staring from within the shadows in a corner of a street behind us. Glistening, unmoving.

… Getting closer.

"W-What is that?"

"Hm? Oh," Takeru-san's eyes widen, looking at whatever it is that remains hidden behind the shadows. Then, he shrugs as he shakes his head. "That's the fox, I think."

"Fox?"

Upon my question, the animal leaves the cloak of shadows with slow steps, circling around us. Its unblinking and deep violet eyes look down at us in a perfect lock as it walks circles around the collapsed streets, boxes and abandoned mementos, its purple fur shining bright with not a single speck of dust or filth. It hops in place, laughing and letting out a small yell, slowly wagging its tail as it stares.

"Sigh… I guess it wants us to follow it," he says, both bunnies groaning a bit.

"Have you seen this… fox before, Takeru-san?"

"Yeah, when I get lost in the wasteland. It's always laughing at me for some reason."

"Do you… think it's one of your friends?"

"No, doesn't feel like it. It doesn't really let me get close, and it kind of gives me the creeps."

"Why?"

"I dunno, it just does. See? Even the bunnies don't like it," he says, petting the white fur until it calms down. I also have to pet the small rabbit that my self is within this dreamscape, for it also was most displeased.

"So you don't want to follow it?"

"Sigh… I don't mind it trying to help me, but I've got the feeling that it's playing me," he says, starting to walk towards the fox, that then seems to cackle as it runs into the ruins. "It never lets me get close, and when it does and I try to pet it, it rushes off in a hurry. It's a bit annoying, but it hasn't tried to hurt me or the animals, so I guess it ain't bad," he nods at me with a shrug, once more hugging all the animals while letting the puppies now walk on their own.

… I assume the fox is the Professor, then? She has been referred as such by some hostile people. So this world's Takeru-san thinks so of her? Maybe, his mind sees her like that due to her underhanded way of acting?

Walking after the fox, it always tries to stay on higher ground than us, staring as if to gauge whether we're following it or not, and letting out a small bark before running off as it sees we are on its trail. A mischievous and untrustworthy guide through the wasteland. There is a certain… pressure coming from the unwavering gaze as it looks back at us every now and then.

What would happen if we tried to turn around and stop following it? A faint groan, the rabbit on my head moves a bit. I suppose, as foolish as it would be to ignore her words back in reality.

But then, if this fox is the Professor… I look at the small loaf of white atop Takeru-san's head, that now has its eyes open and seems to be softly groaning in discontent. Our eyes meet, it wiggles its ears a bit. If you're not the Professor then, who are you supposed to be?

We hop over some lightposts, walking sideways to squeeze ourselves through two crumbled buildings, the puppies walking in between us as he extends a hand to aid me not stumble, the fox still cackling and staying a few steps ahead of us, in the shadows. The nearby area looks exactly the same as the wasteland from before, littered with empty water drums and broken buckets, cracked bowls, and other artifacts. In the silence, not even the faint moonlight reaches us as the tall buildings obscure the area, a thin thread of fog hampering our vision, my breath visible as I exhale.

Rubbing my arms, stealing a glance at him, I edge closer. "So, um…"

"Hm?"

"Err, back to what we were talking about…" I say, looking at him, seeking a reaction. He merely nods back, awaiting my words. "Despite being a pilot, do you have other pressing duties on your shoulders?" I suppose, that would explain why this world's Takeru-san grew so blindly angry, if forced to see the asphyxiating pressure of the war, like it felt within that rotting sea of flames. But then, why is he still so silent, so quiet? Wasn't he supposed to be someone really violent?

"Eh, it's more or less the same as the rest, it ain't like I have it harder or anything," he shrugs again, composed despite his posture remaining hunched. "All members of the Imperial Guard have to aid with patrols, the delivery of supplies and the checks of inventory, the usual reports and other bureaucratic junk, and being a commoner makes me no exception. We're short-staffed already, so everyone is juggling two or three duties at times, even if they're basic tasks."

"For example?"

"Tsuhi aids the maintenance crew besides her patrols and surveillance duties, Fukuha and Okamoto cooperate with the IJA with the chain of deliveries, Amanohara and Kobayashi-san deal with some of Raiho-san's petitions for meetings, and Takahashi-san oversees the maintenance and patrols of our fellows."

"And what about you?"

His gaze falls away, hands retracting inward. "I help in the kitchen and in keeping the shelters calm, besides my office work."

"The shelters? How?"

"By giving them updates, or just listening," he says, tone and face suddenly submerged fully under the dark blue hue, now barely lifting his boots to walk, wrapping both dragons more in his hold. The hand linked with mine starts to slowly shake. "People are desperate, you know. Look around at all this shit, how could they not lose it? So if you leave them alone, telling them nothing, they'll assume the worst."

"I see. Little updates, even if they're false at times, aids the civilians to deal with the pressure, avoiding them from falling to dread."

"Yeah, kind of. They need to try and get a routine going again. And sometimes, all they need is someone listening, to feel those in charge do really care. That's all I can do… all I'm good for."

"I s-see…" again, cracks and vines of dark overpower the blue, the boots dragging on the soil, enough to let me overtake his walking speed. "And, um, does your unit have a name? Perhaps," gulping hard, the caustic scorching almost gags me as the illumination above turns itself off, "t-the Swordbreakers?"

"Huh? The what?"

"Oh, it was just a, uh, name I heard once," I say, looking away, to the ground to not stumble under the low visibility. Shortly after, I hear the white bunny groaning again, its eyes fixed on me.

Yet, Takeru-san merely fiddles with his hair, then the bunny's, before shaking his head, without any sudden disquiet in his body or aura. "No, I never heard of a unit with that name. The unit I'm assigned to is the 44th Independent Squadron of the IRG, callsign Chain. We're officially under the Wolf Battalion, but we mostly just do our own thing," he again shrugs, corking his brows as he hears the fox laughing, doing circles ahead of us, before sighing yet again then climbing the uneven terrain as the lightposts around us continue to flicker on and off, giving away sparks.

I do not recall ever hearing of that squadron from Takeru-san, nor do I remember hearing about it during our recovery sessions. But why would he have not recalled that yet? Hmm, because the memories are not yet assimilated? So that would equal that this Takeru-san is how he was right before becoming that angry person everyone says he was? But he doesn't seem evil or violent in the slightest. Even amidst the fire and in front of that corpse, he felt so silent and cold. Almost as if he himself were like this wasteland.

He offers a hand, I take it and he steadies me as I climb over some cars that are in the way. As my feet slowly reach the other side of the street, I look into his eyes. "… So, are you content in this squadron? Is there something you're not pleased with?"

"… I fulfill my duty, and I try for that to be enough," he says, swallowing another sigh.

"Why? Aren't you helping the people of the shelters? I understand that… in the face of something as overwhelming as what happened in that mansion-"

"It's not like that, at all," he replies, soft acid dripping from his lips.

"Then, why do you feel like your efforts are pointless?"

"Because, I dunno, I feel like we should have better protocols, or some plan to actually help our fellows. It's like…" His arms slowly fold, he looks upwards as I approach his side as the fox barks once more.

A strong wind howls, coldness crawls up my spine as needles dig at my nape. Dizziness, disorientation. Lights flicker above me, or perhaps they're fireflies. But as the blurriness fades, I can see they are ashes.

All around us, smoke and ashes. Strong clouds, even stronger echoes of explosions, distorted shapes flying about, fingers coiling like the horns of a goat, a pouring beating of metallic bits and torn cables falling upon us. And yet, despite the closeness of the explosion's glare, it all feels so cold.

"W-What is… What is-" I gag, coughing brusquely, yet he holds my shoulder in support.

"I always had these nightmares since the defense of Kyoto, when I didn't make it to save some of the fleeing civilians, leaving a girl alone after all that mess."

"Huh? You… didn't manage to save them? But… But you're such a good pilot, how did-"

"Because I started arguing instead. I could have, I dunno, made a more convincing argument instead of snapping. And the time I wasted… caused this," he says, looking around at the blackened smoke which swirls around us, at the shapes that are bent and broken behind the veil. "It don't matter how good a pilot I am, long distances can't be cleared in just a few seconds. Not with a Zuikaku."

Chests folding inside out before giving in to the blazes and smoke, crabs sliced in half, manic screams, mournful screams. No stars above, no wind clearing the smoke, I can only choke as I lean on him as the entire place is engulfed in the suffocating sensation as if this were a closed-off room.

My hands meet the softness of his dress, however. And nothing collides against me, instead I feel something poking my nose. One of the dragons, the black one, rubbed its nose on mine, the blue puppy also huddling closer to my legs.

And yet, the other dragon starts to shriek, shriek and scream as the thin trunks of the Warriors are turned into pincushions, yet the metallic frames up above only find a lone girl safe after the fact. He pets its head, the brown drake slowly curls inwards, hiding its face into one of Takeru-san's armpits.

"I used to think I was having a breakdown after seeing battle for the first time, after only managing to save that lone girl. If we can even call that saving, of course," he spits in a whisper. "I thought that I was freaking the fuck out, despite how many times we were told that people would die in battle," he says, low and cold, eyes barely open. "That this happened because I was a dumb rookie and things would be better when the vets got everything back in order."

A hammer cracking my skull in half or being forcefully pushed down into water. An impact like when I tried to dive into his mind, again spurring dizziness, again sending a line of fire from my forehead to my nape. Stiffness, contraction, hair stands on edge, pain all over the back of my head. How… How can you remain so immutable while feeling like this?

"I used to think there was a solution being prepared…" he whispers, a single tear again falling from his eyes as most buildings around us are crushed into dust, into darkness, "but the hours just keep getting harder to endure, and nothing seems to be going to change for the better."

I pull his wrist, hands shaking, "H-However, you did save that girl's life. Your efforts weren't-"

"That's not the point."

"Then, what is?"

He points up, grimacing. Spiraling around us, smoke, fire and debris flashes in my sight, lifted off the ground like papers from the desk as the Professor hits her muse and blasts into full focus after the customary palming of the wood. Up above, beyond the buildings, echoes of thunders within swirling clouds which shriek into a falling drill. Yet, the storm is blasted apart for a single moment, like a curtain swatted away by the morning breeze, as four metallic shapes descend in the distance. The ground shakes, my feet slip, his arm catches and holds me steady so that I can see well. A few Takemikazuchi units rush through the battlefield like a see-through mirage, splintering even the smallest BETA in twain, standing proud in their conquest over the hellfire.

"Is this the counterattack of the Kyoto Battle?"

"No, this is the first night," he says while still grimacing, the purple puppy barking at the ongoing onslaught where tanks and Tanks are lifted and swatted in the air like ping pong balls by the flight of Type-

00 units. "We had the power to halt the invasion, we had the units to protect the city, to evacuate the people safely even if the shit hit the turbine. And guess what? They left no one to shield the last defense line," he says, sinks, as he wraps the brown dragon in his dress, as he pulls me closer, tapping his boot to halt the aggravations released by the purple doggy. "And even after that battle, there were many small things we could have done. Little details, small gestures of kindness, small moments of bravery from those high up. But every day, it's more silence and nothingness."

For a moment, there are only distant echoes of violence in the darkness. There is only the nose of the black rabbit that scours my hair, rubbing against my scalp in sympathy. Only the soft contact of his fingers as they caress my fringe, the warmth of the animals that huddle close. With one deep sigh, he shakes his head, pats my shoulders, and everything around simply fades away, receding back into the shadows, just barely out of sight. Be it the thrashed furniture, the carpet of shattered glass, the little books burning by the remains of machinery, or the knitted clothes or small accessories or tiny toys that spill out from what boxes, bags or luggage those escaping tried to salvage from their homes, what little dear mementos crushed by either the Warriors or by the Takemikazuchi's feet as they stomp in triumph over their battlefield of choice.

Knees quiver as I try to stand on my own, taking a slow breath in. "Are these the nightmares… you always have every morning?"

"Huh? How do you even- Sigh… Yeah, something like that."

"So is this why you hate the Royal Guard? Because they…" arranged such an accident, to display their Takemikazuchi for the first time? Is this what you meant by 'giving meaning to the burning of the Capital', Professor?

"Hate? No, I don't really hate anyone… I'm just disappointed," both watering eyes look upwards again, both puppies whimpering in agreement, the rest of the animals huddling closer, the white bunny opening its eyes and groaning, the one in my head simply huddling into my touch. "There's no solution, only the same words echoed time and again. Those high up don't listen, they take it as a personal attack if you try and suggest something to 'em. And it doesn't matter what you do in the end, you're just another worthless pawn, another lowborn to use as a meat shield," grimacing, cracks spawn in his complexion.

Yet, where the Takeru-san I know would have ignited further while mentioning such things, there's hollowness behind the cracks, a saddened quiver in his lips as his gaze crashes down, far worse than the wreckage in this place, as he starts to walk once more.

"Are they truly so harsh towards commoners?"

"It's not just commoners, it's anyone who is of lower station than the one speaking," he slowly says, hugging the dragons to his chest, petting the tuna and the red kitty that within the scarf remain. "So if a Shinpan orders something, there's no changing that. Even if all you try to do is give them a suggestion, inform them of how the terrain looks like so they can make a better decision, all you get are shouts and punishments for speaking out of turn."

"So they're truly nothing but prideful buffoons." Just as that mean squadmate of yours, just like Sumika-san told me.

"… If that was all, I could stomach it, you know. Accept the rules, play with the hand I got." He whispers, taking a second to hesitate on his steps, avoiding a lone flower, an abandoned stuffed toy. "Maybe I'm the idiot here, always trying to 'help out' when I'm a stranger in the guard. Sigh…"

Silently, he continues on walking. The fox remains watching us for a moment, before once more hurrying off into the stretched shadows. Under the swirling clouds, small ashes posing as fireflies in the air as the wind howls serve as as powdery light accompanying our travel through the seemingly unending expansion of dirt and debris that goes into the horizon.

Sigh… As if it truly were an eternal wasteland. Yet, even now, there is no hatred, no tension in his hands or lips, none of that fire within his eyes. So quiet, so slow, so dimmed. So, so blue. It might not be wise to press further, but…

"But why won't they care to listen to your reports? The IRG are the protectors of the Shogunate's interests, right?"

"Yeah, that's exactly the problem," he sighs, again.

"Huh? I do not understand. If your work could benefit the organization, why dismiss your reports?"

"Well, you could say salvation is what many are after nowadays. To prove their devotion to the nation to get better food, to find a solution to stop the BETA, to do enough patchwork to keep everything tied up. Or, like… to make business with the situation."

A faint wind blows, ashes and dust kicks up, small flickers of yellow and orange flutter about as the lightposts turn off. And this time, they don't regain their shine. Within the blurry haze of the foggy curtain, so very small specks crack through the ice of his aura.

And near us, a robust building can be seen through the fog, appearing suddenly like a castle by the sea, like in the tales the Professor brought me when I was little.

A large auditorium, overflowed to the brim with people. Thrust together, falling and folding onto one another, toads in a bucket, all of them smeared in filth to the point of leaving their visible skin reddening, their nails long enough to resemble vampires of folktales, tainted bandages surrounding each and every one of them like a cocoon, far more overflowed than the hall we saw before.

A small scratch, a tiny distortion in his aura, in his lips, as he stares at the spectacle of shapes that can be seen through the broken doors of the place.

"… But there is no salvation to be found here."

"But there are people trying to solve the issue, I'm certain. The Prof- I mean, some of the authorities must be devising a plan to counter the invasion and return some normalcy to the Empire."

Instead of answering me, he again stops walking, despite the warning in barks from the fox, to once more seek the moonlight obstructed by stormclouds, only a rough shape filtering through.

"In any organization, high impact decisions take precedence over small adjustments. I know that much, I get it, for real," he says, slow, detached, no different than the beeping of a machine in process. "Those in charge want solutions to the current problems of their agendas, regardless of the methods used to solve them, more so if they come with lots of benefits." Again slumping, his head crashes down like a meteor, the gaze burning even further below. "Focusing on things that give little to no tangible return will only get you yelled at for being useless to the system."

"B-But even in times of crisis, to neglect the safety of the people is-"

"They're well enough in the shelters," a brow twitches, "it's us soldiers who do the heavy lifting, they shouldn't take us for granted," then it's both eyelids as he starts to frown, ripples turning to waves within the glacier. "The safety and interests of the Empire should be prioritized over anything else, and any of us should be overjoyed to courageously offer flesh and blood for the nation."

"I concur a focus on the individual can cloud one's mind when overseeing matters from a position of responsibility within large structures, however-"

All lights in the area shut off, the empty drums falling down, the tiny rations pack joining into tumbleweeds, a cold gale then blows.

"Indulgence in luxuries and selfishness is a sin, instigating dissent and discontent is an offense towards His Holy Majesty's royal commandments," his fist begin to shake, his already tattered gloves breaking further. "Austerity is a value to praise so it is commendable to make do with what the ration-card gives you without expecting further reward for your services," breathing grows erratic like a scared horse, ignoring the taps of the kitties' paws, the grumbling of dragons and puppies, or the groans of the white bunny. "We're not supposed to help, because it's better to spend our resources to turn around the war. Even if… lots of people die for it."

"However, it can't truly be so desperate, right?" I know the situation was, and continues to be, truly rough on the majority of the population, yet there has been a small rebound effect after a few cities were rebuilt. "It is a herculean effort what is asked of you, I won't deny it, but there must be a solution awaiting beyond the horizon. After all, the sky is always darker right before daybreak."

Holding my gaze for a moment, gazing around for another, a slow shake of his head follows while he runs a hand over the dragons and kitties. "From my spot, it looks like everything is going to hell and back, with no turning back. They're planning to even send the orphans to the factories to builds ammo and 'contribute' to the nation."

"H-Huh?! That's not possible."

I recall the Professor saying she pressured the UN to prevent such things from happening, to truly send inspectors to verify where our supplies came from, to avoid needless entanglements with controversy. I still remember how badly she felt after drinking so much coffee when staying up many days in a row for the negotiations between COSEAN and the Empire, as well as the old chain of command from the UN from before the Treaty fell down. Simply thinking about it is enough to make me sigh and look down, the hours on end surrounded by towers of reports I readied for her, the databases I had to build. Left with only being able to bring tea to her bedside after she almost fell sick as my sole way of aiding the Professor.

He sighs, once more, his feet starting to drag and lift dust. "It is very possible, bunny girl. There has been a certain, uh, 'narrative' I think it's called by the higher ups, going around that says that there are actually no civilians in the Empire."

"What? However, why would anyone claim such a thing?"

"Because everyone should see him or herself as a soldier, and all vassals of His Holy Majesty must be honored to be of use for the war efforts," he says, a cracked gesture that does not resemble a smile, further submersion of his features and aura, his pants bitten by both puppies. Crouching to pet them, enduring their climbing attempts, holding them for a moment. "So everyone should obey the orders they're given without protest, no matter what. All thanks to Her Highness' royal decree," he spits as he frowns for a second, lips cascading, with a loud bark from the fox answering it as if in agreement, a whimper of both puppies that try and lick at his chin.

All I see in his logic and sharp eyes is a pyramid enduring a storm. Hand reaching out like roots, like a flower left at the bottom of a ravine seeking the sun, only to be stomped back underwater. Only those high above manage to ignore the pouring rain, those down below remain forever holding the impossible weight on their shoulders even as their inner fluids and vital components are made to join the turbulent stream of the storm.

My fingertips reach for his sleeve, yet are unable to pull it ever slightly. I can only look down, to avoid peering further into what his aura reveals, into the echoes. "Uh… Um… W-Was it truly so desperate? Wasn't there even a single good thing, a small victory you can think of?"

I know our situation was truly dire, the Professor looked miserable on those days, everybody looked completely dark. Empty, void, apathetic, as if they were completely dead inside. I couldn't go outside as much, everyone looked on edge on those days and the Professor didn't want to risk anything happening to me. But going by the ripples in his aura, how it isn't becoming red in anger but falling further into midnight blue, it all would indicate that the visage that lies in front of me is not an exaggeration from his psyche. It is the manifestation of his issues with a reality he cannot cope with.

"… No, it wasn't one lone thing that was unbearable," he whispers, shoulders sagging, a small tickling sensation falling on my head as he stands. A thin thread of something liquid… coming down from his forehead… "And if you stray a single millimeter from the lane," he says, dry and low, "accusing fingers blast to you faster than piranhas to a roast beef," again shrugging, his features relax as he again pets the animals.

I can say nothing, he simply rests for a second. In silence, he walks again and I follow.

Sidestepping through the wood planks, wires, and who knows what else are those broken parts, his hands always extended backwards to aid me traverse the wreckage under the ever-present stare of the fox. And he says nothing else again, leaving that prickling and cold feeling piking at my nape. I breath in, looking down, the rabbit on my head rustles, groaning. The white one does too, as I look up I find the thing staring at me. And as I remain quiet, it gives a small munch to the air, causing Takeru-san to sigh and pet its head.

… So they want me to keep the conversation going? The rest of the animals also stare at me, whimpering as he merely touches them to silence their concerns. And looking at him well, Takeru-san is… limping on the way forward, resting his weight only on one leg. The coldness in the air, the light vanishing from the place, and… the lack of any signs of people or remains in the area is a bit disturbing. Before, I could easily find plushies or books or even… remains. Now, however, there is nothing save hints of unmaking.

Gulping, grasping his sleeve a bit, I inch closer. "However, I, well, believed the selflessness of the army was what allowed them to protect the people. That despite the, uh, strong worded opinions some hold they had managed to open a river through a desert during those days." That's why Lucifer could be a success, that's why the Yokohama Hive could be recovered, that's why the Professor managed to keep Alt IV on the rails despite the almost hopeless situation of this nation on that horrible year that was 1999.

"… A river of blood, that is," he frowns, stomping slowly for a moment as we get to an open expanse of wasteland again, a glimmer of moonlight gracing the edge of the sky. "Sure, we're still floating but even then… we've already lost the war."

"But if the BETA are repelled-"

"So what if they are?"

A flicker of fire, sparking within the blue.

Eyes that open wide, eyes brimming red, eyes that overlap.

And acid, a venomous acid which is equal to the tone he employed when he showed us his memories of battle.

"Is that gonna make up for all the deaths we've allowed to happen? How the fuck are we even supposed to rebuild this nation if all everyone can think of is to keep on fighting to their graves?"

"H-However, there must be something you can do, without countering in aggression," I say, pulling his arm. "Someone has to still be looking out for the future, right?"

The tension recedes, a wave back to the sea, diffusing the red within. "Sigh… I know, I hope, but no one will listen. It's one thing to unite us to try and brave this dark hour, another to… simply surrender everyone to die and glorify it as something praiseworthy."

As if to answer to his words, the ground shakes a bit as the fox's howl reaches my ears. The iron beams, the torn wreckage twists and bends, forming rows of real fangs under the wasteland.

"And as long as those prideful, extreme approaches continue to produce the results those up high want nothing will change. It's just like with Shura's Dance…" biting his lips, he kicks the air, the deformed maw that springs forth from the dried soil, "they'll just abandon the civilians to their luck, because it's better for the battle plan. 'Cutting the right corners' as they say," frowning, he spits on the ground.

"However, humanity's salvation… can still happen because of these noble sacrifices. If the Empire were to fall-"

"Then tell me, Kasumi. How am I supposed to convince an MP that wants to die after losing a limb because 'she can't contribute to the Empire's expectations'?"

"H-Huh?"

"How do I get the kids to eat their meals when all they think is that they'll be sent to work or to train?"

"I… I was- I don't- I mean… Um…"

"And no one bats an eye anymore, no one speaks up against this madness, no one questions the decisions our superiors take, and no one listens to the advice those of us who work the terrain have to give." He then shrugs, his chuckling breaking at times when the fox howls, glaring at us from a distance. "And I ain't even talking about me, some of my squadmates also get lots of shit just for trying to offer their grain of sand. And if we guards get so much shit, how do you think the civvies are treated when they try to offer their advice in their fields of work?"

It's as if a viscous, swirling fire of red were constantly changing shapes inside his heart. Kind of like one of those lava lamps the Professor showed me when I was little, but with true magma encased in dry ice. And eyes, and lips, and fingers melt and swirl within that liquid fire, as if throwing themselves onto it.

Coughing and hacking, my knees meet the ground. A strong scent fills my nostrils, as if oil and fuel were showering upon me. Again slowly stroking my hair, rubbing my back and casting the spikes on my nape away as his aura flows into me.

"You really should turn back and leave, Kasumi," he whispers, patting my shoulder. "This isn't your battlefield."

"… Is this how you've been feeling everyday?" When I wake you up, when I notice your aura darkening in your office… Is this what plagues your mind, below the surface?

"Well… Not every day, no, but for the most part, yeah, it's been the same shit non-stop," he rubs his eye bags, ruffling his long hair for a moment as the animals all press themselves onto him. "Too many things to fix, to little I can actually do, no one who would listen, failing to just, I dunno, contribute anything that actually matters. I'm just… exhausted, I guess?"

After a few deep breaths, after leaning on his arm to stand up again, I cough and speak slowly. "B-But there's no way that there's no solution in sight for you," enduring a strenuous effort, a sharp pain on my lower back, behind my knees, I hold his gaze, sinking fully into the cloak of dry ice which is his aura. "What I saw on those days, what you say happened, and all of this darkness around us… I know the situation must look miserable from the ground, but the UN wouldn't allow civilians to be abandoned or for all of them to be treated as part of the military. And I doubt the soldiers of the Empire would welcome the notion, their honor to protect their people would make them feel dishonored by that. And even then, you wouldn't… y-you wouldn't-"

Again petting my head, he shakes his. "It ain't always so easy, Kasumi. Sometimes, the shepherd's best choice is to blast the lambs to save the farm. And us sheep ain't strong enough to face the wolves on our own."

"But… But even if impossible for common people, there was someone who-"

"Sudden malfunction of communication," he says, sighing, hollowing himself out, "deliberate black screens, false reports, and abuse of the chain of command. If a Shinpan or a member of a Regent House declares an area liberated, no one would be stupid enough to doubt them. Like they did when they abandoned Uncle and his family…" more lava bubbles raise below the icy water, small dents and scars. No amount of kindness from the animals douses his mood. "Where was the UN back then? Running away like cowards. Where was the IRG? Supporting a 'national hero' that abandoned his people. If they had tried, they could have saved Uncle Koetsu and everyone else…" And again, he starts to shake, sink further into dark blue. "But it wasn't worth the ammo and fuel. It never is." Another bark, a cold gust, he frowns. "Ugh, shut up, you stupid fox!"

Clutching his arm, I lean on the freezing fog again, seeking and finding no glimmer in his aura. "However, there are regulations that forbid acting in-"

"Like the Geneva Suggestion?" He asks, raising a brow, a bark from the fox and groans from both rabbits as answers.

"Ah, well… Yes. The Professor tends to refer to it in that way, at times."

"Hahaha… Sounds about right, doesn't it?" He then sighs again as he tends to the animals, making swirls on hairs, rubbing foreheads and ears before we walk again, hands still interlocked, this time with the fox remaining closer. "But a few 'small sacrifices' are little when compared to the 'big picture'. Why waste time saving a few hundreds when thousands, or even millions, hang on the survival of the Empire? And to that end, it's an honor to find meaning in your death. To cheat yourself into believing you dying means something down the line."

"But it's because people fought that-"

"There's a difference between a suicide and a sacrifice, Kasumi. And…" he touches the lump in his forehead, lips receding until they're fully behind his teeth, "it's a hard difference to see, when you've no reason to go on," again he sighs despite the strong gale, the thunders in warning that echo from the thickening stormclouds above. "That's why I've been trying to help the shelters, to tell my superiors of things we could do from our position, but all I ever get are shouts about how useless I am…"

… I suppose, this was caused by the negative of the Professor to relocate Alt IV to the States. If I recall correctly, she had received such an offer after we retreated from Hakuryo Base, after Professor Kirigaya perished. A proposal of support, to merge her project with Alt V, to be granted protection, funds, and new members for the STF. I myself believed she was going to agree, to gain a foothold on the US, to have influence on the decisions made for the supposed new armaments and bring a tailwind of stability to the Empire by supporting a total evacuation of the mainland, more so after the death of the prior Shogun sending quite the chaos into the soldiers of the nation, going by her and the poor Instructor's words back then.

Yet, the Professor vehemently refused. Not only that, but started to push for her own agenda to assault the recently formed Yokohama Hive as soon as its existence was reported. Such an assault required manpower to be preserved, resources to be amassed, appropriate defense lines to be crafted. And a few concessions and deals with the right people, to earn their support.

… And her vision would come to pass, even if it came with a draconian regime to follow so that the Empire's and UN's armies could meet the requirements to execute Lucifer, in opposition to the total loss of sovereignty that meant to send the population as refugees or entangling Alt IV with V.

So the rising magma in him stems from such days, as one of those who had to push the gargantuan wheel with his bare hands. One of the many 'small concessions' the Professor was willing to make when she became the sole lead of the project, one of the 'lambs to blast' as he put it.

And even then it's not like her reaction at all. It's not burning red, it's not sinking dark. It's still so very much blue, so sorrowful and grieving despite the cracks all over him, like metal sinking further beyond the sea.

As if that same ice were constricting upon me, my voice barely leaves my lips. "… However, in the long run, once the BETA are vanquished, everybody will be able to restart their lives once again. It is a strenuous effort that you have to endure… but there is a light awaiting on the other side."

"Even if entire families prefer to kill themselves instead of evacuating, to 'not be a burden on our land'?"

A small flash, or many in quick succession, within the fangs that surround us in the wasteland. Tight expressions, sunken eyes, bolted doors, slow shakes of head. Absolute absence in the little mounds of dirt and balls of concrete where bustling life once was, now twisted and mixed into the sharp shape.

"Even when there's little to no support coming from above?"

A slicing sensation down my back, the point of a knife running up and down. A wounded woman in a BDU, pressure on my arms as I see Takeru-san's own arms in the suit's shielding as they press themselves over reddening clothing wrapped around the lower leg of the soldier. Pain in my lungs, soreness, numbness, a grip at the base of my neck as my eyes water, as red lightning roars in the sky.

" We're wasting crucial time on the mission due to your folly, Shirogane! The man's as good as dead, and we should not be loitering here. Chain One to all. We are leaving, this instant!"

Blinking repeatedly, fighting the haziness, a strong circle of pink now lays in one his cheeks, over the overall paleness of his skin, illuminated by the red bolts which start to fall like the shots of a cannon.

"… Even if we can't give the little kids a single reason to dream of a better future?" He says, falling on his bottom, wrapping both hands over his shoulders.

Whether I sat down on my own or if I fell, I cannot tell. Was it because of the strong wind, of the threat of rain? I do not know. Did a thunderbolt fall nearby or did I collide with one of the fangs? It is hard to tell. All I know is, I cannot remain standing, and my palms meet the dryness of the ground.

It's like back at the facilities, the freezing grip of the weather, the ice spears which tear my insides by merely inhaling. Such is the pressure on his chest as two small shapes come closer, as if they were right in front of us in some narrow, filth-strewn room. Two small little girls, dressed in some rags that would resemble potato sacks more than proper clothing, one with strong pink hair and the other with lime green. Both with sunken cheeks, their collarbones visible and protruding from the skin, both resembling boiled tomatoes that could very well just peel themselves off. As the small girl with pink hair approaches, withstanding her gaze, the pleading, faint hold of her hand on his sleeve brings a twister to his stomach, that spicy fire burning my palate again.

" But the adults said I'll never go back to my village, that I should get used to living and working here in the shelter. My siblings in Suno told me that 'hope' was something I never had to lose when they left to train, but everyone looks so sad and no one wants to play or read with us anymore, and we're only getting one meal despite not doing anything bad. Mister Guard, is everything really going to be fine? Do we have any hope left?"

My throat closes up, a burning sliver of vile slips through my lips.

Crushing my nose, a hand covers my mouth. Yet, the instinct, the hiccups on my chest do not stop.

The repetition, the unending loop of scenes that do not stop in the large auditorium, in the open slums, and who knows where else makes me dizzy, lightheaded as more and more spikes and thorns drizzle over my nape.

Gasping for air, looking up, my eyes find no respite. A vast row of torn shapes hangs below the clouds, coiling and mixing with each other. A large tapestry of grotesqueries, exposed innards which are used as puppet strings, stitched together in a sailor knot, into a large mass which would soon resemble a Legion from folklore, hanging from lightposts or antennas, dangling like swings left to the elements. All of them, in the end, are set on fire and blasted away by red lightning that come from the stormclouds.

"That's why it feels so pointless, they insist on the same tactics and approaches every goddamn time while the ones suffering don't even get words of fellowship to keep on going."

"That's not true…"

"Heh, of course it is. Speak against anyone up, your meals get cut in half. Ask for some help or try to pass a suggestion, you get flamed by the 'honorable' superiors. They don't give a shit anymore, and there's nothing the ones at the bottom can do to change that. Dissent is not tolerated, after all."

That's not true. The Professor was working day and night to reach a solution, against the clock and the opposition from both the UN and the Empire. It's true that she… she was far colder back then, that she did say any sacrifices were worth it for humanity's salvation to come to be. That we had to cut the right corners, and that wasting potential resources on dead ends had to be avoided at all costs. But she did all that for the future, for Alt IV and the salvation that would come.

"The UN… Even if some Imperial soldiers acted out of line, the UN wouldn't-"

"Yeah, right. The 'international police' to the rescue," he sighs, the white rabbit looking back at me and groaning. "After Shura's Dance, who the hell would believe in the UN Farces?"

"But there are many that are trying to-"

"After their 'inspectors' visit the shelters and find nothing wrong?" He asks, again hunching over as a sigh escapes his lips. "I wanted to believe in them, bunny girl. But they're staying safe behind their defense lines, more worried about their meetings than in forwarding actual policies to help their own foot soldiers. Whoever is in charge over there is probably a demon, like whoever planned Shura's Dance and abandoned Hakuryo."

"… That's not true."

"Huh?"

"The Professor isn't… She is no demon."

A cold sensation covers me, the images around me growing defined, clear, the more that frozen blue approaches. Out of air, yet something tries to rise from my stomach as I gag.

"You don't understand…"

"Please calm down, I wasn't-"

"You can't understand!"

"S-Sorry, I didn't meant to-"

"Don't say she's a demon! All she had to endure, all that she convinced herself to do… You can't understand anything of that!"

The Takeru-san I know wouldn't say that. He wouldn't give up at failing, and he wouldn't blame the Professor for it. You should know it, how awful it felt to abandon Hiiragi. She was mostly alone back then, forcing herself to bear everything, even against the opposition of the nobles that hated her so much. And even the Professor… she had to completely drown herself back then just to keep going forward. Hollowing herself out, not even eating, despite how she was trying to remain strong she was cracking all over. Every night, every night I could hear her inner cries before going to sleep echo in the back of my head.

And that's saying nothing on all the members of the STF or the Instructor, all the hardships they had to endure once the Professor formally made their shift to UN Command unlike the mixed arrangement that was in place in Hakuryo Base.

You're always so shining, that drive you always have… I envy it so much, as someone who never did anything on my own volition. Don't call her a demon, don't fall to this dread… Please… You should know how it feels to keep on walking only to see no results come up. Don't talk about the Professor like that. Takeru-san, you more than anyone should be able to comprehend how pained she truly was…

"So if you don't understand, then don't say such awful things please." Don't fall into hatred, that's not how you really are. The Takeru-san I know isn't-

"I can't understand?"

Looking back at him, his lips remained half open as he hangs his head. And slowly, so slowly, a single teardrop falls down, not even strong enough to make it halfway through his cheek. And while subtly shaking…

He starts to laugh.

And doesn't stop.

Instead it grows in strength and loudness.

Even as the puppies bark and tap his legs, he doesn't stop.

Ignoring the groans of both bunnies, the distant barking of the fox, the grumbles of the dragons, the light hits of the kitties and the tuna, or the gust that hits our faces and scatters dust around us as thunders roar above.

He keeps on laughing, almost hysterically, eyes watering yet not enough to shed tears.

"U-Um… I-I'm sorry, Takeru-san. I shouldn't have… shouted at you. So please don't focus so much on… Um…" Without even listening to me, not even seeming to notice I am now in front of him and shaking his shoulder, he keeps on dryly chuckling.

"Haha… hahaha… I see. No wonder you snapped at me, looking at me like that. It's always the same with you."

"Huh? What are you talking about?"

And wiping his eyes, coughing for a brief moment, he looks at me, straight into my eyes, as a wavering smile raises. "In the end… you always leave too, don't you?"

"… What?"

"So it's okay, bunny girl," he turns around, slowly taking a few steps forward. "Just turn around and leave like you always do."

The bunny on top of my head groans, thumping strongly, as I also do, lips shaking as I step closer towards him. "W-Wait a moment, I didn't meant to- I wasn't- What are you even talking about? I just don't want you falling to anger… That's all I-"

He stops, looks up, and I follow with my gaze. It freezes my insides, and I can hear nothing for a moment. Save of a strong rumbling, the rumbling of thrusters coming to life.

A long, long rocket vanishes into the stars while piercing the clouds.

Looking at it brings shivers down my spine, the slow poke of spiders crawling up the bare skin of my back follows right after.

A faint, see-through mirage flickers within the echoing thunders of the propulsion's trail.

A silhouette which resembles me, embracing the cylinder with Sumika-san inside. Screaming at Takeru-san, that he will never understand, before he holds her up and dashes away from the room.

"Ah… A-Ah…" M-My head… It hurts, as if something were piercing from inside my ears.

" No, I don't want to leave. I'll lose myself if I do."

The hallways blur in an instant, held by a strong grip. My nose hurts, as if inhaling into water, as if shrouded in sheets as liquid falls upon me. Gagging, coughing, clawing at my face does nothing to stop the grip of liquid which binds my face.

" Without Sumika-san, I'm just another esper. I don't want to go back to those days…"

Reaching outside, some of his squadmates gather and warn us there is little time left. Sinking to my knees, embracing my stomach, my sight blurs more and more.

" But I… I don't want to say goodbye…"

Takeru-san then pats my- her head, asking for a 'See you later', waving with a smile. Wheezing for air, ears ringing, I keep coughing and coughing. The pain does not recede, now covering all of my head and stomach.

" Don't lie to me. Don't tell me we'll see each other again… Don't make a promise you cannot keep…"

Lifted by a Gekishin's hand, her sight remains locked onto Takeru-san as the machine takes off. His shape becomes so small in the distance, until there is only a tiny, tiny dot. Someone… help… Cough…

"… Don't give me hope, Shirogane-san."

Looking through a small opening nearby, beyond the glass a lone Gekishin waves at me, before everything shakes and the ground becomes distant, so far away. And yet, the large machine that grows smaller and smaller never stops waving, not even as it blurs in with the rest of the landscape of the base.

" Why say 'See you later'? You know that… we won't ever see each other aga-"

"No! This is a lie, Takeru-san isn't going to leave anywhere!" Clawing at the sides of my head, clamping my ears does nothing as the faint cries continue, regretting the time wasted, insisting on the permanent departure. "Get out… of my head. This isn't real."

A strong yet soft hit atop my head. A loss of weight on it.

I blink, gasping for dear air as the echoes suddenly stop, vision refocusing instantly.

The black bunny was now in front of me, looking into my eyes as if waiting.

A moment passes as I regain my breath, rubbing my forehead as my every muscle, my every vein twitches and pulsates, as if I had an engine in overdrive within my skull.

Thumping again, the rabbit groans at me then turns around and quickly hops off beyond the wreckage.

Looking as it goes away, I can only gape as I breath in, my composure finally returning.

Rubbing my head, the lower part of my ears as I blink at the hazy darkness around me, the disquiet ceases and the heaviness leaves me. And only now as I stand up do I realize, Takeru-san is nowhere to be found.

"Takeru-san? Where are you?"

Only a dry, distant echo of my own query answers me. Only the twisted shapes right behind the veil remain here, the silence of the wasteland.

Complete, utter silence within the darkness, the enlarging shadows that seem to fall further upon me.

Everything in sight grows dim and unfocused as the blanket of the fogs tightens its hold over the area, as everything entrusts itself to the conquest of the haze.

And again, the faint sensation on the back of my head, the numbness of wakefulness.

Should I give up? Just surrender to the numbness and wake up? No, I can't… I can't leave him like this!

Slow steps at first quickly turn into a sprint, tripping and almost falling face first into the dirt. No one answers my screams, nothing pierces the shadows. Almost tripping, I end up kicking a torn pairs of boots left behind, stepping on a broken pot with drying flowers. No one answering my screams, only silence around me, I start running in earnest through the shadowy ruins and cracks. Barely stopping as I spot an odd shadow, a crude plush toy with enlarged eyebrows torn and hanging from an iron beam as if it had hanged itself there. A minute golden amulet also lays in a sinkhole shining at the faint threads of light that yet remain, there's even old clothes which remind me of the picture books of Santa Claus the Professor once bought me when I was younger lying in that pit.

All of that and other trinkets remain lost in the holes that spawn in the ground or dangling from the broken remains of TSFs, mostly F-15 models and Gekishins, that take their eternal rest on the ground. The dust and stains on them, the decay permeating them serves as proof of the abandonment said items have been enduring. All of these items, they belong to our Takeru-san's memories, do they not?

If this specific place belongs to his own mind, why is this other Takeru-san roaming this wasteland, then?

Decelerating gradually until my hands meet my knees, again I stand still within the all-encompassing fog. "Haa… No, why did he react so oddly? He remembered something… from one of Takeru-san's previous lives?"

Why did he say 'I always leave too'? He had said before that… he dreamed of me and someone else. But if that is the case then, that would be… exactly like the recovery sessions. That flash of memories, was it how he parted ways with the me of another timeline? But if this world's Takeru-san knows of it-

The ground starts to shake, and shakes, and keeps on growing in anger, sending me towards a wall. What few buildings remain start to collapse as well, the air thickening in heat and ashes. Covering my mouth as I stumble about in the shadows, very slowly the fog starts to clear, allowing a pair of large cliffs to emerge from the white blindness of this haze. With nowhere else to go I thus hurry down the narrow pathway available, my breath becoming visible, the shadows beginning to thaw.

As soon as the minimal thread of light pierces the ravine I'm traversing, needles once more sink below my ears.

" The only thing… a dead soldier can do."

A voice rasps, I hit something with my feet. Still and burnt, the black dragon lays mangled on the ground as smoke still raises from its shriveled body that now resembles charcoal.

Gagging on empty air once more, I step forward in a hurry. Further knives come up my throat and I stumble, the taste of iron causing me to cough and choke on the vile air I did not wish to inhale.

" I-It buurns! Please Shirogane, kill me!"

A scream shatters its throat, and my ears as well. Shaky fingers dig into the solid dirt to propel me upwards, bringing another small shape into my sight. The brown dragon, its facial features distorted and out of order, sliding away from their rightful positions, its tiny arms bending backwards, its wings and tail melting and fusing like plastic near fire. All of its body turning to goo with bubbles gurgling up, ending like some toxic tincture in a witch's cauldron, with both eyes still staring, still crying within the brew.

Tightly closing my eyes, shielding both ears with my hands, I run and run while enduring the boiling sensation building on my stomach. Colliding against a stonewall, placing my hand onto its rugged surface and using it as a guide, I slowly walk forward.

Until I step on something, something that makes a disgusting squelching sound, something that is rather firm under my heel.

" Nooo! I don't wanna be eaten!"

Faint figments of pink fur float in the air, a small and tiny paw severed off lays under my feet as I lift it off, along the tail and head of a fish, and an amalgamation of meat, bone, pink hair, and ligaments fused together into a regurgitated ball that oozed spit.

Unable to hold it in anymore, the burning liquid pours off from my lips. Again, and again, the back of my head pulsating my vision unfocused. The pit of my throat wrings itself yet dares me to continue gagging, my lower back tense and hurting every time I try and continue to release the seemingly unending vile that comes up from inside.

It hurts, and burns, merely breathing causes the reflex to restart, and I can barely remain standing. Gasping for dear life, massaging my neck, I drag myself away from the atrocities.

Only to find a yellow ribbon peeking out from under some large iron beams, red fur dirtied with blood, sinking further into the ground.

" Good morning, Shirogane-kun."

"Huh? Is that… S-Sumika-san?! A-Ah… N-No… W-Why is-" Yet, as I walk closer, an image flashes in my eyes.

Something that resembles the auditorium, a large structure on the ground as a few adults. tell the younger ones to disperse. And how a few comment that limbs do not bend in that direction, just as the remains of the red kitty in front of me are at the moment, a puppet subjected to the cruel performance of having its every joint imitate a spinning top.

Closing my eyes tightly and feeling them searing with heat, I rush away from the gore as my stomach swirls in sickness again, rising up my constricting throat with the haste of a snail.

Is this a memory from Takeru-san's last experience? Is this why he so desperately wants to save both worlds? Is this what can happen in his world if he doesn't fix the divergences of the conductor?

…

Then, why didn't you say anything? Why didn't you tell us? Or did the Professor always knew… and still pushed you to inherit these memories? Knowing you have no choice but to rely on her… and yet, you still try your best everyday…

Trying to make haste, my feet trip and push off sunken parts in the dirt, sending me forward while I try to backpedal. Both legs stop synchronizing, I end up stumbling. Supporting my fall with both hands, which then claw at the dry soil as a cold gale blows along further thunders, I can only cry and shake.

"Why didn't I feel this before? Why did I not notice anything?"

… Is this my fault, then? For stirring what trauma laid buried deep within his mind? Panting for a moment, I look back at what abominable spectacle was in the ravine, covering my mouth as I sluggishly raise back up.

"… So this is what can be happening in his world right now? All of them, dying all over again in such cruel a manner? If so then, why couldn't I feel your sorrow for so long? Why didn't you say anything… A moment, if the animals are here then… That Takeru-san that was walking with me is the one seeing, the one recalling these memories. But these are your memories, which means… that Royal Guard was you all along? B-But the one with me so far was supposed to be this world's Takeru-san, how did- This can't be. Even if the memories are trying to assimilate themselves, that other Takeru-san shouldn't be seeing- No, wait a moment…"

Let's say, for an argument's sake, that for some reason this world's Takeru-san could in fact be the same entity I know as 'Takeru-san'. The Takeru-san I know always keeps himself in check, because he remembers most things about his life and wants to restore some small measure of happiness to our reality. His dream and oath to forge a world with zero wars, in honor of all the comrades and beloved ones he has lost, is what fuels his unyielding resolve. That's what the Professor told me before we started these recovery sessions, that his will to see his goals through would allow him to connect with some of the memories despite any recoil from my psychic invasion upon his mind. And that focus on the good things he wants to bring about is what probably obscured his deeper, darker thoughts from my everyday scans.

But if, somehow, there were no two Takeru-sans and they were one and the same person… assuming that is true, in the case that he were to lose his memories… and started to see them in the form these nightmares are taking… while lost in the war-torn reality of the invasion-

He wasn't angry or wrathful, yet.

Yet, thinking twice, he looked as he was right before our last recovery session, after our morning battle in the Mindseeker.

And what's most dear to him, the one thing that could more easily send him into blind hatred?

A thunder echoes, rain starts to fall. Gently at first, until the wind starts to howl once more. Enduring the beating of the falling downpour, the warning of the reddening thunders, I rush out of the ravine, my feet almost slipping on the muddy soil.

Shielding my face with both arms does little to prevent the incoming gale from almost send me recoiling backwards, the droplets hitting all over me, almost piercing through. Sliding both feet, mire and dampness filling both shoes, I press on and call out yet my scream is obscured by the rumble of red lightning. It all weights on my back, as if now I were garbed in a metallic attire, to the point of almost failing to produce a step forward.

Another thunderbolt falls, yet this time a shadow is cast. Lowering my arms, I discern a large structure in the distance. The moment I step forward, the ground sinks. Carried by the downstream current, I can only scream. Rolling and sinking, limbs flailing about, I manage to hold onto a rock.

And gasping for air as I raise myself, another thunder echoes, its crimson light bathing the area. Again, a shadow is cast. Looking up, I finally take it wholly, a large statue that kept on receiving repeated thunderbolts.

A single spiky horn raising to the Heavens in defiance as it stuck its chest outwards, as if provoking a strike on itself. Despite the gesture, the statue lies armless on its posture. Not by damage done through the elements but by design, if I base myself on the lack of damage on its body.

As I observe the monument as its struck by further lightning, something else catches my attention. The shape that crawls behind the shadow of the statue, a shape I recognize. Screaming his name, Takeru-san doesn't seem to hear me. Fighting the stream for a moment, my fingers claw at the stone to not have me washed away. Just a little further… If I can at least swim to the shore-

Another thunder, another thunder, the statue begins to falter, to catch on fire. The extra illumination reveals fangs, maws extended in threat. Large wolves rove closer, excessive claws protruding from their paws, jaws bending further than normal and revealing a twister of fangs, another maw within the maw. Glistening like fine steel, thin eyes which remain locked on the crawling shape of Takeru-san as they slowly approach. Within the cracks in between their ribs, further mouths open and shriek violence, rampant enough to brave the downpour and the stream. And as they come closer, it becomes clear to me. Their furs are colored…

… in a strong royal purple and an equally firm indigo blue.

Something tugs at my elbow, dragging me into the stream. Yanking my arm from the water, a thin, skeletal hand remains attached to it. A cold creeping feeling surrounds my arm as a mangled, distorted face gazes at me from under the filthy water, staring into my soul.

"… Pull the trigger."

"A-Aaaah! No, don't touch me!" Leaving the rock, fighting the stream, I try and swim to the other side.

Pressure on my ankles, needles or knives sinking into my arms, entangling into my arms, pulling at my hair, water hitting my chin, slipping into my mouth and nose, everything growing fuzzy for a moment.

" Pull the trigger!"

Hurting the inner side of my lips in a moment of hesitation as the water overtakes me, I thrash and fight the hold, a raking pain on my bottom legs and upper arms. Gasping, swimming to the shore, my hands slip as I raise myself, sending my face to meet the mud. The rain keeps on falling, making my balance hard to regain. And while those ghostly wails continue within the river, another rumbling thunder echoes above.

And this time, I see fire. A horn breaking, falling apart and making tsunamis on the mud, the tail end of the ripples reaching my hands. Fire over the armless statue that's beginning to fall apart, into the mud, away from sight.

Immediately after, a loud roar breaks through the rain, leaving the droplets floating in midair. Two large shadows rush to us, large enough to obscure the horizon and part of the sky from view. I blink, yet the sight does not change. Now that they've come closer, I can clearly make out the patterns to the fur of the wolves, of the blue and purple beasts. The circular sigil on their foreheads, a crimson circle with slow waves outwards, a small square with a horizontal line in the middle. From said sign, from the flesh underneath it to be more precise, chains and ropes come pouring out, at parts flesh, at others steel, at times both mingle together. Rippling through the skin, entangled together as if overgrown roots they were, pulsating, twitching in a rhythm.

The large tendrils spread outwards, reaching the shadows that closer come. The wolves which overflow the area, wolves in dark, in golden, in gray, in red. The chains fuse with their joints and limbs, the sleek metallic shape of their claws and fangs glistens as the surface of a lake under the moonlight. All of them do not even bother to sheathe their jaws for a second, tongues running down to the ground as they howl, as they surround the breaking statue.

Those eyes, the lost downwards spiral within them all, the scattered monochrome patters in it somehow remind me of the sight in televisions when the signal is lost. Blank, vacant, wordlessly opposing.

"W-Wait! You two… You're the little puppies, aren't you?!" I scream, almost slipping face first into the mud, yet the two large wolves do not even acknowledge my presence.

All of them pace forward as the protective glow of the statue fades to the dark, towards the groggy, shaky shape of Takeru-san.

Whose dress is torn, exposing his skin, claw marks all over him.

Whose knees and legs quiver and stall a fall, barely hanging on as the downpour resumes its assault.

Who remains standing, shielding… the two hurt bunnies behind him, which lay unmoving by the statue's remains, surrounded by purple flowers.

"Takeru-san, run! Don't fight!" I yell, trying to hold onto the larger wolves.

But my fingers meet the air, I walk through them, meeting the mud.

Why?

Why now?!

A shriek, followed by many howls. Stomping on the ground, along more red lightning.

Seeking his shape, I catch Takeru-san within the stream of bones, fur and violence. Clutching a sword tightly, jumping onto a wolf, preying upon its sight, forever blinding it. Jaws which part to swallow, steel that cuts through. Flanks that are devoured, ripostes delivered to give eternal rest to the beast. Dodging the falling red bolts that seek his shape, the few that dare to come close are dealt quickly.

Yet the claw marks only increase in number, overgrown roots crawling all over the soil that is his skin. And yet, as the blue wolf blasts towards him, there is no movement. Takeru-san is sent to collide against the remains of stone, by the rabbits' side.

" Precisely," a voice echoes through the storm, " you have a duty and an obligation to serve."

It stalls my walk, for I recognize the voice, the arrogant and dismissive tone.

Another thunder echoes, deflected by the sword. Now clearly limping, all Takeru-san can do is swing wildly, a mere detriment to the surrounding horde. Until the purple wolf howls, raising its head, causing its chains to twitch like veins. Causing geysers of blood to burst from all other wolves, all shrieking as they charge forth.

" You must never waver, when it is time to bloody your own hands."

Fangs meet the arm, the sword is lost, trampled by the blue wolf. Chains of red lightning shackle, shock Takeru-san, hitting him over and over again, Mjolnir incarnate.

Rushing to his side, again moving through all this madness, once more that smell reaches me. The scent of rotten flames, of burning. Smoke raising from his dress, hiccuping on the ground, legs unresponsive. Clawing at the soil, still trying to stand up.

"Takeru-san, please stop! You have to wake up!"

Slowly cradling him, moving him upwards, I shield him with all of myself, while trying to open his tightly closed mouth, to allow him to breathe, somehow. Now that we're in contact, the wolves seem to have taken notice of me.

Circling around us, they sniff the air, those tempestuous, ravenous eyes stare at me, unblinking under the rain.

"Why are you doing this?! You were the puppies, weren't you? You're supposed to be on his side!"

Another thunder, more red bolts fall around us.

Jaws that part wide, another howl. Both of them roar in unison, as if mocking me.

All of a sudden, it feels cold. A brief contact makes me shiver, and I see that… the rain now turned to snowing.

" You shall be stripped off the honor of carrying my House's emblem on your person," a voice which rivals what the gale sends into my face.

" I know not who you speak of. Lower your armaments, otherwise I shall be forced to subdue you in them Empire's name," again, distant, indifferent, frosting.

All of their vacant eyes focus on me, beyond the storm. Like stars in the night, yet out for blood. Howling, growling, getting closer and closer. Erratically, Takeru-san tries to stand only to fall face first into the piling snow. Crawling, seeking to shield both bunnies. Both have a wounded leg, unable to run away. What would happen to me, to him, to us if these beasts harm us? Would the nightmare end? Where would his mind go to afterwards?

… Why am I even wasting time, asking pointless questions?

Gripping my knees, I stand. A quiver, a shiver, a step forward. Staring upwards, covered wholly by the cast shadow of the beasts. Looking into their eyes, not a trace of the puppies remains. To try and reason with beasts would be a waste of time.

"Takeru-san, you have to wake up," shaking his arm, he remains clutching the rabbits to his chest. "Please, come to your senses! This isn't real anymore!"

Snow is crushed, a loud stomp right behind me. Shadows covering us both. Turning back, a blur of steel and purple.

Pain, all over my face.

Coldness, I'm suddenly buried in the snow.

It hurts, it hurts, it hurts… Air leaves me, I can't see well with one eye anymore. It's cold and yet it burns, so much. Hair gets stuck in between my fingers, stuck by freezing redness to the skin.

Another stomp. Another shadow above. Constricted by snow, by the blasting of the howling, I cannot move.

Only to move my sight, find the end of a throat, rows of iron fangs already descending upon me.

Is this… Am I going to… to what?

If I perish within a mind, during a scan… What happens to me?

Am I… about to…

Another howl, another stomp.

Followed by heat, heat holding me in its grip. Followed by whimpers in pain. By the mist clearing, the snow melting apart as the heatwave of the impact makes my hair flutter, everything else raising in the cyclone.

As the purple wolf is sent flying upon the surrounding hound, pieces of teeth, patches of fur drizzling from above and near me along tiny snow crystals, I look up.

And find a back littered with scars standing in front of me.

"… Fuck off, you ain't taking any more lives tonight." Hoarse, rough, a subdued war-cry.

"… T-Takeru-san?"

Butterflies flicker about him, sparks of cerulean, will-o-wisps in black. Wounds reopened, or rather… wounds that never seem to have healed burn. The hound roars, trespassing our personal space yet not daring to fall to lethality. Only then, as the fire Takeru-san emits clears the fogginess, do I see another flicker of blue, more subdued, more faint, lying behind all the beasts. Shredding its lungs, another wolf roars, the sigil in the larger wolves burns, causing them to spasm. Followed by manic cries, the chains regressing into their skulls, splintering part of it.

" It is all for the greater good, for the sake of the Empire."

"Don't fuck with me… Where's the mercy in this? You motherfucking sons of an eldritch-"

"Takeru-san?" I tentatively ask, grasping, pulling his wrist, halting his raising screaming. My hand flinches away, as if touching a boiling teapot. "Is that you?" Getting closer, enduring the heat, gripping his shoulder then one of his cheeks I look into his eyes. Into the face of the Takeru-san I know… except with way longer hair, way bigger eyebags.

"Huh?" He blinks, going wide eyed as the frown he had ingrained melts away. "Ka… sumi?"

A sharp howl, rumbling on the ground.

Jaws that lunge forth, eyes glistening through the dark.

A strong push on my body, my back hits the snow again.

And all I can do is watch, watch as the maw of the blue beast fully closes all over Takeru-san.

The fangs move up, and down, and up, and there's a crunching sound, something being grind to nothingness, and a thread of liquid coming out from in between the jaw.

"Ah… A-Ahhhhh! N-No, this is-"

" For the greater good."

"It's a lie! I- I was only-"

" For the thousand years to come, for pebbles to turn to a mountain range!"

Hurrying to my feet, banging onto the monster, on its eye, on its jaw, it merely moves its head roughly, again causing me to stumble to the ground.

"No… Why? Takeru-san… This can't-"

"Shut up…"

"Huh?"

"Shut up… with your bullshit…"

Smoke, overflowing the jaw. Fire raising from within the eyes, searing the blue beast. Until it all catches fire, engulfed wholly by a dark blaze. Erupting into tiny giblets, nothing is left. Only a shape standing amidst the fire… or perhaps, causing it. That back full of scars, those eyes branded in red.

" It is the duty of those who must pierce the Heavens, the duty of-"

"Shut up! You and your holier-than-thou act of superiority can go to hell! If I'll lose it all, I'll struggle to the very end! I'll despair after I'm dead!"

The cape of blaze becomes a trench coat, perhaps a cloak. Engulfed entirely, the black fire shines above the snow with an uncanny glow. As if taking a fighting stance, a rapier of fire he produces, he forces the blaze to be.

"You'll never take their future, never again! I'll burn your salvation to cinders first!"

Something grabs me, everything spins. Yet, it feels warm. Feeling his hair graze my face, the bunnies on one shoulder, the howl and the rumbling approach us, the echo of the thunders. Striking all around us in a pattern, growing ever closer, a cage of bolts. Merely raising a hand, he stops the chains of red lightning, bending them into a leash, a whip with which to strike at the beasts, ripping them in twain. The lightning seems to fizzle, to try and escape his grasp, he rasps a scream, binding it to his hand, chaining it into a weapon that shrieks and sparks in place.

Collapsed Gekishins flicker in my sight as he rushes through the horde, through flesh and bones like a cannon ball. Desperate cries for help, explosions, silence. Almost as what's around, as the skulls, the eyes are sunk in before fire takes them to pointless ash.

" I cannot force any soldier to depart to the frontline, but I won't refuse any volunteers," low and dull, a voice tells. Brown eyes, long frilly hair, the draconian composure of the mask she endows during the training drills absent completely.

Cascades of metal, of bones. A bonanza of fire, treating the large beast as if mere paper, like when the Professor discards failed approaches. Crushed tightly, into nothing but an amorphous ball. Tastes like iron in my lips, bile again rising to my throat.

" Please, do think on the future. It is imperative that the equipment is shipped posthaste. Furthermore, are you not aware of the Professor's research? As the rulers, it is our duty to safeguard our people," composed as a pond, someone tells. A face mired by static, the recollection halted by loud clanging of steel.

The large wolf by the back finally decided to come meet us… purple fur amidst its claws, munching something, spitting out a bone. Giving out a howl, pieces of flesh raise, swirl into a vortex, the blue beast regains form, stitched together, the tendrils now binding it to the other wolf, of a clearer blue.

"Takeru-san… Stop, please… Let's go back home…"

Pain in my throat, searing pain. Coughing, out of air amidst the heat, the swirling in my eyes as he draws circles, spinning and spinning, stretching the blaze outwards, cutting their ranks in half. A ballad of revenge, a dance of carnage, too fast for me to make anything out besides the silhouettes that are torn, and crushed, and ashen in mere moments, all of the wolves crying out in pain. Grunting like a beast, Takeru-san gives no quarters nor mercy. Taking in a sharp breath, enduring the kindling of the heat on my palms, I try and reach out to his face, to rouse him to wakefulness.

Yet, I find dampness.

Tears.

And now, his screams finally make sense.

The rocket that departs once more reaches my sight, the hateful facade of the azure eyes, the visage of the wasteland filled by that giant orb of dark.

And a small hand, wavering like candle by a window, raising to his face. A worn down smile, a face drenched in redness.

Followed by an unending, outstretched, louder by the second flat-line.

" It's not goodbye, Kasumi. If you want to see me again then, let's say 'See you later'."

Piercing in my heart, something chokes me. Constricting the base of my throat, until lights sway and dance in my sight. Unable to withstand the fire anymore, lightheaded and dizzy, my fingertips slip, the warmth leaves me, cold wind envelops my face, I fall. Fall and fall, the specter of black fire continuing his rampage unimpeded. Wicked wings of warfare searing the disaster of a battlefield, departing to the distance as the horde gives chase and devours the shadow of the pyre.

I can only remain in place on the ground, rubbing my chest, the emptiness which now rests in me. In silence, watching the clouds of magma depart beyond the horizon.

Slowly, my breathing returns to normal. Running a hand over my legs, standing up and finding no burns, my palpitations are still lodged at the base of my throat, the warmth that enveloped me, Takeru-san's warmth, still lingers in my fingertips.

But what was that? Why such pain over a hand stroking his cheek? Everything else, I can make a case. Yet, all of those memories, it is understandable he'd be pained, shocked… But why won't he come to his senses? Why won't he wake up?

"… What are you looking for, Takeru-san? Why do you refuse to end this dream?"

Under the hazy mist that falls upon me, I walk after the trail of fire. For how long, I do not know. Simply replaying those moments in my mind, the clarity of what was probably Iceberg, grants credence to his refusal to surrender. The blazing anger did not belong with such emotions, however. The almost suicidal manner of his prior actions, shielding the bunnies and myself despite the damage he suffered, would align more with the desperation of those memories.

"Did the blue beast attacking him caused a buried memory to come forth?"

Then, what can I do? Should I… give up? No, he recognized me! If I hadn't been so weak, I wouldn't have fallen off. But then, what was that sound? Someone… dying? Why did I sense that parting line from within his heart, then? Can I even do anything for him at this point?

Gradually coming to a halt, rubbing the small scar on my left cheek, merely touching it stings. Looking around, the traces in the skyline are barely visible. The fog is falling down heavily again, I can barely see a few feet ahead of me. Even if I get to his position…

A noise, like a can rolling on the ground.

Followed by small pebbles falling down.

Glancing around, a shadow approaches me from behind, from a blank point caused by another ruin. Yet, my tight breathing eases up as I recognize the intruder. The fox from before, the representation of the Professor, paces towards me.

"So it was you. You scared me, you know."

Slowly pacing towards me, circling around me, the fox gives out a small growl. Tail and ears up and in attention, eyes twinkling within the mist, never leaving mine. It grows closer, growls turning to screeches.

"H-Huh? Why?" Stepping back does nothing to douse its apparent ill mood, it continues to approach me, back arched and at the ready to pounce. "S-Stop… Professor, calm down please! I'm not your enemy!"

Ears twitch, it tilts its head. Sitting on the ground, the fox stares at me for a moment. Coming closer, at a snail's pace, sniffing my hand, circling around me, it then gives out a small cackle, wagging its tail.

"Why were you so upset? Oh! Right, weren't you guiding Takeru-san somewhere?" I ask, its eyes glisten.

Letting out another cackle, it taps my leg then starts to walk back the way it came. It looks back after a moment, growling. So it wants me to follow after it? As soon as I do its complains cease, and like before it remains a few steps ahead of me. Still, is this safe? Wasn't Takeru-san following the fox yet end up surrounded anyways? After all… just like how the puppies turned to beasts, the fox might actually be nothing like the Professor. What should I-

A chill down my spine, followed by a sharp growl. The fox's staring, unblinking, showing its fangs. In the reflection of the sockets I could see a spiral of shadows triumphing over the mist, analyzing me whole. Only now do I notice, there are a few small patches of fur in the fox's jaw. Little poofs of white and black. Another growl, low, follows, a reflection of myself, only slumped and cold, eyes blank as paper, coming up in those small, violet eyes.

"Ah, um… You will really guide me to Takeru-san's side, right… Professor?"

Apparently pleased with the word, it gives out a small, inoffensive bark as its tail wiggles. Yet, the coldness of the stare does not thaw, not until I resume my walking. Cackling a bit, seeming more than happy, shining through the humid haze, it resumes its guidance. So all I can do is rub my nose, clean it from the humidity's effect and walk, walk after the fox.

"You really… will take me to Takeru-san, won't you?"

It looks back, seeming to smile as its facial features relax, then it starts cackling as it runs circles around me for a moment, before marching onward once more in little hops.

Sigh… I can only hope, that Takeru-san remains safe from whatever plagues his mind. And that you truly take me to him, Professor. As if reading my mind, the fox looks back and cackles again. Even its mannerisms are alike… Perhaps, there was some truth to the nickname.

The clouds part, the mist gradually clears. Revealing a large expanse of wasteland, yet unlike before, there are no buildings or anything else here. Nothing, except something at the very edge of the horizon, something shrouded by the night.

"Is that where you're taking me?" The fox scratches its head, wagging its tail, resuming its walk.

So, taking in a sharp breath, I follow after it, back to the wasteland. Looking up as a breeze blows, I see the glimmering stars, the moonlight basking onto me.

The pleasant light… of a crescent moon, with an inverse cross encrusted on its lower half.

Shirogane (II)

A/N: The same warning of the prior chapter applies for this one, disturbing dark content lurks in this entry.

P roceed with caution, reader discretion is advi s ed .

As one little suggestion, I recommend you to read this chapter while listening to 'Guts' from the Berserk OST. That's all for now, see you at the end of the chapter.

---

" You see, the war, the true war, has never been one waged by droids, warships, or soldiers. They are but crude matter, obstacles against which we test ourselves. The true war is waged in the hearts of all living things, against our own natures, light or dark. That is what shapes and binds this galaxy, not these creations of man. You are the battleground. And if you fall, the death of the Republic will be such a quiet thing, a whisper that shall herald the darkness to come."

Kreia, from Star Wars Knights of the Old Republic II: The Sith Lords

---

Chapter 77:

Shirogane - Howling Towards a Distant Earth

---

Time and Date Unknown.

(In the middle of the foggy wasteland.)

[Kasumi]

---

A pleased bark, the fox stops in its tracks, looming over me.
Covering my mouth and coughing, I clear the small hill that impeded my steps. Taking a moment to sigh, the Professor's representation merely stares back at me before standing and slowly moving forward. Following it with my gaze, I finally catch a first glimpse of the location it was leading me to.

Through the fading mist, shapes begin to take form. Large expansions of foliage, from left to right, covering the horizon. It is not a normal forest, however. The shapes of trees, of their branches, would make one think people are being kept prisoners within the bark, trying to scream for freedom. Vines or something resembling them drips from the treetops, almost like corroding muck. Small flickers of light, stares shining within the dark, the bark, enlarged flowery shapes which fall and devour one another, surge from one another like matryoshka dolls. Wood that sweats, roots that twitch, the leaf eyes which remain all locked onto me, shifting patterns behind the foliage's cover.

Billowing from the soil, walling itself against the incoming moonlight, the wilderness towers over me, a cradle hoisting distorted yet stitched masses that crawl, that feast, that prey upon one another incessantly.

Gulping hard, unable to endure to cyclopean spectacle before me, I close my eyes and step back. Another bark, a cackle, the fox remains staring at me. Taking a pouncing stance as I hesitate. All it takes is me stepping closer, feel the stench meet my nose, for it to relax. Spewing the two little puffs of fur it had in its mouth, ears and tail standing in attention, it cackles again before darting into the mutant forest, casting one final glare, one final growl from within the veil as its shape mixes and blends with the foliage.

Alone under the light of this crescent moon with a cross in its lower half, alone under the stare of the wilderness, the rustle and echoes of it all, time passes me by as I imitate a crab's walk in my indecision. The roots look like they'll spring out from under the ground as soon as I approach, the slimy vines would perhaps fall upon me and restrict my movements. Who knows what else lurks within that bog?

But Takeru-san must be beyond this place. I could always turn around… but that would equal forgetting all about him if he never wakes up. I inhale into the humidity, seeing the expansion of my sigh in front of me as it departs.

"It's for Sumika-san's sake… for the Professor's sake… for Alternative IV's sake…" One step, knees quiver. The vines twitch or wobble, their gooey shape seeming to wiggle upon my footsteps. "It's for… humanity's victory… I must not be afraid, they're counting on me… It's for Takeru-san, to wake him up before it's too late…" The twinkle of lights resembling eyes lock onto me, the cloak of shadows creaking and shifting with every step I take. "I have to be brave… I have to," otherwise, Alt IV might not reach success, Sumika-san may never be able to regain her self once she becomes the 00 Unit. And I'll forget about it all, all about him, as if he had never even been there to begin with.

I don't want that, I don't want to lose these memories, I don't wanna forget about-

"Are you truly certain this is a wise decision?"

"H-Huh?!"

Frantically looking around, I spot two eyes lunging at me from within the foliage. Swatting the fluid vines which tried to prey on its shape, the shadowy figure takes its time to approach me. Stepping on the gushing flowers, dismissing the crying shapes in the bark, slow yet undaunted. A slim figure of medium stature meets my gaze as it's bathed in the faint moonlight, a prim and proper office attire with a pencil skirt, all in pure black with the exception of what resembles a white handkerchief on a breast pocket.

Those eyes… those cerulean eyes remain locked on mine through the veil, as if drilling into my soul. I take a step back, her eyes squint. Trying to hasten her approach, a minute frowning, a momentary grimacing and stumbling. One of her legs is hurt, there's a stain growing through the leggings. It does not impede her exit through the cyclopean forest, now standing merely a few feet away from me. Garbed in all black, her paling features offer great contrast. A stare frozen in place, cerulean eyes which I've only seen in others like me, silverish white hair done in two slim pigtails which I've also only seen in others like me. Yet, she remains quiet, silent, observing me intently. Nothing in her posture indicates aggression, yet for some odd reason I cannot sense her aura despite how she's not being grayed out as every other person was in this dreamscape thus far.

"Who… are you?"

"It is unimportant," she says, shaking her head. "Why are you here, young Yashiro?"

"Eh?! W-Why do you know my name?"

Not even reacting in the slightest, she takes a step forward, never lifting her eyes from mine. "Why are you here, trying to advance into the forest?" She repeats, not altering her monotonous voice.

"Uh… I was… looking for someone, guided by a fox. Who are you?"

"I see, so the fox brought you here," she whispers, nodding while grasping her chin. "Tell me, what do you hope to accomplish in this forest?"

"… Um, why are you asking me these questions? Anyways, who are you?"

"I suppose someone such as you could already have a hunch on who, or more precisely what, I am. As for why I'm inquiring into your motivations to be in this place, it's because you should not be here, young Yashiro."

Lips fold in, my hands shake. Resisting the reflex to cough at the foothold of dampness in the air, I instead step forward. "Why? I mean, why are you- how can you talk to me? Everybody else in the dreamscape hasn't reacted at all to my presence. And there's no other ESPer in the base. Wait, did so much time pass that the Professor requested aid to bring me back?!"

"Easy there," she comes closer, lightly petting my head. "No such thing is occurring in the outside world."

"How do you-"

"Simply take my word for it."

"B-But if you're an ESPer-"

"Matters not to your objectives who or what I am, right? In any case," what at first was a gentle hold turns into a firm grip, her features freeze further as her sight clashes into mine, "you should turn back and return to the waking world, now."

"I refuse."

She blinks, gradually easing her stare. "Why would you?"

"I have to bring Takeru-san back. I won't leave until he returns with me."

"… Takeru-san, huh," she seems to chuckle, letting my shoulders go and crossing her arms then playing with a pigtail. "Surely you're aware of the dangers that herein lurk?"

"What dangers? I admit the forest looks scary… b-but I believe I can traverse it without much issue," I reply, returning the unblinking stare. After all, I just slip through almost everything in this dreamscape.

"I see, so you do not know."

"… What are you talking about?"

She looks back, gesturing towards the forest. "This place is one of the deepest recesses of this person's mind. To advance further beyond equals to sink into what he actively suppresses. The thoughts that in this specific area reside are strong enough to bring harm to you, were you to see even a glimpse of them."

"And how do you know this?"

"I am an observer, just as you."

"So… Why are you in Takeru-san's mind? Why are-"

"At ease, young Yashiro. I am not an enemy," she says, holding my gaze, squinting hers. "Merely know that you might receive injuries should you try to advance further, to delve into what traumas lie in another's mind is to allow them to echo in yours. Do you not know the saying? If you stare too long into the abyss-"

"The abyss stares back into you. Yes, the Professor is always repeating that phrase," I sigh, feeling my limiters flopping down. She nods, folding both arms behind her back, staring. "Um… So, if you're not an enemy… What is going on outside? Why did the Professor ask you to dive into Takeru-san's mind?"

"… Therein lies the problem we both face, albeit for different motives," she looks back to the forest, I slowly walk up to her side. "I am here for… surveillance purposes, on my own accord."

"Surveillance? Why are you stalking Takeru-san's mind?"

One of her eyebrows twitches, lips and throat also do. "I am not doing anything of the sort," she says, frosting again.

"It certainly looks like that to me."

"Hmph… Quite rude, aren't we. You suck," she then looks away, slightly frowning, crossing her arms tighter. It lasts only a second, she reverts to the prior composed and stoic facade. "In any case, I am seeking the same as you albeit for different reasons."

"… Why are you after Takeru-san? Why would an ESPer-"

"I was here before you, and I shall remain after you. I merely observe, that is all. Yet, on this particular occasion, I have deemed it imperative to assist in the awakening of the soldier," she says, almost choking one of the pigtails. "In any case, while I praise your grit to have reached this far, what lays ahead is too much for your mind to handle, young Yashiro," looking at me, back to the neutrality of a frozen pond, she holds my gaze.

Looking down, losing stillness to the seizing humidity, once more I shake my head. "I won't. Takeru-san… He recognized me for a moment, he should be ready to wake up."

"Then, why hasn't he?"

"… Do you know?"

The edge of her lips sinks, she gazes back at the forest. "I have a hunch. Yet, knowing the fox now lurks within this place, it is better for you to turn back." Looking back, drilling back, she closes the distance, standing over me. "Strong echoes can harm the mind and distort your self. Do not take lightly what this Black Lilith is meant to represent, young Yashiro."

"Black Lilith? What are you-"

She points upwards, to the moon with the inverted cross. "Such is the sign of the black moon, the darkest reaches of a mind. As someone who also used to stargaze frequently, I can understand why the soldier's mind would place such a symbol in this particular location. So," curling her hair on a finger, she again stares through low eyelids, "care to guess why the fox brought you here?"

"… The Professor must have wanted to help Takeru-san, obviously."

She scoffs, sighing short. "Is that so. The fox does want to find the soldier, that much is true. Well, I cannot waste any more time. I have warned you, should you choose to advance know that you might physically suffer from what memories are buried herein." And without awaiting a response, she turns around and strolls towards the forest once again.

Watching her back, then up to the moon, gulping and shivering, I choose to quickly jog after her silhouette, covering my head from the vines that reach out to grasp at my limiters, stomping forward as something thin and slimy tries to sneak into my shoes.

For a moment, there is only the strong odor of decay, of humidity. The sinking soil on contact with my feet, the mire seeping in between my fingers, faint rustling about amidst the foliage. Merely advancing a bit is enough for the bark to truly become human-like, the wood darkening. Antennas rising from where eye sockets should be, more of that molten goo from a witch's cauldron, more stares from within the filth. Bark that crunches whatever is within it, the, um, greenery taking a grotesque, larger shape. The overbearing dampness makes it hard to breathe, the convulsion of the foliage makes it hard to want to breath in.

"… So you've chosen to ignore my warning," I hear her say, she was waiting for me albeit not looking my way. Slowly swatting another vine that seemed to try to drop onto her, a single eye scans me thoroughly.

"I… I want to help Takeru-san, I don't want to forget about our time together. Will you help me find him?"

"I suppose. However, I do not know if I am able to shield you should something grab onto you. You will have to look out for yourself if you desire to remain safe."

"What do you-"

"Step forward, and remain quiet. Close your eyes, I will make sure it only lasts a moment," she says, raising a hand as if to chop something. As I hesitate, she squints her eyes. "Will you turn around, instead?"

"N-No, I… don't want to. You won't hurt me?"

"You might be hurt, but not by my hand. Worry not, it won't last long," she states, firmly, her gaze does not waver. Her aura remains a mystery, yet if she had ill intentions there is little I could do to defend myself properly without her needing to resort to trickery.

Giving then a minute nod, I take a single step forward as my eyes close. There is nothing odd, only the distant disquiet of the wilderness. Why did she ask me to close my eyes? Maybe, she's taking her leave as I stand here, blind to my surroundings? And anyways, who is she even supposed to-

Cold, wetness sieving into my shoes, up to my ankles. Swirling around my leg, something clasps a sturdy shackle onto it. Crawling, crawling on the back of my knees, spreading, extending that damp, filthy sensation over my legs. Opening my eyes, some sort of… of… Thin, yet sturdy, whips of gurgling goo, whips which crawl like spiders over me. Not just one, many of them, many small tendrils which raise and pull me down, seeking to disturb my balance.

Breathing is hard, I look up at the woman for support. She remains still, unconcerned, staring. Palpitations rising, rising as those tendrils do, now tearing the low end of my dress, I raise my shaky hand to get them off me.

Only to end up jerking back and forth, only to feel needles dig onto my wrist. The vines, the vines that drip like sludge from the treetops cover my arm, a few leaves filled with dilated eyes staring into me from within the slimy substance. As if with a life of its own, the muck spreads through me up to my shoulder, a prickling feeling piking at my skin, burning.

"A-Ah! It hurts! M-Make this stop, why are- M-Mmghh!"

Mire invades my lips, infestation overflows my throat. Everything loses its defined shape in my sight, distortion similar to watching everything from underwater taking over my eyes. Feeling as if sinking into a downwards spiral, the threads of light retreating, my ears start to ring, to clog. Trying to cough, trying to struggle only serves to further advance the infestation. Limbs grow heavier and heavier, harder to resist, harder to swim and fight the invading stream. My nose is running, but in reverse. That burning bile seems to also regress, and I might as well have boulders pressing themselves onto my eyes and lips, the cascade of mire doesn't end.

Yet, something, something small twinkles in the distance. Echoes, echoes edge closer, closer. Through the water veil, falling upon me, ripples which grant clarity to the liquid.

And I can see red.

Red hair and eyes. And the night sky. And a tree, the tree by the hill.

Why am I seeing-

Heaviness, gagging me. Burning, searing, my throat constricts. As indifferent as the streams of characters of a program, running on automatic, the flash does not halt as I scream and wail. No matter how much I bash my head about, the error persists, the horror persists.

A chop on my head, air suddenly enters me again.

" Cough! Cough! A-Aahhh… Ugh… Kgh…" Unable to stop the reflex, more heaviness molds my back as that pain flees my insides.

And yet, something's stuck. It hurts, I choke on it. Squeezing through the pit of my throat, I see something dangling from my lips. Squirming, and turning, and convulsing. Moving on its own.

It only furthers my puking, until it slides out. Until it joins all of the other ones, all the moving spaghetti-like parasites that are sinking in sickly green.

"There, there," the woman pats my head, it feels strangle soothing, her fingertips running through my scalp. "It's okay, it was only-"

"I-I could feel it, down to my stomach. Those worms, entering my mouth, forcing themselves-"

"It was only a memory, not one of your own experiences."

Shivering at first, for some reason it's growing unbearably hot. Hugging my shoulders, biting my lips, I close my eyes, shake my head. "I-I felt it! The rush of all those small tendrils, over my arms, into my lips, my nose, my-"

"Calm down," she presses my face into her chest, patting my back strongly for a moment. Entangling onto her, I cry in silence, something drizzling from my lips as I shake the urge to continue to release whatever is swirling within my stomach. "To bear another's suffering opens you to feeling it on your own flesh. You seem able to do so without much effort, so this is the outcome of what should happen if you are not careful while performing a proper mind dive."

"B-But it… It was all over me, and I could-"

"It is not one of your own experiences. Focus, dissociate it," she whispers, circles over my hair.

It hurts, ears ring, and buzz, and screech, and feel stuck. Enduring the damp sensation which still lingers in my feet, taking in a deep breath after another, those images replay in my mind. She gently wipes my arms, the liquid that had started to harden taking some effort to depart from my skin. As the hold of the damp mire over me fades, the first flashes return to me.

"… It was Sumika-san?"

"Looks like you're stable once more," she says, breaking the lock my hands had on her back, separating us. "Do you now see it was not you who suffered through those-"

"W-Why?"

"Hm?"

"Sumika-san… defiled by those- those things… W-Why does Takeru-san know of that? Why did it felt so real, so vivid?"

Closing her eyes, she shakes her head. "I am not the one to answer such a question. Yet all you saw, no matter how brief, is something the soldier has gone through at one point. If the recollection felt vivid for you, then whatever the reason why he was made to see such events, they felt equally as vivid for him at the time," she says, the ice never faltering.

Did… the 00 Unit show such a thing to him? With the full extent of her powers? For what reason? Such a- Such a twisted, sickening- Ugh… Kgh…

" Cough! U-uhhh…" Throat burns, hard to breathe…

"Sigh, you truly should not proceed any further," a delicate rustle of my bangs, of a cheek. "You won't be able to withstand any memories that-"

"No!"

"However, you're clearly-"

"I refuse! If Takeru-san is… enduring this everyday… Hic… Why?" Why remain quiet? Why not ask me to suppress it if it hurts to such extent? How could Sumika-san do such a cruel thing to him?

… Such a sickening, infestating feeling. Was that how… she was taken to her current form? Hollowed out from the inside? Ugh… N-No, focus, don't fall to the reflex, deep breaths…

A few breaths, regaining my rhythm, I look up at the immovable ice mask that scanning me remains. "If I follow you into the forest… Will I see more of these memories?"

"Indeed. The one you saw was a rather surface level thought, something the soldier would like to repress but cannot fully do so, for whatever reason. I am able to resist the impulse to scan such thoughts, while you still seem to rely on… those bunny ears you wear for the control of your powers."

"What? Why do you know of-"

"Matters not," she says, shaking her head, again slicing a vine in half, stomping one of the crawling insectoid-flower hybrids back to the mud. "If you choose to continue, know that you may fall to another of such memories. And if you cannot dissociate what you see before it starts taking hold into your mind, the damage might be irreversible," sharpening her eyes, lowering her tone, she so states, staring until I give a nod. She then turns around and resumes her walk, not even slowing down despite her attire, the harshness of the bog which still tries to prey upon her pristine form.

A single droplet runs down my back. Dirt still clogs my fingers, sticking them together at parts. Spitting away the toxic that lingers in my mouth, I take in a sharp breath and follow after the woman once more. She merely looks at me, saying nothing, expression unchanging, before locking her sight forward once more.

We traverse the pulsating forest in silence. Only a thin glimmer of moonlight filtering through the trees, the eyes that upon us stare. Flowers that munch and chomp on one another, slow movements around the shadows, claw marks on the bark, on the figures. Thin, thin branches take on an arachnid form, tying the trees to one another.

Able to see my breath, walking with an eye on the ground to squash any small vermin, any small tendril that tries to lunge, and another up to scan whatever may fall upon me, to tame the repeated piking on my nape, I can only envy the precise, almost graceful stride of the woman. Unfazed, unblemished by this all.

"Um… Miss?"

"Yes?"

"Do you know how to exit this place?"

"I do," she retorts, not looking back nor changing her speed, not even as I almost stumble while trying to catch up.

"Does that mean that you've been in Takeru-san's mind before?" She did seem to allude to that before.

Looking back at me, she merely shakes her head. "It is unimportant."

"Then, why are you observing him?"

"I have my motives, as you do."

"Uh, well… Can you tell me of how you plan to wake Takeru-san once we find him?"

"… We should remain quiet, young Yashiro. Predators lurk within this place."

"Eh? Predators? But this is Takeru-san's-"

The trees shake, leaves falling, eyes sinking into the mire, melting. A gust blows, cold and seizing. A rumble in the ground, ripples in the puddles, squinting are the eyes within the bark, the arachnid branches regress into the leaves.

"Tch… Sooner than I thought," she rasps, beginning to frown.

Screeching, shrieking like a thousand cannons firing off at the same time, a low roar rushes through the foliage. Not of anything natural, instead burning.

Complexion tightening, she grabs my wrist. "Hurry, or it'll find us."

Without wait or warning, she pulls me to follow, my feet dragging on the stickiness. "What is going on? Why are-"

"Make silence, and hurry up," she says, low, showing me her gritting teeth as her steps grow in strength, as her eyes squint as she exerts her wounded leg.

Through the roots and flowers, through the screams and compulsion, we run and run. Wood creaks, a scream follows. Another rumble, a tree is tumbled. There's even distress in the repulsion within the muck, all of the grotesqueries above also fall back.

So I then cast my gaze backwards, and meet two large eyes. Two violet eyes in the distance, almost out of sight. Eyes that could very well be as large as myself.

Eclipsing the foliage, a staircase of fangs lunge through the damp dark. Those eyes, vacant and swirling eyes the wolves had were now in another beast. A colossal fox garbed in proud purple, rippling with muscles, metallic wings shredding the bark and foliage, giving chase.

Letting out a cackle when I stare, into those monochromatic eyes.

"Hurry!" The pull on my hand grows hurting, I lose a shoe, something sinks into my skin.

Panting, gasping, gaping, the periphery blurs. I run, and run, and continue to as something crawls up my back, echoes of clanking metal growing violent, wood crashing that feels closer, palpitations clang and clang within me.

And I keep on running, until the grasp on my wrist seems to slip.

Something catches my feet, my sight spins, everything grows dark. Dampness in my face, coughing right after as yet again that filth permeates my lips.

Shivering as I leave claw marks on the soil, I look back. Finding those eyes, that tempestuous monochrome chaos staring into me. The unbearable heat of the breath on my face, the thread of saliva which burns as it falls, the metallic fangs which resemble a twister. Mucus ingrained deep in the skin, the scent of sickness corroding within. Features so sharp one would deem it a machine, yet those wide, starving eyes betray such an assumption.

"Get down!"

Cowering upon the warning, I immediately feel heat basking on me. Fire and sparks dive onto the maw, walling onto the fox. Skin and steel beginning to burn, the beast shrieks as it recoils.

Hurrying to my feet, hands almost slipping with one of those helix-like vermin, I rush towards the woman that lights up a small object, throwing it towards the beast that roars once again. Immutable in front of the blossoming blaze, frowning when retaliating with yet another of those small explosives, she then covers my retreat, pushing my back towards a respite in the foliage, light incoming through the thicket.

Reaching a clearing, I spot nothing to hide in, nothing to guard myself with. Looking around in a daze, another roar reaches me, both feet collide on one another, I stumble to the soil again.

The spiral of a maw swallows through the greenery, casting a large shadow over us both. Yet, its eyes squint, making the wounds on its jaw contort, bleed. Avoiding the moonlight, it slides back into the shadows of the thicket. A step back, another, the beast retreats. Eyes squinting harder, head lowering and lowering. Almost afraid, as if touching a source of heat, before it violently leaps back into the darkness of the distorted and atrocious foliage, shredding and maiming what obstructs its escape.

"Haa… Haa… T-That was so scary," placing a hand on the base of my neck, only sighing in relaxation is what I can afford. Even if the slimy feeling at the contact with the soil and the stench remains all around me, weakness and limpness comes to my limbs, air freely seeps in and out of me.

"Siiigh… We were lucky this time," she says, nearby. Looking up and around, I find she was rubbing the wound on her leg, grimacing. "If this clearing hadn't been close, we'd have sustained a few injuries, to say the least," she sways her hair backwards as she slowly raises up, offering me a hand.

Which I take, almost stumbling as my ankles seem to have deactivated. "Um, what was that… thing?"

"You already know, it is the fox."

"Huh?! B-But the Professor isn't an enemy!"

The hold on my hand tightens, as do her features. "Lower your voice, and do not call the beast by name. You'll attract it again," she scolds, brows lowering.

"However, why would-"

"Your views on reality matter little in this place. Logic will not work out in this particular situation."

"T-Then, are you implying it was really going to… try and swallow us?"

A moment of silence, a minute nod. "This is the fox's hunting ground, one could say."

"But why? Takeru-san wouldn't… He doesn't…" Gaze falls down, silence sets in as a faint breeze blows.

"… Have you ever had a voice whisper something to you, on the back of your head?" She asks, looking up at the dark clouds, at what little we can see of the moon from this clearing.

"A whisper?"

"Yes, a whisper. As if you were talking to yourself, yet the voice is not your own but at the same time similar," sighing, she again plays with her hair, eyes falling to the mire. "Such intrusive, recriminating echoes seem to plague the soldier's mind as of late. The predators in this recess hint at that, at what is that he hears, almost out of reach."

"I don't understand… The Professor is-"

"Do not summon it!" She scolds, lightly hitting my shoulder.

"S-Sorry… However, while she's harsh, why would she take this shape in his mind? It makes no sense, I think… I think Takeru-san really likes the Pr- her, deep down."

"… I am not who should answer such a question," she shrugs, sighing. "Perhaps, you could take a wild guess on why would the soldier view the fox in such manner."

"B-But she isn't- I don't believe it's fair." The Professor might be harsh at times, yet she wouldn't drive us to such a chase, she wouldn't threaten me or Takeru-san in that way. "This must be a mistake, it has to- Huh?"

In the middle of the clearing, behind us both, there was something large sitting, sinking into the toxic. Craving the skies, clawing at them, a rusted Gekishin raises a hand. Completely overtaken by moss and corruption, by slime and mire. Broken and twisted like an old toy, just as ice would thaw upon warmth does its armor now surrender to the elements.

"What is this?"

"One of the, ahem, sanctums within this area. A lone moment of respite the soldier had, before facing unforgivable suffering."

"That's… the unit he was using during that mission called Iceberg, correct?" She nods, slowly. "Why would this place be a safe area among all this madness?"

"… Matters not. Simply know that the fox despises the moonlight and that… the stars grant some measure of peace to the soldier, which is why the rest of the corruption that falls upon the area cannot infest these locations."

"But these are still painful memories, right?"

"Yes, of course."

… I don't understand. How could something traumatic give him any measure of peace? Rubbing my hands together, dispelling the chill that's beginning to stick to me, my sight remains on the slumped machine.

She sighs, also running her hands up and down her arms. "In any case, we must make haste. The fox might have retreated, but it will soon resume the chase. We cannot idle by or it will surround us," she then takes in a sharp breath, returning to tending her wound.

… The fingers stretched to the skyline. The visor that so does too. Is this one of the things he prevented me from seeing during our recovery sessions? If only I were stronger, notifying the Professor of his inner suffering might have allowed her to devise a way to aid him truly recover.

Bent at places, sunken at others, lines and markings of dogfighting plague the plating. Now that its laying on the ground, it looks almost as large as the fox despite the treetops eclipsing it. Scars deep as a canyon in the cockpit area, small sections missing, the wilderness making nest in the void. The lines of green, of mire and corruption… almost moving like in a pattern over the steel, the rust…

Like waves hitting the shore, like a puppet's strings…

Like that stain, that trickles on the side. That missing chunk on an arm, as if chomped.

Something echoes, far away, a voice coming from above water. The smells seem to vanish, vanish as the erratic patterns of green fills my view. Fills it up, until it's all dark again.

But not really, because I can see the sky. Small dots, tiny dots above. The stars, far away. Twinkling in the distance, never faltering, no matter what. A cloud of fireflies daring the dark with their tender illumination, always up there for us to look back at. So shiny, so beautiful…

" Please, be safe… "

What? But I didn't-

Pressure on my neck, on my heart. Something clings onto me, hands, nails. Biting, sinking, slicing.

It hurts, but it feels cold. So very cold, colder than the dampness of the bog all over me as we walked.

Again, that rocket. That rocket that departs. It hurts to breathe, I can't feel my arms.

" Fare… well," the voice, Takeru-san's voice, whispers in collapse.

Nothingness. Are my lips moving? I cannot hear anything. Struggling, thrashing, twisting, nothing seems to work, I don't feel it working. Legs, arms, eyelids, nose, heartbeats, anything.

Absolute.

Unbreakable.

Silence, utter silence.

Something shakes, the sky moves. A warning beep, the visage of the stars disappears. Metal shrieks in pain, bent, bending, being bent, a small crack appearing in front of-

Red. Teeth. A large hand.

Limbs feel heavy, can't even scream.

What was cold suddenly blazes in full focus, an arm is twisted and twisted. Ice blades my blood has become, piercing my veins and flesh, only to shrink back to liquid. And start again, higher on my arm, seeping through the pores, dampening it all, mangling the flesh.

With every bite, with every nibble.

With every crunch, with every chew.

Burns, then it's so cold. Burns me so much, like that one time I touched an oven barehanded. Then it's so cold, like when an ice cube got stuck to my tongue.

Again, and again, and again, and-

Pain, on my head. Everything swirls, I shiver and quiver. Hazy, fuzzy, a pair of eyes gain form above me.

And then, she sighs as she places a hand over my head. "I told you to be careful in this place, didn't I?"

"… Huh? I- COUGH! "

From the pit of my stomach, the reflex surges and doesn't stop. Soreness, that expands inward with every breath I take. Simply coughing, any and all air leaving me, everything graying out.

Something covers my mouth, something soft. "Breathe in, slowly. You'll hyperventilate otherwise." I do as told, closing my eyes, hands resting on my neck.

Hiccups that refuse to leave. Dryness that hurts to heal. It takes a minute, or perhaps ten, maybe more. I cannot tell, and my lips feel dry, frail, and broken.

"Can you remember who you are, young Yashiro?" She asks, brows furrowing tightly, lowering a knee to the ground, a hand to grasp my cheek, thumb on my chin, forcing my sight to return hers.

"Ye- Cough… Yes. What was," I sigh, taking in a long breath, shivering at the cold blanket that falls around my shoulders, the wind that howls, continuing in a whisper, "t-that vision?"

"I suppose, one of his final moments. Are you uninjured?"

"… He was dying?"

"Yes, so I said. Most of what you'll see here are what death repressed from his conscious mind," up and down, the silky hand comforts me, the monotonous voice never falters. "Are you feeling well enough to stand?"

"I think…"

"If not, I believe I can send you back to the waking world."

"No… I can- I will stand. Just give me… a moment, please…"

Shivering, running a few fingers over my arms. That same slice of ice tears into me, spurring a beating, a swelling sensation on the back of my head. The feast that monster had on my arms, the cruel slowness of the killing, and yet there was… no fear. Pain and the reaction it brings were there, I believe, but… Looking at the Gekishin, that faint whisper, those final words.

Why was he content at such an outcome?

Resigned, yet feeling fulfilled. Believing to have… saved someone? Did he sent his lover with the migrant fleet, then? Right, Takeru-san didn't knew there were so many BETA in the universe then. Perhaps he also knew of the possibility of failure of the migration, yet found solace in sparing his beloved the pain of Iceberg.

… He now knows they might have died, or would have as soon as the BETA made it to the target planet.

A pointless struggle. Nothingness, except pain.

So this is why he takes so much to stand up every morning, why he insists on clearing his mind. Aware, painfully so, of all the mistakes that must not be repeated.

… Like the Professor was, after Hakuryo burned down to ashes.

Slowly raising back up, I finally can breathe in calmly again. The Gekishin remains in place, in its sorrowful prayer, the clawing towards the stars. A hand supports my head, another hoist my fingers upwards, stabilizes my posture.

"Are you truly in proper form to continue, young Yashiro?"

"… Yes."

"How odd, I'd thought you would not endure a vision of what lurks here. You are not forcing yourself, are you?" She asks, tapping my forearm as I take a few steps, wobbling as shocks run up my legs while they reboot.

"It would be a lie if I said no, but I'm tired of… watching, and nothing else."

I did nothing when the Professor needed help, I merely lived by my orders when her heart was in pain. Just being close is not enough, she needed support. Support I couldn't give her, that she instead finds in her coffee and medical supplements. I do not want to remain staring in the medbay, hoping for Takeru-san to wake up someday. I want to… help them, with my own hands, with whatever little I can do.

Knees shake, I rest my palms on them. It does nothing, both feet refuse to part ways with the soil. That coldness seeps down my back, the prickling, tearing shiver of cold scratches my skin, I hug, and squeeze, and constrict my arms, closer and closer, keeping the dampness at bay.

A soft caress, she pats my shoulder as I take in a sharp breath. My eyes find a nod, a small smile, a hand in the air, awaiting mine. With one last gulp, a long sigh, I take her hand and force the first step out, the stiffness out of me. And once more, we venture into the dark wilderness.

It takes my all to blind my nose to the thickening scents that linger in the foggy air, my tongue desiring to be swallowed whole. Skeletal structures visible through the wood, the mire. A dissonant orchestra of wildlife plays to the madness, entire entities vanishing like candles onto themselves behind the veil of shadow. Seas of worms spilling from cavities, like the soda I once put a mint candy in. More and more of those odd insectoid shapes, of greenery turning to true green in sickness, conquered by mucus and grime.

And within this cyclopean haunt, there is something that starts to linger in my eyes. All the unit patches that float in puddles, in the purplish gray mire. Folders with reports, faces imprinted on the bark. Trays of food, pieces of clothing, collars with tags cracked at the edge. Unable to truly zone everything out, flashes and figments end up reaching me. The face of the poor Instructor carved into the wood, before a cloud of insects splatters her head into fireworks. Two of his squadmates turning to charcoal under the acidic hold of the bog, another taking the shape of a normal pink flower that is then crushed by overgrown vines, swatted over and over again like that one time the Professor found a cockroach roaming in the office, until the remains resembled jelly more than a living being. And a lone, thistle beetle squashed by a lightning-shaped wooden spear, burning to the venoms of the bog.

It is all followed by the toxic scent, the cold sweat, that tight binding on my stomach, and brief yet terrorizing images of tragedy that flash in my eyes when my eyes or ears linger for too long.

Taking in a sharp breath, biting my lips as an image of Sumika-san frozen in a hospital bed with the company of a flat-line etches itself over my vision, my feet drag themselves to a halt as the walls of defense fail me on this occasion, the memory seeps into me.

Massaging my neck, taking one step at a time, I look up and find the mystery ESPer waiting. "Um… Are these all things Takeru-san has lived through?"

"Indeed," she whispers back, slicing vines and cobwebs that obstruct our way. As well as what grotesque shapes came alongside them. "Are you wishing to go back?"

"No, I… I have to bring him back. I'm just… curious, is all." About how is it that he can remain smiling, if such is the pressure on his shoulders. About why he never asked for my help, if he was hurting so much.

She shakes her head, a hand on her waist as she stares, lips cascading. "You do not need to feel obligated to-"

"I don't want to forget. I don't… want to lose him."

"Then, what spawns such a creak in your voice?" She inquires, taking a step closer.

"Well, for me… it's more scary, more horrifying to think of going back to my old life, alone in my office, than it is to face what other… dark memories might remain."

"… You seem to value him much," she comments, eyes remaining on me.

"He's my friend. I know Takeru-san would do the same for me."

"Right you are, young Yashiro," smiling for a moment, she then resumes her walk.

As do I, in silence for a moment as we cross uneven terrain. "Um… Miss, do you know Takeru-san?"

"If I didn't, I wouldn't be able to be this deep in his psyche. His mind would have pushed me out, rejected my presence."

"I suppose… But I don't think Takeru-san knows any other ESPers, and he wasn't being observed as far as I recall." The Professor wouldn't have hid something of the sort to me, and I'd have felt it on my scans too.

"He probably did not know I was observing, truth be told."

"… So you were stalking him."

Her steps halt, eyes squinting. "Quite rude, aren't we."

"Then, why do you want to wake him up?" She closes her eyes, once more giving me the silent treatment. "Miss, could you at least tell me your name?"

"… It is unimportant, and we have more pressing matters," she again strides forward, causing waves in the puddles of mire.

"So you will help me bring Takeru-san back to reality, Unimportant-san?"

She twitches, a single cheek puffing as her lips seem to contort. "You suck."

"Can you answer that? You really will help me?"

"Sigh… I know I must be causing much curiosity, but you truly shouldn't concern yourself with me. If there are any questions that need answering, I shall acquiesce once we exit the Black Lilith," she states, nodding at me, and I return the gesture.

For another moment, we walk in silence, enduring the stench and coldness that upon us falls. Yet, as I look around, avoiding lingering on anything for too long a time, something catches my attention, something in a nearby tree that looks most odd.

"Um… Miss, you did say that everything that appears in this forest is something Takeru-san has lived through, correct?"

"Yes, what is the matter?"

"What is that supposed to be?" I point to a piece of metal with the shape of a hand, that was protruding from one of those people-shaped trees.

"… It, too, must remember him of something painful," she says, hastily looking away, resuming her ant march through the foliage.

"But Takeru-san doesn't seem to know what a cyborg is," besides the knowledge he has of the 00 Unit, "and I don't think he ever met one."

"Perhaps, perhaps not," she dismisses, not even turning back.

"Um, do you know if… it could be linked to… the Takeru-san that was a Royal Guard?"

She suddenly stops, I can hear her breathing in sharply. Wide eyes, almost crossed, lunge straight into my own. "Careful what you speak of in this place. If you summon any further dangers, I may not be able to come to your rescue, young Yashiro," she whispers, threatens, a spiked whip of absolute zero.

"Why? Do you know of-"

"This place hoists all that the soldier does not, or cannot, recall. Summoning it would be a folly on our part. Even mentioning it as you did could cause such hallucinations to inch closer to us."

"… This whole situation was caused by him remembering something about that, something that pained him greatly. Can't you at least tell me anything that might help him recover?"

Eyes squint, not in rage, as they lower, crash onto the dirt. Nibbling at her bottom lip, she shakes her head. "It is not something I should interfere in."

"Then, why are you helping me find Takeru-san?"

"I'm merely…" she crosses her arms, before sighing, short yet heavy, "striking a balance, and repaying a favor. Nothing else. Let me remind you, if we are harmed within this specific place, parts of his darkest memories might etch themselves onto our psyches. And… loath I am to admit that I'm not strong enough to withstand a direct confrontation with Shirogane-san's lowest moments." Sighing heavily, her shoulders sag. She then turns around, advancing while dragging her feet.

Why won't she tell me? She has to know something, and being an ESPer there's no possible way in which she's ignorant to the situation at hand. It is true I am not certain of her intentions, yet I do not feel malice from her being. Her aura might be locked for some reason yet her gestures do not come with falsehood.

Following after, the silent walking leaves me to my devices, which soon spin their gears and overflow my ears from inside. It at least grants me a distraction from the distorted forest, allowing me to walk on automatic. The woman seems rather distressed, however. Ever since we passed a small white hat with cat ears and twin-tails that ended on cat paws, she has been taking glances all around us, almost frantically. Trying to resume any thread of conversation proves futile, so my steps dwindle as I try and regain my breath, unable to match her phalanx march. Lost in thought, my eyes wander about through the horrid visage, almost blurring everything.

… Only to find a silhouette a few odd meters behind our position, in the middle of the trees. Someone was huddled amidst the greenery, unmoving. Upon closer inspection, sharpening my sight as the mist refuses to clear, and moving some vines away-

"… Takeru-san? Ah, Takeru-san!" I finally found you!

"Huh? Hey, wait!" She calls out, but I do not heed nor hear what follows.

Almost tripping, my hands find a root to propel me forward. It grows harder to approach him, the foliage acting as barbed wires impeding my steps, the smallest blade of grass now sharp enough to leave markings on my legs. The figure grows firm, defined, allowing me to recognize the messy hair, the chestnut color. So I rush, hop, and blitz through all what lays in between us, almost running out of breath.

Only to start to decelerate, more and more until I stop cold in my tracks.

The uniform… is different, it's not the white one from the old school, not a BDU nor the fatigues, it is also not the formal dress. The patch, the unit patch on his shoulder… isn't… from the UN…

A purplish pink tint to the skin, sunken at places. Claw marks and tears tarnish the full-black suit, near the draconian design of the patch, almost up to his shoulders. Dark red, coagulated blood shields the wounds, pointlessly. A broken rapier lies nearby, filthy up to the hilt. Surrounding him, feathers form a carpet, a halo on the ground. Bones drained and dried, crushed as if stomped, some with sharp cuts which are unnatural, tainted by the same filthy stains with which the rapier is wholly covered.

The gale courses through us, my feet feel freezing, ice starting to ingrain itself to my sole more and more as some intelligible mumbling whispers out of his lips. And again, it rings in my ears.

The flat-line I heard by the statue.

A rumble in the ground, a shiver down my spine. Two eyes, large eyes locked on me in the distance, a howl that catapults everything in its path into the skies before it begins its assault. The spiral staircase of a maw open fully, the fox is charging at me while tumbling trees and what else is in the way, blind to the destruction it unleashes so long as it reaches its prey.

"Hey!" The woman screams, reaching out to me from higher terrain. "Take my hand!"

"B-But Takeru-san-"

"Don't! That's just a specter of this forest, he's not who you seek!"

"H-However-"

I cower on the ground as a tree in its entirety falls almost by my side. The glimmer of the claws, of the fangs is now visible, clearly and defined like an equation's true and only result. And as cold and uncaring as those numbers are those eyes, those eyes from which drips venom, slime, and blind bloody murder.

Hitting the mud, I reach up to the hand the woman's offering me. But my feet slip, my remaining shoe overflowed by mud, the sole feeling completely covered by it too. So my back meets the sticky wetness as I hear her yell, another of those small explosions followed by a shriek.

"Stand up! Please, hurry!" Almost falling down herself, hanging on with her legs coiled upon a branch, both hands seek at least my fingertips.

A howl, wood that is preyed upon, a storm at ground level.

The pressure of the heat surrounds my nape, clasping a lock on my neck, claiming it preemptively.

Fingertips slip, barely meet as I raise, extended and seek her hand. And again I fall to the mud, her features pale further.

Ears ring, a blitzing mass of fur and bone zooms towards me, allowing me to see the true end of its throat.

" Stop…"

Dampness hits my face. The purplish pink of the skin begins to turn red, dripping down, dripping down, reddening the rest of the arm. The cackle of constricting chains, the grief of a saw grinding itself against a wall. A single hand, holding back the monstrosity. A back filled with wounds once more standing before me, barely covered by the tattered dark uniform.

Knees quivering, starting to buckle, the hand which grips and seals the maw convulses. "You've had enough… You have enough now, right?" The other hand slowly, hesitantly, raises towards the beast. Barely placing his palm on it, skin on skin, the slow rubs seem to unnerve, to anger the monster further as it tries to pull back but finds its efforts futile.

"Hey, Yashiro!" The woman's shout snaps me out of the daze, she was still desperately choking the air, trying to reach down. "Give me your hand, before they move!"

"But… But Takeru-san is-"

"That's not Shirogane-san! We have to leave, quickly!"

Creaking, a low grunt in paint. Fingers that disappear into the jaw, liquid that pours from it. Monochrome eyes that flicker and swirl, claws which aim to tower over Takeru-san, the maw trying to open again. And yet, he doesn't move. A small scarecrow under a storm, the tiny wires of straw tense and stretched, limbs about to forever bend. And yet, despite the required grip in seal, the voice remains soft, low.

" Night by night, a life by knife. Always on edge, with it on your throat, as you devote your all to breaking your chains. But you're not…" The beast swipes at him, the claws finding his body, growing intimate with the scalp and skin. "But you're not being chased anymore. You don't need to keep this up."

The shoulder bends, the red spreads. Knees break away, pinned down easily without mercy. A hollow howling, the staircase of a jaw opens again.

"S-Stop!" The beast halts its moves, those eyes again focusing on myself.

"What are you doing?! Hurry up, give me your hand," she pleads, I can hear the wood nearby creaking.

Yet, taking in a sharp breath, I hold the gaze, the cold gaze that… in a way does resemble hers, when her mind grows resolute to the extreme. "P-Professor, this isn't how you truly are! You're not some mindless, murderous beast, you're our hope. You're Takeru-san's biggest ally. Why are you harming him?"

A smile, the gesture resembles. Shifting its posture, ignoring what was below, now the maw aims at me once again. Completely deaf to my words, blind to my intentions, there is only aggression. Cold, ruthless aggression to anything that gets in its way. Is this… how you see her, then? The part you hate the most, the one that caused the accident with the poor Instructor you showed us? B-But she should still be-

" Stop." Both hands push forward, blackening fingers struggling against the pressure. It again turns into a small show of force, that small lock somehow keeping the monstrosity in check despite its attempts to further fall into murder.

Something hits the back of my head, a small twig. Looking up, a paling and wide eyed complexion meets me, a hand reaching out.

"Snap out of it!" She screams again. "We need to leave, now!"

"But… But if his memories are hurt… Takeru-san doesn't deserve this!"

"This isn't him! It's just a reflection of a past self!"

"Even so… We can still bring him with us, instead of abandoning him!" He tried to protect me. And even now, he's doing what he can despite the injuries. Turning to face the attacker, sending dirt into the eyes of the fox and causing it to flinch, I rush to his side, extending a hand. "Takeru-san, let's run!"

"Stop! Don't look into his eyes!" She screams again, hoarse, louder.

And I cannot understand why she warns me of that. The eyes I see are sunken as well, with larger, darker eyebags branded in blue. Skin flashing red, motes littering and breaking the strong tint. His hands, dry yet warm, are hard to move.

And again, the pressure of the heat, the small growl, the towering shadow. A small explosion, the woman sent one of those small bombs at the fox as she slides down the mire. In a quick hop, she comes to me, grabs my wrists and pulls.

"We're leaving, now!"

"W-Wait, Takeru-san is-"

"We don't have time, we need to get out of here!"

"But is he going to be fine? That monster is going to-"

"I told you, I cannot shield us both from the darkest memories. We can only try and-"

The wail of leaves, branches, and insects. A tree that crumbles in front of us, over it the figure of the beast. Spreading its odd, metal wings up, howling in pride.

"Tch… If only you had listened…"

" Don't you dare…"

I look back, Takeru-san wobbles to his feet. Slowly walking towards us, or the fox perhaps, his gaze remains locked on the ground. A growl in answer, a claw stomping the fallen bark. Tension in the hold on my wrists, shadows coming to her face.

"… Did you look into his eyes?" She whispers, subtly shaking.

"Um, I shouldn't have?"

A rumbling answers me, lifting my feet off the soil, sinking my face to the muck.

Smoke and fire, black fire surges forth from the blackening wounds, fueled by them. The same specter of blaze now stands on front of the beast. Spinning in the air, kicking its jaw shut. Landing in the same violence as his TSFs tend to, an arc of fire contests the slamming claw that seeks to enlarge already gaping wounds.

" I told you to stop!"

A hand raises and punches, and beats, and slams, and knocks itself over and over again onto the maw, not stopping at all. Instead it grows in strength with every swing, the colossal beast collapses to the ground, staggering. Yet, the hound refuses to remain still, winds spread a cutting gale about, blasting away upwards, diving towards us once more.

As the blazes fall back upon the impact, as the heat forces my eyes shut, my wrist is pulled, my feet meeting the ground running.

"W-Wait, that's Takeru-san! He took that form when-"

"I'm telling you that is not Shirogane-san!" She scolds, limping on a leg as she endures, as she forces herself to run. "We need to get out of here now before it's too late!"

"But he's shielding us!"

"Exactly!"

"… What? Why would-"

Another quake, fiercer, causing branches to break. A howl compulses the atrocities, all of the grotesque inhabitants of this accursed bog start running, rushing, falling, folding onto themselves, into a stampede that aims for our silhouettes. Another hollow howl, the shredding gale giving chase.

" If you won't listen…"

Thunder echoes above, rain begins to fall. The pull spurs me to run, and as I look back I spot the flicker of the fire beyond the treetops. Starting to grow, and grow, and grow until it fully eclipses the moon.

"Hurry up, we're going to end up swallowed by their fight!" She shouts, gritting her teeth as we have to jump and sidestep as vines and roots whip and slash at us.

"But what's going on here?! He's still trying to protect us!"

"Just keep running! I can't shield you or me this Shirogane-san!"

Is she more afraid of him than the fox? Even as all of the corruption is intent on slowing us down, as we stumble and lose speed, she remains looking up at the ball of fire. Even when the heat of the breath, the rumbling of the howl pierces our shadows.

" It's still beating, it ain't too late…" A broken voice whispers, causing all warmth to vanish from the hand of the woman, the pull and running growing afterwards.

Pushing on against the stream of never-ending monsters, the orb of dark fire descends in an arc, missing us by a hair, as if drawing a line between our shadows and the chasers. Even as the fox aims at him from a blank point, he remains in sturdy in protection. As if the pain were gaining him further strength, as if his blood were the fuel of the fire.

For a moment my feet try and grind against the mud, against the rushing of the woman. Eyes remaining locked on his back as cyclopean swarms surround him, allowing the fox to glide to us unimpeded. The jaw opens, falling right straight towards us even as we run.

" I told you… to stop! She's still alive! "

Fire darts erupt, the treetops turn orange. Prey to it all, the foliage surrenders to the fire twister which grows and grows, a dark hole swallowing everything in its suffocating erasure.

And then, as if it were right besides me, it echoes again. The flat-line, extending, stretching, undisturbed, unchanging.

Blossoming fully, the petals reveal the core, the prominence of pure scorching.

Kind of like those pictures of boats with candles sailing that the Professor showed me once, kindling under the rain, within the haze of this forest.

It erases my shadow, the shadows around, ahead.

Cleansing the bog of all of its impurities, by force, by brutal force, as brutal as the inhabitants were. A counter in perfect reflection.

Only a shadow remains, witnessing it all from above. Illuminated by sparks and sprites, the fox glides over us.

A thunder echoes above, a thunder rumbles below. Another shadow dashes, swirls in my view, a blurry mass I cannot recognize. Both of our steps halt as the beast is sent on a collision course with the people-trees nearby, splintering them all, making them part and fall as if someone had forced a pathway to manifest through open seas.

Wiping the mud of my face, coughing and hacking, I try to look around through the fire, to find either the woman or Takeru-san. And it takes my breath away, what now looms over me.

Firm silver settles in my sight, small threads of it within the dark plating. Modest yet sharp claws, small spiky wings, a bit too sharp maybe. The slim yet compact form of the armor, the few spikes that surround shoulders and wrists, the glistening of the fire that still burns within it, billowing from the cracks. If not for those light brown eyes within the draconian features, for the scars, the dents and scratches that mire its back, I'd have no way of knowing the angular, weaponized, yet gallant-looking dark dragon in front of me could be Takeru-san.

It stands its ground even as the beast lunges for it, biting, thrashing against the plating. Instead of retaliating, however, the dragon merely sinks its claws onto it, aiming to immobilize the fox, surround it with its wings to prevent it from taking flight once again.

"Now's our chance!" She says, slowly pulling my hand, spurring me to my feet.

Yet, I cannot depart my sight from them as we escape. Even under constant aggression, under the incessant downpour, under the shrieks, the screeches, the clash of bone and metal, the dark steel remains stalwart. Almost as if it were a last rampart, never falling to true aggression, trying to simply cease the drillwind that bites into its frame.

The downpour grows harder, almost impeding our advance. The mire almost reaching my knees, contact with the bark, with the corroding environment is unavoidable, so all I can do is nibble at my lips and swallow down whatever brief flashes my mind is subjected to.

"Can you still go on?" She asks, barely audible through the rain, almost bending backwards as the stream pushes against us.

"Y-Yes… I can do it…"

"Do you think you can clear that hill quickly?" She aims at an elevation, where apparently the forest meets its end.

"I don't know…" It does look rather steep, I could slip and slide down on my face if I try and hurry.

"Then, make a choice. We hurry before either the fox breaks free of the dark armed dragon's hold or we drown, or I return you to the waking world," she says, looking completely frozen as a thunder illuminates her features.

"Drown? The rain isn't strong enough for us to drown, we can take some time to clear the rest of the forest. It's true that advancing against this current is really hard but we can-"

"No, we do not possess the luxury of time, now that the dragon has awakened. I… I don't know how much we have, but I need you to decide now."

"Why? You've been giving me cryptic warnings all the time, please explain me what's going on here. Why did Takeru-san turn into a dragon anyways?"

"Look, we truly do not have-" mouth gaping, her words halt all of a sudden. Eyes widening, petrified.

She looks to the east in said horror, her head falling back until it meets the skin. What meets my gaze as I follow hers is a colossal shadow towering over the very same storm that's raging as of now, piercing the clouds and thunders in its seemingly slow advance. I step back a few times, twisting my neck backwards while supporting myself against a tree, yet my eyes cannot see the end of it. It extends to the Heavens, perhaps further beyond. Falling back on my bottom, half sunk into the current of mire, I can only stare at the gigantic tidal wave that approaches, tall enough to make this large forest seem minuscule by comparison.

"What… W-What is that?!"

Her lips quiver as her hand allows me to stand again, to not slip into the small current twice. Gulping hard, running a hand over her face to try and clean it, through the space of her fingers those eyes, wavering and frozen, remain on that tsunami. "If the forest is the amalgamation of what traumas he can remember, this…" she bites her lips, eyelids falling down all of a sudden, "oceanic collapse that approaches are all the memories that are impossible for the soldier to recall as his current self. The mark of his greatest suffering, of a life he cannot integrate into himself, no matter what."

"The memories of a Takeru-san… that is different than Takeru-san?"

"Or at least, of a life that brings so much misery to him he cannot recall it without it breaking his will. So instead, he forces it all to remain locked away, fused into this filthy tsunami you see before you," she says, taking a few steps back, clawing at the bark to gain balance. "As I told you before, even I am powerless to resist the intensity of those memories. The emotions are too raw, too strong… or too hollow. Thus, we need to depart from this forest, now. I am certain I can clear the distance. What of you?"

Gulping, bending my neck to stare at the water wall that looms, at the small flicker of fire that still holds onto the violent grip that returns the embrace, I shiver and close my eyes. A thunder booms, trees fall and are carried away by the current. Eyes and hands sink into the grime, washed away. All the while, the shrieks of the fox sometimes overpower the rain, followed by the flicker of dark blaze and a low roar.

He shielded me from the fox, and he continues to do so now. Without even trying to harm the beast, merely attempting to stop its rampage. Why am I hesitating? Heaviness again swells in my stomach, on the sides, hurting. There is so much I cannot understand, so many cruel things that I've seen… And just looking at that mega tsunami is enough to spur the echoes I felt while in contact with the Takeru-san that turned to fire.

"If we make it past this forest, Takeru-san… the real one will be close by, right?" She nods, extending a hand, an inquiry. Tightly clasping my own around hers, I slowly start taking steps forward.

She smiles, placing one leg in front of the other, fighting the stream that pushes against us, the droplets that bombard our heads.

"… What's the point in moving on if there's nothing left for you?" A whisper hits my ears, a twig my leg, I stumble and mire almost overtakes my chin. "There's no joy in martyrdom…"

Bending my knees, gripping the hand which pulls me, I try and keep walking. Grinding, sliding both feet, something entangling or sinking into them.

" Where's the mercy in this bloodbath?!" A completely lost voice screams, accuses.

Flashes of burnt buildings, of people scattering like little ants in front of water through the streets. Of giblets and severed body parts scorched by artillery fire, a downpour of it coming from TSFs guarding a dock, a port.

Shifting shadows pounce upon us, end up in pieces that sink into the stream. A sway of the tail, the spiked drill on it, another roar in warning from the dragon, a fire blast that reduces all around us to ash.

Eyes lost in the sizzling shape of the pyre, in the fading dark of the fire… Pain, in my neck. Unbearably burning me first, freezing me firmly a second later. Followed by an impact in between my brows, sight shatters and it seems my skull will soon meet the same fate.

Water hits my chin, the grip on my hand fades, nothing meets my feet as they thrash, and the same for my fingertips as I reach out for who knows what while dragged down by the current.

Gunshots, the scent of gunpowder, broken buildings, hospitals. Hands reaching out in pleading, hands that melt, that sink, that burn, that crumble within the ensuing smoke.

Coughing only serves to fill my lips with more water, eyelids are growing heavy… it's all so cold…

… Huh? For some reason, the stream ceases on its intent to drown me. The liquid that in came now flows outward, throat feeling hoarse after so much coughing. Cold to the touch, sharp to the touch. Raising a hand to seek balance causes it to flinch away, a cut etched on my fingertip, a trail of red flowing downwards. Looking up, angular, metallic features gaze upon me.

Sitting on the palm of its claw, I meet the dragon's gaze, that light brown stare I've grown used to. Short of closing its grip, it remains still, towering over me, shielding my body from the relentless beating of the rain. Faintly warm to the touch, the sharp yet dented steel shines under the storm. A shriek echoes, the blurry shape of the fox diving from behind. Merely swiping its tail, Takeru-san sends the beast to collide into the trees, the stream, causing waves and waves to ripple outwards like a geyser.

"… Takeru-san?" A growl, those eyes again meet mine. "It's you, isn't it? Why… Why are taking this shape? What's going-"

Lowering its head, the dragon slowly opens its maw. Scythes for fangs, a forge lurking at the end of the throat, sparks and embers brimming, ready to pour forth. Closing my eyes, shielding myself with both hands, nothing happens. Blinking slowly, a soft caress begins to envelop, to surround, to embrace me. A soft and gradual sigh, a breath of kind heat covers me whole, drying me, restoring warmth to my body. And in the mist of that dark heatwave, of the lukewarm embrace…

… An old lab flashes in my mind.

Towering papers lurk barely out of sight, at the edge of vision. A gaze drags itself on the ground, miserable and hollow. Making herself smaller, both shoulders and lips, the Professor lies in my sight.

"… I'm telling you, there's no need for you to remain locked up in here, Sensei," Takeru-san asks, low, somber. She remains quiet, crossing her hands over her arms as if enduring the cold. "Are you hesitating because you're afraid of what could happen if you take the pass?"

Quivering, eyes close. Crushing both arms in the grip, a twisted smile raises along a broken whisper. "If I said yes, that it terrifies me to try and get out of this lab, to try and believe in what you propose… Would you laugh at me?"

A step forward, a tender yet tight hold. Lukewarm as the breath is over me, hands rustling over thin, dry strands of hair. Enduring the shaky hold over his shoulders, the quiver as if frozen that struggles against his embrace, the soft caress of warmth continues.

"… It's alright, Yuuko. You're not alone, because I am still here. Even if the whole world is against you… me and Kasumi are still here, and many others also are."

" It's too d-dangerous. Bringing discord to the chain of command… trying to regain my position would-"

" Then, do you believe Alt V to be the solution we should support?"

" If… it avoids any disturbances…"

" But that doesn't mean you have to give up, does it?" He asks, rubbing the back of her head. "You still can try to find another solution."

" Shirogane, it's already over…" she barely says, slumping into his hold. "I couldn't find the solution to-"

" To Alt IV. You can still look for another solution."

The recollection he showed the Professor, the final one of that day when we met for the first time plays out… yet diverges at a point before the end I remember.

" What if taking my side puts you in danger?" She asks, trying to regain her edge.

" Don't worry about me, I'll be fine. No matter what may come at me, I'll show you… I'm enough to support you. Sure, I can't operate a PC like Kasumi, and I can't help in the calcs you make either. But I'll be enough from now on. Gimme some credit, I did manage to reach this far," he fakes a pout, lifting a smile into the utter lack of light of that gaze.

That then chokes his shoulders, hers shaking. "Are you certain of what you're saying? I've no allies left, I'm-"

" Hey, I'm still here, you know?"

" Be serious!" Soft, repeated strikes slam into his chest, cracks of distress flood her complexion. "Just what do you think you can even do to aid me? I'm… I have a duty to-"

Halting the spiel, bringing her to his chest with a tight embrace once again, he whispers. "You always took care of me, ever since I came to this world. Can you let me take care of you, just this once?"

" And what happens when you get hurt?" She whispers back, not fighting the hold this time.

" Heh, I rather try and roll for the twenty than to remain in fear of the one. And don't worry, I ain't gonna get myself in unnecessary trouble. But, if and when shit hits the fan… I'll despair after I'm dead, I won't let anything ruin my efforts. So, if there's any part of you that wants to fight back, know that I'm here, on your side."

"… Even if what I'd like to do were I to regain my freedom would pit us against quite a few dangerous people?"

" Yeah. I'm with you, until light's out. And this time, I'll truly will be enough for you. I know I'm… not who you rather have as an ally but… this is all I am, all I really want. Will you let me help you carry the burden for even just a little while, Yuuko?" He asks, fingertips tracing her arms, seeking her eyes. Meeting them head on, not wavering as her hand clasp onto his cheeks, as her sight scans him deeply.

Only for her to then start to giggle then laugh, leaning onto him, returning the embrace, the all-encompassing warmth.

A thunder echoes above, broken trees below into the stream, the storm returns me to the palm of the dragon. It gives out a small growl, lowering me into the water, close to the woman that hesitantly approaches us. Leaving the lukewarmness, looking up into the somber face of the dragon… I notice there is dampness lingering in its eyes, flowing down its chin. Tears, not droplets of rain.

Howling through the foliage, the fox blasts towards us once more. Again, countered by the dragon, both beasts grappling and contesting one another. Again, merely keeping it at bay, not using its fire or weaponized armor to hurt it.

"Are you alright?" The woman inquires pulling my arm.

"… Yes, I think. Let's… Let's go," I turn away, taking a step forward. Despite the incoming rain, the water up to my knees, the warmth does not dissipate. Even as we run away, as the echoes of Iceberg again reach my ears.

The woman stumbles, her wounded leg limping. Lending my shoulder in support, grabbing onto one another, we continue our march. Climbing, clawing at the soil, at the roots, at those stars that lay in the distance, at the rocket that departs, an end to the foliage comes into view as I push my upper body over the edge of the small elevation. A hand reaches down to aid me, and for a moment I look back.

At the mass of fire that is still burning, at the guardian of our shadows. At the pit in my stomach, the gagging that follows. Choking, a noose binding itself to my neck, my feet jumping down on their own accord, is what this feeling resembles. A complete compression of both hearts and lungs, a searing, piercing into them as well.

Someone that's still alive… That's what he screamed before turning into that dragon. Despite the blazing eyes, he isn't maiming the fox. Even as I catch my breath, run a hand over my legs to gauge any injuries, their struggle seems to not be close to ending any time soon even as they're already half-sunken onto the flood.

… A Takeru-san I know nothing about, wounds that remain open to this very moment.

"Are we safe now that we exited the forest?" I ask, placing a hand on my shoulder.

"Eh? Ah, yes… We should seek higher ground quickly, before the tsunami hits. There should be no further dangers in the way, however" she reassures, looking at her leg, the small cut now visible as the rain clears our shapes of the sludge and grime. I nod back as she looks up and, after one final gaze towards the dragon, I follow after her steps.

Again climbing through elevations of the wasteland, pushing against the impact of the droplets, the stampede of the wind, the warning of the storm. All that I saw before, the small hands, the distorted shapes, the buildings, the rusted TSFs, all is drained and carried away by the stream. It leaves the wasteland void of anything and everything, and as we walk onward those remnants pass us by, fading into the dark and filthy current.

Reaching a cliff, supporting each other to traverse the narrow path to the top, I throw myself to the ground once we do, gasping as the rain falls and falls on me. Looking towards the forest with one cheek sinking onto the mud, a lightning vortex roars in the sky. Unable to stand, crawling to the edge, thunderbolts continue to raid the forest, a twister seeming to spawn on it. The tide regresses inward, the colossal tsunami looming closer and closer, a liquid sky falling upon the ground, Poseidon's revenge in all its glory.

The impact shakes the entire cliff we're on, waves crash against the elevation despite the distance, hitting my face as well. The woman stumbles backwards, also falling on her bottom, and we both can only stare into the stagnant and filthy stream, into the cyclone of this oceanic collapse that swallows all the terrain I had traversed thus far.

The waves continue to thrash among themselves, into the cliff. The splash sticks to me like mucus, a slimy sensation on my fingers, as if I had jumped into the mire. It all swirls into a gigantic cyclone, even the stormclouds are sinking in a tornado, drained by the whirlwind in the sea. Descending, descending, all of it begins to disappear as if swallowed by an abyss. The rocking, swirling waves, the thunders, the giant waves that collapse upon one another. They all fold and fade, lower and lower.

Until they leave nothing behind, a gaping hole of nothingness where the terrain I have been walking on was before.

The woman wobbles as she stands, brushing her arms off remnants of filth, sighing and returning to a calm complexion. Taking out that white handkerchief she had been carrying, she wipes her face and hands, then offers one to me, helping me stand up, patting my shoulder before gently cleansing my face with that tattered and old-looking cloth.

"You're unhurt, correct?" She asks as she sways the cloth, before folding it and returning it to its prior resting place.

"Yes, thanks. Um, miss," looking up, gripping her hand, "are we safe now?"

She nods, slow yet firm. "I believe so, there should be nothing impeding us from reaching our objective now."

"And you… will truly let me wake Takeru-san?"

"I so said, young Yashiro," she sighs, pulling away, rummaging through her hair. "Whether he decides to wake is up to the soldier, however."

"Why do you refer to him like that?"

"… Is there something wrong with it? He is a soldier, after all."

"Well, yes, I suppose. Then, um," starting to walk, my eyes remain on hers, "can you tell me why the Professor took that horrible shape within that forest? She wasn't aggressive when we met the fox in the ruins."

"… That is something only the soldier himself knows," she says, sober, hands folding on her back.

"I see. You did seem to know what would happen, that Takeru-san would turn into a dragon," I say, staring.

She remains walking, saying nothing, eyes locked forward. A momentary gaze my way, she sighs as I do not stop looking her way. "Yes, I was aware of it. Little it matters now, does it?"

"… Miss, you won't tell me your name?"

"It is unimportant."

"Sigh… Then, why did the dragon refuse to attack the fox? Why did Takeru-san turn into that thing? And… about his uniform, and the wounds he had all over, why was-"

She stops walking, looking up. My gaze follows, finding the clouds clearing away. A skyline in perfect dark is revealed, no moonlight to disturb the twinkle of the stars, the expansive bridge of constellations that extends from horizon to horizon.

And as a single hand plays with a pigtail, she again sighs. "Even if some people are truly dear to one, the damage they inflicted upon one's mind is not easy to forgive, much less to forget. Despite what they once meant to you, it is an arduous effort to dissociate their current self with what once you held so dearly. To continue to treat them with the deference, the unwavering honesty, the lack of doubt they once deserved from you would be equal to cling after an afterimage, ignoring all the signs, all the thorns you swallow for them now."

"What? But… But I saw it! As the dragon held me, I saw how dearly he cherishes the Professor!" I stomp closer, coiling my hands.

She shakes her head, brushing her hair as the wind blows. "That is what once was. It's yesterday, not today ."

"The Professor still thinks highly of Takeru-san. She wouldn't have grown as upset as she did otherwise."

"… Does that make up for the harm he has had to endure thus far, young Yashiro?"

"What? She hasn't- Takeru-san doesn't hate the Professor! Why do you assume that is the case?" Who are you even to make such a claim? You don't even know, you're not by their side everyday.

Sighing again, still playing with her hair, she looks down, at her hands, at her wounded leg, back into the void left by the oceanic collapse. Then back at me, her shoulders sagging, lips lowering. "Hatred and love are usually opposing sides of the same coin. If he didn't held the fox so dearly, he wouldn't allow it to reach so deeply into his mind, right into his weakest recess. Yet, the damage she has inflicted on him, the haunt of her words still echoes in him."

"But he… he doesn't think badly of her. I admit she might be, well, uh, ruthless at times, that she refuses to listen once her mind is made up, however all she does is with the greater good in mind." She even hesitated before asking me to perform a mind dive, she was… creaking, her aura was cracking as she hit the controls over and over, cursing everything as Takeru-san didn't wake up. "The Professor might be harsh and dry ice cold at times, that is true, however she is nothing like that savage and monstrous fox. Why would Takeru-san picture her in such a way?"

Staring into me, blinking, looking down, then up as she hugs her arms. "Did you hear what the specter said, before turning into that dark armed dragon?"

"Eh? Yes, I believe… he was asking the Professor to stop. Because someone was still alive."

"… Tell me then, young Yashiro. Do you know why people raise their voices at each other?"

"Huh? Because they hate each other, because they hold violent feelings towards one another. That's why I don't understand, this doesn't align with any memories of him I know of. This must be one memory of that awful and aggressive Royal Guard that fell into hatred, despising the Professor in his ignorance of the bigger picture, due to the cruelty he saw from the ground of the chain of command."

"Sigh… So much presumption, so little desire to understand."

Frowning a bit, I take a step closer. "What are you trying to say?"

"If all you want to hear are answers which align with your beliefs, then there is little point in continuing this conversation," she dismisses me, casting a narrow glance my way before she resumes walking.

Hurrying after her, I cannot match her stride. "Then please be clear. I do not understand… I can't understand what all I saw means. He being pained at what transpired during his prior experiences is one thing, but why hoist such animosity towards the Professor?"

Without stopping, she looks back at me, calm and frozen once more. "You should look deeper into people's feelings, the hints that float in the surface. Furthermore, you should already possess the answer to that query."

"I don't. I truly don't. Please, tell me. Why did he raise his voice, sound so angry back then?" And why did the dragon not attack the fox?

"Sigh… While I can see why you'd assume hatred is what fuels one's screams, there is another reason why people raise their voices at one another." She then looks back, into my stare, then slows down her steps, allowing me to walk by her side. Gazing at the stars above, she again plays with her hair. "Because they want to be understood."

"… I don't get it. Yelling is not productive to express one's ideas."

"Yes, that is true to an extent. However, those who are close to one another can sometimes understand what the other is thinking and feeling at a mere glance. That connection… is something truly dear, very important between peers, comrades, or lovers." She sighs, the wind blows, her steps wane. And again, her eyes lose themselves on the blanket of stars. "But when one desires to be heard yet does not find the understanding one wishes, the vocabulary turns faster, louder. They see the other as being away, growing distant, so they raise their voices in hopes of closing the gap. Of course, sometimes there are ill emotions fueling a rising voice, but sometimes all one desires is for the other to see what you see, before you're so far apart from one another that no words can properly convey your feelings to that someone. Pain more than anger, is what usually fuels a rising voice."

"But… But… But the Professor isn't dismissive at all. She always listen to-"

"Does she truly hear what you or the soldier have to say? Isn't she the type to zone out anything that might impair her devised plans?"

She inquires, turning around, towering over me, into me.

"T-That's… However, it's all for the sake of-"

"Hasn't she acted only on her own interests, disregarding collateral damage and any effect her actions might have on anyone else's life?"

"But she… she does what she has to because Alt IV must be successful or-"

"It's easy, isn't it? To justify yourself with a large, honorable cause. Who could argue against the 'safety and wellbeing of mankind as a whole'?" She shrugs, nibbling at her bottom lip for a second. Folding her arms, once more she plays with her hair as she stargazes. "Yet, try and understand how the soldier sees these actions, these justifications, the dismissal, and what comes along with the landscape the fox has painted, in your world and within his mind."

Lips shake as do my hands. Taking in a sharp breath, I swallow and dry my mouth, taking a step forward. "Are you… Are you saying the Professor is wrong?"

Meeting my gaze for a moment, holding it for another, once more she seeks the stars. "… One has to wonder, until when do those justifications hold real weight and when do they become mere wordplay born out of selfishness and arrogance."

"The Professor isn't mistaken. Her plans are the only hope left for-"

"Even if she holds quite the intellect, she is still fallible like every one of us," she counters, glaring in absolute zero, her already monotonous tone lowering further. "Despite gaining access to causality's flow, the actions she takes are only following the future she desires to bring about, and there is no telling if her ideal desire is truly what's best. To elevate her to a state of unchallenged authority, of permanent righteousness would be the same as," she frowns, clicking her lips, turning away, "enshrining her as a God. And for as much honest care for the planet that fuels her actions, for as much as she might desire to become one, the scientist will never be the Holy Mother."

"Why… Why are you so harsh towards her? You don't know anything… of all she has to do, how she feels, how-"

A small pat on my head, slow and constant. Her eyes lose all edge when I look up, she remains rubbing my head. "She is a mere mortal like everyone else, young Yashiro. Failing to account for collateral damage, disregarding it by claiming a higher cause and that her methods could in no way be mistaken, is precisely what could spur a reaction such as the one you've witnessed in the Black Lilith," she says, before starting to walk again.

"But Takeru-san… he doesn't hate-"

"I am certain you've felt it, the wrath of that dark armed dragon. The soldier does hold the fox quite dearly, and yet… there is a side of herself that he loathes like nothing else. And you should already know why that is."

"What… I don't understand. He knows the Professor's project is our only hope, you're not making any-"

Looking back, saying nothing, frowning faintly as the wind howls and her pigtails flutter. "You have managed to walk past the forest, you've felt most of his repressed trauma, and have retained full consciousness until now. Then answer me, young Yashiro. Do you believe the results to be worth the sacrifices?"

She stops and holds my gaze, arms folding as she awaits my answer.

Under the fully clear skyline, as shooting stars begin to paint thin strokes amidst the dark.

As the wind howls and tickles my nape, those eyes do not leave mine.

Yet, I look down. Recalling all the pain, all the moments of horror I've endured since I entered his mind.

The little child in the house, the ravine with the corpses of his comrades, the wails by the statue as the wolves surrounded us, all that transpired in the forest, the screams of that specter in a dark blaze.

"W-We are still alive. I know he- The project will lead us to-"

"Alt IV might see fruition, only due to an oversight, an unexpected result outside of the her control," she says, shaking her head, looking up as her hair sways in the air. "By the scientist's own efforts, only by the results of her plans and actions, Alt IV would have failed as a few memories of the soldier indicate."

"But… But he said that in his prior experience Alt IV did manage to strike down the Kashgar Hive! The Professor's project can save-"

"Due to her own laid out plans or thanks to the wildcard she was unexpectedly bestowed with?" She inquires, narrowing her eyes. As I say nothing, she shakes her head, takes out that white and tattered handkerchief to wipe her face. "And even beyond that, his most recent experiences in the wakeful world indicate that, indeed, the fox doesn't seem particularly keen in heeding his warnings."

"Wh- The Professor does care. D-Don't say bad things about her!"

"If she truly cared, truly, we wouldn't be having this conversation. Nor would the dragon remain so angered. It is, after all, the rawest representation of his natural coping mechanism."

"Huh? What do you-"

She sighs, raising a finger, "Unable to fully drown within the grind, the soldier punishes himself for all that has transpired, all you've seen in the wasteland." Cracks in her eyes, that then collapse to the ground. "Because if it was something he is responsible for, it means he had some agency in the chain of events and can then strive to mend what has gone wrong in other experiences. Even if he accepts that he has to surrender to the fox's whims when it comes to the big picture, to see there is nothing he can do to protect his beloved ones is too much to bear, regardless of whether his self-blaming tendencies are justified or not. So, he shoulders it all on his own, in silence, until he cannot go on… or someone he cherishes is hurt due to his inaction, thus unleashing that bursting draconian wrath you saw in the Black Lilith."

A cold blanket falling upon my back, the darkening of his aura back at the base when he was pained, the contrast with the shine of when he told me of Galaxy Wars, it all sinks into place. It makes my knees quiver and waver, pressure at the pit of my neck. "But he- Takeru-san doesn't ever grow as angry as-"

"Because while he may lay low and take the blows, thinking he deserves the pain as punishment for his 'failures', nothing could anger him more than to see someone he likes be made to suffer unfairly," she whispers, sighing again.

"But… But Takeru-san does… I believe he does appreciate the Professor, he understands why she has to do all she does!"

"Precisely."

"E-Eh?"

Sighing again, hugging her arms, her gaze observes the pale, cracked wasteland. Her complexion sinking more and more as she does, taking out the white handkerchief to clean something in her eyes. "Precisely because he appreciates who the fox is, or rather was for him, is that he is so hurt by her refusal to listen. It is fitting, for one born under the two-faced star such as her, that he would favor one side of her personality and despise the opposite."

… Is she talking of how Takeru-san sometimes refers to her as 'Vice Commander' when upset? And what does two-faced star even means? "B-But still, to turn her into that monster… Why? The Professor always does what she does for the greater good, and even when she darkens her aura it hurts her much. And she does care about him. She was truly worried and angry when Takeru-san was about to vanish!" I hadn't seen her aura blazing crimson in a very, very long time, too.

"You should already have reached that answer, within the echoes of the forest," she says, brushing her pigtails, turning around and walking again.

"You're just being cryptic to avoid answering me…"

"As much as he might," she stops, words and steps, before she looks up to the starlight, "… love the scientist, hold her truly dearly within his heart, there is someone, someone far more dear than anyone else to the soldier, that was gravely hurt by her actions' ripples, her refusal to consider other outcomes." She says, somber, colder. Again, looking up to the stars as the last threads of shooting stars vanish from sight, I can only walk step by step closer, until I reach her side and see her softly squinted eyes as she gives out a tired, exhausted chuckle. "After all, it is ironic. She desired to achieve order, to gain the means to prevent ruin, yet failed to understand what laid in his heart. She had it in the palm of her hands, the unwavering devotion of his soul. And she threw it away, in her quest for… absolute allegiance to her devised ideal. Heartache, hatred, and hope. It is hauntingly amazing, beautiful perhaps, how such opposing emotions can be held in unison towards a single person," she says, admiring the strokes of the shooting stars, the minute flare in the sky as two comets collide.

"What are you even talking about? I don't- You're not making any sense. It's true that she didn't listen to his warning, about how he felt about the memory recovery, but in the end she grew truly-"

"And that refusal to listen caused the beasts you saw in the forest to be born within his deepest reaches. That dismissal, the deafness towards anything she might deem an inconvenience, a threat to her desired future, or a pointless concern. You already know Shirogane-san well enough, there are a few, only a tiny few things that can truly tip the scale of his heart towards open aggression. The echoes you've heard should be enough for you to piece this puzzle together, young Yashiro," she says, then starts walking again.

"Someone dear to him was hurt, and he can't forgive the Professor for that? So whenever she becomes fully cold and doesn't listen, it reminds him of that?"

"More or less. If you had an ill experience in a relationship, you'd certainly be more reticent to tolerate similar behaviors as the ones that ingrained suffering into your soul."

"Well, I suppose. Then, is that someone… who the white rabbit is meant to represent?"

"… Who knows?" she shrugs, slowly looking back at me in the same cold facade. "In any case, what we may think matters little. Only the soldier can decide how to handle his feelings, his guilt and frustration at the indifference of the silence."

"Um…" Unable to meet her gaze, I gulp in nothingness. "Is there anything I could do to help him? Do you know what could stop these nightmares he's having?"

"… Time. Give him time, and silence. Stand by him, and do not pressure him regardless of his choice. A cruel word from you, even if small from your point of view, could truly harm him much."

"Huh? Why would I ever say anything-"

"You could," she looks back, sighing. "Do not lose your temper, regardless of his choice. And if you value him, truly value him, then give him a shoulder to lean on. In the reality you face, few are the people that would allow him to show weakness. And I also doubt he'd be comfortable, allowing himself to 'being weak'."

"… Just that? Is that all I can really do for him?" All I'm good for is just to stand on the sidelines? All he does for me, and I can't even-

Again, she pats my head. Smiling, she chuckles. "It is no small gesture. Does him being by you hold no meaning in your heart?"

"N-No! Takeru-san is my friend! I… I…"

"Then, you know how much it should mean, to have at least one person close by," she says, giving me one last rub on my hair before turning around.

"But is there nothing that can save him from those nightmares? If it hurts him much, then-"

"Salvation," she says, frowning, frosting, "is no longer available to him, for it would equal erasing who the soldier is, all that he has lived through. If amnesia and blissful ignorance equals salvation, then Heaven is no different than a comatose dream. You might as well say that he can only reach peace in the vastness of death."

"I never- I didn't mean to say that- Then, are you implying he's destined to just keep on suffering?"

"Learning to manage his emotions in front of the shadows he has lived through is a struggle he must endure. It would be easy if he could merely forget it all, yet life isn't as forgiving, is it?" Slowing down a bit, again she looks up, into the starry skyline. Compacting both shoulders, she then taps her lower lips. "Healing, on the other hand, perhaps is not yet beyond his possibilities."

"… Is that so?"

She nods, not turning around, continuing her advance as I follow after. As an elevation comes up, as we walk uphill and my steps wane, she remains looking back, ensuring I do not lose my way. The steepness of the terrain makes it hard to traverse it quickly, it feels as if this hill's inclination were rising and rising the more we walk. The cold wind only makes this harder, even if the illumination of the stars above guide us through the desolate wasteland.

"Um, miss?"

"Yes?"

"How do you, well, know of Takeru-san? You said you're an observer but-"

"Matters not, does it?"

"But how did you manage to dive into his mind?"

"… I merely observe, waiting."

"Waiting for what?"

"… I don't know, truly." Again, her steps wane to the point I can catch up. She remains watching the stars, whispering. "I simply wanted to return the favor, to honor a promise."

"A promise? Did you… knew the Takeru-san of this world?"

"In a way, you could say," she chuckles, again playing with her hair.

"Um… Is he truly as violent as everyone says he is?" I ask, almost stuttering, tongue pressed against the back of my teeth.

"You saw the dark armed dragon, that should be enough," she replies, immediately. "In any case, it seems we are here already."

"Here?"

Hurrying to clear the last part of the hill, a line of asphalt comes into view. The road near the base, the road towards the gate, the trees that stand on the side… except, the ground is missing. Instead of showing even terrain and the base at the distance, only the way up the hill remains intact. The rest has crumbled away, an abyss opening on it. However, there isn't darkness below. Stars and constellations, cyclones of the cosmos swirl both under the road and above in the skyline.

"What is this place? Where does this road go?"

"It is the deepest sanctum of his mind," she says, standing by me, pulling me away from the edge of the ground. "This road shall lead you to the core of the soldier's mind. There, you should be able to find him, his current self."

"I see… What should we do once we find him?"

"Merely limit yourself to simply talk with him, and he shall decide how to proceed."

"Wait, you are not accompanying me?"

She shakes her head, placing some of her hair behind an ear. "I already did what I came to. Guiding you to this place is all I should do."

"You… don't want to talk with Takeru-san?"

She closes her eyes, lips pressing onto each other. "I have already interfered enough. If he is to awaken, you should be the one who spurs such a decision."

"Is that so? Um, thank you, for guiding me here. I, well-"

"There is no need for thankfulness," she says, giving me a small nod. "Simply be careful of your words, and accept his choice regardless of your views on it. Well then," she turns around, giving me a glance, "I shall be taking my leave here."

"Um… Why do you not want to see him? I mean, you could come with and let me talk. If you truly-"

"Because I gave up," she says, spits out, as she fully turns around. "I did not believe, I simply chose to forget, to accept. Unlike the one who remained seeking, waiting for a shooting star, I have no right to see him now. Furthermore, I've lingered enough," she looks at me, giving me a smile. "Best of luck. Cherish these moments you now live, what little time you have left by his side, young Yashiro."

"… W-What? What is that supposed to mean?"

"Only what I said, and only that," she nods, still smiling as she turns around, pacing down the hill. "Look after Shirogane-san. He needs it, more than he thinks."

I try to follow after, a strong wind blows. An arm covers my sight, enduring the gale, yet when I lower it and open my eyes, I find no one around. Walking back to the edge of the hill, she is nowhere in sight.

"… What did she even mean? Sigh… Cryptic until the very end, how rude."

Still… To remain with him, isn't that what I always do? Or, perhaps, she meant more than physically? After all, despite being right besides him, I did not take notice of the hurting he was enduring. I did… not try and stop the Professor, offer another point of view, despite sensing the pain and conflict that within him swirled before our last recovery session.

And… to cherish the time left. Was that a warning? Why would it be one? Who was she even?

"Sigh… She didn't even give me her name. All she left me with are more questions… You suck, miss."

Turning around, taking a deep breath in, I walk up into the road available. Raising to meet the stars, the street goes in a direct line unlike the one in the base. The sakura trees by the side have an iron beam dug into the ground right besides them, for some reason. All of them have an item right in front of them by their roots. A small slice of cake, a spinning top, a shuriken, the small juice box that many pilots hate, a bottle of alcohol, a violin, a basketball-

Noise in my ears, pain below them. Figments flash through my sight, something red filling a control room, a talk with the Captain of the Valkyries, one of the younger ones using her seniority to order Takeru-san to leave somewhere, the aggressive one asking him to tell the rest how 'cool' she was until the end. Something swirls in my stomach, holding it I cough a bit, hurrying past them.

Another tree to my left, a bowl with an unnecessarily large portion of rice. A flash of Kyouzuka-san handing him the extra large serving, along a strong pat on his back. Followed by a hand stretching itself out, missing Kyozuka-san's for a hair. Rain hits his face like a machinegun as he watches the tempest of the ocean swallow her in a second, the raging fury of that oceanic collapse. The scream that follows is enough to fully eclipse Poseidon's rage, enough to shred his throat apart.

By the next iron beam to my right, a small envelope, a letter. Words of encouragement, coming from the Instructor. On a rooftop, in the hallways, a soft and repeated pat as he cries onto her thighs, further warmth comes from that voice as his sight remains locked on the ground by the broken TSF. I try and hurry past it, yet that gruesome end still reaches me. Followed by a harsh, dead-serious expression as she aims a gun at him, someone saying it's okay for him to die if she is restrained.

Almost tripping with a hole in the ground, barely balancing myself on a single leg, my hands meet the rusted iron that rests besides the next tree. The plush toy with large eyebrows lays its back onto the bark. The gurgling goo comes back, a blackened figure being taken away in a gurney, lips pursed along a flushed face as he taps her eyebrows as they lay side by side under the sheets. And the echo, the shaking of an explosion within a hive's corridor.

Recoiling away as if touching an oven, I stumble back. Hitting another tree, stepping onto a yakisoba sandwich. Another explosion, another gurney, his hearing ringing, and the pressure of a hug as both rest on the tree by the hill, feeding each other one of those sandwiches as snow gently falls down.

Hurrying away, gasping, I rush through the trees. The one with a pair of boots, the one with a pot of flowers, the sounds of electric shocks, the crushed and tainted strands of hair, the crying shape as they wave goodbye to a small kitty, the giggle as she falls on top of him from a tree's branch.

However, my escaping rush gradually comes to a full stop as I see a small rabbit. A rabbit in a Santa Claus costume that hangs from the iron beam, like the one Takeru-san brought from his world, that's hanging near the cylinder. Slowly, hesitantly, I drag myself past it. Closing my eyes and pressing both hands on my ears does nothing, the falling basketball ring still comes into sight, the still figure in a pod and a hospital bed flash through. As does a moment of complaining from Sumika-san about sauce, before both simply eat together, alternating the add-on of choice.

Hugging my shoulders and taking deep breaths, what's ahead is that sword he had on him resting by the tree. Walking besides this tree causes my neck to hurt, to burn. A face drenched in red, a pleading voice. A rumbling that follows, a light that blinds. A figure clad in a white dress that wishes to cry as he shouts at it that he is here for her, a smile that embraces him as both roll in the snow. And a distorted stare, clad in strong purple, that oozes violence as it towers over him, aiming… that same sword to his neck.

My knees meet the asphalt, skin turning pink, small stains left below. Taking repeated short breaths, rubbing my neck from the collar bone to my chin does little to calm down the spike that drills my lungs. Crawling, I try and get away from that tree.

Only to shiver, seeing the collapsed woman in the kitchen again, the letter of death resonating in my ears. A tree with picture books and what I assume are game consoles lays nearby, flashes of small arguments and games flash through my eyes. Ending on a discussion in the living room, him punching his father into a wall. And a prayer, a prayer that echoes as I stand up. A whimpering voice that looks back at his house, wishing for them to remain safe and sound, hoping to one day return.

Sighing, wiping the dampness in my eyes, the blurriness does not release my sight. I turn around and wipe my forehead, slow steps forward. Only to twitch and stop again. Because Mister Bun lays resting on the next tree, its eyes looking back at me, a white cloth tied on its arm for some reason.

Gulping again on nothingness, I waddle and halt, I inch closer and stop. Taking in a sharp breath, I slap both of my cheeks and hit the ground, rushing forward.

The rocket, the moment by Sumika-san in the pod, an odd scene with stars hanging from the cylinder as he hands me a small box, me waking him up like always, the seashell he gifts me, a talk by the hill, a promise to one day take to see the ocean. And yet another memory, as he looks back…

His eyes discover frown, a side glance. A frosting, dry ice tone that follows.

" Coward."

" Cough!" Almost hitting both feet together, I hug my stomach, tight, tightly, tighter. "I… I didn't say that! I would never-"

" Coward."

"That's not me! I wouldn't be so cruel…"

Clamping my ears, I run and run. Images and sounds flash before me, the burning of Hakuryo, the damaged Kyoto, a quivering hand that takes on a purple tint handing him that large red scarf he had at one point, someone showing him a red car, a gaze of turquoise promising to teach him about swordplay.

Rushing through it all, gasping for air, I stop as I see one last tree before wilderness and grass claim the asphalt. A tree with a large stack of papers, a Santa hat, and some odd glasses nearby.

Resting my palm against the bark, the scent of alcohol surrounds me. Resisting the urge to cough, the sunken shape, the crushed gaze that meets his lips… is nothing like I know the Professor to be.

Until it changes, to the rooftop of the base. And while wearing a rather revealing set of clothes…

" How do you think Marimo felt as she was thrown headfirst into that meat grinder?!"

I… can't breathe. Lungs burn, his sight grows distorted. Lips hurt, much, very much.

" You're even worse than those BETA you spoke of. You could doom billions to their deaths."

"T-That's… The Professor wouldn't- She wouldn't-"

" Marimo died because of you!"

Running away, away from the echoes of the one dressed as I know, of the offering of a gun, of an acceptance over killing soldiers, of them being worthless. Chased by the voice that grows even more cold, I lose my balance, my face meets the grass. Hitting it as I raise, groaning as I wipe my tears, hiccuping for a moment as I rub my arms, something else enters my sight.

Below the twister and brushes of stars, there is a tree. A large tree, like the one on the hill near the base. Illuminated by the kaleidoscope of constellations, the peak of this place, the end of the road finally enters my sight. My feet tickled by the grass, slowly I approach the peak, the tree. And alongside the full extend of stars that fill my sight, a blue shirt rests against the bark. Long hair of light brown, and eyes that remain on the sky.

One step, perhaps two. The shape grows defined, clear.

Three steps, maybe five. The brown of his trousers, the slouched posture, the shape of his chin and arms all matches what I know.

Stopping a few feet away, seeing the white bunny resting atop his thighs, my lips part, close, twist and bend, press themselves together. A shiver on my arms, another step forward as both hands come together, fingers interlock.

"… T-Takeru-san?"

Slowly, gradually, belatedly, he turns his head towards me. A neutral expression, slack and tired expression, is in his face. He says nothing, simply staring at me. The bunny flaps its ears, looking my way then slumping back as Takeru-san continues to pet it.

And he simply looks at me. In silence, scanning me, watching.

"U-Um… You do recognize me, right Takeru-san?" My voice quivers as I take a step forward, as he remains silently staring. "Uh, um…"

"Are you alright?" He finally asks.

"Eh? Ah, yes, I'm unhurt. Um, you do know who I am, right?"

"Yeah, Dersh Bnnuy, the Mighty," he says, chuckling softly.

I don't know if I want to smile, laugh or chop his shoulder right now. Slowly getting closer, sitting by his side, welcoming the bunny as it demands head pats from me, I look and find him again staring at the shifting constellations in front, all around us. "Um, are you feeling well, Takeru-san?"

"Kind of," he merely whispers. "Uh, are you just a part of this dream or-"

"I'm the real Kasumi," I say, feeling my limiters flapping for a moment.

"For real? Since when can you psychodive into people's mind?" He asks, raising a brow.

"Huh? I… don't know. I can always scan people's thoughts but, well, this is the first time I could perform a proper mind dive. I cannot confirm whether this is normal or not," I say, resting on the tree, huddling closer.

"I see…" Grimacing, he again gazes at me silently. Before he reaches out and pats my head. "Sorry, you must have," looking down, biting his lips, "seen a lot of shit on the way here."

"Uh, well, yes… Takeru-san, what I saw, those memories, were they all real?"

A slow nod, as slow as his finger drop through my cheek to my chin, as his hand flops back to the grass. "Yes, I think. All you must have seen… No, all we both saw as we walked was real at one point for me."

"As we- Wait, you were the child and the guard?!"

"Yeah. I was adorable when I was little, right?" He chuckles, the rabbit rubbing itself against his chest, demanding further kindness. "But yeah, I kind of recall how we walked through my… memories. Sorry, you really should have left after… what you saw in my house."

"… D-Do you want me to leave?"

He pets my head, the bunny grumbles as it looks at me. "No, didn't mean it like that. You didn't need to put yourself at risk, seeing all the shit I've had to endure. You're really fine after all that?"

"Yes, somehow. Um… Were those memories what your nightmares are about?"

He sighs, retracting his hand, the bunny continues to angrily stare at me before it gives a munch to the air. "Sort of. All that remains when I wake up is a sketch, a paragraph, a piece of the whole along the cold hands that clasp onto my shoulders."

"I see. So then, um, we have to return to reality. The Professor is really worried about you slipping to another world."

"I see…"

"And I honestly don't know how much time has passed, so I think you should try to wake up, Takeru-san."

The bunny grumbles, thumping then letting out a pained growl. He pets the white fur, remaining silent as he steals gazes, then once more seeks the stars. "I see."

"Um… Don't you want to wake up?"

A moment passes, silence extends. Under the stars and the wind, he closes his eyes.

"It ain't like I don't know the risks. But I don't feel like just now."

"… Are you upset with the Professor?"

"Huh?"

"I mean, that lady said you could, well, hate her…"

"Wait, what lady?"

"You know, that lady in the office suit that helped me get through the forest."

"… Again, what lady?"

"Huh? You don't know? I mean, she had hair and eyes like mine, so she was an ESPer. Who was she, by the way?" I ask, staring, inching closer.

His eyes narrow as his lips barely open, the bunny groans a bit. "Kasumi, you're the only ESPer I ever met as far as I recall."

"Then, who was that lady?"

"I dunno. But no, I don't hate Yuuko. Why do you think that?" He asks, narrowing both brows.

"Well, in the forest…" I tell him of what happened there, his complexion darkens and tightens as I do. "So she said love and hate are sides of the same coin, and that you were hurt much by the Professor. I, well, heard her say some cruel things to you as I passed a tree with an iron beam on the way here… So, well-"

"I don't hate her, per se. It does…" his lips curl inwards, the fingers over the bunny sink into the fur, "unnerve me, how she acts when the Vice Commander takes over. I know she has to do what she has to for the project but, well, I know looking for other solutions ain't beyond her."

Gulping on nothingness again, I pull the edge of his shirt. "Do you believe her to be mistaken, then?"

"No one is right one hundred percent of the time, Kasumi."

"But the project… You know it can be successful if-"

"If everything goes perfectly and in our favor. And even then, that doesn't mean it's the best thing for the future." He sighs, grimacing, looking up, hugging the bunny. "What is of that world as of now? You should know as well as I do that the only thing preventing Yuuko's research to be militarized in a large scale is her guarding hold over it. Imagine what will be of the future when she's caged as she was in my first loops, when the military starts getting access to loads of G-Elements, new mass-produced versions of the XG line." Breathing in sharply, curling inwards, she subtly shakes. "Imagine what they'll do to research and manufacture new 00 Units."

"But… But the war… But she's-"

"You saw the wasteland, right? You heard… the echoes of Iceberg, right? Those are the results the pigs up above created back then, when they refused to veer away from their stupid plans despite Yuuko's warnings. Even as I supported her to try and wrestle some sense into the UN, nothing changed in the end. Sure, you can fix and mend some stuff at the lower level, but the big picture… was already set in stone." Sighing sharply, unable to lift a crumbling gaze he cannot repair, harvested by the Reaper. "Now imagine what would happen, what is happening over there in that world now. Would you leave your future to people who plot and devise 'accidents' for their own benefit, that shift common policies to make it seem they are the fruits of their accomplishments?" He punches the grass, the white bunny groans in agreement, nuzzling itself against his belly. "Even if, somehow, they avoid the fucking mess of Iceberg in that timeline… It's a matter of time before an idiot tries to start another war. All it takes is a terrorist getting inside an XG…" His eyes gaze at me, falling, falling and burning like a shooting star. "I assume you saw… the time when I had to shoot the particle cannon on Meiya, r-right?"

"… Yes. I do not think any less of you for anything I've seen, Takeru-san," I say, placing a hand on the back of his head, bringing him closer, resting my chin on his shoulder. "Do you think that world is in danger?"

"Either it is, or it will be. Sigh… Imagine Babylon but with XGs and particle cannons. All it takes is an idiot with too much power, a struggle in Europe over natural resources or the G-Elements of the recovered hives, or even here in Asia thanks to the march of a triumphant Empire and the issues that might cause for war to spark up. And… you saw what the UN did during the invasion, so I can't fully trust them either."

"… So you don't want to come back?"

"Sigh… I wanna think, Kasumi." He leans into me, the bunny sitting between us. "I honestly don't know what to do anymore. I gotta be part of the system if I wanna be heard, I get it, but no one will agree to not use Yuuko's research for military developments, and no way in hell we can stop production of war armaments with the G-Elements that will be recovered after we start Alt IV. Siiigh…"

"But, um, couldn't you… negotiate with the Shogun? I know the purple puppy ended up turning into a wolf but, surely she could still be an ally to you?"

"… I doubt it."

"Why? Because her posture on the war differs from yours? Or… because you don't want to… do the same as the Swordbreakers did?"

"This isn't only about the war anymore."

"Eh? Why?"

"You… saw it, didn't you? How my world was, how the wasteland was. You didn't notice any similarities?" He asks, hunching over.

"I don't understand. What are you worried about?"

"Well… To put it simply, the Yuuko from my world warned me about something when I was about to start the transfer. And the highway has remained open, it still is as we speak."

"What highway? You mean the conductor?"

"The ripples of it, to be exact," he sighs, playing with my hair, tone lowering. "At first I didn't think anything of it, I assumed things were just like that in this world. But the similarities are too strong, and on this trip down memory lane I only get more and more certain of it. That this world is, for some reason, being affected by the leaks."

Blinking as I gape, the puzzle shifts, the pieces scatter. "Wait a moment, the world?"

"Yeah. Everybody here is far more nationalistic then before. Like they were in the worlds where Alt IV failed and the US-Japan Security Treaty was reinstated, as it was… after the Babylon Disaster. Even my… situation as Yuuhi's stepbrother, as part of a special task force, and a member of the IRG. It is all an echo, a perfect mirror match to things that have happened before to me."

"But… But the past cannot be changed, and any divergence due to causality must be born from an intense desire in the first place. Wait, Takeru-san, you… were in the Royal Guard before?"

He shrugs, giving me that twisted gesture that does not resemble a smile. "It feels like, for some reason. There's…" he rubs his neck, the bunny tries to climb up his arm, falling due to the wound on its leg. He takes the loaf in an embrace, looking back to the sky, eyes dampening. "There's a memory where I see Meiya aiming a Minaru Kamui at my neck, another when I'm storming a Reactor alongside Shiranuis, Raptors, and Takemikazuchis. And then, the uniform that I see on my arms ain't from the UN." He sighs, rubbing his forehead, rubbing it slowly, hitting the bark with the back of his head. "And those memories feel like a living hell."

"And you're afraid those emotions could… leak into the people of our world?"

"If they haven't already. There are many differences the world you live in has to the one I was looping in. If, somehow, data from the unlimited amount of failed worlds was seeping through the highway for who knows how long, anyone with a strong enough desire might have triggered a leak. And that can continue to happen… with events that could very well screw us over, badly."

Leaves, dry leaves begin to flutter from the tree. Some in yellow, some in red, all swirling on the air, falling and falling.

"Um, so, you think the project is in danger?"

"No, not really. I doubt Yuuko could be stopped this late into the game. That," he sighs, patting the bunny that then grumbles, "is the main problem."

"Huh? What are you talking about?"

"… What date was back in reality, Kasumi?"

"December 3rd, I believe."

"Well, let's just say there's an… incident coming up, an incident that…" he gulps, shivering as some leaves fall upon his head, "I don't know if I can prevent."

Rubbing his arm, feeling the coldness through the blue fabric, I grip and pull. "You're not alone, Takeru-san. The Professor will assuredly-
"

"Yuuko ain't helping me this time."

"Huh?"

"I doubt she'd agree, all things considered. And even if she keeps her word, if she ends up helping me safeguard my world…" lost in the stars, showered by their light, small hints of fire seep through his eyes, "that won't erase the lingering echoes of those failed worlds that are already present in reality."

"Don't call them failures, Takeru-san," pulling at his arm, I pout into his eyes. The bunny thumps and groans in agreement, headbutting his hand. "You did manage to save your… beloved, right?"

"… Sigh. I guess." Not lifting his cheer, still hunched over and completely void, his aura remains neutral.

"And you're… not alone now. The Professor is your ally, I'm sure that if you explain this to her, she'll find a way to help you."

The rabbit again munches the air, sends me flinching away. He pets it, leaving his hand on the head, scratching the ears. "I don't think she will."

"Why?"

"… Because Yuuko only saw me as an ally after she lost everything. The Vice Commander never let me into her decisions, and truth be told, she might choose to leave the conductor open so that she can research it. It is, after all, her life's goal to understand causality."

"But you could, uh, talk with the Shogun to-"

"Kasumi," he says, colder, frowning, "you saw it. Yuuhi doesn't exist anymore."

Shivering, looking down, gripping my dress, not looking up even when he pets my head. "Why? Why are you being this negative?"

"It reminds me of," voice cracks, fades, folds, "those memories after Iceberg." Looking up, I find a single tear running down his cheek. "Meiya chose the Shogunate over me in that world. Instead of trusting and relying on me as she did back in my home world, she decided to serve the Shogunate. That's why, I think, I joined the IRG. To try and protect her, even if stuff went wrong between us." He sighs again, hugging the bunny that licks his chin. "And I ain't blaming her or anything, it's her life. But love is a two-player game, and devoting your whole life, placing your trust in someone that sees you… as nothing but a piece on a board…" shaking and quivering as if under snow, his skin is truly cold to the touch, dry even. It takes a moment for his breathing to stabilize, yet his eyes remain shut. "I made that same mistake in this world, again. Yuuhi was… all I had left, like in that world. But she didn't, she doesn't see me as anything but a pawn."

"Did you see memories of the Swordbreakers, then?"

Slowly nodding, features tighten. "Not just small flashes either. Their relation… was nothing but business. Even during a meeting with a guy I think I recognize while a storm was raging, all she was worried about was her standing and the alliance she had. Made me so mad I almost choked her then and there."

"Huh?! Y-You what? Why?"

"Sigh… You know, I think I knew I had gone through that shit at one point, subconsciously," he says, shrugging. "But even as I look after her, it feels so fake. All she wanted out of the oath was my services, and nothing else."

"But… But she argued with the Professor a lot! I do think she… might still want to see you."

"Yuuhi or Her Highness?"

"Huh? Aren't they the same person?" I ask, tilting my head.

He chuckles, ruffling my hair. "Not at all, little bun. It's kind of like with Yuuko and the Vice Commander, one might be cold but always has your back while the other won't hesitate to backstab you and throw you down a flight for her own gains."

"The Professor isn't- She isn't-"

"Kasumi," he holds my head, drawing circles on my scalp, "you and me both know Yuuko doesn't give a single shit about what stands in her way. Why would she or Her Highness take my side, hear me out even? When pitted against a high noble, an influential person that can be a tailwind for their dreams… It's obvious who will they choose. That's why… I don't think I have any allies back there."

"… You have me."

"Huh?"

I pull, and grip, and squeeze his arm, over and over. Unable to breath in, just holding his gaze, "You have me."

"Sigh…" Smiling, he pats my head. "You know I can't force you to go against Yuuko, Kasumi."

"But I'm your friend."

"Sumika needs you more than I do. Plus, I doubt there's anything we can do this late into the game."

"Please, tell me why you think that," still pulling at his arm, feeling a pit in my stomach start to grow. "What is this incident you speak of?"

"… Something rather convenient, similar yet different to an incident that happened in my first loops. At first, I thought it was something we could prevent, that we had to prevent… but Yuuko might disagree."

"Why?"

"For the sake of Alt IV, to bring stability and predictability to the Empire. That's why I wanna think, reflecting on everything I've gone through," he says, looking back into the swirling stars.

The cyclones reflect shards, images, as if the skyline were made out of glass that was breaking. Parts of the images I saw while traveling alongside his child self, the festivals, the games, the tender moments, the happiness he had along his squadmates, all of that shimmers within the constellations. That multicolored thread, the halo that upon us showers its shine, deeper within the luster of days past, bubbles and what off them is reflected.

"As I am now, I can't really change anything," he says, low, rubbing the bunny. "I don't think I can put my all behind Yuuko or Yuuhi. I don't wanna live a life in servitude if it's gonna end on that madness again. I… need to save someone, Kasumi. Prove to myself I can make a positive difference."

Slowly, he stands up. Walking up to the edge, extending a hand, grasping, clawing at what within the cosmos shines. Tightening his fist, the rabbit climbing onto his shoulder as I reach his side.

"It would be easy, to snap as I did when Marimo-chan died, as I did… after Shura's Dance. But really, there is no one to blame now. I do get it, they're safeguarding their own lives, betting on a guaranteed result."

"That's not true! Takeru-san, you're not some asset," again pulling his hand, I plead and grip.

He shakes his head. "If I have a bad return of investment, I'll be discarded, forgotten. Just as Meiya did in my other lives. Life goes on, with or without me."

"But if you remembered then, why do you refuse to come back? You could… well, parley with the Shogun, even if she doesn't agree with your feelings. You could warn the Professor of what you believe is happening due to the conductor. And of whatever this incident is, and to help Sumika-san… and even then, you're not merely a pawn."

Again, softly rubbing my hair, smiling, pulling me closer, his hand patting a shoulder as he hugs me with an arm. "Thanks. But Yuuhi has no reason to place her standing at risk over a peasant when a successful man with the approval of the people exists, as like Meiya did back then. Yuuko has no reason to keep compromising her project over a nobody that has next to nothing else to give her, compared to the support of the Empire and the IRG."

"Huh? You… You mean to say you wish to go against-"

"Kasumi, with how silly I am with names and songs, do you think I chose the name 'Swordbreakers' lightly when appointed as the Captain-in-Chief? You do remember the odd song we heard during a memory recovery, right?"

"Wait, so he liked to sing as you do?"

He chuckles, playing with my ear. "There's no 'him', Kasumi."

"So it was… you all along?"

"Always has been, looks like, feels like."

"But you're not as aggressive as him, or as that dark armed dragon," I say, wrapping a hand over him.

"What dragon?"

"Huh? Ah, well, while I was traversing a forest where… your darkest memories lie, I saw a Takeru-san in there, all wounded and hurt. But when the fox tried to harm me, he turned into a dark armed dragon and started to fight her off."

He raises a brow, then chuckles. "Heh, that sounds metal as fuck. So I'm a dragon, huh," he laughs quietly, the bunny groaning a bit. "That does sound better than a blossom, to be honest."

"Blossom?"

"Oh, someone once compared me to a flower," he scratches the back of his head, giving a small smile that could counter the brightness of the stars around us. "But, well, all I know to do is shut up and move on. Dull myself," he brings me closer, voice fading, "push onward and do whatever I can. I think… I was blind back then."

"Blind how? In anger?"

"No, not really. Working to protect her, the only person I thought I had left, doing what I could to support, complement her actions. But in the end," he sighs, heavy yet short, "it was all just part of a play in a chessboard. I don't…" voice quivers, his hand on me enforces its hold, his breathing growing erratic, "I don't want to live like that ever again. Left with no choice but to keep serving, eating out of the hand of those who left your comrades and beloved ones to die as pigs."

"But you're not alone," wrapping both hands around him, I return the intense hold. "Why do you think that?"

"Because the answer I came up with, the only answer I see for this jigsaw puzzle… takes me away from my peace," returning the hug, the white bunny groans in discontent, nuzzling itself against his face until he pets it. "I know it's the mature thing to do, to move on and act with the cards you're dealt… Sigh."

Slowly threading his hair in between my fingers, rubbing his head, I shake my own. "Takeru-san, please. We're still here, we're your allies. I know… the Professor can grow cold when it comes to her project… but she was really angry when you fell unconscious."

"Because she lost a valuable asset, nothing else."

"… Why? Why won't you believe in her?!"

"Because… the Yuuko that saw me as an ally was the one who lost everything, Kasumi. The one you know has no emotional connection to that world, to those feelings, has no reason to value me as that Yuuko did. She is more like the one I met last loop, it'd be wrong of me to expect her to have any patience towards a hesitant idiot," he says, shoulders sagging, bunny groaning.

"… Even then, you have me. And Sumika-san, too. Please, let's go back home…" holding his gaze, gripping him, his eyes scan me silently for a moment, then another.

"… By the by Kasumi, do you know who this white rabbit is?"

"Huh?" My eyes go to the little thing, that groans a bit. "No, I've no idea. You don't either?"

"Not really. But, for some reason, I like holding it close," he says, smiling while scratching the ears, the back of the bunny's head, who then rolls in his hold. "It kind of reminds me of when I was little, of why I am here. I wanna strike a balance, save my world and try to prevent more shit to happen in the world we're in now. Even if I haven't saved anyone thus far, even if my player two doesn't reach out, the least I can do is not fall back to living solely for another, placing all the responsibility on their shoulders. So for now, I wanna think some more."

"You… You won't come back?" He shakes his head. "But… But the Professor is… Your mind might-"

Placing a finger over my lips, he smiles. "I'm very slow, Kasumi. It takes me a lot to reach a decision, and I don't wanna rush this. So, the first step is to try and remember who this little bugger is," he say, giving pats to the rabbit.

"I… I can help you with that, I can bring the memory-"

"No, I have to do this on my own."

"W-Why? Do you not trust in me?"

"Sigh… Yuuko will demand to know what you scan, and I can't risk getting you against her. You've already seen too much, and frankly I think she might choose to pull the plug on me after you report what you've been through here."

"That's not- She wouldn't do that! The Professor was very- She's waiting for you to come back, please." Again, I pull his arm. Again, he shakes his head. "Why? Why, Takeru-san?"

"Because this, the chaos you saw, is my battlefield," he then looks up to the starry kaleidoscope, at the faint glimmers of happiness that shine through. Taking in a sharp breath, his features tighten, firm orange glows around him, along small traces of red. "And if I cannot choose how to live my life, then I'm as good as dead."

Fire surges forth from the brink, a tidal wave of dark blazes cover the skyline. The shapes of the forest, of the ruins, searing and screaming, faces folding, falling, fading upon one another. Merely standing in its presence is enough to have my eyes squint under the heat's impact.

"T-Takeru-san, please stop! You don't have to go through that again!"

"… I don't even remember that all that well, you know."

"Huh?"

He continues in a monotone, observing the waves as they keep rising and clashing against the edge. "Too many faces I seem to recognize, yet no name comes up. It happens in my dreams, seeing an old friend, unable to remember their name, or anything at all. Waking up while hugging the air, left with nothing but a sad gaze lingering in the back of my head."

"But that's in the past. You don't have to fall into that horrible abyss again," I try to reach out, end up recoiling at the heat that he somehow endures.

"It doesn't look horrible to me. Everyone says the abyss is evil or some shit… but all I see are hands seeking anyone, anyone to pull them up from the silence. And, how was that saying? The people that forget their history are doomed to repeat the same mistakes again and again?" He asks, tilting his head. "Well, I already fucked up my shot while I was in this world before, whatever the reason I was reset like in my world again. Because I couldn't remember, so I did it again," he laughs, running a hand into his hair, eyes closing as he takes in a sharp breath. "And I know what happens when I run away."

He takes a step forward, his figure growing blurry amidst the fire.

"So I'm gonna return the abyss' stare, and go down there to give it a hug, pat its back. After all, I've abandoned those memories because I couldn't deal with 'em. All those versions of me have left… is me."

Screaming, yelling, my voice doesn't seem to reach him. A spiral of fire surrounds him, he looks back with a smile.

"This is my war, against myself. I won't get another chance to face myself, to try and change the road causality wants to integrate into the world. Thanks for worrying Kasumi, but this dense idiot needs a bit more time. So for now…"

Standing up, trying to reach him, my hand meets the air. Takeru-san vanishes from my sight, the ground starts to get tilted. Losing my balance, I meet the grass but start to slip off it, falling. Clawing at the grass, nothing meets my feet as they extend and search for stable ground. Up above, the flickers of flame, the shifting cosmos remains. At the distance, a hand raises to wave at me… as the Gekishin did in that memory I saw.

"You've seen enough. This is my burden to bear, my own actions are what screwed up my future after all."

"That's not true! You're not guilty of anything, Takeru-san!"

"Thanks, for real. But Sumika and Yuuko need you more than I. So… don't lie to the Vice Commander once you wake up. With some luck, I'll follow right after you."

The ground shakes, stronger and stronger, violent and fierce. Flares of black, threads of stars swirl and rotate in my view. Free falling, surrounded by sparks and bubbles, the kaleidoscope, the silhouette of the tree grows distant. Typhoons of fire engulf it all, stars and meteors picked up by the current.

"See you later, Kasumi."

Explosions reverberate, the hill folds and fades like origami, like leaves dancing to the wind. It all grows small, sinking into a dark hole surrounded by a halo of meteors and cyclones of stars.

Descending and descending, I cannot fight the tide, the pull. Like a single droplet that falls of a leaf. Shining for a single moment, before it forever fades into the ground.

---

Around Three Years ago from the present time.

[Takeru]

---

Softness surrounds me, quietness.

Where am I?

I don't… feel anything. It's as if I were suspended in a void, neither cold nor warm. Where am I? I can barely feel my body, the pleasant cushy sensation under me. How weird… The alarm didn't wake me up, but I feel the sun's warmth on me. There are no windows in my bunk, so what gives?

Can't open my eyes. I… can somehow breathe? Or… Do I feel air coming into me? How strange. What was I doing before? When did I fall asleep? Yeah, I was… tending to the office, looking after the shelter… I already had left dinner ready, too. Hmm… Is it my day off duties today? If it isn't Raiho-san is gonna murder me for real today.

But no matter how much I try, my eyes give no fucks about it and remain closed, my arms refuse to budge. Am I so stressed I'm completely spent? I gotta get up, fast. If I'm late… More shouts, more screams. I'm already a burden, I gotta try harder… If I don't-

KNOCK ! BANG !

KNOCK ! BANG !

Wait… What's that sound? Someone is… pounding a door like a bull. What force, however, to make that echoing sound. Ugh… How rude can someone be, and that's coming from me.

" Wake uuup! Takeru-chan, wake up! And open this damn door!"

… Huh?

Sumi… ka?

Somehow, I felt a cold shiver on me. As if my heart had being struck by a dart. Only to then be followed by thousand more.

It's a lie. A joke. Sumika is… She didn't make it out of Hakuryo. Why am I… Mmgh! Why can't I open my eyes?! Suspended in a void, struggling to no avail, my body gives me the middle finger and remains slumped.

" Open this door and let me in right this instant! Waah… Why did you use the chain lock?! That's not fair…"

What is she complaining about? A chain lock? Is this… a dream? Where am I? Am I back home? If she's coming to wake me up… But, why would I put a chain lock? I… I wouldn't do that to her, she's a good friend.

And there she starts to pound the door again. I mean, Sumika is pretty strong, not gonna lie, but she's going to destroy the door at this rate. Dream or not, to be able to see her again… I should get up and go open the door before-

" Gah! Cut it out! You're so damn annoying!"

My eyes suddenly opened, and I heard my voice coming out of my mouth.

… But I didn't say anything. What… What is this? What's around me is like my room back home, but more… pristine? It's a bit more…

how to say it… Well decorated? Brilliant, polished? Like, looks good. But it's made a mess. What the hell.

And yet… I can't move. What is this? I can somehow feel my body but… I-I can't move. What is going on here?! Why can't I-

" Indeed… What a commotion."

Huh?

My head turns to my right on its own, and I meet a gaze that rests on the pillow. Yuuhi's sleeping by my side with… almost nothing on her person.

…

W-What… What the hell… She's so close… But she looks so… pure, so calm. As she used to be, before she became the Head of the fellowship. That faint and pure smile… she hasn't given me since then.

" Such a rude awakening can hardly be beneficial to one's mental health. " Yuuhi says, as softly and sweetly as she used to.

Yeah, she always looked so shiny and welcoming. I know we're at war now… and that she won't ever give me this smile, never again. Everyone's been on edge all this time, hoping for things to suddenly turn for the best would be pretty stupid, even by my standards. But, wait a moment. If this is a dream, why does it feel so real then? Why can I smell Yuuhi's hair, feel her warmth by my side? A moment…

Her hair wasn't blue, Yuuhi's hair is purple. Then, is this Meiya? Why would I be sleeping with her? I never even got to meet her face to face. What the hell, yet again.

" Yes, that should do it! Takeru-chan, I'm sure you're awake by now, but I'm still coming to wake you up anyways!" Sumika's far away voice joyfully declares, as Yuu… Meiya seems to be reflecting on something.

What the hell is going on with this dream? Or, was the war the dream? Which is real? And why can't I move?! What is this… Why can't I do anything?! What kind of dream is this, teasing me with my home and not letting me move?!

Sigh…

I somehow can begin to feel my body again, the edge of my fingertips, the taste in my lips. But I seem to be sweating an Arctic ocean as of now, for some reason. My lips trembling, barely managing to squeeze out a sound, but said sound wasn't my words. Well, it still sounds like my voice, but I didn't say anything.

Yuu… Meiya giggles at me, edging closer under the sheets. "Whatever is the matter? You sound as if you had seen a ghost."

Yeah, gee, I wonder why. Damn, she's as sarcastic as Yuuhi.

The stomping rush of Sumika raising up the stairs echoes, my body begins to shiver for a second. I can't understand why… Why is this happening? First, why would I be in a bed with Meiya? I mean, if it were Yuuhi I could… Well, if it were as she was before, maybe.

A vacuum on my stomach, absorbing my warmth like a twister. The smiling face right besides me now only sends further darts into my heart.

Yuuhi, Mion and Shion, Maya-nee and Mana-nee… shoved me away. They made it clear that none of 'em think of me as family anymore, after I disobeyed Yuuhi's order to depart from Hakuryo, to abandon the base and the town. They left me behind, and it feels like it's been a million years since I've seen Yuuhi smile as this Meiya does now. She's now the Shogun so she can't have a 'commoner' being her brother anymore. And Mion, Shion and Maya-nee… are acting like those who were horrible to me and Masahide-san while we helped in the invasion. Maybe they were right, though. I… haven't really managed to help with anything on my own, Raiho-san never stops scolding me, everyone else seems to be ignoring me…

My vision grows dark, for some reason I… or rather, the dream's me brings the blanket over our head. Meiya's face being so close to mine, her body pretty much rubbing against mine, the worries left my head. It's as if… I had gone back to before the terrorist attack. When we could fool around and laugh with the rest. Tension and icebergs slide down my back as Sumika comes up the stairs, but I can't share the emotion.

The bed feels so soft, everything in this dream feels… pleasant, like an old memory. But, anyways, why would I be dreaming of sleeping with Meiya? And to have Sumika coming to wake me up… What an odd dream. Then, am I trying to escape my duties by dreaming of a pleasant time? But, why am I conscious of how awful everything has been lately during the dream? That kind of defeats the point, doesn't it? Goddammit subconscious, you had one job…

… I don't deserve these cuddling dreams. Because of me… All because I wasn't good enough, because I'm still not good enough. How many people, how many battles would have gone differently? Maybe Raiho-san is right… I should have died as Hakuryo burned instead of you…

" Taaaakeeeeruuuu-chaaaan?" Sumika says, an eldritch screech. And again, my chest hurts. Why? I like Sumika a lot.

She gets close and tries to lift the blanket but, understandably, this dream's version of myself is strongly against that. They begin to pull at the blanket, like whenever I didn't want to wake up and she insisted I should anyways.

Hehe… You really looked after me much, Sumika. And in the end, I couldn't even do anything for you. Sigh… Though, dream me is kind of being too rude to her. There is no need to utter such words, especially when she took time off her own schedule to come wake you up. Get out of the bed, you damn slacker! Go and make breakfast with her or something.

… I wish I could go back to those days. It's all because of the stupid authorities that don't do shit when it matters… all because of these binding rules… All because the UN ran away like the damn cowards they are. I know we shouldn't pick a fight but they're just using us at this point. Not that our 'beloved national hero' is any better, though.

And dream me is still arguing with dream Sumika, pulling and pulling at the blanket. It's gonna break, dammit.

" She speaks out of kindness… There is no need to be so harsh." Dream Meiya speaks the truth.

…

Which I think is counterproductive in this situation.

Well, it's just a dream anyways. I do share his shivering this time around, it's just like when Yuuhi sent me to that damn mountain after I flirted with Arisa-san. Which I totally didn't meant to do, just to be clear. The only difference is, I didn't deserve that whereas dream me is, for some questionable reason, sleeping with Meiya and treating Sumika like shit. This… makes me want to chuckle for some reason. How silly… and nostalgic this feels. Has it been that long since me, Yuuhi and the pickles were in good terms?

… Yeah, it's feels like a long time ago, those days.

The blanket is lifted, Sumika's dumbfounded stare falls on me, or rather the dream me.

" Hahaha! Good morning to you, Sumika-kun. What nice weather we're having today, don't you think?" He even uses the same phrases I do… Well, this is my own dream after all. Kinda sucks that I can't actually 'do' anything here, though. What the hell, the trilogy.

Sumika's brows twitch, lips begin to slowly shake. Her face slowly spawns a frown strong like oil showered into a fire. I do not recall ever angering her so much… It hurts, seeing her like this. Why does everyone look at me with those same eyes as of late? Sigh…

Dream me tries to 'negotiate' with Sumika to ignore how she broke into our house in exchange for her forgetting about… ahem, us sleeping with Meiya. Which only makes Sumika more angry, understandably. Well, I know she's angry at this dream's me, but I still don't like her face.

A twitch of a brow, nibbling at her bottom lip. " Whyyy youuuuu…" Oh, god. Oh fuck, oh shit. Sumika's gonna DMP us. Well, at least this is just a dream. It won't hurt me in any- " You big, stupid idiooot!"

WHACK !

BOOOM !

BLAM !

My stomach turns as her fist impacts with my jaw, a drill splintering my intestines, forcing them into my throat. I can feel my eyes rolling back into my head, my head rolling into my neck. A second after, the wind surrounds me as I'm launched out of the window, like all the times the girls send me into the skies, everything growing smaller and smaller, the twinkles of the stars becoming visible.

"SONO CHI NO KIOKUUUUuuuuu-" I scream, before fading away into relaxation and darkness.

…

After regaining consciousness, and somehow finding myself back at the same place where I was punched like all the times this happens, I again am made to follow this dream's me routine. He is really rude to Sumika, I was never like that. Also, I don't recall the Hiiragi district being in this good shape. Sure, as of late a lot of work was done, but this road looks well kept, the sideways have no broken tiles, and there's no military patrols going on or anything. It feels so refreshing for some reason, this leisurely pace we walk in.

Sumika walks ahead of us, insulting us, or rather dream me, saying we're vile, depraved and some shit. As he tries to explain himself, she keeps asking us what was up with Meiya, and dream me says he doesn't know her. Why would he lie in such a way? How did she even got into your bed if you don't know her? Makes no sense.

I know I never got to actually talk with her, but Mana-nee did say she liked my pies much. This dream makes absolutely no sense.

" Owiie !" Sumika yelps, bringing me back to the dream.

Hey! Why did he punch her?! One thing is a flick to the forehead, but a punch is-

" Sumika, pop quiz. Yesterday's dinner was…" What's this about dinner?

" Delicious !" She says with a wide smile, charming as always. She truly does look better when she-

WHACK !

" Owiie !"

And he did it again! What's wrong with him?! Why is Sumika just going along with it? That's… sad. I don't like this, why would you hit someone so close to you? Sumika, retaliate!

And anyways… Why are they going to Hakuryo Base? This hill goes there, so why are they climbing it? Why are there this many young people going up the hill? What a weird dream.

…

The base ain't gonna be covered in fire again, right? I mean, my nightmares always tend to go back there… I try to take a breath, but my body doesn't answer. Seeing them bicker again over the key to our house, even if he's being too mean to her, is sort of relaxing. Sumika doesn't seem to be burdened, and she is smiling. The feelings coming through are relaxed, comfortable. They ease my fears as me and Sumika walk together back to the base.

… Until he punches her rather violently, which makes me mad, but then shortly after she retaliates and everything goes black as the pain pierces our stomach like a drill.

Ugh… Why do I also feel pain in this dream? It makes no sense… I mean, he deserved it but I have nothing to do with this. What the hell is going on here?

When I open my eyes I find myself in a classroom, some girl with large and exaggerated glasses scolding us for being late. Wait, is this where I study? No, I never went to this place. But they were going to Hakuryo Base… Oh, am I studying with them in this dream? Maybe… it would have been for the best if I had remained with Sumika all those years ago. Yuuhi… doesn't want me around anymore and the pickles hate me now. I can't help anyone in the Royal Guard, I'm just a burden at this point.

It does make me wonder what's up with this dream, why it all feels so real. Hakuryo being a school… I think it used to be one, a really long time ago. Kinda odd how I remember that.

Returning my attention to the classroom, everyone around us starts to scream, having a collective seizure for some reason. It makes me want to stand in attention, but no BETA are nearby nor is there an alarm blasting. Wondering why the hell are they freaking out, I spot a gaze of azure smiling at me by the blackboard. Meiya stands in a pose, giving her greetings to the class.

Why does she have a sword on her? That's illegal, only Royal Guards can carry katanas. What is wrong with this dream? And yet, why do I find myself wishing to laugh at this? She does look to be joyful, I never got to see her face to face but she always seemed to be rather displeased at something, always sober and serious. Wish Mana-nee had let me see how she reacted to the presents, now I probably won't ever get to send her anything again. Sigh… It would be nice if she could someday smile in this way in reality, maybe she'll find actually good fellows that can help her, unlike someone who can only send her cheap food every now and then. Still, seeing her shiny and happy is making me also feel jolly, if only a bit.

Unlike dream me, who is shaking as he again sweats an iceberg out of his back, I feel myself embraced by sunshine's warm grasp, dragonflies dancing into the garden of my mind, happy buzzing resonating from my chest. Though, it is weird. Why do I feel what this dream's me is feeling? Shouldn't I be dreaming about myself? What the hell, times four.

Meiya slowly comes closer, apparently coming to sit by our side. She's smiling happily, as Yuuhi used to do all the time before becoming the Head. She stops, her gaze fully focused upon us. Folding her arms for a moment, she gives us a nod.

" Takeru, I am overjoyed at the prospect of being your 'class mate', " Meiya says, to the rest's shock apparently. So this is a school… But why would she be here? Wasn't she supposed to guard Yuuhi or something? This dreams makes no sense. Still, she's happy, so that's enough.

Dream me seems to stutter a question, and dream Meiya asks us to call her by her name. Which seems to make dream me all the more nervous, his heartbeat and breathing as upset as a rabbit being chased by a wolf, yet I find this so relaxing. It would have been nice to meet Meiya openly, to train with her.

" You have my gratitude, " Meiya gives us a bow, for some odd reason. "Last night… was simply exquisite. Feeling your warmth as I slept brought me great pleasure," She smiles widely, as pure as water from a mountain's source, rivaling the incoming sunshine.

…

Wait, what?

I… I… I did what with you?! T-T-That's illegal! I mean, if it were Yuuhi or Sumika I could sort of understand, but Meiya? I haven't even talked with her! Why am I having wet dreams about Meiya? And why after the fact?!

Why am I… also getting flustered as this dream's me is? I mean… It's not like I dislike Meiya but…

The odd dreams I've been having weren't like this, it was mostly an unpleasant feeling overloading me in them. Yet… Why do I find her smile so adorable?

… How weird. But it feels good. And a bit lonely, knowing I'll wake up and it's back to the silence.

The dream goes on for a long time, snippets of situations getting shown to me. An army of chefs coming into the classroom, me being in some sort of submarine watching fish with a girl I think I've seen before, then seeing an art exposition and… crashing myself against a wall thinking the painting of an elevator was indeed real. I think that actually happened before when I was little, though.

I also get to see Mana-nee in a dress similar to the one Maya-nee had when she lived with me back home, as well as those Three Idiots that used to help her take care of Meiya dressed like maids, and a raven haired girl giving us yakisoba sandwiches, that other girl with the glasses sharing with us a neat yet small lunchbox. It's all so simple, yet so heartwarming…

Seriously, what is wrong with my brain? Like, of all the things I could dream of, who are these people even?

… Also, what's up with these simulators? Why are they training to pilot TSFs? And what are even those models?! Still, it's all so fun, like how everything used to be. Maybe I'm experiencing some sort of homesickness for a time that won't be coming back?

The calm life goes on… The happiness seems to never cease… As if bubbles were surrounding me, reflecting light and colors around, as if I was relaxing on a warm bathtub. I don't know anyone in the dream save for Meiya, Sumika, Mana-nee and Takahashi-san, but it's so relaxing, like laying on my back onto the grass while enjoying the sunlight.

Simply enjoying the moment, basking into the warmth, letting the silence and the wind pass me by. Yeah, it used to be like this… before this fucking war started…

My nose twitches, catching something in the air. My eyes snap open, recognizing the scent of burning, the distant sound of creaking wood falling to blaze.

Grass meets my hands, I find myself on the hill with the large tree. Standing up, gray clouds emerge from the city, rings of fire running through the street. And Hakuryo… completely engulfed by the searing grip of the BETA.

And yet, somehow, the glare of the fire does not come with fiery warmth. It makes me shiver, cold hands again running all over me. My exhalation visible, breathing growing slow, shallow, the stomping, freezing pressure on my shoulders piles and piles up.

I blink and what's around me changes. Sumika and Mana-nee standing before me with the afterglow as their cloak, no smoke or damage in the city that's in the background. Sumika seems to be near breaking in tears, whereas Mana-nee is sporting a dead serious expression. It all glitches and corrodes, shifting between the one in a maid outfit and the one garbed in the red dress of the IRG. The fifteen minute warning she gives me, one where the dream's Mana-nee is talking about choosing Meiya or Sumika for some odd reason. Then, the one from reality, where Mana-nee admonishes me for wanting to stay in Hakuryo Base, when she threatened me with no longer being part of their family if I turned my back to Yuuhi…

No, to the Shogun. To Her Highness.

"Right… They're no longer who I knew them to be, they changed."

" You shall be stripped of the honor of carrying my House's emblem on you henceforth."

A voice I recognize, a shiver down to knees. Turning around, the royal purple, the glowing red of the Takemikazuchi stands over me.

Aiming the barrel right into me.

"Ahahaha… What? You're not happy with leaving me behind?!"

Blizzard rushes out of the nuzzle, leaving a white haven over the hill. I roll on the ground, avoiding the ice.

"Is that how it is, then?! You're gonna support that damn bastard that abandoned Uncle Koetsu, your fellows, just to look cool?!"

More and more ice beams follow after me, tumbling the tree, white mist raising from the grass. The red glare never releases me, the barrel remains seeking me.

"This isn't… You're not like that! Yuuhi, snap out of it, dammit!"

" I know not of who you speak. Lower your armaments or I shall be forced to strike you down in the Empire's name," she says, far more colder and somber than I've ever heard her being.

Knees shake, frozen in place and not because of the ice. Mumbling an answer, stumbling as I gape, my sight grows blurry, my eyes warm as I cry.

"What the fuck? Is that it? You're just… throwing me away? What of… What of us, all we shared together?! You're throwing that away too?!"

No hesitation, no wasted movements. Another shot, a shard of ice hits and explodes near me. Losing balance, my heels slip. Back on the grass, I start to roll down the hill. Arms to bark, nose to rock, face to spikes, I roll and roll, pain all over.

… Urk. It hurts… My neck feels as if it were being strangled, air leaves my lungs and I suffocate. Ugh… It's as if I had needles coming into my mouth. Legs don't answer properly and I slip a few times as I try to stand. Clawing at the ice, propelling me off it, shivering and shivering, I run away from the mist.

Only to find roots of fire growing through the ground, dark smoke rising from the maw. Nothing is left of the city, save for a giant cradle of ashes and sparks. Hesitating for a moment, until more ice explodes behind me, I run into the molten magma.

The cold recedes, I'm suddenly growing more and more warm, suffocating. Air barely comes into me, my steps grow harder to focus as my feet sear in pain with every passing second. The dark thicket of smoke that walls around me swirls, patterns that resemble faces come into view.

" Please, you've done more than enough. Look after Kaori for me," Saki-san's crying face returns to me.

Clamping both ears with my palms, I rush through the smoke, almost tripping.

"… Pull the trigger, Bro. You gotta survive," Jouji's hand trembles as he hands me his red bandanna.

My eyes strain as I cry, as the smoke overflows. Rubbing my head, it hurts to breathe, thorns encrusted into my neck. The cold hands run over my shoulders, down to my chest, and I cough, and hack, and wheeze.

" It buurns!" The echoes from my nightmares start to come up through the smoke again.

The munching, the electric shocks, the wings of fire. Smoke claws scratch at my face, at my ankles, at my wrists, trying to sink me into the hellish tide.

"No! Shut up! Leave me alone!"

Feeling blood on my lips, slicing pain on my legs, I run through the smoke, slashing it as I go. The echoes follow me, ingrained to my shadow, rivers of fire growing, the roots thickening, the heat almost taking over.

Running, stumbling, losing breath as if I were an overloaded turbo, it's getting hard to keep my eyes open.

Everything grows blurry.

I can't… breath well… Head hurts… so much…

A feet falters, falling asleep on me. Growing limp, bending at an impossible angle, it sends me down into the ground.

It's cold… but I can't feel myself shivering anymore.

Trying to crawl forward, some fingers don't react. Remaining stuck, extended like spider legs.

Legs don't answer, hands barely move, head hurts, ears ring… and everything grows so cold, so distant…

What was I even trying to do? Why even bother? It ain't like anyone needs me…

Sumika's gone, Jouji's gone, the Pickles don't care, Maya-nee hates me, Mana-nee left, Yuuhi cut her ties with me, Masahide-san and Uncle are gone…

… Hahaha.

I couldn't… even save anyone. All I did was make everything worse… Why were those voices calling out to me within the smoke? Like I could do anything about it to help them. Who would even hear me out?

All I tried, all the babel towers of papers I readied were worth nothing… No one even considers me a fellow anymore. Maybe… I should really just… close my eyes… Why even stand up? I just wanted to…

" This time no harm will come to any of you, here or there!"

Huh?

Flickers of light, cerulean and warm.

" This is the only thing I can do to truly carry on, to cut all my lingering regrets-"

The voice continues to speak, raising and raising. The cerulean fireflies rest on me, making my fingers twitch and shiver, a shock running through arms and legs, waking up.

" I don't know what I do or how I'll do it, but I'll sure as hell struggle with all my might to make a positive change and stop all this shit!"

Screaming, yelling inside my head. Air coming in, and out, and in, and out. Despite the quake in my wrist, I force palm the ground and try and lift myself. A leg gives up on me, almost sending me to kiss the ground. Wobbling, it takes a long while for me to raise.

"Yes, that's right… All I really want is to give our future a smile. To make up for my mistakes. Haa… Haa…"

Limping as I hug my shoulders, the white smoke walls over me, surrounds and accosts, whispers and yells, screams and sounds of gore. The small lights keep me warm, faintly, but it hurts just to walk.

By myself, what can I even do? How am I supposed to help? Like hell I'll bow down to that bastard that abandoned Uncle… That's not the future I wanna build, but everyone's on his side. What can I…

" So what if I'm the fool?"

A lower, yet harsher, voice. This time, the flickers of fire grow beyond my body, scattering the clouds of ice away.

" All I want, all I care about is to protect her. That's all. And to that end-"

Rings of fire spawn on the ground, reactivating my legs, thawing the frost, acting as my guide in the hazy and cold mist. Palpitations rising, clawing at my heart as I walk, dampness blurs my eyes for some reason.

" I don't mind being the one in the 'wrong'. If there's no tolerance for differences of opinion, there's little reason to negotiate, ain't there? If we're the evil ones even if we do nothing… Why should I hold back, when the future they want to bring about means the ruin of anyone who disagrees?"

Stomping the floor, starting to walk properly, starting to catch on speed, I straighten up myself. Yeah, ain't that the truth. In front of such radical views, there's no discussion to be had. Politics are nothing but the continuation of war. And when there's no more words, there's only violence.

We soldiers are the last rampart, the last line that must not be crossed. Like Masahide-san said, we're like an extinguisher, ideally we should never be required but we're necessary in cases of emergency.

But what happens when one of us starts to avoid the rules? What happens when the chain gets corrupted? When any and all propositions you forward are met with hostility and shouts?

Only an idiot would try and negotiate with someone who's aiming a gun at your face. When words run out, there's no reason to hold back. Even when they claim the few good news are due to them, when it's the other way around… After all that happened, all I really want, besides all this war and cruelty…

Looking up, I find the stars. Clawing at them, my breath gets caught in my throat. That image, that nightmare of Yuuhi's bloodied face begging me to pull the trigger on her surfaces again.

All I really wanted to… I all I want to do… is to keep you safe, to give a smile to your future…

Without Yuuhi, people will lose all hope. Only she can deal with the required politics and shit, to try and negotiate for good terms, to stop the bastards that try and make business with the tragedy.

Why was I hesitating? What am I scared off? Failing? What's that? Just another sin, another stain to my life? Even if me going for broke went poorly, even if no one finds me useful…

… Why should I hold back when her life is on the line? I should just… stop playing by the book, meet their trickery with fire. If no one will listen anyways… Why leave the shadows uncontested to them? If they want a dirty war, then they shall have one. I'll burn them down to cinders… I won't lose anything else from grasp…

"Are you certain that is a wise decision?"

"Huh?!"

Through the smoke and mist, a small shape walks towards me. Her cerulean eyes, her silverish white hair, and a pair of bunny ears come into view. The little girl is garbed purely in black, her complexion is as cold and pale as the clouds of ice. She stops a few feet away from me, staring.

"Um… Who are you, little girl?"

"I see… So I resemble a little girl to your current psyche," she muses, closing her eyes and nodding.

"Uh, did I say something odd?"

"Oh, no, it is not that. I was merely- Ahem." Running a hand into her hair, she then straightens herself, looking into me. "Are you feeling well, Shirogane-san?"

"Eh? Ah, well… Better than before, yes. Overall… I still feel a bit groggy," I admit, scratching the back of my head, feeling a faint pain on the lower end of my ears.

"Is that so?"

"So, uh, who are you?"

"Do you not recognize me?" I blink, stare at her features for a moment, then shake my head. She closes her eyes, grasping her chin. "I see… I suppose you can… refer to me as Kasumi."

"Huh. Kasumi… Do you have a surname?"

"It is unimportant, my name shall suffice. Do you recall ever meeting me?"

"No, I don't ever recall meeting a real bunny girl in my life."

"Wh- I am not a- Sigh…" Her shoulders sag, a hand rubs her forehead. "In any case, are you certain you wish to stand and return?"

"… What?"

"If you lay down now and close your eyes, perhaps the flow could grant you peace, in a way."

"What are you… saying? Am I… dead?"

She holds my gaze, silently, before slowly shaking her head. "Not yet, no. However, there is an outcome, a… branch, you could say, in which you perish in this particular day. The circumstances are different, yet the echo could be replicated."

"Huh? W-What?" Staggering, grasping at the air, for a sec everything spins on me. "I'm about to die?"

"… There is a possibility, if you allow the current to take you. It is true that… perhaps, it is too painful for you to continue to stand every day. You've already done enough, Shirogane-san. You do not need to struggle anymore."

"So you're saying I… should just shut up and die?"

"O-Only if," another voice raises, hesitates, "if you want to."

A small face peeks from behind he shoulder of the bunny girl. Another girl, even smaller, looks at me, unblinking. The dark garbed one sidesteps, the white one stumbles forward as her support vanishes from place. Grumbling and stomping the tip of her shoe while glaring at the dark bunny girl for a moment, she gulps and takes a step forward, watching me intently. Light brown eyes meet mine, directly and piercingly, a glare that resembles an avalanche. Yet, she says nothing, instead tugs at the edges of her frilly white dress, that looks like a goth loli design or some shit. Her short hair kept in place by two clips in the form of folded bunny ears, her eyes flee mine again. Kasumi chops her shoulder, the little girl squeals.

"U-Um…" She starts, scratching the back of her head as she looks up. "You… You do not want to surrender, right?" She asks, staring again, Kasumi face palms and sighs, heavy yet short.

"… To be honest, I'm really scared right now. I… I don't think anyone really needs me, and maybe it'd be better if I just gave up," she looks down, squinting her eyes really, really hard, bending the edge of her dress. "But… But I don't wanna let things end like this. I don't know what I can do, but this isn't how I wanna let the final curtain fall on me. So no, I won't die today, little girls."

My answers seems to make the one in white glimmer, smiling a moment after. "Heh, I told you he wasn't gonna give up, Kasumi-nee," she says, raising a small fist towards the one in black.

Who shakes her head, rolling her eyes. "Siiigh… Shirogane-san, may I ask what is your plan going forward?"

"Bold of you to assume I have a plan, bunny girl."

Her bunny ears cascade, the one in white gives me a narrowed gaze. "Then, what do you plan to do from now on?" She asks, the bunny ears flapping for a moment.

"Well… I know I'm not very useful, but there must be something that can be done. I still believe small acts of compassion are worth gold, even as everything keeps on falling on our heads. Like Masahide-san taught me, even those tiny mercies will bear fruit at some point. If we don't try to lend a hand in times of need, we get the darker for it. And things are already bleak enough. So, well, while I don't know if anyone really believes in me anymore…" I take in air and exhale, the thorns, the shards, the pressure off my chest. Staring into their eyes, those little eyes that remain focused on me, I swallow the sigh I was about to release. "I think looking for whoever thinks like I me is all I can do, and work from the ground up until one day I can start making a positive difference."

"And what happens when nothing happens?" Kasumi asks, the other girl frowning, groaning at her.

"Well, I guess I'll keep hacking at it on my own…" As I've been doing lately, to no effect. "But even if no one listens, if I'll never see the people I loved again… I'll live to protect that peace we once had, to stop this goddamn war for good. No matter what happens or comes at me, I refuse to keep living like a coward."

"And if these efforts are fruitless?" She asks, tilting her head, flapping her ears at me. "You should know dissidence isn't tolerated in the IRG."

"While that's true…" feeling my neck tightening, I slowly inhale, cross my arms, and meet her gaze straight ahead, "I'll do what I gotta do, even if it only confirms the ill words everyone says about me."

"And if you find yourself alone and without allies?"

"Hmph… In that case…" heat in my gut, in my stomach as I exhale through gritted teeth, " I'll despair after I'm dead. If I'm gonna lose it all, I rather keep on fighting until the end instead of dying like a coward."

"Yeah!" The one in white shouts, nodding as she waves both tiny fists up and down. "There is no point in decreasing your own morale before giving the fight. While it is quite fair to affirm that those around you would rather seek perfect homogeneity, you must face your own matters in your own terms. Regardless of the pressure your peers may place on you, there are some fights you must give for your own sake," she nods twice, a small smile in her face.

"… I guess you're right. You're rather articulate for a little girl, though."

"Wh- I'm not little! I'm-"

CHOP!

"Do not be stupid, please," Kasumi says, after the swift delivery of a chop to the head of the other little girl.

"Grr… You're horrible," so she pouts, small embers coming out. "Anyways," she says, rubbing her head, "please do not be discouraged. I'm certain there is something you can work towards. Just, well, do not put yourself in unnecessary risk, please. There is a thin line separating bravery from recklessness, you'd understand," she says, giving me a small bow, then remains staring, staring, and staring until I give a nod out of reflex.

"Sigh… Merely know that what lays ahead for you is a truly perilous, truly arduous road," Kasumi says, giving me a frontal look. "You truly might be heading towards an unalterable fate."

"Yeah, things do be feeling like that at times," I nod, giving out a sigh. "But, you know, I really… miss the peace we had. I know things won't ever be the same, but even if only a little, I wanna restore a sliver of that peace to Japan."

For myself, to atone for all my fuck ups until now. For all my friends that died, just to keep the BETA at bay. And for all those that will remain afterwards, like that poor little girl from Kyushu and her friend that are about to be sent to work in the factories. As I am now, I'm basically worthless. Worse than a zero on the left, because I have a cost for the army. But now, I'm no longer a little kid. I can try to help, even if no one listens or cares.

… Sure, it hurts a lot. Sure, I wanna cry everyday. Sure, I can't even stomach my rations well lately. But if things could be even just half as nice as the dream I had a while ago… Even if it takes a long while- No, because it's gonna take me a while, I gotta start to make a little more effort everyday.

"Even if no one in the IRG finds me useful, that is enough of an answer. I won't limit myself to being a tool of the system, because people are depending on me now. So, well," scratching the back of my head, my brows curve, I cough and feel coldness on my shoulders, "I'll try to start with small things from my position, to stop the overwhelming stance some jerks have in the ranks. And if that doesn't work out, well…"

"You could…" the one in white whispers, lips curving as she plays with her bangs, "try to join the UN. I'm certain someone there would welcome your services."

"Sigh.. The UN Farces are more of a mess than the IRG, and that says a lot." Just remembering the ruckus that came after some soldiers in the IJA refused to speak in the international language, retorting with 'English can eat shit' instead, is enough to make me wanna puke. Instead of cooling things down, those idiots from the UN wanted to escalate everything. Raiho-san, of all people, had to calm the tide back then. "Honestly, I dunno if they work with the yanks or not, but I can't really trust such a large organization that has a sloppy chain of command. Like, really, forcefully trying to take over the shelters, demanding we become refugees by force? Even I am not that stupid, and I do plenty of fuck ups on a daily basis." If not for that elegant woman, that the IJA soldiers of our shelter recognized as 'the Reaper', shit would have hit the fucking turbine and it would have come down to blows.

"Well, but," the frilly dress is bent, her lips twist into a pout, she remains staring straight into my eyes, "you could lend your help, what you know of the IRG."

"Interfering in his decision is unwise," Kasumi retorts, narrowing her eyes, which causes the one in white to groan, thump her feet on the ground again. "That being said, do not fall on the pitfall that the UN is wholly evil. While certainly ruthless and pragmatic, there are those who would… desire the same outcome as you in that place."

"Well, I guess no tree gives only rotten apples," I nod, scratching my head. Taking in a deep breath, refreshing my lungs, I cough a bit, taking a step forward. "Thanks for the chat, little girls. But… I think it's better if I start to wake up… however it is I do it."

Kasumi nods, "I do agree. Best of luck from now on, Shirogane-san. Please, do not be discouraged at what may come to you. And," she grips her dress, looking away, "do not let the echoes of these nightmares delve too deeply on your ears."

"… I'll try, but I dunno if I can endure them that well."

"Just, please…" the one in white takes a step closer, joining both hands, "don't punish yourself over events beyond your control. Even if what you see pains you to great lengths… do not lose your drive, please."

Getting closer, I pet her head. She twitches but doesn't pull away, instead she closes her eyes while I ruffle her hair. "Thanks. I know I might be too emotional at times, but I guess I gotta man up at one point. After all, if I wanna give a smile to their future, I gotta be willing to keep rolling the dice through the ones."

"… That's not true," she says, opening her eyes, sharpened. "If… If you really want that then, don't lose your own smile. Please, work towards making your own future smile, too."

"… My future, too? Huh… After all I've done, I don't think-"

"Failure doesn't make you any less deserving of happiness, Shirogane-san," Kasumi says, patting my shoulder. "If you forget what joy is, you won't be able to truly take into account the feelings of others into your plans. That is, I believe, your greatest strength. That despite everything, you stubbornly hold onto your desire for peace," she smiles, bright enough to dispel the fog that surrounds us, while nodding.

"… Thanks, really. I… Thanks," wiping my eyes, I take a few short breaths. When was the last time someone even cared about how I felt again? Since Shura's Dance?

"Um… Err…" the one in white steps forward, arms slowly opening, stuck as if lacking oil.

Realizing what she was trying to do, I nod and open my own arms. She quickly dives into me, embracing me tightly, patting my back, rubbing up and down.

"Please, don't lose heart, no matter what it is you see," she says, whispers, pleads, almost. "You might… face many cruel truths, things you cannot compute, but please do not lose yourself in the pain. Please…"

"I… I won't. Um, thank you, really," patting her head, she again closes her eyes. Remaining in place for a moment, she slowly, as dawnbreak, pulls away, then hugs her own sides.

At first, trying to reach out to my face, then recoiling back, two steps, three steps, she gives me a bow. "So, well, best of luck from now on."

"Sigh… I am gonna need it, I guess," smiling at both of them, I take a few steps forward, waving back. "Well, thanks for cheering me up. Goodbye, little girls."

"That's wrong!" The one in white scolds, pouting.

"Huh? What is?"

"Ahem," Kasumi sends a hand to her hair, a gaze to the other one before taking a step towards me. "If you'd like to meet someone again, saying 'Goodbye' would be inappropriate. In such cases, you must say 'See you later', correct?"

"I, well, yeah… See you later, I guess," I nod, waving again. This time they do wave back, the one in black giving me a small smile, the one in white also doing so, yet both eyes and lips squint and contract as if saddened.

Turning around, walking forward, more ice spikes meet my feet. The frozen air surrounds me, blinding me in white.

Barely able to lift my legs, elbows on my chest, palms over my lips. Like a blanket the cold envelops me, seizing all of me even through my clothes. It gets harder to breathe, to move my limbs, kind of feeling restrained by something, bound fully.

Those echoes start again, the explosions, the eternal wasteland. The odd woman that's devoured by a Soldier-Class, the big lady that falls to the stormy sea. Yuuhi asking me to shoot her, Sumika remaining still in a hospital bed as the flat-line beeps with no end.

I know there's little to be done. I don't know what I can do. I am lost in the fog, both now and in real life. But even if there is no road to follow, I do have a compass with me.

"We… wield the sword not to further our own interests… but to protect the powerless. That is… the code of our style. And what has to be done, is not what anyone else has done… but a road that will be forged with my own hands!"

Even if I'm called names, even if the rest of the IRG thinks I'm not worth my rations.

Even if I end up cold and all alone again, even if I'll never recover the bonds I've lost.

Even if I end up as the bad guy for the rest, the one who goes against the current and causes dissidence.

All I really want… is to see you smile, to see you blossom and be happy.

So I'll keep pressing on against the whole world by myself, if that lets me… see that smile will remain safe and sound…

August 5th, 1998.

(In a private room of a hospital reserved for the IRG.)

---

Slow and steady is the awakening, not so the refocusing of the senses. Everything remains blurred to the soldier's eyes for a moment, no blinking can ease the fogginess which has him captive.

Faint beepings reach his ears, he cannot move to his will. Merely opening his lips ever slightly has oxygen, warm oxygen entering him. The mask put in place doesn't allow him to raise, barely even to move his neck. Hands are also restrained to the gurney, tubes whose end is covered by a small amount of white cloth connect his arm to some metallic stick he cannot see very well.

Groans leave his lips, minute movements do not make it any easier for him to find comfort. Heart rate accelerates, the unknown unnerving him further, the weakness in his limbs, the lack of answer from them injects further concerns into his still dizzy mind.

As if to relieve his confusion, the door to the room opens slowly, a slim figure squeezes itself through a minimal opening, making no noise in the entrance. Sporting a small curling ponytail, her shoulder length hair curling inwards, Tsuhi Yasomaga steps into the resting room of the soldier, still wearing the gray dress her station bestows her in the IRG.

Slow steps at first, a sunken expression barely drags itself upwards to leave a folder or two on a desk. She then looks at the bed, blinks in quick succession, and her features rise and grow tense. Eyes as wide as her lips, she remains frozen until the soldier gives out a small groan which spurs her to hurriedly approach the bedside.

"T-Takeru… You're awake?" He nods, barely. "You can tell… who I am?" Another nod with a groan, brows slowly curving down. "Do you feel well?"

He tries to speak, only to end up coughing as the mask continues to feed him oxygen against his will, only allowing him to squeeze half a word out. Yasomaga quickly goes up to the controls for the device, first checking his blood pressure and body temperature in the nearby monitors, only then releasing the mask as she breathes a sigh, deep and long.

"So, um… Are you feeling well?"

" Cough… Kind of. Where am I?"

"You do not recall?" He squints his eyes then shakes his head, she sighs then propels his head upwards, readjusting the pillow below him. "Your Zuikaku was struck down, and your cockpit broke off." Slowly sitting down besides him, both hands crush each other, she cannot meet his gaze. "You ended up falling into the sea, and due to a failure on your suit, you almost drowned. Due to, well, the loss of heat you endured… and all the stress you had built up due to not sleeping for days on your duties, you came down with a severe case of hypothermia."

"Was I… grave?" He asks, feeling like he had heard something similar just moments ago.

She nods, silent for a moment as she shifts, as she gulps. Almost drowning into her inner woes, still unable to meet his gaze. "Yes, despite having the helmet on you almost did drown in open sea."

Flashes of Fort-Class come into his sight, the dangerous maneuver he tried to pull, like he had seen in a dream, seemed to be successful for the most part. Except his watermelon was hurt by the acid, and the ejection sent him into open sea instead of towards land.

"The mission- cough… What happened to-"

Placing a hand over his shoulder, massing him gently and carefully, she nods, "Worry not, there were no further losses of ground nor cities. Albeit dangerous, your maneuver did stall the Forts for long enough to allow the UN to regroup."

"I see…" He closes his eyes then, resting fully onto the bed.

"… Takeru? Takeru, are you still awake?" She calls out, almost quivering, ice darts into her heart, only to sigh pure relief as he groans and opens his eyes. "Um… How are you feeling? Can you move?"

He blinks, trying and easily lifting his arms as much as the bindings allow, fluttering his feet as if trying to swim. "Feel weak, faint… but not hurt or anything. Why am I here?"

"Did you even listen? You… You weren't even shivering anymore when we recovered you," she whispers, looking down to hide her eyes, crushing her knees in the grip.

"I don't get it…"

"You almost died, your pulse had vanished and you weren't breathing. You… Hic… I thought you were going t-to…" a few tears try and leave, she wipes them off, unable to continue speaking.

"So I almost died, huh…" again, something tickled the back of his head, trying to recall why he felt like he was having Deja Vu. "Am I alright now?"

"Eh? Ah," wiping her face with her arms hastily, she nods in equal speed, "yes, you should be safe by now. The doctors said you had already recovered the right temperature a few days ago, but… but you weren't waking up…" lips quivering, again she hides her eyes.

"How long… has it been?"

"A week, almost."

"Huh… Is everyone fine?"

"Yes, we suffered no casualties, thanks to you…" she then grips her dress, purses her lips. "Um, Takeru, do you… remember how you were working before the mission?"

"Um…" closing his eyes, narrowing his brows and lips, he gives a nod a moment later, "I was dealing with the reports in the shelters and my office… lending a hand in the kitchen… and keeping the children company, I think?"

"… I see," she clamps her lips, wishing to ask further, not knowing if he was yet well enough to press for such answers.

Their talk is interrupted as the door opens once more, this time harshly and quickly. In long steps, a shape garbed in crimson enters the room, the strong purple of the glare making Yasomaga's hair stand on edge.

"2nd Lt Yasomaga, how is he faring toda-" Amato's eyes widen, mouth remaining open when she sees the soldier returning her stare. And in petrification she remains, stillness in her mind, further in her soul.

" Cough… Good day, Raiho-san," he tries to say, not loud enough as usual, slowly raising his right hand to salute.

"You're awake?"

"Uh, yes. Either that or you're sleeping," he retorts, narrowing his eyes.

Not finding it funny, Amato frowns yet fumbles with her words, pointing a finger at him, then grabbing her lily hair with both hands. Folding both words and arms, she instead slowly walks up to the bedside, Yasomaga standing hastily to allow her to sit in her position.

"… Since when?" She whispers as she sit down.

"He was already awake when I arrived, Cpt, ma'am," Yasomaga answers instantly.

"I see. Shirogane, how are… you faring? Any pain, anything that feels off?" He shakes his head slowly, she swallows a sigh. "Is that so? Did you awaken long ago?"

"No, just a little before Tsuhi came in. She filled me in what had happened."

"Do you… recall the events that led to your Zuikaku being shot down?" She asks, leaning closer, staring.

"Sort of, but it's all blurry."

"I… I see," she inhales, crossing a leg over the other. Once more she looks into his eyes, steeling her glare. "Shirogane, may I inquire into some matters now?"

"Yeah, what is it?"

"… Why did you not request any assistance with your duties?" She asks, frowning.

"I did, I've been trying to help out for a while but…" he looks down, sighing, "you always shout at me when I give you my reports."

"I… I was not aware you were the one fielding all the reports on your own. Why did you not notify me you were left alone in the shelter's detachment?"

"I did… I asked you if you thought I was doing well, remember? And you told me… I was worse than a zero on the left." His gaze then sinks, closing as he slowly breathes out.

Amato feels a noose on her neck, the vice grip tightening. "I… I had thought you were only tackling your original duties. Why did you not report the matter thoroughly?" She asks, voice rising, magma as well within, burning her throat.

"Ma'am, please mind you tone," Yasomaga reminds, pleads as she bows down. "Takeru just woke up moments ago."

Glaring at the girl, then sighing harshly and shaking her head, fingers dive into the dress, pressure in her head, small flickers of pain in her forehead. "Why did you remain quiet?"

Under the pressure of the stare, the young boy lowers his, coughing getting the better of him for a moment. "You always said I wasn't doing enough, I didn't want to bother you."

"Do not give me that!" Almost raising to her feet, hitting both thighs with strength enough to hurt, she frowns and lets her teeth be seen. "No one sane would even dare to try and handle as much paperwork. It was a folly to even attempt such workloads for a single day," she leashes out, lungs tightening, hands wringing.

His sight closes shut, trying to recall the oath he had made, beginning to falter, fear disturbing his breathing. "I… am nothing doing enough, you always say I don't do anything meaningful. Something that anyone can accomplish holds no value, right?" He asks, rhetorically, causing thorns and darts to pierce Amato's neck, her palms and knuckles growing red.

"What nonsense are you spouting?" She seethes, hands shaking, fully frowning. "You lied to me about the injury in your forehead the day before the mission, did you not?"

"Eh? Um… I don't remember," he admits, truly not recalling much about the last days he had been awake. Due to the lack of sleep and the ensuing hospitalization, a void had been left in his recollections, you'd understand.

She did not seem too pleased with the answer, however. "Then, what of your daily duties? You… You were the one in charge of preparing my meals, were you not?"

"Y-Yes… I know you don't like them but I… was doing my best…"

"Care to enlighten me as to why they were larger than they should have?" She inquires, eyes blazing.

Which begin scorching his composure, subtly shaking, hands drying, losing heat. "Um… I, well, was giving you half of my rations, since you're always staying until late in the office, doing stuff that matters. Everybody says I don't even… deserve them anyways… At least they're being put to better use?" He suggests, trying to smile.

It only invigorates the pyre. "Do not dare to jest on this matter, Shirogane!"

"R-Raiho-sama, please do not shout. He has just-"

"Silence, Yasomaga," she glares, sending the girl recoiling away, gaze crumbling to the floor. Sighing hard, rubbing her forehead, she again gazes at the young soldier boy, who was trying to still hold her gaze despite feeling the scratches of the billowing smoke all over. "Shirogane, you also have been causing some discussions in the shelter, have you not?"

"I… I only wanted to keep the people safe," he says, barely nodding, cold hands embracing him from behind, tickling his ears. "Some officers from other fellowships come and go as they please, they want to keep the civilians caged inside the walls all day. I… I can't simply stand and watch as-"

"And why haven't you reported that?!"

"Eh? Ah, uh, I- I did but you don't read-"

"Because you've remained quiet about it!" She fumes full fire, feeling sick to her stomach, losing breath at the thought of anyone causing harm to the shelter's people or to the relation with the IJA soldiers there stationed. Even more at the piling pressure the boy must have faced, as the lone face of the Koubuin fellowship standing his ground. Even further when recalling her venomous words towards him. "How foolish can you possibly be? Refusing to eat properly, missing sleep while tackling an entire office's work on your own, patrolling and facing other officers by your lonesome… Can you not see the fruits of your own efforts?" She asks, frowning, still fuming.

So he looks down, taking her anger to heart. "I… I'm sorry… I just thought to try harder… to be useful. Even if I'm alone, if I keep trying-"

"There is only so much an individual can accomplish," she shakes her head, ruffling her hair. "Why did you even decide to tackle such a workload in the first place?" She asks, raising a brow, folding her arms, concern showing its eyes within her tone.

He, however, cannot see it. Eyes closed, bolted to his hands, the echoes of her scolding still fresh in his ears. The echoes of nightmares creeping closer, up his back, the blindness of white he suffered before has him shaking, coldness enveloping him. "I just… wanted to make a difference, to keep the peace in the shelter, to help the little kids. I'm not enough, I'm never enough when it matters the most. So I have to try harder, to not fail again. But, well, even without the accident in the mission I'd have fainted anyways… Haha… ha…."

"I do not find it amusing, at all," Amato sighs, still frowning. "My apologies for having shouted," she says, giving a minute bow.

Sniffing, holding himself in check, sighing deep. "No, you don't have to apologize, for real," he says, causing both of them to cork an eyebrow. "I mean, you were always right in the end."

"Hm? Regarding what?"

"… I should have been the one who died that day," he whispers, closing his eyes. "If Masahide-san were here, he'd have made such a huge difference. Nothing would have gone wrong in the shelters, the offices would have remained safe and well staffed. Compared to that, all I can do is hope for the best and push on by myself. Sigh…"

"… What?" She says, gritting her teeth. Blazing eyes is what the young soldier sees, literal fire as her head rears backwards. Images of tempest flash in her mind. Pages torn in brutality, scribbles as chaotic as the oceanic collapse, clouds and typhoons left in the pages of the soldier's personal diary. Recalling the last entry, the flat-line that echoed during treatment, and all that she had neglected further invigorates the already fiery temper of Amato, spurring her to raise from the seat. "Don't you dare to utter such words!"

'For you have nothing to be ashamed of' is what she wanted to say next, to express apologies for the blindness she chose to employ. Instead, however, her insides hollow, the fire freezes, and once more she stands in petrification. In a way, for her it is like staring into a mirror, a mirror to the past.

Both hands shield his head, quivering, upon her harsh swing of a hand when she raises. The veneer of the soldier vanishing, the echoes overflowing, the boy shuts his eyes tightly, quivering in cold. "D-Don't hit me, please!" He pleads, clawing at his head.

"W-What?" She barely manages to stutter back.

"I'll… try harder, I won't hesitate anymore. I'll do my best to m-make a difference…" shaking again, sinking into the white blindness, into the forest.

"I… I am not reproaching you, Shirogane," she says, barely managing to touch the edge of his shoulder, causing him to flinch away, still shielding himself from both hits and shouts. The reflection hurts her eyes, she bites her lips. "I… I apologize," she whispers, slowly placing a few fingers on his, pulling them away from his head. "I was not aware of… all you were handling. It was my folly, and I should not have been… reprimanding you as I did."

"B-But those who cannot contribute are-"

"Stop," she orders, placing both hands over his shoulders. "You've been fielding more reports than anyone else, and watching over the shelters mostly on your own. Can you not see what you have accomplished thus far?"

"… You never really praise me, everyone says I'm not working hard enough." Looking down, shutting down, inwards, he claws at his arms. "I'm just a burden, aren't I?" Yeah, like always. Never doing anything that matters, no one can rely on me. Just like how I left them alone at the end of Ouka. They? Who are 'they'?

Suddenly, there is softness. Slowly bringing her arms around him, Amato pulls him closer, careful not to disturb the tubes still attached to his arm. "You're nothing of the sort. I've made many mistakes, I… have been releasing my frustrations on you, truth be told." She admits, biting her lips as she runs a hand over his dry hair. "Being all day in the office has unnerved me, and it is why I was unaware of your efforts. Forgive me, I shouldn't have placed such heavy burdens on your young shoulders."

"Eh? So… you won't send me away or anything? Aren't I useless?"

"Don't be ridiculous… I'm telling you, that was uncalled for. I am apologizing, so take it to heart, Shirogane. I… will endeavor not to let my temper get the better of me from now." She swears, her hold over him tightening. "So, while I appreciate your hard work, do not keep such things away from my notice. I… I'm sorry, truly."

And for a moment, he merely cries softly.

Every wail sends further knifes into Amato's lungs, the mirror wishing to crack and send the shards into her neck. Once more, like many moons ago, she starts to feel tiny grains of rice, many grains of rice engraving into her knees, her very bones. Swollen, hurting more and more she was made to kneel over the dry grains, the pools and ponds of red that beneath her skin formed, her arms raising in defense as the young soldier had done moments before upon the yells of her father, the dejection she had now imitated and thrust upon the boy.

Her inner affliction, her own oath towards her underling, her apologies to her brother are short lived, however. Her thoughts are snapped cleanly when her fingertips meet wetness on his back. And all air is lost within her when she sees the glove coming up stained in red, red like her dress.

"What in the Heavens… Shirogane, can you turn around?" She asks, placing a hand on his shoulder. He nods, slowly, and tries to move despite the bindings. The white of the hospital garb was now drenched red, even the sheets had a large stain on them. "… What is the meaning of this?" Eyes widening, teeth gritting, she pulls at his garb, to the soldiers confusion. Upon removing it hastily, she finds a large open wound on the left side of his chest, and many more small scars littering his backside.

Freshly carved into his body, the wounds ooze blood yet do not hurt the soldier, who cannot understand why Amato had deprived him of modesty nor why Yasomaga was paling more with every passing second. Of course, it is but an ill turn of events, that they had to come check up on him shortly after the… beginning of the integration occurred.

It did not stop the quake of anger, the frown that spiraled out of control in Amato's eyes. "Who did this to you?"

"Huh? What are you talking about?"

"Look at yourself! You're bleeding all over!" She yells, and the sight of blood gives a momentary flash of vertigo to the young boy. "What happened here? Who hurt you so?!"

"I… I don't know… I can't… Ugh!"

Fire, wings of fire. Two bodies in a gurney, or two pieces of charcoal perhaps. Not understanding, his breathing grows shallow.

"Yasomaga, what is the meaning of this?!" Seeing his confusion, Amato stands and approaches the girl, who was assigned as his guardian.

"I-I do not know! Takeru was fine yesterday," she reports, standing in attention, fearful of the advance of the Red Lighting upon her person.

"Do you take me for a fool?! Answer me, what is the cause behind those scars?! You were watching over him until visiting hours were over, weren't you?" She asks, invading the girl's personal space, almost emitting a heatwave off her person.

"Y-Yes, I was, Raiko-sama. I, um, I only allowed Maya-sama to see him before light's out."

Amato's eyes blaze dark, grabbing the girl by the collar, demanding an explanation for the missing report on this matter, on what transpired during that visit.

And so, neither notices the clawing, crushing grip of both hands upon his nape. The mumbles, the whispers, the twitch in his eyes. Memories flowing back, faster and faster. Molding into what he now knows, the twisting nightmares grow taller, distorted, toxic.

The ports of battle, the repression of civilians. It aligns with the death of Kurosawa, and he bends and bites his lips.

The dismissal and aggression he felt from the one who at one point was his stepsister, reflecting emotions he cannot comprehend towards the Takemikazuchi that gave chase, aiming a blizzard his way.

In the silence of his mind, trying to endure, a face popped up. The face of his friend, who he had lost to the Fall of Yokohama.

And it all comes crashing down like the tidal wave within his memories, his composure, his temperature, even his skin tone which pales more and more. It all crumbles as a memory comes to him, what preceded their union at a critical juncture. Yet, now knowing she was, perhaps, trapped by the BETA…

… the cruel truth she revealed to him back then only serves to sever any and all semblance of reason away from his mind.

Amato and Yasomaga halt their discussion as he cries, as he pulls the tubes off his arm, throwing the IV to the ground. Yet, their steps halt and a void is imprinted on their stomachs, when hearing the draconian war cry that from his lips surges forth as those little, tiny worms squeeze their way down the throat of his friend.

A dialyzer falls and break into the tiles, the monitors also follow suit.

Blood oozes still from his open wounds, further from his lips and eyes as the memories fall upon his mind, as he once more recalls all his mind.

And like the thunderstorm within this Black Lilith, in image of the dark dragon he thrashes about, crying non-stop as he does, undoing what near his hands lie, not finding solace, the flow of reminiscence not stopping.

Hands that binds, shouts that beg for calmness are met with further thrashing. Strong enough to send both of them flying towards a wall, to then punch, and claw, and rip the sheets to shreds, to tiny, tiny pieces. Just as his Takemikazuchi did to that same friend, when finding her abandoned in the JFK Hive. Perhaps, making the link subconsciously is what spurs him to send the chair flying towards the window, to shatter it in a thousand pieces.

And crying and weeping, he struggles against the myriad of arms that try and restrain his outrage. And even outnumbered by a factor of five, they still are just as useful as a wooden rampart against a typhoon. Yet, within the heart, he's sinking into the deep sea, further and further below, where no light truly does reach. The storm inside him knows no end, as voices and people he now knows only spur forward memories of days he could not, did not wish to recall. A slice on his throat, skull-shattering pain in between his brows.

And, even as everything spins and fades, as the anesthetic dulls his mind into slumber, there is one last figment, one last gaze he meets which compulses further tears.

" Sumika-san is dead. Your fight is already over."

A pull on my shoulder, the vision cuts off.

Her cerulean gaze wavers as she takes in a deep breath. "This was plentiful… We've interfered enough."

"… That's not for you to decide," I turn away, closing my eyes once more, shapes swirling in the dark.

"What exactly are you hoping to achieve with this observation?" She asks, as dry and monotonous as always.

"… Really, I don't know. All I'm certain of is, I want to stay by him, even if as a mere observer."

"Sigh… You know there is no way in which Shirogane-san could avoid Lucifer."

"I'm not forcing you to watch, am I?" I look back, frowning, tapping my forearm.

She grimaces, looking away. "I can hear the echoes from your mind."

"Simply stop stalking me then."

"It will only hurt you more," she says, turning around, walking towards the exit. "I doubt he'd be able to fully recall everything, as he is now Shirogane-san won't be able to avoid-"

"Shut up and get out of here already," I fume, turning away, closing my eyes.

Zoning her out, zoning everything out, I return to my observation.

He now lays resting on the bed, Amato stomping over the nurses in her demands to know what had hurt him. Breathing regular, regaining his usual color. While within his mind perhaps much chaos will remain, his aura isn't scattered. Sturdy as an oak, I should not be surprised.

And yet, I do admit she has a point. Furthermore, it is somehow ironic. You, who was once referred to as the silver blossom, might truly resemble such flowers. Known as the white chrysanthemums, symbol of nobility and loyalty.

… And as what flowers are offered to caskets during funerals. It is almost hilarious, white chrysanthemums can only bloom from October to December, too. Sigh…

Despite it all, his vital signs are stabilizing. With enough time and support, he'll walk again. Now that he has exhausted what excess G-Radiation he absorbed due to the laser irradiation, the memory inheritance shouldn't be as harsh and sudden.

… Still, what am I hoping for here? Even as we spoke, he was hesitant, scarred. Resolute by the end, but by his lonesome what could he accomplish?

And yet, gazing at his sleeping face, at the calmness that thankfully sets in, all I can do is extend a prayer, howl towards that distant Earth you are in. Hoping whatever meager effect I can leak to you can aid your sleep, even if only slightly. The blazes within your soul are yours to tame, and in no small amount I have only caused further distress to you. If that dark dragon we met on our way to you a moment ago is any proof, you were more hurt by that incident than me. Physical injuries heal with time, emotional ones… are not guaranteed to.

It is saddening, that this is all I can hope to do. Just watch, silently. Simply watch, as you're mistreated, as you continue to maim yourself, as you push yourself into hospitalization. Now that we are away, I cannot even grant you the respite of an embrace. Truly, what am I hoping to achieve by remaining watching?

Sigh… Shooting stars truly are sad entities. Burdened with hopes and dreams, fated to be forgotten as fast as they flash through the skies. However, I do not wish to turn around and forget. You might have fallen to the ground, you might be burning, fading even, but I refuse to simply forget you. I waited for so long, and against all odds, against all probability, my wish was granted. Thus, despite being only able to send some meager echo, a faint wish of protection to you, I won't abandon you, my shooting star.

Even if I can only accompany you in dreams, even if this is all I can do to repay you.

… I'm not asking for another miracle out of you.

You do not have to take the sword once again if it pains you.

Much less prevent or overcome Lucifer, there is no need for such lofty goals.

Even less to truly recall everything, and face another war over the Alternative Projects.

And wrapping my arms around my body, recalling your embrace and our brief time together, I simply watch you sleep. If you are listening, if could allow me to be selfish one last time, all I would ask, all I would wish for… if you could grant me only one final request, then just… just please…

"… Please stay safe, dad."

---

A/N: I won't have another chance to do this, so here goes:

YOU NEVER SAW IT COMIIIIIIIIIIIIIIIIIIIIIIIIIIIIIIIIIIIIING!

Now, stupid joke aside, this was the grand twist I've been building towards since the start of the rewrite. Leaving many hints towards the fact that Takeru being a parent would be a relevant plot point was one of the hardest things for me to do, since as the writer I thought them to be obvious and I've been second guessing myself on whether the reveal was going to work, if it would have any impact at all on my writing's own merit and not solely for the connection with canon material.

The one cool method I thought to use was to have the narrator use turns of phrases or expressions that only Takeru or her mother use, maybe hoping it would blur in the background and end up assumed as my own narrative voice. SirGaraf was the only that pointed out one of such turns of phrases, so at least the repetition was obvious enough to be noticed. Other small things were how he's referred as a d ark a rmed d ragon, an iconic Yugioh card that is always shortened to DAD, and a few other moments scattered about that put to question him being a parent or alluded to it somehow. Same with the title of the chapter where he regains certain memories, D espair A fter D eath.

There are other little funny things hidden in the titles and I honestly wonder if all of this foreshadowing was too cryptic to work properly or if anyone figured parts of this puzzle before this chapter, like who the mother of the narrator is or how DADkeru was going to be a thing.

I'd like to know your thoughts on the foreshadowing, to see if it's worth it for the way forward. I know many have voiced their oppositions to flashbacks or detours from the 'main' events, but at least in that way you, the readers, are aware of all the pieces. I dunno if leaving things to implications, more with my cryptic way of using foreshadowing, would work out so as to not cause confusion, as the parts with the narrator have been thus far before this reveal that it actually isn't a third person narrator but the PoV of Keru's daughter.

As for why I put this twist in an already charged story, my most favorite part of the trilogy is Unlimited's ending. I cannot state how much I love and hate Song of a Distant Earth.

Ever since I received my first piece of harsh criticism in the OG chapter 31, I've been thinking on how to turn around the overwhelming angst Takeru faces on a chapter by chapter basis. More than anything, the lie that he believes in, that he never saved anyone and never really contributed as much as the rest, the ghosts that he refuses to let go of. So, learning that he had indeed saved his lover, that he saved his child's life more importantly, seeing it with his own eyes instead of just being told of it is what I thought would be the best catalyst to change his mindset, to become his pillar of strength amidst the never-ending stream of setbacks he's been facing in the Reversal timeline.

This in turn sent quite the chaos into the storyboard, into how to line up the events and references, and I've been juggling how to make it all work since the end of 2020 more or less, since the OG chapter 59 that kickstarted the 'The Days Before' arc. I dunno if this twist will work, if it was actually obvious this was coming to everybody, or if it'll be too random and land like a cannon ball on a lake.

In any case, whether the implications this has for the plot and Keru's actions from now on are clear or not, whether this was a decent payoff for this Mind Dive mini arc, the tone has been set. I hope those reading now can at least catch a glimpse of where this is heading to, and why the conflicts of views and objectives will occur.

That's all on my end, sorry for the rant. Updates might be few and far between as I work on some sidestories, IRL stuff has me without much free time lately. But any new chapters for my stories will come out during Sundays from now on whenever it is they're ready for posting.

As always, thanks for reading. Stay safe.

Zuoriel

Riding the Undercurrents

" She drifted off to the warmth of the masses

and I woke up desiring to dream her

Some time ago, I thought of writing to her that I never learned to elude the booby traps of love

I won't be sending ashes of roses

nor will I avoid any secret quickies

From that love like light music

Nothing shall free us

Nothing there is left

Nothing else…

Nothing else there is left"

De Música Ligera, by Soda Stereo.

---

[6th Arc: Trust & Tolerance ]

Chapter 78:

Riding the Undercurrents

---

December 4th. A few minutes before 8 AM.

(Underground Command Room.)

[Yuuko]

---

A deep breath, a long exhalation, not inhaling for a few seconds. The void lingers, accompanied by the light rush of both heels and soles, of white coats and dark dresses. One final glance at the monitor of my laptop, a quick scan through what pop ups were highlighted, nothing is out of order, there are no errors in the system.

"Professor," Yashiro calls out softly by my side, giving a court nod when I gaze her way, "the preparations are completed. We can proceed with the meeting on your word."

"I see." I then scour the whole room, the complexion of those around me.

Banners to war, horns about to be blasted, smoke already within their eyes foretelling the blows soon to come. At long last, it is time to officially request the start of operations for the Project. For those who have stood since the start, like Isumi, or those who joined afterwards, like Radhabinod, it is the time to give back the change loaned from comrades long gone. To place their coin where it matters most, and win the long shot that it is the first victory in human history against the BETA. A tower of coins we have, from both those present and those who entrusted their shares to us. Even then, it is overshadowed by the Monument's shadow, wavering as the foundations threaten to slip further with nothing but the dismissive wave of a hand from HC.

"… Did we heard back from Daikuuji Corp?"

Yashiro shakes her head, shoulders sagging. "No, it seems their setbacks have not been resolved."

"Make a note to request an appointment with them in the short term."

Even if this serves as a bluff, I will need their expertise for when it is time to fine tune Model D. According to Shirogane, only due to Model

D's specifications and superior capabilities was the Kashgar Raid successful. It will take time for America to accept my terms, time that should be used to lay down mines with what little the G-Sun Project bestowed us with.

… Speaking of. Licking my lips, folding my arms and sighing, I hunch closer to Yashiro and whisper. "Any news on his condition?"

A shiver, a shake of her head, both bunny ears falling down and down slowly as little snow pearls to the ground. Only that her complexion is already fully covered by the bountiful frost, paling and cold.

I see. So you're still somewhere in dreamland, huh.

Sharply returning myself upright, I clear my desk of clutter as the rest of the staff deals with the order to prepare the transmission. Curling, crushing a ball of paper and shooting it towards the trash bin, swaying, slamming a folder open, flickering through the pages to find the right one, and lightly hitting the keyboard with a fingertip as the OS lags a response to ready all the assets and diagrams, slowly chipping at my bottom lip.

"XO Kouzuki, please do not be so distressed," Motoko-nee says, slowly coming up to me, expression tight as she ruffles her hair. "All the material has been reviewed thoroughly, we're as prepared for this as we feasibly could."

"I see, as expected. Return to your position, Chief Researcher Kouzuki. The meeting is due to start any second now."

She sighs shortly, her eyes lingering on me for a second as I busy myself with the laptop. Barely whispering her agreement, she slides or slouches back to her seat. Everyone else takes a few odd seconds to finish their task, all standing ready in attention then. I look at the crew, who raises their hands and signals the green light.

One final deep breath, rolling my shoulders, cracking them, the coins on them. I give the nod, the bar bells toll. It is a second, half a breath, what it takes for this curtain to raise. The beeps of machinery, the signal coming to the monitors, the whispers right behind, the creeping cold that embraces my backside, the reminder of all prior shows.

This time, however, will be different. I have a wildcard up my sleeve… even if he's out cold at the moment, the fruits of what intel he brought should allow me to enact my part of the pact as expected. After all, I now hold no hope for an agreement with the Americans. As faint as the expectation was, there could be a possibility, one could make a case with all we have to offer. Yet, he has given me the forewarning, and thus, my hand now has shifted accordingly. It is all a matter of seeing… whether that 'accident' in the XM3 trials will also be required.

All the monitors gain life and light, the gazes of the guests now coming in, the regal and imposing offices flaunting the emblems and flags of their respective faction. Some hurry to their seats, others give faint nods in early salutation, a few dally with their drinks of choice. Two in particular are fully focused on my features, aimed my way as a killer arrow would. And in perfect rehearsal, all of us here present step forward and give a court bow.

"Good day, ladies and gentlemen. Yokohama Base thanks you for attending this meeting," I say, then raise back up, take further steps forward, take the spotlight's dare. "Now, let's not waste time with the introductions, I'm certain you already know who is who. Before anything, allow me to thank you all for the support shown to Alt IV in the last few months, despite all the pressure that, certainly, you too have endured. I assure you, your time and money have not been misplaced. Well then, as the Executive Director of the Fourth Project, allow me to begin the presentation of what advancements this base has produced in recent months."

Nods meet my words, further focus, tightened and compacted postures on the seats. The Prime Minister behind his desk and a retinue of advisors in nearby sofas await in complete neutrality under the Sun's Circle that sways in the light breeze of early morning. The five members of the UN Japan's High Council are seated in half a circle with sharpened expectation in a completely closed-off room in light cerulean with the large flag I also have hanging in my office, the representatives of the UN's Security Council are also seated in a similar manner though with a far more sober facade. Then, we also have the patrons from the Shogunate. All four Heads of the Regent Houses seated in their grand offices, windows showering rippling daylight on their backs, alongside their Shinpan retainers in protection, all of them gazing upon me with that same veiled threat and thin smile that never leaves their faces. Her Purpleness is no different in this occasion, despite the relaxed and soft demeanor she once more endows embers yet remain within her eyes, as could be said of some of her retainers that besides her stand.

Our little matters shall have to wait, however. I signal Pyatkh and she sends the images to them while I walk in front of the wall that's bathed with the same projected diagrams. Some of our guests look perplexed, others simply furrow their brows at the apparently unrelated data I've sent them. Truly, they do seem to be as lost as penguins in a desert. And poor penguins, they are in front of a sandstorm.

"Let's start with the key matter of this meeting," crossing my arms, standing upright and returning the spotlight's glare, the vast enmity of this theater. "As of today, Alternative IV has entered its last stage." A few people's shock was palpable, other's simply tensed their features. Slowly as a moving cloud, I pace in front of the wall, gaining a small smile for the spectators. "As a matter of fact, tonight I plan to activate the 00 Unit at long last. Yokohama Base is proud to announce that we are already making the necessary preparations for the eventual operations to come."

Halting my steps, I scan what within the monitors lies. Some shifted on their seats, looking expectantly at me. No whispers, full focus on myself this time. A captivated audience, albeit still judgmental.

Giving a minute bow, then I cross my arms, purposely looking away from them while busying a hand with a strand of hair, lightly nibbling an edge of my lower lip. "I do apologize for the lack of reports these last few months, however I finally had worked past the main operational problem we were facing, thus decided to wait until I had conclusive proof of my success before notifying this matter." A slow breath in, restoring the poker face, it's time to call and show my bet. "As the Vice Commander of Yokohama Base and the Director of the Fourth Project, allow me to briefly present you all with the recent developments that my research or its prior material has produced. With all of these together along the 00 Unit, I am confident to say that Alt IV is now able to officially begin its operations before next year, if the approval for an incursion to Sadogashima is given."

I look at all the monitors, gauging their reactions, their hands. A certain someone looks too appalled by the news, fingers shuffling through nothingness. The gazes of most of them, however, are filled with stars of delight and clouds of distrust, stuck between raising or folding. Tending towards the latter if I had to guess. It's understandable, my research has been stuck for many months. To hear me now saying I plan to take on a Hive most sound really farfetched to them, a valiant yet pointless death cry.

"Excuse, Vice Commander," the Head from the Takatsukasa family speaks, leaning slightly forward. "You speak of retaking Sadogashima, of completing the 00 Unit, however, what is the data you've sent about? This is in no way related to your project," he notes his displeasure through narrowed eyes, a raising chin. Meeting small nods of approval from a few seated by the PM, of some of his 'fellows', the imposing iron wall of the Imperials hesitates not in calling a bluff.

Most unlucky for you, I am not lying nor exaggerating in the slightest. Yet, you shall regret that opposition in due time. Spit out as much venom as you please, the chain does not only tugs in one direction. This time I won't be selling myself short on- No, focus, concentrate.

"What I've sent you is data regarding a few projects that have been completed in the last few hours and others that are close to reach their final testing phase. I know it might seem unrelated, yet all in due time," I state, giving the man a side glance then coughing and facing back to the wall with the diagrams. "All of what I'm about to show you has to remain confidential, after all. So, let's begin with the reports of what Alt. IV has produced in these last months. First of all, allow me to present to you a new operating system for our TSFs, the XM3."

Despite giving them only a summarized explanation, all of them are bewildered, to put it mildly, at the numbers and footage I'm showing. There is however something to note, the intensifying glare of Her Highness and her retainers as the test battle with Gekishins is shown. I assume, they recognize his patterns? So this world's Shirogane truly did pilot as recklessly as you do, huh. Tension overflows the one with lily hair, I believe the representative of the Amato House if my memory is not failing, before a small argument in whispers seem to start with the turquoise-haired retainer of Her Highness.

Once the brief summary ends and I answer some preliminary questions, Isumi steps forward and gives her report as the Captain of the Valkyries, noting the differences they felt at first, and a short explanation of all the new movements they could do with it once they had gotten used to the OS' quirks, all the while the respective footage plays. I do have to note the small delay, her fingers seeking to undo the formation, to break the stance in attention as her final opinion is requested.

"Despite being favorable, it is hard to ignore the strain the system could cause in our units," she says from her stomach, raising her eyes to face, to endure the entire theater. "It would require a detailed training methodology to not abuse the extra liberties and warn pilots not to attempt reckless maneuvers with their craft. However…" a momentary break of her gaze, veiling itself, persevering despite the ongoing downpour coming onto her, "our last trainings have proved that the XM3 can allow TSFs to perform patterns not available with our prior configuration. I believe that, if given the proper time to devise a doctrine based on it, the XM3 OS will bestow us with many advancements and boons never thought possible," she affirms, facing ever forward.

No further questions are requested of her, thus she bows and steps back. Taking her place, giving her a minute nod as we cross gazes, I cough and slowly proceed.

"As you can see, the research of Alt IV allowed me to create this OS. It was merely meant to be a test for what I had built at the moment, but never did I think these would be the results. The thorough testing of the prototype has taking its fair share of time, thus delaying this meeting and my reports," I give a small bow, signaling the crew to halt the projection on the wall. Walking, stepping forward, lunging forward, I steel my tone, raise a blade to the spotlight. "Alt IV has produced an incredible upgrade for our fleet of TSFs and, since I believe it to be a necessary addition to the A-01 STF, I request to the UN and the Empire to allow Yokohama Base to conduct a test run for the XM3 OS."

Eyes widen like kitties hearing thunders, smiles folding and fading to sobriety, hidden by hands as they whisper to one another. Before what lurks within the fog, before the vipers in the bog decide to lunge forth, I cough and cross my arms, pressing on through the wires and warnings.

"The ideal scenario I hope for would be to host the test with pilots from the frontlines or the high nobility against units stationed here in this base piloting Gekishins, as the one in the footage I showed you moments ago. I believe the XM3 is key to the success of the Sadogashima incursion, so I desire the STF at the least to be allowed to officially deploy with the OS on the missions that will come. Also, since the XM3 lacks any data in actual combat, I wish to test the difference in performance between our current OS and the XM3 in a hard stress test, one could say."

As much as I don't care about following regulations to a T, I can't just sortie the Valkyries in an official mission with the XM3 without notifying it to the UN's HQ. If they notice a difference with the data link, it would bring me a lot of unnecessary bureaucratic problems. The bait is enticing enough, I doubt they'd fold on this offer.

"I think it's clear this is something we need to roll out ASAP," a gray-haired representative of the EU thus says. "If the intel is to be believed, then adopting the OS would equal not only a boost to the culling operations' rate of success but also possibly lower casualties in both the Eurofront and the Suez Canal frontlines. At the least, I concur it warrants consideration."

"Now, let's not be hasty," the Prime Minister speaks up this time, closing his eyes while stroking his thin beard. "While the numbers are indeed impressing, they are in the end just that. Numbers of an untested OS obtained in an isolated testing phase. I do not think it wise to pull valuable pilots from the frontlines for such a test. And while important, I believe Yokohama Base has more pressing matters than the testing of a new OS. We still have not heard a thing about the 00 Unit or its estimated performance. On that hangs the approval for the request of an incursion to Sadogashima, Vice Commander," he finishes, narrowing his eyes, interlocked fingers retreating closer to his chest, hiding yet revealing his hand. Huh, so that's where you stand…

"Kurechika-dono," Her Purpleness softly speaks, slowly entwining her fingers together, brandishing a small smile, "I believe all those gathered here would gain a great benefit from supporting the notion forwarded by the Vice Commander," eyes focusing back to me, to the monitor showing me perhaps, her stare lingers, I return a faint nod while rolling a strand of hair on a finger. She slowly continues. "If the IJA could adopt the XM3, it certainly would aid the survival rate of our troops, letting our soldiers protect our shores more efficiently. And that's without taking into account the possible boons the OS could provide to the war at large. The data provided by the A-01 STF bequeaths bountiful proof of its potential, wouldn't you agree?" She asks, never losing the small smile, the softspoken tone.

Sakaki rearranges his glasses, his throat constricting as if swallowing a sigh. "Your Highness, according to the reports, the TSF's joints wear out much more faster with the use of this OS. We are barely keeping up with the demand of spare parts, so even if this OS would allow us to attain a higher performance, it would come attached with a much higher maintenance cost making the adoption moot since our units would still be out of commission, stuck in already filled maintenance bays." Taking a pause, leaning back on his chair, the wave, that dismissive wave of a hand as his eyes close. "We also cannot ignore that it would take a significant amount of time for our surface pilots to learn how to make the most out of this OS. Furthermore, this meeting was supposed to-."

"If you excuse me, Prime Minister," I address him, smiling a bit, picking the edge of a card to drop, "Yokohama Base has developed a new simulator unit to aid both experienced pilots and fresh cadets to adapt to the XM3," I state, and am followed by more tension, whispers, more kitties and thunders, more Yashiros in front of carrots. A small groan, a low flap of the bunny ears, she looks away and I almost chuckle. A fast breath in, coughing into a hand restores my composure. "We also have developed a few programs that could be used in the training of future cadets more efficiently. Pyatkh, Yashiro."

Both nod and send the next batch of intel, the little sims' performance. And this time, all of them are surprised. Except for the members of our HC, of course. A preliminary explanation from myself, burrowing terminology from your little odd reports, followed by Isumi's thoughts on the machines, despite once more almost showing some manner of dejection, blinking fast and looking elsewhere as she details the results the STF has procured thus far. It all causes further silence, an echo in the cave. And while it is pleasant to bewitch an audience in such a manner, utter absence of sounds is not what I expected. A few whispers, some reread the intel forwarded, a few garbed in blue allow fissures to break the mask of composure they endowed. Clay falling to dust, the first sparks finally raise forth.

"XO Kouzuki, how and when did you devise such advanced machines?" Another one from the EU members of the Security Council repines, a hand sending what little hair fell on his forehead backwards. A look of utter bafflement at the data of the consoles, a slight frown my way for said same reason.

To think this entertainment hardware would turn into such a valuable tool. And they haven't seen it in action with their own eyes yet. If the Valkyries' performance is flooring them, I can't wait to see how they'll react to your-

…

Well, assuming you ever decide to wake up, that is.

Sharply inhaling, crossing my arms and clawing at my elbows, I return the harsh and tight gaze for only a moment. "That is my secret, as it is tied to my research. As I've been saying, I tried to produce results away from the 00 Unit while I was stuck, these are merely the results of me getting out of my 'researcher's block', you'd understand. While I do know it is quite fair for you all to be taken aback, I believe this is nothing but the baseline of what boons the project should give as results, after all the support and funds you have graced it with," I say, giving a smile, a faint bow to ease the rising tide.

Upon their inquisitive stares and further queries, I again briefly explain to them the functions of the MMTS and the WMTS, retelling the small speeches Shirogane had done to convince me of the usage of the games for training recruits. Morooka joins in, giving his own spin amidst a question, perhaps something you had told him during the interrogation, easing the stream, calming the tide, both those in the Security Council and the Empire's HC lower their banners and cease the questions.

"So with these machines to aid Instructors, I assure you that the adoption of the XM3 will proceed smoothly. And we may gain many benefits from using the sims to train cadets with all of the other programs we have developed for them, if there is interest in said functions. Of course, if any of you has an idea to develop another training program I didn't think of, I'm more than willing to hear you out later."

"Vice Commander, if I may," the Head of the Ikaruga House speaks up, annoyingly slow, with that trademarked thin smile never wavering, "I cannot help but to notice that, in the documentation thus provided, these inventions are recognized as Imperial tech yet the patent belongs to the UN. Could you cast some clarity to the motives behind this arrangement?" He asks, stirring the storm, opening a gateway to thunders.

Sighing short, brushing my bangs to hide the minute squinting of my eyes, I stare back to the disquiet within the audience. "Because while they were developed with Japanese parts and machinery, the funds and test personnel belonged to the UN, and through their development we used resources and intel belonging to my research for the completion of the units. Thus, the machines fall under UN jurisdiction even if they were made with Japanese tech," I state, fluidly and not faltering at the glint of blades garbed in red, at the minute cracks in those in blue. Not like I can let them know the HC took them from Shirogane, that would spill all the mess the CCSE brought us out in the open. "Do not worry, my ideal plan would be to give the Empire a year of exclusive use under a trial stage, if you agreed to cooperate in their mass production and there is interest in what these sims can accomplish. As much as I'd like to make more of these, we don't have the time nor the hands for it." This will be a nice gift for you all, if you take my side. My neck isn't so stiff to not bow a bit when it benefits me, I do want them to stop being so hostile towards the UN after all. Hopefully with this, you can all start to-

"Excuse me," the American representative of the Security Council spoke up, breaking my inner monologue with the loudness, the booming of a smacking hand onto a desk, "if the machines belong to the UN, why do you suggest to give the Empire the machine's exclusive use and producing rights without first doing a bidding for their licensing rights? The US would be more than willing to mass produce the simulators, and regardless of their usage for the new OS I believe the technology of these sims holds merit on their own," he nods my way, firm as a rock, clear as dawn. Huh, unexpected but not unwelcome. "We have the industries to quickly make thousands of these in a matter of weeks, going by their schematics. We could arrange a test run in many bases on our country and in South America with ease to boot," stopping to look at his peers seated besides him, gaze sturdy and not faltering, "I believe the rest of you all are in agreement that we are the most-"

"With all due respect, sir," Ikaruga interrupts, coldly and calmly, without even changing his blank expression, "these machines are a Japanese invention. Thus, it is only natural that they should be tested where they were created. There is no need to perform a bidding, as I'm certain the rest of the UN would rather have the machines tested and delivered in a timely manner as opposed to the coming bureaucracy that would delay their adoption should a bidding be required." The American glares at the screen, probably at Ikaruga, the other members of the Council and HC tighten their expressions, shift in their seats while looking away, eyelids descend and call curtains to their intentions. Ugh… This always happens. "I do, however, think that the Empire should have a percentage of ownership over them, albeit a small one, due to its contribution to their creation. My fellows, I believe a mere 4% isn't much to ask? What do you think?" The other leaders of the Regent Houses compact in their seats, some members of the HC also groan as they grasp their chins, share whispers.

A small argument ensues, a desire to host a bidding over proper UN channels on one side being met in firm opposition from the proposal to hasten the production of the units by granting the Empire the production rights, along a small percentage of the earnings as Ikaruga proposed. This isn't unexpected, but it's still bothersome.

Shirogane did want to give the Empire a small percentage according to Morooka, and he did try to make that happen during his negotiations along Mitsuko-nee, but the UN's Undersecretary came with the news that the UN wants total ownership over the consoles. Even I would have it hard to give them a slice of this cake, I can't waste my favors on this. Furthermore, this is only a small detour, another piece forward. Allowing animosity to brew over this when we haven't even gotten to the actual talks of Sadogashima will only make the negotiation go south.

"Your attention, please," upon hearing Her Purpleness' voice, they all quiet down. She coughs, a simple nod before speaking. "While I understand my fellows' wishes, I believe it fair for us to not perceive any monetary gain from the new simulator units. Let this be a show of goodwill from the Empire to the UN, to prove to all of you we are more than willing to start contributing to the war efforts." A sharpened gaze, fire seems to be about to roar out of her. Yet, she gives the cameras a nod, the silk restored to both features and tone. "Representatives, I do not wish to keep pushing our burdens onto the US. We have already asked much from your nation during this year. Certain I am that you are most upset at how the XFJ Project turned out, and at the words some of my fellows spoke during that time. Please, allow us to shoulder this endeavor. The Empire of Japan will deliver these simulators to the UN, and we shall perform their test run to correct any possible defects they may have, or to improve them with the data we gain in this year. We will share all that we obtain from the testing of course, and we shall bequeath the UN a polished product according to the standards they require. Please allow the Empire to prove its worth to you all, as the host nation of the Project it is our duty, a duty we shall take in pride. Kurechika-dono, could you perhaps arrange a meeting with the heads of our industries? I believe we should all have a talk at large some other time, if there is interest for the sims."

The Prime Minister agrees, not wanting to oppose her this time. The representatives also quiet down, knowing that refusing the Shogun would mean getting into a lot of trouble. I didn't choose this day to reveal these things on a whim, nobody would want to start an argument when Alt IV has entered its final stage. And as expected, now that she is vying to make the test run a reality there is a small shield covering me this time. The UN representatives give some more compliments to the consoles, giving their agreement to see their worth at a latter date yet without tying it to the XM3, as I had expected.

"Ahem…" Let's take this tide to calmer waters before they start bickering again, those tense features in the IRG monitors won't remain underwater for long. "Now, as you all already know, part of the XFJ Project has been assigned to Yokohama Base." A few more raised brows, a few stares losing luster and interests. "I now would like to inform you that the railgun has reached its testing phase," and now, tension and widening eyes again fill the audience, surprise at the twist of scenery in the play, at me raising over my own call.

I signal Pyatkh once again, the data is sent to them. Her Purpleness seems pleased, and the people from the UN cannot hide their shock despite attempting to do so. Hide your lips all you want, the quick flicker of their eyes between each other and their laptop's screens can only mean one thing. However, the four Heads and Sakaki seem to be intently devouring the data, despite the echo of unsheathing coming from the sobered expressions in those monitors.

"Ladies and gentlemen, allow me to present to you the Test Type-01X EML-Railgun. Allow me to explain the differences briefly as you read through the documentation," I say, pacing closer to the wall where the diagrams are projected. Coughing, taking a moment to ascertain they were all ready and in attention, basking in the murmur of the audience, I begin the explanation. "When compared to the standard railgun, the Test Type-01X model was shrunk in size due to the change in its ammunition. Now it can carry seven hundred payloads of 90mm ammo. However, as you can see," I wave to the wall, the diagram shifts, their lips and cheeks contract while mine relax into an honest smile, "its power has barely been affected. I am proud to announce we are close to finishing its first working prototype, there are only some small touches left that are being handed as of now by the crew. I would like to test it as soon as possible, in live combat of course. When there is another BETA incursion from Sadogashima, I ask you to allow me to deploy the A-01 STF with the weapon in support," I state, staring straight ahead. This time, all the five Heads and Sakaki agree to it without any arguments, the HC's members also approve the notion timely.

"Excuse me." Another representative, I think from France going by her accent, speaks up as her eyes seem to narrow, focusing and strengthening the stream coming from within. "When and how was this weapon built? I was under the impression the original model was destroyed in Kamchatka a few months ago."

"I suppose I could show you the details," I cross my arms, looking at Pyatkh once more. The dates and progression of the railgun's development are sent to all of them, a small concession in truth. "As you can see, the UN accepted to cooperate with the Empire in this mutual endeavor. Special thanks should be given to 1st Lt Takamura of the Royal Guard, who pushed for this joint project to be a reality and has been giving the Alt IV Research Team many good results in the short time she has been assigned to my base."

I don't like giving free praise like this, but mentioning the IRG will please the nationalists present here. And she did give me better results than I expected, with her help to Tamase and the rest of the squad during their trainings. For Marimo to allow her presence, it means she is capable enough. It looks like your little hunch was proven correct, Shirogane. She did a fine job as a supporting teacher thus far.

Coughing, pacing to a side, I continue. "Having access to its black box, we were able to build a working prototype much faster than before thanks to the data produced during the XFJ Project. Sadly, we didn't have the resources to rebuild it as it used to be, so compromises had to be made as you can see in page seven, where all the comparisons with the first prototype are. Due to a certain research on my end, the process could be streamlined and with the full cooperation from 1st Lt Takamura the production of parts found little to no setbacks or delays."

"Might I ask if the weapon is also under a UN patent?" Takatsukasa inquires, leaning forward.

"Considering that both parties were involved in this, the EML-Railgun is a shared property of the UN and the Empire," I retort immediately, crossing my arms.

I don't want to deal with any more nonsense, so giving them 40% of the royalties is not such a big deal. The UN also doesn't want to keep antagonizing the nobility for such small matters, that's why they accepted this arrangement. I'm sure they would like to gain access to the railgun, and if they can mend their relations with the Empire while they're at it, it's killing two birds with one stone. Even if embers remain buried within the ashes, all it takes is a small spark to cleanse all the tension in-

" Takeru-san said… he had doubts about you, about an incident that would happen soon. That's why he didn't want to wake up."

…

"So would the prototype be ready for testing as of now?" Sakaki inquires, untying the chains that threatened to choke me.

Coughing, they refuse to break away, bending and twisting and coiling over my stomach instead. Taking a moment to swipe my tongue within my mouth, cleaning the bad taste, I nod as I look back at the monitors. "It should be ready for its first stress test this afternoon, if nothing out of order occurs. And if we confirm it works as it should, I would like for it to go through the necessary bureaucratic channels as fast as possible, to allow for its deployment during an eventual incursion into Sadogashima. And as opposed to its prior location, we have here a way to quickly recharge its most vital energy source." They all narrow their eyes, knowing I'm talking about the Reactor. We really would benefit from being able to extract more ODL from it. Maybe Shirogane was right, we should try to capture Sadogashima's Reactor too. "As you can see, there are many advancements made in the recent months. Which is why I believe there is no better time to begin the formal operations of the project."

They all again sink in whispers, shrouded in fog. Requesting another opinion on the subject, Radhabinod steps up and gives his impressions about the weapon, about how he sees it could change the tide of a battle when used wisely, his own posture towards the requested assault. Questions are answered and the representatives agree that the weapon is promising, but that in their opinion the Mk. 57 of the EU is the more versatile weapon. They do, however, agree that its destructive power seems to be a bit above it, since many Mk. 57s would need to use all of its 120mm ammo to dispatch such a large number of Destroyer-Class as the railgun could, even if it has better range and it still had its 205mm remaining.

In the end, each weapon has its own advantages. The railgun is better fit for a defensive role, so its perfect for our coastal defense strategies, or for a machine like the XG. Unless we managed to make a bigger, sturdier TSF who could move with it without losing speed. On the other hand, the Mk. 57's versatility and lightness make it the obvious choice for culling operations, where the railgun's weight and the need to remain stationary when firing it could endanger the mission's success and the pilot's life. It's also much easier to mass produce. However, thanks to having the Reactor here, we might be able to use its spoils to increase the barrel life of the railgun. The Mk. 57 does not belong to the UN though, so they might want to push for it to have their own weapon, since the EU refuses to share the licensing rights of their new gun. Oh well, it's done and that's what matters. Now I can focus on making the ones for the XGs. Mitsuko-nee will handle the negotiations, and I rather focus on polishing the model we have built already for what is to come.

"Now then, let's move onto the next report. As you could see during the footage beforehand, the Gekishin used during the trial employed far more dexterity than what baseline we have as of now. However, that was not only due to the XM3," I pace to the wall, new diagrams flash onto it, my shadow obscuring some of them. "A certain realization brought these ideas to me, so I would like to present you all the new parts we have developed for the F-4 and F-15 alongside a brand new stealth system, as well as the results we gained with these and the Type-00C using the XM3." The hammer ain't stopping anytime soon, get used to it folks. Now that I got my game on, there won't be any breaks for a while.

To say they were surprised is an understatement. Even Her Purpleness was shocked at the performance of the Kagerou Shirogane piloted during Niigata, even if it was formally during a test run. Of course, the HC and all the representatives lost their minds at the intel we gained during the runs the Blood Squadron has been doing with the modified Gekishins based on Shirogane's Shin Gekishin, and the Prime Minister and the four Heads simply didn't believe it as they all started discussing what was shown to them with those nearby.

It is understandable, however. Between the new parts and the XM3, the Gekishin obtained better numbers than our base Kagerou, and the Kagerou was almost on par the Shiranui, even though Shirogane's F-15 was still using prototype parts back then. Of course, the real surprise came with the results the Valkyries obtained with the Type-00C through the XM3. Simply put, the Type-00C could stand toe to toe with the Berkut or the Raptor, going by the numbers without the stealth. And while testing is still necessary, I believe that with the stealth however it should have an an edge over a Berkut in the hands of a skilled pilot. Before, it would be an uphill match dependent on both pilot's skill. With the XM3 and stealth capabilities, however, the Type-00C would have the clear advantage.

And if only you would wake up, these reports would be thrashed in a heartbeat if they demanded more out of us.

Cleansing my throat, enduring the cackle of the heavy chains, I step forward, face them once more. "I'm sure you all realized this by now, but with these parts and the XM3 we have a simple and economic way of enhancing the worldwide frontline. Certainly, all the Strike Eagles would welcome some of these parts, and even if they didn't, the XM3 by itself should be a giant boost in performance as you can see with the limited data we gained through our tests. The same for all the F-4 variations that are still in use in the African front. That's without taking into account the stealth capabilities we could give them too, if you allow us to proceed with a test run and you find the results satisfactory."

"Forgive me for doubting you, Vice Commander," the American raises his voice once more, pinching his nose as he shakes his head, "but you say you could best the Raptor? The battlefield dominator, the TSF that has yet to be defeated? I find it hard to believe. And while it is incredible on its own, I don't think this stealth system can compare to that of the Raptor. Also, while it seems promising, the XM3 has not enough hard data yet. Arranging a trial run seems rushed to me at this point."

"Is that so? For me, it is imperative to bolster the STF's capabilities to allow the 00 Unit to proceed with its intended objective. I must insist on this matter, unless, of course, my prior request for the XG line is accepted."

He frowns, shaking his head as he sighs. "I do not think the US would be willing to fork over the Hi-MAERF Project for any of your current offerings, XO. While impressive, none of these advancements match American tech already available."

Tch… These proud Americans can't accept so easily that someone made something better than them. Well, I'll just have to prove it to them. You're gonna beg for it, be sure of that.

"Of course the stealth system doesn't compare, it is in the earliest stages of its life." And I saved my best pieces of tech for myself. "But considering all the setbacks the Lightning II's production is suffering, I'm certain the Eurofront would be interested on these spoils Alt IV has created, even if only on the sensors, antennas and chaff missiles. All of the tech devised thus far along the XM3 is in need of actual hard data to back their performance, that's why I'm asking to perform an official test run. However, if the UN doesn't think they're worth it, I won't waste your time any further. The licensing rights can go to the Empire, if there is any interest."

"But of course, I believe such advancements would be welcomed by our industries," Her Highness follows up on my trail, nodding in clarity. "All of us are in agreement on this notion?" She asks, her retainers agree immediately and all four Heads also do in unison, a small delay coming from the PM and his advisors.

"Now wait a second!" The French woman shouts as she slams the desk, her cascading hair flowing to a side due to the haste of the movement that also sends her mug to meet the floor. "If the US doesn't have a need for the parts that's on them, but at the very least I assure you that France will be more than willing to make a bid for them."

"In the Queen's name, I can confirm that Britain would also be interested in acquiring this stealth system and new OS," the small British woman affirms immediately after, a faint and small nod afterwards.

And with that, the representatives start arguing among themselves again, with Mitsuko-nee and the other members of our HC trying to calm them down, only for the four Heads to interject, saying the Empire should have exclusive access to the parts too. Well, at least the discord should open a few gaps for me to strike at.

Of course America doesn't want another stealth system to exist. If they are the only ones who produce stealth tech, they can control how powerful the other nations' stealth capabilities are. So long as everything else is under the Raptor's level, they can always win against another army of TSFs. And if the F-22A is ever beaten… They have another one hidden behind the curtain. Not that I want to see an F-23 getting deployed. I do not want to see the American Special Force getting involved in this theater, thank you very much. However, if it is to seal the patent under their own shelves, they'll try and wrestle the parts to their hands. While perhaps cooperation with them could happen, to mix and match our stealth systems and doctrines side by side, I highly doubt such an arrangement can happen. Those who support a TSF-centric doctrine are in league with Prominence, after all. I rather not mingle with them more than necessary, or with the ripples they come attached with. I rather not have to resort to any 'Hail Mary' tactics, if possible.

"I believe you can all negotiate on your own at a latter date," Mitsuko-nee cuts in the argument of the Security Council's representatives, who sigh and look away from each other, echoes of dissidence still rumbling in their tight postures and gestures. She crosses her legs and hands before continuing. "Considering the Empire already has expressed their desire to acquire the license, I believe all of us would benefit from allowing Yokohama to hold this test run. Both for these parts, the small simulators, and the XM3. It would clear all the doubts we currently have, and grant the STF a most needed edge for the Sadogashima mission."

"Now, let's not get ahead of ourselves," the Prime Minister again protests, giving small little hits to the wood before pushing his glasses up. "The goal of this meeting is discussing the state of Alt IV and whether or not it's ready to begin its operations before we commit to a mission on Sadogashima, not to be making bids over new pieces of tech. Vice Commander Kouzuki," interlocking his fingers, what ailing venoms do lurk behind his eyes, enough to pale his complexion, the grip of shade over it, "could you proceed to give us the report on the 00 Unit? On that machine's performance hinges the success of the project, after all."

"… Well, if you insist. Just let me clarify something. All I've shown you thus far is deeply tied with Alt IV's success. As I said before, I plan on taking on the 21st Hive before the end of the year so it's in my best interest to improve our firepower as much as the timeline allows. So by presenting the XM3 and all the other developments that my team has produced, I was giving you all an idea of what cards are available to us. I would like to avoid another Swaraj from happening under my command, you'd understand," I spit out in sincere poison, glaring, threatening. The men and women from the UN grimace but nod at my words, the older ones from the four Heads do so too, Her Highness sighs as she slumps in slow dejection. Sigh… Glad we can all agree in that, at least. "But if you're so impatient, let's cut to the chase. First, these are the numbers of the A-01 STF before and after the XM3 and their change to the Type-00C. This is the current power of Alt IV's vanguard." Pyatkh and Yashiro send the data, with some footage of their trainings playing behind me as I slowly pace to and fro. "Now, as you all know, for security measures I can't show you the machine or detailed data about it, but here is the report about the 00 Unit's expected performance once fully tuned."

I nod, Yashiro fiddles with the keyboard, filing the comparison of the expected performance between the revamped 00 Unit and the old prototype, though it still is only the bare minimal intel. Motoko-nee proceeds to take the spotlight, detailing some of the reworkings she had to tackle, some of the advancements she has produced in the last month. Tying this to the parallel work of the feedback interface, as we did when designing the auto-translator for the datalink structure, allows her to deflect most questions by keeping things professional and using technical terms, buzzwords, and the usual annoying manner of jokes she tends to do, despite the seriousness required.

She takes a step back once she's done, giving me a nod, a faint smile. I merely return the nod, feeling the air seeping down my throat, fighting the grip of the chains, the rocking of the coins. "As the report should have indicated, I will make the 00 Unit perform various tests in due time to evaluate its capabilities and modify the planning accordingly. Which is why I would like to acquire the XG line as soon as possible. I shall be updating you with the clear numbers after it's activated and running. While we do have other means to perform the mission, I believe the XG to be the best machine we have at our disposal. I will insist on the transfer of the Hi-MAERF Project to Alt IV command until the last possible moment. I also would like to inform you I would like to capture the Sadogashima Hive without completely destroying its core, if possible. Considering how vital the resources we could extract from it are, I believe we should try to push for its capture. Of course, the mission's success comes first, but I would like to have another core to further push my research forward."

As I finish speaking, the members of the HC started discussing about how feasible it would be to capture a 'core' and then the Shogun asked the American about the possible terms of the transfer, and the man responded, fuming a barrage out and very harshly, that there were no plans to hand over the XGs. This caused the four Heads and the other representatives to start arguing, this time more heatedly, and my mention of instead choosing to rely on Imperial tech through the prior project handed to Daikuuji Corp only added fuel to the pyre, rising to cover all the offices in thick smoke, shrouding it all in combustion. In pressure towards the US' representative, receiver of more volleys than he can safely deflect with mere words without risking a slip up. Sadly, Mitsuko-nee and Her Purpleness placated them before things got out of control, before the cracks in the facade gave away.

Thanks to this, though, now I know where everybody stands, which color they hoist behind the forced neutrality. I clear my throat as they start to calm down, bringing the attention to me.

"Since it's possible that the XG line is not transferred to us, I began to take my measures to make sure we use the 00 Unit's capabilities to it's fullest. If the XG does not come to us, we have plans to not only redouble our efforts alongside Daikuuji Corp but to also develop a new program to link the 00 Unit to the XM3. This is only the theoretical data, but allow me to show you all… the IST," I turn around as I whisper, narrowing my brows and holding my breath captive.

"May I ask what is the acronym meant to represent?" A member of the HC asks.

"Sadly, it'll have to remain secret for the time being," I immediately counter, narrowing my eyes, pursing my lips and gagging on nothingness.

No way in hell I'll say out loud what it stands for. 'Instant Stunt Transfer', Shirogane what were you smoking when you thought about this name? Sigh… I thought he was kidding when he asked me if it would be possible for the 00 Unit to control more than an XG at a time, but I was not expecting you to suddenly want to have it command a squad on its own.

Pacing again over the edges of the spotlight, breathing in to dispel the small displeasure, I slowly continue. "Think of this protocol as a revamped and enhanced Slave Mode for our units. As you all know, the 00 Unit is a machine with unparalleled processing power. Someone on the base suggested me the idea of improving our AI and asked if it was possible to somehow reliably use Slave Mode on the frontlines one time. And that idea is the basis of this protocol. What the IST does is allow the 00 Unit to link itself with the data that's shared through the XM3's datalink to control a group of TSFs, pinpointing the best possible movements and actions for each of them in real time. According to my calculations, the 00 Unit is more than capable of controlling the XG line of the Hi-MAERF Project, so a group of TSFs shouldn't pose a problem to it. Through the IST, however, it could simultaneously control an XG and, let's say, a squad of TSFs by itself due to the enhancement of the mainframe required for the usage of the XM3. Using all the accumulated data of our best pilots at the same time, it could use the TSF under its control on a level on par with one of our ace pilots while sharing said data through the link to the pilots escorting it," I retell in my pacing, simply flowing down the river, causing them all to shift and whisper, ponder and wonder as if seeing fire or open sea for the first time.

… I still don't know how do you come up with this stuff, but I'll be damned. If this does work out and we gain access to the XG, there will be little to nothing getting in our way. All I need is… well, for you to wake up and be safe, first of all.

"Vice Commander, this is a real possibility? The 00 Unit can… control a Squad of TSF and make them perform equally to a piloted Squad?" The American's voice was almost dry as Yashiro's when she eventually regained consciousness, yet not pale and cracked as she was, like an empty patch of sand.

Everybody else was simply too shocked to speak up. This is on a completely different level to our current AI, who can only replicate the movements its loaded with, and even then it lacks the quick thinking and reaction of a pilot. Who would have thought that mock battle with the Valkyries back in October would end up spawning this? Honestly Shirogane, you scare me sometimes. So stop daydreaming already… and come back to me. We have a lot of work to do, don't we? I even have good news to give this time.

Sighing, ruffling my hair, I then nod. "Yes, though I still need to test the protocol to see the extent of its usefulness, whether it is feasible to employ in live combat. What I'm saying is, we might not need to waste more human lives on the battlefield if this becomes a reality. With the XG and a capable fleet of TSFs at its escorts, the 00 Unit can probably recapture a Hive by itself if we drive it to its full capabilities. Of course, we still need to support it with artillery and some strike forces to clean the Laser-Classes, but we could finally start retaking Hives without risking the necks of our ace pilots on orbital dives. This is the reason why I wish to insist for the Hi-MAERF Project to be transferred to Alt IV command."

I look up, extend my arms in half a circle while taking perhaps a rather dramatic pose, flashing a daring smirk to the spotlight, the storm and thunders that block my way.

"Simply imagine what the 00 Unit could produce with both the XG and the IST working at the same time. Yokohama Base has the XM3, the simulators, the railgun and a few things more to negotiate for the approval. The sooner we test this, the better results Alt IV will produce." As the representatives were about to speak up, I raise my hand, a single finger that waves to silence them as I take a step back, and another, before folding my arms and freezing my expression. "But let's not get ahead of ourselves, I'm sure you all need time to consult this in your respective offices. With this, my report is finished. So, allow me to ask you once more, I wish you all to give me the authorization to perform an official test run for the adoption of the XM3 and the new parts of the F-4 and F-15 as soon as possible. Also, besides this matter, I confirm we at Yokohama are ready to perform an incursion to the 21th Hive by the 24th of December at the earliest. Thus, as the Director of the Project, I request the agreement for us to proceed with the mission and the required preparations."

I say, never lifting my eyes off the monitors, not even blinking as I leave the silence hanging. Some of them start whispering with the assistants they had with them, others drink and remain silent, all look away from the monitor.

"My fellows," Ikaruga speaks up first, drawing first blood as he tends to prefer, "I believe it's in our best interest to allow a test run to occur. If the Hi-MAERF Project is of such importance, we should do all in our hands to allow Yokohama Base to forward a compelling appeal. I myself am also very interested in the stealth tech they have produced. It is clear we have at our disposal a way to become one of the strongest armies in the world with these advancements."

A few of the representatives didn't like that comment. Of course, we do not have a positive image, and us becoming 'stronger' might sound as if we were going to start doing whatever we wanted again, ruling by royal decrees like during 1999. I wonder, what do you think of those days, Shirogane? If you served under Her Purpleness in this world, as Yashiro seemed to confirm, what reasoning did you have? Your actions thus far are the opposite from those that squadron performed up until Lucifer. You wouldn't… be thinking on leaving to her side, are you?

The American speaks up, rebuking Ikaruga, saying we should focus on first delivering results and cooperating with the UN instead of having delusions of grandeur, slicing the performance of the parts and OS with the sheer edge of his wording of choice. While I sigh and shake my head, the man and the Head of the Saionji start arguing. The young man states the Japanese parts could make our Type-00 reach a greater performance to that of the Raptor. Ikaruga adds in complete sobriety and stillness that no one can deny that the technology is Imperial, even if it's under the UN, and that the Empire should have priority in its adoption over the other armies, to better support Alt IV of course, for no other motive than that, by the Heavens no. The Shogun has to raise her voice to pacify the argument that almost spirals into shouting.

If only they knew most of this comes from the head of someone who comes from another world, and they haven't seen the Shin or the new weapons yet. I'd like you to present those on your own, to gain the well deserved credit you've earned. Little I can do if dreaming is more appealing, now can I?

"Ikaruga-sama," Sakaki speaks as silence is achieved, not losing the clashing waves within his eyes, still unwilling to unfold his cards, "the representative was clear. They have no intentions to trade the project and are not interested in the technology developed at Yokohama. While the others might be inclined to acquire the license, it is most foolish to think that we could be on par with the other armies when we're struggling to procure our MDF with Shiranuis. Debating such topics on this occasion is most foolish, when said matters belong behind curtains. We should focus our discussion on how accurate the given numbers are, and how they could enhance the performance of the 00 Unit compared to what's available now. I would like to see the 00 Unit performing a few tests with our current tech before committing my agreement to these test runs," he states, again tapping his glasses, casting a sideglance my way. Some men on the HC nod along some retainers of the IRG.

"Kurechika-dono, it is most foolish to oppose the development of Imperial technology," Ikaruga retorts, finally losing the smile. "If these inventions make their way to the worldwide frontline, much honor will that earn our nation. The Vice Commander was a member of the Imperial Research Institute, and she's the one behind all of this, after all," he says, nodding my way, and sadly I must return the courtesy. Of course he mentions I was on the IRI. Because that is what allowed me to be here, to have gotten this far, sure. Resisting the urge to roll my eyes, I instead curl a strand of hair as the man joins his hands and leans forward, gaining a larger, almost vain smile to his features bathed in daylight. "Looking forward, I believe the Empire can reap many spoils from cooperating with the UN in such crucial developments. Think of all our nation could gain from this. This is a one in a lifetime chance to regain our footing in the world, to prove to the UN that we are more than capable of becoming the vanguard of the Far East Front, a promise that seemed to have been lost after the rueful events that led to the Invasion. I see no reason for you to oppose the notion to support the XO's requests," he calmly says, as usual, despite the frozen shards which sharpen upon the monitors, the blizzard that follows from the retainers by him standing.

Shaking his head, once more he taps his glasses. "While what you've said is true, this isn't the time or the place to-"

"Excuse me," Her Purpleness stops them once more, this time beginning to frown, "I do agree it is foolish to be making bold plans for the future on this meeting. However, this is indeed a prime chance to prove our humble nation's worth to the world. Both with the success of Alt IV and the licensing of this technology, we can finally start to return all the favors we have received since the project was assigned to the Empire, since the invasion happened. I believe all of us want the A-01 STF to be as powerful as it can be. Them failing in their mission is something no one herein present wishes for, I'm certain."

She narrows her eyes, raising her chin, taking that venomous tone and hailing a banner to war as she did in our prior talk. All those from the IRG and our HC seem to have understood the message, nodding in agreement. Ikaruga, on his end, seems a bit miffed as he leans on a hand, not raising the habitual smile. Sakaki, however, rests a few fingers on the bridge of his nose, inhaling and inhaling for a second. Probably, his thoughts dwell in concern over our Sakaki. Perhaps, that is what mainly fuels his opposition to my project now. Or shouldn't it be the other way around? Hmm… I can't believe I never asked you what was his stance on the worlds where I failed, I was so certain the PM's support was lost to me. And now… you won't even open your eyes.

After a short pause, after the bright smile raises like dawn, she continues speaking. "If by allowing a test run we can clear the uncertainty the UN has about these new developments and through it prove we wish to sincerely cooperate again with the international community, then I see no reason to not support this notion. Certain I am that all of us wish to clear the air between us, that has thickened since the XFJ Project suffered the loss of both prototypes last September, so let this be a first step towards mending our link. I ask you, my fellows, to also give your blessing to the proposal of XO Kouzuki," she requests, staring in serenity yet unblinking, firm and focused. The four Heads agree to it, and the Prime Minister does too later along the members of our HC. She smiles and thanks them, coughing afterwards. "Representatives, I would like to ask you to consider coming to watch the testing when it happens. It would make the negotiations much easier, and I'd be liking to show you my gratitude for your continued support towards both the Empire and Alt IV despite all that has transpired since the invasion in the '98. I offer you all a room to stay on the Imperial Palace as honor guests, should you agree." While the four Heads didn't like that much, the representatives agreed to give an answer along the official announcement of the test run.

Thank God she's on my side. Without her calming the waters, the four Heads and the representatives would have ruined this all with their constant bloodlust and bickering.

Once the talks are diverted to what did I have in mind for the testing runs, I give them a rough detailing of the matter. They all seem to agree, or find nothing noteworthy to comment on. Upon my inquiry towards the authorization for an assault on Sadogashima, both Sakaki and the Shogun ascertain the Empire has the required manpower to support the notion, the HC lending credence to the claim. The Security Council merely requests the documentation to go through the official channels up to their desks before giving me an answer, but that is an answer in itself.

They gave me the okay to forward the documents, despite the noise that will make through all the middlemen involved. There were no hand waves, no side glances, no doubtful words. The coast is clear, and the approval is as good as signed. Siiigh…

Rolling my shoulders after agreeing to their proposal, I give them all the final pieces of data regarding the small progress on Alt IV and on my plan to retake Sadogashima, saying I'll be sending an official document to the UN's International HQ shortly after the meeting ends. I do wish they hand over the XG soon, but there is little I can do on that front until the XM3 can prove itself worthwhile to the US. I'll let the Shin and the weapons be a surprise for later, no need to spend all my cards on this table.

… Hopefully Shirogane will already be well by then. It would be… in the project's interests to have him on the field during the XM3's test, to showcase the full extent of the developments made thus far. And to placate Her Highness, of course.

The usual formal goodbyes are said once most words ran out, after agreements and plans are debated for the date of the trial run. Once more, all those besides me bow and thank our superiors and patrons for their presence, shortly after most of the monitors go dark. The others in the room take their leave on my order, saluting me and departing to wherever it is they should be.

I sigh and rest onto the desk, rubbing my forehead for a moment, enduring whatever crawls right beneath the skin. Yashiro comes closer, offering me a cup of coffee that I gulp in one go, and then goes to the controls and confirms the connection is still truly cut and over. Motoko-nee gives me a nod, leading the way out of the room.

Finally, the last stress test of the 00 Unit before we digitize Kagami. I would like to allow her to say some parting words to Shirogane, but he is out cold and there is no more time to waste. Even then, I need to take a peek at the railgun's mounting and first boot up. Also, arrange that meeting with Daikuuji and oversee the weapons he was handling are still proceeding as expected.

Sigh… Today will be another long day. When was the last time I slept more than four hours again?

… At least I had a short rest a few days ago. You could try and wake up already, couldn't you?

---

Same day. Some minutes after 7 PM.

(Right by the elevator, B22F.)

---

The door opens, we stride out of the confines of the four walls and into the hallway. Checking my PDA greets me with the scheduled reports from Marimo about the cadets and Suzumiya about the Valkyries, as well as the docs Takamura sent already. The railgun did start up nicely, I like the singing ring it gives out as it charges up. The heat was growing in expected levels, so she and the team believe it can fire without any setbacks. A good result, at the least.

"Professor, won't you take a moment to have dinner?" Yashiro asks, trying to match my pace.

"No time for that now. I'll eat once we deal with the activation of the 00 Unit."

"… But you probably will end up scanning and going over the numbers all night long," she repines, the fast echo of her short steps chasing my shadow. "It will only take a moment."

"Half an hour is what it'd take, between the request, delivery, and me eating the dish, if I hurry that is. It's too much time wasted, the 00 Unit and its tuning should take precedence for now."

"But shouldn't you-"

"Alright, fine," I stop, feeling her face bury itself in my back as she softly collides into me. Turning around, finding her rubbing her nose and puffing a cheek, I stare into her eyes. She takes a step back, looking down. "Let's make a deal. I take some time off to eat if you tell me what you saw in his mind, in utmost detail."

"… I believe you should speak of that with Takeru-san in person," she whispers, rubbing both hands together as if clasping a lone rope.

"Sigh… You do realize hiding things from me is not a wise move, do you?" I play with some strands of silver hair in between my fingers, weaving them, coiling them around my index as I lean closer, whispering. "Yashiro, you know what is at stake here."

"He… He promised he'd come back."

"And what if he doesn't? Then, we need the 00 Unit active ASAP. And we need to account for what… losses of memory we have to take measures against. You confirmed that there were no two Shiroganes, that it was him and only him. What is it that you do not wish to disclose?"

She looks up, lips folding in. A lone star left in her eyes, yet she then embraces both shoulders for a moment. "You knew and didn't tell me. That's why he was so hurt, why he-"

"No, Shirogane fainted due to a catalyst used by 1st Lt Tsukuyomi and Her Highness, which spurred memories back to him. What was the memory that hurt him the most? Was there some sort of monster chasing him or something?"

She twitches, petrified. "If… If he doesn't wake up soon, would you… pull the plug on him?"

"Huh?"

"I asked if," she looks up, straight into my eyes, a tiny pigeon shivering under a storm, sill trying to fly, "if you would pull the plug if he doesn't wake up soon."

"Excuse me, why are you asking me this?" I get closer, she winces. Realizing I had pulled her hair, I uncurl the strands over my fingers but remain staring, returning the stare. "Was he thinking I'd do something of the sort?"

She nods, holding my gaze. "You two did argue before the last memory recovery, after all. Professor, you are Takeru-san's ally, right? He can count on you, right?"

"… That depends on why are you choosing not to tell me what you saw."

"Well, some things are very scary…"

"Yes, you said that already. Sigh…" Raising back up, shrugging as I ruffle my hair, I turn around and walk towards the medbay again. "Can you at least tell me why is he doubting me? Some sort of effect his Royal Guard self is having on his goals?" Perhaps, wanting to side with Her Purpleness now, hmm?

"… Takeru-san thinks he's alone, that's why he doesn't wanna wake up."

"What?" I look back, her gaze is dragging itself over the floor, steps so delayed I'm gaining ground on her even when slowing down.

"He thinks he's alone, and that I shouldn't help him because you and Sumika-san need me more, that he understands you… would protect the project instead of shielding him any more. So he doesn't know what to do, and wants to think about it more," she finishes with a sigh, expression dry as ice, fallen and sunken like my reflection on my worst days.

"… What? But- How- Why- What does that even- No, why is that what he thinks?"

Scratch me off the table, why is he not trying to gain Her Purpleness' support? Is it the same with her, then? I mean, to admit she has a stepbrother would place a few questions on her shoulders. More so if Shirogane was involved in that covert squadron as I believe. For him to hoist doubts towards me, does he think our prior agreement is not worth anything? That I've used him only to gain Her Highness' support? She should have made it clear to him with the way she argued with me how important he still is for her, and I highly doubt he'd abandon Kagami even in the worst case scenario.

"Yashiro, what else did he say?"

"I… I won't say anything else."

"Huh, is that so. Why would you not?"

"Takeru-san… should talk with you about this, in private. He was hurt much, and there are things I-" she coughs, features constricting as if wanting to puke, "that I believe only he can properly convey to you."

"That only he can convey? What are you-"

" If I said yes… Would you laugh at me?"

Ugh… Why do I have to- It can't be about that, can it? Yet, we did argue a bit that day. Doubting me, wondering if I rather pull the plug on him… Perhaps, thinking on our words about how to deal with Kashgar? No, even if we disagree, he wouldn't turn his back on us, not while his world is-

…

---

Is that it? Do you think… I'd hold you hostage over the safety of your world? Would I do that? Maybe? No, if it comes down to stabilizing the 00 Unit, I would… have to send him back to a branch of his home world and hope that Kagami's data leaks into this world after a balance is made. Sure, it might enhance the ripples of causality and the effect the conductor has on this timeline but that is nothing we can avoid. Plus, the easier the data flows, the faster the 00 Unit can do its job. Even if you have to dirty your hands again… you should know I can mend those timelines. You worked with another me, didn't you? I am not going to leave your services unpaid.

… Maybe, he truly holds some reservations towards me over what transpired in his last experience?

Why are you hesitating? Sure, I did… keep stuff from you. I already apologized, and I said there won't be any more secrets between us, didn't I? You should know I do not utter such words lightly.

Stomping forward, I cross my arms and close my eyes, sighing from my nose.

"I… I don't think he hates you or anything," Yashiro says, her steps indicating a jog to reach me. "Takeru-san is merely… afraid."

"He has no reason to. And if he does not trust in me, then it is on him. Whether he wakes up or not, what we have to do going forward won't change."

"You won't reconsider things if he asks you to?"

"Why would I? He should know our situation doesn't exactly give us any leeway. And you," I stop and look back, her rush halts in a heartbeat, her breath caught in her throat, "should also be aware of what is ahead of us."

"I-I know, Professor. However, is it truly, um, impossible for you to consider anything else?"

"… What are we talking about here?"

"You seemed to know what I meant with the incident Takeru-san is worried about," she takes a step forward, flapping her bunny ears. "Can't you try and find another way to deal with whatever this is?"

"… No, I may not have that luxury. And we are not talking about this," I turn around, resuming my march.

I need stability, certainty that nothing will happen while we are away in Sadogashima. In truth, the island will remain under UN jurisdiction, the Hive will also remain under our care for the foreseeable future. If the mission Shirogane showed me is any proof, retaking Sadogashima will be arduous enough. Reclaiming the G-Elements will have to wait until after the battle has finished and no BETA remain within the Hive, if we can also avoid the attack upon the base. Those G-Elements will, hopefully, go to the reserves for the XGs. Even if some, a little in honesty, is given to the Empire, the island will most likely turn into a research complex, more so if we manage to leave parts of the core unhurt instead of blasting it all away with the particle cannon.

And if that happens, that is a spark enough to incite a certain domino effect. I already received the call to aid in the relief efforts for the volcanic activity present in a mountain range. I know you said we should try and avoid this incident, to appeal to the Shogunate, but with you regaining your memories we already have a bridge to Her Highness. Using the cards we're dealt, preying upon the opportunity presented by this tragedy should allow us to gain the full support of the Empire, to quell the disquiet that lurks in the Capital.

… He wouldn't be letting his feelings for Her Purpleness blind his mind now, would he? Even if he did say once that… he did not want to prey on others as he saw another me suffering after losing Alt IV, there is little reason for us to not arrange the board we require for a successful mission. America won't stay put, and I rather not have them pull anything while we're busy in the island or after it. Once the Empire exhausts its forces, all that will remain in top form is the Capital Defense Garrison led by Sagiri and the IRG. It is obvious why the Americans would try and make a move now, or why they'd agree to the incursion to Sadogashima without trying to be part of it, letting the Empire deplete its might on the mission. If we lose, the Empire will have little choice but to accept a return to the Treaty in fear of a possible BETA attack. If we win, our forces will already be spread thin. And when we're sent to the Cheorwon mission with the Kyushu garrison, the only other force that would remain in healthy numbers…

You should know the board as good as I do, Shirogane. Why are you doubting me? Is your desire to bring peace preventing you from doing what must be done? If so, I can see why I should, perhaps, pull the plug on you. But I do not believe that is the case, he knows what is at stake here.

… Why? Why not wake up and talk to me? What could be worth risking your memories from vanishing from other people's minds?

Sigh… Well, at least Yashiro did say he would wake up. He's merely conflicted, confused. Once he gets his act together, we can have a talk, a mature and calm talk about what we want out of our partnership, of how to proceed going forward. Worst case scenario, if it proves difficult to tune the 00 Unit, I could try to send Yashiro into his mind again and drag him back by force. Him hating me… is only a small, a tiny price to pay.

Reaching the medbay, I swipe my ID Card on the lock. A moment of wait, the numpad opens and I input the password. From red to green, a beep echoes, the lock gyrates and I walk forward. The door opens and the smell of synth meds overflows me, the rows of white beds that are empty fill the view.

Going to the far end, where only he should be, I quickly reach the monitors and find-

A flat-line echoing about.

Blinking as my steps halt, I throw a gaze to the monitors. A line remains undisturbed in its stretching, the beeping continues to resonate. A sharp breath in, a step closer, the machine shows no errors. It says… his heartbeat is…

Slamming the curtains away, I gape as coldness embraces my back. Yashiro gasps behind me, and my hands claw and bend the white fabric, pulling it down and down.

"What… the hell?" I close my eyes, rub my forehead, and look at the bed again.

There's still nothing under the sheets, the cables and sensors left dangling above them, the IV no longer in function and with both tubes also rolling to the floor.

I move the sheets, turn around the pillow, and I find nothing. Going to the beds nearby meets the same result, no matter how much I look. Walking back to the bed where he should have been, I notice even the uniform I had left in case he woke up is gone.

Shirogane's gone.

He really is… gone? Did he choose to? Or took too much time and the pull did this on its own?

"P-Professor, maybe you could try and call the doctor?" Yashiro asks, pulling my wrist.

"… Then, why didn't she report that he had already woken up?"

"Eh? I, uh, I don't-"

"He left, huh. He just up and vanished, is that it?" I punch the bed, kick at it, the monitors.

My jaw hurts as if I had been keeping my breath underwater, the lines of pain spreading up to my ears.

Smacking the system off, the echo of the flat-line doesn't leave my ears even after the screen goes blank.

Short and shallow breaths do little, little against the void in front of me.

Procuring my comms, I quickly dial up the connection.

"Yes, Homura speaking," she answers, taking too much time.

"This is Kouzuki. Homura, did something happen to the patient in B22F?"

"Patient? Um, XO, what do you speak of?" She asks, voice a bit hoarse and low.

"I had assigned you to watch over a patient in need of care today, he was in B22F."

"I, uh, err…" she stalls a reaction, groaning for a moment. "My apologies, ma'am. It seems to have slipped my mind?"

"… Slipped your mind, huh." Are you making fun of me? Hilarious, isn't it. Yes, this is all just one big fucking joke, ain't it.

"S-Sorry, ma'am. I shall immediately-"

"No, don't even bother. Forget I said anything." Quickly cutting the connection, stuffing the comms into my pocket as I turn around, my steps blast to the door, cursing the heels for not letting me speed up further.

"P-Professor, where are you going?" Yashiro says, raising her voice in a plead for me to decelerate.

"To my office, for the readings on G-Radiation. If he slipped off to another world, then we need to start the countermeasures."

"B-But he said that-"

"Then, where is he?" I stop and walk back to her, meeting her stare. She quivers, and looks down in silence. "Yes, that's right. Let's just… get this over with." I sigh at the stare, the hand that lightly pulls at the edge of my lab coat, at what dampness builds up in her eyes. My comms beep, I press the button as I sigh, seeing Yashiro's dejected, crumbling expression as I pull away. "Kouzuki here."

"XO, would you have some time?" Marimo, huh.

"What is it now? I am rather busy."

"I only wanted to ask a single question if-"

"Out with it, what do you want?"

"About Shirogane's situation, I wanted to know if-"

"There are no updates, and there will be no updates," I spit out, turning on my heels and resuming my march.

"Huh? Wait, what do you-"

"Marimo, I don't have a single fucking femtosecond to waste right now. So please do me a favor and don't ask me about this again. Are we clear? Yes, thanks. Later." I cut the call, rolling my eyes, as I chop the elevator's button and, thankfully, the door slides open immediately.

"Are you certain it was wise to react like that?" Yashiro asks, entering the elevator and coming to my side while a hand rests on her chest that tries to ease the rhythm of her breathing.

"It is what it is, nothing we can do except damage control," I sigh, resting against the wall once the ascent starts. All of this work… to be this close… and now you're gone, just like that? Without even trying to talk with me, you just turn around and leave? "Yashiro, do you… not sense anything?" I ask, half resigned as I run a hand over my face as a sudden hold binds me, as the heavy chains cackle at me, at the coin that left my shoulders.

She looks down, joining both hands, complexion turning grim and solemn then tight, lips quivering. I shake my head, patting hers, ruffling the thin strands of hair on my fingers while I close my eyes and simply gape, to let the vile air in me leave. This void in my stomach could really use some dinner right about-

SLAP!

Her bunny ears perk up sharply, making me flinch. Eyes widening, mouth opening and closing in quick succession, mumbling something under her breath, she pales to the point of looking like made out of paper, folding on herself.

"Yashiro? Yashiro, what are you seeing?" I grab her shoulders, crouching to meet her gaze.

Which is unfocused, again piked and cracked as her hands form a lock on her stomach. And as she subtly shivers, as she avoids my eyes for some reason, she whispers in such a tiny, tiny voice, "The… forest. I can hear it, I see… that forest, and the- The dragon is roaring."

"Huh? Wait, what are-"

She tugs and pulls and tugs at my arm, yet her eyes remain scarred. Yashiro looks down, unwinding her own breath, choking my arm, sinking into the sea as she mumbles dragon and forest under her breath. Until she says something else, losing further color from her face.

"And that evil fox, too."

Jester of the Masquerade

Chapter 79:

Jester of the Masquerade

---

Walls surround it all, wobbling and flickering like candlelight. Every part of them, every brick reveals shapes and sounds of another place, colorless and see-through in their texture. A few torches grant meager light to the damp and narrow hallway, exposing more signs and visions in the structure.

Traversing the dungeon takes its time for the soldier, who finds not a single item nor valuable in the place. Only the visions that with him walk defy the deafening silence, the wails of doors in need of oil. The edification itself takes on a labyrinthine structure, staircases reversed from the ceiling that descend to no end in sight, spiraling bridges which coil upon each other, and shifting corridors from which there is no exit, only dead ends. Time had lost its meaning long ago, yet as cold seeps through his clothing, as it sticks to the skin, he cannot help but to wonder if there is any pattern to the roads ahead, above, and around.

Reaching a balcony after a large trek, gazing at the myriad of pathways under the simple candlelight causes a sinking grip to take hold of his insides. It is all too large to recognize a start much less an end, a method to the madness. He likens the winding ways to spaghetti, even some hallways do raise in a helix as if beckoned by a fork of reversed gravity. Sighing, he rubs his arms, fighting the cold, the shake of his tired legs. Allowing his rear and palms to rest on the stone tiles, in silence he admires the expansion that weaves and entwines in a seamless and endless pattern, gaze growing slack, chin faltering as if nodding off.

A sigh once escapes, he throws his back to the stone and veils his sight. Knowing the torch is soon to fade away does not spur haste to his movements, as the paths have not been merciful thus far. It is tempting, to try and jump from one to the other, to rush through it all to the end, if there is one.

He stands in slow motion, unmaking the fire with his own boots. Little point there is to trying to make out the patterns when he does not know the way in the first place. No one does, truly.

Along the shapeless hallways he walks, curling and bending and twisting at times, stretching and slowing down at others. In the darkness, only the rough shapes within the bricks act as guidance. The small bubbles which remain out of reach, out of sight yet ever-present in the back of his head. As he runs his fingertips over the rugged and cold rocks, the temptation to pull and take them with him manifests in his scratching, in the lingering of his palm over the damp wall. Sighing once more, smiling at the kaleidoscope of faces which surrounds him, he pulls away and continues his walking. For those memories shall always be by him, even long after the ones featured in them become as cold and immovable as the stones which these formless candle-walls make.

Walking upside-down in a coiling bridge, he spots a thin thread of light ahead. Finishing the circle of the bridge, a set of stairs descending he finds, illuminated by torches. The way down is uneventful, save for the walls turning to a solid rock formation, no longer reflecting moments of days past. At the end of the road, the cave expands in erosion, a small and calm road of clear water coursing through it. And beyond it, a large and regal chest adorned in gold and jewelry rests atop an ornamented altar, basking in the candlelight.

Splashing his boots in the water and carefully stepping over the rocks, he raises a brow as he approaches and circles the chest in question. Throwing small pebbles does not seem to trigger any traps, so he sighs and slowly grows closer. It takes some effort and force to lift the heavy lock, all to find the inside mostly empty.

Save for a small book of pictures, the images thus reflected on the walls. Lifting the old, tattered book makes some pages tear away from it, fluttering to the ground. Coursing through the pages proves to be as arduous as walking the hallways. Regardless of the oddity, he can't help but to continue onward. And while lingering on every image for a moment, the coldness seems to finally be lifting its grip on his person as he begins to hum a tune to the swing of the pages.

Little did he know, when he barged into a private state aboard an extra large limousine, about what would soon follow. Instinct had overtaken him when giving chase to some of them, to a rooftop despite his wounds, to the shopping district despite the reprimands that would fall on him, to a secret lab in his utter ignorance and stubbornness.

Confusing and threatening is the way forward, yet despite not knowing the way, somehow, he had always found it. Even when he looked away from it, away from the colossal waves, awaiting a hand that never reached out. Far easier it would be if answers could be provided on demand, if a hand was always at the ready to act as a guide. Yet, the path then taken would not be one's own, would it? The pressure of the second and third step is excruciating, as much as breaking the habit if you ever stop. Equally foolish to try and take the same road twice, for yesterday will never be tomorrow.

Wiping a lone tear, he closes the book and returns it to the chest, closing it afterwards. The soldier returns to the river, splashing and making ripples as he follows the small stream of water, finding an exit to the cave after some time. Looking back once he makes it outside, a castle fills his entire view, a castle in the shuffling shape of a crown, a small chain of spheres filled with constellations shining above it.

Standing over an abyss, perhaps floating would be more accurate, the castle emerges from the void, through the clouds. A myriad of roads and shapes deliver themselves to its gateway, waves coming and going about the shore in the color of the midnight sea, glimmering stars reflected in the surface as those celestial tears flash above the crown.

The towers of the edification rise and melt into the dark, the spiral bridges stretch to the point of vanishing from view. Thin, frail, almost sinking into the nothingness it stands over. Making sense of the curved, spiraling shapes that bend at impossible angles sends a small wave of dizziness to the soldier when staring too much into them, reminding him of times when trying to decipher parts of the jungle of calculus someone used to always reference. To him it all could be abstract and surreal, the odd crown-castle itself was only filled with never-ending labyrinths and, by the looks of its exterior, said corridors truly did meet no end, only merge together in an infinite loop.

The thought gets a chuckle out of him as he embraces his shoulders, wondering if he would have felt as he does now should he had always kept his memories on every single reiteration of his journey. Perhaps, it was for the best that he always returned to nothing on those first attempts. Maybe, starting over, even if it never truly was from zero, was what had allowed him to focus more on what is, what actually was, rather than on could have been, the roads he would never walk again even if in the same soil he stood upon.

And even then, in his unawareness, he probably was conscious of what had been, if only through hunches. Understanding the infinite extension of possible roads is beyond his capabilities, it would be as pointless as trying to grip onto air or shackle a river. And yet, he smiles at the winding roads that know no ending, at those that end lost within the darkness of the crown. It allows his features to relax as he rubs his legs, inhaling into the clear, saline air of the sea that greets the shore to this castle. Staring at the shower of stars that course through the unlimited paths, fighting a journey that refuses to change, there he stands in silence, in admiration of the complexity, of the reiteration. Taking one good breath he then departs from it, never looking back.

Nothing concrete is left in his hands, his ankles sink into the waves, causing a small ripple to meet the incoming tide of crystal clarity. And in between the blue waves and azure skies, the soldier walks to nowhere in particular, away from the castle and its infinite roads.

For within the void, the silence is where the deepest echoes resonate in one's soul. Long lost peers, people you've forgotten for many moons, words that had been stuck in your chest.

And despite the lack of any clear cut answer, despite having no idea which path is right, the soldier never looks back to either the castle or the stars above, marching ever forward with a destination etched behind his eyes. A flag that shall guide his steps amidst the confusion, a motive behind the actions sparked by what the unalterable complexity of the castle reminded him was truly worth safeguarding within his own crown.

---

December 4 th , near 9 AM.

(Training Field.)

[Meiya]

---

Slow sips of air I take in while blinking, the distant circle all I can see. Pursing my lips, drying them and the front of my teeth, I rub the trigger for a moment before pressing the confirmation, sending the small shock into my forearm.

Sighing and wiping my forehead, I raise from the ground and meet a glow which eclipses the incoming daylight.

"You managed to hit the target, Mitsurugi-san!" Tamase loudly declares, a smile blossoming in defiance to the descending temperature.

"Is that so?" I accept the binoculars she offers and search for the target. My shot landed on the outermost circle, yet it did meet its mark. "Sigh… So I finally can ascertain a hit to the 800 meter mark, huh. Now it's a matter of replicating this in the simulators," I mull, holding some of my hair as I look upwards, to the fleeing and formless clouds, to the faint outline of the sun that shines through them.

"I still do believe it is a good result, after all the effort you've been doing," she insists, nodding yet not meeting my eyes, minding her words. "Considering the support systems we have in our TSFs, I'm certain your mid-range will improve much from now on."

"Yes, thank you," I return the nod, gaze fleeing to the unassuming soil, the mounds and idle targets in the training field. "I do hope that is the case. Regardless, thank you for the tutoring, Tamase," I smile her way, she hurriedly waves her hands to either side.

"N-No, it's no big deal, really," she insists, almost making herself smaller. "After all, you did cover me when the guards came to, well, clear the air with us," scratching the back of her head, gaze as dull as the ground, clouded as the sun is now, she proceeds to, unnecessarily, give a bow my way.

"Sigh… There is nothing to thank me for, they were indebted to an apology," I state, the echoes of the shootings from the others coursing through the air.

"Still, I'm grateful you stood by me then," she again bows down, both tone and sight not fighting the shrouding of clouds. "And anyways," she grabs an elbow, looking upwards again, "I did owe you for when you tutored me before."

"Hm? From before?"

"Come on, remember how I never managed to even score a draw in our CQC practices? You once advised me to try and wrestle a victory in what few hits I could deliver, and taking on the mindset has aided me much. Not only for CQC, but to conserve ammo during mid-range fighting now that we're practicing in the sims."

"I see," I merely nod back to her smile as she goes prone, ready to take her shot.

Raising the binoculars to my sight, all I see is our assigned target as Tamase delivers a hit to the bullseye, to its very center. Upon my confirmation, she lets out a heavy sigh and follows it with a strong gulp, fingers coiling and uncoiling in quick succession. For someone that always excels, the pressure of the peak must be toilsome. And for her case, it must be doubly so. With the singing of thrusters and the trails of smoke from TSFs dancing in the clouds above, we continue our assigned training.

Sadly, my first shot was my best. I missed my mark against the 800 target on all follow ups whereas Tamase only missed the bullseye in one occasion. It was still plentiful enough to have her gaze stumble to the ground, posture giving in to the weight of unseen boulders and whispers.

A whistle echoes, sending shivers and eliciting perfect straightness from my posture. "Squad, assemble!" Little does it take for us all to stand before her, she gives us all a once over, hands on her waist. "Report your results."

It would seem Ayamine and Sakaki are once again tied in their efforts, neither seem antagonistic nor is there any change in posture or expression when they report the results this time. Yoroi managed to remain ahead of them, as well of myself, and Tamase still is the only one who can attempt to land a hit against the 1100 meter mark. That is, so long as you're not here, of course.

The Instructor nods, scanning our faces, for long enough that a break in the clouds allows a thread of direct light to shower over us. "Very well, decent progress. You may refresh yourselves, I await you in the classroom in half an hour. The morning training is now over.

Dismissed!" she states, we stand in attention and salute, she returns the gesture and departs.

"Siiigh… Can't believe I still can't hit the 800 mark regularly," Sakaki repines, tapping her glasses as she slouches towards a water tap.

"Gotta keep on trying. Small steps every day," Ayamine says, arms folded as she nods to herself.

"Yeah, but it kinda sucks that we still can't do something as simple as this," Yoroi shrugs, shaking her head and leaning on a wall. "Kinda hard to believe we can pilot already but still fail at the drills from basic."

"It is no failure to persevere in front of repeated setbacks," I say as I pass them, going towards the next water tap. "In comparison to previous results, we are showing improvement. There is nothing to be ashamed of." After all, there are times that, no matter the time you pour into an objective, someone will simply best your efforts with meager commitment.

Pushing the button a bit too strongly, the water hits my nose, I flinch away and cough before attempting to drink once more. How foolish of me, to still allow myself to be riled up by you. Yet, no amount of water cleanses the sourness that in me lingers. Wiping the dampness off my face, I sigh from my stomach and step away from the tap.

"I do agree with your words, to some an extent," Sakaki says, rolling up her shoulders, making her BDU flutter as she does. "It is still rather frustrating to see our sniping pale in front of Tamase's, however."

"If we were sent in a mission and she were incapacitated, I don't think anyone could match her eyes," Yoroi affirms, bending over to refresh herself.

Such words cause Tamase to compress herself as if suffering from the cold. "That's not true, I'm sure you could make do somehow. Especially now that we're piloting, the support systems can probably aid your sniping much."

"Still a bother to rely on the machine," Ayamine says, eyes narrow. "That didn't save us yesterday, it won't save us in the battlefield."

All of us look down, silence falling like dusk. How insensitive can someone be, to again bring this up. However, truer words couldn't have been spoken. Merely relying on the automated systems shan't allow improvement to flourish. If only you hadn't attacked Tsukuyomi, we could see this mock battle as a learning step. Now, instead of bestowing a tailwind, all it serves for is to remind us of the empty spot you left, the sorrowful events that in the hangar transpired. Even when you bested both cousins… all the spoils we are not capitalizing on due to your folly…

"Well, today is a new day," Sakaki says, voice raising, echoing a bit in the void of the track field. Taking some steps forward, turning around, her twintails curling over her shoulders, that finger once more traces circles. "I know our first sim run without Shirogane-kun didn't exactly end in success yesterday, but there is no point in lamenting what's already done. Are all of you on board with doing another nightly training after dinner?" All of us nod, she smiles. "I see, good to hear. Let's leave that talk for the PX, though. We do have quite the lectures left for now," she turns around, joining her hands and extending them upwards.

Yoroi once more tries and engage us in idle talk as we walk to the changing rooms to return to our fatigues, Tamase commenting on the earlier news instead of joining in the puns. Sadly, I cannot share their sudden optimism. To think that another evacuation is being considered, despite there being little to none volcanic activity. Why can't the government not respect the wishes of the people to remain in their rightful land? I wonder, what did you think of such an announcement, Sister? Was the press conference announced for tomorrow your own doing, or born from pressure of the administrators? And anyways, the army should strive to safeguard the people's wishes. It is unjust for-

"Hey, Meiya-san," Yoroi calls out, now walking in front of me, "what did you think of the poll?"

"Eh? Ah, my apologies, I was not paying attention."

"Oh, I see. Anyways," never losing the smile, she practically continues to overtake us on the hallways, as if propelled by a tailwind, "I was saying that this season of TV Mangas is really competitive, so there was a poll asking viewers which one would be the most watched by the end. I don't think there are any big releases until April next year so, which one do you think will win the title of better manga of the year?"

"Ah, well… I never really watched much TV Manga…"

Grandfather said dallying by the TV was unproductive, so we only ever saw documentaries or the news channels. Furthermore, I do believe that it detracts from the experience. Why not simply read the manga instead? Grandfather did enjoy reading with me a few, Samurai X was a marvelous experience to share with him, for example. The closeness of a reader cannot be replicated through a TV show. Also, waiting for the next episode is quite certainly torture. Albeit, the same does occur at the end of a tome in certain occasions. Cliffhangers, they must be one of the greatest sins a writer can commit.

"I think Drake Sphere Z is easily the holder of the title," Sakaki says, nodding with a shrug.

Ayamine surprisingly nods as well. "It's hands down the most popular, don't think there's anything that can match it."

"Well, I see why you'd say that," Tamase says, tapping her fingers, "but I think Tarot Catcher Cherry Blossom can be a good rival for the top spot," barely whispering, resembling more a minuscule purr, her steps wane a bit as she steals gazes at us.

"No shot frilly dresses can best the martial arts," Ayamine affirms, nodding to herself.

Which oddly causes Tamase's cheeks to balloon slightly. "Y-You don't know that. Cherry Blossom is really popular with the kids!"

"And the fujoshis," Ayamine retorts, frowning. All the rest grow silent, faces gaining heat despite no longer being outside.

"What is that supposed to mean? I have literally never heard of the term."

"Oh, those are the women that- Mmmmgh!" Yoroi is restrained by Sakaki, who binds upon her like an iron maiden.

"Don't ask, Mitsurugi. Please just don't," she then says, still maintaining her steadfast lock over Yoroi's being, who seems to be sinking upon herself the more blue her skin grows.

"Well, if you insist…" I relent, arms folding.

Sakaki sighs, releasing Yoroi who then gasps for dear life, skin regaining its proper color. She merely scratches her head along a light chuckle upon our squad leader's reprimands over 'sensitive' wording. This does somehow remind me of that one time when I asked Takeru about that special milk he had, and how strongly he refused to let me taste even a sip of it. Most unfair that is, Takeru. I was even asking sincerely and humbly then. Compared to his recent actions, that feels like such a distant memory.

Which one is the real you? The light-hearted and smiling comrade? The ruthless soldier that maimed the chasers in the CCSE and drove Tsukuyomi to true aggression?

Shaking my head, I sigh the blockade in my lungs, once more playing with my hair. "In any case, what is this 'Tarot Catcher' about? I've heard Drake Sphere is supposed to be based on a folktale, however I haven't the faintest of how one could apprehend esoteric cards."

"Oh, no, actually, the cards are magical," Tamase says, eyes glimmering once more, giving small hops as we resume our walk. "So, you see, she has to catch all the members of the Tarot and convert them from the seal of the previous owner to save her city."

"With the help of a plush lion and a totally straight angel," Ayamine deadpans, making a slow gesture with a closed hand which makes Tamase quiver, face set alight in either embarrassment, anger, or perhaps both.

"Ayamine!" Sakaki shouts, features contorting despite the flush that also permeates her face, the slow rocking of her lips.

"Why are you raising your voice? And anyways, celestial beings have no gender, do they?"

"Tell that to the writer and the rabid fans," Ayamine shrugs, brows narrowing.

"Did you… have a bad experience with this manga?"

"Well, no… The trope just annoys me, since some of my neighbors in the slums were, uh," she scratches her head, lips twisting in, shoulders compacting, "a bit too much into those types of characters. The walls were too thin and I rather forget those sounds, honestly."

"What type of sounds? What exactly are we speaking of?"

Yoroi opens her eyes wide, nodding as if in understanding. "You know, the male characters that the fujoshis-"

"Can we stop talking about that?!" Sakaki asks, paling as she facepalms, Ayamine nods and looks away, Yoroi chuckles dryly.

Tamase quivers in place for a moment before clearing her throat. "B-But you know, the last season has been really nice, going from the comments I've heard from the channels. I do somewhat miss having the time to watch it now," she then sighs and deflates, only the specter of her soul following us as she slumps to the tiles. "With how things are as of late, the show is the only way the story has to finish now that printing new material is impossible."

"That is right… It has been harsh, knowing one cannot pick up unfinished stories with the state of the nation as it stands."

Such simple a luxury, the joy of reading, has been denied to my people. And even if in the future the Empire regenerates, who knows how many literary pieces will remain forever unfinished? Our own literature will certainly be influenced by the deep marks of the invasion, as much as the scars of the world war marked the generations that after it came. That is… if we manage to remain standing, if our spirit endures these toilsome days.

"Well, I do wish we could at least be allowed to have a personal radio," Sakaki admits, playing with her twintails. "I could definitely use some background noise while reviewing my notes," she sighs, Ayamine nods.

"On that we can agree," so I nod too as my arms fold.

I have no complains about the selection of channels available in the PX, yet I am rather… hesitant to trust the veracity of a single source of information. But of course, obvious it is that Imperial stations would be banned in international soil, to avoid any possible political discourse to seep into the troop. Even so, would allowing a single channel besides the UN's one be such an impossibility? All that is allowed for us to select otherwise is the kid's channel, they are basically keeping us blind. Usually, I'd have no complains but now that this 'eruption' is being forwarded so heavily through all programs in the main channel…

"Still, Drake Sphere is taking the top spot, no doubts," Ayamine affirms, throwing a punch to the air, then places both wrists together, throwing them back and then forward, making claws with her hands for some odd reason. "Your magical girls can't do nothing against the Kamehadouken," she then smirks to Tamase's groans and squeaks.

"Ayamine, don't bully Tamase," Sakaki scolds, sighing and drawing circles again.

"I only said the truth," she shrugs, still smiling.

"We'll see about that, Ayameanie-san," Tamase retorts in unexpected tension, sharpening her gaze.

"Nah, you're all missing the obvious winner," Yoroi affirms, turning around to grin at us while walking backwards. "The second cour of Gettezinger Wing will definitely give Drake Sphere a run for its money!"

"Gettezin… What?"

"A TV Manga about a robot protecting Japan from cartoonish enemies," Sakaki notes, tapping her glasses.

"More like pro-Eishi propaganda," Ayamine retorts, rolling her eyes.

"That's not true," Yoroi retorts, eyes blazing. "Gettezinger is the ideal a pilot must strive to be! Sure, in reality we don't get any miracles in battle with something like the Zero OS to have our TSFs transform into a super robot like the Gettezinkaizer…" hunching momentarily, her backwards walking doesn't stop even as she raises and smacks her chest, "but it shows how important it is for everyone to do its share for a common goal. Gettezinger is the combined efforts of everyone in the show, that's why it's so strong. Because it carries the torch of the Empire, the fire of dreams towards the future every pilot must protect."

"That does sound compelling," I nod, Yoroi seems to gain sunshine around herself.

"Well, but remember it is a kid's show. The story-line isn't particularly a masterpiece," Sakaki notes, tapping her glasses. Once more drawing circles, her brows sink down and almost connect. "Realistically speaking, there's no way the dinosaurs or Abe-no-Seimei could stand a ghost of a chance against a real TSF."

"Dinosaurs? Wait, by Abe-no-Seimei, are you referring to the actual real life figure?"

"Yeah, the real one," Yoroi smiles and nods in quick succession, Sakaki and Tamase both sigh in unison, Ayamine gives me a narrowed stare. Oh, that's right… Yoroi does like to go into tangents about machinery, and here I am enabling her. The halo of sunshine growing behind her lithe shape, faster than suppression fire do the words flow out from her mouth. "You see, there is an arc when a portal to the past is opened, when its explained how the Gettezinger rays turned some iron into the alloy used for the machines, which is clearly just souped up Super Carbon, and why they have such crazy tech in the show, and then they have to fight the demon army of Abe-no-Seimei before-"

THUD!

Yoroi bumps into an MP, due to having been walking backwards, lost in her speech. Hurriedly turning around and giving a bow, her voice freezes back to her usual. "My apologies, sir!"

"Tch, can't you see where you're going?" The man says, unnecessarily loud, endowing a tightened expression.

"Must be truly nice, to walk as if you owned the place," a woman spits, venom slithering through her tongue. "What did we expect of that American's comrades?"

Coiling my hands in silence is all I can do. Such words did follow our steps yesterday, and Yoroi's miss would obviously be met with such hostility.

"… My apologies, I was not paying attention, sir," Yoroi reiterates, bowing down once more.

"Heh, wish I could be as carefree as a cadet again," the man says, giving us all a glare. "Of course, I didn't get the privilege to enjoy an officer's quarters back then, not to have delivered a Takemikazuchi to my doorstep."

"Yeah, we had to make due with refurb Gekishins," the woman folds her arms, brandishing fangs which drip of acid. "It's a shame the new batch doesn't get to learn proper humility, running on the hallways as they please."

"If you'd forgive me, we were not running. My comrade merely bumped into you, and she has already admitted to her mistake," I fold my arms, they glare at me.

"Oh, is that so?" The woman frowns, curling a strand of hair. "So you can have the freedom to bump into others and think a mere apology is enough to excuse your misconduct?"

"I did not-"

"We apologize, ma'am," Ayamine says, stepping forward and bumping my shoulder, bowing down by Yoroi's side. "We were simply lost in our discussion over the news of late."

"It was our miss, and it won't repeat itself. Please do accept our apologies, sir, ma'am," Sakaki follows suit, me and Tamase joining in.

"Tch… Whatever," the man waves, then pinches his nose as he walks away. "I was getting sick of the yank stench you give out. Just make sure you don't go around tackling your superiors, rookies."

The woman chuckles, also covering both lips and nose with a hand, coughing forcefully. "Well, what did we expect of these guys? If they thrashed the guards, some lowly MP aren't worth their respect, right?" And never losing the aggressive tint in their eyes, they slowly depart to the adjacent hallway, yet remain throwing glances at us.

Ayamine grabs Yoroi's shoulder and makes haste into our way to the changing room, away from their sight. No one says anything, Yoroi merely gives all a deep bow, fingers molten together in a prayer of apology, gaze dragged on the ground on the rest of the walk.

Sigh… All because of you. If we already had motives to be singled out, your folly has only made the animosity all the more strong. Loath I am to admit, this shan't be the only time altercations such as this will occur. Any excuse will be plentiful to try and spark an argument. It only proves I am right, and he should apologize to Tsukuyomi in the open as the trio did to Tamase and the rest.

… That is, whenever it is he returns. The Instructor said not a thing on the subject yet.

"Sigh… If only you hadn't attacked Tsukuyomi…"

"Hm?" Ayamine sends me a glare, unblinking.

"What?"

"You…" gaze narrowing, her hand leaves Yoroi's shoulder, crushing invisible rocks. "Are you blaming Special-kun for this?"

Imitating the expression, I scoff and look away. "It is obvious, isn't it? They not only mentioned him, but before his outburst Yoroi's miss wouldn't have been met with such hostility."

"Oh, so you're also blaming her?" She asks, the lines of fire in the frown deepening, intensifying. Yoroi looks up at me for a second, before once more turning her gaze to the ground, petrified into pure stone.

"I did not say anything of the sort, she was absentmindedly walking backwards and that was a mistake. Her apology wouldn't have been refused if not for… the particular situation we all are being made to endure," I state, arms folding, fully returning the stare that remains scanning me.

"Ayamine, Mitsurugi," Sakaki says, low, tapping her glasses, "if you start again, I will notify the Instructor of the argument."

"I was not starting anything," I turn away, nibbling at my bottom lip.

"Uncaring."

"What was that?"

"Didn't knew you were such a flaky comrade," she says, shrugging.

"You two, I told you to stop!" Sakaki orders, hitting her own thigh repeatedly.

"Not my fault she throws us under the bus without faltering," Ayamine spits out, turning away, patting Yoroi's shoulder and hastening both of their steps.

"Wait a- I did not-"

"Mitsurugi," Sakaki places a hand on my chest, shaking her head, "let it go."

"Wh- You… You certainly do not think I-"

"Stop, now. I am really going to inform the Instructor if any of you continues this argument. Ayamine dropped the issue, don't let your temper get the better of you," she says, staring straight into my eyes until I nod. She then pats my shoulder, sighing. "I know how you must feel, and even if you are right about this, there is no need to voice it out. Shirogane-kun will also be subjected to the same treatment as us, even if he apologizes for his actions."

"I am aware. I just…"

"L-Let's do our best to ignore the whispers," Tamase says, quivers more certainly, as our eyes meet. "We should make sure not to do anything wrong, and people won't have any real motives to reproach us."

"Sigh… I suppose that is the sole card left in our hand at this point," Sakaki shrugs. "Anyways, please remember not to start any arguments."

"I shan't. My apologies," she nods and us three hurry to the changing room, which Ayamine and Yoroi had already reached.

… Still, it does not change that you are the root of this state of affairs. Even when you almost bested Tsukuyomi, when you could have been a fellow… Why?

---

Same Day. Around 06:30 PM.

(Simulator Room.)

[Marimo]

---

"So, do any of you have any explanation for today's pathetic results?" The five girls drill their gaze to the ground as I stare at them. I can only sigh and shake my head at the silence.

Yesterday was the same, they failed their simulation thoroughly. I had thought that giving them some respite this morning would do them good, but the afternoon training found the same setbacks. And this last run met the same result, unchanging as the weather. Though, it's not like I don't know the reason behind their increasingly depressed mood, and I can sympathize.

Still not a single word on Shirogane's condition, absolute silence. I can't blame them for being worried, for the whispers and gazes that on their shadows linger to affect them, but for the situation to have gotten this far inside their heads?

I might need to let go off the Reaper for a moment, I wouldn't want to deal a killing blow to their morale. They were having such a good streak, for it to be demolished so completely despite the decent result of the mock battle, all things considered. Yet, being soft won't prepare them for what awaits. Yuuko won't show them no respite if they ever falter, their moods cannot be an obstacle for their duties in the STF.

Tamase and Yoroi haven't retorted at all, except for apologies. Even Ayamine has kept quiet, despite the friction I expected to see between her and both Sakaki and Mitsurugi. To further pressure them would not be wise… but reality is not particularly merciful. I suppose, it is a lesson they must learn, that they must have apprehended already, that they require for whenever it is they join the STF. I am not aiming to scar them, there's no need to go as far as I did with Isumi. All I want is for them to toughen their skin, to return my stare even if all they have to offer is an admission of failure. Be brave and show some grit, my students.

Inhaling sharply, crossing my arms as I take a stomp forward, I let the air and my voice boom from my stomach. "So no one is going to even try to speak up? What's up?! Didn't think I had trained a bunch of pansies. Is your performance so lacking it doesn't deserve even words of defense?" I glare into their eyes, which flee mine in a heartbeat.

Tamase and Yoroi hang their heads even lower, hands subtly shaking. Mitsurugi and Ayamine burn away, lips compressing and swallowing the defeat. C'mon, don't let me trash talk you!

"Instructor, we're all… stumped on the start of Level B," Sakaki says, stepping forward despite the tension in her voice. Atta girl, if the leader doesn't step up, who will? "We have never fought against so many hostiles before, so we're all… having quite some difficulties with the mission."

"Alright, I can accept that explanation. Every team gets stuck at some point," I nod, taking a step back, softening tone and expression. "Now, how do you explain your lacking attention and coordination through the development of the scenario? Frankly, you all were making splendid progress thus far, yet to see your formation crumble so easily is sending some… doubts to my prior assessment," I narrow my eyes, giving them all a side glance. Instead of raising in support of Sakaki, the other four can only lower their gazes further into the sea, drown in shame.

"We… have had our difficulties coordinating as a single element against a team with an advantage," she affirms, tapping her glasses. "If someone is to blame, I am the sole responsible. My plans… might not be the most appropriate for this situation, and that is causing our formation to not adapt as well as it should," she states, breaking eye contact.

I thought she would blame Ayamine for not following her set of rules or even Mitsurugi for the charges she continues to do. Well done, Sakaki. I suppose you truly are past placing the spotlight on the mistakes of others, instead trying make the most of the situation while shouldering the responsibilities thrust onto the leadership you have. I nod back, she returns to the line despite not dulling the paralyzing grip of tension which binds her.

However, the others have also been off. It is not solely Sakaki's miss, and a team that overburdens their leader is bound to crack apart. While I would like to compliment her for having the balls to take the blame for the team, the others need to start putting some effort into supporting her statements, too. They were making such good progress too, and that mock battle was surprisingly not bad for a couple of amateurs against Royal Guards. If only Shirogane hadn't got injured…

Ruffling my hair, looking at the sims I sigh. "I think you all know that punishments are given to the squad as a whole. I commend you for the change in attitude, Sakaki, however, you sink or swim as a group. Tomorrow, you'll have to run double the laps before the mock battle at noon," I announce, the color seems to take a bluer shade on their faces, nodding despite the paralysis they all seem to be enduring. "I expect you all to get your panties in place and start delivering good results again, and soon. You should review your strategies together to find a breakthrough in what has stumped you. That is all. Dismissed!"

"Um, Instructor…" Mitsurugi speaks up, taking half a step forward, "could you allow us one more try on the mission?"

"Hmm… Are you all in agreement?"

"Yes, ma'am," they all retort in unison, giving a bow.

"Sigh, fine. We can perform one more attempt, but only that. Failing the mission will earn you five more laps to run tomorrow. Do you accept the terms?" They all nod, tightening their expressions and postures, phalanxes about to advance. I nod with a smirk, they all smile and thank me.

They salute, but Yoroi then steps forward towards me. Not meeting my eye she speaks up in a shaky voice. "Instructor, uh, may I ask if have you received word about Shirogane?" The rest fixate their gaze on me, looking like abandoned puppies, the luster present moments ago vanishing like coffee in front of Yuuko.

When did they become so dependant on him? They weren't like this before he arrived… I mean, it's not like I haven't noticed their change in attitude after the CCSE, but still. I am glad Shirogane pushed them to improve, and seeing him sharpen his already exquisite skillset was a pleasure to behold, even if he was also a natural on the cockpit. But he didn't teach them the most important thing: how to fight without him.

If Arai suddenly disappeared one day during our piloting training regime, I would have felt off too. The rapport that's built between comrades is one hell of a drug, when someone you're used to work with leaves or dies, it isn't easy to find another you're comfortable with so quickly. They're experiencing that right now. And after the whole mess it caused, the rumors and all that crap. That's why I cannot entirely blame them for the failures thus far. Level B is a step up in complexity for the missions, what with the hampered datalink and multitude of sniping TSFs. And Shirogane was the central pillar, the playmaker of their team. The covering cloak that safeguarded Ayamine's and Mitsurugi's charges, the baton that signaled the tempo of Yoroi and Sakaki, and the shield that ensured Tamase could have the space and peace to land her shots.

And now he's gone, and they can't deal with the void.

I would like to know what was of him, but Yuuko refuses to tell me anything. He was supposed to be on the infirmary on B5F, but she moved him somewhere else and I can't access his data. What the fucking hell is she doing to him?! I knew he had an S5 lock when he arrived, and parts of his data were still locked, but to not disclose his situation in the slightest?

I can only heave a sigh and shake my head. "I have received no words. I will try to ask around for anything, but even then there should be no need to worry. Shirogane should be returning to the squad soon enough." The relief in their eyes is palpable, their postures lose tension. Well, let's give them a little poke. "I'm sure you all miss Shirogane much, seeing him in the suit during training. Those abs and that butt must be a nice motivation source for you, am I right?" A flinch, a flush, clogging on their throats remain their voices, except Ayamine who just glares back while the rest dig their gaze to the ground.

Sigh… You have no idea how much I envy you. To be young and passionate again. Enjoy these feelings while you can, girls. One day he might really die, and maybe you'll regret not voicing your affection for the rest of your life. Just like me, but in the end it was going to be pointless. Sigh… Being alone is what suits me best anyways.

"Instructor… Please do not mock us." Mitsurugi looks up, unsheathing her glare, vanquishing the emotions. "We all are merely concerned over the state of cadet Shirogane, nothing else," she states, nodding to herself. I would believe you, if not for how much you in particular stare at him.

"Come on, loosen up a bit," I smile at them, shrugging lightly. "You all have been fighting like a barrel full of shit, and it's not because you lack the skill. He isn't dead, he's just recovering from the shock. Don't let this get to you, some comrades will be sent to medbay more times than you'll be able to count, believe me," I say, low, they all nod and sober up again. "Well, let's get on with the training. To your units!"

Without the waste of a second, they turn and hurry to the sim assigned to each. Rubbing my nose, I can only sigh again. I am not expecting any change in this last run, but hopefully they can get used to his absence with more drills. Even after he returns, I should keep Shirogane from enabling these bad habits that came to light. Hmm… I know, let's have them all fight together, as a real squad. No point in repeating isolated battles, and I'm not too confident I'll be able to properly focus on two battles at the same time for too long this late.

Sitting back at my post, quickly prepping the settings takes me no time. Surprisingly, they have no qualms with my idea, asking me only a minute to debate their strategy. And so, deciding to spectate during the early portion of the mission, I push the buttons, the green light filling my monitor, those five faces submerging in tension as the starting sign goes up.

Five pods are roaring in the rather empty room, the remaining soldiers idling by deciding to head to the PX. The dots start to stop their advance, heartbeats escalating. Once again, unable to break the lock of the aggressors.

"04, stop breaking formation!" Sakaki shouts, trying and failing to grant cover to Ayamine's advance, resulting in a hit to an arm, a loss of a rifle.

Instead of compacting their formation, cover each other's flanks, Mitsurugi rushes forward once again, spraying her shots pointlessly. Despite shooting down one aggressor, she is easily overpowered and forced to retreat. Again trapped in a narrow area, she, Ayamine and Sakaki have been disconnected from Yoroi and Tamase, who cannot grant cover or support as they're trading volleys with the second flight of hostiles.

"I was only acting as a vanguard should!" Mitsurugi raises her voice and shield. "You have not given me the appropriate cover thus far, 01."

"Even if you're the vanguard, you have to remain close to your allies! We have to retreat and regroup with 03 and 05," Sakaki orders, firing missiles to facilitate the tactic.

"What are you saying? If we break through the blockade, this flight will fall!" Mitsurugi protests, insisting on the aggressive idea. "03 and 05 possess the skill to handle their adversaries at mid-range, retreating will only have us pincered!"

"02 kinda has a point," Ayamine says, low, "but we can't simply head to meet their aggro like this. I suggest a hit and run approach to regroup afterwards," she suggests, dropping her blade and finding the rifle she had lost. At least she's starting to cooperate.

Mitsurugi protests, the buildings they're hiding behind begin to crumble. Yoroi and Tamase are forced to flee, the lack of coordination separates them further from the other three. Sigh… It's always those seconds, those precious seconds that in real life would cost you your life.

Taking off my headset, I pinch my nose while inhaling slowly, wanting to cough. "Can't believe you're all doing worse than last time. Seriously, this is all Shirogane's fault."

"What is my fault now?"

"Wh- S-Shirogane?!" I jolt up, and to my surprise I find the messy chestnut hair and eyes returning my gaze, a brow raised in puzzlement.

He then stands upright, his rather long hair fluttering as he salutes me with a small smirk. "Good evening, Instructor. It's been like three months since we last saw each other. How's it going?"

What the- How is he- Why didn't I get a- No, focus! I cough as I stand up, pressing the buttons for the simulation to proceed without my input. Waving my bangs and straightening myself, I stare into him, his cheery expression does not change in the slightest.

"Shirogane, first of all, how are you feeling?"

"I'm fine, thanks for asking, ma'am."

"I see… I suppose you've suffered no lasting injuries?" He shakes his head, bangs fluttering. "Was your hair always this long?"

"Huh?"

"Your hair, it's down to your shoulders. I do not recall it being this long." Also, what is up with that odd headband he's wearing?

"… That's what you're concerned with, Instructor?" He gives me a side glance, brows narrowing.

"Ahem… Well, matters not," I might be misremembering, after all. "In any case, I assume you were sent here to train?"

" Vice Commander Kouzuki sent me to watch the evening training, and left to your judgment if I should join in the sim runs. I'm here merely to stand and show myself, basically."

"Is that so? Then, let me cut to the chase." I take a step closer, narrowing my eyes, aiming my barrel, the scythe at him. If there is any doubt on what transpired… "What happened during the mock battle, Cadet Shirogane?"

"I got triggered by the words 1st Lt. Tsukuyomi said to me during our fight."

"Triggered?"

"Uh, really angry, I mean. She kept taunting me, saying stuff she shouldn't have. After she knocked me to the ground I hit my head hard, and then I snapped. And when I tried to attack her seriously, my body couldn't take all the G-Forces of my movements, apparently. I won't make excuses for my behavior, I made a miss and caused the base unnecessary problems," he then gives me a deep bow.

His voice did not falter, but it lacks the usual cheer, the energy he always exuded. Almost as if reading a script. When returning himself upright, his composed expression meets mine in silence, not losing the small smile.

With the explosions in the monitors as the sole background noise, I merely nod. "I see. Then, what exactly happened to you? Anything I should know of, possible injuries, any further punishments, or where you were so far. Since you were taken off the medbay in B5F I assume you must have had some… complications?"

"Oh, kinda. Turns out that jumping off a cliff ain't exactly a good idea, you see."

"What? Wait, what are-"

"Luckily there was enough snow to break my fall, otherwise things would have gotten ugly for real," he continues, unabated, giving small nods to the air. "And that we landed close to that cave that connected to the way back, too. A nat twenty, that was."

"Excuse me, where and how did-"

"And don't get me started on the mess that came with those twin babel towers of cake. I could feel my body giving up any and all hopes of a healthy life in front of that. Seriously, that was like dooming me to having diabetes."

"… Shirogane, what exactly are you talking about?"

"I'm answering your question, ma'am, of course," he smiles, arms crossing. "My time away was rather eventful, you see."

Blinking erratically, I cannot compute his words. Only an explosion in the monitor breaks me away from the incoming headache. "So you're telling me you, somehow, dealt with all that while incapacitated? Perhaps, you should have remained resting if you were made to face such excruciating trials in the medbay," I mock, shrugging, narrowing my eyes.

He simply nods, scratching the back of his head. "Should have stayed chillin' there according to Kouki, but you guys would miss me if I did. So here I am, with no more continues to spare. I know things won't be particularly smooth from now on, but I shall not allow any whispers to bring you or the squad further problems, Instructor," he says, poker face in place as he salutes me again.

"… Shirogane, while I am thankful for the last phrase, the rest makes absolutely no sense at all. Is this some kind of joke?"

"No, you ordered an answer out of me and I obliged. However, the orders from Vice Commander Kouzuki supersede yours, so all I can do is give you a random answer instead," he says, breaking eye contact. "If you want to know what was of me and why was I not allowed to rejoin the squad today, you are free to request the report from the Vice Commander, if you so desire."

"Sigh… You could have said she forbade you from speaking, you know?"

"She didn't do that, though."

"Then, why-"

"I'm being," he smiles, shrugging, "careful. So," he turns to the monitors, "looks like they're having a hard time, huh."

"Well, it is obvious. Level B is where most cadets face their first roadblocks, after all."

"So what made you say their performance is my fault?" He raises a brow, staring.

"Because their cooperation dropped faster than a brick thrown into a lake since the mock battle with the guards. Now that you're not there to cover their flanks, their formation is crumbling. Even some of their moves are less polished than before, losing luster, speed, and precision. It's as if their lessons were slipping from their minds when inside the cockpit." I sigh, shaking my head as Tamase gets shot down. It does happen at times to rookies, they zone out and their mind goes blank. Learning to fight the freeze reaction is a must, however, so these training runs are not completely pointless.

"… Slipping their minds, huh," he comments in a whisper, features tightening. "So Instructor," he looks back at me, straight into my eyes, completely firm and sober, "should I remain watching the training?"

"Are you suggesting… you wish to join in the run?"

"If you so allow," he smiles, standing in attention.

"… Do you have the permission for it?"

"I wouldn't be here otherwise. Of course, you can contact the Vice Commander if you so desire," he gives a little bow, that small, almost creepy smile never vanishing.

It's odd, Yuuko wouldn't omit such a detail. Sure, she does tend to 'forget' to mention stuff to me but something like this deserves a report. I suppose, she did tell Shirogane about it and he's merely being… careful as he mentioned. His skin tone is even, there are no motes or redness to it. No eyebags, no delay in his words or gestures, truly polished and refreshed. Perhaps a bit too well, for how he should be after such a crash. And that smile, the mini smirk that refuses to leave, the stare that dives into mine and nowhere else, refusing to let go.

"… I assume you will be allowed to take part in mock battles from now on?"

"I do not know. Vice Commander Kouzuki did not mention that to me, I assume I might be losing the chance to properly pilot as punishment for my miss," he affirms with a nod.

"Is that so? Well, there's little to be done. It is rather late already… but if you have been given leave of medbay, let's have you make up for the time lost. You may go to get changed into your suit," he nods, smile widening, "however," I place a hand on my waist, raising my voice and chin, for the few onlookers that have not stopped staring, "due to your folly, I shall have you attempt this mission on your own. Also, I will not tolerate any misconduct from now on. Are we clear?"

Without even gaining tension, without changing his posture, he salutes me. And gains a wider smirk, showing me his teeth, as his eyes narrow and tighten, clashing waves within them. "Of course, ma'am."

Saying nothing else, he turns on his heels and exits the sim room in a jog. I glare at the eyes that snooped about, sending them packing. Sigh… Well, at least he's back and uninjured. Even if his spirits seem a bit too high, Shirogane might be trying to cheer himself up for all I know. Frankly, I cannot imagine how Yuuko must have reprimanded him once he woke up. Thinking twice, he didn't refer to her as 'Sensei' even once during our talk, did he? The reaction to my last words… is perhaps how he might be feeling inside as of now. I can't believe he came up with such a tale upon my question, though.

Rechecking on the mission, seeing they were again on the losing side sends another sigh down my throat. Idly watching the monitor, I pick up my comms and search for Yuuko's personal ID. Calling her own unit is only in case of emergencies, but I believe I deserve a small report as of now. Though, time might be something she's lacking right now, to have chosen to send Shirogane just like that.

The tone rings for a moment, before the line picks up. "Kouzuki here," Yuuko says, sober and still. Stinging like snow hitting my face.

"XO, would you have some time?" I ask, slow.

"What is it now? I am rather busy."

"I only wanted to ask a single question if-"

"Out with it, what do you want?" She hurries, barely restraining the blizzard.

"About Shirogane's situation, I wanted to know if-"

"There are no updates, and there will be no updates," she spit out, almost hateful.

"Huh? Wait, what do you-"

"Marimo, I don't have a single fucking femtosecond to waste right now. So please do me a favor and don't ask me about this again. Are we clear? Yes, thanks. Later."

Only the empty tune echoes into me after the angered retort. No wonder he choose to play dumb, when Yuuko grows this sharp and cold there is nothing to be done. I assume, something delicate is going on behind curtains and has upset her greatly. Shirogane might be related to it, perhaps not, maybe she simply sent him back due to not having time to properly explain anything to me. Maybe she simply moved him to another medbay to prevent any altercations with other soldiers. Having to 'waste' time on Shirogane when other more delicate issues pile on the timetable must have caused her a headache. In which case, Yuuko's venomous words must have been reprimand enough for Shirogane.

Turning my attention to the training once more meets me with a new and more compact formation, a diamond pattern to their flight. No longer having long range options now that Tamase is gone has forced them to try and pierce through the pincer together.

A few volleys meet their mark, ammo is running low in complete opposition to their heartrate. Windows are blasted, specks of glass flutter amidst the gunpowder and pitch-dark smoke. Fire follows their foot-marks, preying upon their shadows. Missiles rain down, preventing their advance, a ring of fire surrounding their every flank.

"Looks like them rookies are havin' a rough time," someone comments, looking up I find a light blue gaze and a hand raising in a wave. "Hey, Instructor. How's everything today?" Hayase says, cracking a smile.

"Sigh… I suppose you can guess."

"Stumped on Level B, huh," Munakata chuckles, drinking from a small can. "I guess even your best cadets will face such a challenge at times."

"Everyone does, really. I only hope this doesn't stall them for long," I say, rubbing my forehead while stealing a glance at the monitor, the advance of the blue dots. "So, what are you two doing here?"

"Just bored," Hayase shrugs, finishing her can, crushing it and throwing it towards a bin. "Our trainings are done for the day, and we just got a lot to think about."

"We were hoping to borrow the sims for a moment," Munakata says, then looks to the monitors, grasping her chin, "but I didn't think there would be still someone training this late."

"They get points for persevering," Hayase nods to the monitor. "Still, I do pity them. At least the Reaper didn't have us train until this hour," she chuckles back at me.

"Honestly, perhaps I should have," I return the smile, shaking my head. "Might have done something to mend those manners of yours, Hayase."

"Oh, Instructor, don't be silly. You can't improve what's already perfect," she says, giving little pats to her biceps. "You and I both know I shall forever be your number one pupil."

"Heh, I wouldn't be so sure. Someone did thrash you really badly a few days ago," Munakata says with a smirk, raising a single brow as she slits her throat with a thumb, which obviously makes Hayase seethe for a second.

"Wait, really? Hayase, someone bested you?"

"Eh? Ah, w-well… It was a draw, in all honesty," she says, curling a strand of hair, compacting her posture.

"Still, to have driven you to such lengths… I am amazed, honestly."

"If only she had relied on her comrades instead," Munakata comments, resting on Hayase's shoulder, poking the outer rim of the closest ear. "You truly should have done something about this gal's addiction to close combat, Instructor."

And again, they start to argue. At least Hayase now has someone who complements her well, even if it infuriates her. Despite all that has happened since then, to see you two can still joke about a defeat is a small consolation. Perhaps, one day, these five will see this day in the same manner. Despite the fact that they're almost out of ammo and- Oh, now Mitsurugi got shot down. Well, I suppose this shall end in another loss.

Looking up as my two pupils watch the monitor amidst their bickering, I spot Shirogane as he comes closer, trying to adjust his headgear to not catch onto his hair or conflict with the headband he still has on him. For some reason, his steps freeze when seeing Hayase and Munakata. Taking on a more sober expression and in slow motion he approaches, keeping a mindful space between himself and the two women.

"Hm? Who're you?" Hayase asks as she sees him.

"Isn't he… Oh, the sixth guy from the squad, right?" Munakata nods, ruffling her hair.

"Yes, that's me," Shirogane replies, barely audible. "Good evening, 1st Lt Hayase, 1st Lt Munakata," saluting them, his eyes do not fully meet theirs.

They return the gesture, Hayase with both brows corking down. Before she blasts forward, eyes widening. "Ah! You're the one who bested my record in the sims!"

"Yes, that's right. The hotshot here might truly take your number one spot, 1st Lt Hayase," I remind with a smirk, giving a light pat to Shirogane's arm as I start configuring the sim unit for him.

"Mmgh… We'll see, we'll see. Anyways, you, Shirogane."

"… Yes?" He replies, still minding his tone and space.

She smirks, flashing him a gun with a hand. "I sincerely hope we can one day cross strikes. I owe you quite a debt, you see."

"A debt?" He raises a brow, tilting his head.

"In all honesty, we should probably thank you," Munakata says with a nod, no second layer to her words. "Thanks to that superb showing on your first sim run, we seem to be close to rehabilitating Hayase here."

"Oi, mind your words, you traitor," she spits out, eyes roaring in storm.

"You… still remember that?" He asks, blinking fast, features relaxing.

"Of course I do!" Hayase bursts forward, again flexing an arm, making a gun. "One of these days, you and me are gonna have a match to see who's the real top scorer of this Surface Pilot Academy, Eight-kun."

Coughing as I stare to dispel her usual aggro, she gives a minute nod in apology. However, when I look back at him, I find him chuckling lightly and losing the smirk, instead replaced by a smile, small, honest, as he no longer stands in attention and lowers his guard.

"I see… It'll be a pleasure to spar with you, if we ever get the chance to," he nods, with the usual cheer back in his eyes.

Which sends starlight into Hayase's, who lightly chuckles. "Heh, I knew you and I would see eye to eye. Still, compared to that day, you do look kinda…" she bends and tilts her head, staring at him from different angles, "different. What's up with your hair?"

"Oh, so you like guys with long hair. I didn't-"

"Shut it, Munakata!"

"You two, keep it down," I remind, both of them give a little nod, Munakata giggling, Hayase groaning. "Shirogane, don't let them intimidate you. These two are always like this."

"Haha, no, it's fine, really. And about the hair, I'm just too lazy to cut it, that's why I, uh, have the headband in place, too," he admits, poking the odd, mechanical-looking add-on.

"I see… So, you're going to train at this late hour?" Hayase inquires, smirking a bit as she taps her lower lip. "I like your moxie, kid. Lemme see if you besting my record was a fluke or not."

"If he breaks another record, should I tell the Captain-"

"You're dead if you do!"

"Hayase, really, don't be so hostile," I sigh and shake my head, she nods an apology. "Furthermore, he's going to be taking on the mission on his own due to… certain circumstances. Don't make a bet out of this."

"Wow, really? But I…" she scratches her cheek, stealing glances at him, "I thought both sides had chosen to apologize to the other. Hey, you're really being punished?" She asks, getting closer.

"Why do you ask?" He counters, not minding the intrusion on his personal space, not changing his expression a single bit.

"Well, if you are, then that means the Captain- I mean, the UN is admitting to-"

He starts to chuckle, halting her spiel with a raising handwave, making Hayase and Munakata both share a puzzled gaze. "I am only being punished for being a fool and letting things escalate. Do not think too hard about it, please."

"Is that so?" Neither of them seem to buy into his words, sharing another pondering look.

"In any case, Shirogane, get to unit number six," he nods, giving a salute to the two of them before walking his way to the unit. "Sigh… You two, you better not delve too deep into his situation. Even I didn't get any answers thus far."

"Huh?! Really?" Hayase recoils, gulping.

"Yes, Shirogane was prohibited from mentioning anything, and me delving for a simple answer ended very poorly. Give him some space if you see him on the hallways, please," I ask, both of them immediately nod back. I return the gesture with a smile as I finish the setup on Shirogane's sim. "So how is Isumi faring?"

Munakata chuckles dryly. "The Captain is as immutable as ever. It seems an important mission for us is in the horizon, so our regime was made more severe from today onward."

"Kinda feels like we're back at basic under you," Hayase comments with a smile.

"Really? Is she overburdened at the time?" I know Isumi can be too harsh on herself, on her plans and ideas, but she never, and I mean never, has gone as far as I did during my training drills. And to make both Hayase and Munakata voice the admission to the enhanced intensity, what manner of course has she devised?

"No, it's not that," Hayase scratches her ear, as if unsure on continuing. "You see, the Captain lost a bet and the new methods we're testing are a bit, uh, how to put it…"

"Unorthodox and quite savage," Munakata says, in complete sobriety. "Frankly, we were expecting to run into you either in the PX or the hallways, and wanted to ask for your input on some maneuvers we're having trouble with. We, uh, thought to be making decent enough progress, until we ran into a certain roadblock a few days back."

"I see… I suppose I can give the control logs a look, if Isumi and Yuuko gave you permission."

"Sigh… Thank you, Instructor!" Hayase beams at me, Munakata instead gives a bow. "We can't share everything with you, but there are a few pages we did get the permission for. Can we pass by your room tomorrow before roll call?"

"Yes, I do not mind. Oh," the red alert sounds, the last of them was shot down. "The exercise has finished. Cadets, you may disembark," I speak as I shut off the units and projection, sighing as I see Ayamine hit the unit and Sakaki grip at her face, the rest merely unable to even lift their chins.

"Should we give you some space?" Munakata asks, I nod and they move out of sight, back to the rails.

I move to meet them, all of them stall their descent from the sims. Slow and unsteady are their steps, even more their gazes. I don't know what is in worse shape, the virtual pincushions their TSFs ended up as or their current expressions. Standing in a line, forcing the hands to remain by the seams, the gazes locked at an invisible target, they await my words as I scan them, one by one, top to bottom, leaving my eyes on theirs for a second.

"… Well, I certainly didn't expect you would best the course in this attempt," a flinch, lips regressing, eyes wishing to squint, "and there is much you did wrong in this occasion. There is little else to comment on, save for the fact that I believe you should already have the answers to the problem you are facing in this mission. Try and think from your comrades' point of view, hasten your decisions, and you will clear all drills that remain in your way. That is all. Dismissed!"

"Salute!" All of them do so, relaxing, sinking once I return the gesture.

"Now squad, there is one last matter we must tend to," I say, arms folding, and all of them stall a reaction, looking at me. "As you were partaking in the training, Shirogane came to announce his return to the curriculum."

"Huh?! Really?" Sakaki asks, almost stuttering.

"Instructor, was he unhurt?" Yoroi comes a few steps closer, hands joined tightly.

"Did he receive any punishments? Or injuries?" Tamase follows right after, staring unblinking.

"… Where is he now?" Ayamine inquires, looking around, then silently holding my gaze.

"Alright, calm down! Back to the line!" They again form up, not regaining their stiffness, still staring in worry. Siiigh… "Shirogane was not injured, and seems to be fine. He cannot disclose whatever kept him away today, nor anything regarding what could have been arranged between him and the guards. However, since he has missed a day of training and was feeling up to the challenge, he is now in unit six at the ready to partake in the same course you've been taking thus far."

"What?!" Mitsurugi's eyes contort, breaking formation. "Instructor, I do not believe it wise. If he was kept in medbay for an entire day, allowing him into the sim is-"

"A few hours won't truly make any difference, Mitsurugi. If he was given permission to come by, it is fair to assume he is well enough to resume his training. Also, this is a sort of punishment for him," I say, endowing a colder, slower tone. "Since his actions have caused this squad too much trouble already, I believe having him train on his own at night to be a fitting arrangement." And it will keep anyone that thinks he's moving on without repercussions.

"… Ma'am, that is not a wise decision," Ayamine retorts, eyes narrowing. "To single out a member of the team will only work to the detriment of the whole unit. We sink or swim as a unit, thus I believe continuing to train together would be in our best interests," she says, firm and unwavering, even in front of my direct stare.

"… That is fair. However, individuals can also be punished on their own. Do no think you can shield yourselves behind your unit, you shall be held accountable personally if there are repeated issues of misconduct. This is merely my way to test Shirogane, nothing else.

Now then, you may retire to the changing rooms or stay here and watch his run," I nod their way, returning to my seat.

All five of them huddle close and debate, Ayamine again saying something or the other as she moves away which causes Mitsurugi to try and follow after, raising her voice, yet is restrained by both Tamase and Yoroi jumping in front of the volleys. Their ruckus calms down as they realize there are a few onlookers, deciding to remain close to watch, then left to suffer through whatever Hayase and Munakata are saying in dares when they approach, both wearing smirks. Sigh… Please don't add fuel to the fire, you two.

Putting my headset on, everything in sight is in working order. A moment of checks and confirmations, I bring his unit into the view. "06, are you prepared?"

"06, all green. Ready and in standby," he nods in the projection, a sharp, piercing tint to his eyes as he grips the controls a few times.

"Alright. The course is due to start in T minus One. Be at the ready," I tell, he nods and, again, gives out a small smirk.

Only after the initial beeps resonate, only after his dot blasts away towards the enemy do I realize he had a particular choice of loadout on his virtual Fubuki.

Two blades held in a reverse grip, a single rifle in the pylon which was active and ready to fire.

"This is my life, a survival that knows no end," I hear in a tune over my headset. The smirk in place, a gentle swing of his head, Shirogane sings.

Even as the enemies all fall upon him, he continues to press on through the fire downpour. Singing out of tune all the while, he slices the aggressors in twain, no hesitation in the approach.

From a barrel roll into a bounce on an enemy, altering his speed in zigzags, drawing arcs over the smoke, landing behind the chasers, his blade falling upon them like curtains. Those who try and prey upon his shadow find the pylon's stare transfixed onto them, even the fleeing ones cannot match his tempo.

Not a single speck of damage, save for the one he inflicts onto the frame with his piloting. Not having used even half of his fuel thus far. And yet, his eyes are almost closed. Squinted, downcast, as if he were, perhaps, watching an old photograph. The singing turning into a whisper, a sigh giving out.

Hayase remains fixated on the monitor, slack-jawed and wide eyes even as Munakata shakes her shoulder, also looking slightly disturbed for some reason. The other five simply stare, as gargoyles atop a castle.

I, too, can only stare as my mouth becomes dry and air fails to reach inside. Not at the violent mirage that conquers the danger zone, but at the lone tear that drips from the fallen expression Shirogane makes, letting out a repressed howl through gritting teeth as his spinning attack rends an element apart, as his reverse grip grows intimate with cockpits and engines.

As he slumps into the seat once the mission is over, hiding his face from view, I take off the headset, shut off the projection. And choose to allow him to rest, until he tames the hiccups in his breathing.

Nidhogg & Freyja

A/N: A lot of stuff coincided in this chapter so it got really long and tedious at times. I decided to place all the 'infodumps' here to avoid bringing it all up at other times, and bring the story to the point it was before the rewrite faster.

I concur maybe not all it was 'needed', but decided to roll with it just in case some stuff wasn't clear enough. I know the pacing is slower than a snail, but I hope what little milestones are ahead don't feel out of place. On one hand, I managed to minimize a lot of the explanations from the OG Ch 51 so I'm happy. On the other, this is still over 20k words, so yeah :/. It kinda sucks seeing I can't write shortform to save my life.

Also, a small warning. I don't think I can make Yuuko justice. I've tried, I've thought hard about the characterization, but I am not happy with the result and I know canon Yuuko wouldn't let things play out as they do. I don't think I can write her better as I am now, to find credible reasons for her to go along with the plot more than anything, so brace yourself for some OOC-ness from her. I decided to just roll with it and stop fretting over Yuuko, if I ever manage to grip onto a proper voice for her I'll try and fix the dialogues then.

That's all for now. Thanks for reading. Stay safe.

Zuoriel

---

Chapter 80:

Nidhogg & Freyja

---

December 4th. A few minutes before 8 PM.

(In front of the changing rooms.)

[Marimo]

---

"-and that is the whole theory behind my spinning attacks, ma'am," Shirogane ends with a nod, still standing in attention by the exit of the changing rooms, back to his fatigues.

My feet move backwards on their own as I rub my forehead, running a finger across it as I sigh the cloud of needles from myself. There are some parts I do comprehend of the explanation, but the whole 'stun-lock' on the sensors was beyond me. To his credit, all those savage maneuvers truly did meet their mark. If Shirogane had a more robust TSF at his disposal, I fear to imagine what could he come up with. If there are any leftover Takemikazuchi units from that unexpected delivery we had before when he eventually joins the STF, he might end up committing war crimes against the BETA.

Isumi, you have my condolences whenever it is you're left dealing with that. At least I only have to oversee Shirogane under his cadet regime while he has locked jump thrusters and a base Gekishin at this disposal. Merely thinking on what acrobatics he could try even with a Shiranui is enough for fissures to crack up once more on the back of my head.

"Still, with a theory backing your moves or not, attempting them with a Fubuki against so many opponents was madness. If you are still allowed to partake in mock battles, you are forbidden to engage in these maneuvers of yours, Shirogane," I order, folding my arms.

He nods, a slight delay as his features compact in dejection. "Understood, ma'am."

"In any case, you truly did break any and all records we had for that level," I admit, sighing.

What few onlookers remained in the sim room simply were left speechless, and the other five also lost their voice at the utter massacre he caused in the simulation. Even Hayase was completely flabbergasted at the results, although I believe the evil stare she and Munakata were giving him was unwarranted. It was almost as if they had seen the ghost of an old nemesis appear before them.

"To be fair, I did try and fight to the best of my abilities," he says, raising a finger as he nods. "You could say I… remembered something important, and decided to try and see if I could bring myself to," his eyes veer upwards, but the ceiling is not what the steeled gaze is looking at, "burn everything in front of me to cinders."

"… That is quite the, ahem, violent turn of phrase, don't you think?"

"Doesn't make it any less accurate, though," he counters as he nods, scratching an ear.

"While that is true, you do realize such aggressive patterns will only garner further attention onto your person, right? As effective as your run was, you fought as if you were out for blood, Shirogane," I state, holding his gaze.

That then burrows away, shoulders and lips sinking and sinking. Until from beneath the beaten expression raises steeled tension, a sharp inhalation, once he meets my stare again. "Well, can I be level with you, Instructor?"

"You mean, honest? Feel free to speak as you will," I nod, he sighs and returns the gesture.

To then fold his arm and tighten his face further, releasing the pin of his temper. "I don't give a fuck what a no-name random character may have to say or think about me. I'm gonna keep doing what I believe is best to deliver victory in the battlefield."

"Your cadet course is not a battlefield, Shirogane. And even then, I am not training you to be a killing machine. Such a high-speed line-piercing approach cannot be replicated by an element, and even if it worked out in the sim, it is only worth as a last gambit for when you're out of options. I understand the frustration you might be feeling at this turn of events, more considering what transpired during the CCSE, but do not let your vision become tunneled into a single road. That is not… a mindset you should embrace, believe me."

"I stand by my words, ma'am. And still, better to have the out for those scenarios, right?" He retorts, standing stiff, never lifting his gaze from mine. "After all, I never know when my superiors will ask me to volunteer to hold the line on my own."

"… What?"

"Surely you know what I'm talking about, Major Jinguuji," blazes behind the thicket of smoke, the same torn and burning expression I saw in the mirror… when I was lost as the Reaper… "My superiors won't hesitate to accept any 'volunteers' that want to depart to the frontlines, even if it means leaving a lone soldier to hold the entire firmament on its back."

"… I did not know you were aware of my prior rank," I inquire, leaning forward, eyes narrowing, their backside hurting for a moment.

"I'm not holding anything against you, ma'am."

"Is that so. Then, why bring this up?" Why use the same words… I employed back then?

Yes, I couldn't reject any volunteers to send to patch up the vanguard since I had to coordinate the troop's movements, I couldn't risk myself to be shot down and leave all of them on their own. Not even once did that work out, I knew I was sending them to their deaths. I guess, that's where my nickname came from. The call of the Reaper, the strike of the scythe, Jinguuji's order to assist the vanguard.

… When was it that I simply started thinking it couldn't be helped and kept on sending numbers at the BETA just to reach the arbitrary goal of the mission? When did I stop thinking on keeping them alive? When was it… that the same scorching expression that I'm gazing upon started making its way into my comrades' faces and mine?

But how does he- No, why does he know? Was it all a mere coincidence he used those words? Or Yuuko… did you tell him?

Not relenting under my stare, unblinking and stoic, the pressure slides off him like water off a cliff, failing to erode anything at all. "Because I believe these moves are necessary for the future," he affirms in slow words, giving the wall a small hit. "These 'savage maneuvers' are what could make a difference in the frontlines, I believe. So I'm going to continue to employ and hone them, until I can reca- recommend others to imitate them. Regardless of whatever whispers may brew about me, I ain't going to back down from this, ma'am. So, I must insist that you grant me permission to employ them during the simulations, at the least," he asks, bowing down.

"… And if this course of action causes you and the squad further setbacks?"

He smirks again, scoffing lightly. "Don't worry, Instructor. If I fall, it'll be on my own. Be sure of it."

"Even if the squadron doesn't suffer any repercussions from your actions, you, as a soldier, should know that-"

"And you should know who brought me here, and what duties lay on my shoulders, ma'am."

"What? Excuse me, what does that mean?" I shoot a gaze across the nearby area, only finding Yashiro awaiting us to finish down the hallway. Still, I slash the distance between us, lowering into a whisper. "Shirogane, is this also related to your special missions then?"

And he looks down, heaving a sigh. "I cannot tell you anything, ma'am. But there are certain… metrics, let's call them, that I need to clear in my personal missions. For what is expected of me…" frowning, eyes set alight, "to ensure tomorrow never becomes yesterday, there are a few things I need to achieve." Sighing, throwing his full weight against the wall, he looks at me, or rather, in my direction. "Mastering the spins is but one of such objectives. As badly as this might sound to your ears, I cannot allow the opinions of any third party to impair my performance. So, if you forgive my bluntness, I do not give a single fuck about what any other soldier in this base has to say about my attitude or performance. They're gonna have to beat me in a cockpit before I change my ways."

I backhand the air, exhaling through clenched teeth. "And what of your career? Your records will be affected by this way of acting. Surely you are aware of how detrimental this will be for you."

"Instructor," he chuckles, yet as he smiles a few teeth sink onto his bottom lip, "you and I both know I most certainly won't be alive to see 2002 start. The STF does have a shitty survival rate, after all."

"H-Huh? What… did you…" I gulp, it feels as if it were pure ice. His eyes don't waver, the almost battered expression leaves after a slow shake of his head. "… How much do you know? And why haven't I received a report on this?"

"Because you won't be getting a report," he answers immediately, regaining the usual cheer to his small, almost corporate, smile. "This business is exclusively between me and Vice Commander Kouzuki, since it is the only reason why I came to this place, why I'm still here." Leaving the wall, back to a formal posture, he then gives me a bow. "So please don't feel obligated to show me any deference. There's no need for you to concern yourself with me, even though I thank you for the time you gave me to, well, get myself together after my run, and for having escorted me here."

"Sigh… I couldn't simply let you go on your own with how you dizzy the run had left you," I again rub my forehead, turning away to walk in a small circle for a second. "And Yashiro came personally to look for you, so I assume another mission is already on your tab. You will have some free time to speak with your squadmates tomorrow, I assume?"

"If Vice Commander Kouzuki doesn't send me flying to another world," he notes with a nod.

"You believe that might be the case?" I stare, he again shrugs while making that battered expression.

"The cards are on the table, Instructor. If I don't draw anything that saves me, do you think she'd show me any mercy?" He whispers, looking down, crashing down.

"This newfound attitude of yours doesn't have anything to do with the Royal Guard, does it?" He closes his eyes, saying nothing even if I wait for a moment. "Look Shirogane, I know you have your special missions and you cannot speak of them, and the fixation the guards have had with you is abnormal, yet if there is anything you believe I could do, do not hesitate to tell me."

"I don't think you could change the Vice Commander's decision, ma'am."

"Even so, you're too skilled a recruit to let you go over a mistake in a mock battle. It's-"

"Ma'am," narrowing his eyes, again endowing the corporate smile, "as you told us at the end of the CCSE, there is no evidence that supports me not being an aggressive element. And just like then, you should simply limit yourself to following your orders."

"Cadet, you will not interrupt me while-"

"Then, why didn't you warn me of the report you were going to send regarding the refusal to take my squadmates' testimony back then?" He takes a step forward, glaring as if seeing BETA.

"I was under orders, cadet. You should know that there is purpose behind every directive issued by the XO."

"Then keep following your orders, Major," he again goes to rest onto the wall, both hands behind his head. "All of this, all that has gone wrong is on me. If I had been smarter, none of this shit would have happened. There's no reason to concern yourself with the problems of another, after all a soldier should not push its burdens onto others," he states, spewing air from his nose as a bull, frowning as if surrounded in the Red Zone.

… That damned phrase. I know they need to steel themselves, they need to know how to deal with the regulations that with this position come… but I never intended said line to be used as a crux to abandon someone to their own issues, for anyone to isolate themselves within their own mind.

"Taking responsibility and refusing a helping hand are not one and the same thing, Shirogane," I affirm, louder, a lump of coal burning the base of my neck. "Also," I take a step closer, my shadow blocking the light from his neutral features, "do not be as foolish as to think you're required to take everything on your own, you are part of an organization for a reason. If there are any issues regarding other soldiers harassing you, no matter their affiliation or rank, you come to me and I'll see that they don't cause any problems twice," I nod his way, tensing my expression as he raises a brow.

"What, you think you can simply ignore the Vice Commander's orders without repercussions?"

"It's true I cannot dissuade the XO if her decision is set, but I do not believe she'd discard you or welcome the notion of you, or anyone really, being harassed or hurt. It would set quite the awful precedent, and this issue is no longer only about you, Shirogane, but about how this base chooses to deal with whatever troubling views its crew might harbor."

"An individual's problems are used to bring forth the cracks in the overall structure, huh…" For some reason, he smiles faintly, playing with a strand of hair.

"That is right. I understand your concerns, but they are unwarranted. Also, I assume you know… how starved we are for pilots."

"Well, kind of," he shrugs, scratching his head, still not meeting my eye.

"Then, I want none of this contrarian act from now on. You are part of this base, and it is the duty of your superiors to take notice of whatever interpersonal issues you might be subjected to. If you are deemed the root cause… then your concerns will become truth, but I choose to believe in the temperance you've shown since the return from the island. So cadet Shirogane, ensure you remain acting in a proper manner befitting of the goals imposed by the XO, and that you desire to achieve."

Looking down, inhaling slowly, he gives me a quick bow, a ripple in his voice. "Thank you for the gesture, Instructor. If it is something I believe can be shared, I'll try to find the time to consult with you."

"Good. Now then, while there are a mountain of questions on my mind, Yashiro is waiting," I sigh, seeing the girl again move those odd bunny ears while staring, stealing gazes our way, "so I will only ask one last thing. Shirogane, what are you allowed to tell me of what transpired when you, well, attacked 1st Lt Tsukuyomi at the end of the mock battle?"

"… And why would you be asking such a thing, Instructor, ma'am?" He inquires, his features solidifying as he stares back.

I can't help but to dry my mouth at the forced manners, the death stare he's giving me. It's almost like a reflection into days long gone. "Your squadmates were present when your Gekishin was brought to the hangar, were you told of what transpired then?" He shakes his head while raising a brow, so I tell him of that little mess. We both sigh at the outcome. "They had a small argument over what had truly transpired later, and the pressure of the whispers and stares clearly showed its marks in their trainings today."

"You think they don't want me around anymore?" He asks, looking down, again giving little hits to the wall.

"No, that's not it. I believe they'd welcome your return with open arms, honestly. Still, I doubt they'll keep their inquiries quiet after your stunning performance in the sim. More so if you continue to employ such violent patterns of piloting. While I do not believe it will become an issue, I am concerned about how some of them might react if you, well, state as you did before that you've no intention to change your ways."

"Lemme try and guess. You think Mitsurugi is gonna snap at me?"

"Sigh… Yes, I do. Even if not openly, I do believe she will make her stronger opinions known to you. Can you have a talk with her, try and find a common ground?"

He looks down, hiding his hands on both pockets, resting on the wall again. "It's all up to her, but I will try to explain myself as well as I can, from within my boundaries."

"That is all I ask. You didn't really aim to hurt 1st Lt Tsukuyomi back then, I'm certain."

An eyebrow twitches, he winces. "You should know no plan survives a battle, ma'am. Sometimes, you end up pitted against situations you never thought of, hurting people you didn't meant to… but that's how the dice rolled, no one is to blame. Not me, not those who stood against me." Placing a hand on his cheek, rubbing, mending it, a single teeth digs into his upper lip. "After a cannon ball is fired, it can only keep going forward. Whether it hits an ally or an enemy, it's all the same to it. And there are times… when all you can do is light the fuse and move onward, no matter what stands ahead, even if it's an ally."

"That's a rather… somber take, for a cadet. Are you not regretting this turn of events?"

Cracks and fissures remain open all across his face, he looks down and his long bangs hide his eyes from sight as again heaves a sigh. "It doesn't matter what I say after the fact. People will believe what they want to, my words be damned."

"… Would you like to talk of what happened? You did say she spoke words that riled you up, right?" I ask, taking a step forward, trying to pat his shoulder.

He hurries away, as if my hand were a scorching oven, still wincing. "It's fine, don't worry about it, ma'am." Taking a second to inhale deeply, he stands in attention and salutes me. "I cannot make any promises regarding my… explanations for the squad, or if they'll be enough to appease Mitsurugi in particular, but I won't let my presence be a detriment to the training. I'll remain as silent as a shadow if that's what it takes to keep the peace up. All I ask is that you allow me to polish my new tactics, when it is possible."

He remains in place, not faltering upon my stare, not even as I raise my chin and dive into his eyes does he relent a reaction. So I nod, returning the salute. "Fine, I suppose. I shall be waiting for you at roll call tomorrow morning then, cadet. You're dismissed."

He smiles one last time, turning around and going his way to the stairs. His march remains undaunted as Yashiro tries to catch up, caught off guard by the end of our talk and the speed of his steps.

… What the hell happened to cause such a reaction? Shirogane did have moments of seriousness, when his gaze would sharpen and cut deep. The end of the CCSE being the clearest one, for example. Yet, the almost scarred manner in which his eyes constricted, the knot he was fighting as he spoke, what happened to you in these days?

… Yuuko, you wouldn't truly forsake him, right? Even if the guards asked for retribution to fall upon 'the traitor', we can't afford to lose such an ace recruit. Even less when the IRG provoked this whole affair, asking to partake in our mock battles and with a Takemikazuchi, to boot. But considering how she answered to my call, and Shirogane's reactions as we spoke more than anything, there is something that went very wrong of which I am not aware of.

… Is simply watching over him all I can afford? Even as he seems about to fall down the same hole I fell in? Again, only able to do what I can, what's in my hands' reach, never extending forward.

'It cannot be helped.'

'There's nothing to be done.'

I… I do not want to create more Reapers, that's not what we require for the future. Those meager justifications won't do anything for my cadets, simply making them killing machines is not what I want to do. Shirogane might have brought up some fair points, but simply letting things play out is not wise.

… There is so much I don't know about him, when you think about it. Shirogane said his stay is tied to the reason why Yuuko brought him here, tied to the success of his missions. And to that end, he is willing to burn any and all bridges around him to cinders, it seems. I suppose, you're not her 'special protegee' for anything. Whatever these missions entail, I can only pray for things to turn out for the better as I remain vigilant. Because you were right in one crucial matter.

No matter how much I try, not even the Reaper can stand up to Yuuko, no, XO Kouzuki. On that battlefield, you are alone. And no killer piloting will save you from her gavel.

---

A few minutes later.

(In the Elevator.)

---

The door slides close, leaving the two of them alone in the shallowness. Alone with the prickling of small droplets of coldest, minuscule pokes of spiders to young Yashiro's neck, who cannot lift her stare from the floor.

All the way here, the soldier didn't even stop to wait, didn't decelerate at all in his stride. Shrouded in a faint mist, his thoughts are obscured to the assistant.

So her fingers dig into her dress as she steals gazes. " Why? Why won't he talk to me? Is he mad? Does he now think like the mean Royal Guard did? Why did he even leave the medbay on his own without contacting us?"

Merely peeking at his boots reveals a shrouded dark, a veil in protection. The soldier's mental guard is up, carefully picking his thoughts to avoid Yashiro from sensing anything else from what she already had witnessed. The faint shapes, the silhouettes of the wasteland, of the greenery of the forest flash for a second on her mind as she tries to scan, as her eyes linger for too long.

A slow ruffle on her head shuts off the flickering visions, a finger draws circles near the bunny ears. "Why so tense, Kasumi-kun?" Shirogane-san asks with a smile, softly petting her hair.

Hesitant upon the usual cheerfulness, her hands twist and tug at her dress. "Um… Takeru-san? Are you- How are you now?"

"Sorry for having made you wait," he chuckles, tracing a strand of hair to its end, patting her shoulder afterwards. "I'm okay, all things considered. Has everything been fine over here?"

"… No," she then grabs and pulls at his arm, enduring what echoes the physical contact causes. "I was so worried you would not wake up, the Professor was so upset you didn't return, and then you just leave the medbay on your own…" her tense features slowly relax as he sighs, giving a small nod in apology. "You are unharmed now, right?"

"Yeah, don't worry," he nods, again petting her head, a single finger tickling a cheek, trying to soften the fallen expression of the assistant. "Sorry again, for having made you see all that shit."

"No, it's… fine. So, um, did you find your answer?"

"… Yeah," he says, hand retracting from the hair, sight seeking the ceiling of the shallowness.

"You're… still on the Professor's side, right?" She asks, staring, enduring the visions.

And then, silence. His eyes close, and he leans on the wall.

She lightly pulls at his arm, he remains quiet.

So young Yashiro lean on the soldier as the gears rotate and continue the elevator's descent.

"I guess it's all up to the Vice Commander now," he says through his teeth, not masking the embers within his lips.

"The Professor was really worried about you, she again grew all crimson when she saw you were gone from the bed," she insists with many consecutive flaps of her bunny ears, gripping his wrist.

"Well, can't exactly blame her for that. After all the time I… Uh…" His brows cross, eyes narrowing as his lips twist. Scratching his head, Shirogane-san looks back at her. "Kasumi, how much time passed since the mock battle?"

"You… don't know?" He shakes his head, she flaps her ears as the hold over his hand tightens. "Then, why did you left the medbay if you didn't even knew how much time had passed?"

"Because I wanted to find out what was going on here, and see if people still remembered me, of course. So, how long has it been?"

"Sigh… Only a day."

"Wait, for real?!"

"Yes, that is all. You seem… to believe it would have been longer. Why?"

"If you had gone through all that, you also would believe more time had passed. I guess my will really was enough to bring me back quickly," he sighs, but the relaxation lasts a moment. "Then, that would mean… Hm, I might've exhausted my reserves, dammit."

"What are you talking about?"

"G-Radiation," he mentions, unconcerned.

Which causes a flinch, both limiters standing in attention. "Huh?! But that's a secret the Professor hasn't told anyone… How do you know of it?"

He smirks back as he plays with young Yashiro's bangs. "Kasumi-kun, you do remember I told you that I looked after you during my first loops, right?"

"Did another me tell you, then?"

"Well, more like I found out as I helped you sort out reports for the Yuuko we supported in a previous life," he tells with a smile, a faint shine to his gesture. "All the quantum bullshit considered, I assume the radiation mentioned in the Nucleus' papers is this one, right?" She relents a nod, he groans as he looks up. "I see… So that was right, then. While I'm here, guess I can 'recharge', in a way."

"… So, um, what happened after you took me out of your mind? What did you see?" She once more pulls his arm, yet he shakes his head.

"I told you before, right? Yuuko and Sumika need you more than me."

"You don't trust in me?" Her shoulders sag, eroded by the sobriety of his voice.

"I don't wanna put you in a pinch," Shirogane-san quickly retorts, again softly kneading her hair. "So don't try and look into my mind for answers, please."

"… I'm your friend," She gets closer, staring into his eyes, into the barren wasteland.

The soldier holds her gaze captive, expression unchanging. "Then, let me handle my cards on my own. If you really can do anything for me, let me play this game on my own terms."

"This isn't a game," those slim fingers wrap around his hand, strongly, stronger. Yet it makes no difference to either his posture or his complexion, the barren and grim stare that truly does resemble the bloodstained wasteland we traversed. So young Yashiro's lips quiver, not knowing what to say to spur a change. "I… haven't told the Professor of the forest in detail, or of what we spoke by the hill. And I won't disclose anything-"

"Alright, stop," he says, patting both of her shoulders. "Kasumi, thank you, really."

The soldier smiles in radiance, getting closer, closer and playing with her bangs, parting them away and getting even closer. As his figure covered her entire sight, young Yashiro feels a small, minute contact in her skin, a light dampness to it.

A kiss to her forehead.

Softly, tenderly, for only a second, only a peck.

His eyes remain hardened, burning once they cross gazes again as her fingertips unearth and explore the spot where his lips had been moments ago. "But you really should not go against the XO's orders. Leave the discussions to me, Yuuko doesn't need more things to worry about."

"So you are going to argue with her…" Her stare sharpens, he gives a final pat to both shoulders.

"Can't be helped. She ain't aware of what mess we're in," Shirogane-san sighs sharply, getting back up and shaking his head.

"I don't think you being a Royal Guard can bring you so much trouble, Takeru-san. I believe the Professor still values you much, even if the Shogun would become your enemy she will protect you."

"It's not who I used to be but the reason for why I became like that."

"… The younger Takeru-san seemed to hate the UN during our talks in the wasteland. Are you… opposed to remaining here?"

"No, but you gotta see beyond the surface," he sighs again, hunching over. "The mirrored patterns can only mean one thing, and that… is what I gotta fix."

"You mean how you said you had become a member of the IRG in another world to protect that mean squadmate?"

He gives Yashiro a narrowed gaze, scratching his ear. "You really do not like Meiya, huh."

"She's rude and forceful."

"Siiigh… But yeah, that's what I'm talking about. I… did join the IRG in another world, that's what more or less cements my doubts into certainty," he affirms, arms folding, expression hardening into a rampart once again.

Again pulling at his sleeve, Yashiro's eyes seek his. "However, why would the Professor not welcome your concerns? It's true she didn't want to reveal what this third incident you warned her of is, yet if you're open and clear with her I'm certain-"

A soft hold descends upon her hair, a bit rougher than before. "You leave that to me, Kasumi. Okay?"

A beep echoes as the assistant was about to protest, the door opens and he exits to the hallway. Not slowing down and keeping the lead he had on young Yashiro, she cannot resume the thread of conversation until they arrive to the door of the Professor's office. As Shirogane-san raises his hand to knock, the entrace slides open on its own. Taking a second, a sharp breath, the colors in his aura shifting and turning, taking on a darker shade when his expression grows grim, he steps into the office followed by the small steps of the assistant.

Only the soft operative sounds of machinery fill the office, the scientist's back is turned to them. She slides to the small table, leaving a mug with coffee on it, the red and white cup Shirogane-san has always been given by her. Not meeting their eyes, still and stalwart as a towering wall of dry ice, her aura remains completely dulled and obscured to young Yashiro. The Professor slowly sinks into her chair, leaning back comfortably and staring. Coiling and unfolding a strand of hair, resting her face onto that hand. The pierce of the gaze, the unthawed blizzard aimed at the soldier and only at him, just as that fox would within the Black Lilith.

A slight descent of her eyelids, she looks at the assistant. "Thanks for bringing him here, Yashiro. Welcome back, I suppose," she says, barely gazing his way. "I assume, since you went to train and all, that you have no lasting injuries."

"No, no injuries to speak of," he says with a slow nod, before folding his arms. Then, giving a quick scan to the room, his brows lower and collide. "… By the by, have you eaten dinner yet?"

"What? Oh no, we are not doing this again," she lightly hits the desk, starting to frown. "Shirogane, do not try to change the subject here."

"Kasumi, did she eat dinner today?"

She shakes her head, looking down. "No, she refused since there are more pressing matters on the timetable," a short sigh is followed by both shoulders eroding, even more as the scientist glares into her eyes.

"Huh, what do you know. Yuuko and skipping meals, name a more iconic duo," he shrugs, both brows jerking up for a moment.

"… Cadet Shirogane, this is hardly the time for your quips," she tells, venomous. "I'd appreciate if we could hold a mature talk about what happened before, and of why you left the medbay without notice."

"Call for dinner and we can talk stuff out as we eat, two birds with one stone," he suggests, pointing a finger up.

"I am in no mood for your jokes now, Shirogane. Sit down and-"

"Should we skip the argument and proceed to getting you princess-carried to bed?" He asks, eyelids low, as low as his voice, as the groans of the scientist as she pinches her nose.

However, the little bunny ears perk up, unsure of what to make of the odd tint in the Professor's aura, or of the strange mix of both dark and yellow within the soldier. "Takeru-san, what do you mean by 'princess carry'?"

"You see Kasumi-kun, mommy Yuuko was being naughty a few days ago, refusing to have her nightly meal," he says as he smirks while nodding, spurring tense contortion in the scientist's complexion and widening shock in young Yashiro. "So I had no choice but to take her to bed and negotiate a ceasefire of her stubbornness. So if that's what it takes to make the Vice Commander eat her dinner then-"

"Okay, stop," she warns, force palming the desk, sighing short yet deep. "We are not having this conversation now. And you, cadet, will abide by your orders and start answering my questions. Must I remind you of what's at stake here?"

"The tuning of the 00 Unit, the success of the missions that will come," he says, eyes closing, before he once more gives a small smirk, "and the caretaking of your health."

"I said, we are not-"

"Sorry, but going by your eyebags and tone, I bet you must have not slept yesterday," he asserts, hitting the bullseye, making the lines of tension ignite further. "So what's a light meal as we platicate, Vice Commander ? After all," inhaling slowly, his features grow grim to match what in front of him lies, in the room and his objectives, "we do have a lot of sensitive stuff to talk about."

She eyes him frontally, unfaltering, the hand under the desk tugging and gripping at her skirt, at both the rejection that comes off the soldier's expression and at the immutable posture he endows. Not finding any of the usual cheer, not having expected such refusal or composure from him, she takes her time, sweet time, to ponder what to do, what he had said thus far.

"I suppose I can allow myself dinner, once I'm done with what duties remain for now. So do sit down, Shirogane. I won't repeat myself," she affirms, he sighs. "Yashiro, you may retire."

"Huh?! H-However-"

"You have duties to take care of. Motoko-nee needs your support in the cylinder room, and I… have my hands full at the moment," she says, once more focusing her full armory upon Shirogane-san.

Who looks back and smiles, ruffling young Yashiro's hair. "It's okay, Kasumi. I assume this means it's time to activate the 00 Unit?"

She barely nods, minimizing her shoulders. "Yes, the Professor has decided we should do that now."

"Which is why I'd welcome you not wasting our time now, Shirogane," she reminds, taking a sip from her mug. "Surely, you understand what takes priority in this situation?" She eyes him sideways, he rolls his eyes.

"Um… Professor," young Yashiro braves a look upward, into the stoic and unchanging stormclouds, "you will let us try to speak with Sumika-san one last time, right?"

"Depending on Shirogane's answer, that is," she says, looking away. "Now, on your way. I'd welcome some privacy."

"But I can try and help you two understand better what-"

"Considering the cadet's stance, I rather you not suffer any harm, Yashiro," Kouzuki states, stare unmoving.

"Harm? What are you insinuating?" The soldier asks, arms slowly folding.

"You see, when scanning the area to find you after you left the medbay, without notifying your legal tutor of it," she halts, sending him a sharp and venomous stare, "Yashiro felt a slight pain at the vision she saw. By the way," she then leans forward, fingers interlocking, "perhaps you can tell me what these dragons and foxes are about, Shirogane?"

Ignoring the pyre of magma, he instead pats young Yashiro's head. "Did you see any of that shit again?"

"Sorry…" she whispers, "I couldn't help it. I think you were in the simulator then?"

"Sigh… Don't worry, I'll try not to let those thoughts get to the surface again. You be careful when scanning me, okay?" He twirls a strand of silver hair, she nods.

"Well, let's not waste any more time. Yashiro, go to Motoko-nee, now," she orders, waving to the door. "This talk is between me and Shirogane, you're needed by Kagami," the scientist so states, grabbing her mug and bringing it to her lips once again.

"However, I can-"

"Kasumi," he again pets her head, his hand falling to its back, "if it's time to activate the 00 Unit, then you won't get another chance to talk with Sumika."

"I will still help you tune her as best as I'm able," she states, firm and bright.

He smiles, nodding back. "I know, but it won't be the same. Believe me, the 00 Unit won't be like the Sumika you've been talking with all this time. You will only ever get this chance to talk with her again. Please Kasumi, go and keep her company, okay?"

"… Alright. But please do not get upset, the same goes for you Professor," she says, flapping her bunny ears, which causes the scientist to roll her eyes as the rim and bitter coffee meets her lips.

"Don't worry," he smiles again, waving down in comfort, "we're not going to start arguing or anything. Mom and Dad just need some alone time to talk."

A forceful choke, coffee floods the desk, and luckily misses the papers. Wiping her mouth with a handkerchief, the scientist glares forward. "Excuse me, since when are we 'mom and dad'?"

"Arbitrary, right now," he deadpans.

"Takeru-san, you're, legally speaking, not even an adult yet," Yashiro counters, giving him a side glance, an unwarranted serious expression in her complexion.

He chuckles, again playing with her bangs. "Don't be silly, Kasumi-kun. Going by all my loops, I'm probably older than the CO."

"I don't think you'd make a good parent, though," She notes, puffing a cheek at him, causing the Professor to chuckle dryly.

"Now, that's just mean. Search your feelings, my young Dersh Bnnuy. You know I'm telling the truth."

"I wonder about that," the scientist rolls her eyes as she wipes her desk clean, and takes her stained lab coat off. "Someone as irresponsible as you would truly be a disastrous father figure."

"What are you talking about? I give Kasumi lots of emotional support, right?" He pats her back, recalling their games and talks.

The bunny ears lower, she taps her fingers together, a gently poke as the images flash through her sight. "While that is true, I really… can't see you as a father, Takeru-san."

"Then, who's gonna support the rise of our overlord and savior, Dersh Bnnuy? I know I may have no sugar but I can totally be your daddy."

CHOP!

"Stop teasing me, Takeru-san!" She complains, releasing a volley of suppression fire upon his shoulder, roses in full bloom over her cheeks.

He merely laughs it off, the scientist expression softens for a moment as she watches. "Anyways, for real," a block to the chopping, a clasp on her shoulder, a finger lifting her chin, his eyes diving straight into hers, "give us some space, Kasumi. You don't have to see all that a second time, and there's stuff you shouldn't hear, too," he says, sobering up, a minute glance to the scientist that then relents a slow nod.

"… You promise you won't cause an argument?"

"I've no intention to," he nods, not looking away, clarity shining through his aura.

"Okay then. Um… Please do not argue. We're all… on the same side," she flaps her bunny ears, trying and giving both the most menacing glare she can muster at the time.

Both nod back, so she slowly makes her way to the door. Taking one final gaze back, Shirogane-san waves at young Yashiro while the Professor has her eyes again fully locked onto him as she drinks what little was spared of the coffee. She returns the wave, hesitantly stepping outside and going towards the cylinder room.

Shirogane-san sits in his usual spot, arms crossed, not taking the mug left in front of him. He returns her stare, saying nothing. She remains watching his expression, standing to make more coffee. The viper in her eyes does not lash out nor regress as she sits down.

She says nothing, observing his features, drinking slowly.

He remains with a poker face, posture and features not fully relaxed.

And for who knows how long, silence cloaks over the office.

They hold the other's stare, expressions unchanging, frozen. Frozen as the silence that permeates the room, as the cold gust of December that blows outside at the moment.

The coffee each had was slowly making less cloudy steam, lying as still within the mugs as their eyes have been.

Rolling her eyes, she shrugs. "Are you planning to have us do a stare contest until the heat death of the universe, Shirogane?"

He smirks, crossing a leg. "At least I have something nice to look at."

"Ha ha ha, very funny," she shoots him a glare, resting both arms onto the desk. "Well, if you don't feel like talking, let me be the one to start. Why did you refuse to return alongside Yashiro?"

"Didn't felt like it," he says slowly, expression and aura unchanging.

While her face remains stoic, there's a tiny, tiny flare of dull red around her hands as she interlocks her fingers, as her ankles cross. "Why did you depart the medbay on your own?"

"To see what day it was, and if people still knew who I was here."

"… So you were aware of the risks posed by your little nap."

"Little things compared to the problems at large, ain't them?" He asks, shrugging, the same repugnant mire of the forest flashing for a moment all over his body.

"Shirogane, I assume you know what issues you vanishing could have caused with Her Highness. If she lost any memories-"

" Vice Commander," he slowly counters, entwining his fingers, dulling his face to perfect poker, "you and I both know Yuuhi is little more than a figurehead these days. And I assume, even if she had tried anything to get me off the base, you already have set mines to ensure she doesn't causes you any issues."

She frowns, a veil of crimson falling over her entire person. "Oh, my apologies. I was not aware you had such biases towards Her Highness in your mind."

Again frosting over, he looks back at her. Saying nothing, simply holding her gaze. As if time were standing still, his gaze remains on her. It sends a small shiver down her spine, the lack of emotion in his features.

"… Why did you not wake up sooner, Shirogane?" She asks, louder, while leaning forward.

"Because I had to make sure of something, that's all," he relents, low, shaking his head.

"Really, now? What is this about roaring dragons and evil foxes, then?" She inquires, a few fingers on her chin.

"Nothing you should concern yourself with, XO . It has nothing to do with Alt IV."

"I will decide that myself," she immediately counters, bumping a fist onto her chin, not lifting her stare from his. "Shirogane, I order you to speak. What made you run with the risk of vanishing from this world?"

"… I refuse to answer."

"Are you insinuating you won't fulfill your part of our pact?" She asks, remaining stoic, yer her eyes start to widen, the empty and primal stare of the fox overlapping in her features.

"Sigh…" Yet, rather than intimidated, Shirogane-san simply rubs his forehead as he slowly shakes his head. "Our pact is only about Alt IV, XO . My personal business has little to do with the project, thus I am not planning to disclose that intel unless there is an incentive for me to do so."

She raises a brow, the hold on her chin tightening, the mist falling upon her. "… So you are refusing an order from me, huh. Didn't think you'd take Her Highness' side, to be honest."

"Heh, Yuuhi's side?" He cackles, teeth shining as they're showered in light. He leans back onto the sofa, throwing an arm onto the backside. "Did you get drunk on an empty stomach, XO ? I ain't wearing IRG colors, am I?" He again simply smiles through the cracks of the wasteland, the repulsive corruption from the bog that echoes in his aura and mind.

"Shirogane," she hits the desk lightly, tracing the rim of the mug with her lips before drinking, "I'll have you know Her Highness was truly concerned over your status after you fainted. We already discussed the repercussions her animosity towards us could cause. So if you do not tell me what you spoke with her about, what caused you to faint, and why you refused to regain consciousness despite knowing the risks, I am going to be left with little choice but to pry the answers out of you," she glares, flares and sparks could be bursting between them at the moment.

"Hehehe…" And yet, the soldier starts to laugh, quietly at first, more heatedly afterwards. Unable to compute the reaction, the scientist merely stares in puzzlement until the laughing turns to coughing. "Cough… Haha. Come on, Vice Commander, get real. You already know what happened, don't you?"

"Excuse me?"

He faces her glare frontally, still smiling. "You already knew since the CCSE I was actually a member of the IRG in this world, that there was no 'another' Takeru. That's why you called the memory sessions a 'recovery'."

"… Well, I admit that I had a hunch," she relents, a slow spin on her chair. "Your words after you returned from the CCSE only made it more plausible. So," she stops, again looking at him and nowhere else, "are you still on my side, Shirogane?"

"That depends," he says, lowering his posture. "Kasumi said you seem rather opposed to my warning about the third incident, I assume you already know Mt Tengen will erupt soon."

"… So it is the same mountain in this world, too," she notes, nodding. "Yes, I already made a pact with Her Highness to lend a hand in the relief efforts."

"… That you have no plan to actually commit to," he adds, and sprouts a frown in her features.

Then, contorting her body, a hand aiming for a certain drawer, the blizzard of her stare never lifts from his. "You… You seem to not be particularly pleased, don't you?"

"Could you confirm or deny my previous words, XO ?" He asks. "Without resorting to guns, if at all possible," he then adds, shrugging.

"And if my words do not please you?"

"Is your decision on this matter counter to our pact, XO ? If it isn't, why so serious? You aren't hiding anything else from good old me, are you now?" Shirogane-san again smirks, placing both hands behind his head, leaning comfortably against the sofa.

Their stares once more crash and clash, opposing tidal waves swallowing and devouring each other. Just like that mega tsunami, that oceanic collapse as everything faded into the abyss. The constricting vines which crawled all over, the tiny spiders that seeped under cloth, the heat of the chasing breath belonging to all the twisted monstrosities within the bark.

"So, what's the matter?" He asks, growing sober as he straightens himself up. "Don't tell me… XO," his voice sharpens, dripping venom, "you didn't order Kasumi to scan my mind from outside while we speak, did you?"

She frowns, going to finish her coffee first, unable to clear the clouds in her expression. "… Considering your negative, that is one of the little cards I have left to play," she shrugs, then heaves a sigh. "But no, Yashiro has refused to disclose what transpired within your mind. Considering what you… might be thinking, I rather not risk one of my most precious assets to be hurt by whatever lurks in your memories. But thanks for letting me know how you think of me, cadet Shirogane," she glares, frosting to the core.

"I'm merely concerned over what Kasumi could see, that's all."

"And why would you be? Is there something you're wishing to hide, mmh?"

"She already had enough during the mind dive, Vice Commander. Please don't force Kasumi to scan my mind, if at all possible."

"I assume this means you will start answering my inquiries, then? What was that about dragons and foxes?"

"You and me, basically," he tells with a shrug.

A brow twitches, eyes and lips narrow. "Excuse me? Who is which?"

"I was, according to Kasumi, a dark armed dragon at one point. You, within my mind, take on the shape of a fox."

"… Huh," she says, not amused in the slightest at the term, leaning back, almost fully freezing. "So that's how you see me."

"To be fair, you always were dropping Chekhov's Guns all over the place during my first loops and back home, too. Not to mention you do tend to laugh very, uh, intensely at times."

"… Is that so. What are these guns you speak of? Some sort of tech you haven't mentioned yet?"

He gives her a sideglance, remaining silent for a second. "It's a term used to refer to hiding things despite saying them outright. Like the whole deal with the 'memory recovery' sessions."

"I see… Was all of the mind dive that taxing on her?"

"No, at least not all of it. I think she enjoyed the fireworks and the other stuff we saw at first, despite the mess that came afterwards," he says, relenting a sigh as the mask drops for a moment.

"… Fireworks? Okay, just what on Earth happened during the mind dive?" She demands, tapping the desk with a finger. "Shirogane, speak. Now."

Breathing in sharply, he folds his arms. "… You still haven't answered my previous question. Do you plan to heed my warning about the third incident?"

"… What has you casting such doubts on me, Shirogane? I believe I had told you there would be no more secrets between us after we've dealt with this little matter of your citizenship," she inquires, leaning forward.

"Are you forgetting how you left me on the phone with the fucking Shogun without warning? By the way, thanks for trying to hype me up but, really, I rather you'd have been honest and told me straight up you wanted me to speak with Yuuhi then and there."

"I was not attempting to deceive you. I meant every word I said back then, and my proposition still stands if you wish to remain on my side. Her Highness caught me off guard, I was not expecting her to call so suddenly nor to spur another shock into you," she affirms, speaking the truth and nothing but the truth, clear as the night sky.

Which eases his breathing, if only slightly, as his arms relax by his side. "I see…"

"Your position in the base is all but secured, let me inform you. Her Highness is wishing you to regain your citizenship, and made a point to warn me of how I should handle you. It seems you two were pretty close, hmm?" She asks, narrowing her eyes.

"Not like you didn't knew that already," he shrugs, sinking under the bog's cover.

"I only had a hunch. So then, what was it with that date she mentioned? What caused you to suffer another breakdown?" She asks, leaning forward even more.

"… Are you sure you don't already know?"

"Shirogane, I'd like you to stop this contrarian act. Unless you could enlighten me on the motives behind your rejection towards your ally?" Tilting her head, never blinking, always scanning. Despite the tension in the hand that remains hidden, despite the pit on her stomach at the extension of silence he puts her through yet again.

"… If you recall, we knew 'this world's me' was part of a secret squad, the Swordbreakers."

"Yes, I am aware. I was… thinking you could have been a member of said squadron, and it's why-"

"Save the explanation for later," he hurries, waving a hand down. "Considering I 'inherited' memories during the CCSE, in a place without G-Radiation, those images I saw could be nothing but my own memories, going by your theory."

"Indeed, that's how I- Wait a- Did you just say G-Radiation?" He nods, unabated under her wrathful stare. "When and how?"

"You do remember I've worked for another you in who knows how many timelines, right?"

"And, why, pray tell, you haven't mentioned that at all until now?" Again giving little hits to the wood, scratching the edge of a paper, she holds his gaze.

Yet, Shirogane-san shrugs. "Because you never asked me for help. Anyways, between the few memories I saw and what you knew of my life, you must have seen the similarities. The oddly mirrored results of his life and mine. And knowing of Shura's Dance, and how similar it must have been to what I showed you of Iceberg, you came to the conclusion that, somehow, this world's me wasn't a separate entity at all."

"… Perhaps."

"Oh, come on. Can we be honest with each other, Vice Commander ? Otherwise, we might as well just stop this."

"Sigh… What are you getting at? I understand that you could be upset at me hiding things from you, but, believe me, there is no mistake in this. I cannot understand what series of events caused this but you are, in fact, this world's Shirogane. Or, to be precise, this world's Shirogane was the next 'incarnation' you took after you tried to jump through the timelines back in your world. Just as you said you lived two years in ignorance of what lives you had lost, all the evidence points to you having been living in that same manner in this timeline." She tells, arms folding, compacting, compressing, even more as he remains silent once again. "Ahem… So I assume my hunch was correct, going by your reactions. I know you must be in shock, but I assure you there is nothing to fret over. No matter how close you were to Her Highness or what acts you did under the IRG, so long as you remain on my side I can cover your trails, Shirogane. And if it's bringing you pain, we can repress the memories now that we can attain your citizenship and Her Highness' blessing to you remaining here."

"… So all's going according to your little plan, huh," he says, low, looking away.

It sinks rusted iron into her throat. "Sigh… You should know what's ahead, Shirogane. I only acted as I did to create an anchor for you in this world, to ease your link with this reality. Now, all that's left is you tuning the 00 Unit to stabilize your world and allow Alt IV to attain success. All our efforts thus far were for this moment, weren't they? Unless, of course… your loyalty belongs elsewhere?"

Again, silence. Simply staring at her, expression tightening.

Giving a little hit to the sofa, he exhales through clenched teeth. "Why don't you cut the crap and get to the point? You should know what I'm getting at, XO ."

"… Are you wishing to return to the IRG?"

"Ha! Fuck no. You think I'll leave Sumika alone now of all times? You wound me, Vice Commander," Shirogane-san then, dramatically, tugs at his chest while making a pained expression, slumping onto the cushioning.

She rolls her eyes, a hand going to her forehead. "Then, what is it with you now?"

"I already told you, and there's no way you don't know. Yeah, I was again made to live without my memories, or without being conscious of them to be precise," he sighs, his sight taking an emergency landing, hunching a bit. "And if I figured this out, you also must be aware of it. My life isn't the only thing being mirrored right now."

"What?" She blinks, starting to gape. The words repeat in her head, his complexion does not waver, something starts to ring in her ears. "Excuse me, what do you mean?"

"Come on, stop playing dumb," Shirogane-san straightens up, slowly resting a leg on top of the other before starting to retell the small realizations he had before, all the similarities the world he is currently in has with his home world.

With every word, a crack spawns in the ice wall.

With every sentence and affirmation on his end, more and more does the air leave her lungs, does her sight grow dull and gray.

With every link she also confirms through his words with the intel she knows, her hands claw at the desk hard enough to leave permanent markings on it.

"So as you can see, for some reason, this world has an uncanny resemblance to mine," he finishes, sober and low. "And considering how long the highway was active, sending data into the multiverse, it ain't odd to assume this world took it all in and merged with that."

"… That's impossible," she says, holding her face as she looks upward, lost in thought. "Causal leaks cannot change events that have already occurred."

"Then how the hell did I arrive into this world? What is your explanation?" He asks, leaning a bit forward.

"I was… Ahem… I assumed your data leaving your world caused a reset through a paradox, which made all worlds also return to the respective point in time from which the paradox was solved, since all worlds are parallel. And, just as you did before, you overwrote the 'Takeru Shirogane' of this world at some point."

"… You do know I can only see memories I myself lived through because there was a link with the worlds I was in before. I had no link with this world whatsoever beforehand. Why are you not willing to tell me the truth, Sensei ?" He asks, smirking.

Something in his tone stockpiled nothingness in her gut, a slow raking below her ears starting to move upwards. "I am not hiding anything. If your will was certain and you had all the G-Radiation you absorbed after firing the particle cannon at Kashgar, then it is likely you would have been able to transfer your data even if only as metaphysical information. Then, when the world was reset after the exchange, it was assimilated into the being present in this world."

"And what of all the coincidences I noticed?"

Now, she's the one who remains silent. Running a hand into her hair, grasping and gripping, her previous idea slowly begins to melt like a sugar cube. Within the depths of the thought currents, the soldier's words start to gain hold, despite the pushback that common sense still offers.

She heaves a sigh, starting to spin, closing her eyes. "You are being serious, aren't you?"

"Of course," he immediately answers. "There's no way my world ended up fusing with this one, right?" He asks, out of caution,

Which causes her to wave a hand and groan. "Of course not, that's just not possible. I… do admit you raise fair points, however." A leg seeks the ground, halting the spin. She rotates back into his sight, interlocking her fingers. "Shirogane, did anyone in your world start to forget you after you regained your memories?"

"Nope. Neither Maya-sensei nor Yuuko-sensei forgot the plans we had made, and my parents also remembered me until the day I left. What about here? Did anyone forget me already?"

"No, not as far as I'm aware. Motoko-nee did forget you spoke with her on the phone, but that's about it, I believe."

"I see… So it's the other way around on this end, huh."

"Hm? On this… What does that mean?"

"That one time, when I ran away, people started to forget me instantly as soon as they started to think about me. On this end of the highway, looks like things are the opposite. If people don't think about me, then memories related to me will simply leave their minds. Now that I think about it, that might be why you went and told the squad I got sent to the frontlines last loop, huh," he nods to himself, realization dawning on him despite all that he already knows.

"I… see," she lowers her face onto her entwined fingers, eyes lost in the expansion of a blank page. "Then, does this mean we can have an easier access to the conductor's pull? If such a change came into the timeline due to your transfer, seizing and manipulating the data leaks might actually become possible," she says, a small smile raising like the sun, clearing all shadows and coldness.

Until she meets his glare, grim and still. He says nothing again for a moment, before shaking his head. "You're sure faster than a starting line coming out of a horse. Sadly, I'm gonna have to refuse this idea of yours."

"… Why? You do realize it would mean you could tune the 00 Unit into proper human behavior with much ease?"

"By sacrificing another Sumika to causality and risking the ripples from worsening?"

"I can mend any issues that may arise, be sure of it."

"Tell that to last loop and the destruction of my home. We can't make causality's ripples get any worse, Vice Commander. Much less now that we both are aware the highway is affecting this world as it did mine beforehand."

"Yes, but you didn't have me then, did you? And anyways, a minimal mirror of actions is nothing to be concerned about."

"… Yuuko, I'm being serious," he says, dull and low, facing her gaze, not blinking under the prominence of the light she emanates with the minute frown. "These aren't some small mirrors, everything is exactly the same."

"Sigh… I'm telling you, there's no way it can be anything other than a small assimilation of leaked data. Also, it can only have started after August 5th when the conduit was formed due to the G-Bombs. By the by, why did you freak out when hearing that date, Shirogane? You sort of avoided that topic, for some reason," she asks, tapping her chin with a finger.

"Sigh… That's the date when I got my memories back, when they freed the highway. The date when I became whole again, as it should have been after the conductor opened up here. That's why I could return to my original form as I was before the transfer."

"Then, why didn't you retain your memories of being a Royal Guard?"

"You already know, don't you?" He says, grimacing as he looks at a wall.

"So… Kagami's wish…" he nods, shrugging. "I see, I assume you no longer were who she wanted to meet by Lucifer," she relents a nod, standing up to make more coffee. Staring at him while she fills her mug, leaving it on the desk she then goes up and grabs his, throwing the already cold liquid away, pouring more back and basically pushing it into his hands. "However, if what you say is true and I had actually undershot my assumption, does that mean your, uh, relation with the Shogun is equal to yours with Mitsurugi in your world?"

"… Not entirely, no," he looks away, closing his eyes as he takes a sip.

"And? What are you to her?" She presses, grabbing her mug, resting onto the desk, staring and staring.

"I was her stepbrother for a time, that's how I remained under their care."

"Is that so… I see, that does give their reactions a whole new meaning. I assume, you are not against regaining your citizenship?"

"… XO, do you know what was of me after Shura's Dance?" He asks, barely audible, hands lightly shaking as he chokes the mug.

She slowly places a hand on his shoulder, giving it a few pats. "I can imagine. If you desire to scream or curse at me, feel free. It was my decision to abandon Hakuryo, after all."

"Sigh… What would that achieve?" He shakes his head, her hand off his body.

"It won't change the fact that I ordered that mission. If you have any concerns over my… posture towards the war, let's clear them right now. I did ask you to take responsibility for whatever would happen after the mock battle, and as you know-"

"Yeah, even if it's small, you can't risk upsetting the IRG. Look, I ain't holding a grudge for… what happened after Shura's Dance, for real."

"… Does that mean you remember that clearly?"

"As for the point I was making-"

"Shirogane," she grows closer, tilting her back, mere centimeters left between their gazes, "do you clearly recall those events?"

"Clearly? No, it's more like, you know, actual memories from a few years ago. So-"

"Then, who were you? You were… part of the squadron that cooperated with us during the '99, right?" She asks, again grasping his shoulder, lips tightening.

"Sigh… That's the real reason why you've been pushing me to regain my memories, ain't it?" He shakes his head, pressing his jaw as if crunching small ice cubes. "To manipulate me to gain the Shogun's support, and more allies in the IRG."

"If you are upset, feel free to-"

"I'm not, I'm not."

"Oh, sure. This isn't you being mad in the slightest," she rolls her eyes, taking another sip of coffee, restoring his personal space.

"Sigh, I'm not, really. It's thanks to this we might still have time left to not screw it up, after all," he tells, slow and dejected as he sighs again, slowly taking another sip.

"Alright, if you say so. Will you regain your identity, then? Or, perhaps… you rather remain 'dead' to return to that squadron you were part of?" She asks, staring, something stirring inside at his repeated silence.

"… I wasn't part of the Swordbreakers, XO . I was their Captain," he says, looking up and nodding at the scientist.

Who nods back slowly, again gaping. "Wait, you? You were… their leader?"

"Yeah, just as it was after Iceberg."

"After- What?! But you didn't remember-"

"I'll tell you in detail later, if I deem it necessary," Shirogane-san again waves down, pointlessly trying to appease her blazing impulse of questions. "Thing is, I ended up in the IRG after the Babylon Disaster, appointed as the head of my own squadron. So yeah, even that is a mirror caused by the leaks. Do you know what that means? Those worlds still exist somewhere out there."

"Well, of course they do. I assume they cannot be reversed, since they are a possible state of the original conductor you were during those loops you took. If any branch had to be reset after the conductor vanishes from it, that would make your efforts to make Alt IV succeed be moot in the end," she affirms, finishing her drink.

"And, what else does that tell us?"

"You still insist on this idea?"

"Humor me. You wanna know what I recalled and have me play to your tune? Then be a darling and help me see if my hunch is spot on, honey," he says with a smirk, chuckling as she frowns, undaunted as a tree under a storm, unshakable by the threat of thunderbolts. After all, it would only serve to ignite him into blazes.

"Since when are you allowed to refer to me in that way, Shirogane?" She inquires, taking a step forward, a hawk about to dive.

Yet, the soldier merely shrugs. "I never was, I'm just teasing you back. I thought we were on the same side, aren't we?"

"I am not certain I welcome these… liberties you're taking. What is it with you? Do you again miss that other me you worked with?"

"To be honest, yeah, kind of."

"… What?"

"Why the shock? I always could speak with the other Yuukos without fear of her keeping important stuff from me after a certain point. Sure, the Kashgar mission was the odd one out, but otherwise I always felt like she heard me, even when she disagreed. Now, though," he sighs, arms loosely rest on his knees, a cold raking at the base of his back, "I can't really say that."

"I have been as honest as I can be, you know?"

"Then, stop dodging the issue about the possible threat of the highway already."

"Sigh… I am not. Just… Why now?" She asks, shaking her head as she ruffles her hair, keeping her hands busy. "I had assumed you would be rather upset at me, all things considered."

"Look, I can sort of get why you left me in the dark. Still would have preferred to be worth your trust, but what am I gonna do now? Other than joking to not lose my chill, there's nothing to be done."

"Well, some terms are not appropriate for jokes, Shirogane. What, did you want to call me honey or something?"

"At one point, I did."

"… Huh? If this is another joke, that's going too far."

Pursing his lips, he scratches the back of his head, looking away. "What? You already know I, well, close with another you. Trying to make small jabs and shit is what I always do to remain on good spirits. I know you might- no, you will never see me as she did, but all I'm asking out of you is to humor me just this once, as payback for not telling me about your plans." Inhaling deep, restoring his posture and the shine to his smile, he looks into her eyes. "Surely you're not gonna snap at me for something like that, right honey?"

Hands wring for a second, before she massages her ear while rolling her eyes. "… Fine, I suppose I can do that little, if you miss her that badly," she returns the smirk, yet the heavy sigh he gives out halts the dismissive waving of a hand she was about to make, dulls the tension in her features. "So long as you don't reiterate this little joke, I'll let it slide. Are we clear?"

"Yeah, yeah. Feel free to laugh at me, XO."

"I won't, nor do I think less of you for it. Just don't call me like that again, joke or not. My name is all you should require, Shirogane. Now then…" Slowly, the Professor strokes her bangs, looking up, piecing what he had said thus far, trying to ignore his stare.

After a moment of silence, she starts to pace in circles, tapping her chin, eyes locked onto the ceiling.

"I believe that when you began the transfer, you did so with the will to reverse the effect causality had on your home, right?" He nods, leaving the mug on the table, his full attention on her. Leaving the silence hanging on purpose for a moment, enjoying the attention, she smiles as she plays with her hair. "That is, then, your core wish upon which your will exerted pressure to leave. However, Nucleus or not, you couldn't have returned to the past of the world where you saw Alt IV to fruition because the will of that world's Kagami was already fulfilled and neutralized by the 00 Unit of that world."

"… By the by, how did that even happen? I mean, that's what ended up making me lose my memories when I returned home, right?"

"I assume, yes, since she might have desired to spare you the suffering of carrying the knowledge," she nods, eyes veering to the whiteboard, going up to it and poking certain calcs. "I think she must have observed the variables in the wave-functions of that world and how the non-local influence generated the Conductor, and then neutered the link so as to prevent any further loops from occurring in that world. However, while that only severed the direct link of your home branch and those alternative branches of worlds, it must have taken a severe toll onto her capabilities. I believe you told me the 00 Unit wasn't at full output after the base was attacked?"

Shoulders and expression fall, he relents a short nod. "While it seems I had managed to let her truly inherit all the memories and become as human as she could be, we were running against the clock for Ouka. I doubt Sumika was at the top of her performance then."

"I see, it makes sense. So the 00 Unit might not have had enough power to observe the precise variable to sever the link and push both worlds back to their original, non-interactive placement in space while also not erasing you completely. As an entity tied to the Conductor, once it is severed you would, well, disappear from the world. With your home world getting reset to a point where its Shirogane wasn't gone, no more disturbances would be left. But I suppose… she still wanted to let you live, despite not desiring to leave you with the guilt of the war. That's the only possibility for the turn of events that happened in your world, I doubt the 00 Unit willingly left the ripples unchecked."

"I see…"

"By the by, I am not saying you are to blame for-"

"Don't, I get it," he nods back, hardening his features despite a sigh. "It's all just part of what I gotta do to honor their lives and put an absolute end to this mess."

She starts pacing around again, nodding in relief to see not a single crack in his eyes or tone. "Well, is there anything you'd like to ask about this point before I move on?"

"Actually, there is," both hands come together as if trying to lift a wounded comrade, eyes closing. "Sumika was who made me into a conductor in the first place, so wouldn't her death make me disappear from the world? You know, since she is the source of what actually ties me to reality? I always thought it was weird, how I still existed after she died."

"Sigh… Yes, Kagami is who made you a Conductor to begin with, so as your 'primal observer' she was the first cause of your existence. However, since the condition for her 'wish' wasn't fulfilled by her death, the 00 Unit had to observe your existence's roots and undo the pull that anchored you to that world after she was completely tuned. As the heir of Kagami's feelings the 00 Unit is the only one who could have done that. But even after her death, so long as there were people whose thoughts and feelings worked as an anchor for your existence, you would remain tethered to reality until either your or their deaths. Nucleus or not, as an anomaly you cannot remain 'alive' without a primal observer watching over you, Shirogane."

"Hmm, I see. Guess that means we got lucky I took a nap before activating the 00 Unit."

Sighing short yet heavy, a narrowed gaze remains on him for a moment, only leaving as Shirogane-san raises a brow, unsure of what to make of the Professor's silence.

She leans on the desk, hitting it softly with her heels, again gripping it a bit too tightly. "Anyways, if the 00 Unit became stable as you said she did before the Kashgar mission, it would have been able to completely reverse the effects the original Kagami made on your existence when the G-Bombs dropped, provided it had time to replenish and work at full output while focusing solely on that task. Going into detail of the quantum variables and non-local forces involved would take me too much to explain, so that's all I'm willing to say on the matter."

"Okay, got it. So, the 00 Unit could, theoretically, mend the ripples and stabilize me, either here or in another world by erasing the memories of my loops. At least, she did manage to fix the world I was in last loop."

"Hm? How do you know that?"

"You said it just now. If the conductor's issues hadn't been fixed, then I would have been pulled straight back to that world when attempting to transfer myself, right?"

"Well, I suppose… The conductor and the points in time it existed in should be locked from any outside influence, yes, that much is true."

"And nobody has remembered anything about that world yet, either. Despite me being a stronger Nucleus and the highway being wide open as of now, too," he notes as he nods, pointing a finger up, waving it like a baton.

"And you're certain of that because…"

"Because of you."

"Me?"

"Yeah, if you, the person who I spent most of my time with, the one who is more likely to hold a desire as strong, if not stronger, than the one the other Sensei held in that world, haven't had a single vision of what happened in that world yet, then that timeline must be truly free of leaks," he concludes, nodding in clarity, still as a pond.

Which causes her to get closer, another arrow rain coming from her gaze. "What exactly are we speaking of?"

"I'll tell you after we're done with this discussion," he smiles, gesturing for her to continue, which causes a small groan from the Professor. "Now, if I couldn't go to that world, how did I end up here, in a world I had no ties to?"

"Sigh… I told you, as a Nucleus, you can link yourself with worlds that could be seeking your data. So if it wasn't the original world you looped in, then-" she stops all of a sudden, words and steps, a hand raising to her mouth which widens along her eyes.

"… Uh, Vice Commander ?" He asks, furrowing his brows at the statue the Professor has become. "Earth to XO Kouzuki, do you copy? If you don't reply, I'm calling you honey again for the rest of the day."

"Your funeral," she retorts, eyes blazing.

Which makes him whistle lightly, moving his brows up and down in quick succession. "So you do listen while brainstorming, huh."

"Of course I do. But really, again insisting on calling me like that? Are you that lonely, Shirogane?"

"Sigh…"

"Come on… Wipe the dejection off your face, this instant."

"So," a hand on his neck as it circles, he looks away, to the rows of papers he had arranged before, "did you figure something out?"

"I might. But, just to be sure, you did think to return to that specific world as you made the jump, right?"

"Well, I was thinking on my comrades, to be honest. It was what tied me there, after all. Guess even they forgot about me, in the end."

"They?"

"… You and Kasumi, the only ones who could actually remember who I was, had been. If they, the ones with the strongest connection to me, didn't think of me anymore, then it's obvious the transfer failed," he sighs, leaning back, resting his neck against the cushioning, his legs extending limply and hitting the table. "That's kind of the reason why you baited Yuuhi so hard, right? To make them think about me as someone who is alive instead of dead, to have them aware of my existence in their thoughts instead of fading as a distant memory."

Looking at the apathy of his slouched form, she nods as she again crosses both arms into a sailor knot. "Precisely. You had mentioned once how you stopped having dreams of your home world when you got into a relationship with your squadmates, so procuring an anchor for your existence was a priority. And I still believe you regaining your citizenship and identity would be for the better."

He looks up, again with the battered smile as he nods. "And I get why you did it, and I'm thankful you thought about how to stabilize me. Still, that aside, this leaves a hole in the events after the transfer."

"Does it really matter so much? Why can't you simply accept the events turned out in this way due to causality rearranging itself after your data blasted away from your world?"

"Because if there was no way I could have transferred myself to the world I was in before, well…" a slow nibbling on his bottom lip, eyes which sink under the horizon, dusk to his features. "After everything was said and done, I should have disappeared. And yet, somehow, I ended up back at square zero in a world that seems like a mix from mine and the one I looped in. Why do you think that happened, Vice Commander ?"

Again going up to the whiteboard, she starts drawing circles and lines on it, with words of 'Home', 'Conduit', and 'Shirogane' at some parts. Three circles, one for his home world, one for last loop, and one for the current world were united by a few lines, dates and numbers marked within their perimeter.

"Well, when you activated the transfer, since there was no conduit formed and no 'observer' trying to pull the Nucleus towards it to allow the possibility of 'Takeru Shirogane is alive' to manifest itself there, there was no way for you to materialize in that world's past."

She then crosses the section between the numbers 1999 and 2002, before sending an arrow from the Shirogane dot to the upper part of the 'BETA World' branch.

"I suppose one could make a case that the memories made in that world would allow you to remain there, now that you're a stronger Nucleus, if your will was strong enough and a link could be formed. As you said, however," she grimaces, rubbing the underside of an eye, "it seems that world's Yashiro and myself have either forgotten you, become radically different to who they used to be while you knew them, or have left your memory as something that belongs firmly in the past. Thus, without them having you in their thoughts, you couldn't form a connection regardless of your will or the energy employed."

So, she goes and crosses the line uniting the upper part of the 'Last Loop' world ball with the 'Home' world ball. Essentially leaving that world isolated to its own devices, no longer affected by outside influence, set in its ways forevermore.

"Furthermore, if that had actually happened you would have appeared in a place relative to where the transfer occurred and not in your 'room' as you once described it and, by extension, it would have taken a significant amount of time for your data to flow and materialize into that world. I think that was your world's me's plan."

"But it didn't work out, so my data should have gotten scattered, seeking a link… waiting for anything, anyone who was still thinking of me," voice crumbling like the Oder-Neisse Defense Line in front of Destroyers as he looks down, sighing heavily, holding his left wrist, choking it for dear life.

"It also means whoever is left in the worlds post-Babylon also don't remember you, possibly due to forgetting you existed shortly after your death," she tells, making a cross over the sign called 'ALT V' with more vigor than it was necessary. "Do you believe there might be anyone who still remembers you in those worlds, by the way?

Some lover you made while in the IRG, perhaps?" She teases, tip of a finger on her lips.

A sharp frown, a frontal stare. And then, silence.

"… No, there's no one worth remembering there," he finally spits, poisonous magma and the clouds of toxins all at once.

"I see… Well, anyways, Shirogane, you tried to will yourself to that world, universe, tree or however you wish to call it. True or false?" She asks with a light smile, getting closer, pointing the marker to his nose.

Eyes squint as he fiddles with his hair. "True?"

"However, the conduit that allowed you to appear in all branches of that original world was gone. So, you cannot go into either the worlds after Babylon or the world where you lived to see Alt IV in action immediately, your data would have to first completely flow into them for you to manifest yourself there. True or false?"

"True."

"Then, as you said before, you had an affinity towards a specific parallel world. However, what if an exceedingly similar world also was trying to 'pull' your information towards it?"

"… You mean like, a branch of the world I always looped in."

She smirks, clapping once. "Almost. Think of it as a twin instead. The theory indicates that the Nucleus can link itself if there's a source seeking to 'connect' with it. So, while you cannot link yourself to the world that you looped into, there is another path available to you right besides it. The world in which history proceeded as it was meant to be."

"The… Wait, a world where I never appeared? Why would I end up there?" He asks, following her steps back to the whiteboard.

In it, she draws a line from the Shirogane dot to the 'Current World' circle, back to its lowest point. "You see, I believe there was a split in our timeline when the G-Bombs dropped. Branch One, where a link was successfully formed and you ended up appearing on the 22nd of October two years later, altering the events that would come however slightly. Branch Two, where the link wasn't formed and the world continued down its predetermined path."

Pointing to the 'Loops' and 'Current' balls, she then makes a small reloading icon in between them, linking it to the crossed-out ALT V.

"You overwrote the first world when you returned to the 22nd with every repetition, be it with or without memories, effectively making an alternate branch within it, so to say. And that first branch and its successive branches haven't been reset as we said before. The only world that was reset was yours, where no conductor was formed. So, theoretically, you could link yourself to the future of those timelines, if someone who still held you in their thoughts existed. As you said, however, that did not happen." Looking back to gauge his reaction, Shirogane-san had a downcast expression, a tiny flower enduring a downpour, but was still focused on her explanation, which spurs a small smile in her. "The difference during the transfer you attempted was that there was no clear, strong link with your world to draw you in. You forced the window to open, and in doing that you were subject to forces beyond your control."

"… So I should have ended up drifting through the void, getting scattered all over again," he concludes, grimly. Her nod only causes his hands to rake the palms, his eyes to close for a moment. "However, if there was no one who sought a link with me, even if unconsciously…" he suggests, scratching the back of his head, "why did the highway bring me here?

"The important part here is that those worlds had already made a Conductor appear and then they were brought back to normal, without being reset. There was nothing tying you to them, nothing calling out for you. The other branch, however, never managed to form a conductor. One could say that, as soon as your data tried to break into that world, or subset of worlds to be more precise, you, as a Nucleus, were drawn to the world that never had a Conductor instead due to the unfulfilled desire of Kagami. And alongside you… all the scattered data you say this highway drained from your world might also have come into the world. That is as far as I can go using logic. As I said before, leaks cannot change the past. Even if your metaphysical data was brought over to the branch in which Kagami never found the way to spawn a conduit, there is little that can explain the similarities that you've noted this reality has with your world."

"Then, what? You're saying it's all just a coincidence?"

"Well Shirogane, what is reality?" The scientist smiles, tilting her back as she grows closer.

"Huh? Reality?" His eyes squint, lost as a penguin in a desert.

"I think we should have had a conversation like this in the past, when I sent you back into your world for the theories to complete the 00 Unit. A group of possibilities, what we call reality, is nothing but the collective determinations of every being that observes and resides within its boundaries." She then points again to his nose, nodding shortly. "In this case, you were the 'primal observer' that wished his relationships to be 'true', and as such, the chain reaction to effectively make that a reality, based on the data you had carried with you during the transfer, created this rewritten world."

"… For real?"

"Unless there was another observer which watched over you and had access to energy equivalent to the detonation of many G-Bombs, this is all I can deduce. If the highway you describe the ripples as could affect your world so rapidly, it is not odd it could have far more drastic effects once a proper link was established. Basically, causality seeks balance, to integrate events and data into stability. In a way, the world just reorganized its own data, along the data that came from your world, to 'reach' a certain wavelength and assortment of events that would satisfy the 'Truth' condition of the observer. Since the effect dictates the cause, let me use this example. A photon, when observed, can only exist in one state. The cause, being observed, generates an effect, being in a certain state. In this case, the relationships and situations, which would be the effect of many other causes, force themselves to be 'true' and the causality rearranged the events when this timeline was modified to make them exist. Sadly, this is as far as I can theorize. I cannot fathom how or why the past was changed, unless… Well, the possibility that this is actually another loop created after a reset does exist, and if Kagami's wish was not granted then when the timeline was reset all the data leaked regarding your world got mixed in, trying to satisfy the Cause of Truth both you and Kagami desire."

Sighing hard, she rubs her forehead as she rests against the wall for a moment. Washed over by the rush, the beating on the back of her head after the sudden stream of thoughts, little jolts course through her arms, her stomach as she inhales. The numbers, graphs, and possible links graft a pleasant conclusion, to the point where she extends both arms upwards to allow the stream of jolts to run across her whole back, eliciting another slow, deep sigh.

And with spirits replenished, she once more opens her eyes, tilting towards the sofa. "Was this explanation enough to please you, darling ?" She asks with a smirk, that quickly vanishes as she sees the dead-serious expression Shirogane-san has as he whispers under his breath. "Shirogane?"

"… Hm? Sorry, was lost in thought. You were saying?"

A cheek slightly puffs for a second, she hastily looks away before blasting towards her chair. "Nothing, I said nothing." Sitting into a spin, both hands rest on her stomach. "So then, now that we finished this long detour, I assume your motive to inquire into this was to have me realize the possible repercussions you being linked to the IRG has for you?"

"In a way, I guess."

"First of all, is your situation in the Swordbreakers similar to what you went through after Iceberg?"

"No, that's only half of the mirror."

"And from where comes the other?"

"From the Valkyries."

"… Huh? But you said a moment ago no leaks-"

"No leaks are coming to this world from there, so the only similarities that can exist are those already attached to me," he shrugs, an eye closed. "I assume you remember our… collaborations during 1999?" She nods, eyes narrowing a bit as she starts to spin. "Unlike what I went through in the IRG, the Swordbreakers were a secret squadron. Almost like a STF of the IRG, one could say. Down to the TSF I used and all, really."

"So you were not part of a secret unit after Iceberg? What was of you in those worlds?" She asks, staring.

Shirogane-san shakes his head, his weight falling onto the armrest. "Does it matter?"

"I gave you a decent explanation, didn't I?" She demands, stare unfaltering.

So he sighs, scratching his head. "No, I was made into… some sort of public icon."

"You? A public icon? Wait, but, a commoner?"

"Yeah, believe it or don't. Not to brag or anything, but I was the best pilot in that world save for maybe Marimo-chan and Major Walken."

"Huh, is that so. Who is this Walken, by the way?" She asks, looking elsewhere.

Which immediately makes him chuckle. "Bet you already know, don't you?"

"Why do you believe so?"

"Since you seem against heeding my warning towards the eruption, you may be thinking on… capitalizing on the opportunity to bring stability to the Empire. After all," he frowns, hellfire erupting within his eyes, the same draconian expression he endows while piloting coming forth, "you cannot attain Heaven without going through Pandemonium first, right Vice Commander ?"

A frown in reflection, air is swallowed harshly as the spin stops. She holds his gaze for a moment, grasping her chin. "How do you know that phrase?"

"… Wanna guess which squadron of the IRG was sent to aid us in Sadogashima last loop? Wanna guess which House had the order to look after you while you were in Sendai? Wanna guess…" inhaling through closed teeth, a hand rubs the space between his brows as both neck and jaw tighten, compress, fail to move, spread lines of pain, "who was the one that took your orders to the letter during Shura's Dance?"

"… So that's what this is about," she notes, leaning back, staring down at him. "You wouldn't be getting blinded by… some loyalty you still hold towards Her Highness?"

"No, I'm blinded by own desire to stop the same tragedy from repeating itself. And to that end, we cannot feed the conductor any more chances to screw us over."

"Tragedy begets opportunity, Shirogane. If the conductor's flow can be accessed with much ease, if this highway can bring certain data to us, then all the more reason for us to capitalize on this. The events you went through in those worlds won't repeat themselves, this timeline is already too different."

"… Did that stop Marimo-chan from being thrown headfirst into a meat grinder?" He asks, seething to the rim.

"… Pardon?" And seeing the honest fury causes the question to come to life in her mind.

A momentary dizziness, a news report, sickness and heaviness to the stomach, and a bursting fountain of crimson created by the imagination.

"Causality gives no fucks about the state of the world, it only integrates events in search of balance," he says, trying to douse his mood, release the pin. "And as I told you all those days ago, I am here to find a solution to the war. So Vice Commander Kouzuki, " he stands, slowly walking up to the desk, never lifting his gaze from the now bloodshot stare, disturbed and alert, "you wouldn't be planning to spark up a coup d'état, are you?"

"… I assume this is what the third incident is about?" She asks in stillness, submerging underwater, meeting his gaze in perfect poker.

"Answer the question."

Sighing hard from her nose, she clicks her tongue. "This was how you met the Shogun in your last experience, wasn't it? I assume, you failing to account for the eruption was the trigger. However, by your account, Sadogashima could proceed smoothly afterwards, even the XM3's test was held despite what frictions I am meeting at the moment."

"Correct."

"And you're accusing me of starting the coup now? Why would you reach such a conclusion, Shirogane?" She asks, also standing up.

"First, it was awfully convenient that we found the Shogun. Even if you are the leader of Alt IV, I highly doubt the Empire would have given you the intel. Someone gave the order for Chief Yoroi to leak that to you, and I happen to have a hunch on who that was," he affirms, hands choking themselves. "Second, everything went a bit too smoothly. The Valkyries' skirmish blocking our escape at the right time, the fighting that breaks out to force Yuuhi to flee, even the defeat of Major Walken in his Raptor and the incident that ruined it all."

"You're operating on assumptions, Shirogane," she reminds, tapping her forearm, squinting her eyes. "Do not underestimate my network of intel. Also, even a Raptor can be bested in the right circumstances."

"Hard disagree. I've seen those beasts fight in inhuman conditions after Babylon, no shot a base Shiranui could stand up to it in a fair fight. Something, or someone, screwed up the Major's Raptor."

"… How odd, seeing you defend an American," frowning intensely, she looks away.

"I've seen him fight myself, I know how good he is. Also, he was the only one I recall that actively tried to lend a hand to keep the peace, even if only for the US' interests. And finally, there's the third and most important point of all."

"And that would be?" She asks, lunging for his gaze.

Which then crumbles again, to pieces, to atoms, as he rubs an eye strongly before giving a punch to the air. "… That I died during the original coup."

"… Excuse me?"

A step forward, she can start seeing herself within his eyes. "You're under the effects of a leak, aren't you? I bet the same happened last loop."

"Wait, what did you- Ah… Are you saying these ideas are-"

"The tachyons from the Yuuko of those failed worlds, that are answering to your desire to reach perfect stability for the Empire. Just as it happened last loop, considering you got to the point of throwing the papers of your dear theory at me once, I can understand why you're on the receiving end of this leak," he sighs, shaking his head ever so slowly. "And when I do make it out of Iceberg… if a certain condition is not met, then I try and stop the coup that occurs in that future. And I fucking fail, and get killed because of it."

"… I see," she inhales slowly, rubbing her head, falling into her seat like a fish out of the water. Coughing for a moment, the Professor's back is assaulted by a rain of wax, small stings crawling up to her neck, wanting to delve under the skin. "However, that outcome did not come to be during your last experience."

"The highway wasn't as active as it is now, and that world was far different to this one. By the way, wanna hear something crazy?" He smirks, pointing with a thumb to the map of the Empire reflected in one of the monitors by the wall. "This Japan really does remind me of the Empire after the Babylon Disaster, what with its sky-high nationalism and borderline fanatical views of the Shogun and the IRG. Bet that was part of why I snapped as I did during the '99," he extends his arms outwards, spinning on himself as he moves back to the sofa.

"Still," she hits the desk, raising her voice, her eyes to meet his, to glare straight ahead into his sight, "we are aware of the data and possible outcomes. Those events won't repeat themselves, because I can negotiate for a proper deal."

"So you're not even denying it now, huh."

"What? You think I'm below sharing some favors to reach my goals? I have gotten my hands far more dirtier than this, Shirogane. I have-"

"What's this compared to abandoning Hakuryo, am I right?"

"… Take those words back, or else."

"Why? That's what you're thinking of. That's why you keep moving forward, to not let the sacrifices you've made up to this point 'go to waste'. Sunken cost fallacy, I believe it's called."

"I'm not giving you another chance. You take those words back, now ."

"… So you've already made up your mind on this," he closes his eyes, nibbling at his bottom lip with a single teeth, shaking his head, glaring at the floor.

"Then, what the hell should you suggest I do? Let the Americans overthrow the Shogun and cause an even larger uprising? Remain neutral and let the insurgents actually seize the power? The fate of this planet lays on my shoulders, I cannot- We cannot falter, come what may."

"Exactly," he returns the crossfire, a whole particle cannon. "The future of the children that are to come is at stake here. And I ain't leaving it in the hands of the nationalistic assholes that ruined us after Iceberg, and neither should you. You now know the highway is active, and what consequences it could have to leave it unchecked or to try and spur more leaks to come into this world."

"First, all you've shown are emotional arguments. Second, if the conductor is as active as you claim, then anyone with a strong enough desire could begin to inherit memories of those failed worlds. Not acting would place us at a disadvantage, when we are the ones that can reap the most benefits," she reminds, again palming the desk.

"It's not an emotional argument, it's the proof you need to see," he aims a finger at his chest, chuckling, "after all, what better proof than my fuckups when I ran away? There were no BETA to replicate the data, yet causality found a way. If the data of that future starts to manifest here, it will all try to be integrated into the world. I already regained my memories late back home, I ain't letting it all happen a second time." He takes a step closer, staring straight into her eyes. "But I admit, my own selfish desires matter little when pitted against the planet itself. So let me tell you Vice Commander, the conclusion of my debate as I slept. I'm going to propose to you a choice, that you can think on for some time."

"And if my answer doesn't please you?"

"Heh, that's the catch. There is no answer that screws me over this time."

"Oh, really? What if I deem you a threat and decide to nullify you?"

"Good luck tuning Sumika by yourself, then," he shrugs, smirking again.

"Sigh… You really are doing this, aren't you? What for? What are you after, Shirogane? Is it to keep Her Highness safe? Vengeance on Ikaruga?"

"… Huh? What, you weren't listening?" He shakes his head, rolling his eyes. "I am here to stop the leaks, and save my world. Whether this world wants my input, that's on your hands. I am already dead as far as this world is concerned."

"So why are you so opposed to… well, my plan to make use of the situation for the better of our plan?"

"Sigh… You really weren't listening, huh."

"I'm being serious here! You should know I can handle any negotiations that could be required. If your concern is that the power could shift to the Shogunate, then all we need to do is safeguard the Prime Minister. If you want your precious Shogun to be the one in power, we can try and parley with the IRG. But we cannot allow America to try and stage an incident, do not forget Alt V is still looming over our heads!"

"… Question, were there any G-Bombs in my world?"

"What? Why would there be?"

"Then, could the same amount of death caused by the BETA and the massive bombing be replicated in my world if enough time passes?"

"… We can regulate the amount of data we share to other worlds, thanks to the Nucleus' theory and the 00 Unit. There are no risks whatsoever, Shirogane."

"Besides the data that has already been integrated, that is."

"What is it then? Are you still hesitating on bloodying your own hands? Weren't you the leader of this secret squadron that's feared by most in the Empire?" She seethes, clawing, crushing the blank papers under her grasp.

"I've been telling you, we should not push our luck any further when it comes to causality. After all, to incite an incident is to open the gates for anything to go wrong. But debating over it is kinda pointless, so I'm going to give you your options, Vice Commander," he says with a smile, giving her an exaggerated bow. "Option number one! You listen to my advice, we neuter the conductor first chance we get, and we then continue to work towards a solution that doesn't involve gunshots in the open."

"That sounds extremely optimistic, doesn't it. What failsafe do we have in case of a possible coup sparked by other forces?"

"Me."

"… Huh? You?"

"What's that look for? You do realize you are in front of the Captain-in-Chief of the Special Investigations Brigade of the IRG, right? If you help me stage Ikaruga and whatever idiots from the IJA that wanna start a civil war, I can easily wipe the floor with 'em all."

"So then… you are willing to regain your identity? Will you still work for me then?"

"By you, that is," he replies, an honest and small smile shining through. "However, this does run into the problem of time. A proper investigation will take its moons, and the integrated data might play against us, especially now that Yuuhi must be wanting to get me back."

"Hmm… And then? How do you assume you'll prevent all the other leaks and effects from going off?"

"Oh, that's simple. If you were under custody from the IRG in my first loops, all we need to do is have you being safeguarded by them instead."

"Heh, you think they would want to willingly support me, much less protect me?"

"Uh, again, hello," he deadpans, waving a hand. "Takeru Shirogane, it's a pleasure."

A frown, eyes close and she sits down again. "… So it's all that easy, huh. I just listen to you and everything solves itself?"

"No, because listening to me means no coup. So there is a risk something might go wrong. That's where option two comes in. You can let the coup happen, without involving yourself."

"Why would I do that? I would lose the chance to act preemptively if- Wait, you have the knowledge of the events already."

"Bingo! That's right, I already know what's gonna happen, who's involved, and what's the landscape like. So, if you believe the coup has to happen no matter what, while I still insist we cut the data leaks ASAP, we can try and move within our boundaries without risking any ties coming to us. Let me remind you, the world Post-

Kashgar needs you standing strong, and the less dirt people have on you the better."

"Hmm, I see," she ponders, spinning on her chair. "Yet that leaves us exposed to differing events, unless you're willing to return to the IRG, which also comes with its fair risks."

"Precisely. Me being here does play against you, since I've no plans to make peace with the radicals if they are mirrors to those I've met in my loops."

"Damn it all… You truly cannot be dissuaded on this?" He shakes his head, hard. "Is there anything you desire that I can grant you?"

"No, nothing is worth the risk of seeing everything burn in front of me again."

"Sigh…" A sudden heaviness assails her head, forcing the Professor to support it with a hand, breathing with her mouth open for a moment. "Alright, fine. Is there another option?"

"Yeah, and that's the funny one."

"What does it entail?"

"You kill me."

"… Pardon?"

"You kill me. Bang bang," he says, making a gun and pointing it at his own chest.

"You are not being serious," she states, inhaling sharply, holding his gaze.

"I am, actually. See, there's no way for me to return to my world without it getting screwed over by causality. The only way for that to happen is to erase what made me a conductor in the first place, but there's no way I can bring myself to erase Sumika. And leaving me here will work against you if your best option is to again side with Ikaruga in support of the coup, to screw the CIA's attempt to take the power. So let's make this easier for us and honor our original pact, I tune Sumika for you, you mend the leaks and neuter the conductor after you see that the data you desire is active and integrated, and afterwards…" sighing heavily, hands dangle and waver in the air as he looks up at nowhere, eyelids almost veiled, "you erase me, so that my memories can't be used as a magnet to redirect causality back home."

"You are not being serious."

"Huh? I am, this is what's-"

"Stop fucking with me!" Blasting up, again smacking the desk and causing a tower of papers to collapse, she breathes raw lava back at him. "Do you think I can handle Her Highness if you ever disappear?"

"… I'm sure your friend Ikaruga already has a plan for that."

"Do you think I support every thing that bastard wants to do? Why do you think I cut my ties with the IRI?!"

"Then, option three is out of the question for you?"

"… Look, we can make this work. All I need is you being open about what you know and-"

"No, I won't risk it."

"… So you don't trust in me, is that it?"

"I do trust in you, wouldn't have told you as much if I didn't. But I can't reveal anything else, because I don't think it's a good call. I've told you what I think, now the decision is in your hands," he says, then turns around, walking to the door.

"Where do you think you're going?"

"To the cylinder room, we already took more than enough time. And there's little to do by continuing to talk," he says, low, shrugging, dragging both feet and gaze. However, the door remains locked, so he has to look back.

Back at the undaunted frown, the sentry in warning. "What are you not telling me, Shirogane?"

"Huh?"

"You wouldn't have gone to train with Marimo if this was your priority, you'd have come to the office immediately or would have used Marimo to contact me. Was that whole detour… for something else?"

"… I dunno what you're talking about. I've been as honest as I could right now," he deadpans, poker face in place.

"Speak, now. Are you testing me, then? Trying to see if I'm on Ikaruga's side, Captain Shirogane?"

"… You know, it's the first time I'm called like that, and it feels so wrong for some reason," he admits with a nod, his insides revolting as a toad swallowing a lighted cigarette. "But no, I don't need to test your character to that extend. Because I already know you, all I'm seeing is whether you believe me worth your trust."

"… Really? I don't intend to doubt you, since you did raise quite some fair points," she says, walking off her desk, through the sofas, getting closer again to his personal space, seeing him and nothing but his eyes. "Yet, it is rather odd. You haven't mentioned a thing about what happened in the mind dive. What are you keeping from me?"

"… You wanna know?"

"Oh, no, I'm completely okay with you keeping more secrets from me," she rolls her eyes, slicing a glare into him afterwards. "Speak, cadet. What is your true goal? Refuse to speak and…" her hands slowly raises, her fingertips grip the neck of his fatigues.

Yet, under the brunt of her dry ice stare, he chuckles. Even after she applies pressure to her grip, as she frowns and her expression contorts and tightens, as the tide pulls back into a colossal wave, the soldier quietly laughs.

"Well, if you insist… All I really want is to prevent tomorrow from becoming yesterday."

"… What?"

"I'm done with the loops, Yuuko. I'm done with putting everything in someone else's shoulders and hope things somehow work out. I ain't leaving it to chance, so I want a clear cut answer. But there is no point in chasing after something that doesn't exist here, yesterday will never be tomorrow. And more importantly, we are running out of time."

"Even if the eruption is close to happening, surely you are aware that there are other methods that can be used to light up a spark."

"I'm not talking about that. I'm talking of the Nucleus' pull."

"The Nucleus? You say… your own memories are still leaking into you?"

"Well, kind of. I don't recall everything clearly from Iceberg onward, so that is still clogging the highway. But the worst of it all is, I'm not the only Nucleus here. Everybody can be one, if their desire is strong enough. And I know at least two people who are being locked into a leak. Here's a hint: both have purple hair," he says with a smile, chuckling again.

"… Me and the Shogun?"

"Bingo again!"

"So my hyperfixation on my theories is… a sign of the leaks affecting me? Where is your proof?"

"Right in front of you," he points to his nose, nodding once. "You see, when I came back with my own memories, all I had was a burning desire to stop Alt V. It was legit all I thought of, even in front of my squadmates and all." Sighing, he hunches a bit, falling as if an engine of his had been hit. "I never recalled anything of our lives together, all I cared about last loop was to stop Alt V. It was bad enough I lashed out against Kei and Meiya in the PX, giving no shits about it too. Ironically, it was during the coup that I got my head out of it, maybe due to some subconscious thing triggering in me when I… couldn't put myself through risking someone's life. Maybe the way in which Sumika's wish blocked some of my memories allowed me to not lose it during the coup, but still, until then that was all I could think of."

"And you believe I also suffer from this link? From the tachyons I cannot get away from?"

"Yeah. All you can think of is to succeed, and nothing else. That's literally the description of how the leaks work, and I know this isn't something you really favor."

"Oh, and why do you think so? I am being serious about my ideas."

He takes half a step closer, seeing his reflection below the fire in her eyes, smirking back at it. "Then, why didn't you propose a coup during the Invasion? You know, when America had no influence in the Empire and the Diet's image was below the subway? Siding with Ikaruga then would have let you be on the good graces of the new authorities… but you instead remained supporting the UN and the peacekeeping efforts through what was left of the nation."

"That was…" she pulls at his clothes, undoing a button, nibbling at her lips. "You know the situation back then was completely different, I wasn't who I am today then."

"Yeah, but that doesn't mean you couldn't have gone down that route, though. And yet, just like last loop, the risk of running against the deadline, of an incident resulting in an American intervention, and who knows what inner negotiations you're dealing with, is sending you down this route. Where the only solution to the desperation you feel now is echoed from those ruined futures."

"So, what? If this plan was successful in your last experience, why- Wait, you said-" Eyes open wide, she lets his neck go. "Her Purpleness is also affected by a leak?"

"What, you think the docile and warm Yuuhi prefers to be abrasive all the time?" He shrugs, resting against the door. "Look, I know she has her temper, but Yuuhi would never compromise her standing or position for anything. Just like you back then, she ignored my warnings. So, care to guess why is she being so insistent as of now?"

"… Are you really only her stepbrother, Shirogane?"

"Technically speaking, I'm not even her stepbrother anymore," he notes, a finger up.

"Answer the question. Who are you in her eyes?"

"Of Yuuhi or Her Highness? Because that difference matters, a lot," he spits out, starting to hit the door with the back of his head in a slow rhythm. "Yuuhi probably holds me dearly, I'm still family to her. Her Highness, though, will only think of me as her bodyguard and pawn. What does she want from me, I honestly don't know," he then shrugs, returning the Professor's gaze frontally, nodding once.

"I see… And why haven't you said anything of the mind dive?"

"Sigh… I won't talk about that, not even if you insist."

"Huh, really?" A step closer, a hand to her chin, eyes to eyes. "You will tune Kagami, correct?" He nods. "And, what of these memories you recalled? I assume, you now remember what was of the future up until Iceberg and this… original coup. That means you also remember the world in which… you supported another me, correct? If you can tell me anything from that, perhaps we can gain further boons down the line, don't you think? You could… be my right hand, as you could have been in that world."

"… Until the leaks have been neutered, I don't think it's wise to play with this fire, Vice Commander ."

"You haven't called me as usual all this time, you know."

"Would you prefer me calling you honey?" He teases, raising a brow.

And is met with another step forward, an unblinking stare. "If I let you, will you tell me all you know? Will you stay and fight for- with me, Shirogane?"

And for a moment, they hold their gazes in silence, breaching the other's personal space, with only the tickling of the clock as their company as their exhalations tickles the other's chin.

"… I suppose there is a fourth option available," he relents, looking away, hiding both hands in his pockets.

"And that is?" She asks, not moving an inch.

"Do you remember the poem I told you about?"

"The poem? You mean, the one about you and the silver blossom?"

"Yeah, that one. If you can manage to remember on your own who wrote that poem to me, I'll tell you everything."

"Everything?"

"Yeah, for real."

"Huh, really? Even the size of your friend down there?"

"If that's what you wanna waste the question on, be my guest," he shrugs, rolling his eyes. "But I'm being serious here, Yuuko."

"So that world's me was aware of who gave you that poem, and considering the state of affairs you've described when giving me the pass… Was it some sort of couple's song or something?"

"No hints," he sighs, pinching his nose. "If you do manage to link with those feelings… then I will know we're on the same page. That's all."

"Hmm… There's nothing else attached? No calling me honey, no condition or anything?" She asks with a light smirk, poking the wolf.

Yet finds a small grimace, a deep sigh, a punch to the door. "Enough teasing, Vice Commander. If and when you remember, then we'll continue this conversation. For now, we have other matters to tend to."

"… Very well, you do have a point," she strides back to the desk, her finger hovering over the button. "Shirogane?"

"What?"

"You're certain there wasn't anything more to what transpired within the mind dive?"

"… It was all a reflection of what used to be, not what it is now," he relents, compacting his shoulders.

"So you don't see me as some sort of evil fox, Captain of the Swordbreakers?" She frowns grimly, looking back at him, a single eye scanning, debating whether to pounce, to lunge.

Yet he chuckles and smiles, "Did Kasumi tell you what happened to the evil fox during the dream?"

"No, she refused to tell me anything."

"It disappeared along the dragon, enveloped in its tight embrace."

"… What?"

"After all, I am aware that you're not her," Shirogane-san again shrugs, giving out the battered smile. "So I know holding onto those feels ain't the right thing to do, it ain't fair on you. Don't worry, Vice Commander. This dark armed dragon already knows he's alone."

"… I am still your ally, you know?"

"Yeah, but I can't fall on the same mistakes again," he admits in a low voice, running his hands over both arms, licking and twisting his lips, gaze distant as if looking at the stars. "So, please don't ask about this, Vice Commander. "

"Sigh… Shirogane, you do realize I can deal with anything that might bring you harm, do you?"

"Not against this, you can't really do anything to help me on this matter."

"And what, pray tell, are you afraid of?"

He looks into her eyes, before crashing down again.

Inhaling sharply, hitting the door, placing both hands behind his head, tugging at his scalp.

Fighting the cold cloak that falls on his back, the blazing binding on his stomach, and that ticklish poke in the underside of his armpits, Shirogane-san merely sighs heavily.

"… Of falling in love again, and calling upon the leaks attached to those feelings."

Tuning Duty

Chapter 81:

Tuning Duty

---

Some moments later.

(Cylinder Room.)

---

"So you're the famous Shirogane, huh," she says, giving the soldier a once over. "I'm Motoko Kouzuki, Chief Researcher of the, ahem, Robotics isle of this complex. It's a pleasure to meet you," extending a hand alongside a friendly smile, she returns the firm shaking.

"No, the pleasure's mine. So, was the headband really recording stuff all this time?" He asks, rubbing his now free forehead, staring at the small tiara-like machine that the researcher had connected to a nearby PC.

"Yes, that is its primary function. Although, XO Kouzuki was who designed it so I cannot guarantee it worked as intended," she affirms with a lazy nod, a smile towards the predatory gaze her sister was unleashing from a distance. Looking back at him, she takes half a step closer. "By the by, did I truly speak with you during a phone call before?"

"So you did forget," he notes, nodding as his hands return to his pockets.

"Well, nothing to be done, I suppose," she shrugs, walking over some extra cables in the room towards larger machinery. "Now that I did meet you, maybe this memory leak will stop temporarily."

"Why?" He asks, slowly following behind, towards a large pod that reminded him of his last mission in another world.

"Sight is the most powerful of our senses," she says, the green glint of the screen bathing her features as she starts some checks. "It solidifies much of our experiences, and more can be said through gestures than sounds at times. Wouldn't you agree?" He merely nods, extending a leg to not trip over some wires.

Finally making it to the side of the pod, he can then see the vessel that will become the 00 Unit, cables attached to parts of the body, sprouting like loose nerves, overgrown roots.

Hands wring for a second as he inhales until his stomach cannot take it anymore. "Don't worry, this time I won't force you to overload. I'll do things right," he then sighs, placing a hand over the glass that separates them.

Through the beepings and other sounds that envelop the room as of now, a set of footsteps grows closer.

"Do you think you can speak with Kagami, Shirogane?" The scientist asks, getting to his side and staring.

"Yeah, it's the least I can do," he replies, still looking at the sleeping machine. "These bindings are enough to contain her, right?"

She nods immediately. "I took your warning seriously. Even if it starts to thrash about as soon as it awakens, the 00 Unit won't be able to hurt itself or any of us," she whispers while leaning just a bit closer, so that her sister doesn't hear. "You do have a plan to stabilize it quickly, don't you?" She inquires the doubt, breathing slowing as he nods back.

"The first step should go smoothly with the help of the bunny right there," he says, looking to the cylinder.

"You mean Yashiro?"

"No, the other bunny," he points to the small keychain that still remains hanging over the cylinder, as the stars he once placed for Christmas were.

"Hmm, so that odd rabbit will work as a crux for her to focus on some core memories? How much progress did you make with this method in your last experience?" She asks, eyes set alight, getting even closer.

As the soldier deflects and satiates the starving inquiries of the scientist, young Yashiro scuttles and waddles among the cables. The cylinder now has a few add-ons attached to its base, scanning modules which resemble the special equipment present in the Mindseeker's shoulders. The small yellow threads between the two gave some respite to her worrying, however the fog which still clouds the scientist is still a small thorn of concern for her.

Once the checks and preparations on her end are finished, nodding to Motoko-san, she then walks up to the still debating duo, bunny ears perking up at the rather gentle and simple way in which their auras flow. There is no stiffness in the soldier's posture as of now, neck and arms loose, movements slow and careful like a cloud. The scientist herself is, while standing as straight and imposing as usual, also with her spike shield lowered as she stands mere centimeters away from him without a compact posture or lines of displeasure in her complexion as she shares whispers with him.

A faint shiver envelopes the assistant as the echo of his mind filters into hers, a vision of herself trying to teach Sumika how to do Cat's Cradle despite the blank stare and mechanical gestures she returns. Her steps stop, the tip of her toe stuck under a cable, almost sending the young bunny to the ground. Small flaps of her ears and the slowness of her movements prevents the fall, she heaves a sigh and approaches them again, this time with her sight following her steps.

"-and that's why I think using games and books to bring her memories from the ground up is a better call," she hears him conclude, arms folding as he gives quite the confident nod, eyes meeting the scientist's, clear as the night sky.

Yet, those violet eyes grip onto his, delving deep like a knife through butter. "And in the scenario where your ideas do not hold water?"

A small flare of dark, a short and shallow exhalation. "We'll play with what cards we got. And if it gets to that, I'd welcome you readying the floodgates first, Vice Commander ."

"Of course I will," she retorts immediately, tone and gaze still caustic and firm, yet Yashiro tilts her head at the small knot of yellow brewing around her stomach, at the tiniest curl on the edge of her lips.

"Um, Professor?" She calls out softly and the duo takes a hasty step back, putting some space between them as they notice the closeness of the bunny assistant. "All the preparations are completed. We are ready to start at your signal."

"I see. Good to hear," she ruffles her hair, looking away as if bored, dulling her aura with a shrug.

"We can… speak with Sumika-san, right?" She asks, stealing gazes.

She nods, patting the girl's shoulder. "Do not exert yourself. Remember that she will feel your emotions due to the psychic link, and if you stress over the matter you'll fail to establish a connection. Also," she looks back at her soldier, narrowing her eyes, "remember to not disturb Kagami's heart."

"Easier said than done…" he relents a sigh, a downcast gaze onto the cylinder. Yashiro nods in agreement, gripping the edge of her dress.

"Just don't send her into shock," the scientist tells, gazing into them while raising her chin, staring until both nod. "Well, let's get on with this. I'll be overseeing the last checks to the 00 Unit, just in case.

Motoko-nee, how is the equipment?" She asks, walking towards her sister.

The soldier steps towards Yashiro, petting her head. "Feeling ready?"

Bunny ears flap down once, she nods. "Whenever you are. I'll do my best to give you as much time as possible."

As slow as a parting page, they walk to the cylinder's side. Gradual like the vanishing of the afterglow is the tingly feeling, the presence of an ESPer on the soldier's mind. Looking up at the santa rabbit, a second to inhale, another to hold the assistant's hand, he closes his eyes.

After the initial shock, the momentary darkness, faint light gleams at the distance. It is not direct, there is no warmth. The distorted brightness would resemble the glare of the sun when observed from below water.

However, there is no clarity to the surrounding area. Thickened, taking on a greenish-tint, the aquatic expansion seems to know no end. There is simply water, and nothing else.

Focusing on how her eyes always looked, letting the assistant bask into his mind, share his effort, the soldier slowly feels movement to the vision. Cutting through the waves, piercing the fog that reigned over the tide, surfacing near erupting landmass and greeted by darkened storm above. There is only chaos for a moment, the stream and gale pulling in all directions. It takes them a moment to regain quietness.

"Sumika?" He calls out, causing the waves to roar tall, the gale to subside for a moment.

"Take… chan?" An almost broken whisper calls out, submerged.

"Sumika, I'm here. I can hear you."

"Takeru-chan? Are you there?!" Pain assaults his eyes as the storm seems to surround, to envelop and tower over him in its core."Are you alright? You're not hurt, are you?" And despite that, the desperation overshadows even the thunders that surf through the sky he can now see.

"Yes, I'm fine now. Um… Thanks for worrying, Sumika."

"Thank God… You're alright…"

"Um… How have your talks with Kasumi been lately? Did she show you something else?" He asks, sitting atop the waves, looking around for her shape.

"Yes, she showed me a few more moments. It was… nice to see our old school and all," easing up into calmness, the thunder cease their concert. "But, but…"

"What is it?"

"It feels odd…" she says, voice shivering. "I dunno how but it's… something's odd…"

He sighs, assuming she must be somehow reacting to all the extra equipment added to the cylinder. "Are you in pain?"

"No, not for now… Um, Takeru-chan, you seem… sad. Did something happen to you?" She asks, the waves once more beginning to dance, to collapse upon themselves.

"Sigh… I'm fine, for real. But I need you to hear me well, Sumika."

"W-What?"

"I remember you apologized to me last time we talked. But in reality… I should be the one to apologize."

"Huh? W-Why? I mean, you're not… You're not-"

"Heh, wanna hear something crazy? Turns out, I am the Takeru you always knew, Sumika. Sorry, for having made you wait."

A tall wave, knockback onto his senses, a whirlwind which binds all of his body, hiccups come to Yashiro's breathing as she struggles to maintain the connection.

"It's a lie! Takeru-chan is dead!"

"Then, you're saying you giving me a spinning top as a present didn't happen?" He asks, trying to fight the thrashing of the water.

"I-I did, but… but that was…"

"Didn't I used to tease you about how you didn't like to read Binocchio all the time?"

"Yes, you did… but I… I know you're not-"

"And what of the RPG books we always played? You're telling me you rolling three nat twenties in a roll didn't happen? If so, I want my candies back," he smirks at the expansion of tempest. "It took me awhile, but… I'm back, Sumika. Sorry, for leaving you alone all this time."

His sight spins, propelled upwards like spout. Sent into the sky, amidst the falling rain and the crashing waves, it all seems to grow and grow more by the second.

Yet, as he relieves those moments, the one time when he decided to gift her the santa rabbit, their first culinary accident when they thought it was a good idea to put both white and black pepper to the sauce, the never-ending conga line of bullshit strategies they came up with for their games, their shared Christmas celebrations, the bickering over the smallest things, even the promise that could never be, the birthday present that will remain forever lost, it's as if the storm, the gale and whipping waves were closing in on him, walls of water extending through the clouds, the reflection of memories of days gone by shimmering in the crazed surface.

"… You're alive?" She finally asks, the aquatic prison standing still as a monument.

"Somehow."

"… But I saw how you died. I saw them- those damn-"

"Sumika," he yells, extending his arms outwards with too much drama, "it's okay. I'm right here, and I'm fine."

However, the storm roars once again, blossoming into utter chaos. "Those BETA… Those fucking BETA! I'll kill them all! I'll tear them all apart! I won't let them devour you again! I'll devour those damn bastards! And the Royal Guard too, I'll kill those fucking assholes! No one is harming you!"

"Wait, the Guards?"

"I saw how they hurt you! They abandoned us in Hakuryo! Those damn-"

He screams and kicks at the stream, no amount of focus on what good times they had shared can break the torrent of dark which creeps from the sea, not even as the assistant grits her teeth, slowly starting to undo her limiters, seeking his arm in support.

"Sumika! You don't have to hate them anymore! Please, listen to my voice!"

"I'm sorry," once more broken, like the cracks in the sky that begins to sink upon itself, "I'm so so sorry Takeru-chan. I'm sorry…. I'm sorry… I'm sorry…"

"Sumika-san, please don't apologize. You've done no wrong," Yashiro says through a whisper.

"NO! It's not my fault!" However, little did it do to ease the rampaging tempest from slugging them both around. "I didn't want that to happen! Stop! Don't touch him! Noooo!"

A slight pain on his arm, a tickle on his ear. "Takeru-san, it hurts… I don't know if I can keep this up for much longer."

"Sigh… Just let me try one thing more," he answers back, looking up into the eye of the storm. "Sumika… It's okay, me disappearing wasn't your fault."

"… Huh?"

"I was there because I wanted to. Your wish didn't make me disappear, it just sent me away for two years."

"Takeru-san, what are you-"

"No… That's wrong!" Shrieking, crying, crumbling, both her voice and the tempest could be one and the same. "When I saw you I… I didn't recognize you, and then thought of how you used to be, and then you were gone, and I didn't know what-"

"If you hadn't wished that, I might have died, you know?"

For a moment, the scenery from atop the hill surrounds the waves, the panorama reflecting and bending at times.

"So don't apologize. It's thanks to you that I'm still here."

"But what I asked… but you were gone and-"

"Look, even I'm not entirely sure how the hell that happened, but what it's true is that the wish you made then is what has kept me alive thus far. So thanks, Sumika."

"Takeru-chan… Do you hate me?" The sea, like her voice, starts shaking as the waves clash against one another.

"Why would I hate you, silly?"

"Because of me, you had to die. If I wasn't there… you wouldn't have disappeared, I made you go away, I couldn't-"

"Please stop blaming yourself, you did nothing-"

"Yes, I did!" Her scream overpowers the peaceful memories, the sea once more darkens as bolts start to strike at the water walls. "You did your best to save me, I saw you trying so hard to keep going. I did my best, I really tried! But they- those bastards… and then you were gone, just when I could catch a glimpse of you… If I hadn't been there you wouldn't have gone to fight, you wouldn't have died… It's my fault, it's all my fault…"

"Come on, now. Sumika, please," he walks up to the tempest, resting his hand on it, a shiver, pain on his palm, "I am here, right now. And I'm telling you, it's alright. There's nothing to apologize for, you did nothing wrong."

"Yes, I did! You wouldn't understand, Takeru-chan! I… I… They… to me…"

Thunders break lose, the typhoon sinks, brine and a reversed waterfall raising to the sky. Recognizing the tone, the creaking, breaking, crushed voice, the soldier leaps into the stream, his thoughts almost fading from the assistant's scan.

Yashiro can only stand still and seek, only discerning rough serpentine shapes slithering underwater, a myriad of smallest hydras coiling over the ocean whole, filling it all up, twisting and separating the tide unnaturally until the current turns red, redder. The implication lost on her, the repulsion she felt within the forest stalling the motions to have her dive any further saves her from seeing the cruelty.

And like a lotus slowly spreading outwards, a cyclone splinters the sea. Fingers pressing onto the back, pushing, pushing against the resistance, pushing until the heart is out of the prison. Spirals of shards raise to the stars as it all shatters, slowly subsiding, falling as slowly as bubbles in the air.

Behind the empty shell, the void mask of the firmament, a tiny shooting star blazes through the storm. A halo of light descends through the gap in the sky, feathers of starlight gently parting the clouds away and revealing celestial tears raining down. Each and every droplet, a moment of joy, a moment of laughter. Upon contact with the filthy sea, they spread crystal clarity onto the waves and a refreshing and cold breeze towards the spectating Yashiro. All shadows retreat to the pit, the slithering monstrosities melting back to the abyss upon contact with the starlight.

Floating above the still burning remnants of the shooting star, he holds a wounded shape, hands and legs dangling like a puppet with its strings cut.

"I'm sorry… I'm sorry, Takeru-chan… I forgot about you, I became a BETA… I'm not-"

"Sumika, you're not a BETA," he says, holding her closer. "Look at the sky, are all these memories not yours?"

"But… But I'm no longer-"

"And I'm no longer the quirky little kid I used to be, right? Doesn't mean I'm any better or worse. The war hurt and changed me, too. But that doesn't make me like those monsters."

"But who would enjoy what they did to me?! Only a BETA would!"

"Then, does that mean that you don't want to talk with me and Kasumi anymore?"

"Huh? N-No… No, don't leave me! I'm sorry! I'm sorry!" She convulses, shaking her head, hitting his chin.

"I'm not leaving if you don't want to. So, do you want to talk some more?" He whispers, slowly resting the frailty on his chest.

"Of course I do! I… I don't wanna be alone, I don't want you to go away!"

"Then, that's proof enough. Sumika, you are NOT a BETA. You're human."

"Huh? H-Human?… B-But I… I let them-"

"If you were a BETA, you wouldn't want to talk with me. Because the BETA want to kill humans. So, since you still want to see and talk with me, you're not a BETA. You're a human, you're one of us. You're our Sumika," he says, pointing to the sky, recalling little moments, small arguments, tiny pranks.

Simply holding onto each other above the still sea, under the shower of constellations.

Despite the freight train that continues to slam onto their psyches, the tiny glass that within their throats burn, both the soldier and the assistant remain firm, seeking to cover the frailty with what little calmness they could bestow to it.

Along the gentle rocking of waves, the lazy sprint of the wind, and the glitched reflections of other days upon the water, in between those azure skies, the gleaming stars, and the cerulean waves, the three of them simply stood in silence.

"So Sumika," he slowly begins, taking a pause, a rather long pause, while shuffling his words a few times over, "I need to tell you something."

"… What is it?"

"Sigh… In just a few minutes, your pain will end."

"… It'll end? Am I… gonna die?"

"… Yes. See, we're going to try to transfer your mind to a body made in your image. I… well, I'm not sure how this works, honestly. But at the very least, your torture will end."

"A new body?… Huh? B-But… Takeru-chan, you said we'll be together… Am I… W-What's gonna happen to me?" Her voice grew weak, anxious, ripples, shadows within the sea.

"I don't know. But the only way we can kill the BETA is by trying to get you into that new body. L-Let me try to show you what should happen once we do." Small glimpses of victory, moments of triumph, and the standing ovation he once received as a survivor of the Kashgar raid play out along the waves. "With this, we'll be able to start purging the BETA for good. I know it doesn't make this any better, but you're our hope, Sumika."

"… Me?"

"Yeah."

"… I can help to… kill them?"

"To save others," he corrects, embracing tighter. "And this is all we can do, without risking something worse happening," a small celestial shard falls, revealing the eternal wasteland of salt for a second.

And then, silence.

Only the rocking of the waves, the odd star glimmering into the sea.

"Many times I tried to call out to Kasumi, to tell her to kill me," she says, monotonous, exhausted, so very tired as she leans onto the warmth of his presence, the lingering stare of Yashiro. "I couldn't endure it anymore, I just wanted to disappear. I enjoyed our talks, but I missed her so much whenever she went away. And then, one day… You came here."

Slowly, very slowly, light starts to timidly peek over the horizon, signs of dawn besting the dark blue up above.

"When Kasumi showed me images of you, parts of your words… I was so happy, so confused. Even if you felt different, you made my wish come true. I was able to see you again, to hear your voice. S-So… if you need me to die, if my life will help you… Take it," and looking back, the torn expression smiles with dawn's first rays basking behind her. "Just please… Don't die again. Don't forget me. And… and kill all those motherfucking bastards! And don't trust in the Royal Guard! It was all their fault!"

Patting the head, enduring the searing, he whispers, "Sumika, I got it. I won't let my guard down. So please calm down, yes?

Gulping hard, inhaling sharply as knives rove under her stomach, Yashiro reaches in, diving for a moment. "I won't leave Takeru-san alone, I'll ensure he remains safe. I promise. A-And… forgive me, Sumika-san. We… We can't do anything to save you."

"That's not true!"

Once more, the sun raises tall, blazing the sea away, blossoming into a vast field, a field filled to the brim with wildlife. The small little part of the hill where they used to play when they were younger, where they would idle the time waiting to see 'Saunty Claus' fly through the sky.

"Eh? W-What do you-"

"You both saved me, Takeru-chan, Kasumi. You gave me back my light, you let me be someone again, to talk and have some notion of time once more. Thank you… Thank you… for granting my selfish wish, for being here for me, for believing I'm human, for being so kind to me. Thank you, Takeru-chan."

"No Sumika, thank you. Thanks for… enduring so much," he whispers, swallowing further apologies, choking himself in the process.

Reaching out to touch upon the frailty, Yashiro's breathing is unable to imitate the composure of the soldier. "I will miss you much, Sumika-san. I won't ever forget you, I swear."

The link starts weakening as emotion overcame them both, everything growing blurry, the sky dimming.

"Thanks, Sumika. S-See you later," he says, slight dampness in his eyes.

"Hic… Even in that you're the same…"

"Huh?"

"The last time we talked, you gave me a hug and didn't say goodbye. You said that you would definitely come back… Hic… Thank you, Takeru-chan. For coming back. And Kasumi, thank you… for being my friend these two years."

The small, battered smile bathed in faint sunlight is all they can see, unable to reply. The shaky, almost mechanical effort to raise a wounded, tattered hand and wave away, standing alone amidst the grass.

"… Goodbye."

Their vision returns to the room, both fall to my knees in slow motion, supporting each other. The soldier wipes the light wetness in his eyes, giving Yashiro a one-armed hug as the girl silently wept, shaking and shaking.

"… We did what we could, Kasumi."

"I know… but I'm still going to miss her."

A few pats to her back, ruffling her hair, a minute or two of silence until their legs restart and both are able to stand once more. A pit left engraved in their stomachs, Yashiro coughs a few times, hoarse and dry, whereas dad simply rests a hand on the cylinder, wincing, nibbling at his bottom lip.

"Are you ready, Shirogane, Yashiro?" The scientist asks as she grows closer, wearing a perfect poker face.

"Yeah… Let her die like this, please," he whispers, walking away, letting Yashiro go to her required position.

"… Not like I needed you to tell me that," she hastily turns around and goes to the computers.

A whirring resonates through the room, lights begin to shine in a patter. Slowly, the liquid in the tank starts to swirl, to shine brighter. The equipment that resembles the Mindseeker's parts starts the scan, rotating around the cylinder, the soft whirring intensifying at times.

The minutes slowly pass, the equipment keep rotating, the numbers simply raise on the monitors, the areas slowly changing from blue, to yellow, to green in the confirmation screens. Nothing is said, no movement is made, all four of them remain waiting for the deed to be done.

A light beeping echoes, the circling starts to slow down until it ceases, the whirring also stopping.

" Vice Commander, is the digitalization-"

"Yes, the scan is done. Now all that's left is… killing Kagami. If you don't feel like-"

"No. I said I'll be by her side until the end. Do it."

All he can do is claw at his fists, to try to untie the knot that still holds a freezing grip over his throat, keep the tears at bay.

The scientist inputs a code on her terminal, the liquid starts to leave the tube.

The noise of it all going down somewhere is the only thing that is heard in the room.

Slowly the cylinder is depleted, so slowly, so simply, so gradually.

It's nothing but a percentage that decreases in a screen.

Nothing but a taskbar slowly reaching completion.

It is nothing but a slow descent along the liquid.

Until there is nothing left.

And so, right now… at this very moment, before his very eyes…

"… Sumika died. Just like that."

Dad's knees threaten with buckling as if Destroyers were charging at him, and he has to claw and grip at his legs. Once more, the cloak of cold falls upon his limbs, the stiffness, almost unresponsiveness assails him for a moment before Yashiro pats his shoulder, leaning on him. Both heave a sigh, wincing at the emptiness, at the lack of the usual cerulean gleam that fills this room.

"Motoko-nee, please take Kagami's remains and incinerate them right now," she orders, voice and features immutable as the weather.

Motoko-san goes up to the cylinder, presses something on it's base, and part of it opens up. She puts Kagami's remains on a small plastic box and leaves, also heaving a sigh upon her hurried exit.

"Shirogane, Yashiro," she calls out, waving her head towards the pod, "let's start the 00 Unit."

"Sigh… Yeah, let's," he barely finds the strength to reply, slouching his way forward.

"Don't worry, Takeru-san. Until the end she was happy," Yashiro says, squeezing his arm a bit.

"I see… You okay now?"

"… Yes. I'm fine." She gives a nod, burying the hints, the desire to stare back at the void in the room.

"You two," the scientist raises her voice, giving them a frontal stare, trying to shift gears, "help me get it in the UN dress before we start it up."

They release the 00 Unit from the cables on the pod, slowly pacing the safety covers over the sections in the limbs, and with some effort and coordination it is quickly dressed in the formal attire. Yashiro opens a small briefcase, taking out the ribbon that the scientist then ties to the long red hair. On her signal, the soldier reconnects the main cable that goes behind the neck and rechecks the bindings were fastened once more. He raises his thumb, the scientist walks to the main unit and begins to input the confirmation for the process, once more whirring reverberating all over the place.

Yashiro grabs onto him, watching intently the sleeping features while he pats her head. Numbers and odd symbols flash in the small screen on the pod's outer side. Once the screen shuts off, the noise ceases alongside it. The scientist gives the okay, gulping and taking in a deep breath, wanting to walk closer and do the honors herself yet finds her knees quivering, hollowness within.

As dad presses the red button, all of the pod's screens start shining in some form of patter, a flowerstorm of beeps fluttering about. It all lasts a second, and no errors come up in any of the screens.

Seeing everything in green, the scientist sighs, oh, so heavily. A second to restore air to her lungs, clawing at the supporting structure of the terminal, she takes sharp, long steps towards the pod, inputting the final code.

The cable on the neck snaps off on its own, the pod shuts down.

A small jerk, the chest raises.

And slowly, very slowly, the 00 Unit opens its eyes.

It convulses for a minute, lightly thrashing against the restrains, then takes a long, deep breath and falls still in place.

It remains there, unblinking as it calmly breathes in and out, simply laying on the pod without making as much of a sound.

"S-Sumika-san?" Yashiro peeks at her, hesitantly waving. The 00 Unit didn't react at all.

"Hello, can you hear me?" The scientist asks, staring for a moment with bathed breath. Upon the absolute lack of acknowledgment, she takes out a pencil from her coat and passes it above its eyes. There is no reaction, at all. She crosses her arms as a sigh escapes her lips. "Shirogane, you didn't see the 00 Unit's activation last time, didn't you?"

Dad shrugs with a wry smile. "No, I ran away like a coward the day before. I only know she- Uwah!"

The 00 Unit's upper body raises from the pod in a flash like a mummy from a sarcophagus in search of grave robbers, scaring the three of them to the point of causing them to step back. It then remains like that, not blinking, not moving, sitting on the pod.

The scientist gazes at her soldier, who nods and licks his lips, gulping and then coughing. "Hello. I'm Takeru Shirogane. How do you feel?"

An eye twitches.

"… Hello?"

Again, the same eye twitches. The lips start to quiver, breathing gaining momentum.

"Sumika?"

"… Kill."

"Huh? Oh shit, here we-"

"I'll kill them all!" His arms wrap around the wish for revengeance that erupts forth, the resistance enough to hurt the soldier for a moment until he could readjust his grip. "Kill! Kill! Kill!"

"Sumika, calm down! There's nothing to be afraid of!"

"I'll kill you all! You, and you, and you, and your parents too! You fucking bastards, I'll tear you to shreds!"

"Shit, not like I expected anything else," the scientist grabs Yashiro by the shoulder, taking their safe distance. "I'm going to send her into Safe Mode, Shirogane. Keep her pinned for a while."

"No, there's no need!" He screams, giving out a smirk. "Hey, Kasumi. Bring the bunny," he aims with his jaw at the little toy.

The assistant immediately hurries to take it down from its place, with the scientist's help who sighs, shaking her head at the bloody murder that the 00 Unit promises to bring forth. They then carefully approach the pod, dad aiming the 00 Unit's face towards them.

"No! Don't touch me! You'll break me!"

"Calm down, it's okay," he whispers, coughing as an elbow meets his kidney. "Hey, look there. What's that?"

Yashiro slowly raises her hands, the santa rabbit dangling from a finger. Immediately, the screaming, the thrashing stops. Left gaping, the 00 Unit stares, and stares, and nothing else.

"… Do you remember that, Sumika?" He asks, slowly, softly brushing her bangs. "It's your santa rabbit, a present from me to you. Remember?"

Eyes start to twitch, once more convulsion takes hold of her body.

He brings her backwards, resting her head on his shoulder. "I remember hearing you scream from the window that day, thanking Santy Claus for the present," he whispers, smiling faintly. "Also, remember when you came home for my first birthday? You gave me a spinning top as a present, right?"

For a moment, he remains whispering, retelling old memories. Despite the disquiet found in the breathing, in the pain apparent in its features, eventually it all starts to subside. The shift to Safe Mode was made gradually, without any shutdowns required.

"Sigh… Not like I wasn't expecting it, but you weren't wrong with her going berserk," the scientist shrugs, nodding to her soldier.

"Yeah, at least she calmed down this time. Last time it took me a few days to think of giving her something to use as a central pillar," he nods back, sighing along Yashiro.

"Well, nothing but wait and see what the data tells us. You two, help me connect her to the cylinder, we need to purify her ODL."

As they're going through the motions, sharing determined nods, placing the santa rabbit in her hands as well, Motoko-san returns from her duty.

"Oh, did I miss the activation? So, how'd it go?" She asks, arms compact at first, raising a brow at the firm nod her sister returns.

"Not as bad as I expected. We could place it in Safe Mode without any shutdowns, despite the backlash it suffered. For now, all we can do is wait until the ODL is purified and we can see what we can learn from this awakening."

She ruffles her hair, gazing at the machine, at the activated machine, allowing herself to smile as she sighs. It lasts a second, yet at the very least there are no creeping red screens or error beeps echoing in the back of her head.

"Motoko-nee, I'd like you to file in the headband's data. You don't have to analyze it today, unless something very odd pops out," she nods back, giving a tired sigh and a smile. "Shirogane, you'll be coming with me to the medbay."

"… Why? I'm fine," he retorts, folding his arms.

"We don't know that. The last time you regained memories you lost a great deal of G-Radiation, and I can't risk you vanishing again in your sleep," she states, taking a step towards him. "Giving you a full checkup shouldn't take too much time, and seeing how your radiation levels are should take only a moment."

"Uh, XO Kouzuki," Motoko-san starts to take a step, halting, then fiddles with her hair, "is Shirogane aware of, well, what the radiation-
"

"Motoko-nee, now is not the time," she narrows her eyes, all of her firepower, and her sister can only relent a nod before shaking her head. "Now then, where was I? Oh, right. Shirogane, to the medbay. I'll oversee how your body's faring myself, so do head over there now."

"Look, it's alright," he says, waving down. "I ain't gonna poof outta here, and I am fine."

"Cadet, I gave you an order," she repeats, arms folding. "Go on to the medbay and prepare for a full checkup. And you are not deceiving me," she takes a few steps, pointing at the base of his neck, "look how swollen you are, almost choking yourself on the uniform. I won't have any of your usual quips now. You're going to submit yourself to the checkup and that's final."

"… I mean, I can submit if that's what you want, but at least take me out to dinner first," he smirks back, causing Yashiro to tilt her head and Motoko-san to choke on a chuckle.

The scientist pinches her nose, inhaling sharply. "You son of a-"

"And this ain't a joke, you haven't had dinner yet. You should take a break to eat, for real. It's not like-"

Getting closer, again grabbing the neck of his fatigues, she drill her sight into his, whispering in a hurry. "We can have dinner later in my office while we discuss the plans for the 00 Unit and I fill you in what happened with the guards," she stops, turns him around and shoves the soldier towards the exit. "You haul your ass to the medbay, now. Yashiro, accompany him and make sure he gets ready."

He sighs, rolling his eyes as he exits the room, saluting Motoko-san as he does. Yashiro hurries after him, bowing down as she leaves. The scientist heaves a sigh, ruffling her hair, again staring at the 00 Unit for a moment. Before turning around and finding her sister endowing a small smirk while grasping her chin, drowning a chuckle.

"… What?" She asks, caustic.

"Oh, nothing, nothing," Motoko-san waves down, smiling. "Well, I am rather busy so I'll let you go to focus on the checkup," she picks up the headband and the small laptop that had started a preemptive scan, never losing her smile as she takes her leave.

The scientist wrings her hands for a moment, shaking her head afterwards. Looking back at the empty cylinder, at the sleeping machine, she allows herself to smile as she runs a finger over the glass of the pod as lights form an erratic patter, as the cerulean glow fills the cables.

"I guess I did it, huh. Finally, after so long… Siiigh. Now, all I can hope for is that my countermeasures do stop the sharing of intel… and that you can truly mend her heart, Shirogane."

---

Around the same time.

(Kashgar. Original Hive.)

[Superior]

---

Establishing connection… Processing… Connection established. Psychic Link formed.

"Lesser Entity 22nd, status report."

"REPORT: Unknown Entity discovered.

Through multiple interactions with Subject 597, said Entity produced patterns never before seen.

Entity established a connection with Subject 597 through recognized psychic patterns. It is believed another Psychic Entity might have been aiding it.

Unknown Entity produced similar readings to a previously met Entity. The Entity's readings are also different to that of all the Entities found on the star.

The Entity produced certain patterns recognizable in our database. It is believed it also needs a supply of energy from our systems, since its processing unit produced readings similar to that of the Worker units when they re-energize.

The Entity also showed awareness beyond its own capabilities. During the links, specifically the most recent one, it sent to Subject 597 images and words of stars that are similar to the current Host, but showing different structures and landscapes.

Final Conclusion: The identity of the Unknown Entity might be one of three possible things:

One, it is a new Lesser Entity of this star.

Two, it is the Superior Entity of this star.

Three, it a not yet encountered type of Entity."

"Report acknowledged. Cancel Connection?"

"Negative. REPORT: Damage sustained. Current output dropped below 40%. 50% of the Core's receptors have suffered irreparable damage.

Another Unknown Entity has connected to the revitalizing system shortly. No data was received.

Second Unknown Entity is not a Carbon-based Entity.

Identity conclusions are equal as the First Unknown.

A Psychic Carbon-based Entity has interacted with both Unknowns repeatedly, and has produced a higher output than past Psychic Entities encountered on the star.

Whether that is related to the Unknowns has yet to be determined."

"Report acknowledged. Cancel Connection?"

"Affirmative. Lesser Entity 22nd, cutting connection."

Analyzing data… Analyzing… First Unknown, estimated threat: HIGH. However, until further data becomes available, First Unknown shall be recognized as: Possible Superior Entity or Uncategorized Entity. More intel required, final determination pending.

Activating Emergency Orders. Executing… Setting Priority and Orders…

First Unknown: Contact and/or Capture, HIGH Priority. Sending orders… Sending… Data transferred successfully. Data sent to the pipeline for further reviewing and cross-referencing. Note: If possibility three is proven true, Orders should be changed to: Capture, HIGHEST Priority.

Second Unknown… Analyzing… Not enough information available. Data sent to the pipeline for further reviewing and cross-referencing.

Psychic Entity… Analyzing… First results: Estimated output: 78% stronger than past Psychic Entities encountered on this star. Emergency Orders… Executing… Psychic Entity, changing threat level from LOW to MID. Setting priority and Orders… Executing… Psychic Entity: Capture in working condition, MID Priority. Sending orders… Data transferred successfully. Data sent to the pipeline for further cross-referencing

Analyzing possible outcomes… Checking available Worker-units…

Establishing connection with Lesser Entities 16th, 20th and 21st… Connection established. Psychic Link formed.

---

Next Day. Around 6 AM.

(Takeru's Cell.)

[Takeru]

---

Zzz…

"Wake up."

Tilting to one side, grabbing what little comfort I could find, my sense feel cold and emptiness around me. As well as roughness, the stone cold firmness of the bed.

"Wake up," a soft voice whispers.

Mmgh… What hour is it? Ugh, so tired…

"Wake up."

Five more minutes… it's so cold…

"Understood."

Mmh… How nice of you, Kasumi.

… Wait a sec.

I slowly open my eyes, and a similar and different sight welcomes me. The coldness in the air tells me I'm not back in my world but…

A girl, by my side. Hair is red, not blue.

"… Sumika?"

"Good morning."

She's kneeling near my bed, grabbing the edges of it, staring straight ahead into my eyes, unblinking.

"Y-Yeah, good morning. Sumika, how did you get in here?"

The door into the detention barracks is a manual one, not an electronic one. She can't hack her way in. And the hell did the guard do when she appeared?

"I walked," she answers in a monotone.

"Yes, I know. But…" I look towards the door of my cell. It's open. And that means either someone opened the door for her or she did it by herself. "Sumika, did you come here alone?"

"Yes," she immediately answers, giving a nod.

Okay, how did this happen? She couldn't even hold herself in check yesterday and now she comes straight to my room without help? I can't send her away or she might start having an attack. This is a new one, guess my idea paid off.

I raise from my bed, Sumika also slowly gets up, with sharp movements, and stands there staring at me, holding the santa rabbit in one of her hands.

"Um… Sumika, thanks for coming but you really should have stayed in your room."

"No."

"Well, you could have come with Kasumi to-"

"No."

I feel like I'm talking with a wall. At least she's talking, even if like a machine.

"Okay. I'll take you to your room later," sighing, I get out of the bed. But Sumika doesn't move. "Um… I have to get changed Sumika."

Don't just stand there with a blank look! Kasumi, where are you when I need you?! Well, the 00 Unit shouldn't be ready to move freely anyways. If I recall correctly, it took a while for her to do stuff properly without guidance. Unlike cyborgs and androids, Sumika needs her time. And I have to look after her, properly.

"Sumika, can you step outside of the cell for a second? Come on, I'll get ready real quick." I grab her hand and walk her out of the cell, she immediately follows. "You wait for me here, okay? No looking into the cell."

"Understood." She nods. Good, she's listening for some reason.

Going back into my cell, I see she really is standing there like I told her to. Okay, how did this happen? She went from inanimate doll with berserker mode straight to 'coming-to-wake-you-up' mode overnight? I mean… Stronger Nucleus or not, I should be sharing intel to her as a manifestation of the conductor. Now it's a matter of replicating what I already did before, and see if I can activate my causal pull on my own.

I take off my clothes and enter the shower, taking one deep breath as I grit my teeth before letting the cold needles fall on me. I'll never get used to this, the cold drill on my head is still the same as the first day. Sigh, what wouldn't I give to go back to the warmth of an immersion bath.

After getting into my fatigues and tying my boots, I exit my cell. Sumika is still there, unmoving from the position I left her in.

"Hey Sumika, do you have the key of the cell?"

"Yes."

"Can you give it to me? We have to close the cell when I leave." She slowly turns towards me and points towards the door, also raising her arm to do so. I hadn't noticed she left the key there. "Got it, give me a sec." Closing the door and taking the key with me, now I'm ready to leave.

… But this is way earlier than usual. Well, I should take her back to the underground. This is worth a report, and I can check if they're having breakfast properly or not.

"Sumika? Let's go back to your room." I grab her hand, but then she instead grabs my arm. Her head gently falls on me like snow, expression as blank as snow too.

"No. Don't leave."

"I have to go train, Sumika. I'll go at night, so be good and wait for me, okay?" She tightens her grip on my arm, an eye twitches. "Come on, let's go." I take a few steps slowly. At first she didn't want to budge, but then little by little she starts to walk.

Very slowly, we got to the exit of the detention barracks. I hand the key to the guard, who looks at me with a giant grin on his face, nodding a few times and giving me a thumbs up as we leave. Dammit, I don't need more weird rumors to start spreading around. I should hurry and take Sumika to-

"Takeru-san?"

"Hey Kasumi. Look what I found," I smile, looking at the unyielding grip on my arm.

Kasumi sighs, giving me a small bow. "Sorry, I didn't notice she was gone. What did she do?" I explain to her what happened since I woke up, even how she apparently got to me all by herself. Kasumi's eyes widen for a sec before simply nodding. "I see. What could have caused her to act like this?"

"No idea," I roll my eyes, shrugging. "But you should take her back down there before someone notices she's here.

"No." Sumika presses herself onto me, strongly grabbing my arm as if I were a canteen in the desert.

"Sumika, come on, don't do this right now," I pet her head lightly, curling some hair on a finger, "I'll go later at night and we'll be together then. Will you wait for me?"

"Don't leave," she repeats, her hold binds me further.

Sigh… This is gonna be harder than I thought.

"Sumika-san, Takeru-san is busy. He'll visit us later. Come on, let's go back." Kasumi tries to pull her away from me, which makes her hands start clawing at me. D-Damn, it hurts…

"No, don't take him away from me…"

"Sumika, I'm not going to disappear. I'll come back to you after-"

"No!" She looks up at me, shivering, grabbing me as if I were the lone rope that's keeping her from falling down an abyss. Jaw shivers, eyes twitch, she's about to blow.

So I wrap my free hand over her, tightly. "Sumika, it's okay. I'll stay in the base, I'm not leaving." Her features relax, the hold softens slowly. "You don't worry about me. Wait for me in your room, I'll go at night to visit you, okay?"

"… Understood."

Oh shit.

She replied to me, she is actually talking with me now. I stopped the overload, this is a first.

Smiling back, I nod. "Yes, I promise. You go with Kasumi now, okay?"

I pat her back, she slowly releases my arm. After sharing a nod, Kasumi takes her towards the elevator. Sumika, however, remains gazing at me until they take a turn.

What caused this drastic change? I mean, the only change here is me… Didn't think it'd be this fast. And while this is great, it also means I need to be real careful with my thoughts. Not only to keep my own pull stable, but if she scans anything from that timeline, Sumika is definitely gonna snap.

"… Takeru?"

Hm? I look to my left. A pair of blue eyes greets my view, coming down the hallway.

"Oh, hey. Good morning, Meiya," I nod her way, scratching my head. Thank God she arrived now. A minute earlier and she would have seen Sumika.

"… Morning." Deflating like a balloon, she stares at me.

"So, uh, how's everything? I, well-"

"Takeru…" Meiya shoots a glare towards me, shaving the distance between us.

Her eyes… I wish I didn't remember those blasting eyes. Which one is it, mountain or coup?

"Who was that woman?" Meiya asks, arms slightly folding.

"Huh? What are you talking about?"

Frowning, her lips trembling a bit. "Do not play dumb, I heard you loud and clear. You said you were going to visit her room at night. Do you think I don't know what those words entail, Takeru?"

…

Oh, fuuuuuuuuuuuuu-

"Wait a second! It's not what it sounds like!"

"Huh… Then, care to explain what that meant? Not only you are under a strict punishment, but you also were supposed to be in need of treatment after your folly during the mock battle."

"Wait a sec, the mock battle wasn't-"

She grows closer, burning. "Who was that woman? What did those words mean? Despite your condition, despite your punishment, were you going to risk getting caught for her?" Meiya invaded my personal space, just like she did after I came back from Niigata, and stood mere inches away from me with an expression that could slay Forts.

Shit, shit, shit, shit! Of all the possible people that could have seen us… If she gets suspicious… If she tells Tsukuyomi-san, and if she then informs Yuuhi of it, and when she comes to the base she inquires about this with Yuuko, this is gonna be a disaster.

Causality, I just want you to know that I hate you. Meiya, of all people.

"And? What is it, Takeru? Cat got your tongue?"

"She's… a friend of mine."

"A friend, sure." Folding her arms even tighter, she narrows her purple fire at me. "Then, why are you going to her room tonight, Takeru?"

"Look, I can't tell you. It's… related to some official work the XO is ordering me to do."

"Do you seriously expect me to believe that?" The purple fire roars alive in her eyes. "She was pressing herself onto you, and you're planning on going to her room this night. After what happened, do you expect me to let this misconduct slide?"

Sigh.

I can't allow her to grow suspicious. Now of all times… I don't like the edge in her eyes and I like the snake in her tone even less. Going by her reactions to the talks regarding my memories, I'm sure she was told something. Even if Meiya is someone I would bet my life on, her loyalty and heart lie with the Empire. And while I'd like to believe she won't fall on that path, this Meiya has shown me before how cold she could be. That sweet tint, that gentleness from my Meiya is nowhere to be found here. So I gotta take care of this tactfully.

"Sigh… I can tell you some stuff, but you have to keep them as an absolute secret. Not a word to anyone, okay?" I have an idea, even if it's dumb. Refusing her does me no good, anyways.

"Very well, my lips shall remain sealed. I swear it on my honor. Then, explain."

"Her name is Sumika Kagami, she's a very talented engineer working under express orders of the XO." Last time this was her cover, so I can just tell Yuuko to use it again.

"Sumika Kagami…" She repeats the words, nodding once as she takes a step back.

"She's involved in many of the special missions I've had to work on, and is aiding me with some paperwork the XO ordered me to work on during my punishment."

"I see. But why are you going to her room? Surely you don't expect me to believe you work on her private quarters?"

Actually, that's what we do. The cylinder room is basically Sumika's room, so yeah.

"There's some stuff she has to hand me, is all. Nothing odd is going on here."

She scoffs, looking away. "It still does not excuse how she was clinging to you."

"Look, just, you got the wrong idea," I say, scratching an ear. Meiya folds her arms once more. "So, uh, why are you here?"

"Why, is my presence a bother to you?"

"Someone's moody today, huh."

"Wh- I am not- Sigh. Takeru, surely the Instructor told you of what has transpired in your absence," she states, stares, firm and blazing. Without even asking me how I am or anything. At least pretend some more, Your Fucking Highness.

"Yeah, I'm up to speed. So, what's up?" I lean on the wall, hands on my pockets to hide the claws they wanna turn into.

"Firstly, your flaunting during the run last night was unnecessary," she affirms, eyes narrow as her lips.

"I wasn't showing off, was just testing how well I had recovered, is all."

"I do not recall you ever employing such maneuvers, however. Also, what is wrong with your hair?" She asks, raising a brow.

"What?"

"Your hair, when did it grow so much? Why haven't you cut it yet?"

"To be fair, I haven't been in this world for, like, three months."

A frown sears momentarily, she shakes her head while heaving a sigh. "Takeru, could you please be serious?"

"I am, though. Why don't you stop camping and tell me straight up what you want to ask?" I say, returning the frontal stare.

"Fine, if you desire," clearing her throat, a hand brushes her bangs before the fire aims at me again. "Takeru, what happened during the last moments of the mock battle?"

"Didn't you say before I made a 'folly'?"

"Should I take this as confirmation, then?"

"Siiigh. You do realize I'm under orders to shut up about it, right?"

Eyes narrow, for a moment she looks down. "Are you not regretting the outcome?"

"Even if I do, there's nothing to do about it," I rest the back of my head on the wall, shrugging.

She comes closer, looking right into me. "I do believe there is something you can do to alleviate this situation. Making a public apology to 1st Kt Tsukuyomi should diffuse the rumors, so that the pressure our squad is enduring ceases to be," she affirms with a nod.

I shake my head, her features grow tight, "Something like that is only good for saving face, the whispers will continue even if I apologize. Those who wanna look for shit won't be dissuaded just like that, Meiya."

Exhaling like a bull, she takes another step closer while slicing the air. "Do not utter such balderdash. You forced 1st Lt Tsukuyomi's hand, now it is your responsability to mend this issue posthaste."

"It's a problem because there are jerks that already had a bone to pick with me or you guys," I sigh, hitting the wall. "We should simply remain doing what we've been doing, and ignore the haters."

"You do not seem to be regretting your miss," she says, giving me a sideglance. "Do you know how 1st Lt Tsukuyomi and her crew were treated after the battle?"

"Meiya, look, I get why you're doing this but my situation with the IRG is tied to some personal business. Can you please drop it?" I ask, giving a bow, poking the shore.

The tide immediately marches forward, sudden clouds to her expression. "What is compelling such a negative from you? I did not believe you hoisted any animosity towards the guards. Why, I wonder, are refusing so strongly?"

Finding only waves of fire, I look away, crushing rocks in my pockets. "I dunno, why are you assuming it was my fault? It was an accident, caused by both of us. Neither me nor 1st Lt Tsukuyomi are to blame. It was just a chain of bad decisions on both ends, and anyone trying to make drama out of this ain't worth our time." We've got bigger fish to fry, and I'd kill for some good mackerel right now.

One of her brows twitches, she takes a long pause to inhale. Fire's still there, though. "Tsukuyomi is clearly being pinned as the culprit, forced to apologize, to bow down for an error she did not commit. And that here you are Takeru, refusing to extend some simpathy to your fellows."

"Come on, it's not like I-"

"Oh, but you possess ample time for planning suspicious escapades with low officers. It is unbecoming, having an affair with that coarse woman."

"Excuse me, what was that?"

"I said-"

Taking a step forward, almost tackling her, our stares crash. "What the fuck was that? You take those words back or we're gonna have a problem."

"Wh- You would grow upset over that-"

"She's a friend, so you better not talk shit about her."

"Hmm. Now you know how I feel regarding Tsukuyomi's situation," she then gives a small bow, not meeting my eyes. "My apologies, I let my temper overcome me."

"Sigh. Whatever. Just don't be harsh to Sumika, she doesn't deserve it. She's actually-"

"It is fine, I do not need to know," she dismisses, walking backwards. "However, I must insist that you apologize, Takeru," she nods my way, embers tamed for the moment. "Not only for Tsukuyomi, but for your own reputation as well. Even if you believe it to be an empty gesture for the rest, it is not for the officers of the Guard."

"As if me saying sorry would do anything. They'll get more pissed," I shrug, one eye closing. Sure, I think Mana would appreciate it but I don't wanna explain anything nor answer questions. Plus, it won't feel genuine, it'll be only a corporate gesture even if I am sorry for having snapped like that, sedatives or not.

She remains watching me silently, arms sagging as her lips twist. "Takeru, within the warrior selflessness must flourish. It is key to nurture one's compassion to be your fellows' guiding light. 1st Lt Tsukuyomi did not report your illegal possession of the Minaru Kamui after the CCSE. Now, it is your turn to repay that kindness."

"And what will me apologizing achieve? They'll see it as a forced gesture, the rest won't changw their stances with a simple 'I'm sorry'. Plus, apologizing just for the sake of it would be only for my own peace of mind."

Yuuko already cleared stuff up, no one is to blame. If anything happens, I'll ask her what we can do about it. Though, I seriously doubt there's anyone stupid enough to pick a fight with Mana. Then again, never say never.

Face turns to stone, like a gargoyle. "I can't believe someone trained as a warrior would defy the code."

"Ironically, I am no warrior."

"What? Then, what are you?" She shoots, arms crossing as her lips purse.

I smile, beating a hand over my heart. "As the Japanese term given to pilots indicates, I am a guardian. An 'Eishi', not a 'Senshi'."

Again, a brow twitches. Lips quickly flap before she slaps both hands onto her waist, flamethrower active in her eyes. "A protector you call yourself yet, what is it you safeguard? You're placing your comrades in quite the precarious position, you refuse to mend your mistakes, and you act with unwarranted righteousness after your folly."

"I'm acting as I deem necessary, for what I believe is best for me and the squad," I affirm, not relenting under her stare.

Which wavers a bit, again taking a pause before she continues. "Within the warrior, there is only place for truth. If you're sorry, truly, then, why would yoy not extend an apology?"

Pinching my nose, I inhale slowly. This is the second wall I'm talking with today, it seems.

"Takeru, a warrior wields the blade not to further its own interests, but to protect the powerless," she tells, pushing her chest out, brimming with pride as she looks into my eyes. "I can comprehend your concerns over a possible backlash, but you're now only looking out for yourself. Avoiding an apology in defiance, knowing 1st Lt Tsukuyomi bears no ill will to you. Why, I wonder, would you be against resolving this issue?"

"It's only an issue because others already had problems with us. Apologizing means accepting the guilt, and confirming their suspicions. Do you think the soldiers that stand on either side will change their postures in a flash just because I bow down for a few seconds? Don't be so naive, please." If that was all it took to solve our problems the Invasion wouldn't have been a mess, the Babylon Disaster would never have happened, and I wouldn't be here.

A slight frown, threat of smoke. "What? It is only the obvious course of action, to admit your folly and repent for it. And above everything else… Why do you so adamantly refuse if you're free of blame? It is almost as if you wished to avoid the guards," she whispers, sending a sideglance, a dart into my heart.

She's not her.

Do not be an idiot.

I know she isn't my Meiya.

Don't take it personally. She's not my lover.

"… Looks like you already reached your own conclusions," I roll my eyes, looking away.

"The facts are clear. Do you believe I'd forsake my fellows to shouldering a brand they do not deserve? If you truly are free of guilt as well, is it not in your best interest to extend a gesture to 1st Lt Tsukuyomi? Isn't it for the benefit of the squad as a whole to extinguish any baseless motives that could be used against you?" She asks, getting closer again, staring silently, waiting, awaiting.

"… Again, if that was all it took to change people's minds, politics wouldn't be needed. I get why you're worried but, really, this has nothing to do with you," I sigh, taking a few steps. She extends a hand, blocking the way.

"Surely you're jesting? You should be aware of the repercussions setting such a precedent would cause, to allow blames to be placed onto the members of the IRG. If you truly call yourself a guardian, then your priority should be to-"

"… You do realize the guards were who pushed me to the edge, right? If they had let things rest, nothing would have happened." If only they had kept their cool instead of trying so hard to approach me, all of this could have been avoided. Can't really blame anyone, so better to just shut up and take it.

Another narrow gaze, lips tightly pressed together. "Huh, so you are shirking your responsibility. And to think you were chosen to wield a Minaru Kamui… Takeru, it is unbecoming of a warrior how you're acting."

"I don't remember since when I had to measure up to those values. Meiya, I'm not in the IRG."

"Wh- However… while that is true, considering your skill and the blade, if you extend a proper apology there would be no plausible reason for the whispers to continue. I comprehend being fearful of retaliation, yet I can stand by your side if that is what you're concerned about," she affirms, eyes blazing as she again slices the air. "You also must not be wishing to allow this 'accident' from becoming a roadblock for our shared goal to reach graduation, assuredly."

"Sigh… Look, I'm really thankful for the words, but I wanna keep my distance from the guards."

"… So that is your answer. Yet you seemed quite eager to accept that officer's invitation."

Frowning, glaring, I hold her stare in silence. Long enough to make her posture shuffle. "You leave Sumika out of this. Furthermore, the authorities have already decided the outcome of this incident. There's nothing else we can do from the ground but to keep our composure up."

"Do you not have even an ounce of sympathy for 1st Lt Tsukuyomi?" She asks, again staring deep into my eyes, unblinking. "It is your duty to repay her goodwill for not reporting the blade when she found out you had it illegally."

"… Do you think me apologizing will change anything? Sometimes, keeping quiet is the best solution."

"I disagree. Your actions could do much for the atmosphere that surrounds us now, furthermore, it is imperative you extend an apology to the 1st Lt. You've no excuse, considering your past actions, to refuse such a gesture. Not only as a warrior but as a fellow Japanese, you're obliged to an apology not only to 1st Lt Tsukuyomi but to the other officers of the guard as well. An offense against the IRG is tantamount to an offense against the Shogun herself, let me remind you."

"Huh… So the guards can go around doing whatever they please, since they have the backing of their status to fall back on?" I spit out, biting my stupid tongue after the fact.

Obviously, it only serves to ignite the pyre. "Wh- How dare you say that! You should know what the IRG symbolizes, what ideals their members strive to uphold. Allowing such friction to make nest is a mistake, and all it takes is an honest apology from you. Certainly, a meager gesture."

"… You do realize that, if XO Kouzuki weren't my legal tutor, I'd have been kicked out of the army by now? My words matter little when the IRG can simply sue for defamation or use the damaged databases against me."

"… I did not think you'd hoist such animosity towards the Guard."

"All I've said is the truth. Take off the rose-tinted glasses and go look outside, not all members of the IRG are white knights."

"And, pray tell, how can you ascertain that? I was under the impression that… well, someone of high station was who bestowed you the blade."

"Sigh… Think whatever you want, but it's the truth. There's some people in the IRG… that wouldn't hesitate to break swords left and right if it was what it took to reach their goals."

And no, I'm not proud of everything I did even if it was 'necessary'.

"Huh? How do you even-"

"Anyways, my situation is a bit more delicate than you're aware of, Mitsurugi. So kindly give me some space, let's not force any altercations. I already have enough to deal with," I nod her way and walk off.

Again the hand raises but I squeeze past it. "Takeru, wait. What do you-"

"Oh, Meiya-sama?" Someone says ahead of me. Mion, followed by Shion, stand in attention and give her a bow, yet their eyes remain on me. "Good morning to you."

"Ah, yes, good morning, you two. Takeru, this is a prime chance for you," she says, elbowing me.

"What chance? They're here to keep tabs on me," I shrug, scratching my head.

Both cousins wince for a second, quickly going back to business face. Mion idles a hand on her hair as she steps forward. "You see, Meiya-sama, we were tasked with watching over cadet Shirogane to ensure no one tries to take 'justice' on their own hands," she slowly tells, giving me a look, staring.

Her brow twitches again. "What? However, that as if you were apologizing instead!"

"More like the IRG wants me under surveillance now," I suggest with a smirk, poking the wound.

"Cadet, that is not the case," Mion retorts, solemn and frontal. "We of the Imperial Guard hold no ill intent towards you."

"If you say so, 2nd Lt," I shrug, walking again.

"Takeru, cease this obstinacy," she scolds, arms folding. "2nd Lts, please do accept our apologies. We are sorry for the most regrettable state of affairs that the mock battle brought. Isn't that right, cadet Shirogane?" She stares, and stares.

"Meiya-sama, it is fine," Shion smiles, waving a hand. "We understand, there is no need. We agreed to this task, as our share to leave this accident behind."

"Then, what has the UN done? Takeru, do you not believe they deserve your thankfulness?"

"Siiigh. Mitsurugi, please, stop," I hold her silent accusation, the scorching in her whole posture. "Going around apologizing isn't very productive, is it? This is only a formal arrangement to stop things from getting worse. That's why, please don't insist any more. Do you think my words will sound real when people see me being escorted by two Shinpan?"

She looks down, unwinding her ire. "I suppose there's- However, still, even if only on her quarters-"

"Please, let it go. This is my own fault, and if anyone lashes out against you or the others, feel free to redirect the flames my way," I nod her way, waving before she can reply.

The Pickles hurry a farewell, quickly starting to trace my shadow. Meiya calls out once, but I don't stop or look back. Honestly, while scouting possible idiots is required, it's not like this kind of thing is avoidable. Rumors will brew and those who believe in 'em instead of all you show yourself to be are worth nothing.

All I can hope is that we can stay on good terms. I don't expect Meiya to let this go, much less now that she's got the wrong ides with Sumika, but I can only reach out. If she again reverts to being cold, then-

"Ahem," something hits my right shoulder, Shion is staring. "Good morning, cadet Shirogane," she then flashes me a smile.

"Good morning, 2nd Lt Tsukuyomi."

"Cadet, if you desire, you may address us by name," Mion suggests, nodding from my left. "It would be confusing if you refer to both of us in the same way."

"It's fine, I'll keep quiet and won't bother you," I return the nod, Mion tries not to but ends up looking down, crashing down.

"So Shirogane," Shion smirks, getting closer, "you were told of our watch over you?"

"Yes. Don't worry, I don't intend to make any trouble."

"So then, could you tell us what you expect your schedule to be like?" Mion asks, holding her breath. Shion also stares, firmly.

It's like a cracked glass. Even if you put it together, the lines will still remain. Where before fire or clear energy came forth now there's hesitation, a cat stepping on water.

I suppose not being a jerk to you costs me nothing. Even if you've putting on a front, at least I can poke fun at you two as we used to. Their reactions should tell me enough, and I get to unwind a bit.

Roses and Ashes (I)

A/N: So, uh, I did it again.

This chapter's outline was a meager 2k words before turning into a near 30k behemot. Since I want things to start picking up speed and these events have to happen now, this couldn't be helped. So I split it up in two parts, this chapter and its twin. Part two should come out soonish, it only needs some minimal edits. I know my usual long chaps do get tiring for some, so if y'all do prefer me to try and keep my chapters around 10k words or lower let me know, though I honestly doubt I can lower the wordcount more than that.

Now, to answer a few questions from the comments. First, most of this story has already been outlined and sketched so I won't be adding anything else to it, regardless of TE's release or any other new additions to canon going forward. This story is about Takeru, and any other MCs that may appear will do so if and when they can serve a purpose to the plot. If not, well, they simply won't appear. And if future lore clashes with the fic, it will be ignored at large.

Second, I didn't have Keru accompany Sumika to the underground due to his reputation. I thought that I had mentioned that state of affairs enough times for him to react to it without bringing it up. Any possible negative reaction from a random soldier towards him could cause Sumika, who can scan minds around her, to go into an overload. Or worse, from causing her and Kasumi to be also targeted by those who have ill views of him and forcing security's hand to protect the girls.

Considering he doesn't want to have the IRG set their eyes on Sumika, since he is aware they forgot she ever existed, or Kasumi, who would be treated harshly due to being an ESPer and a foreigner, I thought that him choosing to keep his distance once the bunny appeared was the most fitting choice. It's his way of taking the responsibility and consequences of his actions on his own shoulders.

Also, since Meiya had already seen them, if Keru had chosen to go with them she would probably have reached out to stop them under the wrong assumptions, and then things would have gotten rather messy considering the state of the 00 Unit as of now. You could say Keru chose the better answer for that small little problem. I thought it wasn't necessary to spell out his motivations every time, I am trying to be more austere with my inner monologues and descriptions. Sorry for the confusion.

Also, as one final reminder, this fic is an AU. I won't be 'jumping to the coup', because handling that issue in a different manner is the whole point of Keru's goals right now, to avoid the ripples from bringing the wrong memories from Unlimited into the Reversal timeline. And since this is a different universe, things won't happen the same as they did during the loops. Reversal is not the story to read if you want something that fits into Alternative's canon. I won't repeat this anymore and any further comments about why am I not doing the coup or Sadogashima or any other thing will be redirected to this paragraph from now on.

Anyways, the wall of text got too big already so I'll end my ramblings. Thanks for reading. Stay safe.

Zuoriel

---

Chapter 82:

Roses and Ashes (I)

---

December 5th. Around 8 AM.

(Sim Room.)

---

"Correct, we are only here to stand by and ensure no disturbances occur," Mion affirms with a nod, idling a hand on her ear.

Sgt Jinguuji returns the nod, her posture still slightly tilted to a side, compact and alert. "Understood. Thank you for cooperating, 2nd Lts," she salutes, they return it right away in perfect poker. "I assume this equals cadet Shirogane won't be subjected to any further punishments?"

"On that, we have been left in the dark," Shion sighs, arms folding as she repines in true honesty. "We hoist no animosity towards the cadet nor do we wish to give this accident any unwarranted attention, which is why we have been tasked with watching over Shirogane. I suppose, any decisions have already been settled. Were you not told anything on that regard?" She inquires, eyes narrowing, focusing onto Jinguuji.

Who sighs as she shakes her head. "No, I was also only told the bare minimum. In any case, let's not make this any worse. You may remain close by, but please do not interject prematurely. Allow me to defuse any arguments, to avoid needless friction."

"That is a welcome gesture, Sgt," Mion gives a small corporate smile as she relents a faint bow, Shion soon follows. "We will, however, act as we deem fit if the situation escalates," she notes in sobriety as she raises back. "Do not worry, we shall remain out of sight during the training drills."

They nod to each other, reaching some form of understanding despite a few differing opinions that both sides understood were best left unsaid. While the cousins return to a vantage point, vanishing from the view of most present in the sim room, the Instructor returns to her post and checks the machines are at the ready. Once all boxes return a green light to her, she walks away from it, towards the soldier that was once more trying to make the headband not clash with the headgear.

"So Shirogane," she begins, giving him a once over, "it looks like you did not cut your hair."

"I had more pressing matters last night, to be honest, ma'am," he shrugs, giving a nod. "Do not worry, my hair is no impediment to the suit."

"What if I have you all train with the helmet on?" She presses, taking a step forward.

"I can tie it up, right?" He asks, raising a brow.

A small chuckle escapes the Instructor's lips when imagining the soldier with a tiny ponytail, quickly subdued and masked as she coughs into a hand. "I suppose that's true. So, well, anything you feel like telling me?"

Once more, he gives a battered smile, shoulders narrowing upon his figure, hands hugging the elbows as he leans on the rails. "I cannot disclose anything, ma'am. Vice Commander's orders, you see. But don't worry," he then returns a nod, face regaining its neutrality, "I believe the 2nd Lts do not hold any bad intentions. We could hold brief but simple conversations as I ate breakfast, I think I'm on good hands."

She heaves a short yet deep sigh, toying with her hair. "I see. I won't pry any further, but remember that my ear is open whenever you need it." He nods back, she smiles. "On a different note, do you still plan to continue piloting as you did last night?"

"Not all the time, but I do want to polish my skill further as I said before."

"Hmm, is that so. Please be tactful about it, there's no need to go overboard against your squadmates," she holds his gaze, he straightens up and returns another nod.

So she sheathes the scythe, looking elsewhere for a moment. " After all, I don't want Hayase to start brewing a rivalry with you before you graduate. To think their trainings are stumped by new patterns, that seem to resemble Shirogane's. After Yuuko pushed me off the mock battle, now there's these moves you need to polish, that are too similar to the logs Hayase and Munakata showed me this morning. Just what is going on? "

Her lips twist in, she looks back at the soldier, who is again fiddling with his headgear. "By the way Shirogane, these new movements of yours are tied to-"

"My special missions, yes," he replies immediately, shrugging his lips as a strand gets caught and pulled. "If there are any issues, please do take them to XO Kouzuki ."

She nods, walking back to her seat, pinching her nose. " Yuuko, what on Earth are you planning? To use Shirogane as a base for new tactics, and then have the Valkyries try and replicate his patterns? I admit he's got real talent, but still, he's a novice. And now of all times as well, why would you be on board with your protegee showing off in this manner? "

A slow, delayed shiver runs down her spine at the possible burdens the still complaining soldier could be facing, and her gaze drops as she realizes he is still adamantly, and too stubbornly, refusing to address the scientist by name as he always had done before.

Before she can organize the currents of thought, however, a set of footsteps marches towards her position. The Instructor readjusts her headset before turning around, seeing the five cadets stand in attention, hands at the seams, chin firmly pointing upwards.

"Instructor, Squad 207 is ready to begin the training," Sakaki informs, trying not to veer her gaze towards the one that is still fumbling with his hair.

"Good to hear. Shirogane, get in line," she calls out, looking back.

"I'm on it. Come on, you little piece of-" an eye closes, his tongue regresses, a few hairs got stuck as he pulls his fringe outwards, finally setting the headband in place. He nods back, rubbing his forehead as he goes to the line, poker face in place and avoiding his comrades' eyes.

"Ahem… Well, let us proceed to the briefing," walking in front of them, pushing her chest, her scythe out, her eyes remain on theirs for a moment as she paces. "We will once more attempt the mission that has you stumped, in two teams of three. I hope that with Shirogane's showing yesterday you all gained a glimpse of how to pilot properly again," she smirks, venom drips.

The five of them feel an abyss spawn in their gut, while the soldier returns the harsh gaze the Reaper was forwarding.

"Before the morning drills are over, however, you also will briefly spar against each other," their features tighten slightly upon the small smirk, the glint of the scythe in her eyes. "Now, I know much has happened lately, so you may have some time to debate strategies and arrange your own formations this time," she states with a nod, half to test their own progress in finding the faults in their methods, half to see how they treat the soldier now. They give the customary answer and she steps back to her small post, keeping an eye watching over the pigeons.

"Sigh… I hope we can clear the map this time," Yoroi whispers, hands clutching an invisible cross.

"We just need to react faster," Ayamine affirms with a nod. "Let's not push our luck this time."

"I do have an idea this time around to handle the mission," Sakaki says, finger upwards once more. "But first, well…" all five of them look towards the soldier, who raises a brow at first then smiles.

"Hey there, long time no see," he says, raising a hand in salutation.

"Is everything… alright, Shirogane-kun?" She asks, trying to keep her features composed, tightness still imprinted in the edges.

"More or less, yeah. Don't worry, I'm not injured and thankfully no repercussions fell on my head yet."

"… Yet?" Ayamine asks, brows almost colliding.

"You know, never can be too careful," he shrugs, chuckling lightly. "So, back to the mission, what do you guys have in mind?"

"First, could you enlighten us regarding how did you even beat it all on your own, perhaps?" Mitsurugi inquires, unnecessary banners to war in her gaze, unrequired edge to her slow words.

"You just gotta let it rip," he answers, nodding once.

"What?" Sakaki asks, and along the rest she simply tilts.

"Takeru, could you please be more specific? Certainly, there is a method to the madness," Mitsurugi requests, sighing.

The soldier gives a small smirk, causing a localized blizzard to assault their napes. "Picking up speed while running out time, going head to head, the warning comes up. You gotta fall down, meet ground to get back up again," spinning a finger, slightly rocking his head to a side, he tells in a tune. "And then spinning it out at the speed of sound, you gotta rip it off. So now the bet is on, and you become a bay of blades."

Mitsurugi tries, pointlessly, to picture the maneuver and inputs required. The only answer her mind can come up with is the number 404 and a frown. "What do- Why would- How does that even make any sense?"

He chuckles, scratching an ear. "You can check the control logs later, and ask me anything if you actually wanna try that out. I was simply practicing the improved version of the aerial charges I made during our little bout. Remember how I said they could get better?"

"Wait, is that what you were always aiming towards, Shirogane-san?" Tamase asks, and upon his nod her already gaping features extend until resembling a balloon.

"You're crazy, Monster-kun," Ayamine says with a smirk, lightly hitting his shoulder.

"You know, that might be right," he chuckles back, scratching his hair.

"And why, I wonder, would you choose to engage on such maneuvers after been granted leave from the medbay?" Mitsurugi inquires, staring straight into his eyes, trying to fish for answers, for hints.

He merely shrugs, avoiding her eyes like the sun's sudden glare. "I did my best since I was alone, that's all."

"Sigh… Shirogane-kun, please don't use those air jousting moves anymore. You could injure yourself greatly, after all," she notes as she stares, tapping her glasses.

"Don't worry, there won't be any more accidents going forward," he answers in complete sobriety, nodding firmly. Which takes them aback slightly, since only two of the cadets had seen such dead seriousness in him once before. During the CCSE, during the eye of the storm in rekindling.

"So, anyways!" Yoroi interjects, forcing a smile and the shine. "Those moves truly made the most out of the Fubuki. Do you think an aggressive stance works best for this mission, Takeru?" She asks, clearing the air, returning the talk to the mission, away from his business.

"Of course not," he sighs, shaking his head a bit, back to his neutral expression. "Simply keeping a steady pace while making the most out of the terrain should be enough, I think, even without resorting to any crazy acrobatics. So long as we can all cover our blank spots, it should go fine."

"However," Mitsurugi cuts in, taking a step forward, "isn't the vanguard's duty to neuter the threats that appear as swiftly as possible? We are putting the mission at risk by not endowing in haste," she affirms, nodding as she folds her arms.

He smirks, raising a brow. "Yeah, and remember what happened to your clerics while we trained with the little sims when you overextended your frontline?"

"Wh- That was only one time!" She protests, lips shrugging. "Furthermore, that was only a single outcome in a modest simulation. There are plentiful arguments in favor of the vanguard advancing to scout possible enemy positions, it is in the best interest of the mission."

"Oh noes, it's almost as if the carelessness of the frontliners were directly tied to the safety of the squadron as a whole," he says, rolling his eyes.

"Quite the claim, coming from the most reckless pilot of the squad," she retaliates, undeserved pungency to her tongue.

"And why do you think I know that?" He asks, delving into her eyes, drilling a blizzard, the black fire of a dragon into the defiant azure. "You want me to tell you, in excruciating detail, what could happen when the ones at the frontline fuck it up? Oh right, I don't have to," he shrugs, chuckling dryly, "since you've been fucking things up on this mission already."

"Wh- You… How could you say such a thing to our fa-"

"Mitsurugi, stop it," Sakaki orders, tapping her glasses, holding the stalwart gaze that is left with no option but to wring her hands. "Shirogane-kun, while I do share your opinion, your words just now were unnecessary. We are all doing our best effort in the training."

"And do you think that's enough?"

"Huh?"

"Do you think 'your best' is gonna cut it when it's time for action and not words?" He asks, grimacing a bit, making them all suffer through the same cold hands he had before, Mitsurugi paling slightly. "Believe me, it won't. And sticking to ideas you know are useless is only going to get you and your comrades killed, that's why you should listen to your peers when they offer advice. A new set of eyes is never a bad thing, even if the contrast only enforces the ideas you already had."

"Well, that's true…" she looks down, clutching an elbow.

"Then, what do you suggest?" Mitsurugi asks, barely chained fire in her glare, lips shrugged. "Perhaps to have us employ the methodologies of… other armies?" She says, wincing as if smelling bodily decay.

He doesn't react, simply holding the fire at bay. "Simple, just try other stuff. Mitsurugi, you already tried holding down the line and that didn't work out. What other options do we have as a team? You're seriously telling me we can't do the wave while letting Tama and Mikoto snipe the shit out of the enemy?"

"… The wave?" Ayamine asks, squinting her eyes.

"Yeah, you know, coming in contact with the enemy, pulling back, then going forward again. Like the tide on the shore."

"I see, makes sense," Yoroi nods, grasping her chin, eyes set alight, "we simply need to float carefully and-"

"Yoroi, please cease your attempts at joking," Mitsurugi asks, shaking her head, heaving a sigh.

"Huh? But I'm not-"

"Read the mood, will you?" She imposes, a solar storm, undeserved slicing in her tone.

"Why don't you read the mood?" Ayamine counters, shrugging while clicking her lips.

"Why don't you try and participate in the conversation instead of talking through your teeth, Ayamine?" Mitsurugi asks, now aiming her full barrel at the still expressionless one.

"Because this is less a talk and more an interrogation you're making on Special-kun." She then smirks, rolling her eyes. "Don't monopolize him so badly, we could get the wrong idea."

"Wh- How can you-"

"Mitsurugi, Ayamine," Sakaki repines, adjusting her glasses, shaking her head, "stop going into tangents. Also, Ayamine is right. Let Shirogane-kun and Yoroi talk freely," she stares as stoically as a statue, Mitsurugi relents a nod along an apology.

"So, uh, about the point I was making…" Yoroi gazes at the rest, chin and posture aimed downward, almost as if requesting permission to speak.

"What did you wanna say, Mikoto?" He asks, giving a nod, a bright smile.

"Well, that the wording was very accurate," she says, voice and eyes gaining luster as if under direct sunlight. "You see, we can float carefully together until the enemy appears, until we meet a tide coming in. The vanguard opens a hole in the formation then retreats before being surrounded, going back to the shore. Then the supporters aid with missiles or other ranged options. Once the enemy lines are scattered, as the tide pulls away, the vanguard can once more advance with the space necessary to not be overwhelmed or finish off any stragglers," she finishes with a few nods, the others seeking their chins or hair to idle their hands while pondering the plan. "I think this might work out, in all honesty. Though, I don't know if, uh, I can give such precise support as I am now…"

"Bullshit, your midrange is awesome, Mikoto," he says, winking. "So, yeah, we have other options. What do you guys wanna do?"

"Squad, opinions?" Sakaki asks, looking at the rest.

"I don't mind trying out Takeru's suggestion," Yoroi nods, folding her arms.

"Same here," Ayamine also does.

"I, well, uh, I-I'll try my best to properly support you all with my sniping," Tamase says, or rather shouts, as the blizzard did not give her feet or nape any respite.

The soldier sighs slowly at the shaky second of doubt in the sniper's reply. " Still not committing to the discussion, not wanting to take sides and make the argument worse. It is like you Miki, to simply offer support without giving your input. Guess that's another thing to look out for."

"Sigh… I suppose, we could try and employ this tactic," Mitsurugi relents a nod, the same constricting shock claiming her stomach as it had done when barely woken up after the encounter with the chasers.

"Then, it's decided," Sakaki nods, tapping her glasses as relaxation comes to her breathing, her abdomen. "Now, about the teams. One will be with me, Mitsurugi, and Tamase. Two will consist of Yoroi, Ayamine, and Shirogane-kun."

"Sakaki, as the second-in-command, shouldn't I lead the other team?" Mitsurugi asks, raising a brow, stealing a brief glance at the soldier.

"After all the arguments you've gotten into, it's not wise," she immediately fires off, Mitsurugi's brows twitch but her lips fold in. "Furthermore, only this formation ensures we have equal numbers in each position. You and Ayamine will work as the vanguard, me and Yoroi will provide cover, while Tamase and Shirogane-kun take care of the sniping. Any objections?" The rest shake their heads, Mitsurugi groans briefly before relenting a nod. "Well, let's inform the Instructor. This time we're clearing this mission, you hear me?!"

"Roger!"

Once announcing their formation and positions, the first three go their way towards the sims. Mitsurugi not making eye contact with the soldier, steps long and strong, straight as an arrow to avoid any disquiet to disturb her training. Tamase starts sending looks from one to the other until he smiles and gives a thumbs up, easing the girl's concerns ever so slightly.

"I hope this can turn out well," Sakaki relents a weary sigh.

"Don't worry, Chizuru-san," Yoroi encourages, despite the hold she enforces on her elbow. "Stressing yourself out will only decrease your performance, after all."

"Sigh… I guess."

"Don't sweat it, for real," he nods, arms folding. "Try giving out the orders one sec faster, and don't get married to the plan."

"What Special-kun said. One breath faster, in both moves and words," Ayamine suggests with a nod. She then shrugs slowly, smirking. "Also, just move backwards and force Mitsurugi to retreat if she gets too bitchy."

Gaze sharpens, she readjusts her glasses. "Ayamine, stop it, really. Shirogane-kun, the same for you. I know… No, I don't know what may have happened, but please don't force any altercations."

"I won't. But we can't let this mission get the better of us," he states, looking up, at nowhere, at the barren emptiness. "I figured being brutally honest would work out, even if only to ignite your spirit."

"… I know," she relents, tapping her glasses. "I know these tactics are not the limits of our possibilities. Just please be more tactful. Not only for Mitsurugi, but also Tamase."

"Yeah, I know. Best of luck in there," he smiles, thumbs up again. She smiles back, waving a hand as she walks to the sims.

"Yeah, go out there and do your worst, Cute Eyebrows," Ayamine deadpans, leaning on his shoulder.

Twin vipers spawn from hair strands, bloody murder oozes from the vicious glare she sends back. "What was that?"

"Don't be abrasive, Squad Leader," She asks, hiding behind the soldier. Sakaki grumbles and sheathes the steam while he chuckles dryly.

"Hm? Why are you growing upset, Chizuru-san? Sure, they are a bit large, but I do agree your eyebrows do look rather cute," Yoroi nods and beams back, unaware, tilting her head and raising a brow when the squad leader becomes a scarecrow made out of tomatoes. "Chizuru-san?"

"I-I won't forget this teasing, you know! You three better watch your back during the mock battles," stomping away to the sims, she leaves a slight veil of steam behind.

"Nice one, Yoroi," Ayamine smiles, making and OK with a hand.

"Sigh… I don't think she's gonna recover from the emotional damage you inflicted right now, Mikoto," he nods and sighs.

"Huh? But I only complimented her a bit," she says, arms folding as her brows cross. Taking a hesitant step closer, dragging her feet, her eyes cannot meet his. "So, uh, do you really think our efforts thus far aren't enough, Takeru?"

Taking a second to inhale, he slowly nods back. "Yeah. Don't get me wrong, you're all crazy good. But these small mistakes could cost you your lives on the field. So sticking to the same plan over and over is not gonna let you improve, I think."

"I agree. No two battlefields are equal, and things won't play out always in the same exact manner in real life," Ayamine notes with a nod. "It's kind of counterproductive, when you think about it. Having preset missions doesn't really prepare us well for the randomness of battle."

"Yeah, it… Hm?" Both of his brows slightly lower, a hand covers his mouth. "A way to mend the missions… with a randomizer…"

"Takeru? What are you talking about?"

"Oh, nothing, just lost in thought. Anyways, yeah, trying to adapt on the fly is, sadly, what little we can try and do at times."

Their talk is cut short as the training begins on the monitors, volleys and missiles rolling out moments later. Despite the change in strategy, the trio under pressure was still meeting some difficulty. Tamase misses a few shots, it only enhances the pit that in her throat had made nest. Then, that causes Mitsurugi to try and make up for it by advancing out of tempo, undoing the synchrony she had built with Sakaki. It takes them a moment to regroup, Sakaki pulling out of the enemy's range and forcing Mitsurugi to follow despite quite the blazing protests. To say purple fire is engulfing one of the sims would be a disservice to the frustration, equally as large as the shallowness which does not surrender its grip on Tamase's breathing.

"Well, fuck. They're still lacking coordination," he says, low.

"Mitsurugi's not retreating fast enough, she knows the Leader can't match her charges," Ayamine notes, hand on her chin. "If Tamase weren't there, they'd be both toast at the moment," she affirms as a hostile, that was aiming at Sakaki's blank spot, is neutralized from afar.

"Yeah, I really don't know what we'd do without Miki-san sometimes. So, uh, Takeru," Yoroi hesitates a gaze his way, he raises a brow in acknowledgment, "how were you these days? Are you truly fine?"

"Yeah, thanks for asking," he nods, giving a small smile.

"Really? There is some redness to your eyes, and you do sound a bit, um, more drained than usual," she comments, then looks back to the monitors. "You're not forcing yourself right now?"

"No, it's just… I had to be informed of some stuff yesterday late at night, is all," he closes an eye while scratching his head. "What about you guys? Have things been, you know, messier since the battle?"

"Oh, yeah. Some jerks are giving us some nasty glares in the hallways," Ayamine notes, lips shrugging tight like a brunt brush of dark ink as she sends a look around, finding some vipers staring venom at them. "Not to mention, Mitsurugi has been a bitch since the end of the mock battle."

"Wait, really?" He asks, cold cloaking his neck. "I thought she was only upset at me."

"No, her mood took a nosedive since we saw your Gekishin enter the hangar. Mitsurugi did try to keep it peaceful, but I can't stand it anyways," she admits, kicking the rails. "She even went and blamed Yoroi for how two idiots started talking shit to us."

"C-Come on, Kei-san," she again clutches, chokes an invisible cross, finding no respite her gaze cascades down, "I wasn't looking where I was walking."

"Doesn't excuse how badly they reacted, nor her words towards you."

"So, uh," he starts swallowing a sigh, "I guess I owe you guys an apology," the soldier bows down, remaining in position. "Sorry, guys. If you rather keep your distance from me to avoid rumors, I'll walk to the other end of the room."

"… Did Mitsurugi talk some shit into you or something?" Ayamine asks, seethes as she takes a step forward, causing equal ballooning shock to come to both his and Yoroi's complexion.

"What? No, I'm merely trying to be considerate. I fucked up, there's no denying that. And it isn't fair for you guys to also be put in the same bag as me. So, uh, well, I won't hold any grudges if, say, you'd like to screen me off," he says, holding their gazes.

One of Ayamine's brows twitches, her fist start to coil. "We triumph and fail as a unit, don't we?"

"Well, yes, but-"

"And anyways, you weren't the only one harassed by the guards," she says, again lightly hitting the rails. "Tamase was also targeted, and their 'apology' felt more forced than your manners now, Special-kun."

He narrows his eyes a bit, arms folding. "I am trying, you know."

"Yeah, I can tell you're being truthful," she smiles back, resting both elbows on the railing, "unlike the guard trio. And anyways, I've seen how you are and how they acted. More than anything, I've been target practice for those air jousting moves. You didn't actually try to harm anyone, right?"

"… No, I merely… lost my cool, is all. Doesn't excuse me of anything."

"But then, in the end, there was no foul committed, right?" Yoroi asks, edging closer. "You merely failed your maneuver, but neither of you tried to harm the other. That's the end of it, right?"

"If only that halted the rumors, though," he takes a quick scan around the room and sighs at the glares that remind him of what within the Black Lilith lurks, the other two mimic the reaction.

"Anyways," Ayamine says, arms folding, "I can get why Mitsurugi acts as she does, with her possible… you know, ties and everything. But don't let her guilt trip you, Shirogane. We're with you, after all you haven't been nothing except a great help for us since you arrived. We clear?"

"… Thanks, Kei. Really."

"It's cool… but it's a bit too soon for us to be on a first-name basis," she says, dramatically wrapping her arms around her waist, looking away.

"What?"

"I think we'll need to advance our relationship further before that, you know."

"Wait, Kei-san, what are you saying?"

"If you wish to call upon my name, an offering in yakisoba sandwiches is required," she affirms, with unrequired and extravagant solemnity, while extending a hand as if demanding payment.

"Pfft… Never change, Ayamine," he nods, a relaxed smile as he sighs the tension out of his posture. "I'll see what I can do about the offering later, though."

"Very well. So has been written, thus so shall be done," she says, before reverting to the usual calm expression. "But really, nice to see you're alright. I just hope Mitsurugi doesn't cause you any grief."

"Yeah, Meiya-san has been on edge yesterday and today as well," Yoroi nods, sighing, everything in her collapsing. "Even during breakfast she was so short and cold, not even the news of a speech from Her Highness cheered her up."

"Yeah, she had her sword on her wrist all the time today," Ayamine nods in agreement, shrugging. "Didn't think she'd be like this again."

"Again? You mean, she used to be, well, rather sharp before?" He asks, raising a brow, recalling a certain argument caused by his Game Guy.

They all remain silent for a moment, watching as an aggressor gets sniped, the one standing behind getting rammed by a shield and finished with a crescent slash. The tide turns, the trio retreats to safety, covering fire blasts holes amidst the element of AI Fubukis, stretched further by the resolute charges of Mitsurugi, backed by the shielding arrow rain Sakaki bestows.

"Meiya-san used to be very cold before," Yoroi begins, slowly. "It was clear she didn't like being in the UN, and she argued with Chizuru-san much in those days."

"Even more than me, at one point," Ayamine admits with a wry smile. "She always had good advice and one-liners to give though, despite how sometimes it really didn't apply for the moment. Being so honest and forward was something I welcomed back then, even if at times she didn't listen. Now, though," she looks back at the monitor, expression falling apart like the mangled AI Fubukis to the suppression fire, "I'd like her to, you know, not be one hundred percent set on her resolve. It's not like I enjoy arguing with her, but I can't help it."

"And honestly, I don't know what could we do," Yoroi admits, resting her chin and weight upon the railing. "I tried to clear the air at the PX with a light joke like I did before, but she cut me off so suddenly. This situation with the guards can't be the only thing that has her this upset, however," she affirms, gripping the steel.

"I agree," he says, licking over his lips, swallowing another sigh. "But it's related, I bet."

"You got any hints, Special-kun?"

"Remember when we argued after the emergency call, before the CCSE? I think that little issue is still open."

"… Can we do anything to help?" Yoroi asks, staring.

"I doubt it. We tried talking things out during the CCSE but," he looks down, features growing tense, grim, compacted by unseen walls, "I suppose the fiasco in the mock battle reignited those doubts."

"So you saving her life from the chasers means shit to her?" Ayamine asks, eyes ready to slay.

He shakes his head, watching as the last enemy is blown to bits in an almost double knockout. "Please remember who Meiya is, and who is she tied to," the other two pale, struck down to meager charcoal by the shock. "In the end, this is something she alone can settle. I've already tried my best to fit in, and if she doesn't think me worth her trust… then it's on her."

"But can't you try to, I don't know, clear things up as much as you can?" Yoroi asks, again staring, again subjected to the cold cloak, the thought of returning to the first days of basic.

"I can't explain everything, and if her mind is set there is no changing it. That's how Meiya is," he then sighs, wincing as he lightly slumps over the rails, "for better and worse. Anyways," he inhales sharply, vanishing the lines from his face, "you think we can clear the mission?"

"Don't worry, I won't push my luck this time," Ayamine affirms, returning one slow and steady nod.

"I don't know how good I'll match Kei-san's moves, but if we stick together I believe I can cover you both decently enough," Yoroi affirms, returning a smile.

"Good enough. You two just do your thing, I'll try and snipe anyone that might target your flanks. But do tell me if you wanna change the flow as we fight, okay?" He asks, looking at Ayamine, who returns a confident and shiny smile with a thumbs up.

The sim pods cease their rumbling, their doors open. As the team walk down to the floor, the Instructor gives them a smirk while silently waiting for the six to get in line once again. Despite the favorable result, Sakaki and Mitsurugi bear serious expressions, the edges of Tamase's lips once more retract fully behind her teeth.

"Good work, you three," Jinguuji starts, a few nods to them. "While you took a few risks mid-battle, you managed to clear the level with only one casualty. Not another record breaking performance, but still, good job to finally clear one mission after three days," she presses, unblinking stare upon the pigeons.

"Thank you, ma'am!" All three reply from their stomach.

"Now then. Yoroi, Ayamine, Shirogane, to the sims. Let's see if you can measure up to the hotshot's performance of last night," she teases, curling a hair as she chuckles.

Marching to the sims, the soldier gives them a nod and a smile. Both Yoroi and Ayamine return it, spikes and thorns leaving their breathing alone, their composure restored and ready for the concert.

---

Some moments later.

---

"Well, well, well," Jinguuji starts, her smirk not entirely false in this occasion, "color me surprised, you actually beat the other three's time. Didn't match the previous record, but still, a wonderful performance. Looks like those abs really are quite the motivator, hmm?" She teases, finger on her chin, striking the tomato scarecrows with further bolts. Except Mitsurugi, whose eyes seek his for a moment, lightly nibbling at her bottom lip.

"Really, Instructor?" He asks, eyes and brows narrowing.

"I'm not joking, though. You saw their performance yesterday, and look how better they piloted today. Coincidence? I think not. Whether it was due to you showing off or what, I expect this level of aptitude from your drills going forward, squad."

"Yes, ma'am!"

"Good. So, since we're done with this mission, let's proceed to the next drill. I was hoping to hold more mock battles, but Shirogane's Gekishin is still on maintenance so we'll make do with the sims for the time being. We'll start with one-on-one fights, Shirogane, Mitsurugi, to the pods."

"Huh?!" Sakaki gapes, clearing her throat, trying to shut off the gate. "Instructor, ma'am, I do not think it wise to pit 02 and 06, considering recent events."

"What are you implying, Sakaki?" Mitsurugi asks, leveling a stare in undeserved pungency, a flurry of thorns.

"Do we really need to have you two face each other now?" She retorts, tapping her glasses and undaunted in front of the gale of venom.

"Regardless, this is the arrangement I decided on," Jinguuji states, not lifting her eyes from the two of them until they nod back. "You are training to be soldiers, I am certain behaving properly is nothing but the minimal standard to you. Now, to the pods!" She orders, arms folding, nodding back as the two cadets salute and go their way without making eye contact with each other.

"Um… Instructor?" Tamase hesitates to speak, words clogging on her throat. "I do not intend to oppose your orders, however, is it truly a good idea to have Mitsurugi-san fight against Shirogane-san? There are people watching, after all."

"If they cannot share training drills, then there is an issue I should address personally with both of them. Unless, you'd like to enlighten me on that subject?" She stares, unblinking.

Tamase shrinks further as she hastily shakes her head and steps back, the rest seek and peek at the other two, sharing gazes and sighs at the lack of interaction between the soldier and the samurai.

So the Instructor sighs with her nose, leaving a hand on her forehead as she sits down in her post. " Really, I do agree with you all. Me reprimanding either of them will not go unnoticed. What are you thinking, Yuuko? Why call me for this direct order without any further details?"

She then starts the checks, noticing the downcast, almost ashen expression both pigeons had, fallen to the ground and breaking a wing.

" Testing both of them, perhaps? Mitsurugi's loyalty and Shirogane's composure? What in the Heavens is causing you to send such pressure to your protegee? Sigh… Please you two, don't start anything here." She pleads, rubbing her temple as a void spreads on her stomach.

"Alright… All green. Cadets, are you both at the ready?" Both return an affirmation, she nods and restores the cloak, the empty mask of the Reaper to her features. "Copy that. The exercise will begin shortly, remain in standby."

[Meiya]

---

A mirror to days past, a perfect reflection of our first duels. When I could only hold him off, when there was no hope of even landing a single hit.

Crouching suddenly, a shell shaves paint off my Fubuki's head visor. Exploding on a building behind me, glass and debris begins to fall. The follow-up finds my shadow, thickets of darkest smoke trailing my steps. Halting once I take a turn, gyrating my thrusters, the boost sends me to meet his aggro. All I accomplish is deplete our ammo reserves further.

… He hasn't said a thing since we started, and we have been avoiding the other's assault for quite the time already. Normally, Takeru wouldn't hesitate to reach out through the common channel, either to curse or chain odd jokes. Now, however, all that's within sight is a silent specter, the warning of an enemy engaging in attempts to shoot me down. My shield has received quite the shower, and while I could try and force a CQC clash once more-

BEEP!

Huh? Where is he?! The dot shows the distance is lowering, yet I cannot locate him in the nearby area. Furthermore, the dot would indicate he's-

A sharp thrust of my controls, blurriness on my sight.

It's followed by a loud crash, dust and pieces of debris flying about from a building that sinks to the depths.

BEEP!

Cutting through the violence, a Fubuki lunges forth. Sparks come out from my shield, its slash did not trigger the reactive armor. A push on the pedals, a frontal charge to detonate the shield onto the frame finds me meeting the air. Gliding away with a backboost, he takes aim. My attack shifts into defense, once more punished, once more pushed backwards by his predictions.

An emergency alarm rings out, he detonated a 120mm shell onto my shield, effectively rendering it useless. Inhaling sharply, I return the fire, veering my aim as he begins to perform Kulbit after Kulbit, treating the ruins as a playground. A flicker, my pylon activates. A lunge, I throw my shield to my current blank spot. A step back, half turning my Fubuki's body, I slice half a moon towards the shadow which desired to pounce upon my back.

His rifle struck, rendered useless after taking the brunt of the attack, Takeru doesn't retreat as I had thought he'd do. Upon my step back, a crouch and a dash follow, a shrouded shape soars from below, the glint of a knife aims at my cockpit. Feeling a void on my neck as my feet instinctively stomp the pedals, another alarm reaches me. His follow up attack struck my own rifle away.

Sparks fly off, a shock courses through me as our blades meet now that we are both void of rifles. And yet, it is once again the same as our first fight, my swings barely able to halt his, the erratic crouches and jumps and bounces off the buildings. It makes my head hurt, to envision the environment around me, to try and predict it all, only to simply force another draw and remain on the defensive to avoid giving away an opening. However, I am now certain of it, this is the Mugen Kidou. The patterns, the stance, it is so similar to how my bout with Tsukuyomi was.

… Does it mean you're holding back as well? Or on the other hand, you only have surface knowledge of the style?

If you're one of us… Why? Why refuse my helping hand, my handshake of fellowship? Understandable it is you could be subjected to shame, even more so in my person, yet your attitude is the opposite of that. If this was truly an accident, why refuse to extend some sympathy to a fellow?

… Unless, of course, Tsukuyomi and Daizaburou-sifu were correct in their assessment. If you truly are a spy, if you're a hazard to my people…

A small window of respite, our Fubukis stand in front of each other, blades at the ready. Noticing his jump units are about to ignite, perhaps to once more force a chase, I gulp and smack the button to open the common channel.

"Ahem… You're certainly a fierce adversary, Takeru. I cannot believe you could still improve further."

…

Why? Why are you keeping quiet? I've believed in you, I've offered you my aid… If you refuse me, what does that say about you?

"Ayamine was right, however," I continue, inhaling slowly, heating my own rockets and tone. "Being the recipient of your aerial charges is truly a one of a kind experience. Was this the movement which caused your Gekishin to crash, I suppose?"

"… What do you want to ask, Mitsurugi ?"

Ugh… And that as well, why are you not using my name as we agreed? Are you saying… you're taking back our accord? Someone trained in the Mugen Kidou, bequeathed with one of our blades, why would you turn your back to us? That is… nothing but treason on the trust we had built between us, isn't it?

His jump units flare to life, mine imitate in chase. Seeking each other, sharply turning on the corners, dancing and circling above the ruins. Perfect parries, poignant sidesteps, shallow breaths and sighs, the battle continues.

"You truly won't reconsider extending an apology to 1st Lt Tsukuyomi, Takeru?"

"… No, I don't think it's wise for me to get close to them."

"Sigh… Mion and Shion are acting as your guardians, surely you could at least have them deliver a note."

" Mitsurugi, we've gone over this at morning," he says, sighing short yet heavy, tone lowering, "this is a personal topic for me so please let it rest."

"Takeru, within the warrior there is no need for masks. Withholding a minimal gesture shan't grant you no boons. Furthermore, I do find it odd. You always desired to fit in, yet now your actions are counter to that objective. Why would that be, I wonder?"

"… Could say the same about you."

"Huh?"

My actions halt, allowing his Fubuki to take the high ground of a building. Under the shadow projected by the virtual machine, I stand. He simply remains there, a sentry watching over the extension of ruin.

"Meiya, if within the warrior there is no need for masks, if no hesitation is shown upon conflict…" he slowly says, voice dry. Wait, how does he know the last sentence of the code? "Can you be level with me about what you're playing at?"

"Forgive me but I haven't the faintest of what you speak."

"Heh, for real? Remember when we requested the Instructor permission for Tama to be the leader for a day?"

"… Yes, what of it?"

"Well, you reacted a bit oddly to me mentioning I started to regain some old memories. And despite how you were after our first flying run, you immediately started being welcoming towards me again."

"I was… only doing what a fellow should. I already admitted my frustrations got the better of me that day."

"And yet, here we are again," we both groan on our end, "with you insisting I'm in the wrong. Almost as if the same reasons that made you falter to emotion were kicking in again."

"That's… I would not be pressing to this extent if you had deigned yourself to behave as a proper warrior should!"

"Again, I am a guardian."

"Then cease to employ the style you were taught! If you cannot find some meager fellowship to return an apology, you do not deserve to use the Mugen Kidou!"

A blade raises, my thrusters send me into a building, into a Kulbit, to raise and meet his aggro. Slash to slash, glass to the skies, a cyclone is born in midair, amidst the violence.

I thought you were my fellow, you truly do not comprehend how much your arrival meant for me.

Cracks enlarge in the roads, in between us, as he takes out a knife to throw at me. The manipulators damaged, my stance falters, his counter almost tumbles me down.

A fellow I could train with, someone who could share my ideas, my style. Despite your ruthless choice under the pouring rain, you seemed honest. The refusal to accept my aid, to stand composed amidst the setbacks, it was admirable. Truly, a flower finally blooming within the wasteland just as the trees on the road did last spring.

And yet… And yet, here you are. Spouting such vile wording, refusing my aid, rejecting our teachings.

It hurts, the grip enforced onto my controls, the crushing slam of my feet onto the pedals. It hurts, how my back ingrains onto the seat as the boost starts, as the shock of my repeated slashes threatens with making me falter.

And yet, even now, even employing the same patterns that allowed me to best Tsukuyomi, there is no opening to pierce. Perfect contention, an iron wall undisturbed by petty invaders. Such skill you possess and you'd turn your back to us? After letting out tears for whoever bestowed you the blade?

Unless it was all a lie.

Unless you are a spy.

Unless you've chosen to become an enemy of the Empire.

"… I believed you to be better than this, Takeru. Surely, you do not plan to continue this obstinacy?" I say, malcontented to the brim, feeling slight pain on my ears.

"Says the most stubborn woman I've ever met," he lightly says, as if in jest, while bouncing away as my current of attacks lost momentum.

"Cease your prattling! I will not stand by this. A mere apology, a meager gesture is all I would ask of you. You must have seen how Tamase was, how many glares were hewn onto our backside. Is the peace of the squadron trivial to you?" I raise and point my blade, both inner and outer, taking on my stance.

And he remains silent.

For quite a long moment.

Without even leaving his Fubuki in a proper fighting pose or anything.

"… What has caused this sudden silence, I wonder?"

"Sigh… You do know that even if I-"

"This is not about what some obstinate fools will do, this is about how you choose to handle this situation, Takeru. Most soldiers won't dare to remain in opposition if you do extend an apology, and it would do much for our morale as a team. Considering the cousins will be following you, this incident can be turned into a show of understanding between the IRG and the UN. As it stands, however, Tsukuyomi is the only one forced to bend the knee while you remain free of guilt."

"Taking responsibility is part of the job when you have a higher rank, you know? And anyways, if the IRG hadn't reached an agreement with the UN, then I wouldn't be here. You think 1st Lt Tsukuyomi or the General simply bowed down in front of a threat?"

"Well, no, I do not. However, why would you not extend a mere apology? Is such a gesture beneath your notice, perhaps?"

Inhaling slowly, I can hear the slow, heavy exhalation. The Fubuki's stance becomes undone gradually, as if he were letting go of the controls for some reason. "Can't we let this be? Just, you know, let me take the brunt of the unpleasantries?" He requests, broken and desolate as the ruin around us. "Keep your distance if you want, but let's not make this problem even bigger. I really can't approach the 1st Lt as things stand now. We can coexist even if we disagree, right? You won't… push me out again, right?"

"I… suppose I can comprehend the reticence to approach 1st Lt Tsukuyomi, however, you can write a letter that the cousins can deliver. If it comes down to it, I can tell the message in your stead. As someone who was trained in the art of the blade, who dominates the style almost as well as I, it is your obligation as a fellow. You are… one of us after all, right Takeru?"

"… So that's what's going on here, huh," he barely whispers, the coup d'grace to the already ravished composure.

"What?"

"They told you something about me, right? 1st Lt Tsukuyomi and the General."

"… Why do you assume so?"

"Why would you ask me if I'm one of you otherwise? I see… So you play for them."

Gulping, my mouth drying, a void against which even the sun's golden light cannot fight rends my insides. The coldness of his tone, the lack of emotion… It's a lie. Tell me it is so. You're not doing this, stop it. Why must you oppose us, Takeru?

"I am forsworn to the Empire, above all else. I fight to safeguard the future of my nation, my people. And… I was asked my opinion on you, and given a warning. You are Japanese, you should know what a fellowship is meant to represent. Why refuse my helping hand, Takeru?" I ask, unable to bind my knees, my tongue.

He grumbles for a moment, before a light impact comes through the speakers. "No matter how much you force it, a square won't fit in a triangle. You can try to squeeze it in, you can shave its edges, break it apart, but at that point it won't be a square anymore, right?"

"… How is asking an apology out of you synonymous with such an analogy?"

"Meiya, can we be honest with each other?" He asks, in complete sobriety, as stalwart as that night in the CCSE.

"I have been honest since the beginning, however," I retort, feeling my lips pluck. "And I have been asking the same of you, as well."

"So you won't dodge the questions?"

"… I assume you also will respond my inquiries then?"

"Sigh… What I can."

"Fine. What is it that you wish to ask?"

Inhaling again, his Fubuki… drops its sword. Engraves it into the ground, only to retrieve it shortly after. Holding it in a reverse grip, a knee bends yet the thrusters remain dormant for only a second. Trading blows, finding his new stance far harder to contain, my Fubuki can only retreat further upon his frame as those odd spins begin to chain upon themselves.

" Mitsurugi, " he starts, regaining focus, frozen, "you think I am something I'm not, and that's what making you act in this way. Maybe, just maybe, you could take a step back and think on how I've been all this time towards you since we met."

"… Pardon?"

Something you're not?

You're saying… their concerns were true, then?

No, no, focus! To think on how he has been all this time, he asked of me.

And, well, true it is Takeru has been nothing short of the textbook example of a good comrade. However, could he be trying to divert my concerns? To strike me down from the battle to end the conversation? To try and beguile me into taking his side?

Parrying the rising attack, almost falling to the follow up as he dashes through the street, back and forth, trying to break the dam. "Whatever do those words mean, Takeru? Are you insinuating there are two faces to the comrade I know?"

Halting my advance, pressing my advantage, eviscerating a building in earnest, once again we end up locked in a parry. "Just like the IRG, you're predisposed to asking me to be someone I'm not, assuming the worst out of my negative," he says, fuming a bit. "Is it that hard… for you to see me for how I've been thus far with you, Meiya?"

"I do not believe an emotional judgment to be worth much. Within the warrior, there is no need for masks or hesitation. One's own veneer must remain sturdy as truth itself. If there is any falsehood to how I perceive you, kindly enlighten me on who you truly are."

"… You won't even give me the benefit of the doubt?" He asks, voice cracking, his onslaught losing impulse, allowing me to break free of the parry. And yet, he does not resume the offensive.

"Sigh… I am forsworn to the Empire. Anyone who might impair the standing of my nation is an enemy of mine, more so since I was selected to represent the Empire in the UN. And when it was time for actions and not words, you faltered and chose aggression. Thus, I must request of you to stand back and revise your posture, Shirogane. If you do not cease this obstinacy, consequences shall follow."

He groans for a moment, sounding as if exhaling through closed teeth. "That sounds like the words someone desperate would use. You shouldn't live or die by the sword, Meiya."

"Wh- Are you casting doubts on the value these words hold? You would remain in such defiant attitude despite how all of us have welcomed your return?"

"That's not it. I'm just-"

"If that is how you think, then allow me a final query." I breath in sharply, taking battle back to him, forcing him to go into contention for the first time. "Who are you?"

"… What? You know I am!"

"Do I now? You did say I thought you someone you're not," I say, low, as I jump upon his wavering form.

However, it only takes him a crouch and a roll to regain the advantage, searing my backside, causing me to flee, to spread more destruction over the ruins.

"If their warning was correct, then I cannot simply turn a blind eye. I am a warrior first and foremost, and thus, should you choose to oppose me, there is little option left but to strike you down, Shirogane."

A small beep, a notification from the Instructor. Nothing comes through the speakers, it was a warning. Next time, however, punishment may rain upon me. Of course, if she sides with you, if she covers a spy, I will be forced to report it as well. All because of you. Because you refuse to be a fellow.

"What is it? Once more growing silent? Should I take it as confirmation?

" Sniff… Hehe… Hehehe…"

"… Huh?"

Are my ears deceiving me? No, through the wailing cries of both blades, through the alarms which flash red and notify my halberd is on its last legs, a small, faint sound echoes. Was he crying just now?

"I really am an idiot," he chuckles, his swings grow in speed, indulging in more sidesteps, starting to pick up speed.

"What? Answer my query, please."

"I already knew it. That you weren't her, that you would never be her . But I had to hope for it, dammit. I had to be stupid," he tells, to himself perhaps, collapsing onto a minimal whisper.

"Who are you speaking of? Be clear, I do not comprehend what you're saying!" I ask, lowering my stance, meeting a slash before taking a step back.

Once more, we stand in front of the other. Lacerations apparent in our armors, both blades about to give in, and yet our stances do not dull.

Takeru takes in a sharp breath. "I knew you weren't her, but I still wanted to believe we could get along. Guess it's on me for being an idiot all this time," he says, dry, slow, almost vacant, absent.

"… Am I correct to assume this person is who bestowed you the blade?"

"Yes."

"And yet, despite what she taught you, you would still refuse my offer?"

"Yes, because you're nothing like her ."

"Wh- What has that to do with anything? Anyone in my position would react in the same way!"

"That's the thing, it's not the truth," he chuckles, low. "I was just being an idiot again, trusting in you."

"… Pardon? Are you suggesting… I am not worth your trust?"

"You did treat me like shit during basic, after all."

"I… I already apologized! And I am still extending my aid to you. You are the one refusing!" Why am I shouting? Why is my jaw paralyzed in place? Why am I seething to this extent?

Why won't you simply accept my aid?

"… You know, can I be level with you, Mitsurugi ? You're… really similar to the one who gave me the blade," he tells, relaxing into the habitual calm tone I know him for.

"Huh? I am?"

"Yeah. I… Sigh. I guess I've been treating you as I did with her, because I wanted to share with you the same I shared with her."

…

"E-Excuse me, what does that mean?"

"That I gave you benefits I shouldn't have, that I ignored actions I shouldn't have," he says, hardening, fuming. "Heh, Cpt Isumi was right, I chose to blindfold myself. It's clear you don't regret what happened in basic, that everything I've done means jack shit to you."

"All I am asking of you is an apology," I counter, hitting the controls, causing a small odd window to confirm the ejection of the cockpit from the machine, that I have to close in a hurry.

"And assuming I'm whatever the hell the guards told you I am. I'm not worth your trust, so there's no point in us talking anymore," he sighs, hollowed out. "Just ignore me from now on, okay?"

"Wait a moment! If you hold that woman so dearly… Why? I cannot understand you. Even if… you've forgiven my actions all too easily, that is something we can debate, work out somehow. Yet, if you still… cherish that person so much, surely, defusing these doubts would be in your best interest?"

And once more, he grows silent, close, closer, until our blades cross. If he's afraid, concerned, perhaps of whatever lies in his past, if he's no spy, why is he refusing the code?

"Takeru, if you hold her in such esteem, you should know the importance of the code, of a warrior's word."

"Stop. There's no point to it."

"Why?"

"… If that is how you already feel, it's too late."

"I cannot understand what you're getting at. I speak as I do due to my motives to take the sword. I fight to restore peace to this nation, to my people. Surely, she also would hoist these same wishes."

Galloping through open ruins, the sky is the sole witness of the sparks, of the wails of the joints, of the last flares from our jump units. And yet, he remains silent.

"What of you, Takeru? Is this contrarian attitude how you plan to aid others to rebuild the peace in this nation?"

"Wrong scale, honey."

"W-What? What did you just call me?"

"It's not the Empire what I'm trying to save."

"… Pardon?"

"It's something more small, more personal than that."

"And pray tell, what is this something? What could outweigh your own homeland, your duty to the UN as well?"

One final clash breaks both blades in half, forcing us both to retrace our steps, discard the remnant, take out a knife. Amidst the motions, he does not answer. Taking our stances, basking into the reddening numbers, on the fading response from the controls, I gulp and feel a cold shiver run throughout me whole.

And finally, he relents a sigh. "You could say… the blossom is trying to dream of the skies again, to fulfill that last promise I shared before light's out."

"… What kind of promise?" And how could that be an impediment for him to mend his mistake and extend an apology?

"Someone out there is waiting. And I don't plan to let any of them down."

"… May I ask who is this someone?" Someone he left in America? A friend? A… lover?

"It doesn't concern you."

"Oh, yes, it does. This business affects the squad as a whole, Takeru. If you're being truthful then, why refuse? If those memories are a roadblock, rid yourself of them. Whoever that woman was, she is not worth sacrificing your future!"

"Shut it."

"Then, why? Why choose what is no more over what is now in front of you?"

And then, silence blooms.

Aware of my breathing, of the small threads of air filtering through my nose, of the contraction and relaxation of my abdomen, I can only wait.

Wait as the silence extends, anticipation takes hold and strains my eyes, lips, the back of my head shivering.

Until he lets out a strong yet short sigh.

"… Because even if alone I stand in this hill, with loneliness as my mistress," as if crashing upon an iceberg is the shock which envelopes me as his voice turns hoarse, crude and adusted, blazing, "I will never yield to the paralysis of dread."

Blazing as his jump units, causing his Fubuki to blitz towards me, a true blizzard of aggression. A true cyclone against which there is no defense, odd patterns he hadn't yet employed disturb my stance.

"I won't let a world branded in red to come to be again! Because I have a goal, a hand to reach out for!"

As I falter to catch my breath, a shadow is cast up above. Once again, the arc in defiance, the conquest of the skyline as both thrusters exert themselves with what faint fire they yet retain.

"Because I will! Never ever! Forget you !"

"W-Wait, Takeru. Regain your poise, I am- Ugh!"

A beeping, I slam the pedals. A shockwave sends my Fubuki spinning towards a hill of rubble, its right hand is now disabled. Yet, the mirage in the radar, all around me does not stop its stride.

"Stars above, watch over me," he fumes, far more searing than his aggro, faster than his jumps, "grant me the strength to press through this freezing night!"

Only able to catch glimpses of the frame, only for it to jump above me. Another beep as I rush forward to avoid the attack, my pylon's signal is lost.

"Takeru, I apologize if my words insulted-"

"You woke up the dragon," he spits out, his shadow cloaking over me in a full blackout, obstructing the sun. "Now deal with it!"

A roll, a tackle, knives that meet, rubble and dust spreads away from us like wildfire. A gallant hop backwards he does upon my pressure, to then return to violence and deliver a kick upon my offense.

"Takeru, regain your senses!"

"I'm fully aware of what's going on, of the ripples I gotta halt."

"What are you even saying? Do you wish to call further attention to yourself?!"

"Heh, being a magnet is all I am good for, anyways."

"Huh? What are- Ugh!"

Red numbers in my only arm available, it doesn't stop me from charging ahead. For my knife to lower upon his Fubuki as a vampire would in thirst, even if it is a crude movement. Inches separate the tip from his visor as his extra hand binds my arm, so I trigger my jump units to tumble him down before he can thrust his own knife into me.

Yet, for some reason, I find my Fubuki is already on the air… As he had done to Ayamine, his heels slip on purpose, his grappling hold over me sends my boost into a building as his Fubuki collapses.

Red is all I see in my Fubuki, standing in a herculean effort. Slowly he also raises, jump units already heating up, it seems.

"Is this the real you, Takeru? Are you… my enemy?"

"Sometimes, words simply run out," he says, still adusted yet slow. Frozen, cracks in the imposing iceberg that stands ahead. "You already decided what I am to your eyes. Now, all that's left is to stem the bleeding."

"I've… I only wish for you to-"

"Even if there is no road to follow, I shall cleave one open with my own hands," he declares, once again charging at me, "just like the moonlight that pierces the clouded skies!"

… W-What? Wait, but those words… those are the words of the poem Tsukuyomi taught me. A poem no spy should know. Why do you know it? No, if he does then it means Takeru isn't-

"Ugh! Cough!"

Numbness assails me, claims ownership of my senses for a moment. The sim turns off, my unit was knocked out. Everything slowly ceases to shake, except my hands, except the heartbeats that scratch, and slash, and pike, and rake my insides.

In that moment of hesitation, he stroke a certain hit to my cockpit, I assume. Yet, did I misheard it? Those words, the poem… only a fellow would know such words. I rather not believe something grim happened to one of us to have the intel pried out of them, yet I believe if such were the case Takeru wouldn't be allowed to roam freely, much less near me.

No! Think, myself, think! He uttered no mere words, he employed our poem! A poem the Tsukuyomi Houses teaches with. Something that's only told to the select few who are handpicked to officially learn the Mugen Kidou.

So then… the gesture to have the cousins guard him, how Tsukuyomi chose to seek him first in the mock battle, the good faith she gave him when she caught us arguing about the Minaru Kamui, the admonishment that later befell me…

… By the Heavens, what have I done?

" Sniff…" Huh? Something… is the common channel still open? Are those… stifled cries? Is he- "Heh… Sorry Yohime-san, I can't… I just can't anymore," he whispers, barely audible through some more sniffling and short choking.

A beeping halts my words, something zooms into view. "The exercise has finished," the Instructor tells, dry and low, a minute frown hewn into her features. "Cadets, you may disembark," she says, cutting off the connection.

"… Takeru, can you hear me?" I tap the common channel, yet my simulator is completely deactivated. No amount of pressing the button causes a reaction as all the lights slowly start to turn off. Cursed be the Instructor! Now of all times?!

Fumbling about, heart still pounding, mouth gaping to allow me to breath, I cannot undo the bindings fast enough, fingers knotting over themselves at times. Skipping the ladder, almost losing balance, I throw myself out of the unit.

"Takeru!" I rush after him, after the slouched shape that drags itself through the tiles. "Those words… that name…. Where did you heard the poem?"

And he then looks back at me.

An empty mask which lacks any and all emotions.

A line are his lips, eyelids almost turning his sight into a new moon.

"I don't know what you're talking about, Mitsurugi ."

"Please… You must know what I speak of. And you can use my name, Takeru."

"… Could you please keep your distance, Mitsurugi-san ?" He asks, giving me a slow, delayed bow. "I wouldn't want any… ripples to affect the squad. You're enough to deal with already."

"Ah, well… I admit, I should not have been so insistent. It was my folly, and I apologize," I bow in earnest, constricting both hands and lips. "Please, can you tell me where did-"

"Yes, thank you for understanding," he says in the same frozen tone as he raises, turning around and going his way.

"Wait Takeru, please. I'm trying to-"

"Enough is enough," the Instructor tells as she walks up to us, pinching her nose. "Shirogane is right, this is the end of this argument."

"With all due respect Instructor, this matter is-"

She delivers a vicious strike upon the closest simulator, frowning as she walks up to me, allowing Takeru to leave. "I've let the battle reach its course, not because I am in agreement with what transpired but due to my orders, cadet. But I have been keeping an ear open. And I want none of this pro-Empire attitude from you, miss .”

"Wh- I… I was only-"

"No excuses!" She threatens, eyes blazing, arms folding. "You may be… may have important ties, but that does not excuse you of punishments, Mitsurugi."

"I never have tried to shirk my duty, ma'am. I was only trying to-"

"Shut it, I don't want to hear it. Respect Shirogane's wish and keep it together." She then comes closer, eyes narrowing. "But if you happen to try and continue to place your own code above the squad, this will be going into your personal records. This is my last warning, Mitsurugi."

"I understand, ma'am. I was only-"

"I said-"

"I only want to apologize. I only… I wanted… I've seen I was mistaken, even if my vision of a warrior differs from Takeru's."

"Then, explain what this 'poem' you were shouting about entails."

"… I cannot. It is tied to my upbringing, ma'am."

"Then, I deem it unnecessary to bring the topic to light. You and Shirogane do not mix, leave it at that."

"However-"

"Was I clear, cadet?!" She once more hits the sim, that glint of barely restrained ire, the cackles of the chains echoing. "If you're still so chipper, I can spar with you in the sim."

"N-No, ma'am. I… shall try to remain composed. However, I do wish to-"

"Not today, Mitsurugi. I won't press about these matters of the IRG… but I will be on the lookout for any further misconduct on your end."

"… It won't impair my duties to the UN, Instructor, ma'am."

"Sigh… Just stop causing such altercations, are we clear?" She ruffles her hair, honest weariness coming to her features as her shoulders and head sag and lower for a second.

As she turns around and we return to the open area, besides the surprised gazes of those watching the battle, there is someone else near my squadmates. Who, for a second, quickly glares my way.

"Is something the matter, Yashiro?" The Instructor asks.

Those odd things atop her head flap, she nods. "The Professor is calling for Takeru-san, if he finished his drills."

"I see. Shirogane, we have maintenance practice in the usual hangar at 1500 hours," she says, looking at him squarely in the eye, sizing his complexion, perhaps.

He salutes, trying to stand straight, the forced mask showing cracks. "Understood."

Without wait, he nods towards the rest, giving them a thumbs up, before starting to walk for the exit. Something grabs onto my shoulder as I try and step forward.

The glare, draconian and imposing, remains fixated on my features. "Mitsurugi, don't," the Instructor orders. "By the by, you're going to do a hundred squats after your laps of the day. Repeat your orders."

Wringing my hands, my feet meet as I stand in attention. "I shall do a hundred squats after my daily laps, ma'am!"

She merely nods then leaves to her post. "Ayamine, Tamase, you're next."

As I walk to the rails, Ayamine is descending. To say she's upset would be a severe underestimation. Just remain silent, don't meet her eyes, do not provoke-

"How's the moral high ground feeling?" She asks when passing me by.

Nibbling at my lips, I skip some steps, never looking back. Tamase hurries past me, not meeting my eyes. Yoroi seems to desire to huddle upon herself, saying nothing. Sakaki simply stares.

"If you wish to say something, feel free."

She merely sighs, shaking her head. Looking away, veiling her sight, saying nothing and hanging a cloak of silence over us.

So I acquiese to her unspoken order, simply leaning closer to the wall, watching the monitors. Even if it has come to this, even if I admit I deserve this atmosphere, it is all temporary.

The warning be damned, I now know what I must do. Worry not, Takeru. Once I confirm with Tsukuyomi this doubt, not only your name will be cleansed of any and all vile rumors but you'll regain the status you deserve.

After all, you truly are a fellow of mine. All I hope is, you can forgive my obstinacy.

Even if I cannot measure up to this Yohime you hold so dearly in your heart.

Roses and Ashes (II)

Chapter 8 3 :

Roses and Ashes (II)

---

Some moments later.

(In the hallway.)

[Takeru]

---

Once I made sure the headband is back in place, I look into the full length mirror nearby. Eyes are still red, can see the veins popping through 'em. But there's no more lag to my hands, head doesn't hurt, no whispers nor echoes remain in the distance. Sigh… Though, maybe I should cut my hair once we're done with this little matter. I look like a villain with this headband on and looking this tired, too. The small little horns it has kind of remind me of the Gandum Enpyon.

"Heh, I just feel rhythm emotion!" I say, striking a pose to my reflection. And, ironically, that is not a joke. All the way to the 'Zero System' once I aid Sumika in her therapy.

Though, if that's the case, I wanna wake up to the beeps.

A sigh after, I go to the door. Leaving to the elevator with slow steps, me and my psydekick depart from the changing room, ignoring the few gazes that linger. Kasumi lays her head on my arm, fingers trying to entwine on mine, as the gentle tingly feel spreads. Now able to lift my head without effort, I smile and pet her head.

"Thanks a lot, Kasumi," I whisper, she smiles back.

"No, it's nothing. Are you truly feeling well?"

"Yeah, no worries."

"… I felt the dragon roaring again, however," she affirms, staring.

"Wait, you could still hear my thoughts?" I had asked Yuuko to shut Kasumi off in case- Oh, fuck. What are you playing at now, Vice Commander ?

"Sorry… I didn't meant to, it was like a… wave washing over me, the echo of the roar," bunny ears cascade along her gaze, fingertips enforcing their hold.

"You're fine after that?"

"It was just the echo, I didn't see anything. Um, Takeru-san, do you know why you turned into a dragon within the forest? Is that… how you were in the IRG?"

"No. Back then… I was fire, and just that."

"… Then, who is the dragon?"

"That's… not important right now."

"According to the Professor, dragons are omens of good fortune. And many civilizations seem to revere them as symbols of power and bravery. I do think," she looks away, leaning more, "it fits you well."

"… Thanks, but," there is another symbolism dragons take. And it ain't no good omen or anything. "Anyways, yeah, I had to get serious for a second," to clog the highway despite my rejection, as pointless as it might be I gotta play to my odds.

"I suppose, the questioning was a failure?" She asks, bunny ears and steps slumping.

"There's no failures… Just me being stupid for the umpteenth time," I sigh, she rubs my arm.

"What happened?"

"We argued, Meiya used words that, well, remind me of rough days and I tried to cut things as I felt memories clearing up. How do I look?"

Kasumi puts some space between us, her eyes remain on me. "Shaken, but you're calm now. I feared you were going to faint again, by how pale your aura looked."

"Is it that bad?" My lips dry as she nods, and that cold embrace meets my side again.

"You're still all spiky," she notes, lips shrugged. "Um, the Professor didn't exactly reveal much but, was this truly necessary? Using your… pull so suddenly can backfire."

"It had to be this way, checking Mei- Mitsurugi's feelings was a must."

"But didn't you already know how she reacts in the future?"

"It's not like I know every outcome," I shrug, chuckling. "There's too many possible routes, and I can't really take it all in. Would be cool if, for every problem, a Takeru from another future would come to warn us of what could go wrong." If only I could actually see the future instead of only getting vague hunches and have to hard reset the state to prevent random shit to screw us over. At least, me being an active Nucleus should, theoretically, let Sumika link methods from different timelines… which is the key to getting out of this stalemate.

Kasumi tilts her gaze, blinking fast for a sec. "Huh? But there can't be two you at the same time."

"Oh, yes, they can. I did pass myself Sumika's shoe back home, after all," I smirk, she gapes as the tingly feeling grows, as she sees the memories, one from each side. "Then, we could get one Takeru that comes for the issues we have now, then there's another that comes for the next problem and so on. We'd end up with an army of Takerus, ready to break the universe in half through the sheer stupidity of our puns," I nod to myself, raising a fist.

"That sound unnecessarily complicated," she protests. "Where did you get the idea?"

"You know, Drake Sphere. There's a character there, Tronqs, that comes from the future to help the guys in the past. I'm basically like him, but now without a cool sword." And I can't go Super Shayan.

"Your aura is spiky enough as it is now, Takeru-san," Kasumi keeps complaining, lightly pulling my arm.

"Heh, if you say so."

"But," she says, ears flapping, "that only applies if there's many aspects of the future one does not know. You already, well, know what happens up to Iceberg, so you could technically solve many issues by aiding the Professor with the overall knowledge of how the events transpired, even if they no longer shall occur, simply to be on the lookout for parallels. What does that make you?"

"… Takeru del futuro futuroso."

"I'm being serious," eyes narrow, hold tightens.

"Oh, me too. The futuristic future is real cool and doesn't afraid of anything, though. We got touchscreens, rhino XGs, free chocolate, and the sun is red."

CHOP!

"Don't start, please. Sigh… At least you seem to be feeling well enough," she concludes, lips not entirely relaxing.

"Haha… You could say I was mentally prepped up, even if I'd rather things not be this way," I look up, fiddling with my ear, straightening my back, feeling something crack as a small jolt runs through me. "But at least I know now. I just gotta deal with it… somehow."

I know, different world and all that shit. I can't control how people feel, and I'm no one to tell her not to go hard onto the Yamato Damashii when I almost lost it during the invasion. Guess all those pies and presents are a thing of the past. Even with the best possible roll I could have gotten in a reset, I could not get Meiya to stop seeing herself as a tool of the Empire in this world. Different values, different settings, so of course things would be different. But it's too early to simply give up. She might not… resemble my sweet Meiya, but that doesn't mean we gotta be enemies. If I can convince the XO to send us to the relief efforts, actually saving the old lady might… either let us start coexisting even if we disagree or it'll be the last nail in the coffin if she's resolved to not take her off the small hamlet. But dammit, I gotta roll that dice. If Meiya remains on this path… regardless of how I handle Yuuko and Yuuhi…

…

" Pull the trigger, Takeru…"

Shuddering, I shake my head and inhale sharply. Fighting the scratching, the rake of cold up to my nape, my steps delay themselves as if walking through sinking sand.

"Are you sure you don't want to go to the medical bay right now?" She says as she holds my gaze, clutching both arm and hand tightly as if she were pulling a rope.

"Sigh… It's fine. I think I'm good now," I smile, again petting her head.

She shrugs her lips a bit. "I still think you should-"

Her bunny ears perk up, Kasumi shivers. Immediately after, a steady march reaches my ears. Looking back, a red dress inches closer in long steps as if she were late for a special sale in the super.

"Hey Takeru, whatever is the matter?" Shion hurries to our side, a hand in her chin as she looks straight at me. Lips shrink, gaze narrows. "You… don't look so good."

I wave a hand about, rolling my eyes. "I'm fine, really. I was called to the underground, that's why I left the training," I answer, enduring a smile, bearing the brunt of an inquisitive arrow-stare.

"Oh, I see. Let us escort you, then," she proposes, raising a finger.

"Takeru-san is being called to a special mission," Kasumi says, moving her bunny ears.

"I wasn't talking to you," Shion shoots a glare at her, eyes sharp and carnivorous. Not like in the worst days, but still in needless aggression like when she was little. Only, you know, instead of a silly child this is a full-blown ballista of aggro.

"Hey, don't be like that," I say, waving a hand, losing the smile. "My missions are kind of a big deal, that's all."

As Shion groans and holds my gaze, sparks and shields raised in the crossfire, Mion slowly catches up. Giving a small nod, she plays with her hair. "Is something the matter?"

"Takeru says we can't escort him due to some special duties," Shion complains, not even masking the embers.

"Well, merely accompanying you shouldn't be an issue?" Mion asks, I sigh.

"Please, it's fine. We can take the stairs and hurry to the elevator. Thanks, but you can end the morning watch here."

Her eyes narrow as her fingers trace the ponytail. "Really? Then, may I ask what transpired in the last battle?"

"What are we talking about?"

"Why were you holding your head as you returned to your squadron? Moreover, what compelled you to employ those… tactics against Mitsurugi?" Her tone takes a dive in the Arctic, the hawk in her resurfaced.

"… My head just hurt a bit. Nothing's wrong. And I am doing my best because I need the grades since, you know, my CCSE score was garbage," I point out with a nod, both Pickles seem to not be very enthused by the answer, going by the wiggle of those brows, the embers that still lurk.

"Then, all the more reason to accompany you, isn't it?" Mion suggests, nodding with half a smile.

"Takeru-san said he's going to a special mission. Please leave," Kasumi insists, not dulling her firm opposition even when I grip her hand.

"We are talking with Takeru," Shion spits, playing with her hair as she threw a side glance and a sharp kunai at Kasumi. "So Takeru, let's-"

"Leave us alone please," Kasumi counters, in her own firm way.

"You shut up. Takeru, we are assigned as your-"

"Inconsiderate."

"Kasumi, stop it," I pull her hand, she looks down. Why are you picking a fight with her? What's next, you're gonna hiss like a bunny and bite onto 'em? Her bunny ears flap, she groans as she stares.

As I look back at Shion, her lips are quivering. She takes one step back while holding my gaze, then she shot a glare at Kasumi. Even as Mion lightly pulls at her sleeve, Shion's face does not unwind the steam nor the embers. She's about to let her menacing side out, probably. And if security sees her being a hazard to Kasumi…

"Come on, now." I place a hand on Kasumi's head as I stand in front of her, covering her from their hawkish glares. "Sorry Shion, Mion, can you just drop it?"

"Huh?! Why? Why are you taking her side?" Shion asks, almost wincing. It feels as if I had thrown a dart at her heart right now.

"I'm not. I just want to go answer my call for a mission. You know I'm under a punishment," I state, leveling a stare at them both.

"But why with her? We can watch over you as you go wherever it is you're required," she again raises a finger and smiles at me, tilting her head to a side.

"Inconsiderate, and forceful too." Kasumi, why?! She squints her eyes at Shion, whose fists are now shaking visibly.

"What was that? You wanna say something else?"

"Screaming won't make you right." She replies, moving her bunny ears. Shion's eyes are lost in a pond of fire, only a light elbowing from Mion chains down the blast.

"Alright, you two. That's enough. 2nd Lts, please take your leave," I tap my brows, frowning just a bit, making them twitch. "Causing an argument now is not what I want, and you've done enough for me today," I affirm, speaking from the pit, glaring in earnest. Until Kasumi pulls my arm, pouting.

"If that is what you wish," Mion relents a nod, despite Shion's frown. "However, considering our position, I'd like to discuss something with Yashiro here," she says, inexpressive and cold. Giving me the false smile of a hyena.

"Are you trying to pick a fight with Kasumi?"

"My, of course not. I do wonder why you came to that conclusion… Did anyone speak ill of us to you?" Mion eyes narrow and blazes at the bunny.

"You did try to harm me when we just met… Leave Kasumi alone. She's my friend."

"I cannot speak for Shion, but I have no hostile intentions towards Yashiro," she states, playing with her hair. You still haven't learned how to veil your anger. And you should know Mion, lying to me is quite the stupid thing to do.

"I see. You wanna stay Kasumi?"

"No, let's go."

We try to move but Mion now stands in my way, still bearing an innocent smile that promises lament and docility. "Please, we merely wish to share some words with her regarding these 'special missions'. There is no way we would do anything inappropriate given our position here, much less to the assistant of the Vice Commander. You can trust in my words, we will do nothing to her."

"Acts are not the only thing that can hurt. Mion, I'll say this clearly, if you're hostile to her I'll take it as a personal insult," I warn, staring down at them both.

"… Why are you being this contrarian? I do not recall doing anything to upset you."

"Shion just tried to pick a fight with her."

"I wasn't doing that," Shion crosses her arms, eyes losing light and warmth by the second. "I was just performing my duty and she got in the way."

"She was telling you I'm late for a special assignment. And you told her off way too harshly."

"Please, cadet Shirogane," Mion said, smiling at me, lightly hitting Shion's side, "I merely wish to share some words with Yashiro, nothing more."

"… Then, go on and ask away. If it's about the mission, neither of us can answer," I nod, Kasumi follows.

"May I ask why you cast such doubt towards me? I thought we agreed to try and get along." Mion then slowly looks at Kasumi, who hides behind my back under the pressure. "Maybe someone is truly speaking ill of us behind our backs?"

"If you're insinuating Kasumi did, you're way off the mark. I merely see the you of that rainy night right now," I say, not changing my posture at all. "If you touch Kasumi, you touch me. Why are you looking at her like that? I mean, how could you ever be upset at her?"

"She was rude to me, unnecessarily hostile. I wonder why?" Shion comments, as sour as she could be. If not for the situation, I'd laugh at how childish she looks.

"You also were rude to her, you know?"

"Is she a fellow to you, Takeru?" She counters, a viper lashing out within her words, her stare.

"She's my friend. Kasumi has always been there for me when stuff got tough here," I return the crossfire, enough to make them falter and douse the pyres.

"I see. But that doesn't excuse her behavior towards me, she made a miss first."

"2nd Lt Tsukuyomi," I glare again, tapping my brows and sighing hard, "it's not about first or second. Kasumi has been helping me since I arrived so she gets easily worried about my health. That's all, right Kasumi?"

"… Yes." She says, peeking from behind me. "I am just looking after him."

"Well, you don't have to," Shion again shoots a glare at her. "We are assigned as his escorts, you see."

"Thanks, but drop that stare," I order, they both hold my gaze for a moment, eyes narrowed.

"Shirogane, is she someone dear to you?" Mion asks, losing light.

"Of course. She's a really good friend. I mean, she puts up with my bullshit everyday with a smile on her face despite all she has to do. That's how good she is. Look at her! How could you be mean to Kasumi? She's just trying to help, is all."

"I see, so that's how you see her…" Mion smiles, but in a crooked way. Like my Mom whenever she came up with a punishment after I failed many tests in a row. "However, I assure you I hold no ill will towards her. I just wish to share a couple words with Yashiro. Do you seriously think-"

"Then talk where I can hear you."

"I would welcome some privacy, if at all possible. Since it regards our briefing for this duty."

"… Kasumi, let's go." I reach out to her, grip her hand, and move past the Pickles. I can't let them fight. Everything would crumble if Kasumi reacts badly towards them and they dared to show their fangs.

"It is saddening to see how little you seem to think of me…" Mion's hand that was on her hair delayed its stroke, her eyes slowly descending onto the figure behind me as we pass her side.

"What's sad is that you showed your fangs again here, Mion. I expected more of you two."

And rushing outta there, we quickly chain a few staircases without slowing down. We say nothing for a while, eventually I have to stop as her steps start to delay. Reaching B5F, letting her catch her breath, we pace quietly to the elevator. A slow arc is drawn on my arm, the tender hold softly pulls and the gale of steps subsides into a breeze as she sighs.

"You okay, Kasumi?"

"Yes," she whispers, eyes remain closed. "Don't worry, I did not scan their minds deeply. I saw no," her grip on me tightens, like her lips, "gruesome memories."

"Quite the negative word. You saw nothing, but what of hearing?" I ask, looking at her.

Steps wane, her bunny ears fall. "They do not seem very pleased to see a," gaze crumbles, sinking beyond reach, "Russian doll overseeing you."

Ears ring, sickness spreading on my mouth. I pet her head, slowly, as if handling an old vase. "You're no 'doll' or 'unit' or 'witch'. You're a human like all the rest, Kasumi."

"The official statement regarding the legitimacy of the life of artificial beings clarifies that-"

I stop, my walking and her words, wrapping an arm over her shoulders, pulling her a bit closer, causing her bunny ears to bump into me. "I don't care what the corporate side of the UN wrote down to appease a bunch of assholes who knows how many decades ago.

You're my friend, and if you say that again about yourself I'm getting angry."

She doesn't pull away, the tingly feeling slowing but never ceasing. "That's how many see me, will see me. It's a fact I cannot avoid. I am not-"

"So what if you're different? You still breathe, think, and feel like a human would. You're nothing of those shitty things people would call you," I frown and sigh. I'll never accept that bullshit, not after Alt IV was taken from Yuuko, not when our life was branded in red, and I won't start now either. "Let's try and keep you away from the Pickles. Did they have any other concerning thoughts?" I ask, letting her go before anyone sees us.

Bunny ears softly flap as her hands readjust their lock, head resting fully onto my arm now as we walk again. "Their auras were as red as their clothing, yet the slow swirling denotes true concern over you. Only, well, there was a mist, a fog covering them both. If it was regret, guilt, or any masked intention I did not try to confirm, the color grew deep like," she shivers, taking a deep breath, "that forest we saw in your mind."

"Sigh. Let's try and avoid contact between you and them. Anyways, I guess it's tuning time?" I ask in a whisper.

"Yes. The Professor is both pleased and upset at the first results we obtained from the tests. What do you have in mind?" She inquires, looking up.

"We gotta establish a base for her to build up from. So we"ll start from the beginning, playing old games that might trigger a jog in her memory."

"Will the consoles work?"

"No, this isn't the one from my home. Picture books of folktales, spinning tops, marbles, stuff like that."

"I see. What about Cat's Cradle?"

"Yeah, that works too. Shogi is out of the question, juggling is a bit risky." It can either fail in the sync, make her remember the Pickles or Yuuhi, or we may end up hitting the cylinder.

"I don't think we'd do something like that," she protests.

"Haha, but, well, we don't really have other games here, do we?"

"Don't you know of anything else we can do?"

"Why not play with cards? A standard deck should be available at the library, I believe."

I nod, smirking. "Oh, that's a good one. Simple is… Huh?" I blink a few times, looking at the tall figure that had, at some point, started walking besides us as Kasumi quivers and huddles behind me, gripping at my fatigues for dear life.

"Hm? What is it, Takeru Shirogane? Done reminiscing about games?"

"Chief Yoroi?! What are you doing here?!" And how do you keep sneaking up on me?! Do I need to polish my sense again? And I don't have Tsuhi to help me with that now, fuck.

He just chuckles at my surprise, waving a hand around. In his usual suit, as always, he tips his hat back as he smiles. "Oh, just taking a walk around the base. It is a beautiful building, after all. Top of the line tech in every corner."

"Well… Yeah, you're right in that. So, why did you sneak up on us?"

"I simply found you two absentmindedly walking and thought to see how you were faring. Hello, Yashiro. It has been a while," giving a smile, he waves. Kasumi shrinks into me further. "Oh? Is she still reticent towards speaking with me?"

"Sigh. You just popped out of nowhere, anyone would freak out," I shrug, rolling my eyes.

"And yet, you seem composed enough, Takeru Shirogane," he says, gaze peering, piercing deep into my soul. Feels as if I were staring straight into a mirror without blinking for too long.

"Been through quite the stuff lately, is all."

"Hmm, so it seems. A few soldiers seemed to desire to follow your trail as you walked. Why has such a dark cloud fell over you, I wonder?" He asks, face tightens as he grasps his chin.

"They see me spinnin', they hatin'." Patrolling they tryin' to catch me walkin' dirty.

"I did not know you favored hip-hop, Takeru Shirogane. An… influence of your time in America?"

"Anything for a pun, Chief." And for the record, be grateful I didn't start singing Without Me as soon as I got back to this world. Kasumi's grip on me tightens, her bunny ears slap away at my back. "Well, we were called to some assignment, so I'll-"

"By the way, might I ask about this… device on your head?" Narrow brows, an unwary tone paired with a hawkish gaze.

"… It's just a headband."

"I see… It resembles some sort of horns, does it not?"

"I guess…"

"I wonder what this means. Takeru Shirogane, are you a guardian angel in disguise; or a demon lurking in the shadows?" He takes a step closer, towering, staring.

Furrowing my brows and plucking my lips, doing an effort to keep my tone neutral, I return the pleasantry. "I'm a UN soldier working for the same side as you, I believe."

"… Is that so?"

"At least, that's what I think," for now. "Well, aren't you busy? XO Kouzuki 's gonna be angry if she finds you snooping around. What are you even here for?" For him to approach me, no, for him to be here… Is he here with news about Sagiri like last loop? Pushing Yuuko for your own goals, forcing intelligence to move out prematurely?

Not on my watch, Chief. You ain't playing me a third time.

"Hoho, I can't tell you that. For I am a man with a mission," he gives me his usual smile, raising both hands and waving them to a side while taking a step back and letting out a hearty chuckle.

"Sigh… Well, I guess that's true. I'll forget we ever saw-"

"Oh, since you insist, I suppose I could tell you."

"… Which is it?" Always marching to his own drum.

"You see, I've been tasked to deliver a certain item to this base…"

"Hmm… I suppose to the Vice Commander ?"

"Well, yes. But I suppose you could simply hand it to her."

"Why?"

"You're going to see her at some point, won't you? It makes my work easier."

"Hey, don't slack off, Chief. No one likes a dog that can't do its tricks right, after all," I say, he chuckles.

He's doing his usual act, through and through. Why did he approach me? Is this about an item true or not? Is there… anyone else nearby? Can't feel anyone's presence… But I also couldn't hear him approaching at all. Kasumi remains hidden, grasping at my fatigues. On her guard.

"You do know what's gonna happen if you start messing around the base?" I ask, tapping my brows.

He then smiles, a bit more softly than usual. "Haha, I suppose it is a risk I cannot take. By the way, here," the Chief passes me a small box.

"What's this?"

"The important item I spoke about."

"Huh?! You're just handing it to me? What is this- Huh?" Touching the package, my fingers dive right in. This feels like… "Chief, this wouldn't be a dodo plushie, would it?"

"Oh?" He smiles widely for some reason, eyes gaining luster. "How did you guess correctly, Takeru Shirogane?"

"Mikoto complained once about the plushie you left her for her birthday, said you always give her these things, how much you love these birds."

And all the goddamned times that also happened in my first loops as well, even if she never told me why that happened during those years. Always with the dodos, really. We had enough of the things to make an extra pillow with 'em all back then. Sigh… Was nice to simply lay and chill onto the dodos after some hijinks by the hill.

He nods, sighing and placing a hand near his neck, relaxing a bit. "Oh, yes. The dodos are fascinating, and not only because they're an extinct mystery to delve in."

"For real?"

"In any case, I suppose we should discuss the real reason I came here," he sobers up, straightening his suit.

… But what about the dodos? I never heard anything of why he loves those birds, now that I think about it.

"Here," he produces letter from his suit and passes it to me, scanning the nearby area with quite the killer stare as he did.

"… You do know that XO Kouzuki won't like you using a middle man for the delivery if it's something important, right?"

"Worry not, Takeru Shirogane. This letter isn't for the Professor."

"Huh? Then, who is it for?"

"Read it, and find out. I have business with the XO, so I'll take my leave here," he tips his hat, giving me a smile. "Until later, Takeru Shirogane."

"… Yeah, later."

He goes his way deep into the base, towards the elevator. Doesn't turn around, and shortly after I lose sight of him. I suppose people will deal with him in due time, but just in case.

"Kasumi, can you-"

"I already emailed the Professor about it," she says, waving her PDA at me.

"Thanks, little bun," I pet her head, the bunny ears softly flap. "So, I guess he still has hyper ceramic on him?" She nods, looking down. "Don't worry, his mind is probably one of the last things you wanna scan."

"So, um, what is that about?" She asks, peeking at my hand, at the letter and the box.

"The dodo plushie is… probably a test for me, I guess. Lemme check it for bugs real quick."

… And no, there's nothing on the thing.

"I didn't know you could do that," she says, staring.

"Yuuko taught me some tips when I worked for her in one of my loops." And I got better at it in the Guard. Sure, I ain't no Tsuhi but I can clean up a small plushie no problem. "Wanna keep the little bird?" I offer it, she shakes her head. Guess I'm gonna have to leave it somewhere, maybe in my office.

"Well, but," she pulls at my arm, "what of that letter?"

The envelope is made of a paper softer than anything I've touched before, almost feeling soft despite its sturdiness. White as the moon, it has a small burgundy ribbon on it like those congratulation letters have. Sealed with a wax seal in the same burgundy color, the pattern it has seems… familiar for some reason.

"Wait, a burgundy lotus? Don't tell me-" I gulp, Kasumi gasps and lets go in haste.

As I turn it around, I see another logo. A large purple marking with the image of the handguard of the Minaru Kamui… The Koubuin House's emblem. A stamp with the Imperial Royal Guard's patch is in a corner, looking more like a hand drawn, custom made piece rather than a mass produced stamp. Written in pristine black ink, with such a fine calligraphy that denotes not a single wasted stroke nor hesitation in the action, a name was etched on the envelope.

Recipient: Takeru Shirogane. Followed by it, the directions of the base were written under the name with clear precision, including my current rank.

"Takeru-san?" She pulls my hand, barely grasping it. "This might hurt you. Don't read it."

"Running away is not an option, Kasumi."

"Are you," she looks away, her hold falters on its own, "still considering going back to the IRG?"

I ruffle her hair, the silly bunny looks up. "I ain't going anywhere, Kasumi."

"Really?" I nod, she steps closer. "I see. But I'm not silly, I am worried about-"

"I know. But putting this off is a bad call."

"What about the tuning?"

"I can focus then, unlike you I can't multitask to save my life," I nod, pushing my chest out.

"I do not know if boasting of that is wise, Takeru-san."

"It's the truth, though. I do one thing at a time, very slowly. Don't worry, if we could speak with the actual Sumika before after I came back, I'll keep myself in check."

She still looks into my eyes, unblinking. "Whatever lies in this letter won't make you argue with the Professor again?"

"That depends on what the Vice Commander plans to do going forward. I did give her some time to gather her thoughts, but that volcano ain't chilling down. Neither are those who thank it for the spark."

"I know, but still… You're on the Professor's side, right?" Again, barely grasping my sleeve, fingertips quiver as her lips. With the frailty and purity of porcelain, she stares up at me.

"It's the other way around, little bun," I smile, letting a sigh out as I play with her bangs. "That's what I'm trying to answer now."

Enduring her eyes, I gulp and look at the letter, at the emblem. Feeling the cold hands creep back out, as if my feet were sinking in sand, I can't move from the spot. The grip start distorting the edges of the envelope, a small race of ants on my back.

Letting some air out, leaving my mouth open, I slowly turn the thing around.

Some of my fingers blocked the writing, but I can read the surname just fine. Unlike that time when I saw Sagiri's letter and got the reading wrong, I can somehow tell that this time my reading of the kanjis isn't wrong.

Looking at the sender's last name, I can tell I am not mistaken. I can tell that these kanjis read 'Amato'.

…

I wonder how exactly you're making ends meet while dealing with Fujikagi-kun now on your own, Red Lightning. Hehe, sure hope you're not burning everything around you. Although, without the morning coffee, I don't see your mood calming down at all.

---

Some moments before.

[Mion]

---

Takeru goes his way, sending towards us a murderous glare he only ever employed when truly adusted. Never letting go of the ESPer doll, he leaves without hesitation and in quite the hurry. With that damn witch daring to cling onto his arm, as a parasitic ivy constricts over noble greenery.

I am only allowed a sigh, any reaction can and will be used against us. Turning around, I pace back where we came from.

To think they'll make him doubt us so strongly… As soon as I noticed he seemed dizzy, this Russian witch went to his side wasting not a second. The Instructor shook her head, did not allow us to approach him while she berated Meiya-sama. While I concur she might have made a miss to imprint such ashen dejection to his features, admonishing her in such manner and forbid us to move was a clear mistake on the Instructor's end. I suppose, this shows where the woman truly stands.

In any case, the witch has been ordered to monitor him… Maybe twisting his memories to that fox's convenience?

"So Shion…"

"… What?" She spits, arms tightly crossed as she outpaces my walk.

"Do you think she's affecting him?"

"Yeah, I do. Remember the headband he has? Isn't it oddly similar to that thing she has on her head?"

"Yes, it was. Talking with her won't be easy… But perhaps that won't be necessary."

"It is unnerving, how they flaunt their colors and we can do nothing," she fumes, begins to stomp.

"Peace, we cannot falter. That being said, did you notice the gesture?"

"Yeah…" Her gaze falls to the floor, allowing me to once more walk by her. "To think our Leader would come back defending a foreigner…"

"It is almost a mockery. He does seem to be truly fond of her, and her appearance does align with what Takeru said. However… She's a witch, and she may have him under a foul spell."

"We can't do anything about her, though." Shion says, biting her lips, spewing grave maledictions under her breath.

If she truly is caring for him, I have no objections. However, how did she notice Takeru was in pain when she wasn't looking at him? When she was near the noise of the onlookers? Only us noticed Takeru's slight headache as he exited the sim, and due to the vantage point we observed from. Perhaps the Instructor also did at a glance and that's why she halted Meiya-sama. But the witch wasn't looking at him and yet was the first to react, to hurry to Takeru's side.

Almost as if she could really sense his mind in pain. Almost as if she wanted to block whatever he was remembering then. And she requested of us to leave, without veiling how vexed she was.

"I suppose we've no choice but to remain vigilant," I admit, loosening my arms.

"We do have an option to play," she raises a finger, dead serious upon my stare.

"Do you believe it wise?"

"Now is the most proper moment to contact her."

"Mana-nee is gonna kill us if this backfires, however."

"Then, we can scout the vicinity, to ensure no one takes notice. Or, what?" A slight frown, a step closer. "You rather surrender our brother to a Russian doll?"

"Fine, fine. But if there is any chance we could be seen-"

"We retreat immediately. So, should we be on our way?" She asks, again showing me her teeth.

I relent a sigh and nod, following her stride. Alternating our watch, our approach remains mostly undetected. Mana-nee already gave us a layout of the base, of the blind spots between cameras. Gaining a vantage point was easy enough, keeping watch for onlookers shall be the test now.

Left with no choice but to idle time, wait for the squats to end, we simply watch from the coldness of the shadows while enduring the modest breeze of the afternoon. Until she finishes, refreshes herself, and starts walking to the base, steps short and slow, gaze down in a pensive gesture.

"Meiya-sama," I call out, gesturing for her to get close.

A twitch, a second of hesitation, she then slowly approaches. "What are you doing here, you two? What of Takeru?" She inquires, arms folding.

"That is what we desired to speak with you about," Shion says, leaving the wall.

Yet she shakes her head. "I don't know if this is wise."

"Huh?" My cousin stalls a reaction, an eye twitches.

"As much as I desire to speak with you, if we're seen-"

"We ensured no such thing could happen," I state, returning her gaze, "most of the crew is having lunch as we speak. No one can see us from this position, rest assured."

"I see. Still," her eyes veer away, faltering, clouding, "what is it you wish to ask? Takeru didn't," lips regress, words stall, "agree to forward an apology. In large- No, due to my obstinate insistence on the matter."

"We didn't expect him to," Shion notes. "All we wish to ask is, why was he in pain after the last training?"

"Pardon?" Reigniting, her glare focuses onto us, causing Shion to falter.

"As it were," I say, giving a low nod, "cadet Shirogane was rather distressed after the battle, holding his head quite tightly when he approached his squadmates."

"What?! Then, what are you even doing here?!" She demands, a sudden landslide of blaze. "Was he taken to the medbay once again?" She asks, the hand which tugs and grips at her tank top revealing the source of the outburst.

"No, there was no need. Sadly, we were forbidden to approach him in the sim room unless it were an emergency."

"And later, that Yashiro," Shion seethes, drilling a burn into the ground, "sent us away in quite the hostility, claiming he was tasked with a special mission," she nods, I shake my head at the kindling in her eyes.

"Is that so. So Yashiro was also rude to you."

"Huh? Meiya-sama, excuse me, but," I stare, the glare of the sun unable to fight off the cold gust which embraces my back, "has Yashiro also been hostile to you?"

She nods in honesty, sighing softly. "Yes, in a few occasions. I don't know why, yet she doesn't seem to like me much."

So the witch does not favor Meiya-sama, huh. Curious, very curious, isn't it?

Shion frowns further, embers to flares. "Have you had an altercation with her, perchance?"

"Perish the thought," she affirms in complete firmness as a diamond, eyes blazing as Yuuhi-sama does at times. "She tends to be rather rude towards me despite my best efforts to remain polite, insisting that I am too stubborn, that I should mind my own business."

"Regarding what?"

"Oh, about Takeru. I had, well, desired his aid some time before. Takeru was busy then, and Yashiro said my insistence was inconsiderate. He did apologize for her bluntness, however no matter when I inquired he always had a special mission and she never seemed to be very welcoming towards me."

"Is this true?"

"But of course. Do you believe I would lie to you?" She asks, shrugging her lips in understandable anger.

I shake my head, giving a hasty bow. "No, I would never. I was merely," idling a hand on my hair, I rest onto the wall, "how to say it? I am at a lack of words to describe this situation."

"I have a word for you, Mion," Shion grins, teeth, no, fangs visible as she hits the concrete. "This is a fucking joke."

"Shion, do not lose your poise," Meiya-sama scolds, we both sigh at Shion's groans.

Still, I find myself agreeing with the vulgarity. So the witch has been around him since he arrived, huh? And also has been against Meiya-sama being near Takeru as well. Very curious, indeed.

"In any case," I cough, restoring my mask, "could you kindly tell us what transpired during your battle with cadet Shirogane?" I bow, Shion follows suit.

"Stop," she asks, "I am nothing yet. Rise, both of you." We so do, finding a hardening stare transfixed onto us, fully focused and never releasing our eyes. "I did plan to request a talk with Tsukuyomi about this, so if you agree to take me to her we can clear the other's doubts as we platicate."

"Eh? Ah, Meiya-sama, bringing you to Sister is-"

"If you're fearful of retaliation, let's agree to make this a request from me. Would you take me to Tsukuyomi?" She asks, holding our gazes.

If she herself deems whatever happened of such importance, it would not be wise to ignore it. Certainly, Mana-nee will understand. And if she doesn't, I shall bear the responsibility. Trusting in a witch is never wise. Shion nods my way and holds my gaze, so I sigh.

"Very well, we shall guide you. Please, do try to follow close by. We'll endeavor to not let anyone see you."

"Thank you kindly, both of you," she smiles, widely and relaxed like the skies are as of now. Vanishing what little clouds obscured her features, almost relieved.

---

[Meiya]

---

It almost feels as if I were attempting to sabotage the base, sneaking about behind these two. Alternating their watch in front and behind me, we quickly cruise through the hallways. Halting at times, melting into the wall at others, always in silence.

Yet, I do find it odd. If they found motives to seek me, whatever has happened to you, Takeru? Those charges must have taken a severe toll on your body. And while they said he wasn't sent to the medbay… I hope you truly did not exert yourself. Sigh… I'll never be her, huh. I wonder, just what kind of woman was this Yohime? To have you captive to this length, to ignite your anger to such extent. Moreover, how did her vision of a warrior differ from mine? To not live or die by the sword… I cannot comprehend, a warrior must never hesitate. To falter upon despair is treason to one's resolve, there is no giving up after committing to a mission or a promise. Revising one's approach is… understandable, yet piercing through should always be the goal.

I cannot understand, what did he grew upset about. Especially when Takeru himself acts with such resolve, unyielding even against the prospect of gaining further attention on himself, of driving himself to near exhaustion. But in due time he'll understand, he is a fellow after all. I wonder… if they know anything.

"By the by," I whisper, gaining their attention. Giving them a short bow, I smile. "Thanks for participating on that mock battle. Even if we did not get the chance to cross strikes, it was a pleasure to share the same battlefield." With all that happened after the bout, no one has approached me personally.

"No, the pleasure was ours," Mion says, returning the gesture.

"The pleasure of getting steamrolled," Shion rolls her eyes as she folds her arms. Mion sends her a glare but chooses to say nothing.

"By the way, how was your encounter with Takeru during the battle?"

"Eh? Ah, well," Mion toys with her hair, looking away, ahead, "it was truly fierce, the cadet's patterns are too erratic to follow."

"And when he isn't diving for your head, he's moving like a mirage," Shion protests, gazing back for a moment, warning with a quick gesture so that we hurry.

"… Didn't you notice anything odd to his patterns?" I ask, staring.

"For example?" Mion asks, remaining composed as a lake.

"… So you do not think anything of his maneuvering?"

"Well, it is most aggressive, that's true," she relents, giving a nod.

… I suppose, better to wait until we're in Tsukuyomi's quarters.

It doesn't take us long before we arrive at the barracks, desolate at this time since most are in the PX. Hurrying to their area, we finally breathe a sigh once we arrive, having avoided any eyes save the cameras. Although, I assume they must have taken that into account as well?

"Sister, it's us," Mion knocks in a rhythm, gulping.

"Enter," she says from within.

Mion sighs and steps inside. Shortly after, the echo of a slamming palm reaches me, making Shion stand straight, shivering for a second. I fold my arms, waiting in silence.

Eventually, the door slowly parts and a clearly scarred Mion waves us to enter. Shion follows after me, tracing the wall once we're inside. As Mion closes it, I hear the lock being put in place. Both cousins remain standing by the entrance, firm as statues.

So I sigh and face forward, giving a bow. "Good afternoon, Tsukuyomi."

Her laptop still running, she nods my way, features neutral. "Good afternoon, Meiya-sama. Please, do sit down," she gestures towards a spare chair. "What did you need of me?"

"Surely you can guess. I wish to know what happened to Takeru," I affirm, crossing a leg as I sit.

"Ahem… Meiya-sama, I am afraid I cannot comply to your request."

"I assumed so. However, during the training we shared today, Takeru said certain," I look away, enforcing the knot of my arms, "words which make me believe he truly is a fellow of us."

Her brows narrow, yet nothing is said. Scanning my features, Tsukuyomi then relents a nod. "Very well, let's hear what this is about. Mion notified me the cadet was rather exhausted after a sim battle you had against him?"

"Indeed. I admit I am at fault, I pressed Takeru so that he would extend an apology to you."

"Huh? Why would you do such a thing? Were you not notified no claims will fall upon the cadet?" She inquires, leaning forward in truest indignation.

"No, at all. Takeru mentioned how no repercussions had befell him at the moment yet did not leave the possibility null. And, well," I run a hand into my hair, breaking eye contact, "he was very adamant regarding how he could not approach you under no circumstances."

"… What does that mean?" She asks, interlocking her fingers, crossing a leg, aiming her full focus at me.

"Exactly what I said, he does not believe it wise to approach you. Such is why I insisted on perhaps extending a letter, to no avail," I sigh, curling a strand.

"Is that so? Well, do not mull over this matter. While I cannot disclose what transpired, there is no fault in the cadet's shoulders. An apology is unnecessary," she nods, yet she's the one to break eye contact, slightly… nibbling at her bottom lip.

"I understand. I shan't be pressing any further."

"Well, was he faring well?" She asks, resting her hands on her dress. "After returning from the medbay, to be placed on a battle against you must have been toilsome indeed for the cadet."

"Actually, his piloting did not seem any more conservative than his usual." All the contrary, truth be told. "While his showing yesterday was far more impressive, there was a point in our bout where-"

"Excuse me, yesterday?" Tsukuyomi asks, readiness in her posture, as if she were about to deliver a slash.

"Hm? Yes, yesterday. Takeru came to join at the tail end of our night run, taking on the course by his lonesome. And somehow emerging victorious," I note, arms folding again, a gentle shiver as the reminiscence envelops the back of my head.

"Why were we not notified of his departure from the medbay?" Shion asks, rhetorically perhaps, seething.

"Meiya-sama," Mion calls, giving a small bow, "how was Shirogane yesterday?"

"I do not know, we were not allowed to see him, sadly. The Instructor dismissed us before he left the simulator."

"… Is that so," all three of them say, almost in unison, their features distorting.

"Um, so you were not aware he had gone to train late at night?"

Tsukuyomi shakes her head, gradually traversing her hair with a hand, eyes squinted. "No, at all. I wonder, what has caused this turn of events? Meiya-sama, how was this performance of the cadet? You said he obtained victory on his own?"

"Oh, yes. You see, Takeru has some sort of… air jousting maneuver he likes much, and apparently is now trying to polish further," I say, tapping my chin, looking upwards. "During our bout he employed both versions of the maneuver, both the one where he soars high only to dive at high speeds as a hawk upon prey and the other where he forces his TSF to rotate and spin until a cyclone it turns into. I believe they are most reckless, yet I cannot deny their prowess in-Tsukuyomi?"

Gaping, rather, slack-jawed and unblinking, my retainer remains frozen in place. An eyelid twitches, another grave slamming falls upon the wood as she inhales sharply through clenched teeth. "Are you certain of this, Meiya-sama?"

"Yes, I was made into the recipient of such moves so believe me when I say so. My radar could not keep up with his movements, at all. You do seem… distressed. Was one of such moves what caused the accident, I assume?"

"… Forgive me, but I cannot comment on that subject," she says, sheathing her ire as she slowly exhales.

"Is that so, hmm. In any case, don't you notice something odd in Takeru's piloting, Tsukuyomi?"

She slowly raises a brow. "What are we speaking of? I do not follow. Concerned I am towards those… reckless line-piercing maneuvers, yes, but there is nothing odd to aggression," she affirms in contention, her composure not faltering a second time.

"Well, if I must say it so be it. Tsukuyomi, as I said before, I am certain that Takeru is a fellow of us. And not just a fellow Japanese and not a spy, but a member of our fellowship."

"… What? Excuse me, Meiya-sama," she starts, voice still composed unlike her hands, the minute crack in her features, "I know not what has you affirming such a thing, however-"

"Please, let us not waste time. I came here for a reason, and I have not yet had lunch. Tsukuyomi, Takeru employed the poem as we sparred."

Once again, her features extend and silence blooms. Looking behind me, I find both cousins also petrified where they stand.

"Uh… Is something the matter? Why are you all once more dead silent?"

"… Are you certain of this?" She asks, leveling a stare my way, piercing and imposing. I nod, her mouth slightly opens before she looks down, once more hanging a layer of quietness to the room. "… How?" She finally asks, and I tell them of that moment of the fight, their features tightening further as I do. "So he believes we see him as 'some thing' he is not… A curious choice of words."

"Well, perhaps he still thinks you hold some resentment over the matter with the blade, and he did mention the issues of his databases as well during morning," I nod, yet Tsukuyomi does not relax her stance.

"Not some one, but some thing," she repeats to herself, nodding. "And all the while, he kept employing these aggressive maneuvers?"

"Yes, and certainly you'd agree that they resemble the Mugen Kidou much?" She sighs heavily, finally nodding. "So, I am not demanding an answer or anything of the sort, however, is Takeru truly one of us?"

Throwing herself back onto the chair, making the frontal legs take to the air, she nods. "That is correct, yes."

"… And I suppose, Takeru was chosen to be trained under the Tsukuyomi House at one point? Which is why you've been trying to reach out to him repeatedly?"

"Sigh… This is all I'm willing to confirm on my end. The negotiations for the matter of the databases are still ongoing, and the cadet does not yet seem to recall what was of him fully, so please exert caution around him, Meiya-sama," she tells, forewarns with a glancing glare which assails me.

Yet I nod back, finally unchaining the restrain my breathing had been subjected to and inhaling calmly. He's one of us without a shred of doubt. I can't help to smile as I relax my shoulders onto my chair. He's an ally, he's my fellow. I've truly been blessed by the Heavens, to have you walk alongside me.

"So," Tsukuyomi continues, giving a smile, "can I ask of you to look after him?"

"But of course, leave it to me. I do wish to mend my mistake, and while there is some friction between us, I shan't turn a blind eye to my fellow's plight," I affirm, nodding back, beating a hand upon my heart. "Well, Mion and Shion will also remain close by, I assume?"

"Indeed, they will. However, they do not have the freedom to approach him to their leisure during a training, not without perhaps inciting an argument," she relents, resting onto the desk. "If you can mend this argument that ensued, please do stay on the lookout," I immediately nod, she smiles. "However, it is distressing to hear he reacted in such manner. Equally so for him to cling to the false belief that we desire him harm."

"It could be tied to how he still thinks retribution could fall upon him."

"Yet, we made it abundantly clear we do not wish to push for charges," Shion repines, arms folding, her legs hitting the wall.

"It is what it is," Tsukuyomi states, weaving strands. "At the very least, we know how he is as of now. On that regard, Meiya-sama, do you know of anything that might be placing burdens onto the cadet's shoulders?"

"No, not particularly. He has always been tasked with special missions, after all. Other than his constitution requiring time to stabilize, there isn't…"

… That woman. That Kagami, who he apparently is working with on his special missions.

"Meiya-sama?" Tsukuyomi inquires, interlocking her fingers.

"Ah… No, pay me no mind."

"What is the matter? Is there truly something we should concern ourselves with?"

Looking down, arms fold and compact upon myself as my breathing does. He did request of me not to bring this to light, however, I cannot deny that, if the woman went to awake him so early, she might be… taking advantage of his situation with the punishment.

"Ahem…" she again leans forward, gazing squarely at me, "it does seem that something is troubling you, Meiya-sama."

"… Even so, I believe I shouldn't speak of this."

"He was truly pained today!" Shion shouts suddenly, taking a step forward and not retreating upon Tsukuyomi's imposing glare. "And despite us being assigned as his security, that Instructor forbade us from approaching him only to then have him sent to some special assignment. Please Meiya-sama, if you know of something, anything, please tell us!"

"I also would like to ask you the same," Mion requests, walking to the other's side, the once shining veneer mauled at points. "Even if it's something he mentioned in passing, do not hold it in." They both bow and remain like so in silence, awaiting my words.

It brings a void into my stomach, a searing sensation to my palms. "… Rise, you… you shouldn't act like this." The ripples vanishing, the traces of shadows gone, I so request out of them and they easily return upwards, tension still reigning over their complexions. Tsukuyomi gestures for me to speak, resting her chin onto a hand. "What I am about to tell you is something Takeru himself asked me to keep a secret, and I expect you to also be bound by this. Promise you will not reveal this to anyone else unless necessary," she returns a nod, I cough and clear my throat. "Well… It seems Takeru has been tasked with aiding someone during his missions. I believe that might be taking its toll on him."

"… Is that someone Yashiro?" Mion asks.

"No, although, Yashiro should also work alongside this person if they're tied to his special assignments. I actually saw her for the first time this morning, but her name is Sumika Kagami."

"… Huh?" Tsukuyomi freezes once again, sending the tickle of the night's gust to my nape as her features contort, revealing quite the adusted gesture.

"Sumika… Kagami?" Mion repeats, holding her chin.

"Yes, that is her name. Takeru asked me to not mention her, so I will not say what little he told me about her. If you wish to know, speak of it with him."

"Meiya-sama… Could you describe what this woman looks like?" Shion asks, a small nod despite the tension also claiming her voice, once more seeming ready to begin a duel if so requested out of her.

"Let's see… She was almost as tall as him, she had long, vibrant red hair and a yellow ribbon. She seemed to be very emotionally unstable, however." Assuming she truly had no ulterior motives to place her hands onto him, and that there truly is nothing… odd going on here. Otherwise, well, any unpleasantries are undeserved at the moment.

Despite the silence that falls, my hands and legs move, to idle my thoughts as the cousins approach Tsukuyomi, whispering to one another, shrouding their faces as if traversing smoke. And yet, the largest source of heat in the room lurks within their eyes, kindling against which no wind can triumph.

"Ahem… Tsukuyomi, do you happen to know who this Kagami is?"

She coughs, waving at the cousins to return to their position, trying and failing to regain a neutral facade. "No, it is concerning to hear of a new face being around the cadet, is all."

"… I see." So she cannot tell me, for whatever reason. Pressuring would not be wise. "Anyways, please do not speak of her carelessly. Takeru grew upset when I, well, confronted him about who she was."

"Did he, now," she again rests fully onto the chair, swaying the frontal legs in the air, igniting further blazing. "In any case, thank you kindly for this intel, Meiya-sama."

"No, it is what I should do. After all… It was my miss what had him exhaust himself once again."

"Simply remain composed and stalwart," she advises, nodding my way, restoring a faint smile. "If he sees your honesty, Shirogane will answer to the gesture."

"I so hope. Sigh… Even if I cannot measure up to her, I am still a fellow of him so I shall aid him in whatever I can." If he can find the temperance to yet again forgive my words, even if this time it does not come as easily as before, then there is so much for us to talk about. His views of a warrior, these odd maneuvers, and… how should we proceed going forward. A-Assuming he still desires to share with me whatever it is he had with that woman, that is. Certainly, he's merely talking of being true fellows instead of mere squadmates. Yes, that must-

"Might I ask who are you speaking of when referring to 'her'?" Tsukuyomi asks, raising a brow, still swaying gently the chair in the air.

"Oh, right. I have not yet told you, have I? You see, Takeru mentioned a name after the bout, in whispers and pieces. All we spoke of makes me believe this Yohime is who bestowed upon him the-"

"What did you just-" Tsukuyomi's sudden shout is halted, she yelps as the chair tilts backwards and she falls alongside it.

"Tsukuyomi, are you alright?" I rise to my feet, extending a hand. It has been quite many moons since I've seen her fall on her own in such a manner.

Yet, I twitch and solidify upon her stare, upon the binding clasp her hands place over my shoulder the instant she regains footing. Placing her face mere inches from mine, leaving me no respite from the slaying glare. "Meiya-sama, did I heard that right? Did you just say 'Yohime'?"

"Ah, yes. Takeru mentioned that name, sounding hurt as he did so. I assume, this woman is who bequeathed upon him the Minaru Kamui?"

"There is no mistake? You are certain you've heard that name?!" She presses, fingertips delving onto my shoulders.

"W-What is it, Tsukuyomi? I would not lie to you. It is true he was whispering yet I clearly heard him apologize to this 'Yohime-san' back then," I state, holding my breath and her stare firmly, undaunted upon the incoming pressure.

Her features slowly, gradually relax into truest befuddlement as I've never seen in her before, lips parting and moving yet saying nothing, moving back, resting onto the desk while clutching her forehead. Both cousins are also flabbergasted, Shion is pinching and pulling at her cheek, enough for redness to come forth, whereas Mion is also idling a hand onto her hair.

"Um… I assume you know who this Yohime was?"

"… You are one hundred percent certain that is what you heard, Meiya-sama?"

"Yes, absolutely. Was she who gave him the Minaru Kamui?"

"My apologies, I… I cannot disclose this to you," she hastily bows down.

"Huh? Why can you not? I already know of the blade, and I shan't divulge any sensitive intel to him if that is what you're concerned about."

"You'll have to forgive me, but I cannot-"

"I've come here on my own accord, ignoring a warning from the Instructor for the sake of my fellow. I've broken my orders, giving you intel I should've withdrawn, for Takeru's sake, so that we can aid him brave through these rumors, so that you know he is no spy. While I won't press further if you truly deem it a secret, I would like you to be honest with me, Tsukuyomi. Who was that Yohime?"

She holds my gaze, folding her arms. "… I suppose, you are already old enough for this topic," she weaves through her hair, placing the chair back to its proper position, both of us sit again.

"So, Takeru seems truly fond of this Yohime. She was who bequeathed him the Minaru Kamui?"

"Their… relation is far closer than that, I'm afraid."

"… Pardon?"

"Please, remain composed. Meiya-sama, what I am about to tell you is, perhaps, enough to grant me a reprimand if you mismanage this intel. You cannot reveal this to anyone, not even under orders. Are we clear?" I gulp, taming the minimal shaking that comes forth, nodding. "Well then," her expression falls, both hands overlay atop her lap, "Yohime Amato was a rather distinguished member of our fellowship, favored by many due to her amicable and composed way of being."

"A High Shinpan, huh," I nod, licking my lips. So I was right, she was truly a high fellow. And yet, despite the reverence Tsukuyomi is giving to her memory, her way of the warrior, the one Takeru follows, differs from ours.

"Indeed. However, Yohime-sama did not meet Shirogane while being a Shinpan."

"Hm? Was she sent as a liaison to the UN?"

"No, they did not meet while in America."

"Huh? However, how did they?"

"You see… Despite some initial friction due to certain concerns over the structure of the fellowship, of the balance of power between all Shinpan Houses, Yohime-sama was bequeathed a most graceful reward for her initial spoils and affable personality…" her hands shake, lips regress. When she looks up, there is no retainer, no Imperial Guard. Only the wounded gaze of the Tsukuyomi I met all those years ago as dampness claims her sight and she sighs shallowly. "She was one chosen by Takahisa Koubuin to be his lady wife."

"… W-What? But… that means…" I gape, out of air, ears ring as she nods back at me.

"It is as you think. Yohime-sama was your mother."

…

What?

My mother?

"She was very much like you," she tells, smiling in earnest, imitating the sun, "kindhearted and good-natured, perhaps to a fault. However, I do admit you are far easier to deal with than her."

"Huh? Was she, um," I grip at my pants, a subtle shaking on my whole body, unable to look up, "as resolute as me?"

"Sigh… No, you do listen to others. There was no dissuading Yohime-sama once she made up her mind, and she was more overwhelming in forwarding her ideas. Still, you do share a striking resemblance to her. Namely, the eyes."

"My eyes?"

"Indeed. That sweetness is hers, no doubt."

"… I see. My mother… Was she also a warrior?"

She shakes her head, sighing. "No, Yohime-sama's greatest weapon were her words, not her proficiency with a blade. Meeting a certain stubborn boy who did all he could to have his way only made her verbal proficiency all the more fearsome, as she had a rival who would not relent due to her station."

"… Takeru, I assume?"

"Yes. Surely you can guess how… persuasive he could be when motivated. It was like watching two typhoons meet, their small arguments and debates," she chuckles, coiling a strand of hair, looking at a side, at nowhere while smiling. "You also possess that ability, even if you've inherited Takahisa-sama's fierce prowess with a sword far more strongly."

"Is that so… So that's who she was," I say, sniffing, wiping a lone tear which was not strong enough to depart on its own. Compacting myself, feeling feathers tickling my sides, arms, and chin, all I can do, to avoid breaking my mask, is close my eyes and let the feeling course through me for as long as it'll last.

Now, this has imparted a new shade of clarity upon his resolve. If he learned under Mother, obvious it is he would remain steadfast in his resolve to the bitter end. Perhaps, she had her own opinions as someone who did not employ blades as her main weapon. To learn her name and who she was, when I had given up on ever knowing if she still yet lived or anything about her identity. This is nothing but a blessing, and all thanks to my fateful meeting with Takeru. And to think you'd value her to such lengths, wishing to… to share that with me as well.

I cannot fault you, Takeru. I would… I would most certainly stain my hands if only for a few minutes to talk, to show them who I've become. I wonder, what would she think of me? Takeru grew most adusted, perhaps she'd shake her head at my obstinacy, at my lacking conversational skill to sail our debate to calmer waters. Mother… so I have your eyes, huh. To think I would be blessed to such lengths, to be paired with a fellow who you watched over, who learned under you, who you bestowed one of our bla-

…

Wait a moment.

Tsukuyomi has confirmed Mother was who Takeru spoke about, thus it stands to reason she was who presented the blade to him, well, or had ensured her own was delivered to his hands.

Since they held debates often, it stands to reason she would be the one who also taught Takeru about the handguard tradition.

Obviously, she also must have been who authorized him to be trained in the Mugen Kidou.

Also, it is clear how much he cherishes her, with how he wept at the island, his tone as we battled and after it.

And he did say he desired to 'share' something with me, and that I was truly similar to who the blade had belonged to.

So then, that means…

Takeru was besotted with my Mother?!

"Meiya-sama, what is the matter?" Tsukuyomi inquires, staring.

"A-Ah, no, nothing. Ahem… Could you tell me what kind… relationship Takeru had with my Mother?"

"… I'm afraid I cannot give you the specifics," she gives a small bow.

"Excuse me?" What does that mean? Why- Why would you not be able to?

"What we can tell you, however," Shion says with a gentle smile, pointing a finger up, "is that he truly loved Yohime-sama."

"… Come again?"

"Indeed," Mion nods, also giving a relaxed gesture, "we can confirm that Shirogane was truly fond of her."

"… Is that so."

"In a way," Tsukuyomi begins, looking elsewhere, sighing despite the small smile which does not sink, "one could say Yohime-sama was like a second mother to him at one point."

"… Oh. Oh… I see, of course. Ahahaha… O-Of course that's what it was," I nod, folding my arms, chuckling erratically. "Of course, as if such an age gap would have ever worked."

"What? Meiya-sama, are you-" She frowns, it makes me twitch. "You surely were not thinking what I believe you were?"

"M-My apologies! I jumped to conclusions!" I admit while fumbling my hands in defense, pointlessly trying to defuse the incoming blast of admonishment. "You see Tsukuyomi, Takeru did sound truly fond of who had given him the blade, and he even said he desired to share with me what he had with the previous holder… and considering he knows of the handguard tradition, well, I-"

"… Wait, so, it wasn't an accidental slip?" She asks, leaning forward.

"No, it did not seem so? I believe he knew who he was talking about as he, well, whispered hurtfully. He did play dumb as we exited the sim, however." How rude of you, Takeru. Yet it is obvious he would remain quiet, I am not officially a- Wait a moment. "If he remembers who Mother is… Does that mean he regained his lost memories?" I ask, and their features tense and grow grim, clouding over despite the closed-off nature of the room.

"… You are certain you did not misheard his intent?" She asks once again.

"No, I am certain. And in the event that I did, that does not change that he mentioned her name. Takeru… Takeru remembers something about Mother, however small it may be."

"I see… Sigh. Thank you kindly, Meiya-sama," Tsukuyomi gives a full bow, the cousins follow suit. "You truly have no idea how precious this intel is for us."

"No, it is nothing. I… You've given me an equally precious bit of knowledge in exchange," I smile, sighing, feeling light and about to fly. She returns the gesture, relaxing for a moment. "That being said, Tsukuyomi," I lean closer, holding her gaze, sharpening mine own," I understand the secrecy required, however, could you tell me who Takeru was before losing his memory? I assume you know, all things considered. If Mother is no more, and I assume she perished in the Empire, who was Takeru referring to? Did he obtain the Minaru Kamui here or in America?" Because that, well, changes much in those words, in whatever… relationship he desired to have with me. N-Not that I would refuse a good rivalry as a fellow, of course, but well…

She closes her eyes, heaving a sight, resting an arm onto her desk. "I'm afraid I cannot tell you. If you were to slip up, he may end up having another painful surge of memories. We must be careful about this for his mental health. So don't mention the Guard or Yohime-sama's name to him at all, let Shirogane remember on his own and then he himself shall tell you who he is."

And thus, once more we remain silent, holding each other's gaze. The stoic features, the perfect and imposing complexion of the statue reveal a wince engraved deep as she sighs from the pit upon my unrelenting stare.

"… I suppose I could tell you just a few details," she relents in a whisper, embracing her own stomach. "But under no circumstances you are to tell him of this, are we clear?" She asks, a minimal squint of her eyes, her breath captive. I do not think I've seen her this concerned over anyone except me or Sister.

"Understood. I shall keep this to myself," I give her a nod, clenching my fists in anticipation, bringing my chair slightly closer.

"First, his father was inducted into the Guard when he was little…" She proceeds to tell me of how he lost his mother and how, due to his position in the Guard, his father couldn't go to take care of him. She refused to tell me where his father was stationed, however. "And as it were, as you guessed, he was chosen to be trained under my House's care. Before he lost his memories… Takeru Shirogane was inducted into the Royal Guard."

"Eh?! Takeru is… Takeru is a Royal Guard?!" My mouth remains hanging wide open as I felt a shiver down my spine. He's… already a member of the Guard?!

"In training. Just like you," Tsukuyomi says in a firm tone as she sends a strong gaze at me.

So we're the same? We're both apprentices? You and me, it's as if we were fated to be together. For our paths to have crossed like this, two fellow apprentices in the UN. Sigh… I only hope it is not yet too late to salvage our bond, Takeru.

"So then, do you know when was he given the Minaru Kamui?"

"Sadly, I cannot speak on the matter," she affirms, holding my stare, shrugging it off.

"I see… Well, worry not, Tsukuyomi. I shall do what I can to support Takeru from my position," I nod, firmly, fully returning her gaze.

She smiles, in earnest. "Thank you, please do be patient with him. "So then," Tsukuyomi gazes at me, the hold of her interlocked fingers faltering, "was there anything else Shirogane mentioned that you believe is worth our consideration?"

"Hmm… I believe there isn't- No, wait a moment," I cover my mouth, furrowing my brows.

"What is it?" She asks, gulping and tensing her posture.

"Well, I do not wish to cause you any alarm, but there is one small matter that has been bothering me since a few days ago, actually," I admit, sighing, ruffling my hair in an attempt to rid my head of this numbness. She nods, business face restored, the cousins also listening intently. "You see, during the visit of the Undersecretary's retinue, one of my squadmates mentioned something regarding Takeru, something everyone refused to answer for some odd reason."

"What is this about? Something related to his special missions?" Tsukuyomi inquires, leaning forward, eyes sharpening.

"It very well might be, I assume. As the Undersecretary joked about, one of my comrades said that another was jealous due to being unable to have a taste of Takeru's 'special milk'."

"… Pardon?" She asks, gaping, eyes gradually widening.

"Indeed, so they said. Takeru seemed to know what they were referring to, due to his reaction," I note, groaning as I recall, lightly hitting the floor with my heels. "Then, when I requested him to spare me a cup of his milk, he vehemently refused me."

"Meiya-sama, you did what?" Shion asks, face flushing for some reason.

"What? I am most curious as of what this is about, of course. While I shan't complain about it, the synth menu is lacking in taste. So I wonder how good does Takeru's milk tastes, so I asked some as politely as possible yet he refused time and again."

"M-Meiya-sama, I do not think you should be asking for such things," Mion says, covering her face with a hand, breathing shallow.

"Whyever not? Milk is a spectacular source of vitamins, especially calcium. Having proper dairy elements in one's diet is of paramount importance, so of course I'd welcome the chance to have a sip of Takeru's milk, if he ever allows me."

"You…" Tsukuyomi slowly stands. Her eyes are twitching, hands shake as if choking a chain, simply staring is enough to make my gaze desire to flee as if a blazing oven she had become. "You young miss won't utter any such vulgarities anymore!"

"Wh- But I'm only-"

"No excuses! Meiya-sama, I forbid you from bringing this up ever again!"

"Why?! Why does everyone want to keep me away from this? Tsukuyomi… you wouldn't be planning to keep this milk all to yourself, would you?" I inquire, casting a side glance, a strike in caution.

She gapes, fingers move erratically like a madman's piano. Face flushing into a red more radical than her attire, I can only shiver at the frown she endows, the overheat which upon my figure towers.

"You shut your mouth!" She scolds, smacking the desk repeatedly. "I don't recall raising you in this way, miss. Since when do you go spouting such unproper words in the open?!"

"Unproper? Wait, were not talking of actual milk?" I raise a brow, tilt my head.

She stalls a reaction, then facepalms. "What- But- In any case! You are forbidden from speaking of this matter again!" She affirms, waving a finger at my face.

"I kept my end of the deal, I've revealed all I could," returning her glare, I hold the silence at bay despite the coldness that embraces my soles. "What is this special milk supposed to be and why does everyone want to keep me out of the loop?"

"Sigh… I suppose, this is my own fault for never having taught you of such topics," she laments, pinching her nose, sighing heavily once more, shoulders sagging like elevations of sand upon high current. Tsukuyomi huddles closer until our shoulders touch, shielding her lips with a hand. "Listen well, Meiya-sama. The, ahem, milk you were speaking of is actually…"

…

She leaves my side, sighing. "And as such, you should not mention such vulgarity ever again. Not even as a jest."

So you're telling me…

"Regardless, if anything odd occurs with Shirogane-"

I openly requested Takeru to… to let me have a taste of his…

Lips curl in, thighs meet, hands grip and crush my uniform, foggy echoes surround me.

That embrace, that odd vision in the sim room.

A ruined house with a Gekishin collapsed nearby.

A warm hold on my hand, which then envelopes my shoulders.

Gentle tickling on my ear, the view above the hill as the celestial offerings remain on full display.

" Come on, say 'Aahn'," Takeru requests, pointing a fork at me with some food on it. "What is it, Meiya-kun? If this octopus sausage isn't fitting to your palate…" he smirks, waving both brows up and down a few times, "I can offer you another type of 'sausage'."

W-What? Why would- This… Ugh… Mmh…

The breeze hits my body, tickling it all as my hair loosely falls. A fingertip, two, three, they draw circles on my nape, another hand pokes at my navel. Looking into his eyes, leaning in, my lips part… and meet his for a moment. Only a moment, as he rolls on the grass to face me, hold my right hand tenderly as if lifting an infant.

And under the starry skyline…

T-Takeru, stop… Why am I thinking of… doing such depraved things in the open of all places… while I'm in Tsukuyomi's presence… My breathing halts, legs mold, melt unto one another, it is as if I were surrounded in lukewarm steam, this ticklish feeling that refuses to surrender its grip on my insides.

He plants a kiss onto my fingers, eyes lingering on mine, causing a rebellion within my heartbeats. "This is all I am, Meiya. All I can be. I know it might not be enough to appease 1 st Lt Tsukuyomi or whatever ties you have with the IRG but… Would you give me the pleasure of being my wi-"

SLUMP!

THWACK!

"M-Meiya-sama?! Meiya-sama, please open your eyes! Can you hear me? What is- S-She's burning! You two, bring me a medpack!"

---

A/N: For further reference on how ESPers are treated within the Reversal timeline, you can go read the sidestory Eclipse Chaser.

Now, with this chapter's events we're both on track with the Komoro arc and the issues from before the rewrite. I took some liberties to try and lighten up the mood compared to the usual doom and gloom of the fic, and also to set up the rest of the arc accordingly. I don't know if the last bit works as intended, but I just rolled with it and all be damned. Silly misunderstandings aside, I hope the duality of Meiya's choice and why I'm pressing her so much on her 'resolve' is apparent now. Let's just say that a certain aspect of TDA really stroke a wrong chord in a personal level, due to a character that is absent in it that we know is in the other possible Meiya ending. And if Resonative proves me wrong, glad I made this an AU and the Mad Dog can rail me if I'm wrong about it.

Anyways, this was all for now. Thanks for reading. Stay safe.

Zuoriel

Landmines in the Masquerade

Chapter 84:

Landmines in the Masquerade

---

December 5 th. Around 11 AM.

(Yuuko's Office.)

[Yuuko]

---

Sighing with a vengeance, I sit on my chair and he remains standing. A few fingers clasp onto my chin, I spin for a second before facing the immutable expression directly. Chief Yoroi has remained oddly quiet since Pyatkh found him making his way to the office, thanks to Yashiro's warning. In his usual attire, hands in his pockets, he stands only a few steps from the desk. The small smile never changing, the hidden arrow never leaving his eyes.

"… So what is this about? Surely you didn't bring any odd souvenirs for the inspection teams, did you?"

"Oh, don't worry. I left the dodo plushy in Takeru Shirogane's hands. However, if you were wanting to get your own, I could easily-"

"Chief, get to the point. I'm terribly busy today."

"… So the dodos aren't important, huh? I wonder, when was the last time you showed me a smile for my services?" He laments, gesturing as if to wipe a non-existent tear from his desert dry cheek.

So I narrow my eyes, resting both hands on the wood along a warning of an incoming gavel. "If you don't want to be Hayase's punching bag for the next hour, start talking. I am busy, Chief. You should know why."

"Well, I was told that someone saw a few odd people following a certain group since a few days ago," he mentions undisturbed while tipping his hat downwards, losing the smile, gaining a lingering acid to his words.

"… I see. How does that relate to Alt IV?" I did expect some people to notice, but for him to come personally… Which is it? On which side are you and Her Purpleness on?

"I can understand why they would be curious," he smiles again, waving his hand as if trying to send a breeze to himself. "It seems that there was someone who had become a regular at a sushi shop in the Capital as of late. I do recall telling you of this new establishment, of how their Golden Rolls were culinary works of art."

"Oh, really? What is it with that regular?" I ask while sinking back onto my chair, not lifting my stare.

"You see, he was truly upset that the new business wasn't favored, that the rest preferred to go to the rotating kind of establishments. He often expressed that said practice was against the spirit of sushi, that has to be eaten as it's served," he nods at the end of his slow telling.

I slowly narrow my eyes as I sigh, beginning to spin on my chair. "You don't say. So that regular was upset people weren't following the traditions? Quite the tantrum for a grown man."

"No, he was upset that everyone seemed to think rotating sushi bars were the only alternative left for the business to flourish, all to please the foreigners who saw traditional sushi bars as boring and bare-bones," he couldn't hide the extra pressure of a fingertip onto the hat, acid surfacing again despite the smile never leaving. "I do agree to some extent with the proposition, waiting until the right sushi reaches my seat only to see it taken away by someone else is truly infuriating, won't you agree?"

"If I want something, I go and get it myself. If the rotary equipment has a determined serving place, I'd sit near it to not have to wait. Complaining about the system in such a way is truly childish." Barely answering, I lean on my palm as I send a side glance at him. His brows moved for a second, smile shuffling backwards.

"Well, I rather keep my inner child alive for as long as I can," he chuckles heartily, looking undaunted by my glare. I'm at my wits' end here, so hurry up and get to the damn point. "Also, one could end up eating more than what one plans to in the rotary sushi bars. Temptation is a cruel, bewitching mistress after all."

"… So, what does this has to do with Alt IV?" Stopping spinning, I let go of the chain of my face, now frowning at him and his attempts at making me trip.

He coughs, sobering up. "As I was saying, the old regulars were very upset, I'll have you know. However, after the CCSE, as sudden as a May affair, most of their movements were halted and I haven't heard them complaining as much as they used to."

"… What do you mean?" That's not what my informants have told me. Sagiri was still readying himself and his group, awaiting a spark to light up a blaze.

"So you were not involved in that negotiation?" For a second I was about to retort to his accusation, I manage to clamp my lips and tighten my hands, staring in silence. He immediately raises his hands, regaining that small, insufferable smile. "Please don't shoot the messenger. I'm merely passing the question to you."

Sighing hard, I spin slowly to lift the congestion of aggravations that wish to fly away to his ears. Shaking my head, looking at the red and white mug, I brush the pungency away and lock onto the certain trails I know of.

I have confirmed Sagiri is only a pawn, he lacks the backbone to truly perform a coup only with his loyal men. Their radical group could, theoretically, swarm the Edo Palace and that's it. As soon as the rest of the IJA starts to move, they're done for. Perhaps, killing the Prime Minister and making themselves be heard is all they're truly after. If so, their naivety is only second to their narrow-sightedness.

Still, tragedy begets opportunity. And certainly, this is a chance few would let go off. Both from within and outside our borders. Only with support from… an outside source could Sagiri get his hands on all the map charts he would need, or the man power to actually take over the Capital and fight off the Royal Guard to get to Her Highness. All relies on her accepting an audience with him, and surely he and his group already have ideas in case she were to leave the Capital.

… And something tells me I'm staring at the main piece of charcoal that's lighting up this fire. Are his words to be trusted, however?

Knowingly going through the coup despite the risks, Sagiri must have been fed up with the status quo of the other world Shirogane went through. So, despite all the differences this world has, how Shirogane confirmed it hoists a stronger nationalist ideal, as well as the possibility of a leak granting him dreams of whatever happened after Alt IV was lost in other worlds, Sagiri as of now 'seems to be quiet'?

"… I was concerned about Sagiri, yes. I do not need any accidents to happen while we're in Sadogashima. I only had him under vigilance, that's all. What's this about halted affairs?"

Chief Yoroi slowly gets closer, leaning forward and producing a small notebook from his suit, with a pencil slotted on the side of it. He quickly scribbles something and passes me the page after folding it up. A finger goes to his lips as I took the paper. Eyes only, huh?

…

Someone put pressure to enhance the agitation that was being instigated to send Sagiri towards a coup. Part of it came from a sector from the UN's Japan Branch, who are not entirely aligned with me, the same assholes that thought I'd welcome the notion of executing Shirogane for the mess of a CCSE they brought out . The other… coming from a certain extremist group, one of the core backers of the rushing of Alt V and the raid on the Original Hive. Huh, now this is interesting… So you're already moving out for blood. I chuckle for a moment, since this is unexpected as a simple program eating up all my ram. Not that such a case hasn't presented itself in my time in charge of Alt IV, but the point still stands.

"So he just… got quiet all of a sudden after being fed some intel? He isn't trying to do something on his own?"

"Indeed, what an odd occurrence, wouldn't you agree?"

"Odd? Yes. Unimportant for Alt IV's goals? Also yes."

"Hahaha… What a cruel rose you are, Professor. Certainly, such an oddity deserves more than a passing glance?"

"Not like you aren't the one passing around folders."

"Well, that is true, yet one cannot deny that a small spark is all that's required at times to start a fire."

"… I am going to send support to the relief efforts, personally. Make that clear to Her Highness and her devotees."

A slow raise of a brow, tension in the string, arrow raising. "Oh? Really, now? I was under the impression you were rather short staffed? In any case, Her Highness will be pleased with the news," he tips his hat, giving half a smile. "Still, that's only patchwork. I doubt you'd be… satisfied with such a solution," it turns into a smirk as our stares crash.

"No other accidents will occur, be sure of it Chief."

"Perhaps, what has already occurred will instead fuel this engine to life. Perhaps, it is merely biding its time. Neither of us would welcome anyone disturbing that bar, after all," he chuckles, stopping as I forward a glare.

"… I suppose you're here because you think this has something to do with Shirogane?"

"Oh, what has made you bring up his name here?" He raises a brow, a hand on his chin as he leans forward, smiling like a clown, playing his part to the tune. Whose tune, that's the question.

"Please, anyone could see where this was going. Sagiri was already aware of Ayamine's presence here, and I doubt he either knows or cares about Tamase, Sakaki, or your daughter. And there's no way he knows of Mitsurugi's real identity. So, if your own scouts say he suddenly grew cautious after being given a push, which I assume was something related to the CCSE," I stare, he returns a nod in sobriety, lips shrinking, "then I suppose he saw Shirogane's name, and that has something to do with his newfound over-caution?"

"… You know, as of late I've been unable to surprise people with my reports," he once more laments, bringing his hat to his chest, expression falling to pieces. If I didn't knew him, I'd think he truly was at the verge of tears.

"Are you losing your edge, Chief?"

"Oh, that might be the case. Even Takeru Shirogane saw through my plushy with ease," he smiles, nodding once. Seeming pleased for some odd reason as he returns to normal.

Sigh… Why did he give the plushy to Shirogane? He usually leaves the things here only to make our teams work on them pointlessly because they never have bugs. Perhaps… Trying to spur a memory to surface? Testing if Shirogane is truly himself?

… For which side? You wouldn't be thinking on harming Shirogane now, would you Chief? Would Sagiri raise in arms at the threat of Shirogane being alive once more? No, think. Was the intel on the CCSE sent due to what occurred to Ayamine? To try and spur him into defiance to the UN? Or, maybe, those who wish Shirogane to be removed from the squad wanted to put pressure to fit their goals? The Chief seemed slightly distraught at my mention of the CCSE. Meaning, the data was sent. And he was not related to that, much less pleased in the outcome.

"… So, what is your real reason to be here? What does Her Highness require of me now?"

"No, this time Her Highness isn't the one directing my moves," he returns my gaze fully, slowly tipping his hat, quietly coming closer, briefly curving the edge of his lips. "So long as Alt IV is successful, I believe Sagiri could be pacified if everything goes according to plan when Sadogashima is reclaimed. While it is true some in the IJA do not favor the UN, I doubt they would act based solely on that feeling."

"I see… So he had already gotten quieter before 'they' reinforced the pressure?"

"Indeed. I do not discard that someone sent word to spark up the hostilities in light of your announcements during the last meeting, yet I doubt that faction would simply give in so willingly."

"… Which means, one of them was in the retinues that came with the Undersecretary, and probably also present during my announcements as well. I suppose you want a list of the people that came, don't you?"

He smiles and nods, again tapping his hat. "Thanks for making my work easier, Professor. It is good to work with someone who gets to the point quickly."

"Sigh… What do I get out of this favor?" I could investigate on my own, though it makes it easier on me if he wants to lend a hand.

"Well… I can feed false intel of your choosing to certain parties, in case you wished to hide Takeru Shirogane while he remained serving the UN. As well as aid you in keeping an eye on the sushi bar, to not have your men stand out in the streets. Of course," he lowers his hat and tone, jaw tightening ever so slightly, "if you would desire to place your own spark upon the establishment, I suppose I could acquiesce."

"… I guess this works for our mutual benefit. I'll have Pyatkh give you the list before you leave, and I'll contact you when I wish to have you keep your end of the deal," I tell, hand on my chin, as I stare. He nods, placing the hat on his chest as he then makes a small bow.

"Thank you kindly, Professor. However, there is one matter that must be addressed to raise the coming operation's chances of success to a degree many will be comfortable with."

"… And that is?"

"The cases of BETA appearing in the mainland. According to my informants, there were some… victims to these stray appearances after the last mission, thanks to some high ranking officers not sending the right support when it was needed," he gives a short, fleeting sigh, I roll my eyes as I also do. Shirogane won't let me hear the end of this if he finds out. Great. Wait…

I never told him of the BETA attacking isolated settlements, did I? I wonder if he knows anything… He did mention the BETA attacked the base, how they surfaced almost by our defenses' side in the mails he sent me about the Sadogashima mission of his last loop. Yet he has not mentioned anything about this incident. Dammit, I should have asked him about this before. No matter, we're still safe. If Sadogashima goes better and we don't lose Model B this attack will be thwarted with ease and minimal losses.

I still would like you to be completely open with me, Shirogane. But we'll talk at large tonight, don't worry.

"You seem… to be pondering something important, Professor." I look at him again, still smiling as his ballista readied itself, tensing his brows before shooting. "For such thorns to raise in threat, what could be troubling our one and only Professor Kouzuki? Do you happen to possess any intel you would be willing to share?"

"… No, I am merely reviewing my moves to ensure Operation 21st succeeds. Moreover, the UN doesn't have authorization to move out in the western side of the Empire and doing so might upset some of the more avid loyalists in the IJA. Furthermore, the crew of Yokosuka should be the one dealing with the scouting."

"Still, perhaps the A-01 could aid in these endeavors?" He tilts his head, the glint of the bolt openly visible in his eyes.

"They're readying themselves for the mission full time. I don't do charity, Chief."

"Well, perhaps, you could send them undercover along the pigeons to the relief-"

"I don't do requests, Chief. You should be grateful I haven't deported Shirogane and accepted to aid the relief efforts, after all the mess of the last few days," I remain composed, my voice level and my expression neutral, a rampart of dry ice.

I don't know what caused him to be suddenly suspicious, but I can't, I won't show him anything. You made me trip multiple times since we met, I'm not going to keep letting you gain intel from me in the same way.

"… Surely you can't risk the BETA suddenly surfacing in Niigata while the Sadogashima operation is on-going?" He suggests, slow.

"I can manage just fine, thank you. I am making plans to counter any and all setbacks that might present themselves." And if Shirogane starts cooperating, then we're all set.

I narrow my eyes, fingers joining as I rest my elbows on the desk. He holds my gaze, bolts and arrows ready to come out yet restrained for now. If he insisted on solely the relief efforts, I could understand. But aiming his shots at the stray BETA… Warning or threat? Still, he does have a point in that I can't overlook this situation.

According to Shirogane's notes of his past experience, the BETA attacked the base after Op 21st coming straight from Gunma, hiding under the ground, and using our tactics to boot, possessing knowledge of how to deactivate an S-11. While we tested that the Reactor hasn't transferred our intel to the BETA yet, the Sadogashima Hive's tunnels can reach the mainland now so we have to take it down as soon as possible before they launch an invasion behind our defenses, even if Shirogane affirmed nothing like that happened in his first loops after Iceberg, despite refusing to elaborate on what actually happened until I give him an answer. And the possibility of them launching an attack as of now, after we're having the 00 Unit connect to the Reactor and after all the tests I did to guarantee that no data was leaked, is a certain threat.

A threat I can use to my advantage. So long as the BETA are breathing down our necks, Sagiri won't be foolish enough to do a coup, I believe. And come next year Alt IV will be showing off results left and right, giving the Empire more recognition and lifting the burden of the tight defense lines from their shoulders. Once the situation for the general population improves, he won't have most of his current backers within the IJA. If Alt IV proves itself superior, America might openly accept it as the best plan and thus Sagiri's lifelines will vanish into thin air.

Of course, I do not believe the other players will remain idling by. It's a matter on what is best in the long term. Gaining the IRG's support would mean much, more so if somehow power is restored to the Shogunate. Simply saving Her Purpleness should be enough to gain her blessing, what with Shirogane's-

---

Right. Shit… Could I somehow convince him to stay despite the coup? I have not had any dreams nor odd feelings creeping into me yet. Despite my pressure, he remained steadfast in the four options he forwarded. Without him… I still can go through the coup, gain the Empire's support. Yoroi here would truly be on my side then. Taking cards to prevent this, to counter the people Shirogane desires to strike down… if linked back to me, it could easily backfire. Not to mention, the ripples we'd have to deal with afterwards.

"… You seem to be pondering the state of things very thoroughly," he notes, sober and lacking any tint to his tone. "I had thought you to already be aware of the terrain's look. Please, those bladed thorns are ruining your complexion, Professor."

"I'm merely weighing my options, Chief. Much rides on the Sadogashima mission."

"And precisely because of that, I believe that it would be in your best interests to solve this issue now, with all due respect," he affirms, clashing his gaze with mine with the habitual inexpressive mask he wears off.

"I think it's quite fair to affirm that moving carelessly could, and will, cause a domino effect. I highly doubt Sagiri is what we are both truly concerned about," I scoff, shaking my head as he starts to chuckle.

"Ahaha, you're truly a sharp, cruel rose. However, it would be a shame if all the efforts you've put into gaining Her Highness' favor were to crumble due to a sudden paradigm shift."

"… Surely you wouldn't be trying to use me for your own agenda, would you Chief?" I accuse, tone slowing down.

"Perish the thought. I merely find the timing of this deceleration odd, and very perplexing."

Ge again smiles, slowly waving a hand as if it were a candle's flame, gazing at the maps on the wall, to what in the east lies.

"If anyone wanted to strike at your project, now would be the most opportune time. Yet, everything seems to be rather… calm, eerily so, compared to how everything looked in the field but moments ago. And if anything could reignite the tension, that is the stray BETA that randomly appear after an attack."

Tipping his hat, hiding his eyes, he leans on the wall as his telling slow downs, drenched in acid.

"The IJA will claim the defense lines were useless, that cramping the population within the shelters was meaningless, that the UN was deceiving them. Maybe then they'll release the reports of the destroyed villages in the radios or through a broadcast, claiming the UN was pressuring them to keep quiet and that Sakaki's cabinet was in league with these efforts."

Quite the elaborate description for what could occur, huh.

"So, you're saying they could rally their troops against us despite the fact that the BETA might still attack during this… petty infighting?" I inquire, causing tension and animosity to well up. The lower lip seemed to be forced to retreat within as he relents a nod. "Well, while the warning is appreciated, there is little we can do against that, can we? If Sagiri do desires, they can and will use the stray BETA as a spark and no report will deter them." After all, if the BETA threat did not stop them during Shirogane's last experience, it certainly won't in this world. "There is one thing you can be sure of, Chief. No rebel will stop Alt IV from starting," I affirm, smirking.

"However, if said unrest made its way to the UN's Security Council-"

"Stop beating around the bush, Chief. What are you truly after? My help in… suppressing these soldiers before they act? You know that we can't take an open political position."

"… I already said I came here on my own, and I do not wish to have you start a fight with the IJA."

So you don't deny that you want the fight to occur, just that you don't want us to be the ones who start it, huh… Seems like Shirogane's notes also apply for this world, Chief Yoroi did leak the plans of Her Highness' escape from the Capital and seemed to be playing as a double agent, to the point that he had to 'vanish' and his daughter was taken in for questioning.

"Then, get to the point before I lose what little remains of my patience." I lean back on my seat, placing a hand on my chin, firing off a glare.

He endures the drizzle, not breaking eye contact. "While I was tasked with delivering a pair of items here, there were another set of reasons for me to take the time to do so now. First, I believe you do need to deal with Sagiri in one way or the other. After the… tensions sparked by the Yukon Incident, I believe we'll both agree that America wishes to stabilize the Far East Frontline."

"Nothing will occur so long as no spark can lift off. And if the stray BETA are revealed, that is something that will affect more than just the Empire." Though, I know a few who would welcome the spreading chaos that would ensue. "Yet, I will not risk the first move. The UN won't involve itself in the Empire's inner matters, even if I were to request an investigation."

He nods, once more smiling. "Precisely. There are some strings you can pull to calm down the regulars of the sushi bar, though."

"For example?"

"Well, I heard they actually dislike natto rolls, very much so. If they were restored to the menu, I'm certain they'd have to do a double take. Not even the snake would dare to reach for the apple, since it dislikes the strong smell of natto."

"… What?"

"Hm? Oh, you don't know? Interesting…"

"Chief, you have two minutes to explain yourself."

He immediately raises both hands in defense, chuckling so erratically, so annoyingly. "I believe you already know what I speak of. But I'll cut to the chase," he straightens his suit, undaunted steel meeting my gaze, "you could send Shirogane to the Capital. His presence alone would be deterrent enough."

"… I am not going to use my protegee in such a way. I assume you are aware of his… ties?"

"A trainee of the Tsukuyomi House, mysteriously returning from Death's door as a UN cadet. The horror tale practically writes itself," he once more lets out a chuckle, that stops short as I begin to, very slowly, tap my papers while glaring. "Ahem… You could mend two issues with this action, in my opinion."

So this is what you're truly after. Quite foolish of you, Chief. Do you think you can try and harm my bodyguard?

"Interesting proposition. Do you think his name would be enough to strike fear in the valiant Sagiri?" I ask, leaning forward along a smile. "Despite how you warned me to dispose of him before?"

"Well, anyone would be shocked to see a dead man walking again," he deadpans, nodding a few times.

"And that could cause quite the commotion, don't you think? This is a delicate issue, that I shall oversee. Shirogane won't be leaving to the Capital any time soon. Furthermore, I don't think he would-"

"Oh, I do believe Takeru Shirogane would welcome the notion to visit the Capital," he tells, a faint smile.

"What makes you affirm that?"

"Because I left a letter in Takeru Shirogane's hands."

"… What? From who?"

"You can speak of it with him, if you're so inclined."

Hitting the desk, standing up, my teeth remain closed for a second, keeping the tidal vulgarities at bay. "… And who authorized you to do as you please in my base? Shirogane is off limits, Chief." He says nothing, doesn't move, and remains returning my gaze as if a statue he were. "Answer me, who sent the letter?"

"… I am not UN, so I simply took my liberties. Also, Her Highness has already expressed her wishes to have Takeru Shirogane regain his memories. I wonder why you're so riled up about this…"

"Hmph… I am concerned, since he might have another shock as before. I'd be foolish to not be taking his mental health into consideration."

"Quite odd, coming from you," he chuckles, slower than before, "who would have said you'd grant a shield of petals to him."

"Who sent the letter? I am not asking again."

"I suggest you to talk about this with Takeru Shirogane, and proceed as you believe is best after hearing his thoughts."

Rough and dry, inflexible as my equations' numbers. Ruthless and cold, without caring a single bit about my needs or position, only caring about the right result. Heh, people can be just as, if not colder, than my research is to me, after all.

"I will remember this little… mischievous act of yours, Chief," I smile as I sit down, resting onto a still tight fist. "If something is wrong with Shirogane after he reads this little letter… I'll make sure you repay me, and him, for your carelessness."

"I shall accept any punishments or requests you place on me. You were the one who taught me not to hesitate when reaching out for my goals, after all," he then chuckles, I cannot help but to mimic him.

Though, our laughter is dry, restrained in our throats. And our smirks, twisted in their edges, are but a wordless confirmation on our dissidence. Of course, his loyalty lies with Her Purpleness after all. No… To the Shogunate would be more accurate.

"Well, the other reason I am here today is this," he takes out a small data pad from his suit, placing it on my desk. "Here is the confirmation of all troops that will take part in the coming operation, as well as the most recent intel on our sightings of the BETA in the mainland and Sadogashima. The IJA will place most of its military might at your service, and both the Navy and the Army are more than ready to lay down their lives to earn humanity's first victory if you gain the approval. Both the Shogunate and the Diet have forwarded their appeals and answers to your prior announcements, expect a formal document to be coming through the official channels shortly."

"… You could have saved valuable time for us both had you had gotten to the point, you know?"

"Haha, what can I say? I love monologuing," once more smiling for a moment, he places both hands within his pockets as a statue he becomes again. "As for my own reason to be here… I am of the opinion that, considering this odd step back that was taken, you should watch your shadow quite carefully. Many are the people pleased with your developments, but many more are those whose expectations have been dashed."

"So, basically, what I was already doing." However, if they gave up on Sagiri, it might mean their catalyst could have changed to fit the new board we created. "And I suppose that you have certain… interests vested in how this is resolved."

"Ahaha… I cannot best your eyes, it seems." So the notes do apply to this world too. Now it's a matter of whether we are on the same side or not. "If you ever require my services, all you need to do is call. Also, I insist on you sending some help to investigate this matter of the stray BETA. Not only for my own wishes, but for yours as well."

"… I'll keep it in mind. Anything else?"

"Not from me. I suppose Takeru Shirogane will come with the news in due time," he chuckles, until I frown and lean forward. "All I'll say is, solving the issues of his citizenship should be your priority, regardless of how you'd favor to deal with the sparks."

"You say he has enemies that are coming after us?" How odd, they never revealed much about him. What is it with him now? "Out with it, who is it?"

"… It's the opposite, actually," scratching his head, he chuckles, dryly. "I heard your talks with the General and Her Highness weren't exactly smooth sailing?" I sigh, shaking my head as I roll my eyes. "Ahaha… I don't think anyone will insist on him leaving the base as before, so rest assured in that. Her Highness does not oppose him working for the UN."

"Well, that is a good bit of news." Didn't seem like she was on board with that idea, at all, however.

"Yet, there are some that desire to see him, confirm for themselves he truly is alive and that he indeed is who he claims to be. Oh, and do not worry. We are working to keep trouble away from your horizon, Professor. No one wants such a beautiful rose squinting her eyes so," he affirms, again with that insufferable smile as he gives a small bow.

"Siiigh… Is Her Highness asking for another meeting, then?"

"… No, but not everyone is as patient as Her Highness or the Tsukuyomis, nor do many see you in such a good light as her."

"… Is that so?" The feeling is mutual, then.

If the Guard keeps pressuring us, Shirogane might react negatively. If he favored their aid, then he'd have welcomed the notion, suggested that to me. And yet, he hasn't said anything. Perhaps, because he's still waiting on my answer. In any case, I need to know what was in that letter and who wants to see him. He's… a too valuable asset to be hindered by these fools. Much less now that the 00 Unit is ready to be tuned, even if it overloaded itself again on our first test. I need him… operating at his full capabilities, so I cannot let anything burden Shirogane any more.

"Shirogane is currently required to stay here, focused on the missions. He isn't leaving anywhere, and he won't be meeting anyone from the Guard besides Her Highness or the ones watching over him. Feel free to tell that to whoever sent you to deliver the letter," I smirk, leaning forward, "and don't dare to repeat this, Chief. My patience only lasts so long."

"… I believe I might not want to push further." And you chose right, Chief. "By the way, might I ask about that device he has on his head?"

"… It's there to help him keep his migraines in check, that's all." I stand up, going to make me some coffee, grabbing a small cupcake.

"I see. So, regarding the matter of-"

"I'll send some scouts, if I can spare them and our aid is welcomed. Preparing for Sadogashima is my priority, as should be yours."

"… Indeed. Oh, before leaving, I'll leave you a-"

"Bring out another stuffed bird or a weird rock and I'm calling the Valkyries," I lunge for my communicator with the haste of Yashiro's running speed when faced with carrots.

"Ahaha… I have nothing on me. Please drop the comms, Professor," he requests, voice lowering as does his head, both hands once more up and trying to appease. I do so slowly as I narrow my eyes, he softly sighs, placing a lone finger over the rim of his hat as he looks at nowhere. "Ahem… Simply allow me to give you a bit of advice. She can be very stubborn, and I believe she won't stop insisting until you allow her to visit the base."

"… Who are you talking about?"

"The woman that sent a letter to Takeru Shirogane. Watch out for her, she also has a short temper as you do and it would be a shame if the relations with the Guard worsened all of a sudden."

"… That was a threat," I affirm, giving a chomp to the cupcake.

"No, it wasn't. If he truly is Takeru Shirogane…" his eyes gradually close, massaging his chin he exhales through his nose, "then, you should have nothing to worry about. He should know the truth, it won't do him good to remain in the dark for so long, especially if you desire to have the pigeons graduate and take part in Op 21st."

"That is for me to decide," I glare at him squinting my eyes, "as his current tutor," I add a second later. "Shirogane hasn't said he wants to learn of his past, and so, I see no reason to force the situation when it could backfire."

"Is that so? I wonder, why have you left the rumors unchecked then?"

His eyes look right into mine for a moment, that same coldness, that same harshness, that same arrow aimed right at my throat. I return the glare, slowly eating the cupcake and silently retaliating towards his wordless accusation.

"… I'll call Pyatkh to escort you out, and to give you the list you were wanting. I expect to hear back from you if you find anything suspicious about anyone."

He strongly places both hands on his suit as he straightens it up, gives a smile, tips his hat with a single finger and bows to me, departing without his traditional wordplay. I call Pyatkh and relay the orders to her as he leaves, sitting down and swallowing what was left of the cupcake as I start to spin.

… So, someone big is coming after Shirogane and the Chief still doubts that he's their Shirogane while also thinking I'm keeping him from the truth. I assume, someone was not very pleased with Her Purpleness' answer to let him stay here. Sigh… Nothing I can do, save for preparing for whoever it is that wants to poke their nose where they shouldn't, to try and take him off my side . And more loyalists to boot, great.

I assume, must be someone tied to his old squadron in the Guard. Someone from the Koubuin fellowship, that probably took part in Lucifer. Quickly flaring my PC to life, flashing past pointless reports and pop ups, I begin my search. Option one is the other Tsukuyomi, the one that came to deliver spare parts to the Blood squad. However, she has been serving Ikaruga since a few years before the invasion. Chances are, she's not on Shirogane's side. The females from the Kisaragi that could have met Shirogane are all dead, the ones from the Guren family are stuck in offices. They do not strike me as the type that would challenge me, going by what my crew says of the meetings. So that leaves-

"… The leader of the Strike Force," I say as the profile comes up, inhaling sharply and tasting iron.

Raiho Amato, leader of the Chain Squadron. I believe, she was in charge of some food plant project the UN wanted a piece of during the invasion. She stalwartly refused any cooperation, and to her credit the deals she has secured do seem to be on their way to fruition. I don't… have a particularly pleasant view of the woman, however. If I recall correctly, she was one of the strongest opposing voices to my directives during the invasion, to take the defense lines further back, to have the IRG work alongside the UN and IJA.

… And if my sources don't lie, she was behind the fall of-

…

"No… You gotta be kidding me."

Quickly typing, smashing the keys in a flurry, the result of the search voids me of air. There is a blank in her squadron's formation. I'm sure Shirogane is this missing member of the Chains. But then, that means… he was involved in the fall of Mogami?

… Chief Yoroi warned me of possible enemies, of how his presence could work as a deterrent. After all… that squadron was said to show neither justice nor mercy to the wicked. If Sagiri is the smokescreen, and the Chief chose to be frontal about it then, what lies in between the lines? Wait, the snake and the apple. Are you telling me-

"… Is EDEN trying to worm their way back into the Empire? Damn it all," I hit the keyboard, exiting the window, causing something unrelated to come to the front. I already have enough with the softer side of the cult, this is-

Could this be a mirror, a parallel to the events of another world? If I could gain even some small memory, regardless of how small, I could try and adapt the landscape. And yet, I find myself slumping onto my seat.

"No matter how much I try, I've no idea who could have written that dumb poem. Siiigh… I haven't noticed anything odd, my absorption of radiation hasn't changed either."

That being said, where is Shirogane? Why didn't he contact me about this letter? Let's see… my inbox doesn't have anything from him or Yashiro. He… wouldn't be thinking on meeting this woman, would he? No, what was he doing until now? Considering this threat… Why have you not come to me already?!

No, that doesn't matter. I inhale deeply, feeling the smell of the coffee before I drink it as I slowly sit down. I'll send him on a special mission if things look bad. I cannot lose such an important… resource, without him I can't tune the 00 Unit. The Guard can't be so idiotic to do something against me now when the mission is so close, even if Her Purpleness gets all riled up about how I'm handling 'her stepbrother'. Once the waters are calm, I'm certain they'll welcome a proposal to ensure no further outside interference can strike back at the project.

However, Shirogane did say something interesting about regarding their relation… A difference between 'Yuuhi' and 'Her Highness'. Perhaps, that is the reason why they're insisting so much. I can only wait until he comes and tells me of what the letter said. Still, I need to give him an answer soon… and if EDEN is in the picture, then I should try and bring stability sooner rather than later. To allow an intervention would be suicide, even if the US begins to support my project. Not to mention, I can only parley so much with what few Alt IV supporters, or Alt V decriers to be exact, I still have in the US.

Finishing my coffee and eating another cupcake, I spin in my chair, spinning and spinning, closing my eyes and fully resting my neck onto the cushioning.

"… You sure do like leaving me in wait as of late, Shirogane."

---

Same Day. Around the same time.

(Office. Camp Ichigaya, Tokyo.)

[Naoya]

Straightening the papers, I sort today's report before stashing it within a folder. Sigh… It is so disgusting, how they shift the blame onto the delivery services when we never receive enough supplies. Oh, but the 'favored' bases get their shipments in time. And of course the high political class has all their necessities covered. Is it so hard to give just a tiny more support to our people?

"Worst of all is, if the Capital Defense Regiment is in such state, what is left for the rest?"

What of our fellows in Kyushu? Of those holding the line near the possible attack lines coming from Sadogashima?

I walk to the window, basking in the incoming sunlight, in the busy streets of Tokyo. From here, it's almost as if there were no war. People are still working, walking to their everyday jobs, holding the line in our capital. Be it those who tend to the food centers, the shelters, the schools, the toll is beginning to show. Is there truly no other way… than to risk their lives in rebellion?

… What good is a blade that so simply surrenders to violence? Am I lacking resolve, perhaps? To merely live on in this monotonous dread would be equal to death, and yet… Can I so easily surrender their future, risk it all in hellfire and smoke? I will most certainly perish, yet those I leave behind… Will the melting snow serve to breathe new life onto our soil? Will it mingle and mix with the spilled blood into an amorphous corruption instead? Regardless, if this emergency evacuation we've heard about does come to pass, the shelters won't be able to hold out. To leave the people in meager excuses for tents, out at the elements' mercy…

"… Is there truly so little empathy left in your soul, Prime Minister?"

At the very least, I should reserve my judgment until Her Highness has spoken. We have a duty to ensure her conference proceeds smoothly, and cleansing my mind of clouds should be my-

"Captain," I hear her voice alongside a knock on my door.

"Enter," The figure of my second-in-command, 1st Lt Sayoko Komaki, takes some steps into my office, giving me a salute and standing in attention. "At ease. What is the matter?"

Not altering her firm posture, she takes a few steps forward. "I have come with two reports for you, sir. First, our contact in America has brought some papers for you," she holds up two dark gray envelopes in offering, which I take and start breezing through. "And second, our informants have confirmed that the UN will be lending their troops for the relief efforts."

"What? Are they… planning to forcefully remove our fellows from their rightful land?"

She shakes her head, immutable despite the small pursing of her lips. "We do not have confirmation on their intent. However, our sources seem to indicate that they're willing to send a few TSFs to the mission."

"I see… I can only hope some meager decency remains in those halls. Do we know from where the aid comes?"

"No, my apologies, sir," Sayoko bows down, tightly veiling her sight. "We were unable to receive a conclusive answer."

I pat her shoulder, giving a smile. "Such oppression in not deserved, you hold no blame, 2nd Lt Komaki," I affirm, she straightens once more and nods. "However, that does not equal we can relax just yet. Even if they're lending us a hand, it's the method which makes the madness. Our scouts are still vigilant, I assume?"

"Of course, sir. In that regard, I wish to inform you of something that caught my attention."

"What is it?"

"There were some people snooping around the perimeter of the base, as well as the sushi bar our fellows frequent while on leave," she notes, further tension to her already serious expression, arms bolted to her sides. "It is not a rare sight for some of the civvies that still choose to live nearby to come near the base, but these two individuals remained staring at the building, and from different places too as they moved around. I believe someone sent them to monitor our moves."

"Do you think our real intentions were leaked?"

"No, I doubt anyone in this base would betray you, sir. However, it is clear someone is wary of us," she looks down, tapping her glasses, "perhaps, due to the slowness of our movements of late."

Sighing, I face the window, meeting the dejection of the reflection. "… I cannot deny that," after all, we are merely pieces on the board. If it's not us, it will be another. "I trust in your instincts Komaki, so have some of ours perform a few surveillance patrols around the terrain every now and then. Don't do it all the time, we must not let them know we're suspicious of anyone."

"Yes, sir!"

"Also, did we already receive any news of the next budget?"

"Yes, it does seem like the Prime Minister will once more cut part of the Restoration Project, to use the money to rearm the western front," she informs, trying to remain composed, failing to tame her brows and lips.

"Heh, using some of their own money is out of the equation."

It's always the same. No matter the face, all of them are corrupt to the core. Just like how Shukaku-san was betrayed by politicians, those same corrupts are thriving on our suffering, leeching off our resources. But if I don't time my moves… the BETA will eradicate us. If another large herd comes our way while we fight, that which we desire to safeguard will fall. And that, that will be nothing but the toll of the final bell. Is this all I can accomplish?

"… When it is time for actions and not words, you should force the clouds to part with your own damn hands. If you ain't got the balls to do what's necessary, kindly fuck off the battlefield and go back to the reports, 1st Lt Sagiri."

The adusted voice returns, the pressure of the blaze. With war as its cloak, thriving amidst the carnage, that echo still resides within my ears. A frown is hewn into my features once more, carved deep into my soul.

"Sir, with all due respect," Sayoko calls, a hesitant and slow step forward, her eyes unable to rise and meet mine, "isn't this the most appropriate time to launch our offensive? The BETA's last attack in Niigata proved the frailty of our defenses, and now this evacuation only confirms our suspicions. We could easily-"

"And risk having another Shura's Dance?!" A shout left me, fueled by cinders of days past. Her lips clamp shut, she hastily dives into a deep bow in apology. "Raise Komaki, I didn't meant to let my woes to affect my voice." Sighing, I take off my glasses, rub my eyes for a moment. "I understand your feelings, but we must never underestimate the BETA. And if we start our plan now, the people won't take our side. It will seem as if we were kicking the government when they're weak, we'll be giving them a chance to victimize themselves, to seek support from the UN and the US. And I think I know what's in these folders…"

If that name from the new recruit was no mistake… Did you make a deal with the Devil? Or perhaps, your sins were so grave you were even denied the eternity of nothingness?

Shaking my head, I pace to my seat. "We might be playing as their pawns, but that doesn't mean we will follow their moves to the letter. Patience is key, Komaki. We must execute the valor that is discretion, until the time is right."

"Yes, forgive my rudeness, Captain," and again, Sayoko bows in apology.

"Please… It is alright. You may leave."

"Isn't there anything else you require of me? I could aid you sort these new reports, if you so wish," she proposes in a hushed tone, locking her gaze with mine.

"Sigh… Sit down, let's take a look at these documents together. Two heads think better than one." I nod and walk up to the other end of the room, preparing some coffee for the both of us.

As we drank, we discussed the data Sauber had sent us. It's clear he is not entirely false in his words, as what he tells aligns with our own intel. Even if this insistence is also born out of interest, I don't believe his words about desiring to offer honest aid. We are, truly, nothing but pieces on a board, but even so there is some merit to being a pawn. At the least, we can endeavor to athwart their plotting. It's all a matter of whether Her Highness will welcome the chance to free herself we shall offer.

As me and Komaki plan possible routes to surround the new Capital, brainstorming possible scenarios and double checking our allies' positions on a map, a page on the second folder cautches my attention.

Or, to be more precise, halts my heartbeat for a moment. I felt my throat twist on itself as the shock jolted my insides. A request for a report on someone Sauber didn't have any data on, couldn't find anything about.

"Captain? What is the matter?"

I quickly type the name into the databases and a profile shows up. Once more, my breathing halts as I stare, not believing what pops up on the screen. I take my glasses off, rub my eyes and look at the screen again. The writing does not change.

So you're truly back from the grave… Now of all times, this cannot be a coincidence. Why must you reappear at this moment, Black Fire?

"Captain, whatever is the problem?" Komaki's shoulders grew smaller as she gazes at me, seeming to be holding her breath. She rarely shows her inner feelings, so I take a deep breath to calm myself down and shake my head.

"I simply saw… someone I hadn't seen in a long time." I say, ripping the page apart, closing the site in my PC. "I'll handle the second folder on my own, 2nd Lt Komaki. It would be suspicious if you were to stay too long in my presence from the eyes of the few unaware ones here."

"… Yes, Captain," she immediately stands and salutes me, not inquiring about my sudden decision, and leaves after bowing by the door. Sigh… What would I do without her, really.

But, then again, what is the meaning of this? Why is a dead man walking? And why you, of all people?

"Takeru Shirogane… You truly are a revenant, I suppose," I cannot help but to chuckle at the state of affairs.

Quickly reopening his profile, only minimal intel remains in the report. Alaska, huh. Was he truly overseas or is this all lies? The beast that destroyed Mogami Base in a single night, the Black Fire that which surges after the Red Lightning. Shirogane, Chain Three, despite being of common descent was perhaps the most dreadful member of the Strike Force.

Does this mean… the UN is against us? I doubt I could get any insight on him without drawing eyes onto me, and I cannot do that. I already risk myself by sending those letters to Kei… Wait, that's it! According to this data, he's stationed at Yokohama. As a cadet, for some unexplainable reason. Well, he always favored the shadows, that much is true. I could at the least warn Kei of him, try and keep her safe. But does this mean the UN is cooperating with Shirogane?

Wait… A sudden approval to send aid to the relief efforts, despite the rather lack of cooperation between the UN and our forces of late. Is this your doing? Did he gave up on struggling from the inside? Or, on the contrary, is he operating in the UN for his own gains? Predicting his moves is a futile effort, that much is true.

"Sigh… This threat completely changes the landscape. The smallest push, the faintest spark… if he's showing himself openly again, it can only mean one thing," I shudder, frozen slugs spilling through my back, dripping all over me. The icy pain of the cold shower I endured during the invasion's worst days, the desire to curl up assails me.

Back before the invasion was fully repelled, I was tasked many 'favors' to cover Kei's trails. And of those, the ones I loath the most are the ones regarding you, Shirogane. Those first months of '99, having to 'cover' your missions…

… The instinct to puke comes up again when remembering how his squad even attacked some of my comrades, saying they were traitors involved in backroom deals. I knew those people better than them, there was no way anything of the sort happened! The Lt Col of Mogami Base was a very respected man, framing him with charges of selling and producing illegal drugs was nothing but the lowest a warrior could do. And according to some, there were some more awful charges pressed onto him.

I do agree with some of his targets, but to execute our fellows without trial… to use the cruelty of war for his own ends…

" Don't make me waste my time. It's clear as day, these bastards were involved in illegal acts that amount to treason towards our nation."

Always the same answer. 'Treason to the Empire', the perfect excuse no one could argue against without bringing about a brand upon oneself. And when pressed for clarification-

" I have no reason to tell you the specifics, soldier. I'd suggest you to open your eyes and take a clear look at who stands by your side, but you have to wear glasses to even see…"

Gulping what was left of my coffee, I again stand and open the window, feel the breeze rustle and wash over me as I light a cigarette. Simply standing, I look at the sky, at the clouds which threaten with covering it all again.

I concede some people were not worth my trust. But for someone so young, so ruthless, to be given such power… Why? A casualty of the war that only furthers the chain of pain, that's what he was. Even if his searing wrath cleansed a path forward, there is much regret left in the ashes.

And yet, standing here, watching at the city, at what we managed to protect, I realize that, perhaps, you were just like me, trying to brave the despair. If results are absolute, I suppose the future generations are to decide if our struggles were worth it or not. And yet, is there someone who can truly judge right from wrong within the desperation of carnage?

"And when our guard was down, we both did see eye to eye. Suffering only begets suffering, it is a venom that corrupts the mind, erodes the soul. More so in these times, where even the smallest elevation another may enjoy gives plentiful reasons for spite to fester like a disease."

A disease there is no cure for, a bewitching whisper which one cannot ignore at times. The desire to strike back, to lash out. Every time we hold a meeting, this meager office is barely able to hold all that mire within its four walls. It overflows, it sinks its fangs through the flesh, straight at the heart. Discontent which morphs to anger, anger which evolves to hatred. Had I not been taught under Shukaku-san I, too, would have fallen to such a cesspit. A cesspit you employed as a fuel source at times, Black Fire.

"And yet, looking at our current dilemmas… Perhaps, it simply has to be this way. I've carved my own path, you followed your wrath, and yet we met the same dead ends," letting out a puff of smoke then closing the window, I drag my feet back to the report, the request for intel Sauber forwarded. "If this is the landscape you fought against, maybe… we are far more similar than I thought."

To ensure yesterday never becomes tomorrow. That is what he always said whenever I pressed for answers.

Under that hope, perhaps I could eternally rest under the bloodstained snow. Would marching for my ideals despite the risks find some meaning? On which side would you stand if I raise a banner to war? Or is bloodshed all you desire to bring about?

Ring! Ring!

Hm? I wasn't expecting a call at this hour…

"Hello, Captain Sagiri speaking."

"Good afternoon, Captain. Might I borrow some of your time?" A small voice resonates from the other side of the line, I straighten up instinctively.

"Of course, 1st Lt Kobayashi. What is the matter?"

"We of the Royal Guard stationed here in Hibiya have been ordered to move out to assist the western front for the time being. Thus, there will be some shuffling of patrols near the Palace during the press conference. A report should be arriving to Ichigaya to update you on the IRG's positions. Considering how short staffed we already are, I decided to inform you ahead of time, so that you can hasten the commands."

"I see. Thanks for the intel, 1st Lt. Best of luck in your coming endeavors."

"Yes, likewise."

"If I may, what has caused this last minute arrangement? It is odd to hear such an important matter relayed in such haste, mere hours before the conference."

"Apologies, Captain. As you perhaps already know, the UN's aid has given us some… leeway to deal with certain pressing matters, is all," she says, composed and stable. "By the way, Captain," she asks, lowering her tone ever so slightly, "a bird told me someone rather suspicious presented itself at your base's gate at dawn break. Do you know anything about it?" Is she… suspecting me? I suppose the Royal Guard does want to avoid any kind of infighting after all. Also, damn you, Sauber. Be more careful next time.

"No, I was not aware of such happenings. I will ask around, just to make sure nothing is wrong in the base. Thanks for the tip, 1st Lt Kobayashi."

"It is nothing. It will be much appreciated if you can find out what was that about. Now then, until another time, Captain," She cut the call, without changing her sharp yet kind sounding tone.

If the Guard were watching over me… Does that mean you want to neutralize me, Shirogane? If he is the one behind this- No, he's in the UN as of now. Furtheemore, he knows no moderation. If I were in his sights, there would be no words left to speak. Yet, this sudden movement from the Chains is extremely suspicious. Not to mention, there has been some other oddities after the Defense of Niigata.

I might need to call Saito for intel and hope that mysterious caller contacts me again. For the time being, patience is my ally. I cannot show weakness, I must ensure my fellows remain composed in front of the adversity. Faltering isn't an option, not with the threat of the Black Fire on the horizon and the Red Lightning on the loose.

… And whatever lies buried in Kitanomaru as well.

---

A/N: Answering MonkeTitan's question, while Alt III is top secret, remember that the Pickles were part of the Swordbreakers, which are like the Valkyries of the Imperial Guard. Besides that, even if her status as an ESPer is not know, this world is more discriminatory than canon and Kasumi is Russian. So while not everyone treats her badly, prejudice is still there.

Also, no, Keru does not need a haircut. Long hair Takeru looks better.

Anyways, this was more of a transition chap not much action here. See you next time, thanks for reading. Stay safe.

Zuoriel

Link of Desire

Chapter 85:

Link of Desire

---

December 5th. Some minutes before noon.

(Yuuko's Office.)

[Yuuko]

---

Aiming my full focus upon him, to the point where Yashiro can no longer remain staring, a hand serves as soft landing for my chin while I stare. And yet, he forwards the silent treatment again as he drinks his coffee.

"You refuse to tell me of the letter?" He nods, a leg crossing over the other, an arm loosely extends over the sofa. "Do you realize what this antagonism tells me about you, Shirogane?"

A brow corks, he then smiles back. "Do you realize what kind of mess you're getting into, Vice Commander ? Knowing intel you shouldn't have access to can easily backfire."

"Thanks for the reminder, but I deem this an emergency. Speak, now."

"No, I don't think I will," he then sobers up, resting the cup on a thigh as he returns my gaze, fully, "unless you're ready to give me an answer."

"The contents of the letter may play a vital role in our plans, Shirogane."

"Your plans, you mean. We have not yet agreed to remain working together after I tune Sumika, and I'd like you to cease these attempts at pressuring me, Vice Commander ."

"… Is that so," spinning, kicking away at the floor until I can feel the back of my head regretting the impulse, I interlock my fingers and shoot gazes at him when he enters my vision. "Did you also have something with this Amato while you served in the Guard?"

"… She almost killed me, you know."

"What?"

Slowly sipping his coffee, he remains quiet. Bereft of answers, I can only stare yet find no cracks. Perhaps, because any further cracks would have it all collapse. Yashiro's ears lower, a few fingers barely grasping at his sleeve. And then, she fires a glare at me. If she were a real bunny, she'd be hissing.

"… Alright, enough of this. Are you in any danger, Shirogane?"

"Nope," he says, leaving the mug on the small table, shrugging, "not while I remain here. And I ain't leaving the base if we can't reach an agreement, so telling you of something that will matter little if your decision is set is a waste of time. Try as she might, Captain Amato cannot do anything to get in the way of the tuning, so it's not worth your notice."

"… And what of afterwards? If we need to stabilize you and regain your citizenship-"

"Should I take that as an answer, then?" He delivers another eclipsing stare, tone quiet yet harsh.

Little more han once again focus fully on him, pressing a knuckle onto a cheek to denote my displeasure. "I'm merely seeing if you're thinking this through, remember that the IRG doesn't have a good view of me. If I commit to your ideas, I cannot have you in any danger going forward. So, what was in the letter?"

"I don't deal in hypotheticals, Vice Commander. This has nothing to do with Alt IV, so can we get to the tuning already? I won't let any memories affect Sumika, if that's what you're concerned about," he affirms, arms folding and giving a firm nod, never breaking eye contact, breathing stable as his features also remain.

"… Shirogane, surely you cannot let a meager detail get out of control again, can you?" I ask, leaning forward. "Even if we pacify Sagiri, there is a possibility your identity could be used to strike back at me, that a few loyalists would try and free the Shogun's stepbrother from my grasp. After all, you're, legally speaking, closer to Her Highness than even Mitsurugi."

"Except I'm no longer that," he slowly shakes his head, joining both hands, slouching a bit.

"… Hmm. So why are you refusing, then? What are you keeping from me, Shirogane?"

Like a sudden wave gaining altitude, the counter effect of the surfacing of whatever lies below, beyond sight. The smallest frown, now present nonetheless. "You should know already, Vice Commander. Curiosity is what killed the cat."

"Are you threatening me, Shirogane?"

"Are you threatening me, XO Kouzuki ?"

"You two, stop it!"

CHOP!

He pouts a bit, groaning back at Yashiro, whose bunny ears continue to flap as she shoots little glares at both of us. "You're supposed to be on my side, young Gadawan."

"A young what?" I cork a brow, failing to recall hearing of said word before.

Yashiro's gaze gains intensity, as does the hand which still grips at his sleeve. "I am your friend, but please stop antagonizing the Professor."

"Not my fault she can't take a no for an answer. I do give her time to sort out her thoughts, but she immediately pressures me for every last bit of intel, even on things she knows she cannot learn at the time," he shrugs, shaking his head in a dramatic and exaggerated gesture.

Coiling a fist, hammering at the desk, I glare. "Shirogane, stop messing around! You already know what risks would I face if someone with your ties to the nobility ever becomes a target. Do I have to force the answers out of you, perhaps?"

His lips purse, slowly he leans towards Yashiro. "See, Kasumi? Told you she was Zith."

"Takeru-san, don't start, please. We're all on the same side," she scolds, pulling at his arm.

"What's a Zith?"

"I guess that means now there's… three of us?" He says, losing force as he raises a brow, ignoring my query.

"Sigh… Do you have to try and make the joke?" She asks, flapping her ears.

"No, wait, we're the Zith Triumvirate now," he affirms, regaining the usual cheer, raising a small fist while nodding to himself.

"I'm saying, what is a Zith?!"

"We are nothing of the sort," Yashiro protests, pouting.

"I mean, to be fair, from the perspective of the Empire, I'm sure we're probably the bad guys of the story, though. But don't worry Dersh Bnnuy, Mom and Dad got this covered," he states, pushing his chest out, eating another flurry of chops to the shoulder while starting to chuckle.

"… Dersh what? Okay, Shirogane, can you start explaining what are you on about?" Here I am, revising all the old docs I can to see if there's anything conclusive to use as a lead to confirm my suspicions. And there he is, joking around like a clown.

Blocking the chopping, he nods back at me. Endowing a small smirk. "Fuhuhu, well, if you insist. Allow me to present to you the first ruler of the United Federation of Mankind, our overlord and savior, Dersh Bnnuy!" He announces with a dramatic bow, patting Yashiro's head.

"Takeru-san, stop it with the puns," and she immediately protests again. "I'm nothing like that old mean man who ruled the Zith."

"Hey, for now," he raises a finger, another smirk. And receives another chop.

"Sigh… Is this all just a joke, Shirogane? Because I might be considering bringing some syringes if you don't stop now."

"See, Kasumi? That's the Dark Flow at work," he points at me, nodding at her groans. Before going back to business, lazily smiling my way. "But anyways, I was just talking of Galaxy Wars to lighten the mood a bit."

"And what is this 'Galaxy Wars'?" I ask as I spin, rubbing my forehead.

"… Wait, we don't have Galaxy Wars in this timeline?" He asks, features widening in honest surprise.

"No, I don't think so? Unless you count the BETA war, that is."

"… This world sucks."

"So, you were saying about these wars…"

"Oh, they're a series of movies. And comics, and games, and other junk. It features lots of starships and battles, the iconic lasersabres, and it was really popular back home."

"Laser… sabres?"

"Swords made out of lasers, that is."

"What!? You could make… Was that all fiction?"

"Of course they were, duh," he rolls his eyes, shrugging. "Though, not all of it was magic science. Learning about the Doom Moon was actually what made me like jets and stuff when I was little. Though, it kinda sucks knowing it could never be real," he nods slowly, putting both arms behind his head as he relaxes onto the sofa.

"And what is this Doom Moon?"

"A planet-sized XG, kind of. With a laser beam and all. As I said, seeing that is what made me wanna be an engineer, even though my grades were awful."

Inhaling slowly, feeling my own waves going tidal, a frown I forward. "… Shirogane, why have you not mentioned any of this until now?"

"I mean…" he looks away, ruffling his hair, "the tech shown in Galaxy Wars comes from a futuristic future. I doubt even you could make heads or tails about such advanced things, and we have other stuff to deal with. More important stuff, like tuning the 00 Unit to get a head start compared to last loop."

Halting the spin with a heel, aiming squarely at his eyes, tensing my lips for a second, I rest both arms onto the desk, causing a pencil to fly away to the floor. "Excuse me? I am more than capable of sizing up and working on any 'futuristic' tech from your world. Do remember we have far more advanced spacecraft here, going by the notes you brought from your world."

"Huh, really? Then, what about the Rapier?" He asks, resting onto the sofa while playing with his hair, while smirking.

"… What?"

"Yeah. You told me the meeting for the negotiations went alright, but you didn't say a thing about it, you only spoke about the XGs. What's up? Chickening out again?" He raises a brow, defiant challenge, not altering the teeth-revealing smirk as I glare.

"What are- What do you mean by 'again'?" Staring, I tap and press a paper, pulling at my own strings.

He chuckles while idling time on his long strands. "Well… Last loop you didn't have the time to work on it, so you gave up on fine tuning the Rapier. I think it was some sort of special TSF made to work with the XG?" He asks, hand on his chin, returning my gaze, not faltering.

"Yes, it… Yes, it was. Why haven't you mentioned it thus far?"

"Because I know nothing about it, of course," he smiles, shrugging, not altering his posture at all, still looking into my eyes. "Never saw it do anything but collect dust. We did have a small talk like this, when you showed me Model D for the first time. Something about the ion thrusters not being like you thought, kind of a pain to deal with."

"Wait, you- Since when do you know of ion technology?!" I slam the desk, hands quivering against my restrain.

And he dares, he dares to chuckle again. To still smile my way, resting onto a hand, posture relaxed onto the sofa as if floating on a pool. "Since back home. It was actually one of the stuff I looked as a way to forward my thesis back in college."

"Huh, really now?"

"Yeah, for real. Not gonna lie, I wanted to make one of those giant ships from the movies, maybe fly to Mars and explore the stars. Turns out Ion thrusters are not actually very strong, though. Good at efficiency, but back home they had their limitations and weren't very fast. Mostly used for satellites that remain on orbit, I think."

"I see…" No lag in his words, no shade in his eyes, only raising a brow as I remain silent and staring. So he's telling the truth, huh. Something I couldn't do in another world, something which could protect the XG… "Do you believe we should push to get one in our hands?"

"Depends. If you think you've got the time, sure, go for it. Not that I care, if you're dead set on going through the coup."

"Sigh… What is it now? Something in the letter riled you up, Captain ?"

"It's 'cadet', Vice Commander ."

"It's 'Sensei', Shirogane."

"I'd prefer it to be 'Yuuko', though."

"Oh, giving up on the 'honey' already?"

"… Not like you remember anything about the poem, anyways. Sigh…" And like a balloon poked by a needle, he deflates for a second. Taking a short breath, folding his arms, he straightens up, back to the neutral facade. "But, back to the point, no, I ain't telling you about the letter. Has nothing to do with Alt IV or our pact, of that you can be sure."

"So you won't speak?"

"Until you give me your final answer and commit to it, I think it's better for both of us to, you know, keep our cards close to our chest.

Better for you to not entangle yourself with me more than you need, if you only need me for the tuning."

"… So you are not answering, huh," I narrow my eyes, bumping a hand on my chin while spinning.

"Neither are you," he rolls his eyes, some hair on a finger.

"Please, stop fighting…" Yashiro pleads, trying to stare, lips quiver as she looks down. "We're all allies, right?"

"Until XO Kouzuki answers my suggestion, it can't be helped, Kasumi," he says, petting her head.

"Mmgh… Is this pouty act fueled by the result of the questioning on Mitsurugi?" I stand, going to make myself more coffee.

He sighs, relenting a nod. "Kind of, yeah. And no, it did not work out."

"Hmm. As expected. Don't worry, I already told Marimo to stay on her guard. Mitsurugi won't be an issue to you."

"If only that solved the problems."

"You cannot control other's feelings, Shirogane. If she won't see as you do, there is only so much you can try to do," I remind as my cup fills up, he simply shrugs.

"I know… And I won't falter, don't worry."

"Any ideas to try and make peace with her?" I ask, inhaling into the fresh scent, bringing the cup to my lips.

"Yeah, there is one card left to play," he affirms, despite the desolate tint to his eyes, the visibility I gain on his knuckles.

"I see. In any case, there are other matters we need to talk about, so let's deal with the 00 Unit first," I say, pacing towards the door.

They follow behind, Shirogane scratching his head as he comes closer. "Anything I should know before we start the tuning?"

"Nothing we did could get a reaction out of the 00 Unit that was not pure rage or docile obedience, and it did not answer why it left the cylinder room to seek you. From a computational standpoint, it's working as expected. But if I only needed a quantum computer…"

"Same as before, huh," he comments, sighing.

"Well, I hope your tuning session yields results, however small."

We exit the office, turning towards the cylinder room. If my theory of two-way communication stands true then, perhaps we don't even need to send the 00 Unit to Sadogashima to gain intel on the Hives. Shirogane did report that the Reactors are another BETA strain, so once I confirm no leaking happens, once its capabilities are stabilized, perhaps we could have the 00 Unit scan our Reactor, gain the mapping of the Sadogashima hive, maybe more.

Then, our last resort would be far safer than otherwise. The 00 Unit can fully focus on the particle cannon without resorting to scanning the Sadogashima hive, without putting further burdens onto the system.

We enter the room, the two of them slowly go up to the pod, watching over it as I approach the monitors and start the gradual cease of Sleep Mode.

… If it does react as I believe, then I will require Shirogane to stay until then. That equals preparing a motive for the pigeons to graduate against the piling pressure that pushes against the notion. Perhaps he could help me, but that would mean accepting his terms.

… Not that I had any plans to allow him to leave. Shirogane is staying, I'm certain. He's only hesitant due to what's at stake for his world, for the ripples that may follow. Once the 00 Unit is properly tuned, things will go back to normal. I'll ensure no ripples can screw up his home world, nor our efforts here. It's in my best interests after all… to repay his aid, to have him stay by me .

Looking back at Shirogane, stepping towards him, I cough. "So, are you ready to begin?"

Silently nodding, he holds my gaze.

---

Some moments later…

---

"So, which one do you think will stop spinning first?" He asks, looking at the three spinning tops he somehow found available in the library.

The 00 Unit's lips twitch, gazing at the three wooden triangles. "Uhh… Left one."

Sigh… Still talking in a monotone, huh. Only some brief changes to the patterns recorded earlier.

"Alright, let's see how this goes," he softly says, brushing the hair and the ribbon, before the three twirl and give impulse to the toys.

As they spun around on the ground, I took a glance at Shirogane. He nods back, so I return my attention to the monitors. The fluctuating graphs, the spikes, the smallest, erratic reactions on its face… So this is working, somehow. Luckily, it seems to like spinning tops for some reason.

There is only a minimal disquiet to the patterns in the screen, a composed appearance instead of seeking bloody murder far more savage than Shirogane's piloting.

The toys slowly start to lose speed, and in the end the left one was the last to remain spinning.

"Wow, you guessed right again, Sumika. Here, some more candies," he cheers, placing more of the things in its hand.

However, the 00 Unit limits itself to simply holding on tightly. The still waters of its expression betray no emotion, blank as a sheet of pure, immaculate snow.

And yet, the stability is more than enough. Its patterns denote emotion, buried deep within, lost in a trench. But it is there, there is acknowledgment towards Shirogane's actions and queries. His gaze hesitates towards me, he allows a sigh as I smile and nod back. Gesturing for him and Yashiro to stand, his motions stop and a grip sends him back to the floor.

"Don't leave," the 00 Unit pleads, grasping at his arm, maintaining the neutral facade.

"Sumika, we played a lot today, right? I have to go back to my own training," he whispers with a smile, petting its head.

"No," the gripping increases in strength, his lips purse for a moment.

"Come on, now. I'll come back tomorrow and we'll play again. I'm not going anywhere."

"No!" It then constricts upon him, with far more impulse, enough to cause a wince out of Shirogane.

"Sumika, calm down," he pleads amidst a groan, embracing it with his free arm, patting the back of its head. "Nothing's wrong, no one here will harm you."

Yashiro hesitantly steps closer, as if walking against the wind. "Takeru-san, shouldn't we turn her off?"

"No, she has to get better," he looks my way, unblinking. I slowly nod, watching the erratic numbers, the exertion closer to red.

"But she might hurt you, and I don't think this is good for her, either. Professor, should we really let this go on?"

"We do need the data of a stress test," I simply say, not meeting her gaze. And frankly, there is little comfort we can offer for the horrors Kagami endured. Time is all we can give the 00 Unit.

Shirogane did report that the 00 Unit was also reacting in this manner during his last experience. We have little choice but to stand and watch it endure the flashbacks until it can control the searing revengeance it inherited from Kagami. To that end, the readings are necessary. After all, if there is a need to assault Kashgar before its Reactor grows to the next Phase, the 00 Unit has to reach a proper level of aptitude. Fast at that. And while Shirogane's idea of playing games is trouncing my earlier trainings, if the progress is insufficient…

… Do I have to send him back to his world? What will Shirogane do… if I force him to ruin another Kagami? He's going to cross me if it comes to that.

"It's alright, Sumika-san," Yashiro says softly, lowering to the ground. "We're safe here, there is nothing to-"

SMACK!

THUD!

"Go away!" The 00 Unit shouts, eyelids constricting, trying to melt into Shirogane's hold as it stares at Yashiro, who lays frozen on the floor, holding a reddening cheek, eyes and lips extended in paralysis.

"Sumika, calm down! Kasumi isn't your enemy, she's-"

"No! Go away!" Another manic scream, another frantic expression, yet this time-

The readings are different, this isn't a berserk overload. The toxins released by the synth skin, the wavelengths emulated… Fear. Another emotion.

It took him only a single session to bring out another emotion in it already?!

"Ugh! Please calm down, Sumika. Nothing's wrong, we're all on your side here," he wails, groaning. Looking back at him, his glare holds my gaze, unblinking. Gesturing for me to turn the 00 Unit off.

Inhaling softly for a moment, gazing at the shrinking shape that starts to loudly wail, to beg for Shirogane to not leave, to not be hurt, I relent a nod. Inputting the commands takes a second, the 00 Units begins to quiver, its speech turning jumbled, down to a mumble in mere moments. A sleeping Whitesnow it turns into, limp on Shirogane's hold.

Without sharing words, we connect it back into the pod. Once I made sure the ESP protocol is in working order, I start up the ODL purification. Looking back, Shirogane is rubbing Yashiro's swollen cheek as she apologizes for some reason.

"Shirogane, Yashiro, to the office," I order, leading the way.

I take one last look at the pod, seeing the undisturbed sleeping face, as if resting beneath an ice cage for eons at a time. Both of them sigh and leave the 00 Unit's side, so I exit the room with them tracing my steps back to the office.

Shirogane and Yashiro both sit side by side as before in the usual sofa, she in complete petrification, he still gently rubbing the reddening cheek. I quickly prep up and hand him the red and white mug with coffee to him and the full black one with cocoa to Yashiro. Both of them drink in silence, so I take the opportunity to sit down myself and start looking at the recordings. After some minutes with only my key clicks resonating in the office, Shirogane clears his throat.

"So how did it go?"

"What do you think of that last outburst?" I ask, looking into his eyes.

"She was either seeing another traumatic memory or she was really afraid of me leaving," he affirms, then looks back at Yashiro. "Do we have anything for her cheek?"

"Don't worry, we can tend to that later," I wave away, he groans a bit. "How is the progress compared to the prior one you tuned?"

"A bit better, I guess," he shrugs, taking another sip. "The outbursts were way stronger last loop, probably because she saw me die in front of her. But the overloads still happened, it took me a while to actually hold a conversation with her."

"… I see. So there is not yet conclusive proof of progress on the stabilization of her psyche."

"Yeah, that is true. I'm not going to-"

"I wasn't going to suggest anything. Drop your guard," I cut him off, slowly spinning in the chair. He sighs, resting his full weight onto the sofa again. "Shirogane, did I ever tell you what you were doing right last loop?"

He raises a brow, eyes squint. "Regarding the 00 Unit? No, you only told me she never showed emotions when I wasn't around, that I just needed to be close to trigger a change. Her attitude did shift drastically, she started behaving like a kid just a few days after you put me in charge of tuning her."

"Hmm… You told me Yashiro shared memories with her too, right?"

"Yeah, that Sumika once said she remembered sharing breakfast with my squad, but the one who did that was Kasumi. Do you think Kasumi can't link the memories of her little self I saw for some reason?" He asks, Yashiro's ears flop down, stalling the rise of the cup to her lips.

"No, that's not it. The easing of memories from another Kagami might have aided with the assimilation."

Inhaling sharply, his eyes shut down as harsh as hail. "… Yes, that's what happened. I am not doing that again." He then swallows all the remaining coffee in one go, throwing himself harshly onto the sofa.

"No matter what? I'm sure you know it, we need the 00 Unit in working condition as soon as possible. Even if another Kagami suffers again, that world will get fixed in the end. For our shared goals, stabilizing the 00 Unit is-"

"One more word and I break off our pact."

A frown rises on its own, we glare at the other. He meets my eyes without any hesitation, arms resting comfortably on the sofa, lips tightly sealed. Yashiro once more steals glances at us, slowly finishing her drink.

A small moment of silence extends in the office.

And yet, not even a slight crack surfaces in the mask. Not even a mere joke to lighten the mood, not the lightest relaxation of the blazing glare.

So I shake my head, spinning again. "Sigh… Fine, I won't ask you to go back there. Do you have a plan to make this go better then?"

"Yeah, actually. We just gotta do the reverse of what we were doing before," he affirms, smiling again.

"The… reverse?"

"Remember what we were doing with the recovery sessions? Can't Kasumi work as a bridge between my memories of this world's Sumika and the 00 Unit?" He asks, patting Yashiro's shoulder, making her gaze slowly return to reality.

"So instead of holding back the memories, you want to bring them out and link them to its current psyche? Hmm… I suppose, there is some merit to the approach." However, an adverse reaction could occur if, for example, Kagami's mother appears and the reminiscence turns into a catalyst. Even the faintest detail could devolve into an overheat, and Yashiro's psyche could suffer due to the recoil. "… Let me test it first. I can't have either of you getting injured, after all. Do you want to try this later tonight?" I ask, gazing squarely at him.

"I guess? Not like I've got much to do, other than oversee the tuning," he says, returning a nod. "So, how did the session go in the end? Did we get anything out of it?"

I shrug, sighing, resting my head onto the cushioning as the spin slows down. "It went fine, I guess. Your idea of playing games did affect her more strongly than my testings, I'll give you that. I got some new readings and data to compile for later."

"Um, Professor," Yashiro asks, peeking. "how much of an improvement did we obtain?"

"Well…" I ruffle my hair, taking a moment to readjust my position on the chair, the numbers and possible wording to employ. "What the 00 Unit is struggling with right now is the processing of Kagami's memories. Every time it tries to do so, the instruction the 00 Unit demands are too much for the constrains of the system and that causes an overheat. This time it was again drawing too many resources, but it handled the stress better than the test we did at early morning. After all, we could make the shift to Safe Mode without any sudden shutdowns required."

Shirogane coughs, leaning forward. "Basically, what she sees in the memories is so strong that she can't distinguish it from reality. That sends her whole system on a loop of anger or fear. Then, she can't keep up with both what she feels for the memory because she relieves it as if it were an intense flashback, alongside how her body has to react in a proper way to he memory. Was that somehow right?"

Smiling his way, I nod and breathe a sigh. "Exactly, that is it. You get a hundred, Shirogane."

"A hundred what?"

"I dunno, I'll decide later. Anyways, that is the main issue. The 00 Unit tries to assimilate the memories as something of its own, that forces it to emulate the pain and trauma. Its current status clashes with the perceived status as the flashback occurs, the programs' priorities get mixed up, it starts using more energy than it should as it thrashes about while the security programs try to execute the right order to work in. The system falls into chaos as the instructions don't align, so the 00 Unit shuts off as the errors overload the system."

I conclude, spin for a moment, before facing them both once more, endowing a mask, a glare.

"However, if the current approach doesn't work out in a few days…" the spinning stops, my fingers entwine as I lean onto the desk, focusing onto his eyes. "I want you to think thoroughly what you should do to ensure the 00 Unit is properly tuned before the Sadogashima Operation. On that hinges our pact, Shirogane."

"… I'm well aware, Vice Commander."

I narrow my brows, crossing one leg over the other, meeting the silent hail as I tighten my gut.

"I surely hope so," I say with a shrug, again going back into the seat's cushion. "Well, now that's out of the way, how have you been feeling? Did the talk with Mitsurugi give you any memories?"

He looks down, idling a hand on his ear. "Yeah, parts of stuff I rather not see. She used words from… a dead end, so I think she's suffering from a negative leak. Anything coming up in the radiation scans?" He asks, looking up, lips cascading down, eyes ever so slightly squinted as if surrounded in smoke.

"Let me check. The training happened at around- Oh…"

"I'll take that as a yes?" He asks, barely audible. I nod, he heaves a sigh.

"Don't get too beat up about this. There is only so much you can do against a fanatic."

A minute frown, he then shakes his head. "Meiya could be different, you know? She may not be… like the one I remember fondly, but that doesn't mean we gotta be enemies."

"I take it this means you do not wish to antagonize the IRG?" I ask, resting both arms onto the desk again.

He gives me a side glance. "That doesn't help in the slightest and you know it."

"And in the off-chance your fears about the leaked parallels becomes truth? What do you propose we do then, assuming my answer is affirmative?"

For a moment, he again stares at me.

Arms slowly fold, silence extends.

And then, he again gives a small smirk.

"I'll fly like a cannon ball."

"… What?"

"Exactly what it means. If it comes to blows, there's nothing to fear. They won't take me down."

"And you're so confident in that because…"

"Because," he frowns, inhaling sharply as he looks down, hellfire dripping from the glare, "I already pulled the trigger once. I can sure as hell do it again."

"Takeru-san, you're no coward," Yashiro states, rubbing his arm.

"Thanks, little bun," he smiles faintly, patting her head again, causing the bunny ears to flap a bit. "Still," he shakes his head, returning my gaze, "if you do want to keep me around, I can guarantee you victory in the field if you help me with the setup. So long as you don't send me against fighter jets or an XG and I'm in a working machine, I can probably beat anyone in a fight."

"Anyone?"

"Yeah, anyone. I didn't survive the Babylon Disaster for nothing," he reminds, a glitched twitch on one of his eyes.

"I see… You still won't mention anything about the letter?"

"Will you give me your answer now?" He stares at me, and nowhere else.

"… There are some matters I'd like to check before," I say, spinning away.

"Of course… Of course…"

"Takeru-san, please," Yashiro again pats his arm, trying to smile back at him, "the Professor is merely being cautious. You're no burden or anything."

He sighs, leaning back onto the sofa, both hands behind his head, seeming to be sinking further away from reach. And so, he says nothing, closing his eyes.

"This isn't a game," she protests, for some reason, flapping her ears. "There is more at stake than cold numbers."

… What is she answering to? And why is she so upset?

"Sigh… Thanks, Kasumi. But it is what it is."

"I don't agree."

"Excuse me, you two," they look at me, seemingly unaware of the motive of my inquisitive stare, "what exactly are you talking about?"

"Huh?" Shirogane raises a brow, scratching his head. "I said, it's completely understandable for you to prioritize other stuff, after all… I am aware I don't have a good RoI for Alt IV, that on this board I'm more of a pain than anything else," he shrugs, chuckling dryly at the ground.

"That is not true," she protests again, ears flapping a few times.

"Is that so… But you didn't say that, at all." He again raises a brow, she tilts her head. "Yashiro, can you still hear Shirogane's thoughts?"

"Eh? Ah, yes… Sorry."

"Wait, you didn't lock her away?" Sudden blazes back to life, he glares strongly enough to scatter ashes about. "Now that I think about it, she did hear an echo of my thoughts as she came to the sim room. Vice Commander, kindly block Kasumi from scanning my mind. Now."

"I already did, though," I retaliate, the frown and the Fimbulvetr back at him.

"… What? Then, why is she still hearing my thoughts?"

"Yashiro, can you?" She huddles upon herself, relenting a nod. It only brings the stillness of the great winter into me. "But I… But I'm sure I blocked Shirogane from your-" I quickly bring my laptop to life, smacking away at the keys, bringing up the control logs. And yes, the safety measures are in full effect. "There are no errors coming up, there should be no way in which she can scan your mind…"

"But she did hear my thoughts just now," he points out, still glaring.

"Shirogane, think of something."

"Of what?"

"Anything at all. Yashiro, you try and see if anything comes to your senses."

He holds my gaze for a moment, a grave expression hewn onto his face, but a pull from Yashiro relaxes his features. A sigh after, Shirogane holds his chin and purses his lips, looking upwards. A moment of silence passes, until both bunny ears perk up as if hearing thunder. Yashiro proceeds to release suppression fire upon his shoulder, Shirogane laughing for some reason without even trying to appease the chops.

"… So I assume she did manage to scan your mind?"

"Ahaha… Y-Yeah, she did," he says, coughing as he wipes a small tear from his eye.

"You're horrible, Takeru-san," she pouts, bunny ears flapping. "Why do you have to imagine that again?"

"Hey, you need to eat them to start growing, my young Gadawan."

"Shirogane, what did you show her? Nothing… inappropriate, I assume?" I threaten, narrowing my eyes.

He merely smirks back. "I thought of Kasumi frolicking about in a field of carrots, devouring them all in large chomps."

…

"Pfft! Ahahaha!"

"P-Professor! Do not laugh, please."

"N-No, I mean… Cough… Just thinking of you actually doing that- Ahem… Anyways," straightening my lab coat, I look back at the still chuckling Shirogane and the still chopping Yashiro, "this is quite odd. The bunny ears are working as they should, this shouldn't be-"

Wait, a link that cannot be broken… Being able to see and hear his thoughts in real time…

"Yashiro, do you feel any pushback from his mind?"

She groans for a moment, looks at him, then shakes her head. "No, I can clearly hear him, even if only a whisper. Sorry, I am not trying to-
"

"It's okay, little bun," he comforts, petting her head. "So, can you do something about this?" He asks, leaving his hand atop her hair.

"Shirogane, how are you feeling as of now? Any pain, any disquiet, discomfort?"

"No, not really? The tingly feeling's still there, just, like… There, and that's all," he says, furrowing his brows. Not lifting the hand which on the hair rests, Yashiro not seeming to mind as she leans closer.

Why are they engaging in a psychic link all of a sudden? Why with so little recoil? Is this a side effect of the mind dive? What could-

…

Oh… Interesting, very interesting.

"I don't like that smile," Shirogane says, giving me a side glance.

" Shush, you. Anyways, Yashiro, can you end the psychic link?"

"Eh? But I'm not… Well…" she looks down, gripping her dress, putting some space between herself and Shirogane. "Mmgh… I… can't," her shoulders slump, she throws herself back upon his arm. "I can't zone his mind out. Sorry…"

He pats her head, softly parting her bangs. "Hey, it's fine. Don't pressure yourself. So Vice Commander-"

"Sensei."

" Vice Commander," he insists, looking back at me, monotonous as the silent ruins, the beeps of machinery, "is there anything we can do?"

"Hmm… You can't push her out yourself?"

"I would if I could, it's just, you know, the feel is there. Not bothering or anything," he says, scratching the back of his head, compacting his shoulders a bit.

So he isn't suffering any recoil either? Could this be… a synchrony? If so then, there's much work to do. I cannot allow Yashiro to end up as she was when returning from the mind dive, and I rather not have Shirogane believe I'm pushing Yashiro against her will. But if my hunch is true and this isn't some temporary link… I should go and rewatch the readings from the Mindseeker, see what I can glean.

"Well, for now you remain on your guard, Shirogane. Don't think of anything that might harm Yashiro," he nods, immediately. "Also, Yashiro, try and not remain attached to him all the time."

She twitches, bunny ears flap. "I am not."

"Oh, really?" I smirk, she straightens herself.

It is odd, Yashiro hasn't been particularly receptive of most people. Not even I've managed to have her display such closeness. While the mind dive did leave a great toll on her shoulders, if there is no recoil as of now and he welcomes her aid then, this is nothing but more news. All I need to do is ensure you both remain in good health, so that this link does not become a burden instead. I suppose, another motive to have Shirogane remain by me. Not that I ever doubted he would aid Yashiro, but now I simply cannot… let such an enticing asset out of my grasp.

"I repeat, I do not like that smile," Shirogane says, arms folding, another side glance cast.

" Shush. You remain on your guard and take good care of Yashiro, you hear me? Now then, time is of essence so I have one report for you, Shirogane."

"Hm? What's up?"

"Tomorrow, a retinue from Daikuuji Corp will pay a visit to the base. You'll accompany me to present your weapons to them, with some luck they'll be interested in them."

"Wait… Daiku… Daikuuji Corp?! Are you for real?!"

"… So you know of them already, huh. And you didn't tell me a thing about that, why exactly?"

"Oh, come on. I know them from my world, they were, like, the second largest business group in Japan," he says, nodding a few times, small sparks coming out of his eyes. "Are they still the same big shots here?"

"Well, more or less. They're the largest commoner-led business in the Empire. All the others have had ties to the nobility, but Daikuuji Corp has stood on its own since the, ahem, restructuring the IRG did a few decades ago."

"The mess with the New Zaibatsu stuff and the like?" He asks, raising a brow, a scowl.

"Yes, precisely. Sadly for them, they were left out of the TSF deal for the Shiranui due to being, well, referred to as 'lukewarm' fellows. While they still have a good standing, they're losing ground by the minute as things are now."

"So you'll use that to your advantage and get an easy agreement," he nods a few times, relaxing a bit.

"Something like that, yes."

Of course, that is not the entire truth. Daikuuji Corp is one of my initial supporters, I wouldn't be standing here if they hadn't backed my proposition to the IRI when I was just a teenager. Now I have much to offer back to them, but the most important thing… the treasure he left in my care…

No, do not focus on that. There is much to be done, and grieving accomplishes nothing.

"So, you be on your way to the office and get as much done as you can before your afternoon training. Once you're done, go back to Hangar 90 and keep at it until Yashiro goes to pick you up."

"Understood."

"Yashiro, you go back to the 00 Unit and start compiling the data produced before. And try and not scan Shirogane's mind."

"Yes," she nods, standing up. Looking back, she waves at him as she goes to the door, saying her goodbyes.

His hand remains in the air for a second before it slumps back into the sofa, Shirogane then sighs.

"Shirogane, I won't press on the letter, but do not let the result of the questioning to Mitsurugi-"

"I'm not," he shoots out, hitting his knees softly. "I know, no time to waste. Don't worry, I'm fine. But…" his lips then pluck as he starts gazing around. A tight, narrowed gaze meets mine as he grumbles for a second.

"… Is something the matter, Shirogane?"

"Yeah, that I see no tray or anything around."

"Wh- No. We are not doing this again."

"Sigh… Look, our pact aside, you really need to rest well," he says, lips shrink, his gaze lingers on me, in silence, calm and sober as a lake. "I bet you didn't sleep at all yesterday, too. There's still quite some time before my training begins. I can tackle the office again, if you need the rest."

"… Hmm. I assume, you're not planning on forcing me to my room, will you?"

"If you don't want me around…" he slowly stands, dejectedly shrugging, chuckling to himself, "I'll just take my leave here."

…

"I want a report on Sadogashima."

"What?"

"A report on Sadogashima, on the outcome of Iceberg to compare to our current situation. You can deliver that, Shirogane?"

"Hmm… I guess I can do that, yes," he nods, smiling.

"What of a report on the discussion you had with Mitsurugi?"

"I already told you the most important things about it," he affirms, holding my gaze.

"Surely it's in your best interests to halt the ripples? I need to know her reactions to analyze the readings of G-Radiation."

"Is that your answer, then?"

"Sigh… You should be aware of how the board looks, Shirogane," I let out a small sting, gazing at him.

Yet, his gaze crumbles. "Did the Chief tell you anything odd?"

"… Perhaps. But if you don't make an appeal, I don't know if I can properly see your side. You promise aid, but refuse to elaborate and give conclusive evidence on what and how you plan to halt the issues which will come, coup or not. So," I smirk, leaning on a hand, "will you give me details to base my answer on, Shirogane?"

His complexion dulls, slowly he inhales, as slowly as the twitch in his right eye. "I already told you my position yesterday. But if you want proof…" he again smirks, letting me see his teeth, "we can easily bind the moves of the IRG, even if it doesn't come to blows."

"How, exactly, do you propose we do that? They don't particularly hold us in good esteem, you see." And I highly doubt they'd let the opportunity pass them by.

"But the ones who want to light up a spark don't have the freedom they wish," he affirms, a gradual cloud shrouding his complexion. "After all, they made many mistakes… many compromises during the invasion."

"What are we talking about?"

"I'm saying that, if you'd like, I can give you a hint towards what really happened in Mogami Base and why the Swordbreakers were as feared as they were," he says, low, stepping closer and resting onto the desk. "You really didn't think Yuuhi let us roam around freely for no reason, did you?"

"… What of handing me intel that would place me in a compromising position?"

"Oh, that's not what we're talking about here," he remains smiling, undaunted. "But if there are parallels incoming even beyond the coup, if distress will fall on us to deter Alt IV from attaining victory, I think this won't be the first and only attempt to destabilize the Empire."

"Hmm… You do know we cannot take a political position. Are you suggesting me to blackmail certain key figures, then?"

"Yeah, I mean, we don't have to cross strikes if we can help it," he notes, despite the sigh that follows. "There are some that probably won't listen… but we can try and, uh, negotiate with the rest. Even if you've no intention to actually committing to the threats, having dirt on the HC or the Regents has to be worth something for you, right XO Kouzuki?"

"Sensei," I counter, tapping the desk. "And might I ask what athwarted you from achieving these goals while you were in the IRG?"

He rolls his eyes. "Her Highness. She won't do anything that might impair the peace of today, not in a million years. And my own hastiness back then."

"Hmm. Then, if she refused, why should I agree, Black Fire?"

A minute frown, whirlwinds on his pants the clawing spawns. "Because, one, we can't let the Empire lash out in defiance. Any more prideful bullshit and the rest of the world might truly be done with Japan. I guess that's why you were keeping the peace until I arrived."

Holding his gaze, I twirl a hair. "Perhaps."

"And two," he relaxes onto the sofa, blazing at the ceiling, "I'm no longer fire."

"Shirogane, you should know how the guards will-"

"That's not what I'm talking about. As of now, I am the dragon," he chuckles, rubbing one of his wrists.

"The dragon, huh. The one from the mind dive," I stare, until he deigns a nod. "And why is that benefitial to me?"

"Because this dragon don't need any Heavens," he declares, gazing straight at me, banners to war. "Do you plan to seek Heaven's aid?"

"Never."

"So, I guess our endgame is still in alignment? Because if it is," he smiles, confidence like the ever-rising sun, "let me remind you I'd like you to remain strong after Kashgar. So I can't have you burning everything to make Ouka a success."

"Huh… So if I support your little mischievous act, I assume you swear to remain here?" I ask, he nods immediately, not releasing my gaze. "Yet, the issues with," I spin, nibbling at my lips, "those extremist are something that we might prevent. What else can you present as proof now?" I stare, smirking.

Yet, while tightly folding his arms, he groans and looks up. "Well, I can lend a hand in dealing with IRG or the nobles. There's also the odd reports you've told me in other lives, which I already told you about before."

"And you won't force a fight against the ones you dislike?"

He frowns, tone searing. "I retaliated like an accursed fiend because they made a miss, to deny me the balm that is peace. I assumed we agreed on that regard?" He stares, I look away and nod.

"I see… Shirogane, if I can be honest with you, there is something I've been wanting to ask," he nods as he tries to cool down, gesturing me to continue. "We will both agree in that, so long as Her Highness remains unhurt, the coup won't yield us a negative result," he again nods, complexion undisturbed. "So, if bringing stability to the board that is the Empire is our goal, why not ally ourselves with the IRG? I can see your… strong emotions towards Ikaruga due to the man's addiction to heroics at the cost of verticalism coming to the Guard, but certainly, we benefit more with a united Empire, don't we?"

"Yeah, we do. Assuming Yuuhi isn't taken out of the board."

"… Excuse me?"

"I told you before, didn't I?" He frowns, bending over the desk, our gazes meeting at the same height. "I died in the original coup. Care to guess against what the rebels rose?"

"The Diet, I assume?"

"Correct. But there was an American intervention in those worlds, remember?" He smirks, one eye starting to twitch non-stop. "There was no way the rebels could have gotten away with their coup, right? There'd be no reason for the US to support something like that in that future, right?"

"… You didn't pull the trigger back then."

He chuckles, both arms falling to the desk as he shakes his head. "No… I couldn't. And that cost me my life."

Standing up, I pat his shoulder, stronger with each repetition. "It won't come to that in this world, even if she refused your words."

"… Even if that's the case," he raises back, the waves towering, his sight almost going odd-eyed, "would you care to guess why I joined the IRG in another world, if I vehemently opposed them in the other roads available?"

"… So that is the spark that comes from within, huh." It makes sense… too much, to be honest. Her Purpleness pacifism is in stark contrast with Ikaruga's glorification of the Imperial traditions, of the addiction he has over the spotlight. However, "You wouldn't be letting your… feelings for Her Highness cloud your judgment?"

He again stares, then chuckles. "No, because I know what will happen. Maybe not who, but I do know what. And there's no peace to be found in tyranny. Stability and power? Yeah, if what you're after is that, like what I showed you of our meeting in Sendai," he grimaces, far too strongly, "then supporting them is your best bet," he spits, pungent acid coating his every word, drenching the scowl.

"… So her life is in danger. Is that why you're against regaining your citizenship for now, to not give her further burdens?"

"Sigh… More or less. I'd like to believe we could make a truce but-"

"It is quite fair to affirm you and him are in collision course, yes."

"Well, there goes that option," he shrugs, closing an eye, restoring his usual calmness to his features. "So, this is where I stand. I really can't tell you anything else, not before you commit to an answer," he nods, holding my gaze.

"… And if I do accept, you'll stay in this world? Fighting under the UN?"

"Yeah."

"And there won't be any more secrets between us?" I ask, edging closer, poking his collarbone with a single finger.

"I dunno, will there be?"He asks, staring, not moving away.

"I… wouldn't mind being honest, if you give me your full acquiescence and continue to produce results with the 00 Unit . I do expect you to follow my orders, as well, " I state, holding his stare, his chin with the tip of my finger.

"And I expect you," he places his own finger on my neck, narrowing his eyes, "to hear my warnings, instead of doing things behind my back. If we are to be equals, then I also expect your full compliance."

"You will have it, so long as you pledge yours to me. "

"You do like being always on top, don't you honey," he rolls his eyes, slowly.

"Oh, it's just what comes with the position," I smirk, leaning a bit closer, treading a fingertip slowly up and down his neck. "What is it? If you'd like, I can bottom for you if you triumph in Sadogashima."

Pursed lips, choked words, eyes that flee. "Don't try and trip with me with that, Vice Commander. I know younger guys ain't fitting to your palate."

I chuckle, lightly nibbling at my lip. "Well, pour me enough drinks and anything could happen, you know? I'm almost tempted to ask you to 'take care' of me if I do overdo it with the alcohol," even if only to see if it'll let me inherit any memories, and maybe grant him some stable ground to regain his usual cheer.

Yet, his eyes widen. Breathing stuck as I was in my research, lips slightly parting to let out intellegible syllabes.

"Wh… Oh, no, we are not having this conversation," he quickly pulls away, rushing like a deer seeing a predator. Flushing red, blazing red, his hands idle themselves as they straighten his uniform, features contorting a bit. How… How adorable, to grow so embarrassed.

"What is it?" I approach from behind, slowly binding his arms with mine, he freezes for a moment yet doesn't refuse the hold. "Is the mighty Viking coming undone under some simple teasing? Fuhuhu…" Leaning closer, whispering to his ear, "My, how cute of you, Takeru."

"Don't tempt me."

"Huh?"

A hand reaches mine, fingers slowly sliding in between, gently squeezing. His back relaxes, resting against me, onto me. Looking back, our eyes meet, heads almost bumping, strands mixing. There is no longer a blush, only an ashen, downcast gaze left in him.

"Don't tempt me, Yuuko. I'm only human."

Gradually, he undoes the little lock, shakes his head and heaves a sigh. Turning around, a small frown, another tidal wave.

"And if you're just playing here… Believe me, you'll regret it."

"Sorry… Still, I do want you to stay here. Despite the issues that might come."

"… Is that your answer?"

"Sigh…" ruffling my hair, I sit on my desk. Meeting the frontal gaze, the ice which now covers him whole, I simply return the pleasantry. "If I want you to regain your citizenship, will you comply?" He nods. "If I want you to aid me in building a sustainable relation with Her Highness?" Again, an immediate nod. "If I… desire you to tell me about that poem?"

"That's off limits."

"Isn't it something important enough to allow me to see memories of other timelines?"

"If you can't recall it on your own, there's no point. Same reason for why you didn't straight up tell me I was this world's Shirogane after the CCSE, right?" He asks, smiling.

I can only groan and look away. "Heh, is that so?"

"If it's the results you want, I can tell you once we progress enough with Alt IV," Takeru affirms, standing straightly, in attention.

"… Good enough, I suppose. Still," I walk up to him, never lifting my gaze from his, again poking his neck with a finger, " get used to the idea of staying in this world, dragon."

"Keep your word and I will, Vice Commander."

"For the last time, it's Sensei. Or, if you want it so badly, you may call be by name," I tease with a smirk.

He steps back, shaking his head, looking down, collapsing down. "Anyways, get your thoughts in order and give me a clear answer, soon if you can. Without teasing involved," he adds, pursing his lips while messing with his hair. "So, you wanna rest or should I leave?"

"Hmm… You will write those reports I asked of you?" He nods, I smile. "Then, I suppose I could use the rest." Groaning as I stretch my arms upwards, I hear something crack. My lips part, a yawn roars out. "I… really do need some shuteye right now. Don't do anything stupid while I'm asleep, got it?"

"Yeah, yeah," he gives me a sideglance, arms folding. "You want lunch later?"

I rub an eye, swallowing another wild yawn. "Hm? Oh, yes, call for it. Wake me up before you leave for the training."

"Roger. Sweet dreams, Yuuko," he smirks, waving back.

"Yeah, whatever. I leave the office to you then, Takeru. "

"… Huh?"

"Hm?" I look back, he's gaping for some reason, blinking slowing to a halt, remaining quiet. "What?"

"How did you just… call me?"

"What is it? That's your name, isn't it?"

"I mean, yeah, but-"

"Anyways, I did overdo it today, so I accept your graceful offer," I turn around, rolling both shoulders up and down. "Don't exert yourself like last time, understood?" He nods, slowly, features tight for some reason. "Well, I am expecting a decent set of reports from you, Takeru. Do not disappoint me."

"… I won't," he salutes, gaining a small, yet honest, smile.

"Good. See you later, then," waving him off, I yawn without restrain. Again stretching my arms and arching my back, I slump back to my room.

… For now, I won't overload myself. I'll just note down what I think is important from what Takeru told me, and then I'll sleep. After all, he seems to be telling the truth. If harm can come to Her Highness… that completely changes the scenery.

But still, if he no longer wants to endow the mantle of the Black Fire, what is this 'dragon' to him? Now that I think about it, Shirogane hadn't mentioned anything regarding the cult yet. A memory gained from his experiences in this world? Or, perhaps, there are still secrets to unearth?

Well, for now, let's not focus on that lest I won't be able to fall asleep. At least we got good results in the tuning. Another thing to thank him for, I suppose.

Jester's Trickery

" You swore never to look back and yet, somehow, it's painful not to

This wasteland cracked by incessant drought is, truly, a perfect reflection of your soul

Beyond those eyes that blaze, all I see is abundant courage and a conflicting sadness swirling in

Unseen by everyone, alone you're washed away in the tears you shed

a current strong enough to cause an oceanic collapse

Even those who you're supposed to love will vanish from your mind, if you choose to endow the Great Red Dragon's mask

You carry grievous scars engraved deeply even within your dreams,

thus you hide them with the mask as you rush through the timeline

Hey, this is what divine retribution feels like, right?

Hey, this endless conflict is a masquerade

Hey, this is what celestial tears look like, right?

Hey, this tactical face-off is a masquerade

… Right?"

Masquerade, by Kosaka Yumiko. From Tekkaman Blade.

---

Chapter 86:

Jester's Trickery

---

December 5th. Some minutes past 2 PM.

(In the grounds of the Edo Palace.)

---

Hurried whispers traverse the tiles as journalists take notes, make calls, ready themselves to collect phrases off the record. The Capital Defense Regiment raises its arms in salutation, receiving a gentle smile from the Shogun as she descends from the small stage prepared for the occasion, a similar gesture is taken by the detachment of Imperial Guards from the palace stationed around her perimeter. A few flashes capture her silhouette as she approaches the leaders of the IJA's retinue, who kneel and bow in deference, a shiver enveloping them upon words of thankfulness from Her Highness. It soothes the parched heart of the Captain, assuages the displeasure the Guards had at being stationed to watch over her alongside the IJA.

The scarce natural light showering upon her features gives her already angelical smile further boons, as she walks by and both rows of Guards and IJA men raise and salute, forming a corridor of honor for her to return into the building. With only a simple wave of a hand she has all those present return bows and salutations, exaltation blooming into those watching the live footage, hands clasping around dry lips for those who heard her speech via the radio. As the first gust of dawn, cleansing the skyline of dark tints, burying the stars and refreshing the shine which upon the land delivers blessings.

And yet, the flashes only serve the unnerve, to unearth what little spikes are raking at her composure at the moment. Gulping, licking the inner side of her lips, she turns and returns to the innermost section of the palace grounds in slow yet long steps. The stalwart rampart that is Maya guarding her steps, shielding her Regent from any further inquiries, eventually the noise and chatter subside and leave silence as her sole escort.

Slow are the steps, slower the exhalation she releases. To pieces, the smile. To ashes, the eyes. No matter how much she tries to run, the welcoming tint is now gone. Lost to the undercurrents which she cannot tame, on those eyes she longs to see once again.

"According to our sources," Maya says, edging closer while trying to catch up, "your words had a positive effect in both the media and the soldiers. A few of our fellows already reported the balm your speech was to those in the shelters."

"… Is that so?" She answers, short and cold, never looking back.

"The other members of the Guard were in agreement with the necessity to enforce the evacuation, I believe there won't be any discussions arising to impede the command for the IJA to sortie."

"Is that so?"

"… Your Highness," she lowers to a whisper, towards her ear, "please do not hoist such apprehension. Certainly, news about him will be coming shortly."

"… Sigh. Forgive my lacking veneer, Maya. It is all… simply frustrating," she admits, a minute crossing of her brows. "All these years, and all I can hope for is to parley with time. When I should be acting as a guiding light, all I can afford is to leave the heavy lifting to another, simply suggest the course and not act to ensure it is taken. Sigh… "

"Please, Your Highness," Maya comforts, tapping her glasses, "you deflected most questions in grace, and I do not believe either side was left in disagreement. No doubt do I hoist that your performance was not lacking in any way," she affirms, and receives the same drowned answer again. Folding a sigh, knowing dissuading the Shogun would be as foolish as to compel her to cook, she simply shakes her head and desists.

Maya continues with her report on what she observed, yet as their walk continues they pass by a mirror. When gazing upon it, Yuuhi finds an empty glass returning her stare. Despite the gentle sunlight which invades through the glass and curtains, none of the warmth reaches her. It is, after all, nothing but a performance, an act. While understandable it is to soften reality's cruelty for their already battered population, to find no receptor for her truest words only furthers the ill mood she has been in as of late, the tension with which both lips press onto one another.

In the warfare of wordings that is the stage of politics, alliances could come and go in a heartbeat. And while in the local level, in the vicinity of Tokyo all those present had an agreement in certain key matters, such was not the same once you zoom out from the map.

"Excuse me, Your Highness," a voice calls, slow and tired. Tapping his glasses as he slowly approaches, Kurechika Sakaki bows down and remains in position, "Would you have the time to share some words?"

Inhaling sharply, bolting the edges of her lips upwards, she turns around and relents a small nod, endowing in docility and imitating the sun's gentle light. "Why, of course. Whatever is the matter, Kurechika-dono?"

Raising back, gesturing to his retinue to remain a few feet away, he looks back at her as he once more idles a hand on his glasses. "Regarding the arrangement for the evacuation, I have an inquiry to make. Why did you request for UN aid without consulting with our advisors?"

"Would there be a problem with my decision?" Blazes rise back despite the smile never vanishing, the gentle tilt of her head.

He clears his throat, slightly sticking his chest outwards in a, quite futile, attempt to ascertain his position. "Your Highness, while your concern is noted, please do not ignore the channels we've built between our offices. It is quite detrimental to my men to be left negotiating for a deal they knew little about."

"A report was forwarded to the Diet after the last meeting of the Regency Council," Maya states, glaring in venom. "Whatever caused a break in the chain of reports, I know not. Yet we did notify the course of action the Shogunate had arrived to, Prime Minister," she says, slowly bowing, if only for the Shogun's sake.

"Still," the man's eyes squint, words slow, taking his sweet time to ponder and brew them, "please do not try and act on your own anymore, Your Highness. I can comprehend the negotiations for the Type-00C were made as a proposal from your fellowship, yet the Diet needs to debate on whether we desire to accept the UN's aid as of now," he notes, tapping his glasses, breaking eye contact.

"… Would you possess a method which could allow our forces to proceed with the evacuation as soon as possible?" She presses, eyes regressing downwards.

"It is my duty to oversee that matter," he affirms, eyes holding the stare. "If you so desired, a call to the advisors was all that you required to do. Yes, it might have taken a few more days to debate the matter, yet it is only the way things have to be handled."

"… Then, may I inquire on the other propositions I forwarded? Because I've yet to hear an answer from your fellows, Kurechika-dono," Yuuhi requests, raising her chin, the acid despite never losing that small, gentle smile. "I know many are the tasks which upon your shoulders rest, yet, certainly, a meager answer wouldn't take more than a few weeks, you'd agree."

"Huh? Ah, well…" he slowly turns to face the window, coughing. "There are some concerns about the plans you've presented that we do not have the manpower to make a reality." Another slow bow, voice as dry as his complexion, sealing the Shogun's words in a bottle, throwing it towards a twister.

"Is that so?" And closing her eyes, heaving a sigh, lips then press together for a moment.

"Yes, that is the case. Currently, we do not possess the-"

"However, I believe that, for example, Mitsuhishi's R&D has already received plentiful boons from us," she notes, fingers entwining, about to tear apart the frail veil of restrain which holds the facade, the blazes at bay. "Wouldn't it be in our best interests to employ the surplus to, finally, finish the adaption of the Kanamachi Waterworks?" She states with a rapid nod. After all, it never had quite sunk, the motives behind that delay.

Yet, even now, as she gently compacts both lips and stares firmly in blazes at the Prime Minister, the Shogun also knows that the towering funds to make the Takemikazuchi a reality had to come from somewhere. And as harsh as it is to admit, to let matters rest, to focus on avenues that produce further earnings is what a nation in shambles like the Empire should do. Such was the conviction she held onto, to await the rebound and be able to fulfill the task without risk.

And yet, even a mere gesture is denied to the population. Despite the rising tensions, despite the already grim horizon which upon the Empire falls.

Kurechika coughs, idling a hand on his tie. "Your Highness, as you know, we have contracts to answer to, quotas to fulfill. It is not yet time," he bows down, brows almost crossing, almost breaking the mask. "Furthermore, our industries are what drives this nation forward. Without the budget assigned to them, the already dire situation with spare parts for our armies would only worsen. Once we can compact the defense lines, we'll hold another meeting to discuss this matter," he affirms, relenting a small smile.

Yet a subtle narrowing overtakes those purple eyes, a step forward she takes. "Certainly, we cannot simply let time pass us by. When the remaining of the population is brought to the shelters, everything that comes with that would soon follow. What of using the available infrastructure for new locations to house the people?"

"Ahem… Your Highness, each district has its own stance on the buildings left in decent shape," he states, holding her gaze, tapping her glasses before turning to the window once more. "The distribution centers are already plentiful to keep the situation under control."

Yuuhi simply inhales sharply, shoulders raise as her hands fold behind her back. "Is that so. I suppose, then, my words are not required for the moment. We shall discuss these matters… when the time is right," she nods, slowly turning away.

"Excuse me, Your Highness," Kurechika presses, now clearly shrugging his lips. "Could you kindly revise your decision to have the UN intervene in the evacuation efforts?" He bows in haste, a cold shudder enveloping him at Maya's glare.

Yuuhi waves a hand, defusing the heat and having her retainer take a step back. "Why would you desire so? Our men are in need of aid after the last defense operation from the herd that surfaced in Niigata. I believe it is our duty to ensure the evacuation can proceed smoothly."

"Yet, the risk of altercations in the field is too large to ignore, Your Highness," he says, wiping his forehead, coughing again. "Not only with our own soldiers, but think of how the population will react to seeing UN crew asking them to leave their," his lips purse, fingers shuffle around, "rightful land. It would be a disaster if those sent had to complete the evacuation by force, as their own code forbids them from abandoning civilians under danger. If the volcano were to erupt-"

"Then, an immediate approval would solve that issue," Yuuhi counters, choking a strand of hair, letting it go, not softening her expression. "The sooner the UN receives an answer, the sooner the operation can be coordinated and executed. I understand the possibility of reticence festering in the people, yet isn't because of that why you've requested me to speak today?"

"Well… while I can see your point," he grimaces for a moment, a small shape holding a Chop-kun doll flashing through his mind, hands which tighten upon his pockets' innards, "to leave that duty to UN soldiers would be-"

A small step, a cough coming from behind breaks the link between both stares and both loosen their posture. Yuuhi turns and finds Tsuhi standing in attention, bowing down as they make eye contact. Maya flinches, once more failing to notice the presence until the last moment, yet as Tsuhi does not look her way, the retainer knows the intrusion is fueled by honest concern.

Without letting a single ripple disturb her composure, the shinobi garbed in gray slowly starts. "Yuuhi-sama, I have a report for your ears," she says as slowly as usual, staring as she raises back. As the Shogun relents a nod, holding her breath, the shinobi grows closer, she so whispers. "Mana-sama has called, with quite the urgent report."

"How urgent are we speaking of? I'm in the middle of an important discussion, you see."

"… More important than learning of what Takeru remembered?" She asks, giving a small smile.

"… Kurechika-dono, something has come to my attention and I must tend to this immediately," she states, looking back, relenting a nod. "Please excuse my hasty departure, but I must return to my chamber."

The man swallows a sigh, once more tapping his glasses and straightening his posture. "Oh, I see. However, regarding the-"

"I shall be calling your office so that we can debate at large. Until then," she spares a smile before turning on her heels and moving to the elevator, outpacing both Maya and Tsuhi who must first give the expected courtesy to the Prime Minister before departing after the hasty steps.

"Your Highness, please remain composed," Maya so requests, sighing at the lack of deceleration. "2nd Lt Yasomaga, whatever is the matter? Did something disturb the departure of the Chains?"

"As a matter of fact, yes," Tsuhi notes, twirling a curl in her hair, gaining a gaze from Yuuhi as Maya's arms fold and compact. "It seems Fujikagi-kun did not wish to say his 'See you later', so Raiho-sama had quite the trouble in pacifying him. Worry not, however, as they are already on the road," she says with a faint smile, which the Shogun imitates for a second, a second of calmness.

Maya simply sighs, shaking her head slowly. "I see… Then, what other matter has caused you to interrupt the discussion?"

"… I cannot say, not here," she lowers her eyelids, facing forward, not reacting upon a frontal stare.

Maya groans momentarily, looking away from the impregnable shadow who refuses to return her gaze. As the three make it to the elevator and await its descent, nothing is said. Once inside the narrowness, Yuuhi relents quite the heavy sigh, shoulders sagging, posture beginning to melt.

"I assume Mana has forwarded a report?" Maya inquires, resting onto the wall.

Tsuhi nods, electing to remain silent, not meeting the retainer's gaze. Maya gulps, sudden heaviness in her gut. Yuuhi coughs, a searing glare demanding silence, which is answered by two immediate nods.

Little it takes for them to reach the audience chamber, despite Maya's request to have the Shogun slow down once again.

"Please, Your Highness. Such disquiet in your features will certainly cause concern in the attendants," she repines once inside the chamber, sighing when she gains no answer. Coughing, she turns to her right, finds nothing, and with a shrug of her lips glances at her left, where Tsuhi stands, raising a brow. "2nd Lt Yasomaga, this is… about Takeru, isn't it?"

She nods subtly, as slowly as if having just awoken. "Indeed. It seems he has recalled who Yohime-sama was," she simply says, as if commenting on the weather.

The words send a jolt into the other two's bodies, the paralysis causing Yuuhi's feet to meet the wood and almost stumble face first onto it. A minute wobbling until balance returns to her posture, a blaze of a gaze then blasts towards the humble shadow.

"Excuse me?! You said… Did you just said he remembered Mother?!"

"So I said, yes," she repeats, brows lowering, lips ever so slightly pursing.

"Wait a moment," Maya asks, features contorting yet finding no words for a second, lost as a penguin in a desert, "does that mean Takeru has finally recalled everything?"

"I do not know," she answers, slow. "Mana-sama has reported that Takeru was granted leave from the medbay yesterday, without them knowing of it for some unexplainable reason. According to their words, he is now training as if," he looks away, idling a hand on her hair again, "he were preparing for a sortie, like we were when stationed here."

"… Tsuhi, whatever do you speak of?" Yuuhi asks, feeling a slight needle on the back of her head, fingers coiling in. "Is he once again being tasked to resume his piloting training?"

"In a simulator, it seems," she nods, arms folding onto her back.

Hands wring, throat as well and blocks incoming air. A small poke of pain on the sides of her head, Yuuhi's eyes close, as tightly as a vault. "But I requested… The XO said she would ensure he would remain in good health."

"Ahem," tapping her glasses, she stares at the petite shinobi, "were Mion and Shion able to interact with him?"

"Yes, it seems he does not have any issues with them following as his guardians. However," she notes, lips pursing, "they informed that the small ESPer which works as an assistant to the XO has displayed an odd closeness with him."

"… Pardon?" Yuuhi inquires, a brow twitches. Maya sighs and shakes her head at the poor choice of words.

Meanwhile, Tsuhi simply nods back, immutable as a frozen lake except for the minute shrug in her lips as she raises her voice ever so slightly. "I said, they reported that the ESPer has been looking after Takeru, it seems. The cousins do not seem to favor the assistant being around him, despite Takeru openly referring to it as a 'friend'."

"I see…" she says, sighing as she finally sits down, fingers interlocking as her hands gently fall onto her lap. "So how did… how did they learn Takeru recalled who Mother was?"

Clearing her throat, she takes a step forward and kneels before the Regent. "You see, it would seem Meiya-sama has made a… folly in her interactions with my Leader," she says, somber, features growing tight. "Her obstinacy in demanding answers from him drove Takeru to fighting her without restrain, causing him to grow pained after the fact. Not only that, but it seems her attitude has caused friction to brew in the cadet squadron as well."

"… What a foul turn of events," Yuuhi laments, rubbing her forehead, looking down. For as she envied her sister's resolve, the Shogun can only feel a void at the thought of what imposing the dogma of the Imperial Guard onto the soldier could cause. "Did he react negatively towards Meiya?"

Tsuhi shakes her head hastily. "It seems he desired to coexist with her, until she, believing him to be a spy, countered in hostility. After that, it seems he was driven to performing equal to, well," she purses her lips again, shoulders compacting, "whenever he began spinning. Then after their training was over, amidst wails heard before the common channel was closed, it would seem he uttered Yohime-sama's name."

"Huh? After the battle? Not due to Meiya's resemblance to her?" Yuuhi asks, leaning forward.

Both hers and Maya's features begin to widen upon Tsuhi's full report of how he himself mentioned the resemblance Meiya had to who handed him the blade, his desire to share said bond with Meiya as he had insisted when a child he still was, yet in equal measure they contort when learning he denied the query, that the cousins were unable to follow him to his next assignment, his stoic rejected towards both of them in favor of young Yashiro.

Yuuhi nods, treading her hair, looking at the balcony. "So it is all thanks to Meiya breaking her orders to notify Mana that we learned of this… Sigh. Maya, go and contact Mana posthaste. It seems XO Kouzuki owes us a report on Takeru's condition," she orders, raising her chin, her voice.

And causes a flinch from her retainer, who immediately shakes her head as she steps forward. "Your Highness, please reconsider," Maya requests, brushing her bangs, adjusting her posture to not receive the brunt of the sunlight, of the light's blaze of a gaze. "Do not act on emotion, it will only open wounds for others to strike back at us. Perhaps, Kouzuki does not yet know of his ties to Yohime-sama, and simply learning that name would be enough for her to retrace the trail."

Her eyes narrow yet there is no blink, her smile raises as dawn yet the composure remains frozen. "Whatever are you saying, Maya? All I wish to do is extend some advice to the Vice Commander so that she can press for the relief efforts to be authorized shortly, due to the reticence Kurechika-dono's crew seem to hold towards the notion of welcoming Yokohama's involvement."

"H-However-"

"Certainly, we both agree that it is imperative for the order to sortie to be forwarded to the respective offices posthaste?"

"Yes, milady, of course. However, clashing against Kouzuki will-"

"I am not planning to do nothing of the sort," she affirms, hands enveloping each other a bit more, fuming a slight ember out. "Tsuhi, do the cousins believe Takeru is, well, stable enough to hold a conversation with?" Yuuhi inquires, forcing Maya to pinch her nose and sigh heavily.

The shinobi returns a quick nod, her features do not relax. "Yes, although they did not try to breach the subject of his profiles. Also, Meiya-sama said, it seems, that Takeru believes he cannot approach Mana-sama at the moment."

"It's understandable," Maya nods, tilting her chin downwards. "After such an accident, anyone would try and steer clear of the Imperial Guard. More so if suffering through painful memories, or the dread of further punishments. Yet, I still believe composure and patience are your allies, Your Highness," she affirms, bowing down.

"While I do not wish to pile further pressure upon the board, this… truly does merit an inquiry. Maya, contact Mana and relay my request for a talk with the XO. Now," she commands, staring as her retainer stalled a motion.

Maya relents a sigh as she nods and stands, taking a second to salute before immediately departing. Once outside, however, her steps wane momentarily, gaze losing itself to the clouds above, thinking about the soldier, on what he could have recalled, extending a prayer as she taps her glasses.

Yuuhi idles some seconds looking at the skies, at the threads of light which fall upon the room. "Tsuhi, did the cousins report how he was after this training he shared with Meiya?"

"It seems he was tired but unhurt," she notes, softly. "However, as I said before, he stalwartly defended the ESPer as he used to retort when we worked under the Swordbreakers."

"Is… that so."

"Although, the cousins did mention he requested them to not be hostile towards the assistant, and also kept an amicable posture towards them during their talks at morning. In due time, I believe he might reach out on his own to the Tsukuyomi," Tsuhi concludes, in an attempt to appease the combustion which within the Shogun erupts.

At the very least, the smoke veils the fire as she shakes her head. "I hope so, too. So," clearing her throat, her inner clouds and raising a smile, she fiddles with her hair, "what else did Meiya mention? Is her training proceed well?"

Tsuhi corks a brow, lips plucking. "Yes, it seems her efforts are still yielding good results, and that she does not wish to enhance the rift in the squadron. However, Mana-sama mentioned that there was something troubling her, lamenting how she hadn't taught Meiya-sama of whatever this was before. She hastily changed the topic when I inquired about it."

"Huh, is that so? I can only hope Meiya remains stoic in the face of adversity, and whatever is troubling her at the moment." And that Kouzuki does not take her offer back upon Kurechika-dono's concerns.

Looking back at the skies, pacing towards the balcony, her gaze loses itself in the azure expansion. In days past, in those visits he used to pay her, in those first days when he had just moved into the fellowship. Holding, gripping, choking the railing as she slowly exhales, wondering what it is that the soldier remembered, how he felt about the words they shared during the call. Knowing it's better not to hope, yet finding her rising heartbeats disagreeing with the notion.

---

Some moments later.

(Yokohama Base, Mana's room.)

[Mana]

---

"Look, I do agree with you," Maya repines from the other side of the line, heaving a sigh, "yet Her Highness was clear in her wishes and I doubt could be dissuaded from this decision. Could you arrange a call with the XO?"

"Sigh… I'll see what I can do," I answer, a finger gently rubbing the outer side of an eye. "I did assume a quick reaction would arise but, for Yuuhi-sama to once more endow aggression as her method of choice…" It is not odd, no, it always has been what followed when he could ever have been in any danger, yet for her to still favor this approach at this point in time. I sigh and slowly throw myself onto my chair, careful not to fall again.

"By the by, Mana," Maya asks, lowering her tone, retreating to the ice cage, "did Takeru truly recall who Yohime-sama was?"

"We don't know yet. Meiya-sama affirmed she heard the name clearly, and if so, his confusion would be understandable," I admit, a faint numbness on the back of my head. There's also the gesture the cousins reported, however whether that was unconscious or deliberate would be hard to confirm. "I assume Her Highness would desire to platicate with him once again?"

"Sigh… Yes, certainly. While I do not believe it wise, her orders are clear. There is also the matter I told you about, to at least maintain appearances with the fox and see whether she honors her word," she says, a venomous tincture brewing. "Now that Raiho-sama has departed, it is perhaps the most auspicious time for Her Highness and Kouzuki to platicate again."

"… I assume she did not retract her words?" Maya groans, I sigh and place my full palm onto my face, resting onto the chair, lifting the legs off the floor.

"I shall concede that the points she raised were valid," she starts, slow and frozen. "However, to still put into question the resolve of the Shogun, it is nothing but treason."

"… Yet, if not for that, perhaps Yuuhi-sama wouldn't be acting with as much haste as she is. If she already had extended an offer to aid him, and he has recalled anything at all, there is no point in focusing in such petty details."

"Sigh… I suppose," she relents, leaving silence hanging for a moment. I know those two never got along well, more after the invasion, yet I want to believe both you and Raiho share the same goal, as I do too. A small cough, a contained snowfall follows. "In any case, please do not dally in requesting this call. If you can try and garner anything to at least placate the blaze, it would be much appreciated," she tells, weary, with the decaying impulse of one final, dried leave forever departing from a branch.

"Understood. I shall be trying to attain an answer soon enough. If the cousins find anything else, I shall be relaying that alongside my report later at night," I affirm, resting the chair back on the floor, straightening myself and smoothing my dress.

"Copy that. Godspeed, Mana," she says, lowering her tone, her guard, slumping within the cage before cutting the connection.

Resting the comms onto the wood, slowly letting my arms come into a soft knot, I simply stare at the desk as I move my neck to the sides, hearing something crack. Not only the cousins' full report, regarding the ESPer's closeness towards Takeru and his own adusted reaction, but Meiya-sama's account on his words paints a harsh visage looming behind the horizon. Takeru always sings during battle, yet the tone indicates the motive, the wording his goals. He was truly upset, from the bottom of his heart, if the savagery of his shouts was not exaggerated by Meiya-sama. If he recalled something and he does not desire to approach us, is he confusing the memories? Not believing them? Or, perhaps, could Kouzuki have a hand in this?

Going by his reactions during the fight and his reluctance to approach me, could he believe we restrained him after Kageyuki-san's death? It is odd Kouzuki hasn't tried to inquire on the matter, too, if he disclosed anything to her. Rubbing my forehead, another sigh leaves me as I look up.

I suppose, waiting is all that can be done now. Meiya-sama and both cousins should gain anything from their interactions with him, and hopefully that will be enough to assuage Her Highness' ill mood. If Takeru has remained silent, Kouzuki must be bidding her time to breach the subject and not risk him suffering from any recoil. And if not I do not pity her, for the retribution Yuuhi-sama shall unleash is an end I do not wish upon even my enemies.

Opening a drawer, I take out the UN communicator I was given, slowly tapping at the buttons, searching the ID of the proper channel. Taking in a sharp breath, crossing a leg and pinching my chin, I input the command and bring the device to my ear.

I'll have to mind my words carefully, lest she'll treat this as further pressure, intimidation. I assume, she should be aware of what happened in the training and perhaps will deem us a hazard, perhaps even remove the cousins from his side due to their reaction against the ESPer.

The automatic receiver answers from the other side, asking for me to input the Code for the office I desire to be connected to. Quickly following with the XO's quarters, the machine takes a moment before accepting the connection, the tune echoing once again. I know the fox has expressly requested I only call her directly in case of emergency, yet these matters with the negotiations for the relief efforts should suffice. If she hangs once I try and delve into the other subject, that is a plentiful answer in and of itself.

Still, it is imperative to alert her of the block to the negotiations. So long as Kouzuki keeps her end of the deal, time is all Takeru needs, and perhaps a showing of fellowship. He did… request empathy out of me during the mock battle. Considering what he had to do, the role he had to play… Sigh. Again tilting back on the chair, I ruffle and twirl my hair. I should have been more careful, should have actually listened to his words. If only the XO could allow another talk with him… I doubt we will be able to share some words any time soon, Takeru. I only hope you are faring-

"Vice Commander's office. What may I do for you?"

"… Huh?" That voice… Did I hear that wrong?

"Could you hear me well?" He asks, coughing, a small jolt running from my nape to my heels. "You're speaking with XO Kouzuki's office. What business may I help you with?"

This is voice… This is-

A small creaking sound, my vision bends, the chair tips backwards and I slam against the floor. "Oof… Ugh…" Twice in the same day, to make matters worse.

"Um, excuse me? Is everything alright?" He asks, softly, the voice not changing at all.

I roll and rest my palm on the floor, slowly lifting myself, coughing softly. "Cadet Shirogane, is that you?"

"Ah… Yes, that is the case," he says, slightly slowing down his tone. "What can I help you with, 1st Lt Tsukuyomi?"

"Why- Why are you picking up this line? Where is the Vice Commander?" I ask, pulling the chair back up, brows crossing as I slowly sit.

" XO Kouzuki is AFK at the moment."

"What? Oh, you mean absent, right?" If my memory isn't failing me, that is.

"Yeah…" he stalls the words, seeming to groan a bit, just a bit. "So, as per my punishment, I am now tasked with receiving calls and redirecting them to the proper offices, or leave notes in case anyone requires to speak directly with the XO," he tells, simply and flatly, before coughing again. "What may I help you with?"

"Ahem… First, would you be in good health at the moment?"

"Yes, thanks for asking."

"I see… Cadet, allow me to apologize over what transpired in the mock battle. I did not intend my words to-"

"It's fine, don't bother," he says, lightly, a small glimmer gliding over the horizon, through the line. "On the contrary, it was my fault that things spiraled out of control. There is no blame on you, ma'am."

"Is that so?" I nod, licking my lips, compacting upon myself for a second as I ponder what to say. "It is good to know. Were you told of what was already arranged on the matter?"

"… No, not yet," he tells, slow, delayed and leaving a moment of silence hanging. "Am I correct in assuming no further inquiries will be forwarded?"

"Only if and when you welcome them, cadet. We only desire to aid you with the databases, nothing more. By the by… About our discussion during the battle-"

"Please, let's not. Our views don't match, we'll never see eye to eye," he deflects, affirming the absoluteness of his answer. "I understand that we come from different worlds, 1st Lt. After all…" he short, hollow sigh, a second of silence, "those of the Imperial Guard do believe Heaven can only be reached through Pandemonium."

"Wh- Excuse me, what?" I hit the wood, pursing my lips in a futile attempt to halt my words. "Cadet, that is not the case. Such a mantra is not what the IRG practices."

"Oh, for real?" He asks, slow, dismissive. "You did disagree with me back there, even if I do admit I got too heated about my, well, naive and ignorant ideals ."

"We were merely arguing semantics," I counter, again pinching my nose, leaning into the desk as the venom of those last words constricts over my throat. "No warrior would desire death to be the sole metric upon which a life's worth is judged, I was merely saying there is no need to so harshly judge the actions of those who came before you since… it could take you down a path of wrath, rejecting their efforts. I… may not know what tribulations have you endured, yet I do not think our views to be opposites."

"… I see. So, why have you called the office? Would you like to leave a note for the XO ?" He replies, monotonous yet still sounding welcoming, flowing easily as a calm river.

"Ahem… I heard the cousins had some trouble before with the assistant of the Professor?"

"Is that why you've called the office?"

"One of the matters it is, yes. Allow me to apologize in their stead, they are… not very welcoming towards foreigners," I relent, resting onto the wood.

"Oh, yes, I already know that. Very well, in fact," he tells, almost in jest, probably rolling his eyes. "Don't worry, I don't plan to let them argue with Kasumi. So long as we can coexist, it's all good. Just tell them to not think of approaching Kasumi as they did earlier, security will be forced to intervene," he warns, a slow thunder, the same shaving tone he employed when a shadow he was.

"Of course, I understand," I answer quickly, idling a finger atop a pencil, making it roll. "If I may, why were we not notified of your return to the training course yesterday night? The cousins should have escorted you to the sim room and back, according to our agreement."

He chuckles shortly, light and melting the ice from his voice. "It's cool, I insisted to go train to get back in the groove. The XO simply didn't want to pressure you in the middle of the night, is all."

"Is that so…" The cheer and usual relaxed tone tells he isn't hiding anything, yet I doubt XO Kouzuki would risk this to be misunderstood.

"I also didn't know they were assigned to follow me when I went to train, so the blame lays on me, really," he adds a second later.

"Eh? Did the XO not notify you?"

"Not until I was ready to return to my cell, no."

Hmm… How curious. I had assumed the woman was being truthful when she said Takeru would remain in good hands, yet here we are apparently. Gripping the pencil, pressing my lips, I sheathe my words and choose to slowly exhale instead.

"I see. So, you've been tasked to do office work for the XO personally?"

"Not like I could be elsewhere without risks or forcing the 2nd Lts to stay close. Really, I'm doing less than you'd expect," he chuckles again, the sound of some ruffling papers coming up. "Well, did you require anything else?"

"I had an inquiry for the XO herself, when may I call back?"

"Hmm… After 1500 hours she should be back here in person. Is there anything you'd like to relay to the Vice Commander ?" He asks in a corporate tone once again, it makes my teeth sink onto my lips, flick the pencil to the other end of the desk.

"No, it is an important matter, so simply tell her I shall be calling back."

"Understood. Anything else, 1st Lt Tsukuyomi?"

"Would you be in a hurry?" I ask, swaying in the chair again, frowning a bit at the hastiness with which he desires to end our talk.

"Not really, I just need to finish sorting some papers. Did you want to leave another message?" He says, still keeping that fake business tone.

"I would… be wishing to ask you for some minutes to platicate. Would that be agreeable?"

A moment of silence extends, enough to force a gulp out of me.

The flop of a heavy stack of papers in the distance comes up, before the whirring of a chair reaches my ears

"What exactly would you be wishing to ask of me, 1st Lt, ma'am?" He asks, back to the shaving wording, the forced formality.

"I assume cadet Mitsurugi held some… mistaken views towards you? Do not mistake them as her true feelings, we do no wish to antagonize you, cadet."

"I see."

"… And, if you ever need to depart to the medbay, do inform the cousins. We cannot be too careful as things stand nor do we desire to impair your training regime."

"I see."

… Takeru, please. "Ahem… So, if there is ever anything you'd desire to talk about with us, do not hesitate to reach out. I was told you… believe it is dangerous to approach me, yet that is not the case. I hoist no animosity towards you, cadet Shirogane," I state, giving a small palm to the desk.

"I see. Thanks for the gesture, ma'am," he utters, faint as a cloud, undisturbed like pure snow, cold.

"No, it is nothing… I only hope you truly do not hoist any mistaken views of us, and I reiterate my apology towards you."

"Really, don't," he tells, another small glimmer through the blizzard. "It ain't your fault, I lost my cool first."

"It was still my miss, as the officer I am. Thus, well, is there anything you'd wish to request out of me? If you were wishing for our aid, my ears are open," I ask, holding my breath, clutching the comms closer.

"… I assume Her Highness asked you to inquire about me regaining my citizenship?"

"Eh? Ah, well, yes… I was told you… platicated with her for some moments," I admit, slow gestures as I swipe my hair off my forehead. "Would you wish to accept our aid to restore your databases?"

"… That won't be necessary, but thanks for the offer," he says, downcast.

"Pardon? What do you mean, it isn't necessary?"

"Opportunities don't arrive freely, 1st Lt," he tells, slow as I hear him start to spin in a chair. "Talent on its own cannot break through the clouds, so making the most out of the chances you get is important, I think."

"… Huh?" But those words… I told him that many moons ago. If you recall that then, "Why refuse our aid? Isn't this a prime opportunity for you? You could… become a fellow once again, after all."

"Aren't you seeing me as something I'm not, ma'am?"

"Something, instead of someone. Could you enlighten me on the meaning of said words?"

"Heh… Well, you're helping out due to," he stops, words and the spin, as pungency permeates his voice, "who you believe I could be. But that's not who I am now. So, could we please try and coexist as things stand now?"

"… I believe Her Highness herself had made it clear, that you are a fellow of ours. Whether you choose to regain your identity or not, at the very least your citizenship has to be returned to you."

"… Maybe later. Let's not force any issues, please, ma'am," he asks, dull, low, vanishing in image of the afterglow surrendering to dusk.

"What are we speaking of? The Shogun herself has confirmed-"

"1st Lt, ma'am, certainly you can see what issues will arise if someone like me were to be shielded by Her Highness?" He asks in assertion, once more endowing the sting of a blizzard. "This is no time to be spawning rifts, 1st Lt. Someone of my station has nothing to offer in return of the favor that it is to be granted the goodwill of the Shogun."

"That… might be so, yes," hands curl in before flicking the pencil again, before resting a brow upon my fingers, "however, you are the son of a vassal. It would be a most regrettable shame if-"

"What would be a shame is Her Highness suffering through undeserved setbacks due to the aid she has extended towards me, a mere peasant," he affirms, once again without hesitation or delay, absolute as the dusk of a new moon night. "Even if wild horses wouldn't drag her away as of now," he says, with a light chuckle, "if these issues were noticed, many would be the troubles going her way. It is far easier to mend the databases and simply let me be, to avoid any ties to be brought to you."

"… What are you saying? You don't even know-"

"Now, 1st Lt Tsukuyomi," he says, coughing, frosting, "if my memories of my talk with Her Highness are not mistaken, she had forwarded the idea that someone from the fellowship had been hired by my late Father to take care of me while he was on duty."

The formal telling, the molded wording brings tension to my stomach, recalling the whisper, the steps of the shadow that once followed, judged from afar. So I cough, place my free hand on the base of my neck. "That might be the case, I assume. If so, do you not desire to-"

"Do you not think it is extremely selfish of me, to try and entangle those people with my current woes?" He asks, once again low, the snow melting away. "There is little a baseborn like me can offer in offering for these favors, much less if being linked to me brings judgment and trouble to your fellowship. I'm sure that such a gesture towards a commoner won't be taken well by the more… intense members of the IRG, just as Mitsurugi reacted against me."

"But that is not-"

"You should know, better than me, that there are many threads tied into the knot you're trying to untie, how it all weights on the Shogun's shoulder. And how time is of essence and she cannot spare the horses. To either face the error in the databases exposed or for her mingling with a commoner to be discovered, someone as violent as me, who is in UN, would be nothing short of fair for Her Highness, wouldn't you agree?"

Nibbling at my bottom lip upon the ice blade hewn into the voice, contraction coming to my neck and shoulders, I simply sigh, heavy. "While that is true, and your concern over Her Highness is welcomed, you are deserving of a reward. Do you not desire to search for the ties that you once had?"

"If wishes were horses, beggars would ride. And Her Highness shouldn't be forced to beat a dead horse, it's better for me to remain as I am now."

"… Do you not think abandoning you to fate would be far more cruel, far worse on the Shogun's image?"

"It if it prevents rifts from spawning, yes," he tells, simply, coldly, as if merely announcing an obvious answer. "Please remember that, even in the most favorable case, you are still wanting Her Highness the Shogun to favor a baseborn UN soldier that killed your fellow Japanese."

"You should be aware the CCSE is not a fair metric upon which to judge you!" I hit the wood, sending the pencil to the floor, feeling my lips fold in, air barely seeping through my throat.

He simply sighs. "And you should know how the intel would be taken, and how it will be used to pressure her. She has done enough for me, as you have too, by not forcing a brand upon me for possessing a Minaru Kamui illegally. Thanks, really, but," he takes a second, sighing softly, I then hear the chain spinning once more, "I think you'd agree that it is for the greater good to not rock the boat. Nothing good will come out from letting such shadows linger near the light, I'm sure you'd agree, 1st Lt."

"… What?" Did he just… Is he holding a grudge? No, wait, he shouldn't- Did he remember?! "Cadet, what are we speaking about? Certainly, simply restoring your rightful citizenship can not be the source of such concern."

"Well… No, but it's true that I don't want more problems to happen because of me. Both Her Highness and the Vice Commander have much to deal with, there is no need to pile on further pressure," he says, back to a rather normal tone.

"Her Highness had already expressed her wish for you to regain your identity, right? Could the XO be… behind this rejection you're displaying?"

"She is not pleased, to be honest. How would you feel if a mere cadet was giving you such trouble when you have more pressing matters at hand? Sure, I don't really know what's going on in the base, but the Vice Commander was on edge lately so I assume something serious is happening, or going to," he tells, heaving a sigh.

I see, if the announcement is to be believed then, the project is about to bestow results. To be faced with Her Highness' ire while she rather be finishing the preparations on her end must have been excruciatingly arduous, yet the words she gave indicated she desired Takeru to remain under her. Was she merely admonishing him?

"So," he coughs, "all I'm trying to do is make myself useful, making the most of what little time I have left." Huh? What does that- "While I thank your deference, there's no need for you to bother with the likes of me, 1st Lt Tsukuyomi, ma'am."

"Excuse me, what did you mean before?"

"If you'd permit me," he continues, unaffected, again low and sharp, "I believe you should be more concerned over the ripples my identity could have if and when the XO inevitably asks me to regain my Japanese citizenship. How the threads that will fall once this knot is untied could cause a premature sunset."

Eyes widen as do my lips, yet I do not take in air. "… Wait, are you-"

"Thus, please do fulfill your duty, 1st Lt Tsukuyomi. Stop looking out for someone who is no more, and do ensure nothing weakens Her Highness or troubles the XO . I'd hate myself if either of them were to be placed in jeopardy due to my presence, so kindly cease your inquiries. And, if and when no bad apples can get in the way… maybe then we can continue this conversation, 1st Lt, ma'am."

"I see… If such is your wish, I shall respect it. Would there be anything you'd like to request or express? If only as a gesture of goodwill."

"… Well, some pudding would be real nice right now."

"Pudding, huh… Do you favor such desserts, cadet?"

"Yeah, I liked homemade pudding much. Still, nothing I can do under the punishment. Well, I've got some papers to tackle so if there's nothing else, I'll be hanging up."

"If I may, was this concern of yours towards Her Highness… sparked by the conference?"

"Conference?" He asks, finally breaking the relaxed tone, back to the unsheathed blade.

"Yes, you see, Her Highness held a conference moments ago, where she expressed her feelings on the current situation of the Empire. Were you not allowed to listen to it?" I ask, low, hand in my face.

"… Sadly, as you can see, I was left in an office to handle paperwork. It sucks, but I suppose I'll hear something in the hallways," he repines a bit, spinning in the chair once more.

So you were left unable to hear the announcement, huh. Interesting and curious, indeed. "Would these tasks not be taking their toll on you, cadet? You did seem rather exhausted after the training, according to the cousins," leaning on the desk, pinching my chin, I focus.

On the small sigh, the sudden halt of the spin. "Yeah, just a bit," and the weary and decaying tone he now makes. "It is what it is, though. Tell the 2nd Lts not to worry, I can take this."

"Were you not given any aid? I had assumed the assistant would also join in such tasks?"

"No, as of now I am on my own. I am sure you know, but Kasumi isn't the XO's assistant just for show. Anyways, was there anything else?"

Treading my hair, I cough and try to clear the dryness of my lips, straightening my posture on the chair. "I did have one final query. If you were in need of aid, perhaps, couldn't you request the one known as Kagami to support you? I believed you worked alongside-"

"Excuse me, what was that?" He cuts, searing, blazing as when the shadow of black fire he was.

"… What is the matter?" I compact, the same cold shiver running down my nape as whenever he used to stand behind me during those days.

"Where did you hear… No, why did Meiya tell you about her? You wouldn't have forced her to speak, would you 1st Lt, ma'am?" He asks, demands, short and precise as a simple volley, yet still burning a small injury upon my throat.

"… Ahem. If you must know, Meiya-sama was concerned over the words you spoke during your sparring. She merely thought it wise to notify us that, well, her views of you were mistaken. I then informed her you were not under suspicions, and that the cousins were following you under protection and not otherwise."

"And why did she speak about Kagami?" He presses, not dulling the impulse of the arrow, the glare of the dragster chasing me down.

"Please, do not hoist such apprehension, cadet. Meiya-sama was merely concerned over your special assignments taking a toll on your constitution," I say, relenting a sigh, narrowing brows, lips and legs. "Is this Kagami not aiding you as of now?"

"1st Lt, as I asked of Mitsurugi, you should not delve into this matter. Ever. I asked her to keep this a secret for a reason, dammit," he states, still blazing.

"… Why, it seems that everything around you is a secret. You're like a box full of mysteries."

"This is hardly a matter to jest about, 1st Lt Tsukuyomi," he warns, I can sense the scorching of his composure peeling away. "I will have to ask of you to kindly not divulge a word to anyone else about her."

"May I ask the motives behind such… adusted impulse residing in your words?"

"Because Kagami's situation is very delicate, she is as important as Kasumi. If anything is disclosed about her, and if the XO finds it was because of me, you can bet she's gonna lose her marbles. Please, I know I cannot ask much of you, but take my standing into account if you will, 1st Lt."

"There is no need for such words, I do not wish to worsen your situation, cadet. And, you are a fellow of ours. If that is your wish, I shall respect it," I sigh, nodding, my free arm embracing my upset stomach. "Still, it is quite curious. Why would you be placed near such key individuals, if your situation is so delicate?"

"Well, they both helped me when I just arrived," he tells, back to normal, under the waves. "I've been assigned to lend them a hand when I can since the XO saw I hold no prejudices towards Kasumi, is all. Please, do not disclose anything about them… let's not force a, ahem, solar storm to come our way."

"I see… Very well, then. I shall acquiesce to your petition. And do not place blames on Meiya-sama, all she desired was to mend the rift her attitude seems to have spawned in your comrades," I ask, shoulders sagging.

Takeru scoffs, sounding angry. "… She had given me her word, and it didn't take a day for her to break it. I expected more of her, to be honest," he fumes momentarily, groaning. "Anyways, please, let's not force an argument about Kagami. It would be better to keep certain things from reaching the light," he affirms, coughing a bit. Was the wording deliberate? I am receiving mixed signals in your tone, Takeru.

"I understand, cadet. And worry not, I shan't pressure the XO unnecessarily, either. Well then, this shall be all. Farewell."

"That's wrong, 1st Lt Tsukuyomi," he immediately counters, almost chuckling.

"How so?"

"It's 'See you later', not 'Farewell'. I assume we shall be seeing each other and, even if things won't ever be as pleasant as they once were, I do hope we can remain in good terms," he says softly, slowly, as if extending a hand to the stars when he was little.

"I see… Indeed, I too desire to that to be the case. Do you… believe you'll be able to one day regain your citizenship, then?" I ask, leaning forward, joining my knees, pressing my lips.

He lightly chuckles, spinning slowly in the chair. "If the situation can be salvaged, and XO Kouzuki sees no threats in the horizon, then I may accept your proposal to visit the Capital. Maybe you could suggest me some establishments to try some pudding once I do?"

"… It'll be my pleasure then, to recommend you the best homemade pudding of the Empire," I say with a smile again, leaning back onto the chair, swaying a bit, enjoying the soothing tone as if floating in the sea.

"It's a date, then! That'll be much appreciated, 1st Lt," he answers, calm and bright.

"Well, I shan't disturb your work any longer. I hope the day when you can… regain what you've lost can come soon. See you later, cadet Shirogane."

"… See you later, Mana-nee."

"Wh- A-Ahh!" Again, the chair tips, I meet the ground.

Groaning as I roll and caress the place of impact, the comms lay on the floor. Returning only the empty tune now that the connection has been dropped. And yet, I cannot lift myself from the floor, remaining in a crawling position. Hiccups on my breathing, distortion caused by dampness on my sight as my nails bend upon pressure onto the tiles.

Coughing, supporting myself on the desk and picking up the pencil, I quickly restore the chair to its proper position. Readying a page, twirling the pencil, I start to pour all the words, all that at first I thought were coincidences but were actually deliberate. Not giving my lips any respite, still breathing with an open mouth. Because not only he remembers, not only Takeru truly recalls us…

"… But you believe Yuuhi-sama to be in danger, and have kept quiet about your situation thus far. If he also believes Kouzuki could be impaired by his identity, if he still supports the workload given to him…"

Bad apples.

That is what he said.

That was the calling card, the warning the snake of the garden gave. The sign he said would be followed by those he tried to erase from this Empire of ours.

Feeling a void in my stomach, my scribbles gain speed despite the roughness of my strokes. If he truly was conscious of it all, and spoke in consequence… then I must decipher what 1st Lt Shirogane was trying to request out of me, not only for the coming call I need to make towards the XO but also…

"… Oh, by the Holy Emperor," I slump onto my desk, both hands tugging at my hair. "Takeru, why must you always leave the harshest reports to Yuuhi-sama in my hands?! What am I even supposed to tell her now if you want her to not grow adusted?! Sigh… Still… Hehe… It is a blessing, to hear you composed again. It truly… will be my pleasure, to once more make pudding for you and the cousins. So," coughing, rubbing my face with both hands, throwing my hair back and inhaling sharply, again I wield the pen, "I must note everything to the utmost detail, as detailed as the report for Her Highness must become."

Pulling and Being Pulled

A/N: The introductory scene for this chapter would be the prologue to the sidestory 'Before Light's Out'.

I was on the fence about whether to place this here to give some clarity, since it probably will take some time for me to finish and start posting any side content. While the prologue will be expanded in its proper story, I hope the added context helps a bit.

While I don't think it will appease those who are dissatisfied with the direction the story took and I admit that my portrayal of Yuuko is sub-optimal, being generous, I feel like this has to be placed here for the moment. Once I get to posting Before Light's Out, I'll remove the prologue from this chapter and link to that sidestory instead. That means this chapter doesn't do much for the plot at large. I know the pacing went to play Faraway Dawn, and there's nothing more to say than sorry to those who find reading this a chore, I guess.

Also, this chapter contains passages that hint at substance abuse. I don't think it's that bad, there's no violence or anything, only mentioned in passing, but just in case. There's also clear discrimination and some sexist slurs, so proceed with caution. And no, I do not support the strong worded attitudes depicted in the story.

As always, thanks for reading and sorry for the drag. Stay safe.

Zuoriel

---

Chapter 87:

Pulling and Being Pulled

---

December, 2001. Unlimited Timeline.

(Yokohama Base. Yuuko's office.)

---

Slightly to the left, she spins in her seat. Eyes closed, basking in the silence. As if a thin thread was tied to her neck, holding her breathing hostage, the scientist cannot truly relax. Not that she was wishing to, not that she looked for such comfort.

Barely opening her eyes, reddening eyes, scanning her office… the office that would no longer be hers in but a few hours, echoes and stitches replayed in her mind. All the towers of papers, all those nights of work, all those equations fixed and erased and fixed who knows how many times over…

"… All for nothing," she whispers, looking at an empty hand before it raises to claw at air, to hold nothing within its palm. Void as her stomach, the gesture collapses in apathy as she continues to spin in slow motion, slumped into the seat.

Unable to muster any anger at all, carefully resting her hands on the desk, one good breath she takes before standing up. Grabbing a few folders and placing them on an open suitcase, grabbing both mugs she always used, dragging her feet, feeling as if walking upon scorching sands, the scientist allows herself a last look at the office by the door before flicking the switch off.

From behind the mask, within the shell, a minute quiver tries to emerge on her lips. Thoughts of what could have been, of where she had gone wrong swirl, boil in her mind, overloading it, rough strokes of pain in the back of her head. The quietness that comes after utter defeat, the unbearable silence, the unblinking pondering… and the echoes, the echoes of the wound that remains open made the sight a torture, you'd understand. Inhaling sharply, the hair on her nape standing on edge, she shakes her head. And thus, she turns off the lights, leaving the place.

Small, short steps towards the elevator, towards the exit. Whatever tincture is brewing within, whatever lies buried in the cyclopean depths of her guilt makes Yuuko release an extensive and slow sigh, body slouching forward, downward. I believe it is quite fair to affirm part of her is glad to be leaving. To be able to leave the whispers behind, to not be forced to remain static in this place filled to the brim with regrets.

Inhaling is painful, as if all of her teeth were piked by cavities and she had just attempted to drink warm coffee. Feeling contraction, as if her ribs were actually pressing themselves closer and closer to her lungs with each exhalation, to crush whatever faint beats that yet remain in her heart, to choke them as a noose would now that the floor is crumbling all around her.

Running a hand over her eyes, trying to hammer the mask into her face, to rivet the nails of composure upon her features, it did little to aid her breathing, her steps, or the nauseating hammer on the back of her head. So she slows down, pressing her palm over her eyes, groaning, feeling her features dry, her eyes burning. Shaking, oh, so subtly.

"… Sensei, are you alright?" An unexpected voice asks, low, making her flinch.

Looking up through the fingers clinging to her face, she sees the one who was not supposed to be, who now was grimacing as if he had just been stabbed right in the gut. The proof her theory had been right all along, the proof she herself had failed to bring it to fruition, that was what he meant for her at the moment.

It hurts, looking at the cadet, at his worried grimace.

It aches, thinking on what could have been should she have met him months earlier.

It burns, pondering what she could have been achieved if only she had a bit more time.

And finally, it ravishes her insides, recalling what she forced upon him in her pain. How she felt after waking up drenched in sweat and other sticky fluids, barely able to move her limbs due to the hangover, unable to fully close her legs due to the soreness, and unable to stop the shaking as she started remembering what she had done as the lingering vanilla scent he had left imprinted in the sheets made nest within her nose.

So she shakes her head, sighing hard. "You shouldn't be here, Shirogane. Upper brass doesn't know of your security pass being different, remember?" Yuuko wearily reminds, ruffling her messy, entangled, unwashed hair. At the least, there was one person she did not need to pretend around. A small, tiny comfort on this ruinous day for her soul.

The cadet frowns, taking a step closer. "Whatever. So… A-Are you leaving for real?"

"… Yes. Alt V command decided my aid is of paramount importance. And… well, that's all you need to know." Looking down, away from his worry, she bites her lips. Frustrated, not at the situation but at her weakness. To have released such cruel truths upon the boy, when he was only trying to support her as she drowned her despair in alcohol, unable to look at reality in the face.

"That's just… Come on, there has to be something…" Wincing, hands shaking, he denies, he rebels, he rejects. So he seeks her eyes, slicing the air with a sharp gesture. "This base was super important, right? Why can't you stay here and-"

"Shirogane," she steps closer to him, a hand slowly, hesitantly reaching upwards. A second of stalling, instead of going for his face the scientist grabs the cadet's shoulder. "It's alright, this is how things work. Just… do what you can, and forget what we spoke of that night."

Grimacing, the cadet shakes his head, never leaving her eyes. "But Alternative V doesn't exactly guarantee our survival, right? I mean…

I don't…"

"You do what you can, you now know what… will come. You have time to act, to think things through." As I should have done when Yokohama fell, she admonishes within, the grip on his shoulder tightening. "Time's cruel, but it can also be forgiving. Healing at some points, even. But-"

"That all depends on what we make of it," still frowning, he finishes.

Surprised for a second, the scientist nods, releasing his shoulder. "Indeed. And none of this is your responsibility, so do not mull over it so hard. Get commissioned, learn to fight, and maybe… things will change for your future, Shirogane."

"… And what about you?" Leaning closer, he inquires.

So the scientist holds his gaze in silence for a moment. "… I'm leaving on my own volition, this is a burden I have to shoulder as the head of the prior project. But you… you have nothing to do with this." And I won't allow them to lay their hands on you, Yashiro, or anyone else, she swears to herself, knowing what would be of the cadet should his existence as a dead man were noticed by HC. "So go back to the barracks after I leave, don't mention how I called you to meet me, don't stand out. And don't ever come back to this floor." Uttering not another word, she hurriedly walks past the cadet, eyes bolted forward.

Yet, after she got to the elevator, she hears his steps chasing after her. "Is there anything I can do to help you, Sensei?" He asks, out of air and aware of his heartbeats despite not enduring any physical exertion.

Folding a sigh, she tries to muster, to forge some steel, some of the imposing tone she employed at times. "… Can you operate a PC like I do to help my research?"

"Well, no…"

"Can you help in the calculus I need to make?" Looking back at him, she sees the cadet clawing at his palms, sharpening his teeth against one another. "Do you know anything about engineering? Of how to manufacture machinery? Electronics?" She waits, yet his gritting and shaking only invigorate. It hurts, it sends a myriad of arrows into her throat. "… You can't, you've no skills to aid me, Shirogane. So don't worry, there's no point in lamenting the failure of another," I'm just reaping what I sowed, so the scientist keeps admonishing herself, shaking her head, unrelenting in the blames she places upon her person. "And moreover, you already… helped me enough, that day." Allowing a moment of honesty as the doors open, she then heaves another sigh.

Unable to truly express how much the cadet's company, his honest words of praise and encouragement had done to keep the scientist from hurting herself that night, how he broke her fall into a seemingly endless cesspit of despair.

He says nothing, she steps into the elevator. The scientist remains looking to the walls, not turning around.

"Is there really… nothing I can do for you?" He asks, low, cracking.

Her hand grips the briefcase as intensely as her teeth hail upon her bottom lip, a self-imposed reminder not to give in. Yet, as if choking on smoke, as if swallowing needles, tearing her throat and filtering blood into her lungs, her chest tightens. So, lips twisting, Yuuko looks back.

"… Shirogane?"

"Yes?" Immediately looking up and alert, he gazes into the reddening eyes.

"Yashiro," she asks, something crushing her heartbeats into stillness for a second.

Takeru then nods, saluting her firmly, understanding the request. And right before the door to the elevator closes, the scientist can discern the faint drops welling on the corner of his eyes, the minute shaking on the hand that remains bolted by his head in one last showing of respect and support. The small twitch of his throat, of his lips, the same defeated expression she engraved in him while blurting cruel truths upon him that night.

The elevator whirs to life, beginning its ascend. Slowly allowing her back to crash against the wall, Yuuko remains looking down, unmoving. Mouth a bit open, fingers and arms limp, what currents of thoughts had flown in the scientist were now frozen, molded into a square, an unmoving, unchanging state.

"At least I might be able to device a warning by working on the ML-Engine for the G-Bombs, I guess," she reassures out loud while embracing herself, trying to compress her figure, not truly believing her own words.

Donning the mask, molding her inner feelings deep within, she steps out of the elevator. Ready to leave Yokohama Base, back to the IRI's facilities in Sendai.

As it were, those of the Fifth Project did not trust in her, at all. They desired full access to the spoils of Yokohama, the Reactor, and having her near would be detrimental despite the prospect of cooperation. Thus, locking her service behind the eventual pass for herself, granting her family a seat in the migrant fleet the more she produced results was the condition, the main one, the UN imposed onto the scientist. To that end, to avoid any rebellious ideas from taking hold in her mind, the IJA was discarded due to the eventual reshuffle of the Valkyries and their Instructor into the Fuji Corps, into the Wardog Battalion. So, in a show of cooperation, in a bid to gain stability, the US allowed Yuuko to be handled by the IRG as she was before she took charge of Alt IV in Yokohama. Sharing some spoils would, for the moment, placate the nobility and perhaps prevent their desire to spark an incident in the face of a, quite forceful and one-sided, reinstatement of the US-Japan Security Treaty.

It all would happen in but a few hours, and by then Yuuko would once more be forced to wear the black dress of the IRG as she was when forwarding her thesis at age sixteen. Back to square one, only with no prospect of support, knowing no rope would be coming to soften her fall.

Guided by the MPs as the wind howls around them, no one returns her gaze, no one even dares to look her way. Smiling wryly, she chuckles at the sight.

No interruptions are found on the way out, and only a small retinue of the prior crew of the base is standing in wait near the carrier on the runway. CO Radhabinod, 2nd Lt Pyatkh, a few of her engineers and fellow researchers, and all of the Valkyries besides Sgt Jinguuji grow stiff and salute her, gaze locked upwards, away from hers.

Again, the nails pierce her jaw, the skin below her ears as she merely passes them by, enduring the strain. All of them remain stoic, the formality required in their postures and gazes never breaks. Yet, the cracks are evident in their eyes, the cold seeping through them, the light squeezed out as they stood in petrification. Not even her best friend has the valor to break protocol, despite the quake in her knees and hands. Not even a whisper does she extends to the scientist, whose heart and shoulders sink a tiny bit more. She was not expecting it, but perhaps she had wondered whether anyone would extend a simple parting word.

" So only Shirogane, huh. The one that shouldn't exist, the one I've been with for the less time…" she muses, giving a faint, warped smile.

And with just a nod, and a few pleasantries from the new authorities, Yuuko slowly steps forward into the carrier. The shadows falling upon her sight, as if something had spread wings to envelop her whole, or as if she was again drunk like she was on Christmas. Walking on automatic, slumping onto a seat as the doors to her VIP room close, she still looks upwards in a daze before simply collapsing face first into the cushioning bed.

"At least those two will be safe…"

---

Sinking, sinking, just a little bit more every day.

Buildings falling inwards into a trench, to the bottom of the sea, obstructing all light.

"-and as such, the overuse of the engine could-" her voice drone on, trying to lift her gaze, only finding unfocused eyes, faces lacking any and all emotion or expression in the vast conference room, all over the seats present.

"But where is the proof?" A man asks, frowning at the papers she had crafted so thoroughly.

Slowly inhaling, swallowing the brine, she nods and points to the right papers. "As you can see in the graphs obtained during my stay in Yokohama-"

"That was only an unpolished model of the G-Bomb," a woman dismisses while tapping her glasses, brushing her short dark hair. "I sincerely doubt such a large scale reaction could occur by simultaneous detonations."

Chin lowering in, unable to meet their eyes, a stutter in her lips prevents the words from flying as they normally would. "The readings of the second detonation show a twenty three percent increase in its expected radius, the scans done in Ground Zero shortly after the mission and throughout last year do indicate that-"

Her voice continues seeking, the gazes simply cast lazily over the papers. As her diagrams on the possible distortion of gravity appears on the large screen behind her, a sudden shout makes her quiver for a moment, a researcher from Boening storms from his seat to curse aggravations. While the scientist speaks the truth and nothing but the truth, her results, the veracity of them, only serves to add fuel to the fire.

"There is no proof!" The man shouts, eyes red as he points at Yuuko. "All the testings done thus far have confirmed the safety of the G-Bomb. Your claims are nothing but baseless slander!"

"Then, why have our readings on Ground Zero been rejected thus far? I am not decrying your own research, I'm only showing the results obtained during my stay in Yokohama and the conclusions I've drawn from them," she presses, taking a step forward and giving a wide stare at the room at large.

The man seethes, waving down at her while his features contort as if smelling bodily decay. "Again, the G-Bombs used in the Yokohama Hive were prototypes. All the testings done since then have granted conclusive results over the safety of the engine and its null collateral damage."

"As far as I'm aware, you're only testing one engine at a time," she says, sighing, straightening her dark dress. "That is why I am requesting you to test multiple in unison, due to the anomaly that our readings captured during Lucifer and my preliminary calculus over the ML-Engine."

The man scoffs as he sits down, his weight causing wailing in the seat. "Heh, are you aware of the cost attached to such intensive testing, with how precious our reserves of G-Elements are? To jeopardize the production schedule over a single reading? Guess we should rework the entire delivery system because one truck was delayed yesterday."

"… Perhaps, if you actually analyzed the readings, you'd arrive at the same result. Unless, of course, there is something you're not disclosing about the lasting effects of the G-Radiation," she spit out, wanting to rid herself of the cold lump in her throat, of the vines constricting her limbs.

"Professor, I believe falling to insults is only an admission of your lack of arguments," a man with crimson hair tells, grinning. "I do find it quite farfetched, your angle of attack. While simultaneous detonations in the nearby area are a fair concern you've proven, to claim such an effect could extend to other locations in Babylon is nothing but fear mongering," he concludes with a nod, a vain and smug smirk.

"Indeed," the woman from before quickly chains in, glaring at Yuuko, "there is simply no way the effect of a G-Bomb will leave the place where it's detonated. It has been proved the radiation only affects the radius and its adjacent area, and nothing else. Frankly, to you say the gravity's distortion could grow despite the sheer distance between hives is nothing but madness."

Nods and whispers soon follow, gazes narrowing, postures facing away from her all over the expansive room, brows that fall and cross, sighs in tandem with eyes rolling. Her hands begin to shake despite the pleasant lukewarmness of the room, chin almost hitting her neck as the tide of not-so-subtle whispers reach her ears.

" What a hysteric bitch. Can't believe she's still rambling about this, I thought she had learned her lesson."

" She's delusional, what the hell. Expansive world-wide gravitational anomalies? The G-Bombs barely even affect the nearby area around their detonation. Why was such a psycho put in charge of the prior project?"

" Did you see that rack? Probably sold a night to some important seats in the Empire to skip the ladder."

" I heard she was a minor when she was admitted in the project, actually."

" What did you expect of the japs? They do have a taste for unripe fruit, if you know what I mean."

" Ew, gross. Still, how immature, really. I expected more from the famous Professor Kouzuki, not this bitchy tantrum."

" Why doesn't she bring her super quantum thing to explain the radiation issue? Oh, right. It was a fucking waste of money."

" I bet there was some laundering involved there, and in how over the top Yokohama was built. How much do you think she got paid?"

" I'm more frustrated with how she insists on opposing the project if she doesn't get her way. She's just being cunt to flip us off at this point."

" I'd like to disagree, but it is women like her which give the rest of us a bad reputation. I wonder how many times she bent over to get this meeting approved."

"T-The distortion issue-" she chokes, knees bolted, pain slicing her legs. "There is a detailed effect that lingers in the air, an impediment to the equipment used to record the readings. And said same effect left our vessels unable to properly communicate with the troop during the minutes that followed the bombing," she states, hurrying to showcase the proper documents.

Right she is, as the side effect she has proven to exist is what will send the HSST fleet of Babylon to their doom, forever ruining the Earth with magnetic interference. Despite the nails which pierce her flesh, the quiver of her wrist as if it were snowing, she tries and conveys it all as simply as possible, so that it digests easily and without a hint of malice or ill will from her end. Yet the apathy, the frowns, the smirks which her gaze receives only makes hers collapse as once more harsh taps hit the presented papers, more whispers put her integrity under the microscope, and others openly belittle her while using her research as a coaster for their drinks of choice.

Sink and sink. Below the waves, further beyond the sea, light becoming ever distant. Her lungs ache, now unable to properly search those gazes, heaviness claiming her back and innards, bolting her in place.

Cutting off in the middle of the explanation, the members of the Security Council stand up in hurry and call off the meeting. The rest of the retinue from different avenues of the UN also stand as if their seats were flaming, shooting glares at the scientist, throwing the papers she had worked for nights on end without rest to the floor, stepping on them, some with evident pungency and deriving a thrill from the vacant gaze Yuuko endows to prevent anger to surface. Like mannequins, expressionless in a blur they pass her by. Some order about ceasing on the futility reaches her ears for a moment, she barely musters a nod in acknowledgment out of formality.

Slowly, she bends down and starts picking up the pages, one by one. The ones that were crumpled into a ball, the ones thrown to the floor in dismissal, the ones stepped on purposely. Tenderly grasping each with only her fingertips, as if they were each a small shard of glass, a recently unearthed relic. It takes her a moment to gather them, until only one remains. Yet as a hand reaches out for it, a well-lustered shoe steps on the paper.

The page breaks in half as she pulls, a small shiver runs through her veins, freezing her in place. There is no anger, no fire surging from the empty stomach, from the dried lips. Only a sigh, a frown as she looks up.

"… Listen, Kouzuki," the man with crimson hair whispers, still daring to smirk down at the scientist, "there is little to be done about this. Even if you decry Alt V, their decision is already set. They'll only think you're lashing against your prior rivals."

"Lift your shoe from my research," she says, glaring, low.

He sighs, throwing his hair backwards. "Please, listen to reason. You're wasting your talent, you should see how fruitless your work thus far has been. Why not honestly support the project, join our team?"

"Lift your shoe, Eberbach," she threatens, allowing her teeth to be seen, a primal reaction, a last meager vestige of impulse.

"Me and my men lobbied to grant you this meeting, out of our mutual distaste for Alt V, and yet you've dashed our efforts with your attitude. Is this how you will treat your allies, Professor?" He asks, smirking, pressing his shoe further into the paper as if stomping on a small spider.

Jaw clenches, she looks down. Slowly exhaling, a small, minute nod follows. "Please, let me pick up my research."

"See? It isn't that hard to not be a bitch, Kouzuki," he states, still daring to smirk.

The shoe leaves the page which she immediately picks up and places on her stack. Hugging the research papers for dear life to her chest, the scientist stands in a hurry and tries to return to her desk, yet the man blocks her way.

Patting her shoulder, leaning closer, he whispers. "They'll never listen to you. It was the same with me when I suggested the French frontline to be reinforced, you cannot change anything from the outside."

She turns away, grimacing. "… Thanks, but I will manage on my own. I only need to present conclusive proof, once my work on the ML-Engine bears fruit-"

"They won't let you near one, if you remain in opposition," he affirms, chuckling as he again traces her shoulder and backside with his fingertips. "Your prior research met a dead end, but this doesn't need to be your end. Are you sure you don't want our aid? Prominence might have little support as of now, yes, but together maybe we-"

Stuffing her research into a briefcase in a rush, some edges of the papers sticking out, she edges away, knowing lashing out would only cause further issues, only allowing herself to bite her lips. "My research was not mistaken, of that you can be certain." Otherwise, where the hell did Shirogane come from? Where did those images Yashiro showed me came from? Where did that Game Guy machine came from? I am not mistaken, I only didn't manage to circumvent the limitations of the current hardware.

"I see… I do concede you are one of a kind, Professor. If you wish to see the fruits of your research be taken seriously, some compromises are unavoidable." Gaining a smirk upon the petrification which follows as he once more trails her shoulder and arm, the man nods at the her, undaunted as he seeks direct eye contact. "I'm sure you don't desire to surrender to becoming the Whore of Babylon. Certainly, your efforts deserve better than this sorrowful ending. My phone is always open for you, I'll be anxiously awaiting your call, Kouzuki," he says with light cheer, daring to slap at her bottom while chuckling.

Shaking as her hands coil, she remains still while glaring at the man, who winks and waves back before departing. As the door once more closes, as the shaking resumes and overtakes her being, she tries to order, to arrange her papers once more. To put everything in its proper place, to honor the research she had started, she had inherited so many moons ago. However, it doesn't take long for the detachment of the Imperial Guard to enter the room.

A slim man garbed in burgundy smirks, giving a bow. "It is time for our departure, Professor."

"I am arranging my papers, Cpt Makabe," she states, not looking at him, chin still pointed down, shoulders sagging.

"My apologies, but we must be going shortly since there is another meeting to come in this room. Due to the extended duration of your speech, we are already tardy as it is. If you dally too much, I'm afraid I'll have to report this to-"

"Stop, I- I'll be ready in a moment. Just give me a minute."

He smiles, bowing. "Just a minute, then. By the by, since I assume your presentation was met with rejection," he stops as she glares, trying to rise her chin, to stand straight, a lone tree braving a typhoon, "perhaps, could I suggest you to seek my Regent's support? With us as your patrons, your words could gain a new weight for the UN."

"I cannot entangle anyone in-"

"If you produce no results, certainly, consequences will follow, for both the Empire and your own goals," he states, never losing the insufferable smirk. "We are in agreement towards our views of the Fifth Project, why not collaborate in our efforts? I believe we have treated you well in Sendai."

She hurriedly stuffs her papers, choking on blazing charcoal as she knows they're out of order, as she sees them bend and twist within the briefcase before she slams it close. "This is not the time nor the place…" clawing at the grip of her case, at the laptop she had brought, she rushes away, gaze locked on the floor.

And yet, her steps wane eventually. Collapsing to a mere stroll, stalked by the Imperial Guards. Knowing there is nowhere to run, joining her wrists as if wearing handcuffs, gaze lost and vacant as she slumps her way back to the carrier, back to Sendai, back to the prison, to the silence.

Once she regains consciousness, it becomes hard for her to know how much time had passed. Unable to gain approval to go outside, she simply paces to the lab, eating in it while standing, delivering a daily report, returning to her quarters and slumping into her bed without getting under the sheets, removing her heels or changing her clothes.

Over and over again, time and time again. Enduring the monotony of the closed-off space, the queries, the demands for results. Emptying a small bottle of all its pills, failing to prevent a whirlwind in her stomach from spouting breakfast out of her system. Wobbling to a desk, to dirty her nostrils in white, shivering with each inhalation. Losing her perception of time, reports and failed tests pile on the lab. Growing to despise the chime of a phone that only signaled awful news, growing intimate with the angular plastic seat of the place, falling unconscious on it, the abundant papers acting as a cushion for Yuuko as she slips to the floor in her sleep.

Night by night, a life by the knife, with it on her throat. The reprimands echoing in her ears make her shoulders forget how to raise, scoliosis setting in as the slump in dejection becomes a staple of her daily routine.

" When was the last time someone noticed I ain't eating breakfast?" She thought once as the emptiness in her gut almost sent her to meet the cables of the lab.

Days or weeks? Months already? When was the last time she could leave her prison? Time had lost its meaning, only mattering when she was called to report something in person. Like a dog ordered to do tricks for the amusement of its owner. That same small smile, the gaze that looks down at the restrained being which believes it's free is what meets her gaze, time and again. Realizing she has to work for that praise, for the headpat in approval only serves to rend her spirits further, relenting on some negotiations and petitions if only to see some meager improvement. Unknown to her, the reports she forwarded were actually craved by many as much as fresh water in the desert, held as carefully as a newborn child. It is, perhaps, her own refusal to request aid and the adusted mood which she endows whenever she leaves which isolates her further. It's what makes the excuses of the IRG all the more believable, how 'the Professor does not wish to be disturbed by petty matters not pertaining to her research'. And so long as results continue to appear, and if they can come without forcing an altercation between Yuuko and the researchers from Alt V, the top seats of the UN are more than pacified.

Unlike the dissolving heartbeats in her chest, the arms that rubs her own arms and neck over and over again at times while awaiting the computers to finish the compile.

" When was the last time I talked of anything besides work? When have I done anything other than work?"

Reprimanded when speaking out, dismissed, rejected, forever living in a new moon. Nyx could have very well have cast an eternal night over the scientist, for the routine never breaks. Never, not a single time. Never, not once, did she try to reach out. After all, there were more pressing matters to attend. After all, she could not let her life's work meet its final curtain in such shape

" Am I not actually mistaken here? I mean, why are my readings not lining up? Am I doing something wrong?"

The babel towers of papers grow and grow, yet she now slumps in her seat, not wanting to move.

" After all, I failed and now am meeting the expected result, is all."

Completely loose as she spins, looking up at nowhere, the petition for her to work on the railgun rests on her desk.

" Why did I think I was right all along? Even if you could sense causality… no one can change its nature."

The desire for support lingers as she gulps heavily, wheezing for a second. Knowing it would be a mistake to trust in the IRG as of now, in who desires to be her patron, yet it is that or surrendering to fully cooperating with Alt V. Still, to cling to obstinacy would be a mistake, she thinks.

" Am I sure I didn't imagine Shirogane being there? A dead man walking… as if something like that could happen. Maybe I really am going insane at this rate."

Shoulders sag, with slow movements she grasps a pen with which to place her agreement. Merely extending her arm causes pain to sear at the bottom of her nape, forces her to actually stand. Staring at the paper with half-open lips, resting the tip of the pen onto the line with demands binding, she gives out a long, low sigh, hunching even more.

A knocking disturbs her, flinching and trying to straighten herself. "Who is it?" She asks, almost rasping.

A guard in black enters and salutes. "Professor, ma'am, you have a visitor."

"… A visitor?" She tilts her head, not recalling any appointments. "From where?"

"UN, ma'am."

She frowns, seeing the crimson hair and the smirk in her mind for a moment. "Send him away, I am in no mood to receive him."

"Um, ma'am, the soldier in question has been very adamant in this request. I am loath to admit he shall return at a latter date even if I refuse him once again," the inductee laments, giving a bow in respect.

"A soldier?" Yuuko asks, brows furrowing, blinking fast for a moment.

"Yes, ma'am. He has accompanied the retinues from the UN that have come to receive your reports for a few months, and has requested a meeting with you on every occasion claiming he comes to deliver intel from Yokohama to you," the inductee returns up, straightening himself into petrification, not making eye contact, afraid of disturbing the scientist.

She raises a brow as her lips purse, the description not inciting any face in particular. No one from the Valkyries or her close circle could it be, nor was it that insufferable man since he no longer was a soldier and, with his influence, could attain a meeting with ease instead of having to wait. Interest piqued, she leans forward, her chin onto a hand. "What's the name and grace of this soldier?" She asks, staring.

The guard stiffens, relenting a small nod while gulping. "He identified himself as 1st Lt Shirogane, ma'am. Stationed in Yokohama Base, 4th Armored Battalion, OIC of the Lupine Squadron," he notes, shivering a bit upon her silence. Yuuko merely hums, blinking a few times, wondering if she was dreaming or if he actually existed. Coughing, the man gives a minute bow to the scientist. "The security personnel at the foyer are, well, vexed with his reiterated insistence, and those from the UN's retinue do not seem to keen on reprimanding the man. Please, could you not receive him, if only this time?" He again asks, remaining in position, pressing his arms onto his dress upon the silence.

"1st Lt… Shirogane…" Yuuko says, repeating the words under her breath, a hand raising through her cheek to grasp at some hair. Lips purse, legs meet, eyes close. Inhaling slowly, slower she stands. "Fine, I suppose…"

Allowing herself to be guided towards the place of the meeting, a room divided by glass with a small speaker in the middle of it and two chairs on each side. Fitting for a prison such as this damned establishment, I dare say. In equal disgust was he frowning as he strides into the room, ignoring the ill comments from a guard in gray.

"-and if you were to attempt anything to-"

"Dammit, I get it!" He snaps, arms folding, glaring, making the woman take a sudden step back. "You think I'll try to impair the UN's standing here of all places, surrounded by Imperial Guards?"

"I am merely reminding you-"

"Yeah, shove the screams. Any further hostility will be detailed in my report to Yokohama HQ as aggression towards UN personnel," he threatens, in earnest. "I do not recall to have broken protocol so, if you'd be so kind," he smirks while giving half a bow, with a hand swipe exuding drama, "please relent on the pressure, miss. I would hate to give my superiors an unfavorable report. After all, instead of letting us grunts handle these reports, perhaps some higher ranking officers will decide to involve themselves," he says, half in threat, half serious. The small kindling in his eyes, unblinking, is enough of a deterrent to the inflexible demands of the woman. The foolish guard gulps and leaves with another warning, he heaves a sigh and shakes his head.

The searing fire dies down as he looks to his left, meeting the pale, crumbling complexion of the scientist, her sunken cheeks as spirals of shifting sand, the red eyes aiming down as if in apology, a dead serious and almost absent expression. Eyes like fish, still as a pillar, compacting onto herself as if to trim dear space in a hard drive. For a moment, neither says a thing. She stares at him, scolding herself for believing the soldier to have been nothing but a fever dream, noting the sharper angle of his jaw, the usual relax smile absent, and the extension of his unkempt hair that is about to reach his shoulders. He cannot look, the erosion in her features bringing stillness to his thoughts, the downcast posture contrasting with the one he recalls. Except for one particular night which fills him with regret and aching, reprimanding himself for having taken advantage of her weakness.

"… How are you, Sensei?" He asks as he sits, tightly entwining his fingers to dispel his negative thoughts.

"I'm not your teacher, 1st Lt Shirogane," she says, barely, low, without meeting his eyes. "Congratulations on the promotion, I suppose," she raises a wry smile, compacting her shoulders in a shrug. The expression leaves her, her breath is caught in an attempt to escape her throat at his tense frown. Believing to see disappointment, she once more looks down, silent.

"How are you faring?" He asks, leaning closer, lips tight. "You don't look good at all, Sensei."

"I am well, I am well," she states, nodding slowly, not looking up as she idles time on a strand of hair. "I am rather busy so… What would you be needing out of me, 1st Lt?"

Biting his lips for a moment at the docility of the answer, he coughs and clears his throat. "Yokohama HQ is asking for a detailed report on your findings of late, personally from your hands. Some intel was delivered to you a month ago, I think?"

"I see… So you too, now," she whispers, softly joining her hands.

"Huh? What did-"

"You sure climbed the ladder fast, Shirogane," she nods, smiling weakly, chuckling at the apparent success he had found. "I do have the reports at the ready, if you would be so kind to wait a moment," she tells, nodding, almost bowing, tension freezing her complexion. "I shall have an attendant bring them to you, however they are all printed in paper at the moment. Would that be agreeable or would you prefer a digital format for the intel?"

"Yes, sure, in paper is fine… Still, that's not the only reason I'm here," he says, stealing gazes, never finding her eyes, sighing.

"What would you need of me, then?"

"I came here with a proposal from the UN," he affirms, leaning forward while clenching his hands, sighing as he seeks her sight. "Sensei, would you consider returning to Yokohama?"

"… Why? I am… I already have dealt with those discussions," she states, lifting her eyes, facing him with renewed plating. For she knew this conversation was being recorded, that retribution would fall upon her sisters or her only friend should she go against the current. "The leads of the Fifth Project have rejected my findings thus far, and I still would desire time to work on my own. If that is what you're after, I will have to decline the offer."

A frown meets her, it sends shivers down her spine. The same adusted glare, the unblinking fixation of that night, of that Christmas of defeat lingers in the soldier's eyes as he force palms the nearby wood. "Please, be serious. There are concerns about how well you can work in this lab as opposed to back at the base. And a few people told me… you seem to be having a hard time. Looking at you now, you're made a mess."

"I am… lacking time, Shirogane. It's my responsibility to finish what I started," she affirms, before breaking eye contact. "I've no intention to alter the conditions of my duties. Tell that to whoever is using you."

"I came here on my own volition," he affirms, smiling.

"Are you sure you're not being used as a pawn?" She asks, shrugging, venomous, trying to scare him away.

But instead of the usual fidgety attitude she knew in the cadet, the soldier remains smiling. "I am only following your advice, Sensei. I'm making the most out of my time, before it runs out."

"… Is that so. How does being a delivery man help your career? Paying back a favor for the promotion?" She spits out, arms folding, looking away from the shine. Yet, she finds herself staring as he starts to chuckle. At first due to anger, feeling betrayal, the same echoes that trampled her research.

But finding a small, kind smile, a nod as she stares, the old upbeat posture of defiance she knew in him. "I am still on your side, remember? I don't believe I'm completely useless now. I'll have you know the entire base hates my guts," he states with a puff of his chest.

"Why? You… wouldn't still be swimming against the current?"

"Oh, no. I just spin."

"What?"

"I spin, in the TSFs. Haven't lost a single fight yet, so pretty much every squad wants to strike us down," he admits while scratching his head, giving a wry smile. "The new authorities have more or less turned my squad into the grueling trial for fresh cadets. My scores and tactics gained me some recognition, is all."

"I see… Good for you, I suppose," she says, facing away.

"And since I also tend to Kasumi, people have found me useful for contacting you."

"Huh? You… Why?"

"What? You think I'd leave Kasumi alone?" He asks, crossing brows and arms, hurt to some degree by the gaze of befuddlement. "I do concede that I am only a useful pawn, but even a pawn can become something great if it makes it to the other end of the board. Still, my peste- I mean, suggestions have made some high ups see some value in cooperating with you to prevent any intel from being withheld."

"What? What are you talking about?" She asks, leaving her lips parted, slightly slouching to a side.

"Well, that it seems your reports are not sent as is," he notes with a nod. "I caught a glimpse once when I reported to O'Connor-"

"Who?"

"Oh, the new CO. Anyways, he asked me if I knew anything about your research and junk and I noticed then your doodles were not present in the reports our men got," he affirms, giving the evil eye to the guards that stood nearby in watchfulness as their features tightened.

And yet, what makes him flinch is not them but the caustic frown, the slam into the nearby wood the scientist makes. "What do you mean by that? Doodles?"

"You know, those odd symbols you write with."

"Wh- They are not doodles! They're symbols of my-"

"Yeah, cool. Anyways, they're not in the papers," he states, giving a nod. "Did you remove 'em or is something rotten here?"

Crossing her arms, facing away once more, she slowly takes in air. "I… will have to revise my papers, I've been very busy as of late," she says, hoping he'd desist, to avoid the recording to bring him trouble. "And anyways, I do not recall ever letting you in on such topics, Shirogane. Who would have thought you'd be so loose-lipped?"

"… I only talked out of concern, because it's not like you to omit such details," he retorts in sobriety, holding her stare, wincing a bit. "Also, you should know I… can easily draw parallels in your rambles, even if they sound like they come from another world," he says with a smirk, pleased with the wording he practiced to deliver the message.

Yuuko gapes for a second, suddenly desiring the glass to not be present to lunge at his neck and demand answers. The impediment, however, is enough for her to sigh and look away, ponder on the repercussions. With a heavy stomach, she shakes her head. "In any case, your report has been received. I shall tend to my reports more carefully, notify that to the UN. Now, if there's nothing else-"

"Sensei, you haven't answered yet," he complains, pursing his lips a bit. Taking in air, features tightening as his fingers entwine, he looks straight ahead into her eyes. "The UN would like you to return to under their banner, to prevent these issues from repeating themselves. Believe me, they weren't pleased with the repeated negatives I got to meet with you, and," he steals a glare towards the ones watching for a second, "they won't the next report. If you give the agreement, negotiations with the IRG will proceed shortly. I think maybe in a month or so you could-"

"… I will not bend over," she states, clutching, gripping at her thighs, bending her dress, looking down in blazes. "I'll lead my own research, with the paths available to me. Breaking the status quo will only cause further ripples." And I will not bow down and surrender my work to go and slave away at the bombs, not before delivering a proper warning of what will follow Babylon to whoever listens.

"I was under the impression they want you to lead the R&D back at the base," he says, slow, nodding. "That's why I'm here, to see if you'd welcome the notion. And… by the way, are you eating well?"

"That's none of your business…"

"… Please, Sensei. You're looking-"

"I'm not your teacher, you were only a pawn in my project. Nothing more," she says, frozen in place. "Stop it, don't become a target, you idiot. You'll get hurt if you get closer."

"Still, I think that you can't do your best in these conditions," he firmly says, not flinching or looking away, gaze squarely on her features as his lips cascade. "And I am on your side, Sensei."

For a second, she stares. Legs press together as she looks down, she shakes her head. "You shouldn't, there's nothing to be gained."

"At least, I can be a bridge between you and Yokohama for anything you might want to convey. Also, you don't look good at all. How the hell are the Guards treating you here?" He repines, glaring at the men standing behind her, who despite their training find themselves looking away from the ravenous bite of his eyes.

"That's none of your business," she dismisses, shaking her head, turning away from him.

"For real? Come on, Sensei. Look at me, let me explain what the papers-"

"I shall receive the documents and reading them in my free time," she says, supporting herself on the chair as she stands up, looking away. "However, I won't be revising my decision. I… have only one way available to me."

"H-Hey, wait up! I haven't even-"

"Shush. I have work to do, 1st Lt. The reports you're after will be arriving to your hands shortly, so please do wait a moment. Now, if you'd excuse me," she nods, nibbling at the edge of her lips as he calls out when she departs, when she runs away.

Jogging back to the silence of the lab, hugging her sides, she shakes her head while taking short breaths. Rummaging through the papers, a shiver runs down her back as she sees that, in fact, her symbols were present in the pages. Handing the correct folders to the attendant along a glacial glare, so that the soldier can depart as quickly as possible, she starts up the calculus and everything else, sending herself into work. The threat of not delivering present in her mind, of being reduced to an assistant, a mere clerk standing on the side answering requests like an automaton. The threat of having Shirogane sent once again to this place, to garner more attention onto himself. The threat of knowing her reports were being tampered, that she was far more trapped than she believed to be.

The same guard from before enters her lab, leaving the briefcase the soldier had brought, ascertaining the folder had safely reached his hands before departing in quite the hurry like a kitty from a source of water. With heavy steps and a heavier stomach she places her hands on it, lifting it towards the desk, opening it in slow motion. Seeing what inside rests sends a dart into her heart.

A messy drawing, unpolished as it could be. Rectangular shapes to the limbs, twisted circles as the eyes, the colors not remaining under their expected lines. Two figures were in the page, a woman with purple hair and a long lab coat wielding a clunky mug from which steam apparently comes out and a smaller girl garbed in black with two bunny ears carrying a stack of papers almost as tall as herself. Etched in the bottom of the page, a single line so reads: "Please stay safe, Professor. Until we meet again, best of luck. Yashiro."

Soon after, small stains fall upon the page. Only two or three, only that as the scientist's vision blurs, as hiccups devour her shallow breaths, pressing her teeth upon one another enough for it to begin to hurt. The disturbance did not stop as she sees another letter and a small sealed cup. Opening it and finding coffee as she likes it most, instinct takes over and she drinks. The iced coffee replenishes her spirits, the sensation forcing her back to stand straight on its own. As she sits down, she opens the next letter. A small paragraph was all it was, words of encouragement from Kyozuka-san, hoping for Yuuko to remain in good health. Hands shake as she reads, having to stop a times to pinch her nose and breath in sharply.

Finishing her coffee, rubbing her eyes to clear the fogginess which befalls her, she slowly picks up the next report. A detailed proposition to transfer back to Yokohama, to appeal to Alt V command for cooperation due to the rather lackluster results of the current crew stationed in the base. A proposition that was forwarded by Prime Minister Sakaki, before a rather convenient accident forced his departure from the seat. While traversing the text, the scientist once more slumps, seeing only demands, the same demands and results others desire out of her. Until a small update comes up, the rather precarious state of affairs between the IRG and IJA with the UN-US bases regarding the arrangement of the defense lines, a request for Yuuko's opinion on the matter, perhaps for her to intervene in favor of the peacekeeping efforts in the meetings coming from Undersecretary Tamase. It hollows her insides, she shakes her head and throws the papers towards her desk.

Twisting her lips, an odd tincture brews and swirls in her stomach. The difference with the landscape she knew is shocking to the point of almost giving her vertigo. Even with the schedule for the departure of the selected few towards the migrant fleet, it is quite fair to affirm the tensions were rising at an abnormal rate. What took her breath the most was the presence of the RLF, a few attacks and threats made to certain key ministries. And the clerical chorus that would soon follow.

It made her question her sense of time, question how could she even react on her own outside of the lab. The Empire's board has changed much, and she was unaware of it all. Almost dizzy, she stares at the ceiling. Wondering if it wouldn't be easier to just remain here, working and focusing on what she does best instead of again swim in opposition under unknown waters. Perhaps, appeasing the retribution that desired to fall upon the Empire would be the best course of action, what yields the best results in the bigger picture.

As she stands and rubs her legs, sighing and preparing to resume her work, she finds a small box left in the suitcase. Raising a brow at it, Yuuko cannot tell what it could be. It is too small to be food, a data pad would not be left in such a case either. Contact with it makes part of it sink and give out a clicking noise, sending a shiver down her spine. Removing the cloth, a small gray machine meets her eyes, a trinket that should not exist. Sensing something soft meet her fingers, she turns the Game Guy around. A folded note is attached with tape to its backside, which she gently removes and unfolds, beginning to read what in it is written.

" Don't forget to take breaks or you'll get sucked in, Sensei. I left the cartridges in the small pocket of the cover, I hope you find it useful even if only to idle some time every now and then.

And if I didn't get to speak with you, know that me and Kasumi are still on your side! So please do take care of yourself if you're really having a hard time.

If you need anything, don't hesitate to send me a letter and I'll go deliver a package to you in person. The same if you want intel or how the base looks now if your reports are really getting tampered with. I have some good rep now that the squad got a record going in the mock battles, so I can ask about and give you some tidbits of intel if you think the UN can screw you over, too.

And don't worry, Kasumi is safe with me even if her drawings ain't getting any better. Can you believe she still refuses to eat her carrots? She has now taken a liking to chopping my shoulder whenever I try to feed her some, the ungrateful bunny.

Major Marimo-chan also sends you her regards along her battalion. She asked me to tell you that no soldier marches to seek death, that even if you're called names only those who survive and keep pressing on can change the future.

Time can be cruel, but also forgiving. The difference lies in what you do with it. So let's try to make the most out of what we have left, Sensei. Your fight is not over yet, even if we can't stop Alt V there has to be something we can do for the better. And while I can't help at all with your research, I think I'm not entirely useless as I am now. Even if you were right and we're headed to a disaster, I'll do my part properly and brave through it all. I'll despair after I'm dead, doing my share from wherever it is I can help.

So please, don't hesitate to contact me if you need anything at all. Even if it's only to send you more of Kyozuka-san's coffee, let me repay all you did for me.

See you later.

Shirogane"

Simply gripping the Game Guy, she sighs and, for the first time in who knows how long, she begins to chuckle. "You're truly… such an idiot…"

Grabbing the cup, she tries to drink again, only a few droplets reach her tongue even as she shakes it. Slumping again onto the seat, her grasp on the cup falters and makes it fall and roll away, her chin lowers and rests on her shoulders.

"I wonder if he'll really come here if I write him a letter…" she ponders, simply spinning in her chair, licking her lips to savor the taste, slowly pushing the buttons of the turned-off console.

December 5th, 2001. Reversal Timeline.

(Yuuko's room.)

[Yuuko]

---

From one shoulder to the other, a gentle shaking rustles me. A moment of quietness follows, then yet again something moves my shoulder, a faint voice calls. Squirming under the sheets, hugging the pillow with an arm, my eyelids refuse to open shop.

" Vice Commander… XO Kouzuki, it's time to wake up," Takeru calls, again shaking my shoulder in slow circles, almost like a massage. "I have to go train so I can't stay here much longer… Hey, are you hearing?"

"Mmh… Yeah…"

"Oh, cool. Your coffee and the lunch are over there," he says, lowering his voice, retracting his hand. "I left a note with the calls you received on your desk. I'll be goi-"

I extend a hand, fumbling in the air for a moment before I catch his sleeve, digging into it. "Wait…"

"What is it? Is there anything you want a report on?" He asks, looking at me in calmness as I move my head, a single eye catching him raising a brow at my silence.

"Did you arrange the papers?"

"Yes, just as I did last time."

"The reports?" I ask, yawning softly.

"They're also ready for you, do you want me to bring them here?"

"Mmh," I nod, slumping back into the pillow. He sighs as I slowly let go of his sleeve before turning around.

As I wait for him, I extend a hand to grab small bites of the lunch he ordered. Stretching my legs causes a small pain to raise in the middle of my back, I can't fully circle my neck. Ugh… What a pain… This is what I get for sitting all dusk in front of a monitor. And just when I need to review the compiled analysis of the 00 Unit.

"Here they are," he says as he enters, leaving a few stacks of papers in the small table further in. "Give me a call if you need clarification, I'll be in Hangar 90 after the training is done," Takeru nods, waving as he moves to the door.

"Wait," I call out, gesturing for him to come closer. Again pursing his lips a tiny bit and raising a brow, he walks up to the end of the bed, and there he remains. So I point to my wardrobe, coughing a bit. "There's a pair of jade wheels there, take them out."

"… You are not thinking of requesting me to give you a massage, are you Vice Commander ?" He asks, giving me a side glance.

"Yuuko."

"What?"

"My name is- Yaaawn… Yuuko. Stop it with the rank already," I rub my eyes, again pointing to the wardrobe afterwards. "Come on, stop standing there. My back hurts and I need to get rid of the soreness," again resting my chin on the pillow, grabbing small bites of food, I steal glances at him.

"Wait, are you-"

"It's an order, you're under a punishment. So- Yaawn. So stop standing there."

At first, Takeru simply remains watching with quite the tension in his posture. As I simply return his stare, smile back, he sighs and shakes his head, rolling his eyes as he walks to the wardrobe. Procuring the wheels without much issue, he hands me the coffee as I point to it.

"Someone sure is comfy there," he comments, raising a brow.

" Gulp… I did need the rest, and don't feel like rushing is a good idea as of now," I admit, resting the cup on the nearby wood. "So? Come on, get on with it," I tilt my head backwards, removing the sheets from my upper back.

Sighing yet again, Takeru slowly starts, from outwards to the center, from the top of the shoulders to my nape, up and down my neck, around the base, following my spine.

"Mmh… Harder…"

"H-Huh?"

"Do it harder, just a bit," he sighs, I feel his breath on my arm as the impulse picks up, now enough to move me, a tender jolt coursing through my muscles. "So, umh… Did anything of importance happen?"

"1st Lt Tsukuyomi called, she apologized for the altercation the cousins had with Kasumi," he says, dry, as he focus on my neck for a moment.

"I see… Anything else?"

"She said she had something important to speak with you, so she'll be calling back. She refused to divulge what it was, though."

"Mmh… Good. What else?"

As he reports what few calls arrived, his hands drive the wheels over me, crushing the soreness residing under the skin. Takeru does express his concern over the amount of coffee in the expresso machine, and I can only roll my eyes at his usual complains about how much I drink while taking bites off the lunch. When he ask about his plans for the 00 Unit, I tell him the few folktales available are already in the cylinder room for whenever he desires to use them.

"Got it. Do you want another go at the tuning tonight?" He asks, kneading my shoulders a bit harder, tighter.

"Yes, we should- Mmh… try two sessions each day to gauge its reactions," I nod, sighing with my nose, rubbing my ankles together.

"Roger… Well, I guess this was enough?" He lifts his hands, giving a nod.

I stretch and feel no tension in my muscles, nothing cracking. "Yeah… It's like day and night, for real . Who would have said you'd be so useful?" I smirk at him, again reaching out for a bite of food.

"Sigh… You really do like to drive me hard, honey."

"Only because you can deliver," I say, chuckling at the minimal shock, the lips that cannot seal. "Well, anything else?"

"… No, there's nothing else to report. Should I be on my way?"

"Hm? Oh, yes. Let's not give Marimo any more trouble. You be careful around the hallways, Takeru. I'll call you if I need anything," I nod back with a smile, grabbing the coffee and taking a sip.

Mmh… This burning sensation is the best. The smell, the aching already has my breathing restarting in full force, ready to march out and untangle the next puzzle. Shame I never asked Takeru about how he aided that other me before, I really can get used to receiving coffee every time I wake up.

Looking back up, he was again shocked, standing still and contracting upon himself.

"Is something the matter, Takeru ?"

"Ah, no… Not really, but-"

"Out with it, what happened?"

"… Why are you calling me by name?" He asks, facing me frontally, features tight, arms folding.

"Huh? Why, you ask? It's your name."

"I mean, yeah, but-"

"Come on, now. Enough with the formalities, okay? Unless, you're retracting your habitual way of being for some reason?" I ask, sitting up and brushing the sheets off me.

Eyes widen upon my stare, he truly remains petrified. Void of breath for a second, before he coughs and straightens further, turning away. "No, it ain't that… Just wondered why you started calling me like that all of a sudden."

"I dunno, why have you been calling me as Vice Commander?" I stare, he cannot return my eyes. Lips pursing, posture faltering as if walking on the shore, receiving a wave to the face and turning away at the saline impact. " Takeru, what is the matter? You wouldn't still hold some… doubts towards me?"

"No, it's not that," he affirms, nodding once, despite how his sight remains veiled. "I simply would like you to stop teasing me, especially when we're speaking of important matters. I am not going to trip, Vice Co-"

"Yuuko."

"… Okay, fine, you win but stop with the teasing. I mean, I don't mind some, but Sumika could scan us and-"

"The 00 Unit cannot scan my mind, and while you are not in its vicinity it also cannot scan yours," I affirm, grabbing the cup and finishing the coffee in one gulp. Mmh… Damn it Takeru, you brew it almost as good as I would.

"I see… Makes sense, with the guards being near me and the rumors as well," he nods, scratching his head. Yet as I nod with a smile, he quickly turns away, as if recoiling from a source of heat. "Well, I have to be going or I'll be late for the training. Later," he turns around as if hearing the 991 alarm, blasting away from the room as if he had engaged one of his crazy acrobatics.

What is it with him now? Well, Marimo might become concerned if he is late. Right, those two guards could also be a nuisance for him if they start asking questions. Still, what was with his expression? The way in which his lips turned and tossed, the disquiet in his arms… You wouldn't be hiding something from me now, Takeru ?

"Sigh… Anyways, I should be going, too. Yashiro should be done with her tasks as well, and I have a call awaiting me, it seems."

So I rest the cup again on the wood, a hand caressing my neck as I circle it around. Both of my hands join and stretch up, letting a shiver run from my toes to my nape, one final yawn to leave my lips. There truly is no tension left in my back, no knots or contraction in it. Sigh… You know, I might have joked about it before, but I think I'm gonna have him bring me coffee every morning. Not like he can refuse, since he's under a punishment to justify the order. And he can come here earlier, to tend to the 00 Unit too. A perfect result, isn't it. Wiping the last motes of blurriness from my sight, I approach my wardrobe.

And my steps halt cold in place as I reach it.

My own eyes widen and extend as my lips, as my own reflection returns the confusion and shock Takeru endowed in moments before.

In the full length mirror that resides in one of the doors of the wardrobe my reflection stands before me, with absolutely no modesty covering her figure.

"… Hmm, I see," I smirk, tapping my lips as I open the wardrobe, taking out a fresh uniform from it. "So that's why he was in a rush, huh."

Sitting on the bed to begin from the bottom, slowly I get changed. Still, he was not ogling like a teenager or a creep. Not intimidated either, but not trying to steal 'subtle' glances. Standing up, I raise both arms and put the undershirt in place, slowly pushing my head outwards. Grabbing the upper part, buttoning it all, once that's in place I grab the skirt, push the heels from below the bed. In only an extra minute, my reflection returns the usual visage as I put on my lab coat, brush my bangs.

"… Still, he tried so hard to remain standing in attention, never letting his composure falter." I place a hand on the glass, finding a smile curving as I lean closer to it. "And yet, those lips and hands remained so disturbed, to the point that he fled. In embarrassment, maybe?"

I can't help but to chuckle. Turning around, I grab the tray with the lunch and bring it to the small table. Sitting there, starting to glance at the reports while finishing the meal, my lips cannot relax. A few fingertips trace my neck, down to my back. Recalling the pressure, the small hesitation he showed me. Even the small surprise at the simple show of appreciation that is to call him by name. And still, to think you'd try so hard not to stare, to manage to keep your poise yet still would find your own subconscious fighting against you. That troubled expression as you tightly closed your eyes with pursed lips… despite all that is in the board, all that can come our way, you still do have many amusing surprises waiting for me to uncover.

Slowly licking my lips as I take the final piece of food into my mouth, I chuckle softly, leaning back, trailing the edge of my neck. "My, my…

How cute of you, Takeru. Fuhuhu… If you were so adorable in front of it, perhaps the 00 Unit would be tuned far more easily."

… Still, I think I prefer that side of yours to be something only I get to see. It's good to know… that same bright gaze you had when we met is still there for me, even now, after all that has happened.

A sound reaches my ears, the ringing of the phone. Well, looks like I have to go keep my end of the deal. I do wonder what she wants, though. I certainly hope Her Purpleness isn't thinking on insisting any more to have Takeru visit the Capital. Not when the 00 Unit's tuning is on the line, and the reactions we got before show he is on the right track.

"… And I rather not have him resorting to the third option due to your meddling, guards. I should try and inquire about their intentions… to see whether we choose the first or the second one, though."

…

… I do wonder what is up with that poem, and why can't I recall anything about it. Did I have a dream today? Um… I can't tell, the heaviness left me now so I don't really remember. Grasping the receiver, I give the okay to accept the incoming call. Guess I should try and cause a link on my own to start remembering something of those worlds sooner rather than later, if the reports I asked of him do not spur any echoes in me.

Assuming he won't again grow all red upon the notion, that is. Hehehe…

Jester's Quiz

Chapter 88:

Jester's Quiz

---

December 5th. A few minutes before 3 PM.

(Hangar.)

---

All stood still, ears sharpened and listening. From the available speakers in the expansive room parts of the speech from Her Highness the Shogun are repeated, intensely commented on by the debating journalists. Even the smallest clanking ceases upon the silky voice, all foreigners ceasing their movements in a show of respect to their comrades who stand in attention when hearing the pleasant flow the speech.

Sights that untie the knots choking chests, features that tense upon the words and turn away, two sides of the same coin, two sides of the same argument. Both born out of equal concern, yet fundamentally different.

"A request for another evacuation… I dunno how to feel about this," Ayamine says as her arms slowly cross, sight downcast. Rubbing her arms slowly, she tries to dispel the narrowing of humid walls that choke her, the overflowed and thick air of the slums again kidnapping her sense of smell.

"It's a commendable request," Jinguuji begins, tapping her shoulder, breaking Ayamine's ill reminiscence. "Sometimes, there is little to do besides weathering the storm. I understand how you could feel about this Ayamine, but there is only so much we can do to aid those who remain living beyond the defense lines," she sighs, dropping the mask as she nods. " And considering the last result of the BETA incursion in Niigata, the eruption is but the perfect excuse to order the evacuation. It's not a work anyone wants to tackle, but it is a necessary evil even if the slums are already in a compromising position."

The cadet returns the gesture, sighing briefly and resuming her aid to prepare the lesson under the calm company of the silky voice, the debating journalists and mechanics that express the same concerns anyone with knowledge of the precarious situation of the shelters would do. Deafening her ears, Ayamine simply entrusts herself to the work. Tending to each crate, to ensure enough tools were in each, she reports that the last one lacks a wrench, causing the Instructor to heave a sigh. The small matter leaves their minds as a low rumble reaches the hangar, a Gekishin unit being docked in.

All the other present begin to whisper, small gestures, glances at the still damaged machine. The Gekishin the soldier used during his bout against the guards, with part of its plating still showing the marking of violence endowed in said mock battle.

"… I suppose this is also part of his punishment, huh," Jinguuji comments, a hand slowly swimming through her hair.

"Instructor, ma'am, will Shirogane be tasked with servicing this unit?" Ayamine asks, standing upright.

"I assume so, since there is little reason to send this unit here otherwise," she relents a nod, a shrug.

"Ma'am, requesting permission to operate in pairs during the training," she asks, an unblinking stare upon Jinguuji.

"Motives for the request?"

"Shirogane mentioned before he is not confident in his maintenance skills. I believe it would be more fruitful to pair him with someone who could aid this lacking aspect he has. The same applies for Tamase. Since in the frontlines a squad must collaborate with their mechanics at times, I believe this would be a good opportunity for us to operate as a real squad would," she tells, complexion unfaltering, unblinking as she stares.

The Instructor sighs again as a hand rests on her forehead, rubbing it softly as Ayamine remains silently staring. Her answer stays captive within the throat as footsteps inch closer in quick succession. Turning around, the remaining four girls of the squadron stand in a line and salute, notifying their arrival to the training. Ayamine goes to join the line, still staring at Jinguuji, unblinkingly so.

Pacing in front of them and coughing into a hand, the Instructor nods and folds her arms. "Alright, all of you. As you know, today is maintenance day. If you reviewed your textbooks as you should, this training should not be too difficult. You will have two hours to try and repair small sections of the joints and cockpits of your TSFs, and do a system check to ensure your task was completed successfully," she slowly tells, as slow as her pacing back and forth in front of them, giving them all a side glance. "While I don't expect a perfect performance on your first hands-on maintenance, I am looking forward to the results you'll produce. If there are any doubts, either me or the crew nearby can aid you. Do remember to pay attention to what you see, what your movements cause in the TSFs," she states, chin upwards, drilling her gaze into each and every one of them for a second. "This training isn't solely about how to mend the TSFs but to also let you see how your choice of maneuvers impairs the machine."

"Yes, ma'am!"

"Now, unlike usually… we shall approach this training in pairs. Sakaki with Yoroi, Mitsurugi with Tamase, and Ayamine with Shirogane," she notes, halting her walk to observe them well.

Minute glances towards Mitsurugi, whose lips purse ever so slightly. And the smallest, briefest hint of a smile in Ayamine's face, the faintest relaxation in Tamase's breathing as Mitsurugi returns a subtle nod her way.

"I expect a report for tomorrow's morning lecture, about the difference you found in each TSF's maintenance," she concludes with a firm nod, which they all answer in unison as habitually. "Good. Now then," her voice drifts off, her gaze cast towards the hallway, lips pressing a bit.

As if beckoned by her stare, the soldier walks into the hangar, once again messing with his hair as both cousins follow close by, unrelenting in their small queries, the small, shallow breaths they take upon the rather somber and neutral facade dad chooses to employ on them. Both guards salute the Instructor, taking their vigilance to a spot where they'll remain undetected.

"Apologies for the tardiness, Instructor!" He says, standing stiff, hands at the seams. "My prior assignment had some… difficulties in letting me go," he folds a sigh, a minute lowering of both brows.

"I see. In any case, we shall be taking on this training as pairs, you're with Ayamine," she reports, holding his gaze, gauging his reaction.

The freshness of his gestures, despite the slowness, grants her some respite and Jinguuji returns a nod, allowing the cadets to be lectured by the mechanics one last time before starting on their duties.

It does not elude her, however, the downcast gaze the soldier throws at his unit as he approaches it after the preliminary lecture. For a moment, the Instructor tilts her head, rubs her eyes, as a few cerulean fireflies spark away as he gently rests a hand upon the cockpit of the Gekishin. Sighing at what she assumes is the stress and tiredness seeping in, she leaves the cadets in charge of the mechanics, going to the closest vending machine to get some much needed caffeine into her system.

Meanwhile, as the clanking and whirring of machinery resumes, as hands grip onto cold steel and follow pointers, the cadets all look to one another, taking a step forward. For a moment, only the silence and rustling of iron can be heard. Despite being tasked with the simplest parts of the Fubukis, minutes pass as they look at the parts, at the inner recordings of their lectures before hands respond to the command, before even starting. And even when they do begin, their breathing remains isolated, their movements as delicate as if handling porcelain.

"… Damn, you really destroyed this thing, Special-kun," Ayamine comments, giving a solemn nod to the Gekishin.

"Well, it's what happens when you crash land," he chuckles erratically, looking down.

She pats his shoulder, giving a small smile. "Look well, this part here needs lots of care," she notes, pointing to the gears that open or close the cockpit.

As they tend to his Gekishin, a relaxed and easy flow in between them, Mitsurugi and both cousins cannot help but to stare a bit for moments at a time. Obvious it is that Ayamine is placing herself in between the samurai's line of sight and him, throwing back glances every now and then, a sharp and blazing gaze towards Mitsurugi, who looks away to avoid a confrontation. For a time, their training proceeds smoothly despite some setbacks in the complexity they yet cannot tend to on their own, Tamase deflating and almost flying away like a wounded balloon, Sakaki massaging her temple and wanting to melt into the floor upon inciting a detailed rambling from Yoroi about the modular nature of the Fubuki.

"… Don't we need a wrench to replace this thing here?" He asks, slowly caressing his head on instinct, recalling the tomahawk technique his prior comrades learned back then.

"Yeah, you're right," Ayamine nods, rubbing some soot off her nose.

"Looks like our crate doesn't have one, huh…" he comments as he rummages through the supply crate assigned to them, lips pursing as he blinks slowly, again shielding his head with a hand.

"Ah, here," Mitsurugi hastily steps forward, procuring a wrench and extending it in offering, "you can use ours." Yet, the relaxed gesture grows tense as his eyes refuse to meet hers, as his posture compacts onto itself, retreating back into the stillness of a cave. "… Takeru? What is-"

"Ayamine, here," Sakaki calls out, throwing a wrench in a slow tomahawk, Ayamine catching in in midair like a goalkeeper sealing a corner kick. "Once you're done there, hand it over."

"Of course, ma'am," she gives an exaggerated salute and a smile, causing Yoroi and the soldier to chuckle at Sakaki's grumbles.

And yet, Mitsurugi's lips purse, the once calm hold turning into a tight vicegrip over the refused wrench as he slowly walks away back to the Gekishin. Contraction in her throat, eyelids that grow closer, squinted. "Takeru, I was-"

"Can you not?" He asks, almost pleads, in a low whisper. "Please keep your distance, Mitsurugi-san ."

"But I was only-"

Ayamine glares, Sakaki stares, and he walks away with a sigh. So Mitsurugi simply folds her words, hand limply falling, walking back to the petrified Tamase. Still glancing at him throughout the training, softly nibbling at her bottom lip, at the smile and relaxed gestures he gives to Ayamine, the small jokes he shares with Yoroi to Sakaki's complains. Even at the tools he extends to Tamase as the girl fidgeted about as her mind blanked on how to proceed.

And she can only heave a sigh, feeling the cold gust of dusk envelop her whole at how his gaze avoids hers. At the frail slump in his shoulders, the stiff posture he gains after their eyes cross, the aversion overflowing.

---

Almost two hours later.

---

"Well, I'll be damned," Jinguuji slowly claps, smirking and nodding. "I didn't think you'd actually finish before time is up. Good work, squad."

"Thank, ma'am!" All reply in unison, again standing in a line.

"While I understand the setbacks you faced, the end result is, once again, better than previous cadet squadrons achieved in their first go at the maintenance. Don't rest on your laurels and redouble your reading on the basics, build firm foundations and ensure you can be entrusted with repair duty when extra hands are needed," she states, raising her voice a bit, the scythe out of her as her expression tightens.

"Ma'am, yes, ma'am!" The six reply again, a few more stiffly then before.

"In any case, good job. I am looking forward to your reports on the maintenance duty for tomorrow's morning lecture. This shall be all for today, however. Dismissed!"

"Salute!" Sakaki orders and the cadets exchange the gesture with her teacher, who nods with a smirk, honest in its contentment, before slowly strolling to the hallway. Once Jinguuji is out of sight, she sighs as she taps her glasses. "Oh, thank the Emperor. For a moment I was sure we were not going to make it…"

"Come on, Chizuru-san," Yoroi pats her shoulder, returning a thumbs up, "we were making good time. And anyways, all we had to do was follow the pointers detailed in the report about the benefits of the modular design for-"

"It's because of your ramblings we almost didn't finish," she admonishes, shrugging. "Yoroi, I really thank you for the pointers, but please don't go on so many tangents. Leave that for class, okay?"

"… Well, if you insist," she nods, joining her hands, lips shrugging slightly. "Anyways, what of you guys? You also finished the repairs, was it too hard?"

"There's so many gears…" Tamase says, slumping down, melting into a slime. "And there's so many cables, and some parts are almost the same… and the explosive set in the blade pylons didn't want to fit in… Awawawa."

"Worry not, Tamase. I believe we made a decent enough job on the surface repairs we were tasked with. No one shall fault us for a pair of mistakes," Mitsurugi reassures, smiling at the small dam cracking due to overflowing concern.

"What of you, Ayamine?" Sakaki asks to the silent duo, tapping her glasses.

"Stuff went fine, save for the Geki's cockpit. The hatch was in need of lots of oil, and probably will need a serious repair," the soldier says, scratching his head, looking down.

"It was made a mess, really," Ayamine affirms, tapping his arm. "Even the simple matter of getting the system of the control unit to do the check for errors took us quite some time, same for making sure everything worked as intended. Still, thanks to it being a bit more simple, it didn't take us much to see what we had to do," she smiles, nodding.

"Yeah, the Gekishin's simplistic way of operating does help with the maintenance, even when you thrash them," he nods, recalling the scolding his mechanics gave him in his loops due to the abuse he subjected his unit to.

"I see," she taps her glasses, coughing softly. "Squad, what do you say of meeting in the library before our night sim run to review the material and prepare the reports?" The other four nod, dad scratches his head and looks away. "Are you available, Shirogane-kun?"

"Uh, well, I don't think so. I actually gotta return to the underground right away, and I don't know if I'll get permission to join in the night training," he sighs, shoulders sagging a bit.

"Well, nothing we can do… Anyways, let's be going to the barracks. You can come with us until the elevator, right Shirogane-kun?" He nods, she smiles, and so all six of them make their way into the hallway.

At first, they merely extend their shoulders and arms, relaxing their tension, idly platicating about the training, a gaze of azure seeking the one of light brow and being ignored at large, a few lingering whispers follow their steps until a cordial pair of guards places their attention upon the fools.

"Still…" Yoroi says, hands behind her head as she looks up, "do you guys really think a volcano is gonna erupt?"

"It wouldn't be odd," Sakaki notes with a slow, dejected gesture, the finger barely finishing the circles. "Volcanic activity has been on the rise, and, well, I can comprehend the concerns fueling the request."

"… I still think it's a bad call," the raven says, arms tying into a firm sailor knot. "The slums are full already, and I don't think this benefits anyone," she repines, knowing full well that complains will fall upon the government for the worsening situation in the shelters, yet also being aware that leaving the people in the loneliness of the wilderness is not an option for they as soldiers. "If the army has to do what it can for the people it protects, what would be the correct choice? To allow them to live and die in their homes or to safeguard their future and the heritage of their villages?"

"I, too, think the same as Ayamine," Mitsurugi affirms, a slight frown setting in, light vanishing from her features as the incoming dusk. "I do not believe it wise, to place further burdens upon our people. And also, the IJA is already lacking hands at the moment. While I comprehend the concerns Her Highness must hoist… I have my doubts regarding this request."

"Meiya-san, what are you saying? You want to abandon those people?" Yoroi glares at Mitsurugi, the slicing of wilderness all over her body, the soreness of limbs and back, the silence of the dark when forced to camp in the open during the evacuation.

Losing words at the unexpected counter, Mitsurugi's frowns gains impulse as her arms fold. "No, I did not meant to say that."

"Then, why did you say that? The soldiers have to protect the people, right?"

"The army has to do what is in the people's best interests. I highly doubt this motion truly benefits anyone," she states, knowing, dreading the pressure which upon her sister falls, understanding the pain of being taken away from the place one favors the most. For a moment, the last meeting with Raiden flashes in her eyes, and in an attempt to remain composed she clamps her lips and looks away.

Taking the gesture as dismissal, shaking subtly as her stomach tightens, Yoroi hugs herself while looking away. "What if the volcano erupts? Would you leave them there, knowing they're in danger?"

"I mean… It's their land. If it is their desire to perish there… It's their life, isn't it?" Mitsurugi slowly says, still looking away, lips regressing, fingers delving into the curves of her forearm, preying upon the muscles that tense up.

"It's the army's duty to do what it can for its people," Ayamine says, a poison sting as she glares at Mitsurugi, ignoring the pull Tamase enforces on her sleeve. "While I agree the shelters are note exactly a nice place to be in, if there is an eruption it is the duty of any soldier to protect the civilians."

"I am not decrying that," she counters, sighing hard but short, shaking her head. "I'm merely saying that, if it is their desire to remain there, why force an altercation? Why take them forcefully from their homes?"

"… Her Highness wants everyone to be safe," Ayamine takes a step closer to the purple blaze, shrugging Tamase's hold off her arm. "Protecting the civilians' lives is something only the army can be entrusted to do."

"… Living and being kept alive are not the same thing," Mitsurugi scoffs, turning away, speeding up, trying to end the argument. "And in the current stage of the Empire, I highly doubt Her Highness desires for such barbarity to befall our people."

"What are you trying to say, Mitsurugi?" Sakaki asks, lips narrowing as do her eyes, throat constricting ever so slowly. "Who are you blaming for this 'barbaric orders', then?"

"I am not blaming anyone, cease placing words in my mouth," she counters, folding her arms again.

"C-Come on, we all agree that we're worried about the eruption, right?" Tamase wails, placing herself in between the squad leader and the 2IC, waving both arms in the air as if she were drowning. "Sometimes, imperfect methods have to be used to prevent something worse from happening, right? I-I mean, if a volcano does erupt, there's no way the army won't have to do an emergency sortie, right, right?"

A gentle hand pats the small shoulder, diffusing the spiky tension in Tamase. Smiling her way, Takeru nods. "Yeah, Tama's right. It's better to prevent than to lament, and turning a blind eye to the people's woes is not wise," he affirms, his sight remaining in the other three's for a second, until his firm gaze makes them all relent a nod.

"Yeah, I agree," Yoroi says, doubting in meeting the other's gazes as she hugs an elbow and the wall as her pace slows down a bit. "Reacting to the problem would be worse in the people's eyes, after all."

"… Misjudging the threat to forward the evacuation is equally, if not worse than that," Mitsurugi affirms, nibbling at her lips, trying to tame the slices and gashes which pour over her at the thought of her sister remaining alone in the podium again, on the concern she noticed in Yuuhi's complexion.

"I do agree with that… but that doesn't mean we shouldn't try and save them from an eruption," Ayamine says, giving the azure samurai the evil eye.

"Casting doubts on the authorities under biases is also not wise, Mitsurugi," Sakaki points out, lips shrugging at how she knows that, perhaps, her comrade is speaking the truth about the deals her father must meet to ensure the threads that hold peace together remain undisturbed.

"Ahem!" He folds his arms, a brow twitching. "Look guys, sometimes shit is gonna hit the fan, like it or not," he starts slowly, sighing, looking up as acid claws up to his lips. "While acting on the ideals each of us holds dear ain't a problem, it is when it starts interfering with our duty. And even if we can and should speak out if we notice something is wrong in the field, doing it with so much venom is gonna backfire."

"I doubt any Japanese fellow would be able to remain composed in front of such an affront to our rightful land," Mitsurugi says, sighing, slumping a bit. "Simply thinking on forcing villagers to depart from their homes… is honestly enough to make me lose my appetite."

"… Same here," Ayamine nods, shoulders eroding in the same dejection as she fiddles with her hair. "If there is an eruption, I do agree with the orders. But even then, if the soldiers have to remove the people by force…" a small frown appears, swirls and cuts within her stomach.

"I don't think anyone would welcome such orders, even if they might be necessary," Sakaki relents a sigh and a nod.

"Still," he says, inhaling slowly as a hand rubs his forehead, slowing down to descend the stairs, "whether the orders are correct or not, I do agree that respecting the people's wishes isn't a hard ask. It's better than forcing them and causing a mess. After all, no matter how badly you'd want to help… there is simply no saving those who cannot help themselves. If death is what they desire, simply keeping them alive serves no purpose," eyes blazing, the signs left engraved in old rocks by the path serve only to thicken his breathing, his lips pressing themselves to forget a certain moment spent in absolute and intimate dark. So he shakes his head, ruffling his hair hard as if clearing a desk off books and old notes. "But so long as someone out there is asking for help, even if it is to keep a tiny peace of memory alive, the army should try to lend a hand."

"… Even against the negative to evacuate? Why withhold some empathy to their desires?" Mitsurugi asks, arms unfolding, loosely falling as she stares down at the steps, stomping the rest of the way down the stairs.

He sighs and looks away as he reaches the hallway, walking past Mitsurugi. "Everyone needs a hand at times, even if you're set in going down with your convictions. If the villagers die, their customs, their legacy dies with them. In these times, if we don't offer them a hand then we become all the more darker for it. Even if you're right and they have to be kept alive for some years, people have to survive for the day when the war ends."

"But… the people are not requesting any aid, are they? To be a rampart for the powerless, that is what the army should strive to do," she affirms with a nod, Ayamine and Tamase relenting a nod in mild agreement, Yoroi hugging the wall and remaining silent, Sakaki sighing as she rubs her head. And yet, the soldier remains quiet, not looking back. "Why, Takeru? You also desired to aid the people, did you not? You also were taught under our code, under Mother of all people? The soldiers sent will have to remove the people, forced to act against their fellows… "Surely, there has to be another way to solve such an issue?" She asks, almost rhetorically, as she sighs and tightens her hands.

The other four sigh in equal dejection, some MP passing by imitate the gesture, grim contortion to their features. Silence extends as they descend another set of stairs, the railing choked with undeserved strength.

The soldier sighs, rubbing the underside of an ear. "… Sometimes, there is not. The volcano doesn't care about ideals or oaths. And not extending a hand in front of such a disaster to safeguard a moral code will only make us darker for it."

"… However, a warrior should strive to-"

"A protector should strive to see past the immediate board. Can you think for a second on the issues that come with a government abandoning its people under some idealistic code?" He lashes back, glaring. "What of the precedent this will leave? What of the repercussions this could cause? Just because the people desire something doesn't make them right. A parent has to reprimand its children when they act out of line, and like it or not, people are in danger our there, in need of rescue from an eruption. When it's time for action and not words, our ideals ain't enough to save lives, Mitsurugi-san . And bending to the desires of the people will get you nowhere."

"Wh- But, surely, some empathy towards them can be spared? Removing them by force is not wise," she insists, holding his gaze.

"We can listen, we can explain ourselves, but ultimately we gotta protect their lives. Otherwise, with them die the memories of their villages, a piece of history forever lost," he sighs, grimacing as cold arrows pierce his flesh, as an aquatic tornado fills his view for a second. "We help without betrayal to our ideals when we can, and we bite the bullet if it comes down to it."

"… It would be hard to find a middle ground in such a situation, after all," Sakaki says, caressing an arm, looking down.

"I mean, if there is an eruption," Yoroi starts, looks up, clamps her lips as she messes with her tags and looks down again, "the soldiers might even have to place themselves in danger to get to the people."

"And the BETA might attack anytime, too," Tamase mentions, hands joining as if in prayer, compacting her already lithe shape further.

Ayamine places both hands behind her head, closing her eyes tightly, clicking her lips. "This whole business looks like a time bomb, huh. Damned if you do, damned if you don't."

"Sigh… I suppose, all we can afford is to hope the relief efforts proceed without issue," Mitsurugi nods, a hand tracing her ponytail to the end, the other hugging her side. And yet, those eyes seek his figure, taking a few steps forward to meet his stride before a final stair to the barracks. "Still, Takeru, do you not believe Her Highness would favor extending some kindness to our fellows in such dire times?"

"… That depends on what you mean by kindness," he says, low, as his hand slides down the railing, strong steps down.

"What do you mean?"

"What is the kindest thing to do? To let them do as they think it's best or to guide them to what will actually keep them alive? What does a leader have to do on such occasions, Mitsurugi-san? "

"Well, there are vast examples of those who came before us, of the values we must uphold and the methods to employ. Following the wisdom imparted to-"

He scoffs, shaking his head. "That's wrong."

A brow of hers twitch, arms begin to fold. "Could you elaborate?" She presses, tone frosting over, causing Sakaki to sigh and shake her head and the other three to grow tense.

The soldier shrugs as he finishes his descent, messing with his hair, meeting the azure gaze and feeling emptiness permeate his innards at it. "Yesterday will never be tomorrow. So repeating the same methods over and over again ain't exactly a good call. If you were a leader… you would have to be a guiding light for the rest, a light that illuminates the untamed path towards the future, right?" He asks, holding his breath, gulping hard as a march of cold ants races in his back.

Yet, the wording causes said same sensation to envelop Mitsurugi. A brow again twitches, lips fold in. "I… do not believe that to be true. A leader must endeavor to be worthy of its position for it is the first servant of the people. That is why we act with others in mind first, isn't it?" She asks, seeking his gaze, a nod in approval.

Yet he sighs, looking away, crumbling away. "Guess we really don't see eye to eye, huh…" And with slow steps, he goes towards a different hallway, towards the elevator. "I gotta go this way. See you tomorrow, guys. And… please don't beat yourselves up about this whole affair, okay?" He asks, receiving a few nods. Raising a hand, he waves back as he departs.

A slow grip restrains Mitsurugi's arms, Sakaki shakes her head as the azure gaze blazes back. "Don't, give him some space."

"I only desire to-"

"Please, Mitsurugi. Shirogane-kun tried to keep things civil, so don't go causing another argument. I'll notify the Instructor if you do," she warns, again drawing circles.

"I was not attempting to do anything of the sort. I merely…" she looks to the hallway, to the silhouette that leaves, to the two shadows that his steps trace. "I want to apologize from my previous words, since I did not have the chance. I do admit… I've been acting out of line, but I merely wish to bridge this rift that's spawned in between me and Takeru," she affirms with a strong nod, unfaltering and clear gaze imposing as the skyline.

"And what if he doesn't want to?" Ayamine says, rolling her eyes.

"What was that?"

"Special-kun tried to keep things calm but you keep insisting," she says, glaring a bit as she toys with her tags, pulling them a bit. "Look, I agree with wanting to help the people, but give him some space. You already almost knocked him out during the training earlier, and he hasn't tried to provoke you at all."

"Wh- I did not aim to-"

"Please, don't fight!" Tamase asks, again placing herself in between them. "It was just an accident, right? Right?"

"I… It was my miss, I admit it," Mitsurugi relents, sighing, turning away. "However, I only… wish to platicate with Takeru, nothing more." About his views, the words he said… about Mother, if he would allow the question… if he truly remembers her. And if not, then granting clarity to his teachings is my duty. Even if we seem to still be debating semantics.

"… Can't you give him some space?" Sakaki asks, tilting her head a bit. "If you're really sorry, start by thinking about him. You heard the whispers, right? Let's not force any arguments. That also goes for you, Ayamine."

"… Got it. Sorry," she gives a small nod, scratching her head.

Mitsurugi waves as she sighs. "It is fine, I deserve the pungency with how I've been acting. Was he fine during the maintenance?" She asks as they begin to walk once more.

"Yeah, Special-kun didn't seem too tired. Still looks pale, but I think he's fine. He didn't make any puns, though," she notes, holding and kneading her chin.

"Well, you did say the Gekishin was in rough shape," Yoroi says, again edging closer now that the tide was calm. "Maybe he was feeling bad, seeing the state of his TSF?"

"Yeah, if I was nervous seeing the damage mine has, Shirogane-san must have been so concerned about his," Tamase affirms, again shrinking further, rubbing her palms together.

"In any case, let's remain focused," Sakaki orders as they make it to the barracks. Standing to face all of them, a finger raises once more. "I haven't heard if the Instructor or Takamura will be in charge of the night run today, but in any case, we have much time to make up for. I expect nothing but your best in there," she affirms, holding their gazes until they nod. "Well, would you like to go to the PX earlier or to go to the library?"

"I would welcome some free time," Mitsurugi says, rolling her shoulders.

"Same here," Ayamine nods, circling her shoulder as she cracks her knuckles. Yoroi shrugs, Tamase is quick to agree once again.

"Sigh… Okay, see you all in the sim room later," she says, waving as she turns around, heading to her room.

The rest all do so too, except the samurai whose steps are slower, her gaze still crumbled on the floor. Still lingering on the aversion, the reticence he displayed, the collapse to darkest depth that came to his features and posture upon her final answer. Throwing herself into the bed, covering her face with both hands, she groans as she turns and tussles.

"Why? If you were trained by Mother, if you're one of us, a Guard in training as myself… Why are your answers so different, Takeru?"

Hugging herself, crossing and entangling her legs, another hailing falls upon her lips.

"… And why do you refuse to call me by name now? Sigh… I know Tsukuyomi ordered me to remain quiet…" turning on her side, biting a nail, her eyes tightly veil themselves, "but I still desire to mend our relation… Surely, some moments to extend an apology to him are not a hard ask. Cleansing the shadows which follow him is a priority, after all."

But, again, she turns around.

Again she bites her nail, cracking it, bending it.

Legs cross and twist, brows lower and crash like orbital divers.

"… That is, if he even desires my apology… Siiigh… I should have apologized as we came here…"

---

Some minutes before.

(In a hallway.)

[Shion]

---

The cadets remain arguing something or the other, Meiya-sama remains quite upset about the result of the discussion and the impediment of following after us. In perfect steps, Takeru marches in front of us. Never looking back, never stopping nor decelerating.

First he almost doesn't make it in time for the training, now he has to stay under another special mission all day long. And that's saying nothing on how much tension he bathed in whenever Meiya-sama tried to approach him.

I can't help but to groan, Mion shakes her head as I try and step closer. So I keep groaning, arms folding. It's completely normal for him to want to put some distance with her, but to not even accept a wrench or some tools? Come on, Takeru. You're better than that.

It's so distressing, too. He refused to tell us the reason behind his delay, and despite our attempts at small talk he remained mostly silent on the way to the hangar. Mana-nee isn't responding the comms, so who knows where she is. The trio isn't nearby watching over Meiya-sama, probably because we already had to be here. Luckily, she didn't hurt herself as she fainted and managed to keep her composure after the fact, despite the clear insistence to have Takeru agree to her words. I do comprehend her distress, however. When interacting with the rest, that small smile, the gentle gestures are still there, even if slower. Yet whenever Meiya-sama tries to approach him, his features grow dull, tense and averse. Truly, as he was on our worst days, when we… lashed out in our darkest hour thanks to those damned meds.

"Mion, you think he's sad?" I whisper, leaning closer.

"Hm? You think so?" She says, raising a brow as we peek at his back, at his stride that does not decelerate.

"See? He's not waiting at all, Takeru always busies himself when he's worried, right?"

"Perhaps. Still, let's not bring anything up," she states, holding my gaze as she retreats back behind the wall. "Meiya-sama already said she'd endeavor to regain his trust on her own, so let us not interfere. Our position might impair her efforts, until we can confirm what it is he remembered."

"Sigh… Is waiting all we can really do?" I ask, still peeking. "We could try asking him about his hobbies, what games he favors…"

"Shion, come on," she sighs, elbowing me softly. "Can you please remain composed?"

"Hmph, I don't know how you can be so collected. Ice must flow in those veins of yours."

"What? Sigh…" she pinches her nose, wrinkles surfacing in her face. "Look, if you do anything, I'll report it to Mana-nee."

"Better to make haste than to let opportunity pass us by."

"Haste makes waste, patience is our ally."

"Says you."

"Mmgh… Don't you dare to start anything, Shion."

"Or what?"

"What are you two arguing about now?"

"Huh?!" Flinching away from the clash of stares, I find Takeru giving us a side glance, a brow raised. "We… We were merely debating… some questions we'd like to ask you," I say, coughing, standing upright again.

"Shion, let us not impose on the cadet," Mion warns, folding her arms.

"It's cool, really," he waves down, shrugging. "I also did want to talk with you two about some stuff," he says, arms folding as he rests onto the wall, his full attention falling on us, hail to the gardens.

"Ahem," Mion straightens up, giving him a bow which I quickly follow. "First, we'd like to apologize for our behavior earlier towards Yashiro. It was unsightly and inappropriate."

Yet, as we raise back, Takeru is pressing a brow with a finger, lips pursed. "I think you've got something wrong. Kasumi is the one you should be apologizing to."

"… Is that so?" I ask.

He nods. "Yeah, since you two were real nasty to her. Make sure to not repeat this ever again, okay?"

"… You like her a lot, don't you," can't help but to squint my eyes, drip some poison.

He nods again, holding my gaze as he looks down. "Yeah, she's a friend. And I'd like to ask you two to never be like that again to her, security will have to intervene otherwise."

"Still, she reacted aggressively first," I say, arms folding. "No issues would have happened if she had behaved properly."

"Sigh… Look, I know you might have your… reasons to not trust in Kasumi much. But if you're willing to give me a second chance, despite all I did thus far, why not give Kasumi a chance?"

"The assistant proved she does not wish to cooperate with us, despite us being merely worried over your complexion," I state, holding his gaze, the concern he shows to that damn doll. "If she does not provoke us, we shall not retort."

"Look, even if she does-"

"We understand, and will not react as we did before twice," Mion says, giving a minute nod, elbowing me. "Sadly, we cannot approach Yashiro to our leisure. Which is why we're relaying our apology through you, please do let her know we are sorry for our actions yesterday," she says in a business tone, with a small smile on her face.

He sighs, ruffling his hair. "Good to hear. Well, I'll tell Kasumi you said sorry."

Folding my arms, staring, I can't help but to ask. "By the by Takeru, why do you still have that headband on?"

"I'm too lazy to go get it cut, is all," he shrugs, avoiding my gaze, retreating, avoiding me. "So I just wear this thing instead."

"But it doesn't look like a normal headband," I insist, a hand on my waist as I lean closer, staring at the odd thing. "Why does it have those horns?"

"Because the Enpyon looks metal as fuck, obviously."

"… What?"

He chuckles, rolling his eyes. "Your guess is as good as mine. I have no clue what the current fashion trends are."

"So, you ordered it from somewhere?" Mion asks, idling a hand on her hair, curling it behind an ear. "Might I ask from which store?"

Lips shrugging, he looks away while scratching his head. "I just went to our storehouse in the underground and asked for a headband. No idea where it's from. So, think it looks good on me?" He winks, a hand on his chin as he grins back.

"I do think… you look fine," Mion relents, slightly looking away.

"Well, it's not like you look bad…" I groan, still staring at the odd thing. "But you'd be better without it, in my opinion."

"Well, can't please everybody." He shrugs. "Anyways, please don't be mean to Kasumi, for real. Let's keep things peaceful, okay?"

"But of course," Mion nods immediately, returning a smile. "Was there anything else you wished to discuss with us, perchance?"

"No, not really…"

"Ahem…" Mion sends me a glare, I remain looking at him, "How are you feeling at the moment? Considering how you were after the morning training, you still do look rather pale."

"Eh, I'm fine. Don't worry," he nods, sounding clear, firm.

"Hmm… So, ahem, you seemed a bit… reticent to speak with Mitsurugi during the maintenance."

"Shion," Mion warns, again glaring.

"What? I'm merely concerned if there is… anything we could do to bridge their postures. Would you favor our aid, Takeru?" I ask, smiling and raising a finger, taking a step closer.

"… And what's the price?" He asks, low, giving me a narrow gaze.

"Nothing. We only desire to mend our prior failings, and bridging whatever rift is now present between you and Mitsurugi is only natural," I nod a few times, holding his gaze. "Certainly, you do wish to remain in good terms with her?"

"Sigh… I do, but our views are… perhaps too different to reconcile," he says, barely forcing it out, hunching over.

"… May I ask what did you argue about during the training?" Mion asks, giving a minute bow, standing stiff.

He shrugs, looking away. "I just… told her the person what gave me the blade was similar to her, in their ways of carrying themselves but with a different outlook in life, is all. She didn't take kindly to my opinion, so I think keeping quiet is the best I can do as of now," he straightens up, leaving the wall, giving us both a calm, slow nod. "So don't worry, I don't hate her or anything."

"Still…" I purse my lips, curling a strand of hair, "if this… person you speak of is so similar, why not try and speak things through with Meiya-sama?"

Slow, his blinking.

Unblinking, his upward gaze.

Faint, the tightening of his expression.

Downcast, both lips and eyes.

"… Sometimes, words simply run out. I know they were raised in different worlds… but I do hope me and Mitsurugi can make peace. Just that debating will serve no purpose as of now, I doubt I could dissuade her in an argument with her stubbornness," he shrugs and sighs again, brows crossing in complain.

"Well, you do have a point," I nod, agreeing on his concern. "Still, if you ever… desire to reach out, know that we do sincerely wish to aid you, Takeru."

"… Thanks," and there, the usual, old smile. Bright and warm like direct sunlight, paired with a direct gaze which locks upon us and nowhere else… He's there, right here, in front of me… "Anyways, I really need to hurry to the elevator or I'm gonna be late, so if you've nothing else to ask, I'll be on my way," he says, leaving the wall and walking again.

Following after him in silence for some moments, keeping cold glares and ill whispers at bay, the shallow distance is unbearable. He's right there, as he always was… If he recalls Yohime-sama, does he also remember us? Is he confused? His gestures do not denote anger, he's simply a bit dejected. And if so-

"Shion, don't," Mion whispers, grabbing my arm. "Any more pressure may be counterproductive."

"We don't know that. I do have an idea to ask him about without risking anything," I glare back, she corks an eyebrow. "And if it backfires, you can lay the blame on me, alright?" Never breaking the bridge between our souls, she relents a small nod, relaxing her shoulders when she lets me go. "Ahem, Takeru?"

"What?"

"Did you get the chance to listen to the speech Her Highness gave earlier?" I ask, staring.

Blinking slow, he veers away. "No, didn't have a radio nearby."

"So you were not allowed to listen?" Mion notes, choking the end of her ponytail.

"I had work to do, didn't think to ask for a radio, is all," he shrugs, shaking his head.

"But still, you did hear something in the hangar, right?" I press, walking closer, stepping on his shadow. "I assume, your debate with your squadmates was about what she spoke about?"

"Sigh… Kind of, yeah. I do…" fury surfaces with the violence of a whale, he again taps his brows, "agree in Mitsurugi's real concerns, about using Her Highness to deliver the request of another. I know we are stuck between a rock and a hard place, but I expected more from the Empire."

"Huh? What do you mean?"

Slowing down as he reaches the elevator and pushes the button, he gives the wall a small kick, sighing hard from his nose with the fury of a bull seeing red, or Yuuhi-sama seeing horses. "It's not like I don't understand the burdens that lay on the Shogun's shoulders. It is simply…" inhaling through clenched teeth, slowly shaking his head he again kicks the wall, "concerning to hear a mere figurehead instead of a proper ruler in her voice."

A shiver runs down my spine, ears burning at the adusted tone, the displeasure flooding his lips. That same blazing stare which my leader endowed whenever Yuuhi-sama would refuse his proposals. Looking to my side finds Mion staring at me in equal befuddlement, just that her lips cannot close, her chin desires to sink into her neck, standing still, stiff. Silent.

"Um…" Licking my lips, unable to dispel the acidity, the burning on my throat, I step closer. "Do you not favor Her Highness' actions, perchance? Or, are you merely displeased with the situation she's facing at the moment?"

Barely looking back, a single eye holds my stare, rivets my feet in place, cause my lungs to forget to breathe. Lost in the soft kindling, I can only wait.

"… I simply expected more of her, to act on her words instead of merely doing a request. If Her Highness believes it imperative to tighten the defense lines, then she can order the evacuation immediately or support the notion forwarded by the other powers. Leaving things to those that remain away, when they clearly have had no desire to seek asylum in the shelters, is asking for things to go wrong."

"In that we agree," I nod, releasing a long exhalation from my nose. "However, there is some… friction she is enduring at the moment, you'd understand. Perhaps… a stronger, imposing ruler would be what you'd favor? If the Shogun were… feared and respected then-"

"Is that how you wanna do things, huh?"

"Eh?"

Glaring back, blazing back, coming closer, mere inches separating our eyes. "Is that how you rather do things? To forget empathy and rule by decrees? To… crush the fangs of anyone who opposes you?"

"W-Wait, I did not-"

"Violence breeds violence, and should only be used as the last resource," he affirms, restoring my personal space, tapping his brows again. "If that is all you can think of to aid your Lady Shogun, then you'll never become a proper member of the Guard."

"… Excuse me, what?" Mion asks, gaping.

He beats a fist into his chest, raising his chin, the blaze. "A blade that doesn't know when to sheathe itself is nothing but a tool to kill. And an Imperial Guard is, first and foremost, a protector of the people. A rampart to safeguard the peace of the future, to ensure it remains smiling." He sighs, hiding his hands on his pockets yet not releasing us from the draconian stare, the unblinking and stoic stare of our Leader. "If you falter to aggression, you're no better than a mere knife. Sometimes, the threat of violence is more effective than violence itself. Standing in protection is what you should focus on, in my opinion. Unless, of course," he frowns, looking away, "you rather try to reach Heaven through Pandemonium."

"Wh- There is no way in which we'd support such a notion!" Unable to rein myself in, I step closer, stares clashing.

"For real?" He asks, in that same irreverence, that same burning gaze.

"Of course. We… We do not hoist such values, even if we would wish Her Highness to stand proud."

"Shion, do not be so coarse," I'm pulled back, Mion gives him a minute bow. "Do forgive her outburst, cadet Shirogane. In any case, I assume you also are opposed to… such adusted showings of power?"

"Yeah, more or less," he states, frowning a bit. "You're both Imperial Guards, Shinpans at that. Supporting your rulers to avoid needless conflict is something you should know well, and sometimes ascertaining a clear position is what is required to quell the disquiet in the air."

"… Are you displeased with the Shogun's decision?" Mion asks, low, gaze and chin descending.

He sighs and shakes his head. "I merely would wish Her Highness to stand resolute, whatever her plan is. There are lives at risk, and her words can easily solve the issue. Even if at times one must not hesitate to bloody both hands, even if there are differing views in play, I believe her standing her ground would be welcomed by many, and would actually help the Diet more than they believe."

"I… Ahem… I do agree with your words, cadet," Mion says, giving a nod, compacting both shoulders. "However, sometimes, there is little option but to stand proud in one's convictions. And if Her Highness chooses to do so as of now, well…"

"Consequences will follow, as you perhaps know already our Empire is in quite the dire situation," I sigh, letting my sight crash down. "Her Highness only desires to safeguard the peace we enjoy today, frail as it is. Moderation in one's wording is, sadly, the most fitting weapon she can wield at the moment," giving a nod, I hesitate, lick my lips, steal a gaze.

And find his eyes still squarely on mine. "Yeah, I know. Doesn't mean she can't try with what little cards she has to edge the board to her favor. If actions have to be taken, they have to be swift a silent, aiming to stem the bleeding instead of leaving it to chance."

"Still, please do not be so harsh on the Shogun. There is much which rests on her shoulders, and the pressure she exerts upon herself is grand indeed. I can understand you not knowing of it… but she truly has been doing an utmost effort with whatever tools she has at her disposal," I ask, sighing along Mion. Ever since you've been away, convincing Yuuhi-sama to sleep properly has been nigh impossible, much less to placate her ill mood on the odd moons in which it rose back. I cannot blame her to show cracks in her veneer, more considering how their talk seems to have gone.

And yet, he sighs and relaxes every so slightly. As he fiddles with his hair, a small swirl of air causes lips and eyes to squint in concern. "While I concede her situation is hard to juggle and that her words do carry another weight, those same words are her greatest tool. If she allows her mood to cloud her judgment things will only turn south. As much as I get her frustration with how things seem to be going by what I've heard since I arrived to the Empire, this ain't the time to go spewing blue fire."

"Yes, I do… What?" Did he just-

A chime rings, the elevator opens. From within it, Takeru stands upright, in attention as he salutes us both. With a glare that could slay, an open combustion roaring away.

"I'm certain we'll agree in that there are more pressing matters to tend to, before the bad apples spoil the rest of the tree. So I think, from my humble position, that perhaps Her Highness should choose one path and stick to it, be it the docile peacekeeping efforts or the adusted blue fire of displeasure. I'm sure a resolute speech would have done more for everyone, a truthful one which she believes in. Otherwise, her poor standing… could call snakes to the tree."

"Wait, what are you-"

"Anyways, thanks for keeping an eye open so far, you two. 2nd Lts, I sincerely hope we can keep getting along. And I'd appreciate it if you could ensure the blue fire chills down, before the black one has to go and burn some snakes again," he smirks widely, letting me see his teeth, as his eyes begin to cross, as he cackles slowly. "Remind her that she has to be in the dark, so that she can shine brighter. I'll leave this request in your more than capable hands, cousins."

The door to the elevator then closes, the whirring follows shortly after, the display showing the descent. For a moment, I simply stare there in silence. Watching the numbers slowly go up, feeling the small threads of air seep into my nose. Glancing down, at the minute shake of my fingers as I exhale and feel a my stomach contracting upon the lack of air.

"… Mion, did he just gave us an order?"

She blinks fast, again fiddling with her hair. "I… don't know. But those words… I did not misheard them, right?"

"No, it was the same as during, well, cough, the times when we were working together, yes."

"Wait, so- Wait a moment," eyes and lips widen, we both look at the elevator, back to each other, lost in silence for a while. "… Did he remember?"

"Did he?"

"You did hear the same as I, right?"

"Yeah, and he did look as adusted as back then, too."

"Indeed he did. So… Wait, if he remembers, why did he remain quiet?" She pouts, eyes closing as her hands shake.

"Perhaps, he's being overcautious? Even the wording of the order…" I look at the elevator, rubbing my arms together. "We didn't misheard that, right?"

"No, we did not. He… Sigh… Oh, thank the Heavens…"

"Yeah, thank the- H-Hey! Don't fall on me!" Supporting her with a hand, Mion groans a bit, tugging at my dress.

"S-Sorry, I merely… I mean, we really did not misheard it, right?"

"No, I think not. Still…" Why those words? Why not smile, call us Pickles? Why… remain quiet and distant? Why must you be the Leader and not Takeru? "… Let's go look for Mana-nee, we need to report this."

"Eh? Ah, yes, of course," she nods back and regains her footing, we quickly turn around and start to almost jog back to the barracks.

There is no mistake, that was deliberate. Those words, the expression… But then, if he remembers… Why keep quiet? Why antagonize Meiya-sama? I don't care about the Leader of the Swordbreakers, he can stay dead for all I care. But that kind gleam in your features, the sound of your chuckles… I want my clumsy little brother back, I… know it won't ever be the same. I know it. But at least we can remain close, be there when we need each other. If he already recalled everything then, why would Takeru choose to play dumb when-

…

Slowing down, I tap Mion's shoulder. She raises a brow, decelerating a few feet in front of me. "Say Mion, don't you find this odd?"

"Huh? You mean, him asking us that out of the blue? Well, yes, it is rather concerning he hasn't tried to approach us, but perhaps Kouzuki has him under vigilance and-"

"No, not that. Well, that is a concern too, but it's not what I'm talking about here." Sighing, rubbing my forehead, I lick my lips, restoring dampness to my mouth as I meet her gaze. "This last talk… he gave us an order, right?" She nods, hugging both arms together, looking down, a tender flower under a downpour. "Yet our leader wouldn't be so, well, subtle about this, right?"

"Indeed… If he deemed the issue worthy of an order, considering the circumstances, then I don't think Takeru would have postponed the talk. Perhaps, he would have told us something earlier when we had some time alone."

"And yet, he waited until the last moment. If all of this was deliberate, why?"

"Hmm… If he, well, was truly aware of everything… He chose to gave us a warning about Yuuhi-sama, above everything. To prevent… the Black Fire from resurging." Inhaling sharply, enduring the pit that spawns in my stomach, I return the grim gaze Mion also endows. "Do you believe Kouzuki is what he's warning us about?"

"Hardly. There would be no warning if that was the issue. Still, let us not act conspicuously for the fox may not be aware he regained his memories. And if our leader desires Yuuhi-sama to remain calm, then it means he knows his presence can be used to her detriment?"

I nod, folding my arms. "If Yuuhi-sama is upset, he must be aware the tribulations about his return are ruining her mood. And learning of his memories will only incite her to reclaim him… and if we tell her Takeru wants her to stay put…"

"She's gonna lose her marbles," Mion sighs, slouching alongside me. "In any case, whatever it is his goal, it's clear Takeru is aware of the burdens Yuuhi-sama is facing… and I suppose, the possible ripples of disturbances hitting the Capital," she finishes with a solemn nod.

Slowly walking once more, the back of my head hurts. Looking down, I simply follow Mion's lead. "If he requested of us to remain composed… Does it mean there are enemies nearby?"

"Either that, or that we cannot alert anyone of our cards," she says, low.

"… Anyways, let's hurry to Mana-nee. If our Leader of all people is asking us to be calm…" I shiver, exhaling pure snow. Mion chuckles weakly, smiling in equal dejection and happiness.

Because he is back, he's right there, at arm's reach.

But he is back, aware of the risk, the danger.

And he is back, back to that furious gaze, that adusted contortion, distortion of his bright features.

Even if it was calmer, more subtle than before. Even if he may have used it only to deliver a message.

… You stupid idiot. You could have hugged us or something when away from the cameras, called us as always, smiled as before. You're such a jerk, always leaving us in wait, never arriving in time. You're cruel… After all this time, after being so close…

… Next time I see you, I'm gonna hug you so hard your eyes are gonna pop. And this time, this time I ain't letting you go on your own anywhere. This time… we'll rid you of those nightmares, of whatever is making you believe you must remain adusted, Takeru.

---

A/N: Not gonna lie, the last batch of comments has made me a bit concerned, and also a bit upset.

I know the story is dragging on, and to be honest I do understand the complains about shipping and all. For a while since I started this rewrite, when I freaked out and deleted the older chapters 59 to 64 and then wiped D&R, this story has been a mess to deal with. Part of me does agree with some of the more strong worded comments, that maybe this would be better split up into its separate stories. It was a thought I had, and still toy with, to make the whole 'Native Takeru AU' from scratch with TDB and work up from there and keep the other aspects about the Unlimited timelines and Takeru's daughter to Before Light's Out and the story it builds up to, something I call the 4U-0W Saga.

All these details and different mindsets of characters are honestly a bit overwhelming and hard to keep track of, and I may have been way more ambitious than I should have. Trying to make everything make sense has been hard, and while I thought the Mind Dive arc would help a bit it is a bummer to see the small foreshadowing added to kind of hint at Yuuko's change didn't work out, but she is the character I write the worst out of the original cast.

So, point being, lay it on me and be brutally honest. Are the last slew of chapters just not working at all? The characterization, reactions, and interactions, I mean. I know the pacing is dead, despite my attempts at getting it back up. I've been second guessing myself since chapter 69, since I had to sit down and commit to writing the last scene of chapter 77, and while stubbornness, sunken cost fallacy, and feeling bad about dropping this fic are kind of driving me forward to ignore the complains, I do concede that it may be for the better to have this split and turn into separate canon-divergent stories even if that makes it all 'not read like muv-luv' as a commenter pointed out.

And yes, I am salty as fuck about this. But it's all more practice to learn to juggle the details better, even if some will never be pleased with what and how I write. I know that both Yuuhi and Yuuko should have no need for someone like Takeru in a romantic sense if we base them on canon, but even if it comes out OOC that is the direction I wanna write.

Anyways, yeah, I won't be going on a 'hissy fit' again nor deleting stuff or anything. I'm honestly just frustrated, while this fic did start out without an outline or a clear goal beyond 'find a way to let the girls be happy even if the war goes on' I did try to put some signposts and stuff back then about where I wanted to go, and I did try to hint at where the story would go in the current chapters since the rewrite, thanks to some harsh but helpful words I got on the OG chapter 31 from both a guest and Dash9. Namely, the whole relation with Yuuhi being actually a thing and the involvement of Takeru's daughter from Unlimited are twists I tried to foreshadow, even if in canon those timelines are erased. It was all to hint at the conflict from the cover and the issues Takeru faces and the forgets about post-CCSE, that the people here are not like the ones he loved before. And having him deal with that is what kind of fuels his attitude in the last chapters, or what I hoped to hint at anyways.

So while I know I'm not entitled to any comments, I'd like your honesty on how this has been thus far, beyond the pacing issues which… I don't know if I can solve, writing long is the only way I know to write. Also, learning new details from old Age games isn't helping. Seeing one of your 'original' ideas be already present in a canon CG is quite the shock, more so when it actually makes a small joke I put in just for the lols suddenly fit in better with the plot at large. I love and hate this franchise so much, but God, I should not have requested those CGs. As someone who loves little details, trying to keep up with the parallels in between games is exhausting. Mad respect to the localization team.

Sorry for the long ramble. As always, thanks for reading. Stay safe.

Zuoriel

Cracks in the Masquerade

Chapter 89:

Cracks in the Masquerade

---

December 5th, 07:25 PM.

---

[Meiya]

---

"That was not my fault." Ayamine says, lowering her brows.

"Yes, it was. I asked you to not advance so much," I insist with a sigh. "How can I cover your advance should you choose to insist on not communicating your patterns?"

"I told you to move one breath faster, to not remove your feet from the pedal," she counters, taking a spoonful to her lips.

I look down to my own plate, letting the synth scent of the broth fill me, the chatter in the PX claim my ears. Try as I might, I do not believe this rift will be mended easily thus it is in the squad's interest for me to desist on this front. So I resume my dinner, ignoring the small gazes Yoroi steals at me.

"Sigh… Look Ayamine, if we are to work as an element you have to stay near my position," Sakaki repines, tapping her glasses. "You already know I can't move as fast as you do."

"I'm trying to actually beat our enemies. Hiding all the time won't do us good," she retorts as her nose tightens slightly, before going back to her dinner.

"Loath I am to admit my agreement, Sakaki. While I welcome the idea to shuffle our positions, it is clear you're not yet ready to take the role of a vanguard," I offer, trying to defuse the situation.

"Mitsurugi, that's not the issue here," she tenses her lips, closing her eyes as circles are drawn once again. "Regardless of my position, Ayamine's tendency to advance carelessly could compromise a mission. She won't always have someone like you or Shirogane to accompany her. Furthermore, our performance in the morning training proves we need adaptability. This new method in the night trainings is my idea to allow us to reach said aptitude faster," she states with a slow nod, slowly cutting a slice of pork and giving it small bites as she looks back.

"I merely do not see the merits of such an approach. Why place us in positions where we will not work at our full capacity?" I fold my arms, as I cannot fathom what she's trying to achieve. Besides keeping myself and Ayamine away from the same element, that is. I admit my folly, and I have kept quiet during the run to not burden my comrades any further yet if Sakaki decides to implement this routine as our nightly course then, I have my doubts whether this will truly be beneficial at all.

"Did you ask yourself how good your covering fire was, Mitsurugi?" Sakaki says as she leans back and slides another piece of pork into her lips.

"What? You know I am not a good a sniper as Tamase. Obvious it was my performance in the position you placed me in would be subpar."

"What is it? You're adept at criticizing me and Shirogane-kun, why can't you say that you failed in your task openly?" She asks, raising a brow, a cup to her lips.

"Mmgh… It is true that I did not fulfill my role today, but that is because you placed me in a position I am not comfortable with." What is wrong with her? I had thought Sakaki did not wish to invigorate the tensions I foolhardily created… It seems I was mistaken.

"A-All of us had some trouble in the training since we tried out new positions, is all," Tamase braves, barely lifting both voice, gaze and posture, as hesitant as the hand that brings a small dose of rice to her lips.

"Yes, that is true. And how would you rate my performance as a vanguard, Mitsurugi?" Sakaki then asks, yet again beginning to make circles in the air as she rests her glass on the table. So… I cannot read her intent as of now, I believed her to be still upset towards my person.

"Atrociously terribad," Ayamine answers with a smirk while I was trying to find the right words to avoid further embers.

I can practically feel my breath turning cold at the sight of Sakaki scowling at the one sitting to my left. Her lips seem to contort, swallowing a retort and the venom of a snake that still slithers in her gaze. Tamase, who is sitting to her right, sighs heavily when she sees our leader calm down. I merely shook my head.

"Ayamine… What exactly do you mean?" Sakaki says, eyes still narrowed.

"Ask Special-kun, I just think the word sounds funny. And you were awful, worst partner I've ever fought with."

"… Precisely. And that's why we'll continue to use this formation from now on. This was my idea to aid us surpass our temporary setback, even if I agree with the points Shirogane-kun raised earlier today." she declares while tapping her glasses, then returns to emptying her plate.

If she admits her own shortcoming, why continue down this path? It is unlike her, when Sakaki voices her own failings she usually back downs from her plans, even if that only happened rarely. I fold my arms, deliberating within myself for a moment at how to approach her.

"… Sakaki, forgive me for insisting, but I do not see what good this will do. If you also have seen none of us benefited from this training, I think it best that we return to our usual formation."

"No, that will only make everything worse. We need adaptability if we ever wish to catch up to the training. Please remember that you, me, and Shirogane-kun need the score to reach graduation," she answers, despite her voice being calm it's apparent in how her chin and eyes contract that she is troubled, angered perhaps, at our results so far. "At this rate, we will take many months to get up to skill if we remain stuck in this level of the course. So we need to begin by polishing our individual abilities before anything. After all, he is right. This lacking display will not be enough once we become commissioned."

"Hard disagree," Ayamine counters in her usual emotion lacking tone. "We would benefit more from letting everyone do what they do best for now."

"I agree with Ayamine. I am to be a vanguard, considering my aptitude, so while I can only agree in further polishing our skills I see no reason for you to place me as a Blast Guard." One of Sakaki's brows twitches, she then sighs shortly. "I believe every one of us has a role we excel at. I am of the opinion that we should return to what was working best for us, with you in the middle as our leader. And… I shan't spawn any further debates. My veneer won't bend twice, you have my word," I nod her way, never blinking, never breaking eye contact.

"Sigh… I just told you, we can't keep going like this," Sakaki says, practically sighing the words out as she lowers her arms to the table. What has afflicted her to such lengths? Could she be dejected with herself at the issues we suffered through since the mock battle?

"Chizuru-san, no one is blaming you for this slump we are now in. You do not need to shoulder it all on your own," Yoroi requests, wincing slightly, idling the cup she was drinking from.

"Sadly, the leader has to take responsibility for it's team. So, it's up to me to find a new way to take us out of this lock."

"You're only digging the hole."

"Ayamine, must you?" I stare, she shrugs, so I sigh and see Sakaki's gaze lost in her soup, not even wishing to retort.

Ayamine also seems to notice it, growing a bit stiff. If Sakaki is again holding the words in, retreating within herself… this will end up in the same way our prior trainings before Takeru arrived. I… What can I do to help without undermining Sakaki's role as our leader? I do think she is mistaken, but if I keep pushing that fact… her confidence might crumble. She is taking this harder than the rest after all. And I have not been in my best behavior to point fingers to anyone at the moment, much less since they are trying to not exclude me as well.

"Um…" Tamase's interjection is barely more than a whisper, she switches her gaze from us to her plate in indecision for a moment. "Maybe we could… leave the swapped positions for when we clear all the standard courses? If we keep falling back on the trainings, the Instructor will continue to increase the sim run's difficulty, right? We do need to make up the days we lost, and you three also need the grades, so we should do our best in the one area each of us excels at, in my opinion."

"So much that," Ayamine nods as she points a finger to Tamase. "We need one good result. We can't keep screwing up for so long."

"… And that's why I'm telling you all, we should first get used to shuffling around the battlefield." Sakaki tightens a fist, dispelling anger's roots from the soil of her words. "The Instructor won't give us the luxury of two identical battles or a detailed skirmish plan once we shift back to mock battles, going by how today went. Care to guess what's going to happen if we start to drag our feet again?" She inquires, tapping her glasses, seeking our gazes. We all lowered our eyes, remembering the earlier training.

I can only sigh and bring some water to my lips to cleanse the dryness, the harshness which didn't leave me after the training. I had thought I could fight toe to toe against Takeru, but as it turns out he had been holding back. Even leaving my uncouth behavior aside, I was no match for him once he began to employ those erratic, eccentric patterns. A novice I still am, yet I believed myself more capable after trading blows with Tsukuyomi. All I truly desire as of now, besides mending my relation with you, is growing strong enough… to stand by your side, Takeru. To understand what it is you see, what drives you forward, and how it is our teachings developed into such savage maneuvers under your hands.

Which is why I agreed to try Sakaki's suggestion for this nightly training, as a way to clear away these clogging chains on my hands, these doubts that threaten to take hold of me once again in my frustrations. I cannot believe he still isn't available, even if to only extend an apology. It also serves as proof I do not wish to hamper the squadron's unity any longer, and I did try earnestly to support both her and Ayamine from the position I was assigned to.

"Sakaki, I truly agree on your wish," I say, nodding. She seems to relax her gaze and lips. "I do know we need much training to reach a level of aptitude which will please the Instructor. Yet, I believe Tamase speaks the truth. We, as a team and individuals, need to gain our first victory. We need to see positive results, since… well, our first mock battle was not particularly positive for us."

"Sigh… I know that already. But we won't see different results if we stick to the same trainings forever," her brows narrow, she quickly grabs the last slice of pork and mixes it with one small mound of rice, bringing it all to her lips.

"We won't prove ourselves if we keep failing, though," Ayamine retorts as she leaned back on her seat, finishing her drink.

"Ayamine-san, please don't say that," Tamase scolds, her tone rising from that whisper despite the downcast posture not faltering. "We all are in this together. So… maybe we could keep trying for a few days?"

"Tamase, we do not have the luxury of time," I sigh as she looks down immediately, as if that was all it took to have her silenced. "Surely you also weren't comfortable as a Rush Guard?"

"Well… I guess."

"It's as if Miki-san was missing a wing as she flied. Speaking of, I think this tale of a bird is-" Yoroi commented, despite having being silent most of the time.

"Yoroi, this is not the time for your ramblings." I cut her off, before she worsens the mood.

"Eh? But I was just-"

"Please, read the mood. You shouldn't speak up now."

"… Why not? I can't talk now?"

My mouth was left agape as Yoroi returned my gaze intensely. I looked at her, Yoroi was to my right so it was clear to me. Her brows furrowed and lips pursed, she reminds me of those lynxes I saw in books. It is rare to see her… No, scratch that, I have never seen her hold her ground to speak up.

Despite a slight shaking in her shoulders, she returns my gaze firmly. "I think all of you are misunderstanding Chizuru-san here. Meiya-san, Kei-san, you tend to move forward without considering that we might not reach your side to cover you."

"That is… As the vanguard it is our duty to-"

"Do you think those excuses will convince the Instructor?" She narrows her brows, my words clog my throat for a moment.

"… I am not making excuses. It is our role to take the frontlines."

"Yes, that's true. But you can't simply rush away and put yourselves in danger. Didn't you learn anything from what Takeru has always told us? You know, cancel and back-dash?"

Ah… She does have a point. Takeru would also have reminded me of that… if I hadn't been so obstinate towards my fellow. Yet, he would have covered us… No, I cannot think in this way. I cannot solely rely on him. Even more after what Mion and Shion told me, what Tsukuyomi disclosed as well. Despite how late it is, it seems he hasn't yet been released from his special mission as I was not allowed to visit his cell. Moreover, I cannot allow myself to become co-dependent on him, I desire… to be a pillar of support, to mend my mistakes. Sigh… I suppose, being more agreeable to the squad as a whole would also work in my favor to rebuild the trust I eroded.

"So you're saying this method will bring boons to all of us somehow?"

She smiles, giving a small nod. "Yeah. You saw how Chizuru-san was acting when trying to be a vanguard, right? So now you know how frustrating it is as a Blast Guard to have the vanguard rush ahead without a care."

"Wait, are you saying… I cannot believe I did not see it." It all makes sense now.

Sakaki is trying to have us see our own shortcomings by placing us in other positions. Me and Ayamine tend to move too far ahead, it is true. So, if we are placed in the read and are forced to keep up with the vanguard while having to cover their advance, we will learn how detrimental it is to the team as a whole for the frontliners to never take a pause to retreat, even if from our position it seems as if we were making the right call.

The same applies for Tamase. She tends to get down easily and is not odd for her to downplay her contributions. So by displacing her in the formation and having someone else be the sniper, we can show Tamase how truly vital her marksmanship is for us, perhaps more by placing her in the frontlines. So that is what this was about… Polishing our vision individually, both to sharpen our habits from the training course and to allow us to take different roles on the fly if the situation so demands, to then allow us to bring better results for the team as a whole.

"I see… I was so focused on my own role that I failed to see the bigger picture."

"Hm? What do you mean?"

I explain to Ayamine what I just realized, allowing Sakaki to sigh and recover a faint smile, relaxation coming as she finishes her drink.

"That's exactly what I was trying to do. But telling you beforehand would have been counterproductive, so I chose to keep that to myself, to let you figure it out on your own through the trainings," she nods, again making circles in the air.

This time, however, she seems to catch herself and stops said finger, furrowing her brows at that for some reason. Why would she be bothered by the gesture?

"… You could have told us, though," Ayamine glares at Sakaki in mild acidity, leaning into the table.

"It wouldn't have done much. I think it's better to let us reach our own answers through experience," Sakaki shrugs, expression remains loose and undisturbed as the night sky.

"I agree with Sakaki in this. Now that this has been cleared up, I suppose we could continue this method for a few days."

"Kei-san, maybe you should be the Blast Guard tomorrow," Yoroi smiles and chuckles at her, making Tamase giggle at Ayamine's flinch and purse of her lips.

"… God no. Anything but that, my sniping sucks."

"Use the chance to improve. You never know what might happen in the field, after all," I nod in agreement with Sakaki's words, Ayamine groans as she leaves her mouth slightly open.

"I know we all have sore spots but… let's try a bit harder tomorrow to make up for the time we got stumped!" Yoroi says, a smile on her face. "Well, I'm gonna hit the library now, do any of you wanna come?"

"Oh, I was wanting to go there too," Tamase then finish what little was in her plate, causing her cheeks to balloon beyond limits, causing her to hastily seek her glass to aid the gulping process.

Sakaki sighs as she pats her back, which allows Tamase to return to normal. "Be more careful, there's no need to rush. I'll pass on the reading though," she says, tapping her glasses, a hand running around her neck, "I need a good night's rest today."

"I think I'll join in the reading, if we're gonna keep shuffling positions in the night runs," Ayamine nods, making eye contact with Sakaki for a second.

"Meiya-san, um," Yoroi's hands rustle together, her eyes veer away as her elbows rustle closer to her person, "would you be liking to join us in the library?"

My throat constricts for but a moment, a small shiver runs down my spine. Barely managing to restrain a frown from raising to my face, I merely shake my head, look away.

… I know it is futile to repine on the matter, but it is truly uncomfortable to hear you being formal all of a sudden. I suppose, it is my just dessert for my attitude of late. Sigh…

"No, I'm going for my usual run and then I'll sleep early as well."

"Oh, I see. Well, see you guys tomorrow then!" Yoroi smiles at us as she grabs her tray, nodding as she departs to the counter.

Tamase also says her good nights to us as she follows behind. Sakaki covers her mouth, hiding the yawn that she allows to escape. After rubbing her eyes, she also stands and grabs her tray and, followed by Ayamine, also went to return her tray. I gave a nod to them as they left, choosing to take my time to finish my meal and not disturb the obvious motives behind the synchronized departure.

Savoring the food on my tongue, slowly breathing in, I ponder what Mion and Shion told me, what my trainings are producing, and what comes from tomorrow. Should I give him some space today, leave my apology for tomorrow? On the contrary, is a mere apology worth anything at this point? I should endeavor to show him clear support first instead of simple words. The same extends to the rest of the squad, that have tried to remain composed and welcoming during our training and dinner despite my prior words and actions.

Still… I wonder, how are you faring as of now? Burdened with more assignments, lacking any free time at all, unable to take a breather, to come outside if you so desired. Despite our arguments over semantics of late, the fight earlier today… Was that how you dispatched of the chasers? Not an ounce of hesitation, overflowing hostility. When we spar, usually there is tension to his features but the brazen spirit has never denoted wrath as his voice portrayed earlier today.

… Perhaps, the gaps in his memories are causing him pain? Tsukuyomi warned me not to mention anything, but I suppose that, if he was close to Mother, to see our Empire fall, to return and learn of our grim situation is not doing Takeru any favors. And here I am, adding further pressure to his shoulders.

I drink some juice to clean my palate, then grab a tissue and wipe my lips. Letting a small amount of air out, it feels as if a shower had washed away what weighted down on my shoulders. All things considered, it is good to see we can now discuss openly without reaching a dead point. I had feared Sakaki and Ayamine would begin arguing, but it is reliving to see that is a problem of the past, even if they still bicker from time to time. I do have to give Sakaki her due credit, I never would have thought of such a training. In any case, now it is my obligation to mend my relation with Takeru, so that we can all once more progress as a team.

After all, above everything else, I do have an oath to fulfill… For if that park still remains standing among the ruins, then I must also endeavor to bring my ideals into practice. I am blessed to no longer being caged, to have a fellow guard-in-training near me. I can only hope you can spare me another chance, Takeru.

"Oh, I didn't think you would be here."

"Hm? Oh, 1st Lt. Takamura. Good evening." I salute her and she returns the gesture as she sits down in front of me, leaving her tray onto the table. "Were you occupied until now? The night training ended quite a while ago."

"No, nothing of the sort. It's just that, since my current task is close to completion, I need to review a few reports before retiring for the day, is all," she compacts her shoulders, sighing shortly as she slowly begins to eat.

"I see…" That, too, is a duty we must prepare to tackle in due time.

"By the by, did something happen today? It was rather odd you all would choose to alter your formation for today's run," she asks, staring.

"Oh, it is nothing. Sakaki merely believed it was for the better to allow us to see the battlefield from another position, to give us all more awareness once we return to our intended placements."

"Hmm… Quite an astute plan, I say. It is good to see you're truly making the most of your time as cadets," she smiles, nodding as she pierces two slices of pork atop one another, slowly munching them.

"Thank you, ma'am."

"It's nothing, really. It is nice to see you're all this determined in your trainings, is all. At first I feared to be perhaps too harsh on you all, however I am impressed by your results," she nods, again slicing the synth pork in tiny pieces.

"… Ma'am, may I ask why are you using a fork?"

"Hm?" She tilts her head, still munching. Eyes widen momentarily, she drinks slowly for a moment to then clear her throat. "Oh, force of habit, I suppose. I was stationed in Yukon Base beforehand, so it has been a reflex to ask for forks and knives to eat my meals."

"I see…" So she, too, was stationed at Yukon, huh. Is that the reason why she has been watching over Takeru's training from time to time and he aids her- Wait, that's right! If she's here, then he should be already free for the night. "1st. Lieutenant, if it isn't much bother, could you tell me how Takeru has been faring as of late?" I would not like to intrude on what little free time he has, after all.

"Shirogane?" Her expression darkens ever so slightly, eyes falling to the plate, lips compressing for a second. "I haven't had the chance to see the cadet since a few days back, due to my duties not requiring his presence at the moment."

"Is that so?"

"If I may… Has he been giving you any trouble?"

"Eh? No, on the contrary, I have… been rather tactless towards him lately."

"I see…" She resumes her eating, we share a moment of silence as the scent of her synth food reaches me, as the noise in the PX dies down. "I assume, he has remained composed thus far?"

"Yes, of course. Please, do not think badly of him. Takeru wasn't-"

"Worry not, I do not entirely believe the rumors I've heard," she waves a hand, shaking her hear. Still, not entirely, huh. "I am merely concerned over what he could do, I did see a few soldiers trying to incite a fight with him. Perhaps the same will happen now, and the same could extend to you and the others," she sighs, then looks straight into my own gaze. "Do not let the pressure impair your poise, is all I'll say."

"Yes, ma'am." Sadly… those are words I required earlier today.

I fold my arms, I feel my teeth pressuring my lips from within. I take a sharp breath as I cross one leg over the other. All he has done for me, and yet I once again lashed out as we platicated on the way to the barracks. When I should have expressed my apologies to him. And yet, now that Takamura has confirmed she has not been requiring Takeru's aid, that equals he might still be in the midst of his special missions at the moment. Sigh… Such a blunder on my part…

Still, all in due time. No need to fret over small errors. Me and Takeru will once again share a good relation after I properly make amends. Then, maybe… maybe I could ask him something about Mother… or would that be a secret we cannot disclose? Mmgh… There are so many oddities I'd like to clear regarding your identity, Takeru. For us to become true fellows, to hoist no secrets between us as the partners of the fellowship we are. And…

" It's a beautiful name, is all. I just think it suits you well."

Mmgh… I admit, it is truly frustrating to hear him refuse to use my name for some reason. I do deserve the reticence, yet the reluctance he displays is truly a concern. Takeru didn't show such aversion to my person before the CCSE or during it, so I must have crossed a line. To think it was only a few days ago we were jesting during the Undersecretary's visit, all of us sitting in this same table without the air thickening at all.

… Even if they refused to elaborate on that dirty joke, for some reason. Sigh… How shameful of me, to not have realized what Ayamine's gesture was about, to lose my composure in such way in front of Tsukuyomi. I admit, such vulgarity was unexpected and I am thankful Takeru and Sakaki defused that situation as swiftly as they did. I may lack experience with such jargon, but uttering such vulgar words is nothing but a stain on my person.

… Even more to have imagined it in such detail upon the revelation. I did not think myself such a salacious person, to fall prey to my basest instincts at such simple words. First that odd dream of a mansion during the CCSE, then my daydream in the simulator, and now this. I am grateful to have learned meditation, to keep my hormones at bay. Who knows what manner of shameful behavior I would have displayed in front of him without the proper time to regain my poise? Truly, this is nothing but a stain on my person, to view him with such eyes, to think him in that way.

… As if Takeru would ever try and feed me in such manner, or p-pet my head while doing so, o-or toy with my navel as he licks a stray grain of rice off the side of my lips… m-much less to embrace me and say such words… Or to k-k-kiss me as he did in that dream of the mansion… even less to sully our training grounds, to have us act as beasts. I-I mean, we did seem, well, compatible at one point, I admit. Now that I know he is truly a fellow, that all he said was truthful, I shall relent that… I admire many traits of his, even if our views seem to not be perfectly aligned. And, truth be told, he has been most kind towards my person ever since we met. However, me admiring his skills does not- I don't truly think Takeru…

Would he? Would he truly favor me to such lengths? If he desired to share such a relation with me, the same closeness he had with whoever handed him the Minaru Kamui, which I believe was Mother, does that mean Takeru… w ould truly one day… embrace me in that same manner and offer a ring to me? Can I… salvage our relation and… aim to earn his respect once more? Were you… all this time… seeing me with those eyes … while I stomped all over your goodwill? Would he wrap me in such kindness, try and share a picnic with me, be content with sharing his time with me? He had always… smiled much whenever we sparred, before I became undeservedly harsh towards him. He did say he found my name beautiful, even allowed me to call him by his.

Perhaps, he noticed the similarities in our style during our bouts? And thus, he has… favored me since then? Takeru has… always looked hurt whenever I grow harsh, averse towards him. Be it when we trained with those small simulators, when we started to put space between us and him, during the CCSE, and these days in our training have been the same… until I crossed a line, until I uttered grave words today. Then, all the more reason for me to ensure this mistake does not make nest. To show Takeru that I am regretting my words, that I am willing to lift this stain and regain his trust. And, if he would still desire it, that I would… w-wouldn't be opposed to-

"Mitsurugi?"

"Y-Yes?!"

"Huh? What's the matter?" Takamura asks as her brows cross, slightly tilting her head.

"No, I was… deeply lost in thought. What it is, 1st Lt?"

"I was merely wishing to ask how are you all faring. You all didn't seem as tense during this evening training, so I suppose you've managed to attain some progress?" She smiles softly, delaying the ascent of the cup to her lips.

"… Well, while we are at an impasse as of now, I believe we are making decent progress."

I spend a moment indulging Takamura's questions, accompanying her on her dinner, while receiving her advice for my squadmates and sharing opinions with her as I also finish my meal.

"… I do think that you should focus on giving Tamase an idea on how important she has been for all of you."

"Yes, I agree. She does need to gain confidence, after all."

And yet… it feels just like back then. While she is trying to not be so obvious in her respect due to her rank, it feels like all those caretakers that were assigned to me back in Sendai. I know Amato meant well, and he was right in that I needed trustworthy people looking over me, yet I would have preferred to remain with Tsukuyomi.

I know it was due to my standing as a political piece, but what wouldn't I have given to be allowed to fight back then. I am sure Takamura also was made to fight despite being younger than me, and yet there I was. And now, she is also speaking with that same respect, just like Tsukuyomi was when we met again. Like everyone else, except Takeru. And Yashiro, even if she dislikes me for some reason.

"I have been faring well," I nod, folding my arms. "Perhaps not to a degree I would be pleased with, but I cannot complain." Not after what my actions have caused to the squad as a whole.

"I see. If you ever need advice, I am always ready to listen. Even Shirogane has consulted with me at times, despite how far ahead you say he seems to be," she again smiles, giving me a small nod.

I return the gesture with a faint bow, she does seem to be far more relaxed than Tsukuyomi is, perhaps because she isn't completely aware of who I am. In any case, I do agree with Takamura's words. Simply following the training courses blindly will do us no good, indeed. Learning from the past, from all that has been harvested thus far and then applying it to our current missions is key for our growth. I do wonder why Takeru refused my words, however. I suppose, he has seen battle already whereas I haven't. And Tsukuyomi was quite flabbergasted at learning he might recall who Mother was… so there is a chance he has recalled unpleasant memories from the invasion, before whatever accident took his memories befell him.

Even if Tsukuyomi warned me to not disclose anything, I do wish to mend my relation with him. As fellows, of course. So… perhaps asking Takamura her opinion on the matter, on how she saw the incident and these semantic disagreements me and Takeru are having could grant me a hint to better approach the situation.

"… 1st Lt, if I may ask, you said you were stationed in Yukon before returning to the Empire, right?"

"Eh? Ah… Yes, I was. Why do you ask?" her expression gains sobriety, her shoulders slowly lower as does the fork that was aiming for her mouth. "Did you wish to ask anything about my time there?"

"Yes, if you would be so kind?" I ask, lowering my head, she sighs and nods. "Ahem… Could you perhaps tell me… how the Incident played out from your eyes?"

The sudden appearance of the BETA, having to fight against other humans, then seeing the broadcast where the Americans' foul plan was revealed and moments later executed… And yet, she's still here. Standing proud and working for the Empire from her humble position. I know certain intel will be withheld, but I desire to hear the contrast her words have with his, even if I only gain an immediate refusal.

"Of course, if it is painful you do not need to indulge me," I add with a hasty bow, lips pressing together, as I do not wish my appearance to force her hand.

"… It's alright. I suppose it could be useful, somehow, to your growth. We should speak of it somewhere else, however. Would you like to hear it now or, perhaps, tomorrow?"

"If I am not imposing, I would like to hear it today."

"Well, let me finish my dinner and we'll be on our way."

"No, please do not rush. It is fine," I say, grabbing my own glass to slowly finish my water. She seemed to wish to object, but merely nods to my words. Sigh… "If I may ask, you weren't injured during the fight, were you?"

"Oh, no. I was lucky, one could say," her eyes curve away, her tone dulls and slows down.

I see… Perhaps, she was sent to her TSF immediately while Takeru had to fight head on with the terrorists? No, I am sure he was also lucky to only suffer those scars. If he had been hit on the head or shot at, he could have been killed. Truly, I am blessed to have been given the chance to meet him.

Takamura finishes her dinner rather quickly, despite me insisting that she could take her time while we could discuss other matters. A few odd murmurs tail our steps as we advance to the track field, lingering stares that are repelled by Takamura's own adusted glare over her shoulder. Once we reach the door, a cold gust envelops us as it opens, a shiver from my armpits to the tail end of my toenails. Nobody is here at this hour, so there is no risk of anyone eavesdropping in our conversation. Only us and the clear skyline, the rather humid air of this calm night of December.

Takamura walks over the lines of the track, looking up. I can hear her taking a breath, I do so as well while looking at the stars and the moon, the faint light that upon us falls. That being said…

"It truly is getting colder," I rub my arms a few times over, still feeling the coldness seep through what little openings my uniform gives it. I let the air go and, for now, I cannot see my breath. I know it is a matter of days however.

"Indeed. In Yukon it was somewhere around this temperature all the time. I did miss my Royal Guard uniform back then…" she slowly says, placing her hands on her elbows, embracing tight as she slightly sways, eyes remaining on the sky as her lips slightly purse and twist inwards.

"Is it protective against the cold?"

"Oh, yes. Since it's made of a fine material, I barely felt cold during winter. It is slightly uncomfortable to wear during summer, but I vastly prefer it to the UN's dress."

"I see… So, 1st Lieutenant, I know it is a confidential matter, however-"

"Worry not, I won't divulge anything you shouldn't know. So, what in particular would you like to hear?"

"Where to begin? Oh, I suppose you could start with how the whole attack started. It must have been hard repelling the terrorists if they used both guns and blunt weapons."

"Blunt weapons?" Takamura arches one of her brows, blinking in quick succession yet remaining silent as the wind propels her hair off her shoulder. "Who told you of that?"

"Hm? Takeru told me about his participation in the Incident once."

"Huh? But… The terrorists in Yukon only used machineguns."

"… Eh? That can't be. Takeru told me of that himself, of how he had to fight back during the Incident."

"However, that cannot be true," Takamura affirms, her voice firm and clear as tonight's sky, her eyes looking straight at me. "I was also in the ground when the attack began and they didn't resort to blunt weaponry. That wasn't even mentioned in the briefing, they all stole weapons from a nearby outpost and brought them to Yukon by abusing their jobs in a delivery company. I cannot discard the chance of them making due with objects at hand in the heat of the moment, but I assume you watched the broadcast. The incident was caused by the RLF, and believe me when I said they were more than prepared for their foul plan."

"Is that so? Was Takeru trying to cover the truth, in case I ever mentioned anything?"

"Sigh… It was foolish to divulge such a thing, to be honest," she caresses her hair, her face still stern and tense, the hold over her strands twisting. "Might I ask why you inquired about the matter with him?"

"Well, I once saw his scars, so I grew curious as the rest of us did. Takeru told me he got hit by metal bats and other objects while he tried to protect the people. That's why his back is full of scars, and, well, there's another large marking covering the entirety of a side of his chest." I purse my lips, swallowing harshly and feeling my throat burn, my stomach heavy. The aftertaste is filthy, for me to divulge these matters without consulting him. However, I am certain that Takeru will understand. Takamura was also in Yukon like him, after all.

"… What?" Takamura's eyes remain widened as her posture freezes, and not due to the breeze that still surrounds us. "That's… That's not possible. I cannot deny that, at one point, ammo might have run out, but still, to employ bats and the like? Considering they had taken over parts of the base, I doubt such objects would be nearby."

"Huh? I am not lying, 1st Lieutenant. I saw said scars myself."

"No, however, as I said before, such blunt objects couldn't have been used by the terrorists. If Shirogane was attacked, he would have been shot at or paralyzed with a taser. And in the case he had been struck with a baton repeatedly, considering the progression of the attack… Well, I can understand the small markings you mention in his back, but the large scar in his chest does not add up…"

"… Then, how do you explain his words?" I fold my arms, raising a brow at her.

"I do not know about that, perhaps he simply exercised caution at the time. However, those scars are not from the Yukon Incident at the least, of that you can be certain. More so considering… No, it's nothing."

"Is there something… classified about the matter, ma'am?"

"Not classified per se, perhaps you've already heard of… the motives why cadets were targeted during the incident?"

"Hmm… No, I do not know. I do recall hearing the training schools in Yukon were also attacked, but the news were, well… more focused on the lasting damage." And we were all tending to the scars of failing our first CCSE, so we did not particularly spend much time in the PX together or listening to the news.

"I see…" she sighs, embracing her sides strongly. One of her eyes twitches as she looks up to the moon, as she presses a hand into her cheek. "The schools were targeted due to the RLF seeing the young pilots as traitors who looked away from their fellow refugees, so they were targeted as a diversion to separate the forces of the UN. That is why, I believe he might have told you a half truth."

"I… I see…"

… Then, how was he inflicted with such grievous scars? Why was he forced to lie? I thought you… had been serious… No, he was! Those expressions did not betray truthfulness, thus, what does this mean? Takeru is being forced to not reveal the source of those scars, he said it was a military secret that day. However, he didn't seem to be lying back when he told me of how was he inflicted those scars, nor at the CCSE, that night after those soldiers ambushed us.

"1st Lt, is it truly impossible that Takeru could have sustained such scars in the Incident?"

"Yes, I am certain of this. I don't know if we should pry into his life, but I can confirm such scars as the ones you describe would not come from the incident. If Shirogane had found himself at the mercy of the terrorists for long enough to leave so large a gash on chest, he would have been, well, killed by that point," she affirms with a nod and a heavy sigh, erosion coming to both features and posture, finally relenting a shiver to the dancing breeze around us. "The only thing I can think of is…" she grasps her chin, closes her eyes, and hums softly, "no, nothing."

To see her deflect the matter in such hurry, something she cannot disclose is what she was pondering at the moment. The only way to gain injuries to leave such scars… The BETA would have killed him, the terrorists could have clearly struck his head instead of his chest if he was left at their mercy. I haven't been inside a tank but I doubt they sway like a TSF does, so he couldn't have…. A moment, a TSF?

I gulp, my brows tensing downwards as the coldness pikes at my nape, as my breathing becomes a hostage to the pressure in my stomach. Was he… made to pilot? Perhaps, without a suit? Or, maybe, did he do so without permission? In the anger of losing whoever that woman was… in that same adusted impulse he showed in our bout this morning…

"Well, I believe we shouldn't pursue this matter," Takamura asserts, sending a hand to her hair which dances in the air, basking in the moonlight. "Whatever reason he had for covering it up, we shouldn't pry into it."

"However, it is odd. Why would he lie regarding them? Even more, linking them to the attack…" Why is my chest hurting? Because he lied to me? Of course, but that's not all. Why was he hurt in such a way? Why did he… Well, I was horrible with him back then, and have continued to act poorly around Takeru to this very day. Perhaps, I wasn't worth his trust, perhaps he simply tried to appease me and Sakaki with a half truth during the CCSE to prevent silence from festering doubt in our hearts. Yet, this is strange. What is the need to hide the origin of such scars?

"I agree it is odd, but I am sure he must have his reasons. Surely you have had a talk with him regarding his experiences. It is clear Shirogane is burdened by what lies in his past," she whispers as she looks down, holding one of her elbows, walking about the track field.

"… Well, that is true."

"Let's not dredge up this matter. It would only make him hurt more, considering all that the cadet is shouldering at the moment. Well, in any case, would you like to hear of my experiences during that day?"

"Oh, yes. Please do, 1st Lieutenant."

"Ahem… Takamura will suffice, Mitsurugi."

"Truly?"

"Yes, please do not be so stiff. Well then, I'll try to avoid the confidential details as I go, would that be alright?"

"Of course. Thanks again for indulging me," I give her a small bow, she waves and says I shouldn't worry.

For now, I'll let this rest. However, I suppose I should tell Shion and Mion about them. For all I know, they might be a clue to his past. That's right… Perhaps Takeru doesn't even know from where they come from, considering he woke up without any memories. Of course, saying he knows not how was he inflicted such injuries would sound quite suspicious. Then, with all the more reason, I should ask Tsukuyomi to look into this. In that way, I could help him to finally lift one of the mysteries that are veiling his past.

And in any case, I wish to tell him that he… can confide in me, that I do regret my actions and words… and that I would be more elated than any expression I could use to regain his trust, to… perhaps, maybe, be worthy of sharing that closeness, the fellowship he had with who bestowed upon him the Minaru Kamui. I am certain… Mother would approve, that she would desire me to aid Takeru. And I… and I will act as to not dishonor my lineage any longer. After all, I do know how it feels to lose those who you held dearest in your heart. I at least still have Tsukuyomi, and I suppose I can visit the park now that I know it is still standing… but what of him?

However, small steps. For now, I'll focus on learning all I can from Takamura's experiences. And I also must remain composed, to not let my guilt rush my hand, to not fall to… those odd visions again.

---

A/N: Thank you all for the responses! Really, they helped a lot.

For now, I'll keep at it in smaller doses like this one, limiting myself to one, maybe two points of view per chapter. Flashbacks and the like will go to their separate stories, unless they're required and short, so I hope the small thoughts in italics can work as hints towards the conflict in emotions. As for the stuff that will be cut off, it will be eventually coming even if most things are small, world-building stories or background details on certain characters. I do feel like fleshing out the past bits, it works out better for me in that way even if it can cause issues like those in chapters 69 and 87.

Regarding the claims of plagiarism, Provenance was an inspiration to give me the itch to see how a possible story with Takeru being paired with Yuuhi, the real one, would work. So I guess some similarities were bound to happen. As for this Luv and Hate story, I am afraid to say I am unable to read it. I can't imagine its main character, Captain Steele, as anything other than Estelle from Trails in the Sky because my brain is very dumb and it ruins the story as I can't stop hearing 'WE'RE GOOD TO GO!" whenever the captain is supposed to be talking. I've heard much praise for the story in some Discord servers, but from what I gather the way in which it handles Yuuko's daughter is nothing like what I have planned for my white bnnuy.

And since we're on topic, I know the last bits of Yuuko's possessive strike towards Keru come off as odd. For now, I'll keep on trying my best to make it less jarring with as little flashbacks as necessary. In time, I'll finish the final rewrite and Takeru's interactions with Yuuko will hopefully hint at this better, even without needing to read BLO. I admit it will come across as OOC, Yuuko would never let her feelings get in the way of her work in canon and I know that.

There might be a few more slow chapters like this one but after the current arc ends, all that's left is gas. Once the volcano erupts, there won't be as many slow breaks, I hope, even if no hard mecha action is in every chapter. If my estimations on my current drafts are correct, I'm more or less done with 75% of the story of this saga once the Komoro arc ends. Updates might slow down while I try and write Yuuko in a better way, but I do plan to stick to my idea of finishing this saga in this year or shortly after.

Anyways, this has been a large enough wall of text. Thanks for reading, and again thanks for the honesty. Keep staying safe.

Zuoriel

Jester's Dagger

Chapter 90:

Jester's Dagger

---

On a stormy night of January, 1999.

(In the hallways of Hibiya Camp.)

---

Where in another world an ample expansion laid bare to the elements, a fortification now stands in the night. A reinforcement, a sign of might to those who surround and squirm about the two palaces of Tokyo. The newly designed edification shines under the light of erratic thunders and the constant curtain of heavy rain, perhaps contrasting against the olden atmosphere of the palace grounds, the frail gardens which endure the bombardment of hail Mother Nature delivers in the eye of this storm. Through the coldness of this winter downpour the place remains indifferent, however. In grand part due to the adusted slam of a pair of eyes which sent sticky sweat down to blemish most polished uniforms, an odd tincture swirling within the stomachs of what few crossed her path at the moment.

And yet, little do her contorted features against the small smile that remains chuckling as if frolicking over a field of flowers. With a single finger he tips his hat, still forwarding the amicable gesture. "Please, Amato-sama. This humble worker does not deserve such tension from your delectable features."

"If you remain jesting, these folders shan't be departing to my office, Yoroi," she warns without lifting her eyes from his for a second, expression and posture frozen in an upward tilt, almost as if endowing a light veil of hoarfrost.

The incoming hail from the Red Lightning does not thaw the facade which remains smiling, not even a random thunders can elicit a flinch from the agent. "Hahaha, always such a cruel mistress. However," the finger which on his hat rested now limply falls to his chin, which also falls to hide eyes that regress as if facing the aggressive rain, "my warning is no jest. The supply lines are in jeopardy as it is, and I'm merely…" again, the smiles raises, "passing the tip to your ears."

"Hmph… Quite forthcoming with demands, aren't you?" She asserts, the voice imitating the rapid descent of raindrops onto the windows, the waterfalls marked upon the glass. Eyes blazing, aiming to pierce the storm as a lighthouse would, she takes a step forward while crushing, choking the small plush toy the agent had insisted she took. "What has you casting such defamation onto my person, I wonder?"

"It is no insult, I'm afraid," he relents a sigh, the small cold cloud leaving his mouth clogs against a window, fogging the shape of the castle in the distance. "The delivery of supplies has not been received, not the ones you sent. The shelters near the northern defenses are making do with low ranked synth food, and the tension is as harsh as this storm that has been raging for quite a while." Looking back, another smiles raises as he again fiddles with his hat. "Certainly you would see what I mean, being shoved within the buildings with little to do but to endure the rain or to withstand it in tents is hastening the downfall of the citizens' mood."

"… And yet, you conveniently are not aware of the method in which the cargo was supposedly diverted from its intended destination," she comments, a narrowed and venomous glare flowing towards Yoroi.

"Well, is there anything you'd be wishing to share? Perhaps, with the right tip I could-"

A thunder blasts in the sky, loud enough for the shiver to propel veins to spike towards the skin, spines to ring away like a xylophone. Yet the motive behind the flinch of the agent is not the lightning up above nor the one in front. It was instead the faint rustle, the minute step that behind him echoes along the orchestra of nature, the shuffling of a shadowy silhouette in the nearby window. And the raking in his nape, the instinct which forebodes danger, that had always kept Yoroi safe thus far in his rather dicey line of work.

With a noticeable gulp, he rearranges his suit, clears his throat, dispels the cloak of cold that had enveloped him like a twister. "If you'd allow, there is little reason for you to doubt my sources. There are certain sectors that will only grow more displeased if the situation is left unchecked, and the liberties the IRG has taken are only invigorating such concerns."

"Duly noted," she answers, facing away, lips still cascading down, posture as gallant as the samurai statue near the outpost that defies the rain. "Yet you are coming to the wrong location if you aim to solve those issues. If you're recommending me to clash with the Saionji and Ikaruga fellowships, allow me to inform you that such a course of action is not in my plans."

"Hahaha, perish the thought," he says, raising both hands as the shoulders compact. "On the contrary, my suggestion aims for the opposite. Do not forget," he again tips his hat, lips shrinking as he gazes out the window, to the shrouded lightning of the castle, "we are walking a treacherous tightrope, and the minimal unbalance will cause a domino effect. Sharing words is all I can do, so I hope my services prove useful to you, Amato-sama."

Both gazes cross, both lightless expansions scanning and piercing under the soft company of raindrops. Not even a faint thread broke through the crack of both gates, so swirling in dark the souls remain, unconnected. A mere nod, a singular prayer, obscured by the storm which rages on since a year already. I believe it is quite fair to affirm that despite the lack of words, true ones, both clearly understood in which tile each stands.

"I shall review the intel, and act in consequence. Against whoever it was that dared to divert the supplies of mine House from the people," she affirms, raising both voice and posture, a slicing stare which could perhaps even cut a brief respite into the raging clouds as she bounces the small dodo plushy the Chief had brought along the folders.

So Yoroi relents a small smile, a faint nod. "That will be much appreciated, I assure you. Well then, while I'd love to remain in your gracious presence, I have places to be. Until next time," tipping his hat, he slowly turns away and departs with careful, methodical steps.

As if he were dodging large pools of water, walking against the storming winds. Once he reaches the midway point of the hallway and begins descending the stairs, he heaves a sigh and throws a brief glance upwards from the corner, the rim of his hat. No shadow falls upon the stairs, except from the markings of water on the windows. The shiver on his nape does not decelerate nor do the heartbeats in his neck, so a smile and another nod are extended at the emptiness. Yoroi then resumes and finishes his trip back to the ground floor, the distance between each step gradually enlarging with every repetition of the movement. Fleeing from the judgment of the silence.

Back at the hallway, a slight frown stares at the derpy-eyed dodo as it bounces up into the air, back into the gloved hand. A slight curve in the lips, she shakes her head and gazes outside for a second, basking into the rain, shoulders sagging as she grows closer to observe better, a sigh leaving as she sees the hail not halt its descent. Fingers that rustle the opposite arm, driving away the freezing air that would otherwise sink through even the undershirt, nostrils that wiggle as the smell of humidity trounces the glass, lightning that convulses up above flashing erratically. So Amato shakes her head, rubs her temple while slowly stepping towards the opposite end of the hallway, back to her personal quarters in the edification.

The lateness of the visit, the night shift that was in place meant her steps are only accompanied by the rain and thunders. So with no hurry whatsoever she takes a turn, still bouncing the little dodo as she eyes the folders, the lack of an emblem or a stamp causes a ripple in her brows. Briefly placing two fingers onto the seal, the squirming noise of faint glue giving away as she opens the folder almost losing to the rain, she brushes the edge of the envelope the peek at what within it lies. The gray and blue marking that on the first page lies can only signal one origin for the reports, a certain gaze of violet flashes through Amato's mind as her complexion tightens, as her steps stop cold, as another thunder roars.

So tilting her gaze to the side without angling her head, raising the folder ever so slightly, she stares for a moment at the one garbed in black that silently stands behind. "What are your thoughts on these papers?"

"At least one half of their content is truthful," he replies with a short nod. "I managed to get Makabe to admit certain things and relent on the pressure a while ago, so Chief Yoroi was not lying about the supplies."

A slight frown sets in momentarily, she heaves a sigh. "Is that so. Yet he should not have known we'd attempt to gain such confirmation," she resumes her walk, now with another set of footsteps trailing hers. "Do you believe his intentions to be aligned with ours, Takeru?"

"Neither the Chief nor the fox indulge in charities, Raiho-san," he comments, low, colder than the rain.

"Sigh… I suppose you are correct," she relents a nod, a hand swimming through the feathery spikes of her lily hair as she gazes to the windows one last time before taking an inner hallway. "Still, perhaps the Chief can still be useful for us even if there are certain disagreements in our visions."

"… Doubt," he counters, shaking his head, brows lowering upon the hints of embers. "I find it very curious that he'd forward this intel now of all times, after the meeting with Makabe was held no less, when we had the trail since a few weeks ago. It's such a clear tripwire it makes me mad he'd even attempt the misdirection, for real," he grumbles, arms folding. "I think he should still be in the building. Can I go sucker punch him?"

"But of course not."

"… Shoot him?"

"Even less."

"Force feed him Her Highness' cooking?" The folder softly meets his forehead along a groan, he sighs and shrugs.

So Amato shakes her head as she halts her steps and looks back at him, hands on her waist. "Being Her Highness' personal intelligence division does not equal we are allowed to commit war crimes, Takeru."

"Then, should we really let him go without a slight reprimand?" He pushes, taking a step forward, mere centimeters between their gazes.

So she softens hers, shrugging her lips. "We'll take some countermeasures to make it so the Chief doesn't have such easy access to the castle, if he is indeed attempting to misdirect us. Sheathe your blaze, it is better served elsewhere," she states, giving repeated, slow slaps to one of his shoulders with the folder.

"I see… Sorry," he relents, nodding, thus they once more walk side by side. "So, what do we do with the Shogun's aberrant attempts at cooking?"

"Wait, you weren't jesting?" She asks, eyes widen as he shakes his head, the poor dodo is once more distorted, it's already derpy eyes popping further beyond its fake fur. "Why did you even allow her to-"

"Releasing stress is good for the mind, and cooking is indeed a relaxing activity that aids said goal. Burning things, too, works to that end even if they're expensive pots, ingredients, and utensils. Your complexion does look rather drained as of late, so maybe you should give that a try, Raiho-san," he says with a small smile, chuckling.

"… The burning or the cooking?"

"Yes." Again, the folder blocks his sight in a light slap as Amato groans. "Ouch," he deadpans, closing his eyes.

"Siiigh… Why, exactly, did you not stop the Shogun?"

"One, to remind her of her limits," he remarks, somber, looking down, eyes squinting, "to remind her of how useless she is, of her mortality. That she is not only the prim and proper Shogun enforced onto her shoulders," Takeru sighs, short and shallow, as Amato's steps wane and her features contort. "Two, to let her see the difference in the available food we have when compared to her practices back home. If herself, the Shogun, is now using what once were regular ingredients even I could gain access to, then that should serve to let her imagination fill in the gaps as to how severe the food situation is for the recruits and the peasants."

"… All to deliver the importance of the missing supplies during the meeting, huh," she notes, lightly holding her chin. "Decent enough method, Takeru. Did she make any comments on the matter?"

"She asked if the rest of the castle was receiving the same quality while we were alone in the elevator, and by her compact posture and gestures I think Yuuhi got the message."

"And your answer was?"

"That comparing her meals to those of anyone below the fudais was the same as equaling duck ragu to canned dog food, a comparison as excessive as employing a shotgun to kill a cockroach."

"… Sometimes I am left bereft of words at the examples you forward," she admits through the unpleasant twist on her lips, even if he spoke the truth and nothing but.

Looking away, pace and tone unchanging, he simply remains walking. "And finally, because she really needed something to block her mind even if only for some minutes."

"I see… How did the meeting proceed?" She inquires, he details the events that transpired some moments ago in the castle.

Their walking slows upon his words, acidic and caustic, and the pressure which once again assails the little bird. With a slow brush of her hair she idles time as he opens the door to her quarters, in slower steps they walk past the living room, so as to not awaken the little one which clings to a blue cloth, and once reaching her studio Amato swiftly enters and flicks the switch, allows cold light to bathe the small room. A few shelves of gallant, polished wood return the glare of the light in pride, the thick books and folders that within their rows stand seem to leave no air in between each other. The slow search makes Amato raise a brow, resign herself to rest the delivered folder to on her desk. Not even the aroma of lilies which the office retains within its four cream white walls can douse the tense lines of displeasure remain engraved in her features as she sits down, and no amount of massaging her temple can tame those traces of embers. The gaze towards a shimmering dark blue vase with flower offerings which once belonged to her own House's magnificent gardens, the lingering of her sight on Kodachi which in a small altar rests does not dispel the clouds either.

Until a pair of hands meet her nape, the thumbs folding the skin, a jolt coursing down her back, sounds stuck in her throat as both eyes part wide. "Mmh… Takeru, stop. I do not require- Ah… Kgh…"

"Come on, now," he whispers, the four fingers scouting the curve towards her chin, the thumb softly circling the lower end of her ear, the cleanly cut end of her hair with the slowness of a calm tide enveloping the shore. "Exhale, loosen your shoulders. It's too late an hour for you to be this tense, Raiho-san."

"I know, however there is- Mmh…" Sight veils itself, arms rest and sink into the desk, a sigh reaches them. "Your report is-"

"We can platicate as I tend to your stiffness, it does you no good to either remain working this late or to go to sleep as is."

"However, I do not-"

"You cannot take care of others, if you do not take care of yourself first, Raiho-san. I believe we both learned to rely on each other when the going gets tough?"

"That is true… However, this is no way for me to receive such a vital report."

"Neither is it while your muscles are strained after a whole day of office work," he affirms, lowering his face, allowing her to feel his breathing on her scalp, the edge of her ear. "You won't welcome even a meager massage? You certainly won't begin to imitate Her Highness in her rejection towards proper rest, are you now?"

"… Sigh. Just on my neck, understood?"

"As you wish," he smiles and chuckles, her lips fold inwards.

The first movements are slow, as if carefully passing a thread into a needle. After some moments, the steady pace, the sewing and entwining of motions spreads from the base to the sides, eliciting another drowned groan, a back that fully rests on the seat, a calm tendency to the breathing.

Seeing she was beginning to relax, he leans ever so slightly, keeping his tone low, slow. "If I had to bet," he begins, his palms resting onto her shoulders, the scent of faint lilies reaching his nose from the equally colored hair, "the fox is seeking to edge us to seek the supplies, but not for the obvious motives one would assume."

"Hm? How do you mean?" She inquires, looking up, extending both legs as the fingers tug at the seams of tension, untying it in slow motion.

"One would assume the UN is either warning us of this issue due to being unable to do jack shit about Ikaruga's stance and its ripples in our ranks or because of their concern over the defense lines." His eyes almost close, his fingers stopping when meeting the neck of her undershirt while his thumbs press circles on the sides, yet it is not his breathing what is held hostage of tension. "But if that were the case, Yoroi would have done everything he could to deliver this folder to us before the meeting with Makabe considering he keeps playing dumb about our arrangement. I think he was scouting for intel, as always. Damn dog…"

"Takeru, please do not lose your poise," she repines, taking in a good breath and relaxing, sinking into the seat, his hands. "I do agree, and it is frustrating to be left with no choice but to continue the parade. The question is, why and who is tugging at his strings? Another Regent, perhaps?"

"I doubt it's anyone from our ranks," he ascertains, "I don't see the point of trying to bait us with this intel, knowing Her Highness would forbid the correct course of action," he notes, giving a strong kneading as his lips shrug, fuming in understandable dejection at the answer he no longer awaits from who was once his sister. "And if they wanted to sow discord in our fellowship, well…"

"Say no more, that four-eyed traitor does not deserve to reside in your lips," she fumes, frowning for a moment. Upon the diving of a few fingers to the base of the strings, her neck, her features slowly contort in the opposing side, the pendulum swinging in counter-force. "Mmh… Not so hard…"

"Got it, sorry."

"Phew… No, it is fine. Then, the Diet- No, they do not possess the structure, the support to dare antagonize the Shogunate in the current climate."

"I think Sakaki is on our side, to be honest," he says with a slow sigh from his nose, to try and douse the embers.

She groans in silence. "Is that so…" relenting only that, and a half tilt with her neck, demanding treatment and quickly receiving the slow caress which makes her eyelids almost close, lips remaining parted as she sighs in contentedness. The soldiers caretaking is nothing but precise and welcomed, you'd understand. "The UN it is, then."

"The fox, to be precise," he affirms, low and adusted, his own complexion clouding over, and she gives a strong nod in full agreement. Four fingers slowly threading through her nape and up, the blur between the neck and the back of the head as she arches down further into the desk. "I surmise XO Kouzuki is aware of the whereabouts of both the supplies, the motives behind the lack of intel, and… I dare say, Kannagi's whereabouts."

The name causes contraction, stillness in Amato, who then takes in a sharp breath. "A test, isn't it? She's gauging which faction of the IRG to collaborate with?"

"I doubt it. Even the concessions are part of her outlined scenario, I bet. The fox is toying with her agreement, with the defense lines and all just to exhaust time. Once neither side can reach a solution on their own, her terms will sound all the more enticing… It's all just a setup for the future she believes is correct, all other opinions be damned," he repines, his hands stopping, breathing as well.

"With the threat of another intervention on the horizon? Is she aiming to have the UN default to another imposition of the Treaty?!"

"… Raiho-san, please do relax. You're growing all tense again," he complains, giving her neck a slight pinch as he kneads and folds and circles. "Don't you always tell me not to snap so easily?"

"Mmgh… Sigh. I cannot help it. The Americans abandoned us, allowed the BETA to ravish our land and people all to have an easy to invade hive to raid. To parade themselves as the saviors of the nation, to crush what little pride still remains in our people and- Ah! T-Takeru, don't- Mmh…"

"I won't repeat myself, 1st Lt Amato. You either chill down or I carry you back to the bedroom."

"Wh- Y-You will do no such thing!" His hands stop, a finger lifts her chin into his narrowed and silent stare. Lips purse as her shoulders compact, a shiver running down her spine. Slow inhaling courses through her nose, filling her stomach. "… I shall try not to grow adusted, if it will alleviate your concerns."

"Thanks," slightly lowering, for a moment his lips find her forehead, and causing paralysis to bind her whole being. "So, as I was saying," from the outside towards the chin, down and extending to the shoulders, and back up again, the motion continues as he ignores the eyes that blaze due to the lingering touch he planted a second ago, "I think the fox desires a raid to occur, but not on either proposition. The UN would rather impose another Treaty, perhaps even… seek another alternative."

"Whereas our people would see anything but support as treason," she finishes the trail, closing her eyes, enjoying the pull of the tide which envelopes her nape.

"And yet, without the aid of the US army, we would be allowing both hives to grow to Phase Three, or more if our scouts' intel on the Yokohama Hive is confirmed."

"Then, we simply must surrender to that fox's whims?"

"Raiho-san, you must chill."

"Mmgh… I admit an assault on Yokohama with only Imperial and COSEAN troops is madness, yet I shan't relent on my rejection towards the Americans meddling in our land any further. Her project is hanging from a thread, yet she dares to cut her ties with the Shogunate, to desire to reside in the UN's complex instead when they rather surrender the Empire as they did with Korea. Just what in the Heavens could that woman be thinking?" She fumes as both eyes blaze, as arms and legs cross, composure shining for its absence. Nothing but smoke and sparks, combustion is left within her towards the scientist, despite how she knows nothing but rumors.

It is all, sadly, a reflection of the scientist's own actions. Of the echoes Shura's Dance left imprinted on her soul, on the cracks that came afterwards upon a certain flat-line.

"… From within the forest, you cannot always see the stars," and yet, he quietly whispers.

"Hm?"

His hands stop, rest on her shoulders, barely grasping.

"It'd be easy to assume every rustling sound, every little shifting shadow around is a predator."

Toying with the tip of the spiky feathers, he looks up and nibbles at his lips.

"The smallest fire can be used as a guide, but it is also a sign that reveals one's position. And who knows what lurks behind the veil, awaiting the first mistake."

"… Do you think as she does, then?" She asks, low, straightening her posture, shaking his hands off her person.

"No, because a swift resolution would be better," he admits, softly resting his fingertips against her nape. When she doesn't move away, when she releases a strong exhalation, he resumes the massage. "I think Her Highness and XO Kouzuki are very similar, only that one favors intrigue while the other would rather be frontal as a battering ram should she be able to. Neither of them can afford to make a mistake, but they also cannot waste time to deal with those who stalk our steps." Smirking, he again lowers his posture, to whisper to Amato's ear. "And that's where we come into play, right?"

"… What of their STF?"

"Under constant surveillance and suffering appalling losses. I think."

"Do we play into her hand, then?" She asks, looking back.

He smiles, chuckling. "There's no need to feed the mistake. Let's remain vigilant for some more days, let's see if my hunch is correct again."

"Sigh… You say that, yet every time you ascertain something it is usually what ends up happening. You and your odd hunches," she complains, lifting a hand, poking his nose, putting some distance so that she doesn't have to feel the slow feathers that tickle at her, his breath on her ear. "Ahem… Does the whisper tell you to remain in stillness for the moment?"

"Yeah, it's time to observe now. While I believe we both agree with the fox's desire to prevent any… insurgent attitudes from ruining what frail bridges of support we have with the UN, there is no need to make a grand show of our moves. Let's make her seek us once again, and then we can have a talk at large."

"Do you believe that the fox would bend the knee and show herself? That we can trust in her word after the fall?" She asks, arms folding tightly, eyes lightly blazing in ignorant animosity towards the scientist.

So the soldier relents a sigh, sewing slow erosion to the firmness, causing Amato to swallow a soft groan again as her eyelids flutter upon the caretaking. "… No. But I doubt she has any actual support, behind her own exploits and the disturbances within the UN giving both her and us the time to avoid an imposition of the Treaty."

"Then, why not use our new liberties to gain intel on her, to ascertain an agreement?"

"We need to also keep her safe, right?" He affirms, truthful and correct, which causes her to groan and look away. "I believe… she wouldn't try and make business out of this tragedy, that we can leave hints and signs for her to see we share an end goal."

"Is that so?" She asks, low, venomous as her light frown. "What if she doesn't?"

"… If the UN Farces do prove to be all the same rotten apples, then we're gonna have… to make the fox collide against an Iceberg."

Smiling at the calmness, at the lack of dark blazes in his words and movements, she nods his way. "Very well, I can agree to that. So you believe her to be someone we can negotiate with? After Shura's Dance?" She presses on her concern, holding his gaze.

Which does not combusts even if his fingers stop, hands resting upon her skin. "If we manage to arrange a meeting, I believe we could reach a mutually beneficial agreement. After all, if she did not desire to collaborate with the Empire any longer, she would have sold the Fourth Project to the US and fully turned her back onto our woes, supported the notion of the Treaty returning in full force. And as… irritating as the situation is, if we snap first we lose," he admits with a heavy sigh.

"… I suppose," Amato relents, once again straightening her posture yet not fleeing his touch this time. "There is the chance that Yoroi will leak her intentions somewhere else, however. Or, on the contrary, that he could be altering the message she entrusted him to deliver."

"That's why, better to observe and stand at the ready. To see if she truly is… who we believe her to be."

"Point taken," she nods, tilting her head to a side. "Mmh… It also serves to placate Her Highness, and to continue this play of cooperation with the UN for the moment. In time we shall see how the fox plays her cards, if the supposed goodwill Yoroi spoke about actually resides within that woman."

"Still, she did send the message. I rather believe there is more to that than a mere misdirection. So before she places herself or the Project in any danger, or she chooses the wrong allies, we should return the intrigue and make her want to seek us again, for real this time," he notes, finishing the massage and leaving her side, resting his weight and back onto a bookshelf.

"… And if she doesn't?"

"Then… all the more reason to hasten our search of Kannagi. That threat is bound to make the UN relent on their idiotic pressure."

"And if they don't?"

"… Then I hope their STF is proficient at CQC."

"Is there truly no way in which you'll support a diplomatic end to this conundrum, Takeru?"

"Not with the little time we have left… Things will spiral out of control if we don't act now. Everything could fall apart at the smallest spark, after all."

And while Amato relents on his points and worries, thanks him for the massage, and begins to admonish him for once again daring to suggest that he'd carry her off to bed, despite the expanding red below both eyes and shuffling in her lips, she looks away while tracing her neck, the remnants of heat as she bounces the little dodo.

Yet he is not listening, feeling heaviness in his stomach. "Otherwise, she won't even consider the possibility of speaking with us in person. Using her research to try and facilitate a meeting will backfire if middle men have to deliver the message, it will put her on edge if it's forwarded by the Valkyries. And having that intel leaked would spell doom for her standing in the UN to boot, if we take the risk. Even then, the defensiveness of her posture shows pursuing that line will only make her more paranoid. Instead of openly requesting our support, you're still playing at two coasts. To not force Yuuhi and the Prime Minister to join in your petition for international forces, to keep the UN interested and the US at bay, to prevent the warmongers from ruining everything. Again shouldering everything on your own, exhausting all your lines of play, standing alone and isolated…"

Breathing hiccups, new charcoal onto the bonfire, blazes that begin to revel.

" Becoming a target… thanks to whatever you think is your fault, thanks to whatever it is that you're convinced will play out. Thanks to that reticence, to remain playing on two sides, wasting so much time, such a prime board… all for whatever balance you wanna strike. You think you can atone for the fall? You think playing balance will lead you to victory? Even if you again manage to somehow keep the Empire from doing something stupid… you should know the warmongers from Alt V won't stay put."

Air that rushes in through the impregnable union of teeth, a tense jaw that spurs a localized quake.

" We've got two bombs with our names on their shells, for fuck's sake. Or you're telling me that's part of your plan, too? To be able to scan how a G-Bomb works, how the G-Elements you cannot obtain affect the environment? To test… your theory on causality, on G-Radiation? In hopes of showing the lack of care the Fifth Project has, how detrimental it is when compared to the results you bring about?"

And as if seeking the stars in the same forest he described, meeting only the distant, echoing cawing, the minimal rustle behind sight, the twisting shadows and silhouettes of a cyclopean forest, his eyes begin to cross.

" And yet, all you get are two years… and then, if you don't listen, if I die and that's it this time… All that we could prevent if only… if only you would let us in, if you'd welcome our aid. But you won't even fucking expose yourself nowadays, much less grant a meeting with anyone not in the top spots."

Swirling shapes, bleeding and weeping gazes, wings of pure fire and colossal waves flash in his mind. A cold bolt could have struck him for the soldier arches his back, his spine cracking at points, his ears hurting, ringing. And that gaze, the adusted and draconian gaze which was once branded in red raises back as the gap between breaths shortens and he pants, as his jaw cracks and closes and opens, hard enough to splinter an ice cube in twain.

" Damn… Damn it all, Yuuko…"

"… Takeru?" Hastily leaving her chair, Amato firmly clasps his shoulder, giving him a hard shaking. He flinches, sight refocusing, ankles almost losing balance. Supporting his falling body, wrapping an arm around him, she whispers. "What is it? What has spawned such concern in you?"

"Nothing… It's nothing, for real. I'm-"

"Takeru, what ails you now? Echoes of days past?" He nods into the hold, she slowly runs a hand over his long hair. "It is alright, there's no need to force yourself to be logical all the time. You're our last blade for a reason. Sheathe your wrath for now," she orders, patting his back.

"But… But if we waste any more time-"

"Shh," a finger binds the lips, then lifts the chin into her eyes. "Calm down, there are no dangers here. Come on, just as you told me before. Close your eyes," in imitation, in thankfulness, she begins to run circles on his forehead, joining her hands atop his head, massing it, lowering to the back to tend to the nape, "loosen your breath, fall onto me. Relax."

"… But. But we do have to stay alert, if we-"

"Calm down… There, there. Anger has a proper time and a place to manifest itself, now it is not said moment. We shall remain ever vigilant, correct?" He nods, she swirls a strand of hair onto a finger.

"Then, it is no waste of time. I do concur we need to ascertain her intentions soon however it is not worth such a strong reaction. Let us reserve our energies for when it is time to take to battle, yes?"

"… Yes, Raiho-san," he says, almost sleepy, sinking into the embrace, letting the echoes go.

"So, are we calm and collected again?"

"Ye-Yes, I think."

A hand cups his cheek, fingers press and lightly pull at his eyebags, tracing back onto his nose. Her own eyes squint as she leans closer, filling his view, holding his gaze captive. "Do not believe yourself capable of beguiling me. Would your head be hurting once again?"

"No, I'm fine, really."

"Hmm… Remaining hidden in the audience chamber must have been toilsome for you, at this late an hour. Did Her Highness gave you any issues before departing to bed?"

"Sigh… Yes, I had to force her, too," he admits with a nod. "She also didn't want to sleep, again."

"I see," her fingers trace the rim of his ears, he shivers. "Do not clog your mind with possibilities, there is no need for-"

"There will be," he says, low, eyes again beginning to cross.

She is the one who shivers now, barely able to remain grasping his shoulders. "Are you certain of it?" The soldier looks straight into her eyes, nodding, silent. "I… see… Allow me to handle the planning, you can limit yourself to watching over Her Highness."

"… Raiho-san, please don't hesitate to use me if you need the fire."

"I said, limit yourself to watching over Her Highness. I know you are the Captain-in-Chief, and that your suggestions are usually correct, however, I shan't place you in… such compromising positions again," she ascertains, lifting her chin as she takes a step back. Perhaps more to herself than to him, a reminder of the power and responsibility she still holds within her palms. "We act in concert, Takeru. I will heed your advice so do not resort to aggression without consulting with me first," he nods, she smiles. "While I do share your feelings towards the UN, let us remain calm as you suggested. If and when we see a threat, then we'll crush its fangs. Until then, do not allow such emotions to make nest within you. However, it is already late and today has been a long day. You may retire to your room."

"… And what of you?" He stares, raising a brow.

"Sigh… I am not planning to remain awake for much longer, neither of us will be up by morning if we dally here. I merely need to review the reports and-"

"Then, I'll help you with that," he ascertains, smiling, trying to raise even a fragment of the cheer of better days.

She holds his gaze, unblinking."I suppose, if it'll aid you clear your mind. Are you truly not feeling in pain?"

"Don't worry, I've got the thing under control."

"For real?" She asks, leaning onto him once more.

"Yes, truly," he smiles, sighing short yet heavy.

She returns the smile, a slow, gentle pat on his shoulder. "Very well, could you write me a report on what transpired during the meeting while I course through the folders?"

"Consider it done."

"Thank you, truly. Oh, right. Do we have the confirmation on the Shogun's schedule for tomorrow?"

"Ah, yes. I left a mail in your inbox with that, and some suggestions for our patrols and the like. I would rather get a stricter perimeter set up, and have the crew from Kitanomaru require a pass to enter the castle-"

"We do not possess the influence for such arrangement… but I shall note the idea down. However, let us not go overboard again with our reviewing lest we're still up when Fujikagi awakens," she relents a sigh, rolling her shoulders as she returns to her desk. He chuckles for a moment, procuring his usual notebook from the shelve, nodding in agreement.

And for a moment, after a passing jest or two while he readies some coffee for Amato, both begin to focus on the papers at hand. A few fleeting questions are exchanged, scribbling as the sole noise contesting the tickling of the clock. And yet, despite the pleasant quietness which spurs stable breathing in Amato he finds himself gripping at the pen, licking and traversing the back of his teeth time and again. Thinking about a violet gaze, of the current board he and the scientist face from their, oh, different positions.

" Sigh… What is it with me and falling for strong women that refuse to let their inner feelings out? It's been four times already… Heh, I never learn, do I? I guess I can only hope the ripples don't screw me over as hard this time… and that you don't choose to preemptively become the Holy Mother this time around."

---

December 5th, 2001. Around 7 PM.

(Takeru's Office.)

[Takeru]

---

" December 2nd, 2001.

Dear Takeru Shirogane-sama.

I hope it is you who is reading these words and not another, for this letter to have reached your hands safely.

I am convinced you might be confused, perplexed perhaps, after receiving this item and seeing the emblems engraved on its envelope. However, please banish all disquiet in you. I am not your enemy, for real. This letter is not a threat of aggression but an endeavor to restore a connection that I thought lost long ago, axed by the cruelty of fate.

I have been made aware that the Royal Guards stationed at Yokohama have treated you with undeserved pungency ever since you arrived back to this Empire of ours. I also know that it seems you have lost parts of your memories, and so you might not remember the days we spent together. Due to this, I know it might be difficult for you to favorably welcome these following words, however please know that this is no deception and that I have no wishes to bring harm to your person.

You and me used to be close, almost like family. It is true our relation wasn't always pleasant, yet my memories of you are assuredly, overwhelmingly precious. Despite your humble origins, I am more than proud to say that you considered me one of your closest fellows at one point. I would be hoping, and more elated than any words could properly express, to regain that bond we used to share.

I understand that, in light of the events that have transpired since your return, you might be inclined to dismiss these words as nothing but falsehood. Therefore, allow me to prove to you now that I am no trickster, that I truly was someone you confided in, lived side by side with before we thought you gone. Please remain composed, I know that you might grow fearful but rest assured, I hold no ill will towards you.

You have a soft spot for both mackerel and natto rolls.

You usually tend to oversleep if left to your own devices.

You dislike being forced to employ formal speech much, usually reverting to your more lax manner of being once you grow either exhausted or famished.

You also have a propensity to delve into your inner thoughts often, ignoring all around you whenever that happens.

You like going stargazing when you have the time, though you often used to fall asleep as you were doing so.

You also tend to employ rather eccentric words every so often, making some of our interactions rather wack.

There's also your propensity to begin singing as you pilot, which I admit is legit infuriating at times.

And above all, you have a fiery fury lurking within you, manifesting it when you see others being treated unfairly for baseless motives. Driving you to crush the fangs of whoever it is that's acting out of line, at times allowing you to illuminate the enthralling darkness that were those so chaotic days we spent side by side.

I know that by now you might be rightfully fearful, to have a stranger possessing such knowledge about you. Yet, please chill down and continue reading. I know not what ails your heart, but please believe me when I say that I was, and still am, someone you can place your trust in. I know all of this because we knew each other well before ruin befell you, before you suffered that regretful accident that teared you from our side. I cannot apologize enough for not having been by you when that happened, whatever it is that occurred, and during all these years you were abroad and alone, for not looking for you and so easily assuming you were dead. From the bottom of my heart of hearts, I implore you to bequeath onto me your forgiveness, Takeru.

I understand if you're reticent about recalling events that bring only pain to you. If you wish to move on and lead a new life, then do so with my blessing. Know that, if you ever require anything, I shall do all I can to aid you.

However, if there's a part of you that would desire to learn of who you were, even if only to dispel the uncertainty of your records, please do contact me. I cannot fathom how hard it must be for you to accept this offer with open hands, to learn that you once were close to a Royal Guard such as myself. Know that there are no conditions tied to my offer, I wish only happiness for you.

If you would desire my aid to learn of what I know of your past, all you need to do is contact me. I shall arrange a visit to your base as soon as I'm able.

And, were your answer be negative, then I wish you a fruitful life from now on in whichever path you decide to lead. To have learned that you yet live is enough reason to celebrate.

For if your future is smiling, then that is enough to appease me.

I wish to at least hear back from you once, even if only to say our farewell. While I do not know when will this letter reach you, I shall say so now in case you receive it at a latter date or if you would choose not to reply back.

I wish you a happy birthday, Takeru. May you spend that day free of any worries, along those you consider your current fellows.

Well then, I hope this letter brought you some measure of comfort. To reiterate, there are no conditions tied to my aid. All I would be wishing is to merely have the chance to speak with you once more, one last time. I shall be anxiously awaiting your reply, however, if it is painful, I shall understand if you wish to dismiss this letter altogether as nothing but a mistake.

Until the day when we can meet again comes, I wish the tailwind's blessings to remain on your side.

An old acquaintance of yours

Raiho Amato"

Resting the letter on the desk, sighing as I put both hands behind my head and look up, I can't help but to smile. Guess I won the linguistic war in the end, to have you employ my odd words. The strokes denoting certainty in the writing, she didn't doubt or catch herself in her wording even once. The paper shows no ruggedness, so she didn't have to erase and reword anything. The phrases regarding our 'relation' being more marked, as if she had pressed the tip of her pen a bit more into the paper, the baton in them was more than obvious. As frontal as a freight train, striking like lightning.

"… Though, if she chose to be so direct, she might have had an argument with Yuuhi about stuff after I lost my shit during the call. And with Maya, too."

I doubt those two are in good terms now, considering all that happened before and the assumption Raiho came to back then. Going by my interactions with the Pickles, they do… resemble my friends, the little girls I fooled around before. Sure, they now walk with more of an oomph to their stride since they're guards… and I did scream at 'em quite a lot while I was their Leader, too. But they're worried for real, the small glimmer in their eyes is still there unlike our last months together before, that silly and easy to target string with which to pull at their heart. Shion is still as easy to upset as always and poor Mion has to keep acting as a deterrent.

"Heh, the more things change, the more everything stays the same. At least they're able to display such simplicity, even if only around me." A slow shiver runs down my head, lips purse as I scratch an ear. The sterile office scent is replaced by humid grass, the beating of rain on my body. The lightless, hawkish gazes they threw at me during the CCSE, the invasion. "Then again, that menacing side is still in 'em both. Same for Mana."

… Hmm. Going by how stuff looked today…

The Tsukuyomis are wanting to see if I recall everything or not, and I need to make sure they don't get too close while pointing them in the right track. If there is someone I can trust in that's Mana, but the Pickles might want to act more quickly than we can afford. Also, being an ass to them ain't nice. Sigh… Making puns could work, I guess? Also, I still need them to be careful not to let Maya in on me remembering stuff yet.

"… Easier said than done, though. I know there's no bugs in this office but…" The second Yuuko notices I'm keeping things from her, she won't let me out of the office until she knows every last drop of intel I can give. And in my current condition, that is extremely dangerous for her more than anyone else.

Slouching from the seat to grab some water, drinking as I pace in circles over the narrow space, my eyes remain fixed at an invisible target while I go through the motions of walking, placing the right folders in place, turning off the PC and the like.

Raiho is not the type to favor indirect methods, though. I assume Tsuhi suggested a letter to her, if she ended up arguing with either Yuuhi or Maya, or both. Not knowing what's going on in the palace is a great handicap to play with… I'd like to believe Tsuhi is still my friend, but time can erode anything. I might be nothing but a ghost of the past to them… and Raiho might be testing whether I am truly me or a faker, I can't be so lazy as to assume they entirely believe I am really me through my freak out during the call. Yuuko did seem honest about how Yuuhi is wanting to see me again… but after all that happened, after these tow years, she might not be who I remember her as.

… And even if she is, it ain't fair to give her any hopes considering what may come ahead. My clock is tickling, and this time no bullshit quantum miracle will come to my aid. After all, shooting stars are fated to burn down anyways.

Sitting down again, picking up and twirling a pen in my grasp, I tap my lips with it, looking up, groaning and mulling. In a way, their struggles are very similar to mine. They might want 'Takeru' but not 'the Leader' to return, just how I prefer 'Yuuko and Yuuhi' over 'the XO and Her Highness'.

… And if that wasn't enough, I also gotta deal with Meiya now. She looked conflicted, wanting to make amends… but that might be her own harsh reprimands over keeping the peace in the squad. And she's the last person I want to get closer to me at the time.

Nibbling at my lips, I sigh from my nose as a bull. "No, even if she isn't close, those feelings already reside in her. There's only one thing left to do… and if that fails too, then it's light's out again. Siiigh… Come on, let's get on with it," blinking fast, rubbing my eyes slowly, I refocus on the still empty paper, starting to craft a report.

Luckily for me, the punishment ended up working more to my favor than to my detriment. Most of the small scale prototypes for the weapons are done, those reports are already done and forwarded to Yuuko in case she wants to find something wrong in them again, and everything else is progressing well. Shame the Shin Kagerou ain't done yet to go for a run…

A beeping breaks my concentration, ruins a stroke in a kanji. Grumbling as I erase the mistaken word and tap at the comms, I shake my head and heave a sigh.

"Shirogane here."

" Takeru, are you already done with your prior tasks?" The XO asks from the other side, in the same hurried stride but with less of an edge to the wordings. Also, still trying to trip me with using my name, huh.

"Almost, yeah. Do you want to start the tuning?"

"If possible, yes. Come over to the office, you also need a briefing on the meeting with the retinue from Daikuuji Corp," she orders, before hastily cutting the call.

"Sigh… As bossy as always, huh. Heh, well, at least she's still holding up alright. Anyways, where was I? Hmm…" I grab the papers, giving them a once over, a small smile and a nod come naturally as I finish. "Yeah, good enough. Let's be on my way."

Closing my office and checking the hour, I beeline to the elevator. Going down, back to Hangar 90, I salute the MP guarding the sliding door, notifying my business to hand over some docs to the crew within.

"Again? Man, I sure don't envy your situation, Shirogane," one comments as he slides an ID card on the reader.

"Heh, it's not that big of a deal, really. Nice experience to flaunt on my resume is always nice to have," I note with a smile.

"Wish I could be that positive," the other sighs, shrugging. "Still, be careful in there, kid," she warns, giving me a full, frontal stare. "There is a detachment from the IRG on some checkups or something, and-
"

"Yeah, I know. They sent me to give them the reports."

Both of 'em gape, tilted harder than Meiya and Yuuhi when reading cooking books, before slamming them onto the floor and trying to play it be ear.

"Eh?! W-Wait, are you serious?"

"Yeah, for real. You know, a test of character during my punishment and all that jazz. XO Kouzuki knows no chill, so make sure you don't ever upset her. Been there, doing that, not a nice thing to deal with," I nod, arms folding.

They share a look before sighing and nodding, signaling the approval for me to go into the place. "Be on your guard, kid. We… will have to notify anything that transpires here directly to the XO, after all."

"It's cool, thanks," I salute them, giving a smile. "I've no plans to ruin your evening." With one final nod shared between us, I walk into the silent hangar.

… Still, I can't get used to walk in this super big place. The echo of my footsteps on the bare metal sound so tiny, the whispers and clanking of tools, the distant beeps stretched in the echo of the place. Through the drums and crates I walk, saluting the mechanics that greet me as I do, a few gazes lingering on me as the smell of oil and plastic, the metallic taste which again clogs my lips.

Easy enough it is to locate my target, the lone Takemikazuchi with wires coming out from within its plating.

And a petite shape arguing with our mechanics, twirling a little wrench in her hand. Yep, that's her alright. Hmm… Simply approaching them is a bad idea, she might freak out if I suddenly appear outta nowhere. Time to see if I can pull it off again.

Slowly sink the heels, let the rest of the step follow in quietness. Make the steps shorter, faster. Watch their eyes, where they look, thread the shadows… look for the point most apt to approach.

…

Circling around the area, amidst crates, cables, and who knows that else, now I'm approaching the guards from behind, away from the eyes of the UN crew. Or most of them, anyways. Still, how do I break the ice? The talk with the Chief seems to be about to end, they're again resuming their focus on their laptops and the scans they're doing on the Type-00C.

Now that I think about it, this too is nothing but another ripple. Did Yuuko did this purposefully, trying to have me regain memories of the guard? Maybe, but I doubt she'd have the foresight to account for what stuff I would have recalled if she had had me pilot this thing.

Looking up at it, despite the UN coloring, brings aching to my stomach. Why was I so patient back then? Those years truly are a blank, a dark void of nothingness. I guess love is truly blind…

"Sigh… Not now, focus, dammit." Inhaling sharply, pinching my nose, I step forward towards the IRG's mechanics, leaving the comfort of my hiding.

One of them turns around, posture compacting into solid stone. "Excuse me, sir. We are currently in the midst of… Huh?"

"Greetings. I've come with orders to leave a folder in the hands of the Chief of your crew, Mst Sgt Kazama, I believe? Could you kindly allow me to hand her the papers in person?"

"Eh? Ah, yes… Excuse me, your name would be?"

"Takeru Shirogane, it's a pleasure."

"… Shirogane?"

"Yes, I am Shirogane. I said that just now," I nod, giving a small bow and a smile.

Which makes Onimura's eyes widen a bit, tilted again. "Wait, but… but I… but you're…"

"Corporal Onimura, whatever is the matter?" Chief Kazama calls in her usual delayed and quiet tone, despite the embers that within it lurk as she paces towards us. Still garbed in the pristine white of her Tozama dress, she approaches with slow steps and crossing brows. "What has you platicating with UN personnel?"

"My apologies, ma'am. I was merely… I mean…"

"Excuse me, Mst Sgt," I step forward, giving another smile and a bow, to spare Onimura the scolding. "I was tasked with delivering this report to your hands."

"… What?" Her eyes widen too, blinking fast. "Who… are you supposed to be?"

"Cadet Takeru Shirogane, ma'am. It's a pleasure."

"Are you mocking me?" She throws, taking a step forward.

"No, why would I?" I remain smiling at the quiet kindling, the fixation of the stare that's ready to slay, to smack me with the wrench. "Sincerity is a virtue, after all."

"Huh?" The tide subsides, draining the tension away from the shores of her posture and expression. "Excuse me, you… You said you were…"

"Takeru Shirogane, ma'am. Nothing but a humble shadow working here."

"Shiro… gane? What- How-"

"You are Chief Kazama, correct?" I ask, smiling. She nods, still keeping a closed posture. "I do get why you'd react like this, but please don't worry. I'm not an enemy or anything, there's no need to crush my fangs."

"Eh? Ah, I see… Ahem. Why have you come to our presence?"

"As I was saying, I came here with a report for your hands, ma'am," I give a minute bow as I raise the folder, the letter underneath it. "All I was told is, it is tied to some modifications to this one Type-00C."

Slowly grasping the folder, her lips shrug. When taking both envelopes, a few fingers run about on the letter, striking eyes once more seek mine. "And this… envelope is meant to explain such matters?"

"Indeed, that's what I was told. It would seem it is time for action and not words, and this Takemikazuchi looks like it's gonna be put to quite the strain."

"Oh, is that what you believe?" She asks, a hand bringing the folder to her person, keeping the letter between it and her dress. The noticeable gulp, the small silence that extends, the unblinking stare and squirm of her lips seems to prolong its welcome, until she coughs softly. "Would there be any pressing matters behind this rather… unceremonious way to deliver the papers?"

"Maybe, I don't really know, being a middle man," I shrug and chuckle, before tapping my brows. "But things do look rather tense, one has to wonder where our burnt and feeble present is heading towards at times. Though, in my case it's more due to the rather sticky situation I'm facing more than anything… In any case, please do read the papers at your earliest convenience, ma'am," I say, giving a salute.

She returns it, holding my gaze. "So I will. If you'd allow an inquiry, why would you be in a rather compromising situation?"

"What? You haven't heard anything?"

"No, I do not pay much attention to gossip myself, much less when work is on the timetable."

"Sigh…" I scratch an ear, shrugging my lips. That does sound like you, Chief. "Well, I'm fulfilling special duties due to some prior misses on my end, you could say. Between that and my own cadet course, things are rather hectic for me. But still, I hope all this effort is worth it in the end, if I get to see our future smiling again."

"… Eh?" Again tilted, she gapes for a sec. Before twitching and resetting her poker face, despite the glimmer in her eyes as she takes a step forward, giving an enhanced grip onto the folders. "Would you… have any other words for us?"

"No, that was all I was told. The details are in the papers I brought you. Now then," I again stand in attention, giving a salute, "best of luck in your endeavors, Chief Kazama. May a glimmer of hope shine through in whatever is keeping this Takemikazuchi here."

She returns the gesture, still staring firmly. "That I plan to make a reality. This fallen star will leave the shadows to reclaim our blue skies… soon?"

"I sure hope, if it stops them from being filled with blue fire instead. In any case, I shall be taking my leave. See you later, Chief."

I turn and wave at her, she nods back with a small smile. Another wave I give to Onimura, who remains tilted as he nods, before the Chief slaps him with the folder to send him back to work. Ahaha… As harsh as always…

She then looks back, holding my gaze, giving a wider smile as she safeguards the folder and the letter under an arm while returning a stoic nod. Another nod towards her, I turn and walk towards the end of the hangar. Thankfully, it seems she understood my hints. If she wasn't in the known, Mana might have been overburdened and forgot to relay the news to the Chief. Or she didn't think we'd meet, is all. Anyways, with that letter delivered there is only-

BEEP! BEEP!

"Sigh… Hello, Shirogane he-"

"Where are you? I called for you half an hour ago."

" Vice Commander, I was delivering the papers you tasked me to. I'm already on the way to the elevator," I whisper back, shrinking my shape as I take a line of walking that'll keep me away from the mechanics, even if it's a detour from going straight to the exit.

"Oh, really?" I can hear her begin to spin as she lets some air out. Siiigh…

"Yes, I'm on the way. Don't feel so lonely, honey. It's only a few minutes before I get back there," I chuckle, avoiding the crates and people.

"You better," she threatens, light embers blooming from the furnace. "If you're not here in ten minutes, I'm sending Yashiro after you."

"Hey, let Kasumi rest. I'm already exiting the hangar, for real. Just wait a while."

"Hmm… Fine, I'll be waiting, Takeru, " and again, she cuts the call with that.

Mmgh… Guess I better hurry before she forces Kasumi to look for me. Really, it's just a few minutes. And the reports are already in her inbox, too. Someone sure is being pushy today… I wonder if she noticed anything? No, she would have inquired about it on the call if that were the case. Maybe she's just in a rush? I mean, yeah, Yuuko must be barely containing herself from doing another tuning on her own. The fact she called instead of sending Kasumi without warning is proof of that.

Ahaha… Well, I suppose I can indulge her curiosity on how the 00 Unit works today, too. So long as she doesn't start pressuring me again, that is. As stupid as it is to hope for it, I very much prefer that shiny and curious gaze on you even if it comes with more work.

Jogging the remaining of the distance, I reach the gate, notify my exit, salute the guards and share a joke or two, and with the excuse of being called to the end of my shift, I run to the elevator just in case. Yuuko does have a short fuse whenever results and testings are involved, more than usual.

To Be or Not To Be

Chapter 91:

T o Be or Not To Be

---

Some moments later.

(B19F, near the Cylinder's Room.)

[Takeru]

---

Groaning as I roll my shoulders a few times, I let out a yawn while waiting for a door to unlock itself. Red turns to green, a gentle chimes beeps and the door slides open. Resuming my walk towards the office, slowing down a bit, I idle a finger on my fringe.

I wonder how the tuning will go now. Imagine if Binocchio is one of the few folktales we have available here, Sumika might react very badly to that. Kasumi too, for all I know. Still, so long as she reacts somehow, that's enough for me. If Yu- XO Kouzuki sees no acceptable progress, she might try and force me to go back home. As things stand, even if somehow manage to not spur any ripples while going back there, and despite knowing there's little else to do if we cannot successfully heal Sumika's heart, as I am now I'm not certain if I can make it ba-

The sound of echoing footsteps in the distance reaches my ears, snapping me out of dreamland. The shape I see coming towards me is one I didn't expect to see. Rushing straight, cutting the air, I gulp and tense my abs to receive the incoming landing. She grabs onto my arm like a metal drawn to a magnet, falling into my hold with all of her weight.

"H-Hey… Good evening, Sumika," I whisper while patting 00's head, but as usual she doesn't-

"Takeru-chan."

"Huh? Sumika, did you just-"

"Takeru-chan… Takeru-chan… Good evening," she then nods, eyelids fluttering like clumsy butterflies running away from mischievous kitties, slumping her face onto my arm.

And she stays like that… simply leaning on me, using me as a pillow as if planning to sleep on her feet. I stand there, petting her head. She isn't freaking out, what happened here?

"Sigh… Good evening, Takeru-san."

"Oh, hey Kasumi. Say, what's up with Sumika?"

"I don't know," Kasumi shrugs as she comes closer, staring at Sumika. "She was acting as usual while me and the Professor were mentioning the names of the books we had arranged for you to read her, when all of a sudden she got up and dashed out of the room just a moment ago. Is she stable?"

"Yeah, no idea why. She didn't progress at all today?"

"No, the Professor seems a bit mad that it's acting as a computer," Kasumi moves her bunny ears as she slumps a bit, then tries to talk to Sumika but she doesn't acknowledge her. "Sigh… Well, should we go back to her room?"

"Yeah, let's. Come on, Sumika," I whisper, taking a slow first step, "let's go read some books. You know, as we always did by night when we were little?"

One step, she holds me tighter.

Two steps, she groans, her features tighten.

Three, four, she starts to drag her feet, to follow along.

Despite not letting my arm go, Sumika returns to the usual blank, silent state as we walk. Not reacting to Kasumi's attempts at conversation nor to my small jokes, at least it isn't showing signs of anger.

"Um, Takeru-san?"

"What's up?"

"… Are you feeling well?" Kasumi asks, a bit down.

"Yeah? Why, did XO Kouzuki ask you to monitor me or something?"

"No, that is not the case… but you seem to be on your guard against the Professor," she notes, flapping her bunny ears, holding my gaze without blinking.

"What, you wanna explain to her the mess of that inner forest?" I ask, raising a brow, she flinches and looks away. "It can't be helped, is all."

"Is that so," she says, almost without energy, like a fan disconnected from the powerline as it slowly regains stillness. "However, your mind seems rather tired, foggy. Are you truly feeling okay?"

"Yes, don't worry. Also, don't try and look into my mind, Kasumi." Things are already dangerous as is, imagine what would happen if she starts seeing some of that stuff. Same for the time I was in the IRG, it might… make her hate my guts, just as she was when I ran away.

"I am your friend," she insists, getting closer. "I would never treat you so coldly," a groan, a pout, a few consecutive flaps of the ears, she stares as if ready to munch at the air. "Takeru-san, I wouldn't bite you… I'm not a real bunny."

"Ahaha… But for real, stop reading my mind."

"Huh? Ah… S-Sorry, I didn't mean to."

"You didn't notice?" She shakes her head, looking down. "Well, just try not to stare into my thoughts too much, okay?"

"Yes, I will try. But… Takeru-san, why was I rabbit in your mind?"

"I mean, you do look like a bunny…"

"Then, um, who was the white bunny? Do you remember now?"

…

Stopping my steps, turning to face her and petting her head, a bit stronger than usual, simply holding her stare hurts, feeling the lingering tingle being my head circling around like a small ant looking for a leaf to pluck.

"Kasumi, please keep that to yourself."

"Why?"

"Will you do that for me, please?"

"But… But why would you-"

A sudden vicegrip on my arm, huffed groans as if trying to lift an iron beam. "No… No… Don't take him from me…"

"S-Sumika, it's okay," I embrace her, bringing her face to my chest, resting my chin on her hair while petting her back. "It's okay, I'm here… Not going anywhere."

"No, don't leave me… No…" she whispers, tugging at my uniform, squirming her face into it, shivering like an abandoned animal at the mercy of the elements.

Kasumi also begins to extend some kindness towards the 00 Unit, it gradually comes back to stability despite it now not wanting to release me at all. So I sigh and resume my walk as is, Kasumi giving a bow in apology. It doesn't take us long to arrive at the cylinder's room, where the scent of burning fury was barely contained in the walls of the place. Amidst the illusory smoke, one cyclopean creature threatened to unleash unspoken violence upon us the second its unforgiving eyes made contact with-

CHOP!

"Takeru-san, stop exaggerating."

"Hey, I'm not."

"… What is the matter?" She asks, bumping a hand onto her chin as she comes closer, staring at me and nowhere else. "Besides you being almost half an hour late to the tuning, is something else bothering you?"

"Yeah, how on fire you look. Something up?"

A brow twitches, arms fold and she looks away. "We'll speak of it later. Are you ready to begin?"

"Yeah, sure."

---

Some moments later…

---

"So then, despite the sadness and insistence of his parents, Issun-Boshi departs from his home. Reaching a river, he skillfully traverses it on a tiny boat made out what Nature bestowed him-"

I continue the telling of the third book, barely getting an acknowledgment besides the grip that does not falter. Barely even blinking, perhaps more out of necessity of the system, Sumika remains still. Well, at least it's not freaking out.

"So as he walks, a certain building catches his attention. A most proper and striking house that-"

"Um, Takeru-san," Kasumi interrupts, huddling closer, "how did Issun-Boshi manage to traverse the city, if he was so tiny?"

"Who knows? I still think he'd have gotten stomped on the way."

I mean, let's be real. How the hell does such a tiny thing even get to steer a boat in a river? Skillfully my ass, there's a limit to bullshitting one's way out of stuff and that's coming from me. Also, if the parent's didn't want him to leave, just stuff him into a jar of jelly or something. What's he gonna do, pout about it?

"Wrong…"

"Eh? Sumika?"

"Very skilled… Attentive to movement…" she says in a monotone, not moving her gaze or posture one bit.

"Well, I guess that's right… Issun-Boshi does end up becoming a great leader in the end of things," I pet her head, there's no reaction again. Sigh…

The rest of the tale went without issue, only her hold over my arm tightened more and more as we reached the end. Posture and expression growing tense, breathing slowing down almost to a halt. Stealing a gaze towards XO Kouzuki I see her endowing a small smirk as she does that repeated little bump with a hand on her chin, eyes sparkling away. Looks like someone sure is enjoying herself over there… Oh?

Immediately sobered up the second we cross gazes? C'mon, I don't bite. Sigh… She returns a nod, gesturing for me to keep it up. Leaving the book on the pile nearby meets a strengthening of the grip, barely allowing me to stretch to grab one of the few books that remain.

"Don't leave…" she whispers, hands beginning to shake.

"It's okay, Sumika. I'm just grabbing another book to read. See? Oh?" The letters and image in the cover immediately sink in my mind, recognizing the ink painting of a woman with long black hair dressed in a red cloth with the moonlight as her cloak. "Kaguya, huh? You wanna read this one, Sumika?" She stalls a reaction, but the mere gesture of dropping the book causes further tension to rain down into my arm. Sigh…

"Takeru-san, do you not like the book?" Kasumi asks, tilting her head as she stares at the thing while I scuttle back to Sumika's side.

"It's not that, I just think it's rather sad," I shrug, sighing a bit.

"Really? What is it about?" She edges closer, waiting, looking expectantly, firmly into the book, then at me.

So I start my telling, how Princess Kaguya demanded legendary treasures from her consorts in an attempt to not get married. Against all odds, the demands are met one after the other. But when the requests dry up, as Kaguya had found a person she was truly in love with, she is fated to return to the moon. Leaving a potion back to her beloved, the man burns in amidst his suffering since for him an eternal life means nothing if he cannot spend it with her.

"… And then?" Kasumi asks with bated breath, both hands joined.

"That's it."

"Huh? W-What do you mean? That cannot be the end," she affirms with a strong flap of her bunny ears.

"But it is. Sucks, doesn't it?" Her face falls, a pout raises. "But the real sad part is not what you might think at first. Wanna try and guess why?" I ask, nodding.

"Hmm… If it's not that the man didn't find his feelings returned, I do not know what it might be. Is it that Kaguya realizes how important she was for him after she's on the moon?"

"Well, that might be the case, but-"

"Read… between the lines…" Sumika whispers, nodding to herself. Lips pursing as if tasting Meiya's cooking, eyes narrowing as if about to unleash a DMP. "Kaguya was… making a vow. The man didn't… didn't… understand her message… A-And-"

"Very good, Sumika," fiddling with her hair, I rest her head on my shoulder. The premature signs of anger are buried, even if her breathing does not chill. "You have a very good memory, don't you? Do you remember why Kaguya left the potion?"

"She… She was," her eyes close, slightly shivering as if under the rain her hands claw at me, strongly so, "trying to tell him she'd wait forever, no matter how long… how long… U-Ugh, agh-"

"Yeah, a vow of unconditional love," massaging her hair in circles, I rest onto her as well, closing the book to better support her weight. "That's what Kaguya tried to convey, but failed to be understood. The man was too sad to notice, too lost in the grief of the moment. That's why it's a really sad tale, right?"

"… Yes." She nods, sighing.

… She just acknowledged my words! We had a conversation! Sure, Sumika still looks like a statue but this is great progress for a first day. It's too early to sing a fanfare but if things keep moving on this rail, we might-

"It's horrible…"

"Huh?"

"Leaving… never meeting… N-No, no, no-"

"Calm down, Sumika. Come on, now. I'm here, there's nothing-"

A piercing scream shatters my closest eardrum, my arm twists backwards in the hold she enforces. The thrashing continues for quite a while, merely holding her convulsing frame as she tugs and pulls at my arm feels as if I were resting on top of a wheel. A wheel that is cosplaying as a hedgehog. A wheel whose true vocation was to be a potato peeler. Legs feel weak, trembling like jelly, as emptiness is left at the pit of my stomach all the way up to my throat when she eventually loses impulse and goes limp in my arms. Just as every time we tried to tune her. And at the very end, after all was said and done.

"… Siiigh. Is… Is she stable enough to make the shift to Safe Mode?" I ask, looking back as I lift Sumika off the ground.

XO Kouzuki nods as she types something real fast in her terminal. "Nothing I hadn't seen yet, as far as readings are concerned. Still, it was another reaction of fear instead of anger. Those only happened thus far when you're around," she notes as she rubs her temple, then her eyes as she avoids the glare of the screen. "It should already be falling into the right protocol, let's connect it to the pod," she orders, walking up to the thing and opening it up. "Yashiro, what was see seeing throughout the session?" She asks as I lay Sumika down in the system, connecting the cables in the right place.

Kasumi's hand shift and shuffle each other, avoiding looking either of us in the eye. "Um… At first, there wasn't anything. But the more we read to her, the more small fragments of memories of her child self I could discern. Takeru-san," she steps closer, helping me fasten the security belts on the pod, "did your father read with you and Sumika-san at times?"

"Hm? Dad? Yeah, at times. Oh, wait a sec, we're talking of this side, right?" She nods, bunny ears flap. "That's a bit weird, then. Dad had his schedule packed, I don't really remember if he had much time to read with us in this world…"

"But I saw him, or someone that looks strikingly similar to you but with black hair," she insists, staring firmly as we finish our duty and the XO starts up the pod's functions.

"Well, I ain't saying it couldn't have happened, but it sure was a rare thing over here. So XO-"

"Yuuko," she cuts, slices, and slashes me in half, quite the narrowed glare she forwards.

"… Fine, whatever. So, your thoughts on this session are?"

"Let's discuss them in the office. You go there and prepare some coffee, I'll take Yashiro to her room."

"Huh? But I still have to-"

"It's already late, and you can prepare a report before going to bed," she insists, giving the bunny a side glance. "Now, let's be on our way. Tomorrow will be a rather busy day, and I need you up early, you'd understand." And without waiting, she turns on her heels and blasts towards the exit.

"Always marching to her own tune… Well, thanks for the support, Kasumi," I pet her head softly, rustling her hair a bit. "Good night, and see you tomorrow."

"Yes… Bye bye," she nods, waving as she moves towards the creepy corridor. Eventually, as I remain waving back, she finally smiles a bit before leaving, gaining some force in her steps.

… Still, we kinda cut it close.

Looking back at the pod, she looks so calm and peaceful. She hasn't had a single berserk attack yet, but the fact that fear is what she feels the most when around me… I guess Yuuko was right in one thing, and that might be the source of the crux Sumika carries in this world. And for her to completely become whole, she will have to face what the real Sumika couldn't compute, the end of Lucifer.

"… I wonder what are your thoughts on that, Yuuko. After all, something doesn't add up here."

Though, can't really blame her when everything just flew over my head, too. I only hope she's willing to be honest from now on. Anyways, to ensure that does come to pass, I better hurry and go prep up the coffee. Yuuko's gonna get cranky if she doesn't have her drink. And I can order dinner while she's gone and is unable to stop me.

---

Some minutes later.

(Yuuko's Office.)

[Yuuko]

---

"I'm gonna just sit here and stare at you until you eat it," Takeru affirms as he folds both arms and throws himself quite eagerly onto the sofa.

"I do not recall asking for food. There was no need for you to-"

"Keep the tough act up and I'm gonna sing the parody song instead," he smirks, for some reason.

"… Parody of what?"

"… Don't tell me we don't have Weird Al in this timeline."

"Who?"

"An American singer that makes parody songs of other popular songs. Eat It is a parody of Beat It, you know, the hit from Mike Hackson."

"Haven't heard of either, sadly," I shrug as I start to spin, resting my head on the cushioning.

"… This timeline fucking sucks. Anyways, yeah, could you eat something at the least? Bet you haven' had any-"

"Oh, fine, fine," I roll my eyes, spinning back to the desk, huddling closer to it and grabbing my fork and knife. "In any case, the data procured during this tuning session was satisfactory. It yielded better readings than my testings during the day, and elicited another fear-based reaction." Munching on the meat, pairing it with some small spoonful of rice, I take my time to savor it all before drinking from the coffee Takeru brewed. "Hmm… I'll say, you truly chose the most fitting curry for this one coffee. Good job, Takeru."

He scratches his ear, looking up. "It's nothing, I just knew you preferred it that way, is all."

"Still, it's appreciated." Even if I don't know how you guessed the new password of my safe. Maybe I followed the same principles from another me, thus it was easy to predict? "As I was saying," I clear my throat, delaying the raise of the spoon, "the fact that the 00 Unit reacted somehow to the books is enough proof for me. We'll continue with this method for a few days, adjusting our estimations as we go."

"Sigh… Good to know," he says, resting his arms on his thighs as if leaving a flower upon a casket. Slow and modest breaths he takes, leaving his lips closed, his eyes on the floor.

After taking another bite of the curry and sip of the burning coffee, I again cough to regain his attention. "So, I assume you already finished your papers to present tomorrow?"

"Yeah, they're all in your inbox in case you wanna review 'em. And no, there's no eccentric words in any of them, I triple checked," he nods much, holding my gaze.

"Good enough, I'll trust you on that then. Now Takeru, I have been meaning to ask something. I know it might be hard to gain a definitive answer but, why do you believe Iceberg resolved so differently than Operation 21st?"

Inhaling sharply, looking away, shutting off. "Because the goals of the missions were different," and frosting over his tone, too.

"What do you mean?"

"I wrote that down, didn't I? Iceberg aimed to clear all the bulk of BETA, have the G-Bombs blast them and the monument away to allow a diver corps to rush in, steal the G-Elements, blow up the Reactor, and escape the hell outta there before reinforcements could arrive," he tells, petrifying himself. "To that end, the G-Bombs had to had the biggest effect possible. All the troops sent into the ground that day were nothing but a diversion, what really mattered were the divers. So long as we held the ground and managed to make the BETA spread all over the island, it was all the same," he spits, venom erupting in every word, quite caustic even by my standards.

"So then, the procedure in my mission was not the same and despite that we suffered similar setbacks, huh. Going by your report, there is no feasible way in which we can invade the hive without the XG, right?"

"I mean, you can try. Everyone's gonna die, though."

"Siiigh… I would be liking to obtain the G-Elements during the sortie, if at all possible. Could we do so without many losses?" I lean onto the desk, popping another spoonful into my mouth, enjoying the mild spicing, the soft caress of the heat in the sauce enveloping my lips.

Takeru remains silent for a moment as he looks up, twirling his hair and lips, his legs changing positions a few times before he hunches over. "It would require the mission to last longer, to create a more appropriate diversion for the BETA. Even if they won't use our tactics, the amount of BETA in Sadogashima is more than we can currently handle with the same arrangement of last loop."

"Because of those stragglers that almost surfaced in the mainland, right?"

"Yeah. Even if I manage to pull off the same stunt and kill twenty-something Forts to allow the rest to off the Lasers, there will be more coming at us this time. More Forts, more Lasers, more Tanks. Sure, we have the railgun now but that's a one or two use weapon that we can only recharge by having the XG close by. If the particle cannon cannot fire a third time, there won't be a victory anyways," he states, sober and cold, as both hands go to the back of his head, as he throws himself back onto the sofa and closes his eyes.

"Hmm…" Idling some time as I eat and finish my coffee, the bitter burning igniting lines on my stomach and back, a few fingers slowly grasp my chin. "I suppose, this is why you desire to prevent the coup, so that we have more manpower available?" He nods, without changing his posture in the slightest. "However, if that is the issue you find, I believe we could still get away with having it occur now. All we need is to make up for the numbers with skilled members from the IRG and-"

" Vice Commander," he begins, once more with a scorching and almost crossed glare, "I believe I already expressed my opinions on the matter."

"Yes, I know. Did you know 1st Lt Tsukuyomi wanted to know if I was available to receive a call from Her Purpleness in the short term?" I ask, leaning forward, focusing my sight on his.

His features do not waver, he merely raises a brow. "What, she really insisted on that?"

"Indeed she did. I suppose, the Shogun isn't entirely pleased with our arrangement. This rising animosity might play against us, you know?"

"Don't worry, it won't come to that."

"And you're certain of that because…"

"Because I gave some hints to the Pickles so that they calmed down a bit," he admits, shrugging, loosening his back and falling onto the sofa. "I don't think Yuuhi will chill out in an instant, but there's no way she'd actually try anything against you with me being here. And if you deem it such an obstacle, you can erase me whenever-"

Slamming the desk and frowning, I glare at the silence he extends. "I believe I told you to get used to remaining in this world? What will we do if-"

"Yuuhi knows what she's dealing with, don't worry."

"Hmm… Where did this confidence in her came from, again?"

"From remembering my past? Not like you didn't already know, though."

"Sigh… So, you're still opposed to giving Sagiri a little push? Even if it's in our best interests?"

"If that's what you wanna do, why even ask my opinion? Just do whatever you want and deal with the hell you built for yourself," he shrugs, looking away once more.

" Takeru, could you kindly answer the question? I am asking for your thoughts."

Again, he stares.

Once more, silence extends.

Saying nothing, resting onto a hand as he calms his breathing into a steady rhythm.

"… Even if you predict some of the stuff that will happen," he starts, low, complexion neutral and dull, "you can't expect a nat twenty to always save your skin. While I can see why you wanna do this, to flaunt the new tech in the Takemikazuchis and our other TSFs as the UN saves the day, there's many links that can go wrong."

"Hesitation creates no solutions, Takeru."

"Neither does hastiness," he counters, the embers resurfacing in his crossed eyes. "Furthermore, I already told you this world is far too different to the previous one I looped in. I can guarantee you, the rebels will have way more support here."

"Huh… And can't you do anything about that, Captain? Your Swordbreakers could come to our aid, couldn't they?" I ask with a smile, a slow tilt of my head.

Yet, he doesn't alter his frozen features even a little bit. "I did already warn you about the original coup, did I? Of how this world could be affected by leaks, how anyone with a strong emotion or resolve could be on the receiving end of the flowing data?"

"Yes, you did. Do you believe that scenario will repeat itself, then?" He nods, groaning a bit as he fumes at the floor. "Then, why not take advantage of it? Is it really impossible to-"

"Yes, the balance will be broken if the coup happens," he states, firmly, meeting my eyes in full fire. "So, since we've already gone over this, what is it that you truly want to ask, Vice Co-"

"Yuuko."

"Sigh… So, what is it now?" He asks again, resting on a hand, still blazing.

"Causality isn't fated to repeat itself, it's all a matter of choice, of willpower. We can break through this adverse situation if only we play our cards accordingly. Am I right to assume you recall… most of your memories in this world?" He takes his sweet, sweet time to return a silent nod, to break our gazes apart. "Then, let's get down to business. Assuming I desire your aid in allowing the coup to happen with minimal losses, what would you suggest we do?"

"… You're gonna have to let me go, in that case."

"Huh?"

"I'll return to the IRG and fight from within, to spare you the issues that come with this mess."

"… Pardon me?"

"I said-"

"You are not going anywhere, didn't you hear me before?" Frowning, feeling tension and contraction in the back of my head, I hold his stare without blinking, straining my sight.

"You can't involve yourself any further, Yuuko," he retorts, unaffected and loose, relaxed yet still stoic. "There's already enough trouble you're mixed in, and I told you the world needs you standing strong after all is said and done."

"So you wanna go back to Her Purpleness, huh… What of the 00 Unit?"

"I can finish the tuning after the dust settles."

"What if you suffer an accident?"

"That can happen with me standing on either side, to be honest. And honestly," he then smirks, chuckling a bit as he shrugs, "I might even just accept to talk with Yuuhi next time. She might actually listen to my words, unlike a certain someone who doesn't know when to take a step back," he says, bright, honest, shining as the clear sky.

"… I have power and liberties Her Highness does not enjoy. There is nothing you can achieve with her we cannot trounce together."

"As things stand with my squad, I doubt the coup will proceed smoothly, what with Meiya being affected by a negative leak, and the issues the others might also face. There's also the fact that, if things do repeat themselves, our goal is not to calm down the lines for the CIA to screw Alt IV over but to protect Yuuhi from whatever will try and harm her. So, if I'm by her side-"

"I can forward a warning, using your position here as an excuse, the words Yoroi left me on his last visit," I retaliate, cut the stupidity in twain before he spouts more nonsense.

"Sigh…" Shaking his head, ruffling his hair, his features fall, collapse as he stares at me. Before simply closing his eyes and pinching his nose. "If you're dead set on this path, then do as you like. I ain't gonna change your mind when you get like this, so there's no point in arguing about it. Just keep your end of the deal and I'll finish the tuning."

"Excuse me, we're not done yet," I state, standing up and going to refill my mug, stealing glances at him.

"What? There's no reason to-"

"I can show you proof of your stabilization," I say, leaning closer to him, grabbing his already empty cup, meeting his eye at the same height and gripping onto them, staring down at my own reflection. "Once we neuter the link between timelines, only you, a strengthened Nucleus, will be able to reliably access the shared data between worlds. And in front of the diminished flow, you'll be able to rest well and not fear any more sudden catalysts. So, works for you?"

"That was kind of part of our original deal, though," he barely says, daring to cast a side glance my way. "And I told you, I'm not sure if I wanna stay in this world yet."

"Why? I believe I told you we'd be equals if you pledged your services to me…" I ask, feeling acid welling up within my palms, behind the ears as I fill his cup and move mine away.

"And here you are, not listening to a thing I said before," he rolls his eyes, softly leaning onto the sofa, avoiding my eyes. And hesitating on taking the cup, even.

" Takeru, what is it that you desire? Out with it, state your terms and I'll see what I can do," I affirm, giving one good nod and never looking away. Taking slow sips of my cup, I stare and wait.

A brow twitches, he inhales sharply once again before going for a sip. His face contorts and twists as if he had just heard the 991 alarm or smelled the acidic sulfur stench of the BETA despite the long while he takes to enjoy his drink. "Phew… Why don't you start by stopping with the tripwires, XO ?" He asks, frowning, blazing more than the coffee.

"What?"

"Stop calling me by name, you never do that. I dunno what you're playing at, but stop it."

"… I do not recall to have done anything to deserve such pungency from your lips," taking a few steps closer, tapping his collarbone, I hold his gaze, clashing towering dry ice into the searing pitless flames. "What has you saying such things, I wonder?"

"I told you already, treat me seriously. How many more times do I have to ask you that?"

"I am being serious, however. I'm merely treating you with the deference an ally deserves, is all."

"Huh, for real?"

"Yeah, just that." I then smirk, tapping my lips. "But if you're holding such consternation in you, I suppose I could relent and extend you proof of how much I desire you to remain by me, Takeru."

"… You're just messing with me, aren't you?" He sighs, slouching down, deflating and dousing himself, sinking into the sea. Not even a sip of the coffee ignites his spirits or posture back up, despite the superb taste his brew ended up with.

"No, I am not. However, if you doubt me so much, I could give some undeniable proof."

"Like what?"

"Oh, I dunno…" I lean closer, from behind, aiming to whisper to his ear, "maybe, if it would placate your mood, I could wear a santa outfit for you."

"Wh- COUGH!"

Out of air as if he were drowning, Takeru coughs for dear life for a moment. Spitting the coffee onto the carpet, holding his throat and massaging it, his features contort momentarily. And still, his face is now completely flushed. How adorable.

"Wha- What did you just say?!" He asks, standing up and glaring back at me, despite the quiver in his lips, the overall shaky posture of his which wavers more than Yashiro in front of carrots.

"Oh, nothing much," I smile, again tapping my lips. "Just that, if you fancy it, I could give you a… reward, let's call it, and wear a santa costume for you. Would you happen to be into that kind of play, Takeru?"

"Wha… What did- Why are- How even… Hauuuawawawa…"

"Oh dear, are you having a breakdown? How cute of you, fuhuhu."

"What… D-Did you see it?"

"Hmm? See what?" Smirking a bit, I circle closer.

He quickly steps away. "You… saw that memory, didn't you?"

"I dunno, could you be a bit more specific, perhaps?"

"Mmgh… You know, when I, well…"

"When you 'took care' of another me?"

"Ugh, just… Why? Why that night?! And why now?!"

"Who knows? So, that did happen, huh…"

"No, don't lick your lips like that, dammit!"

"Oh, why are you getting so bothered, Takeru? Didn't you desire to be my equal?"

Inhaling sharply again, restoring composure to his features and folding his arms, he holds my gaze. "Look Yuuko, I… Why? Why did you recall that?" He asks, brows almost crossing, lips regressing as he begins to face away from me, as if bracing for a crash landing. Hmm, how odd.

"Well, if you must know, I was rather… concerned while you had your beauty sleep," I shrug, finishing my coffee, resting onto the sofa afterwards. "All these days, the negotiations I've had to tackle weren't particularly pleasant, and while the meeting I held did proceed smoothly, I am not daft. I know what all of them were thinking… Sigh. And as I was reviewing the docs you left me, parts of… what I dreamed about today came back."

The never-ending demands, the sleepless nights, the pressure choking me as it did on my worst nights. My own voice whipping at me, the rejection incoming from every single member of the Council and the HC. The frustration at being so close and yet so far.

And then, a little, frail glimmer of light. An idiot that does not know when to take a no for an answer.

"And I saw parts of… our farewell, when you so desperately asked me for anything to help with. As well as the, ahem, motives of the disgust that came with those echoes," I admit, while going back to my desk and procuring a cloth.

"But… But even then, why would you- Mmfh!" Pressing the cloth onto his lips, cleaning them off stray coffee, my hand slowly rubs at his skin, at his cheek, jawline, descending to the collarbone as the taint spreads over the UN blue of the threads as much as redness claims Takeru's cheeks once again.

"And then, there was also the small present you left me on your first visit," I smile, leaving my hand on his neck, grasping, caressing, leaning closer. "If this echo isn't mistaken… You had proposed to be my support back then?"

"W-Well, yes, but-"

"Would that proposition still stand?" I ask, a fingertip tracing his neck outwards, towards his ear. "Would you consider… remaining by me, permanently, as you swore to do in that world ?"

"… Did you remember the meaning behind the poem?" He asks, low, finally returning my gaze without moving away.

"Not yet. But I do wish to regain those memories, if only you would lend me your agreement. Would you?"

"… No."

"Excuse me?"

He takes a step back, then another, and another, and shakes his head while a frown erupts into his complexion, ashes and smoke burning everything about. "I won't. You don't need those memories. If that's what has you insisting so much, then drop the issue."

"Why? I thought you… desired to remain here, to help me and the project," I restore our prior closeness, almost pining him against the wall.

He stands straight, nibbling at his lip. "This and that have nothing to do with each other."

"Oh, yes, they do. It is both a method for me to recall whatever I researched in that world and for you to gain an anchor in this world before we cut the link between worlds. Plus, if it truly would please you…" an arm extends, over his back, his shoulder. He stiffens but doesn't pull away, "I truly wouldn't mind letting you get closer, giving you certain benefits if you continue to produce results."

"… And yet, you don't remember the poem."

"I will, in time. More so if you aid me remember."

"… No, it's pointless," he slowly removes my hand from his person, edging away, towards the door, hugging the wall. "If the feelings are not born naturally, there is no link that can be built."

"Uh, excuse me? I did just dream of that world earlier today, even if only a light echo remains as of now. And yes, I was very concerned over your health, Takeru. " Of how could I complete the project on my own, of how things would turn out. He won't hear it from me but… I did fear what would happen if he truly disappeared. And when I saw nothing in the medbay, I almost- No, I outright lost it. The thought of him being gone, just like that… "I do value your presence here. And I desire you to remain here, as I've said multiple times already. Teasing aside, you truly cannot be dissuaded to stay here and aid me recall what was of me in that timeline?"

"Do. You. Remember. The poem?" He deadpans, crossing his arms.

"No, not yet." Getting closer once more, placing a hand over his arm, leaning in until I once again see my reflection in his eyes, a line of bolts running down my back, into my legs, I smile back at him. "Tell me, what do you think would happen if we kissed now?"

"… Huh?"

"I said, what do you think would happen if we kissed now? What kind of memories would I see? Would I dream of them tonight? Would they flash in my mind as we make out? What do you think, Takeru?"

Tension, contortion once more claims his eyes, squinting eyes as he inhales deeply once more. Veiling his sight, returning the indifference of the silence to me he then takes a single step back, compressing his figure onto itself, further tightening his folding arms. " If there are no feelings, then nothing will happen," he answers, dry as the wasteland.

"… And if there were?" Another step forward I take.

Another back he takes, meeting the wall. "… What is it that you want to gain, XO? Are you testing me again? See if I take the bait?" He asks, frowning.

"No. And I told you what I want already," I chuckle, slowly resting a hand on his shoulder, placing myself on the wall by his side, so that he doesn't feel cornered. "I want you to stay, be my vanguard just as you were in that world. I am aware acquiring the agreement from the Shogun will be harsh, equally so to align both of our objectives if you truly do desire to avoid the full brunt of a possible coup… but if you accepted another me in your loops, if closeness is what would sate your spirits-"

He releases himself from me, stepping back, glaring. Gritting his teeth as he taps his brows, as his sight goes odd-eyed. "You shut your mouth."

"Huh? I am-"

"No. Stop, now. There's nothing to be gained through this, XO."

"Yuuko."

"Shut it… Don't you give me this bullshit…"

"I am being completely serious, Takeru . If having intimacy between us is what you'd-"

"You don't get it, do you? You just don't fucking get it," he seethes, barely chained blazes which would soon overtake the dam.

"Then, why don't you enlighten me?" I ask, lower, not breaking eye contact but also not getting closer.

For a second, it was as if a guillotine fell upon his neck. Choking, out of air as his eyes closed tightly, an unnatural jerk and jolt of his chest. Taking half a step forward, the hand I offer is ignored as he gasps for a second, short and shallow breaths.

"… How do you think you felt, being trash talked by the entire UN?"

"Awful, desiring to headbutt a bullet, probably."

"Yeah, exactly. Now tell me," he lifts his face, wiping the dampness that was soaking his eyes, yet the fire still remains, "how do you think the grand and mighty XO Kouzuki ended up allowing me, a fucking cadet, to have sex with her?"

"… Well, I suppose I was… devastated, looking for an escape. If you offered me some intimacy in that time, then perhaps-"

"Heheheheh… Intimacy, you say?" An eye twitches, non-stop. His breathing grows more erratic, the frown enlarges. "Don't fuck with me! You think I'm proud of taking advantage of you?! You think I'm happy of having done you as you were drunken out of your mind, crying non-stop?!"

"… Wait, what? Excuse me, what do-"

"Kindness? Intimacy? You think I'm some white knight or something?! All reason and good intentions went flying off the fucking wall the second you kissed me. And you know what?" He laughs again, holding his face as his footing grows unstable, a hand seeks the wall for support. "I enjoyed it, taking you however I wanted, having you reduced to nothing but a mindless slut."

"… Is that so."

"It felt powerful, to reverse the roles. It was sick, and sticky, and it hurt, but fuck me if I wasn't intoxicated at the time… Seeing you slumped on the floor, slack-jawed, just… surrendering to anything I tried… You shut up when I told you to, you let me bounce you and touch you and who knows what else we did as we drank down the entirety of your safe. It felt good, to own you."

"Huh… I see… So that's what… happened."

He starts hitting the wall, over and over, slowly, so slowly. "But then, the next day came. The news came, everything started to sink in. And…"

"You couldn't forgive yourself? Even when I forced myself on you first?"

"… If that had been all, it would have been a mutual mistake. But I didn't care, I took advantage of you. When you needed help, support, or even a show of affection… All I did was use you as a meatbag. Do you know how it feels, remembering your crying face, seeing you completely defeated? You… were even begging, for fuck's sake. And I didn't care, and just kept fucking you until I forced some answers out of your mouth…"

The tension leaves his features, the crumbled posture does not lift itself. A hand clutches his chest as he tries and regains his breathing, despite how his eyes are still twitching, crossed.

"Those memories… have nothing of value for you. They're only one of your lowest points in your life… where not even the guy who wouldn't have been alive if not for your mercy had any sympathy to spare for you."

"… And yet, you went to look for me in Sendai," I say, finally walking up to him again.

"T-That's… I was guilty, and lost, and confused. That's all, we simply remained working together on a shared goal, that's all."

"… But didn't you want to 'take care of me'?" Looking into his eyes, the scarred and ashen remnant so them flee me again.

"I just did what I thought was best for the future at the time. Just that, nothing too noble."

"Hmm, I see. Then, how do you want me?"

"Wait, what? D-Didn't you hear me?! I-"

Tapping his lips again, I lean closer. "As the XO? As your boss? Or, do you still want something more? Is there any reason you're taking back your words to go through hell for our shared goals?"

"Siiigh… It's going to be the same as with Meiya. If the feelings don't reside in you… then, there's no point."

"Why not try? All it takes is a small peck, nothing more. You already ravaged me once, what's a little-"

"Shut up!"

"H-Huh?"

"You're not just a pair of tits to fuck for me! I don't want to see the Yuuko of that damn Christmas ever again! I… I am not like that, I will not fall in that same pitfall twice." Clutching his face, groaning in pain, wincing, his eyes remain ready to slay. In a way, one could call the stare he's giving me… a draconian one. "Haa… Haa… W-While I will try and remain useful for as long as I'm here, if you're trying to bind me with sex I will have to decline the offer. That Yuuko isn't one I ever wanna see again. You don't need those memories, for real."

"… Then, which Yuuko do you wish to see?" Lightly wrapping my fingers over the hand that claws at his face, removing it softly, smiling at the maelstrom of twitches and contraction which in his face resides, I simply chuckle. "I'm not asking you to rail me into the ground. I simply want to regain the memories of the world in which we worked together. After all…" licking my lips, I grow closer despite the shiver which envelopes him in paralysis again, "you and me already worked side by side before, during the invasion. Won't you let me test it? Just a little kiss?"

He turns away, facing the floor, rushing away from me as if my very being was a source of heat. "You don't need to bribe or test me, so long as you help me I shall remain on your side. So, please, don't salt the wound any more."

"Huh… Who would have said you'd be such a coward, Takeru ."

"… You do know that you only ever called me by name during that night, do you?"

"Hm? For real?"

"Sigh… Yes. And," again frowning, circling around the sofas, keeping his distance, his guard up, "if you wouldn't mind, could you get to the actual point?"

"Huh? I am being serious, you know?"

"… Let's say I buy that, that you're saying this for real," he stops, leans on the sofa, glaring my way. "What was stopping you from simply kissing me out of the blue to test your idea?"

"I rather have a real kiss, thank you very much," I shrug, walking back to my desk, sitting down and spinning away, with enough force to make my hair flutter. "I can find anyone to fuck with if it pleases me, but having someone willingly coming onto me… That is rare, many are those who think I'm dangerous. That there's great risk in approaching me, even moreeven more with those intentions."

"And they're fucking right."

"Hmm. Curious choice of words, Takeru," I smirk, he raises a brow before again flushing red. "Fuhuhu."

"Goddammit, not like that. Sigh… Anyways, this isn't what you're really asking me about, is it?"

"Hmm? What has you think so?"

I am being serious, truth be told. I do want him to stay, I need him to stay. Well, maybe not need, but I rather he remains by me. And, honestly, if it does please him… I wouldn't mind giving him some of me. Takeru himself is already dealing with much for me, he's given me plenty of resources and good results. Really, getting sex with him is but another reward for me. More so if it comes with the possibility of unlocking a leak into my person. I admit that, perhaps, I am being rather… pushy on the matter, in wanting his consent, and in calling him by name too. But I…

I don't want him gone ever again. That void, that crushing emptiness I felt as I saw the empty bed, heard the flat-line echoing about, I don't want to endure anything like that again. Not after finding a proper spearhead, someone who doesn't fear my shadow. Not only is he a good influence on Yashiro, everything he has done thus far was to my benefit. Extending some affections his way… is nothing but a small, tiny compromise, if at all.

He scoffs, folding his arms. "Ain't it convenient, all things considered."

"… What are we talking about? If you're asking about why I'm requesting this of you despite wanting you to regain your identity, it's simply because we can keep this a secret between each other. And just that, nothing more."

His eyes narrow, with slow steps he approaches the desk, never lifting his sight off me nor his high guard. "Tell me, Yuuko. Do you think any random guy could have satisfied you back then?"

"Of course not. I have standards, you know. You simply… must have said or done something right, and I was probably a bit drunk." And heartbroken, and devastated, and wanting to die and disappear. Even if for only a minute, to forget it all, to let it all go. To this day, I still toy with the idea. Of how it would be, to give it all up. But now, that might not be necessary. Because I have someone to lean on when the going gets tough.

"But the point is, even if I said something suave, a virgin would in no way have been enough to press your buttons, right?"

"… Are you gloating?" Can't help but to smirk, chuckle at the blush.

"Wh- No! Dammit, Yuuko."

"Then, what's your point? I mean, you did… well, press the buttons, right?"

"Sigh… Yeah. Care to guess why?"

"Hmm… Maybe you're a nympho at heart?"

"What the hell?! I'm being serious here!"

"Well, but other than that I don't- Wait a second… Inherited experiences? Oh, now that makes actual sense," I lean back, spinning again. I see, if he gained some experiences subconsciously, then I suppose that even Takeru could put out a decent enough performance on his first luster. "So, what's the issue with this? We already know you regain your memories as you loop."

"… We know that now . At the time, that was probably the first definitive proof any loops at all were happening," he states, nodding as he sighs, scratching his head. "It was something that was completely out of place, something that made no sense as I thought about it beyond 'Sensei was wasted'. And right now, as things stand for us," regaining his composure, he takes a step closer, as close as he could get to the desk, "there is another little thing that doesn't add up. You wouldn't be testing me again, would you XO Kouzuki?"

"Excuse me? What are we talking about? I am being serious about kissing you, though."

"… Look Yuuko, I've already told you all I could about my life, about my loops, the theories and all. And there is one little thing that makes no sense, that is completely out of place, that doesn't belong no matter how you look at it. And, oh, it just so happens to be something related to you," he fumes, extending an arm upwards in an arc, with quite the drama.

"… Wait, what?"

There is? I mean, I already know who he was before in this world. I know what was of his life thus far, the only thing I don't know is what the hell caused him to fall into rage during the mock battle or why he didn't wake up… which I admit I want to get out of him while we're, ahem, trading affections. But something I should already know, something that doesn't align? Hmm… I concur, I do want to inspect every nook and cranny of his body, see how it reacts to different memories, how the radiation affects his functions… and maybe for other purposes too, if it would alleviate any of the disquiet he now feels, to work as his anchor until the 00 Unit becomes like a functioning human. But even then, that doesn't seem to be what he's hinting at, either.

"This doesn't have anything to do with your little nap, does it?"

"It may, it may not. I already gave you all the pointers I could without demanding a clear answer, could you be honest with me? No teasing or plotting involved?"

"… I'm not plotting anything, I am merely curious about those memories."

"… So you won't even tell me, huh. Whatever, then," he turns around, shrugging.

"Where do you think you're going?" I ask, tapping the desk.

"Back to my cell, because I need to be awake early since you want me to take part in the presentation, remember?" He nods, sighing again.

"Hmm. I don't know what came over you but there's something you should know," I stand, approaching him once more. He doesn't move, but remains with both arms folded, facing away from me. "I am being serious in wanting you to stay by me, Takeru. And I haven't the faintest on what you're speaking at the moment. So, how about we trade? You give me a kiss and tell me what's on your mind, I deal with that for you and grant you-"

A hand cups my chin, he infringes on my personal space. "Yuuko, please don't. I don't know what you're on about, but if you're not really trying to trip me, please stop insisting on this trail."

"… Is that so," I rest onto him, poking his neck. "Why would that be?"

Lips regress, he shakes his head, which then falls along his shoulders and breath. "I just don't wanna get attached, is all. If it's not meant to be, then I rather have nothing instead of void hopes. I already… made that mistake, after the Babylon Disaster. Just… focus on your answer regarding the coup and the eruption, and in seeing what this oddity is about."

"I see… So why can't you tell me right now?" I ask, poking his chin, cheek now.

He leans back, but doesn't flee the touch. "Because, just like the poem, it's better if you figure it out on your own. Until then, let's keep stuff as it has been thus far."

"Well, that's agreeable, I suppose," I nod, arms folding. "Very well, I get it. You may leave, the briefing dock for the presentation should be available in your inbox. We'll go over the details tomorrow morning, so don't make Yashiro wait. After that, we'll see how we handle Her Highness."

"… Roger. Night, XO," he salutes me, with barely no energy left. Slouching his way to the door, posture aimed down, almost limping even.

Just as he looked by the elevator in that echo…

Sliding past the desk, the sofa, I take long, fast steps. "Takeru, one last thing."

"Hm? What do you- Mmmfh!"

Cupping his chin, keeping him in place, the aftertaste of the coffee still mixes and entangles for a second. A second where his lips almost part, where the tip of our tongues briefly greet each other. Before he pushes me away, a hand wiping the faint thread that linked our lips together.

"Sweet dreams, Takeru."

"Wh-Wh-Wh-What did you-"

"Come on, off you go to sleep. I'll tell you if I recalled anything… worth mentioning to you," smirking back at his groans, I chuckle lightly.

"I… I told you…"

"What? Did you really dislike it that- Huh?"

"I told you… I don't wanna remember that, dammit… Kgh…" Grimacing hard, a single tear runs down his cheek.

"H-Hey, are you really-"

"Just… please, don't. Don't give me hope… I… already lost you once, I don't need another reminder of my failures, okay?" He turns around, still shaking. "So don't play with my heart. Because… I know I can't make everyone happy already. Shooting stars… always crash down and burn, after all."

"Shooting- Wait, Takeru, I didn't-"

"I'll be going now, Yuuko. Please, if you're just testing me, stop it."

"Oh, come on! Why are you reacting like this?! What did you even-"

"Because I'm an idiot."

"Huh?"

"Because, deep down, I still… I still love you. That little bump you do on your chin, the sparkly gaze whenever something catches your attention, the impulse you put in everything you do. And I… don't wanna confuse anyone anymore, I wanna solve the ripples for once. Can't do that if I'm trying to link with old memories now, can I?"

"But I am not-"

"Then, would you be mine if I asked?"

"H-Huh? Are you being serious?"

"If you won't take me one hundred percent seriously… then stop. With me, it's either all or nothing. No secret affairs or any bullshit like that. And anyways, we have more urgent matters to take care of, anyways. So, well, um… Later…" Without even looking back, blasting away faster than his jumps, he rushes out of the office.

And all I can do is sit down back on my chair, lick over my lips, hunch over my desk. And feel a cold cloak cover my back slowly, as a similar voice zooms into my ears for a second.

A pledge to choose me over his squadron, any day.

A request to return to Yokohama, to his side.

"I… see… Heh, I've gone fucked it up, huh. Still… I see… So you… So you loved me, Takeru? I see, so that's why. Interesting, very interesting."

Unnumbered Excuse

Chapter 92:

Unnumbered Excuse

---

December 6th. Near 6 AM.

(Detention Barracks.)

---

A slow gesture blocks the lips that part by reflex, young Yashiro cannot help but to release a long, elongated yawn. Softly rubbing an eye as she makes her way to the soldier's cell, once more does her mouth betray her will, from her chin to the base of her throat stiffness is followed by pleasant looseness. Even the footsteps which could be drowned by the march of ants sound deafening in the emptiness of the hallway, under the glare of the lightning which bounces off the walls. So she cannot fully open her eyes through the fogginess, her chin lowering inwards, almost meeting her dress as the temptation to nod off tickles her nape. It is, after all, a full hour earlier than her usual waking time. And the prior day had been an arduous one, the ones before all the more demanding on her petite shape. So you'd understand the wobbling advance, the sway of her head as if atop a small boat she were, the third yawn which rebels against her willpower.

And yet, through the shrouded and rather pleasant state of mid-wakefulness something reaches her ears, it makes her limiters bounce up on their own. A moment to blink quickly, a second of blindness as the rebounding light meets her unprepared sight, young Yashiro halts her steps and runs a hand over her face, listening. A slow twitch, a gradual ascent of the bunny ears along a singular brow, she tilts her head at the soft echo with dances from further into the hallway.

Now fully conscious, fully curious, she steps towards the source of the sound in a straight line. Through the concrete she perceives a faint cloud, a tiny and frail nebula as one would see during summer's most intense days. A mirage of yellow with lines that shift into a calm violet red, a slow shuffling of the fluffy shape, a calm downstream river.

And the more she approaches the cell the sounds come from, the one she was aiming to reach as per the scientist's orders, the voice becomes clearer.

"Yo quisiera que supieras… cuanto extraño tu presencia aquí," the soldier sings, low, the evening call of a lone bird during spring's closing days. "Y no puedo, no me atrevo…"

Peeking from the corner of the bars, she sees him lying comfortably on the sorry excuse of a bed available, already dressed in his fatigues. The odd cloud was surrounding his whole being as he continues the song in question, to her consternation with both eyes firmly closed as the safe of the scientist normally would be. Minimal is the movement of the lips, evident the markings of tension in his solidified complexion. The shiver, the warm descent of a feather's tip from her nape drives her curiosity to delve, to stare, to scan. And yet, despite the full focus losing itself in the slow swirling of the fluffy and sunny cloud, she can never truly reach the red core of the spiral nor hear any thoughts. Drowning in a droplet, sudden contraction comes to her body. Desiring to embrace herself, clamping arms and legs together as if needing to drive away snow, the emptiness around her person.

… However, the quietness which surrounds young Yashiro elicits a ring in her ears, obscuring everything else in the overwhelming pull which forces fingers to trace from the wrists to the shoulders, to rest upon her neck.

The lone image that comes up, the trail of smoke and fire that loses itself in the skyline amidst the silence is enough to reverse the motions she was about to make, sending the yawn back the way it came. Even a single shard collapsing from a heart is more than enough to eclipse any and all blasts of engines, as the inner silence which with it comes silences more than the external sounds and sensations of the moment.

"T-Takeru-san?" Young Yashiro asks amidst a small cough, grasping an iron bar and shaking. Not because of the coldness of the material, you'd understand.

The soldier halts his singing, opening a single eye as he barely raises his face. Relenting a smile as he takes a deep breath, both legs curl up before he propels himself off the resting place of the cell. "Hey, Kasumi. Good morning," he nods at her while rolling up an arm as he approaches the barrier separating them.

"… Good morning," she stares, brows almost bumping as the colors in his aura suddenly swirl and become cerulean, calm and at ease yet still showing no thoughts to her ears. "Um, are you feeling well today?"

"Yeah. Save for the shower, you know," he shrugs, giving a wry smile. "So, can you open the door?"

She slowly nods, not lifting her eyes from him as she unlocks the cell and allows him to exit. After closing it again, turning to see how he's stretching both arms upwards, young Yashiro steps closer. "Takeru-san, what were you singing about?"

"Hm? Oh, uh…" he looks up, scratching the back of his head, "nothing, just a song from an anime. Let's be on our way, the XO won't like to be left waiting for too long," he states, starting to direct himself towards the exit.

She paces by his side, saying nothing for some moments, hands joining as she stares yet finds no sounds. "Um, Takeru-san?" He hums, looking her way. "What was the song about? Your aura was… a bit odd to the eye."

Slowly blinking while returning her stare, it takes him a second before he pets her head, playing with the strands of hair, tickling her forehead. "Don't worry about it, okay?" He asks as a sigh escapes along the words.

The collapse of the voice, the switch to a midnight blue hue in his aura rivets nails into young Yashiro's breathing, as if the Mjolnir was employed to fasten them into her slim abdomen.

" Not like I could ever discuss these things with Kasumi of all people," his mind's voice echoes, furthering the piledrive which assails her lungs. Along a dim image, distorted, cut and scratched. Nothing but a slim figure raising a hand towards hers, or his, face. Nothing but the brunt of tackling an iceberg, the hull bruised and bleeding ice inwards.

" That's not true, you can speak of anything with me," she counters, half a step closer to his person, arms almost touching.

" Come on, now," he shrugs, gradually releasing the last strand of hair his fingers had captured. "You know there's stuff I… can't really discuss with anyone. " He then sighs, arms seeking the cover of both pockets, the sole of his boots remaining in contact with the floor for a few seconds more than necessary with each successive step. "No one would really understand, and speaking of this shit would be enough to get me into more trouble anyways…"

" I am your friend," she asserts with a few flaps of her ears, as if attempting to take off the floor. "Even if some matters are secrets you cannot divulge, you can place your trust in me."

" Uhh… You're truly is too good for this world, little bun," he whimpers within, relaxing into a small yet honest smile.

Which causes slight redness to come into young Yashiro's cheeks, the interlocking of her fingers enforced further. "Takeru-san, don't say that. It's embarrassing…"

" Huh? Wait a second… Kasumi?"

" Yes?"

" Are we… talking?"

" Of course we are? Why are you asking?"

" I mean, look at my mouth… It ain't moving, right?"

" Eh? Ah, you're- Wait…"

"Were you reading my mind just now?" He slowly asks, stopping his steps.

"N-No, that wasn't… I didn't notice at all. My apologies," she tries and bow, he chuckles lightly and waves off the gesture with a small smile. "But I… I can rarely establish such close communication with another's mind…" she wonders, brows narrowing, the warm fall of raindrops on her nape continues, the lingering thread of the fluffy cloud still surrounding her person. "Can you hear me, Takeru-san?"

" Yeah, loud and clear," he nods, folding his arms. "I didn't know you could do telepathy."

" I can't. It usually hurts a lot to try and link my mind with others with this clarity ," she admits with a sigh, shoulders falling a tiny bit. " Scanning minds isn't truly easier than actually talking, you know."

" Yeah, I know. It's still a bit surprising, though."

" What is?"

" That I keep learning new things about you," he chuckles, his aura brightening slightly. "I thought I knew all about your little tricks, and now we can have mind chats too."

" Um… Do you dislike this, perhaps?"

Patting her head again, he shakes his head. "Nah, it's just a surprise that you could pull this off."

" I don't really know why this is happening, I am not doing this on purpose," she affirms with a nod, a flap of the bunny ears.

" For real? Oh, is this due to that… psychic link phenomenon? The synchrony stuff?"

" Yes, I think… I never really managed to trigger and maintain said ability, so I do not know if this is how it should feel, but it is the most logical explanation."

" Does it hurt you?" He asks, again petting her head in kindness.

She shakes it slowly, leaning into the comfort. "No, which is odd. I usually must focus much to establish a link, and sharing sounds and images is rather taxing as well."

"I see… Anyways, think you can stop it?"

"Um…" she closes her eyes, inhales slowly, focuses on the small, minute pokes in the back of her head. The sensation resembles a full headpat, and there is no thread to cut, to knot to untie, no current to block. Taking some steps back to leave his aura's immediate surroundings does little to nothing, so young Yashiro relents a sigh. "No, I cannot. It's… simply there, your presence."

"Sigh… Well, let's try to not let it impair our work today. Simply tune me out, and don't listen into my thoughts, okay?"

"Yes, but… if you need to talk, all you need to do is ask," she insists, again flapping her ears like a small pigeon which fell into a lake.

He smiles, once more petting her head. "Thanks, Kasumi. But some stuff… You already saw a few as you tried to wake me up, this ain't your burden to carry. I don't mind you trying to talk with me through this link we now have, but don't look too deeply, okay? You already know… well, what disasters lurk in my mind."

"However-"

"And we already lost enough time," he pokes her nose, smirking a bit. "So let's get going before the XO starts looking for us herself."

She nods, he smiles. Yet, as they once more walk to the exit, as she informs him of the time they have left before the retinue arrives, as the elevator descends and the beeping of her communicator interrupts the explanation with a rather bothered voice demanding answers from the other side of the line, young Yashiro's eyes do not lift the downcast posture, the lingering gaze upon the fluffy clouds that were branded in blue. Upon the delayed gestures, the smile that refused to fully open, her own movements imitate the lack of gusto.

"… Why would you still try to bottle everything up, Takeru-san? You were clearly in so much pain in that forest, by the hill too. Just like the Professor… always remaining silent…"

---

Around an hour and half later.

(Meeting room.)

---

Clicking noises fill the place, a sizzling image flashes through the large TV screen brought into the place. As large as the stock explosions from the game are the gaping expressions of the suits from the retinue.

"May I ask why would you employ such sharp evasive techniques?" Chairman Daikuuji inquires, threading his slim beard a few times over while admiring the spectacle.

"Easier to gain a vantage point," he answers, lips slightly pursing as his base Kaizer proceeds to slice off a few Strugglers in half, rapid fire sending the few Colossus into a frenzied escape. "By moving in such patterns, I can throw off the radars and auto-aim systems. Then, if the pilot cannot locate me, they're as good as neutralized."

As if to prove his point, his Kaizer dives into the stream of volleys. Facing the pray of the spray, a small smile raises in him. Jumping high, sword set alight far more than the thrusters, a sharp pressure onto the controller causes the Kaizer to shine in blue, to unleash its Break Skill. Blasting through the aggressors like a cannon ball, his air jousting maneuver skewers a few of them. Little but cry and vanish amidst the pixel clouds can they do as the hammer falls.

"Phew…" he circles his wrists as the golden glimmer appears in the screen. "And as you can see, even such line-piercing maneuvers can be taught through the software."

"Hmm… Indeed, it is a most surprising training method," the Chairman notes, relenting a small smile. "Still, it is rather concerning, the application of such a doctrine. The adaptation might not be as smooth as you would claim, cadet."

"Actually," the scientist interjects, returning the small smile, a few thorns in the stare, "there is no need for such concerns, Chairman. Allow me to show you," she quickly types something into her terminal, another recording starts being played in the other monitor as the soldier mutes the TV he was using.

In the new display, footage of some of his trainings started to be shown to the group, some of them already losing grip on the masks of their complexions. And if such a reaction was born when witnessing the failed mock battle between him and his other two squadmates, further did the walls bend as the training he took after regaining consciousness began to play. Low movements, hushed whispers soon follow, as well as narrowed yet puzzled stares towards the unassuming soldier.

"By the by," the scientist whispers, leaning closer to him, " Takeru, why did you employ such moves during that training?"

"Just testing my endurance after waking up, XO. Nothing more," he simply says, taking a step away from her, not meeting her eyes.

Grasping her chin, she edges closer again. "So is this your best performance?"

He again slightly turns away, giving a sharp nod. "Indeed, that is correct, XO, ma'am."

"Excuse me, XO?" The Chairman asks for her attention, coughing softly.

Dulling the cross her brows desired to engage in, she brushes her hair as she faces the retinue one again. "What is it?"

"Ahem… Regarding the footage provided, why would the cadet be partaking in such courses? I did not believe Sgt Jinguuji to favor this kind of practices," he nods, never losing the small welcoming smile.

"Cadet Shirogane's own piloting quirks are what gave birth to both these programs and the maneuvers shown in his training. Due to coming from another base, it is expected some of his tendencies do not align with ours. Shirogane, if you would," she looks back at her soldier, receiving a short nod and the indifference of the silence as the answer.

He steps forward without making eye contact, clearing his throat and standing in attention again, while she simply folds her arms, stares into his neutral facade while her eyelids slightly narrow. He once more begins to explain the reasoning behind his piloting, sharing opinions with the team from Daikuuji Corp on the impact his methods have on the craft as the suits procure notepads and begin to scribble at mach speeds which would leave their TSFs jealous, the soldier apologizes internally to two of the members of the retinue, that he already had a similar meeting with back in his world, before regaining himself. As he navigates the inquiries while never losing his tone or momentum, never leaving a dead trail lingering in the air with the use of some eccentric words on his end to spark further inquiries and interest into the little sims and his own piloting quirks, Chairman Daikuuji remains staring at the soldier while twirling and caressing his beard.

While the words and explanations were as satisfying as the rumbling of a successful launch, the admiration towards a beautiful and bright ignition, what spurred a gleam in his sight, full focus onto the soldier's features was not due to what he was in the middle of explaining about his rather reckless aerial charges.

There was a certain lack of air, of distance between the dark of his jacket and the white of her lab coat. Even before, as the meeting started, the Chairman noticed the lack of delay in the soldier's movements, the minute gazes which she shared with him only to be followed by the actions, no words required. The simple presence of the cadet was already cause of befuddlement, the shift in the displays as the scientist proceeded to present the little machines and her other announcements would indicate the cadet was more than familiar with what he was doing. If not for his stoic gaze, for the unfaltering stance and wording he employs amidst the stream of inquiries and curious counterquestions, the Chairman would have believed it all to be mere coincidence.

He cannot help but to remain smiling and relent a nod as the soldier finishes tending to the retinue's curiosity. "The explanation was greatly appreciated, cadet. I admit, of all the programs you've showcased thus far, this Valgern-On software would seem to possess great promise. However, we will review the available documentation first before giving our final answer. XO, I assume the HC is already on board with the decision?"

She nods, brushing her bangs. "Yes, the HC would favor having a clear deal at the ready before the official announcement. Thus, I would welcome a rapid answer, if at all possible. Shirogane, Yashiro," she didn't finish the words that both were already on the way to deliver the folders with the respective papers, eliciting a simple but pleased smile in her. As she nods back at them, they each return a customary gesture. The impregnable mask in his features dull her own, sight lingering on him as he walks past her to stand in attention once more. "Ahem… Shirogane, could you proceed to present the next topic?" She requests, staring.

And receiving another nod, another frozen expression hewn into his face. "Yes, ma'am. Well, if I may have your attention… Now then, as I've already explained, my own frustrations with the shock countermeasures is what drove me towards my current eccentric form of piloting. However, XO Kouzuki took an interest in said patterns and ideas," he says, giving her a minute bow, "which then spawned another project to try and adapt said maneuvers into a formal doctrine. Allow me to present to you," he gives a court bow with a large and dramatic sway of a hand, smiling a bit as young Yashiro forwards the correct images to the display behind him, "a new operating system for our TSFs, the XM3."

Skepticism is thawed, melted into shock and whatever comes afterwards as his words and the graphs that Yashiro forwards. The nods and the mini smirk the scientist gives with a small tilt of her head, playing with her hair is enough to affirm the intel provided. One could equal the current expressions of most of the retinue as kitties falling upon the booming roar of thunders.

Except for the Chairman that, despite never losing his smile, never letting ripples bring blight to his lake, is now resting a hand under his chin. "It is most gracious of you to present such intel, XO. However, one could say it is almost to good to be true, haha. Certainly, there is a catch involved?"

"Oh, no, there is none, Chairman," she affirms, the devil surfacing, the little horns shining below her strands of hair. "I do comprehend your reticence to accept the veracity of the given explanation, however if it is clear results you'd be desiring to be presented with…" the smile enlarges, her eyes sharpen, merely the tip of the iceberg indulging in the threat, in the minute shiver of most guests in the room, "I would be more than willing to give you a live show."

"Is that so?" The Chairman nods, clamping his lips not to laugh. Instead he merely limits himself to sigh from his nose and rest his weight onto the cushioning of the seat. It had been, after all, many, many moons since he had seen such cheer in the scientist's eyes. "Would the Valkyries be at the ready to present us the boons of the OS?"

"That will come too, in due time. For the moment, you'll have to be satisfied with Shirogane's display," she ascertains with a strong nod.

And causes the mask to crack, the soldier's brows to interject. "… Huh? Me?"

"Hm? What? You've a mock battle scheduled for the morning training, don't you? Your Gekishin has been outfitted with the XM3 to serve as a demonstrator of what one could expect of a cadet learning under the new OS should resemble. Didn't I tell you?" She says, dripping a few droplets of acid, as she looks away and ruffles her hair. Only to lightly chuckle at the small sigh he releases, the relaxation into gestures she is used to seeing.

"Understood. I shall try my best, XO, ma'am," he salutes, giving a firm nod. Which bolts equal seriousness into her features, a momentary narrowing of her eyes and lips.

The retinue begins to inquire about the matters spawning the decision to have the soldier as the demonstrator, and she deflects the questions with enough ease. Giving a nod to her soldier, she waves and dismisses him. With one slow and court bow towards the guests, he turns around and aims for the door.

"Excuse me, cadet," until the Chairman calls for him, approaching the soldier with slow steps.

"Yes, Chairman?" He asks, stopping and standing in attention.

The old man pulls and straightens his dark suit, slowly as his tone are his steps. Giving the soldier a good once over, he smiles up at the poker face. "It has been most surprising, the news you've delivered. Could we expect a similar performance to come in this training?"

"I shall try not to disappoint, sir," he affirms, giving a nod.

"Is that so? I know it might be out of place however, have you considered pursuing a career as a test pilot?"

"… Sadly, while that avenue has been suggested to me already," his sight veers towards the scientist, that is again indulging, reveling in the incredulity soon to be smashed to pieces, "my place is in this base, sir," he states, returning the gaze and another nod, tightening his hands.

As opposed to his expectations, the Chairman smiles and returns the nod. "I see… Frankly, this answer is also good to hear, cadet. It is a blessing to see a fresh cadet holding onto such composure during a meeting such as this one, to show such grit while being under the direct orders of the XO." It truly is a blessing, to see someone who can stand behind her in such tranquility, he relents within, again fiddling with his beard.

Yet, the soldier's expression tightens slightly, looking down. "I am merely following orders, sir."

"Still, one would be remiss not to acknowledge the value of your presentation, regardless of the circumstances that have removed your name from the simulator's documents. Certain I am you will… prove to be a valuable ally for the XO."

"… XO Kouzuki does not indulge in charity, this is nothing but the expected results I have to deliver after all the setbacks my presence has given her. Otherwise," grimacing slightly, coughing, he returns his hands to the seams, stillness to both breathing and features, "the moment I am no longer usefulshe'll discard this useless jester away,"he concludes, looking back at her for a moment before shaking his head. " After all, she did say she'd only aid me 'so long as I help her'," he repines inside, foolishly blinding himself once again. "There is no way Y uuko would truly allow herself to show such emotion as she did yesterday, she's just manipulating me into opening up to her by pulling at my strings, knowing what another her meant for me. Not that she could really understand… how I felt at the end of it all… how it felt to feel you vanishing from my hold."

"I see, I concur your situation is rather delicate," the man gives a nod, yet remains smiling. "By the by cadet Shirogane, do you favor card games?"

"Huh? I mean, yes, some of them I do. Why do you ask, sir?"

"Oh, it's merely that I found your words slightly concerning, you see," he looks back, back at the chuckles of the scientist in the midst of a debate, allowing a sigh to finally escape yet never losing the smile. "You see cadet, the jester is usually it is seen as a worthless card in most games."

"… What? Oh, you mean how it isn't allowed in some games?" He asks, raising a brow at the unexpected curve ball.

"Indeed, that is one motive. Even when it isn't exiled from the deck it could be employed as a penalty in many games. In a way, the jester is made to suffer the brunt of the punishments, branded as a card of ill omen," he says, low, before turning to face the soldier once again. This time, his features light up as he takes a singular step closer, leaving the docility of the smile, brandishing the inner edge of a blade in the stare. "However, there are other games in which the jester is allowed to reside in the deck alongside all the other cards in equal footing, and then it is that the its true strength shines through. As the figure who is always joking besides the king, no one pays much mind to the joker. Almost as if it were an ornament, a piece of furniture in the background. And it is why no one can ascertain the joker's true strength, why the joker can seize up all other members of the court and speak truths others wouldn't dare to bring to the king's attention."

"Huh… So you're referring to how the joker can be used as a sort of wildcard?" He asks, lost as a penguin in a desert regarding the seriousness, the firmness of the Chairman's stance and the dissonance it has with the rather silly discussion they're having.

The man forwards a few nods, once more grasping his beard and lowering his shoulders. "That's right, the jester has the ability of adapting itself to the hand you require, becoming the key piece to ending the game in victory. I believe this gives the otherwise punished jester an unparalleled power, for it can be a knight or an ace in the hole… or even a king itself in disguise," he says, somber, smirking and showing his fake, pristine white teeth back at the soldier. "Thus, the value of the jester is not in what others see in it or how it's usually treated, but in how skillfully its wielder can play it, for even a punished jester can be used as efficient bait."

"I see…"

"Thus, even if your situation does prove to be perilous indeed, do not lose spirit, cadet Shirogane. You've shown to be able to deliver satisfactory results, after all. I for one am looking forward to hearing about any new ideas you might forward in the future," he smiles and nods, offering a hand to the soldier.

Who takes it and returns a firm handshake, a clear nod. "Thank you, sir. Your words are appreciated."

Yet, as he tries to pull away the Chairman does not end the lock of their hands. Smirking once more, letting small embers reside in his eyes. "I also am looking forward to seeing what kind of jester he turns out to be for the XO, cadet," he whispers, the unblinking stare, the blight in between words enough to spur contraction in the soldier's features. "In any case, I've held you long enough. Best of luck in your training, cadet. We'll be watching you, with great interest."

"… Thank you, sir," he salutes, before slowly turning around and leaving the room, before blasting away down the hallway.

Sitting back, the Chairman douses the inquiries that upon the scientist fall with a wave, smiling at her and young Yashiro, who hides behind the lab coat. "Now then, if I might ask, the Gekishin unit the cadet will be piloting during this training wouldn't happen to be outfitted with the parts you've spoke about before?" He asks, gasps and gaping ensuing in the members of his retinue.

The chuckles from the scientist only enlarge the already comedic shock they were displaying. "My, was it that obvious, Chairman?"

"Haha, you wouldn't allow such a tantalizing opportunity to deliver a royal flush pass you by, XO."

"Well, what can I say? In the meantime, allow me to present to you the project to refurbish some parts of the Gekishin to new standards. Yashiro," she orders, the assistant hurries to her keyboard.

The demolishing performance of a black Gekishin facing off against many others amidst the ruins of the city at night, the testings of the Blood squadron, the drills of the Valkyries thus far, and some meager intel on the expected performance of the new parts devised are forwarded, kitties and thunders all over again.

"… So as you can see, the cadet's training will be both serve as a test for the new Gekishin parts and the XM3. As I've shown you, the XM3 does require certain parts from my own research which is why I am asking for your cooperation in these deals."

"It is understandable," the Chairman relents, nodding as he watches the movements of the dark knight before the Gekishin engages into an Albright Turn. "Of course, we'd be overjoyed to nurture the partnership we've established with Alt IV, XO. However," entwining his fingers, resting his chin onto them, he smiles, "the progress presented isn't decisive enough to warrant a shift to a new OS, much less for us to become the backers of the proposition."

"Well, that much is true," she says, returning the smirk while placing a hand on her waist, looking back at young Yashiro. "Then, allow me to show you a glimpse of what could truly be achieved should you support my proposition."

Replacing the footage of the prior fights, a new setting zooms into the screens. Once more it is nighttime, yet the frames shown leave everyone, even the Chairman, lacking sounds and air for a moment. The valiant yellow trades paint with the walls in an attempt to escape from the savage assault of the midnight blue, slashes that meet, windows that collapse, buildings that are hollowed. It always ends the same, with a struggle of Takamura's Takemikazuchi against the Kagerou of the soldier, almost evenly matched.

"So as you can see," she says with a grand gesture, raising her chin and chest, a smirking devil drowning chuckles, "with the right upgrades, even a base Kagerou could face off against a Type-00."

"XO Kouzuki, this is no jesting, is it?" The Chairman asks, blinking quickly as the Kagerou took reign over the skies, trying to skewer the golden plating from behind in an almost perfect maneuver.

"Of course it is, you should already know not to cast doubt to my statements, Chairman," she asserts, still smirking. Upon the call, young Yashiro goes and delivers the folders with the Kagerou's modified parts' intel. The scientist nods to her assistant, pacing in front of the rather large desk in the place. "Again, if left to my decision, I'd rather have Daikuuji Corp be who manufactures both the sims and the new parts for the Gekishin and Kagerou. The official meeting will be held on the twelfth of the current month, so I admit there is little time left for you to reach a decision. I would like to extend an invitation to the meeting as well, should you welcome this proposition."

A beeping echoes, Yashiro notifies the cadets are already on their respective positions to begin their mock battle. The scientist allows the guests to finish their drinks and rearrange their papers, notebooks, and pens, sharing a smile with the Chairman.

"Well, why don't we simply let actions do the talking for some minutes?" She suggests, walking away from the screens as Yashiro sends the correct feedback into each TV.

Sadly for the scientist, she just overshot the duration of the mock battle by several orders of magnitude, you'd understand.

---

Around two hours later.

(Yuuko's Office.)

[Yuuko]

---

"So such performance is commonplace for the cadet, huh," Chairman Daikuuji nods, still threading his beard as his features lower and lower.

"Impressive, isn't it," so I chuckle back. "I believe it is quite fair to affirm that if a single cadet could overpower its comrades in such manner through the XM3 despite the technological gap between a Gekishin and a Fubuki, the elites and veterans will undoubtedly pay back gracious dividends in the battlefield under this OS."

… Still, way to break the stage, Takeru. I told you to best your squadmates, not to ravage their composure, for fuck's sake. I do admit, the silent admiration of the retinue was fun to see, yes, but I think I'm gonna need to tone down your 'best efforts' from now on. I don't need Marimo sending me double digit calls every time I require you to provide a show of might, thank you very much. I know you said you desired to force your squad to improve further by showing your full skill under the XM3, but there is a difference between winning in moderation and an unadulterated massacre.

… Guess I should have seen that coming from the leader of the feared ghosts of the Empire. Neither mercy nor justice for the wicked, right Captain Takeru?

Doing a short spin and finishing my coffee, biting onto a muffin afterwards, I smirk towards him as I lean and rest onto the desk. "While Shirogane's tactics are not what one would normally expect, I believe that the results he is providing us with under the Reaper's harshest course yet are proof enough of the worth his ideas possess."

"I am not objecting to it in any way, Yuuko-kun," he lightly laughs, waving a hand about. "I would appreciate it if you ceased to try and send the jaws of my fellows to the floor with each and every presentation you hoist."

"Oh, but where's the fun in that? If I'm not cause of shock, then I'm doing something wrong. And… You do deserve the show of might, after all that has happened in this year. The support you've shown to Alt IV amidst the pressure will be repaid tenfold, I assure you of that."

"Don't, it is unnecessary," he sighs while waving a single finger, shaking his head, complexion dulling. "You've endured much on your own, more so with whatever was stymieing your research. I'm merely playing my part to support the project from my position, nothing else. Although, I shall relent that I am quite flabbergasted at this new pawn you've acquired," he takes a slow sip, holding her gaze from beyond the rim. "Who would have said you'd favor such offensive methodologies, Yuuko-kun?"

"… Sometimes, the threat of aggression is more effective than violence itself. If Shirogane trouncing all obstacles I throw his way serves as a deterrent and a pillar upon which to base my developments, I see no issues with granting him the approval to continue to pilot as he does."

"I see… Haha, I admit the cadet was an unexpected but welcome surprise. However, those new weapons were, how to say it… quite unorthodox," he admits, a cloth wiping the side of his forehead. "I never thought I'd read the phrase 'chainsaw-gun' and see it actually work…"

"Well, Shirogane is kind of crazy, to be honest," I chuckle, spinning slowly, giving small bites to the sweetness of the muffin. "The weapons do require some revisions, and while he insisted on the idea of the gun I believe there might be a better usage for the vial system he came up with. Would you be interested in forwarding a bid for the rights of either the weapons, the sims, or the Shin Kagerou project?"

"Haha, if it were only up to me, I would try and aim to hoard all which you've presented today," he smiles, finishing his coffee. "I will admit, with our current manpower, I can only aid you with the XM3's processing units, the new simulators, and some of the simpler weapons designs," nodding back and staring, he holds my gaze.

So I return a nod, a smile. "That is plenty enough, Chairman. Your support is much appreciated."

"Please, Yuuko-kun. There is no need for such formality."

"Oh, really? Well, anyways, things are going to start getting interesting from now on. It's nice to have you on board with the plans, Daikuuji-san."

"Haha, every time you proclaim anything with such impulse, lighting up your eyes in ignition, most complex situations end up befalling me… So," he clears his throat, crossing both legs and arms, gulping slowly and drying his mouth while leaving a cloak of silence lingering for a few moments, a few seconds, "I assume your project is ready to start its final phase?"

"Well, what do you think?" I smile, playing with my hair.

"Oh dear, this explains the gusto you've shown during the meeting," he laughs weakly. "Were the negotiations for the XG line successful?"

Shrugging, I shake my head as I go for another spin. "Of course not, they refused for the umpteenth time. This little test with the cadet was but a prelude to see if he could achieve a decent performance to convince others of the XM3's prowess. I'd like to believe America won't remain in opposition after an honest showing from my end, but I am not as naive as to simply hope for the best. So, any news about your project?"

Hunching over as he leans back into the sofa, his eyes gradually close, markings claiming his forehead as he shakes his head. "No, we've obtained no progress on the G-Sun. The attempts of the R&D team to enhance the chipsets you handed us have been met with failure."

"How large a failure are we speaking of?"

"They can't manage to start up either of the three units," he relents with a heavy and short sigh, folding the cloth after wiping his lips. "Perhaps, the XM3 and your new core design could allow us to bypass the taxing system requirements to operate the machines."

"It will be our backup plan if the negotiations break down again," I sigh, emptiness in my stomach. "I suppose I can count on your support to contact Lockweed so that they begin to lobby for the proposition to be accepted?"

"I will do what I can within my boundaries," he returns a firm nod.

"… Also, do you think we could obtain even a single unit of the produced Rapiers along the XGs?" I ask, leaning forward.

He blinks in quick succession, slightly moving backwards, readjusting his posture. "Why would you desire that, Yuuko-kun? Those TSFs are untested prototypes, and outdated by current standards."

"Well, that might be so, but they do have a few nice tricks built into their frames, if my intel isn't mistaken. Do you think we can gain the agreement?"

He groans, hiding his lips as he looks down. "It would be… arduous to gain both lines from the Hi-MAERF Project. If they would welcome the notion, I sincerely doubt they'd bestow you with more than a pair of Rapiers," he admits, posture falling down.

That is plentiful enough, I only have two pilots in mind to be in charge of the XF-108. And if Takeru thought it important enough to bring to my attention, it's worth a shot. We already have the negative so inquiring and showing interest in the Rapier is but a small matter that just maybe might play in my favor.

"In any case, it is good to see you in proper form once again, Yuuko-kun," he says, again smiling. "Perhaps, procuring yourself a new assistant has aided your spirits?"

"Huh? Oh, well, Shirogane is nothing but another pawn. A useful piece, is all," I affirm, holding his gaze, narrowing mine into his.

Yet there is no constriction, no hesitation as he once more laughs. "There is no need for you to raise thorns in defense. I am merely surprised that you'd bestow such leeway to a mere cadet, to allow him to stand so close to your person."

"I am merely ensuring he does not cause further issues, that's all. Shirogane is but another grunt, a promising one yes, but nothing but a pawn at the end of the day."

"… Is that so?" Once more interlocking his fingers, a thin smile, a firm stare he forwards as silence lingers for a second. "I believe the roughness in his eyes, the stoic demeanor he can endow in while in your presence is proof enough that… this new cadet is more than he appears to be at first glance. It is also odd that you'd give him credit over these developments, when there was nothing stopping you from coercing the lowly cadet into relinquishing his spoils to Alt IV."

"… I'm merely keeping our relation in mind, it does me no good to gain the animosity of a future subordinate. There is no need for a leader to impose such restrictions onto its followers, one must be gracious while at the peak. Is that what you've taught me all those years ago?" I rest my chin onto a hand, smirking back.

"Oh, yes, indeed I did," he returns another small chuckle, quickly clouding over his features as a finger courses through his beard. "It is still surprising to see. One would expect the fabled XO Kouzuki to show no second chances to anyone, much less to keep the problem person so close to herself…" Eyes narrow as I hold my breath, arms folding. He again chuckles, not lifting the cheer back to his face. "I won't divulge the presence of the cadet nor will I inquire any more into his situation. However, I'd be remiss not to warn you. The other side will strike back at your project in an attempt to halt your victory, sooner or later. Leaving loose ends and open wounds for them to prey upon is unwise."

"Thanks for the forewarning, Chairman. But rest assured, Shirogane won't become a cause of concern."

"I see… Were you planning to discard the jester once his uses run out?"

"… Pardon?"

He dares, dares to chuckle. "Oh, you see, the cadet seemed rather… reticent to welcome the notion of his prolonged stay in the base as I gave some parting words to him. He described himself as a 'useless jester' as far as your plans are concerned, Yuuko-kun." He coughs, sobriety returning to his features, clear as a lake or the sky as of now. "I know not what arrangement nor plans you have in wait for the cadet, however certainly some concise show of support would be welcomed? I admit, it would be most regretful to see such a promising mind caught in the middle of the warring factions of the Alt Plans."

"… Excuse me, he called himself as a… A useless jester, you say?"

What the actual fucking hell? What does that even mean? I… I was more than clear already to you, wasn't I? No, could this be some sort of pouty act on his end? Did… my kiss upset him to such lengths? Why?! I… thought we were on the same page, desiring the aid and support of the other?

… And after seeing his repeated, and slightly pathetic, attempts at reaching me in Sendai. Seriously, I never thought I'd be saying this but how glad I am he knows when to end his arguments. To almost start a fight with the guards in the complex… all to give me some pie Kyozuka-san made, another drawing from Yashiro, a letter from Marimo…

I cannot fully recall everything, it's all just bits and pieces, fuzzy and distorted. But his attitude was like that one night when he forced me back into my room. Dealing with that on a daily basis… Sigh… I suppose, Takeru does deserve more credit than I usually give him. Not exactly much, mind you, but still.

"I don't desire to delve deeper than I should, however, if you require a place to send the cadet to if his position in the base places you in a compromising position, I could-"

"Shirogane will be staying here, Chairman. He might be… a bit more trouble than he's worth, but I am certain that he'll pay back the chips placed on his back tenfold."

"Oho… It is odd, to see you ascertain such a thing with a resounding a tone," he says, holding my stare, undisturbed. "I suppose, you desire to hold onto your current hand?"

"Indeed. The cadet won't be cause of distress to my project, I assure you of that," I state, returning the gaze fully.

"… I see, that is reassuring to hear."

"Hm? Why? Do you… have some motive to desire Shirogane to remain here?" I lean forward, frosting my own tone. I did not think the Chairman could be related to Takeru in any way, however…

"Oh, no, nothing of the sort," he again laughs, finally relaxing and going for another sip. "I'm merely relieved to see you've found someone you'd welcome to stand besides you, even if it is only a mere pawn."

"Wh- Chairman, Shirogane is nothing but a cadet. While he has provided decent results thus far, he is nothing but another pawn in the large scheme of things," I affirm, giving a light slap on a pile of papers.

"That might be so, but it is has been arduous for you to find personnel that would work in your shadow with such efficiency," he remains smiling, finishing his drink. "In any case, so long as you forward a convincing enough appeal, my fellows should be able to work their expertise to allowing the XGs to finally stop collecting dust." He stands, sighs, and once more gives a nod my way. "I trust that this XM3 you've produced will show spectacular results during this coming meeting, so I shall endeavor to bring good news to you soon after."

"That will be much appreciated… after all, this vital piece reached completion in part due to the final exploits of 2nd Lt Daikuuji in her last sortie."

"Yuuko-kun, you need not tell me anything," he winces, waving a hand, shaking his head with even more apathy. "Ayu chose to lead her own life, to live alongside those she considered her fellows and conquer her own battlefield until the final curtain fell, I'm certain. While many words shall forever remain unspoken in my chest now that she departed earlier than me, if your project bears fruit then… then that is all that I could ever ask of you, not as the Chairman but as a father."

"… I will deliver, Chairman Daikuuji," I nod firmly, holding his gaze, a hand outwards. We share a handshake, he barely regains the prior smile.

"If and when the XGs arrive, my fellows are at your disposal, XO," he affirms, back to business once the handshake ends. Coughing and straightening his suit, he once more nods back. "And if you ever desire to attain a few more bottles of quality alcohol, please don't hesitate to call."

"Ha, I might be contacting you sooner than I thought then," I return the chuckling as I press the button and unlock the door.

"I see, I shall be readying myself in that case. Regardless, this visit has been a most welcome surprise, XO. I certainly hope the coming meeting measures favorably against today."

"Oh, believe me, it will."

"Haha… You truly do enjoy flaunting your advantages whenever you can, Yuuko-kun… Still, I shall be looking forward to what you've brewing," he says as he gives a small nod, starting to walk towards the exit, "as well as for what you have planned for this special cadet."

"I said, he's nothing but-"

"Nothing but a jester," he looks back, smirking. "A card you've chosen to keep close to your grip. While I won't divulge anything, I advise you to keep the boy under watch, so that the card doesn't get… confiscated away."

"… What are we speaking about here?"

"Oh, nothing much. I merely hope this one jester does bring auspicious boons to you," he sighs, relaxing his shoulders, giving me a small, honest smile. "I am not blind, Yuuko-kun. Your shortage of reports, these new developments, the brand new OS, it all started near the end of October. A birdie told me that could be when he arrived to the base. So, in all honesty, I simply wish this unexpected ally is able to remain by you. It has been indeed long since I've seen you smile in such shimmering cheer, after all."

"… I'm merely glad I can progress in my research, Chairman. Shirogane has little to nothing to do with that," I say, ruffling my hair, looking away.

"And yet, you allow him to present his own arguments during a crucial meeting," he again smiles, chuckling lightly. "People will notice, Yuuko-kun. Inquiries might even be coming as we speak, if the HC is aware of his involvement in the little simulator's development. You've lost much, and there is little more than I can do in support for the project… So do keep this card close to you, even if you aim to sacrifice it at the most appropriate moment. The cadet is truly a goldmine for you, and even if his eccentric maneuvers do seem hard to replicate, such a champion is what the STF so desperately required. I assume, the Rapiers you desire to acquire are for the boy to pilot?"

"Sigh… I can't truly hide anything from you, huh."

"Haha, one of the advantages I have as your old professor," he nods, lightly hitting his chest. "Thus is why I insist," once more clouding his features, nodding and drilling his gaze into mine, "use this jester to its maximum efficiency. And if there is a… forced play coming towards your plans, do not hesitate to discard it for the benefit of your end board."

"… I see. Is something looming behind the horizon, then?"

"Well, I suppose you've heard of both issues. Of the troublesome sushi bar and the random visitors to settlements beyond the defense lines… We have been hard pressed for spare parts on both ends, and my inquiries met with," he grimaces, scoffing and fuming a prominence, "unpleasant ends. I am glad to see you've procured a fine tool at this stage, I only can dare to hope you need not discard him too early in your plans," he affirms, nodding in dejection, everything in him collapsing. "It truly is good to see someone willing to remain by you in such composure, after all."

"I see. I shall see to these… issues that are arising, do not worry. And as far as Shirogane is concerned, a jester he might be but you should know wildcards are not to be underestimated in the right hands."

"Haha, truly I do. Well then, I shall be taking my leave here, since my fellows should be done with their little tour in Hangar 90 by now. Until the twelfth, XO Kouzuki."

"Until then, Chairman. And worry not, the trial run will be truly an interesting event to witness," I affirm with a smirk, and we both chuckle for a moment before he departs.

Shrouded Silver Blossom

" Things have gone wrong, they do more often than they don't

I was a child before

A soldier in defense

I'll take the leap, I've gone so far for lesser gold

I wanna know this life, by your side

I don't wanna try to fight this love

How dangerous can it be?

I know the odds are so unfavorable, and honesty's forsakable

So many run for safety, run from the-

Danger, of falling in love like this

Danger, of falling apart

In the hands… of another…

Danger in falling in love like this

Cold sweat craving the dark

So completely… so sweetly…

… Danger"

Danger, by Etro Anime. From Digital Devil Saga: Avatar Tuner.

---

Chapter 93:

Shrouded Silver Blossom

---

December 6th. A few minutes before 7 PM.

(Hallway, near the changing rooms.)

[Meiya]

---

"You don't have to apologize, for real," Takeru says, as slow and apathetic as one could possibly be, dismissing it all with but a brush of a hand and facing away from me. "So, was that all?"

Veiling my sight momentarily and keeping air hostage, I step forward towards him. "… Takeru, why won't you accept my apology?"

He once more looks elsewhere, slow and minute movements as he escapes backwards. "There's no need to apologize for how you feel. We don't see eye to eye, and that's perfectly fine, Mitsurugi."

"… You also refuse to refer to me by name, despite our accord," I cannot help but to note, a slight purse in my lips, equally slow a contraction in the pit of my stomach at the lack of an answer, even a mere acknowledgment. "I admit I was undeservedly harsh towards your person, yet please allow me to mend my mistake."

"Sigh… You don't have to do this."

"Yes, I must," I fold my arms, giving a frontal stare into the immutable curtain which has befallen the gestures I knew in him. "You have been trying an utmost effort not to inconvenience the squadron, and yet I stepped over your goodwill once again. Furthermore, if you'd be so kind…" my eyes veer away upon meeting no change, arms release themselves and hang loosely, "I would welcome the notion to become your fellow, as whoever granted you the sword once was for you. If you'd rather have us start over, for me to regain your trust, then I shall acquiesce to-"

"Mitsurugi," he stops, cold, slightly frowning before shrugging and allowing a meager smile to rise. "Can you be level with me and tell me what you're really after?"

"Huh? I am not jesting, I honestly desire to earn back your trust," I state, returning his gaze. Amidst the silence of the hallway, with only a distant echo of hurried footsteps as our company, the almost absent stare only spawns greater a contracting void in my lungs.

For some reason, I truly do not like the look in his face. Be it the new longer hairstyle he now favors or the neutral facade, it makes my skin crawl to be on the receiving end of such deafening extension of quietness. It is almost as nighttime was when I was younger, the grayed out walls, the impregnable silence extending for hours on end with no change to be made. Why won't you show me a mere emotion? Anything at all, even anger would be welcomed at this point. Takeru, please, look at me…

Gradual and slow, the descent of his body onto the wall, both hands cradling the back of his head and fiddling with the headband he still has, his eyes remain on the ceiling. "So you ain't here trying to pry any answers or anything outta me?"

"Wh- I would do nothing of the sort! I have been… acting inappropriately, I admit and accept your judgment. However, I would not try and deceive you to such ends."

"Then," he cuts in, tension in his features, a dead straight gaze he forwards, "care to enlighten me on the motives why you told the guards about Sumika?"

"Eh? Ah… Well, I was…" Unable to face the stare, that wrathful pyre he also endowed during the CCSE, I can only sigh and veer my sight to the ground. "I was concerned over your health, over the possibility of you being overburdened due to the punishment. I did warn them of not taking the matter lightly," I nod his way, taking another step closer.

In the absolute void of the hallway, surrounded by the sterile scent of Clorox permeating, the unblinking eyes that seek nothing else drown everything else in sight. Even mere excess saliva is difficult to gulp, not a single muscle can bring about the smallest movement.

"You gave me your word," he barely whispers, looking away as both arms embrace each other, "and you smashed it to pieces in less than a day."

"Wh- That is not- I was only trying to aid you, however slightly! To make up for my mistakes is all I desire. I only-"

"And yet, the first thing you did as we docked earlier today was again bombard me with questions about my piloting," he says, rolling his eyes.

"You cannot possibly fault me, even the Instructor was bereft of words at your performance," I sigh and shake my head, face away from that which burns my sight.

I still cannot believe he neutralized both me and Yoroi at the same time, without any assistance might I add. Considering the Instructor received a call, and then seemed to be at the verge of a headache as Takeru reiterated his orders to not disclose anything, I assume this is also a result of his special missions. Another ripple of the punishment, of my weakness during the CCSE. And to make matters worse, Yashiro once more arrived to take him to another special mission as soon as we were done with our debriefing.

Absent from our afternoon lectures he was as well, thus I haven't been able to share even a word with Takeru until our night runs. And while I do welcome the harsh yet truthful advice he forwarded, as he supported Sakaki's idea to shuffle our positions and we all managed to clear yet another level of the course despite the setbacks, I am not pleased with the slow gestures, the lack of eye contact, the stillness in his voice.

Despite telling the cousins to take their leave for dinner after the training, Takeru did not aim towards the food storage and I almost did not catch up despite my hurried departure from the changing room. Sakaki did held me up for some moments until I clarified my intentions, but still, he has been in a most strange and somber mood today.

… Even if he once more smiled as teasingly as always when a few MP tried to cause friction as we came to the changing rooms, using himself as a shield when Ayamine was about to burst. Sigh…

" I welcome the aid if you wanna share the pain, man. You wanna be special, too? Then come and lend me a hand in helping the XO with her random assignments. Of course, if you don't mind getting stuck with half rations and cold showers whenever you screw up, that is."

I cannot believe he'd jest about such an arrangement… A blessing it was the MPs simply left as he tried and gain their 'support', although something tells me Takeru was actually threatening them for some reason.

And now, once more his features remain still, dull, cold.

"But you still broke your word," he says, once more looking away, shaking his head minutely.

"… Takeru, I shan't inquire into what caused your stellar piloting today, and I don't hold any mistaken views against you anymore. However, please believe me when I say I had no ill will when disclosing Kagami's name to-"

"It matters little, you did it and that's what counts," he sighs, leaving the wall and moving away without looking at me for even a millisecond. "I've no intention to antagonize you or anything, so let's keep things calm in the squad. Can we agree to that?"

"… Yes, we are in agreement in that regard. However," once more stepping towards him, entering his sight, I nod and hold the neutral stare's pressure, "you truly cannot bestow upon me another chance? Surely we can still be fellows?"

"… Why?" He asks, taking a hasty step back, avoiding my gaze once more as if a source of heat it were. "You already made your feelings clear to me, there is nothing to-"

"I am apologizing," I insist, heaving another sigh. "Have you not been listening? I admit I… let my less stellar emotions control my actions. You're clearly not deserving of such animosity, and your words back then made it clear to me you do value our teachings dearly even when our views on the code differ. Thus," stepping once again towards him, bowing down, I lick over my lips as both hands clench, "could you give me another chance to earn your favor?"

…

"… And what happens the next time our views are in conflict?"

"Eh? Well…" idling a hand on my hair as I rise back, my eyes seek the ceiling for a moment. "We can debate on our views beforehand, so that such issues are not anymore."

"Sigh… Yeah, right," he scoffs with barely a move of his lips, rolling his eyes as he retracts further.

"I am being serious, however."

"Mitsurugi, if there is something I know about you is that you tightly cling onto the ideals you hoist dearly," he notes, with a small crossing of his brows, a layer of pungency to the words. "If we don't agree now, there's little debating over the matter will do. It's how you are, and that's it."

"… I was under the impression that you valued much whoever it was that bequeathed you with the sword. For you to display such voracious wrath during our battle yesterday, I believe there are ideals you, too, hoist with pride in your heart, Takeru," I firmly state, taking another step forward. His apathy does not thaw, those eyes simply remain watching my every move, the thin line that is his mouth remains loyal to stillness. "I… do not believe our views to be irreconcilable, more if you would still desire to share that same fellowship with me. And the rest of the squad too, of course."

I wait, yet he does not answer.

Leaving me to the silence, once more denying me entrance to his sight.

Lips weave wordless phrases while he scratches his head, in the end he retracts behind the curtain once more.

"I understand you to be dejected at my choice, but it was only… born out of concern. You seem to still be exhausted, and I did not desire to see further burdens fall onto you. That is why, I am not asking your immediate forgiveness. Please, state your terms. Allow me to mend my carelessness," breathing in sharply, I once again bow down.

"… Why?"

"Huh?" Raising back, I find contortion to his features, disquiet in his lips and hands. "Takeru?"

"Why? What exactly do you want from me, Mitsurugi? We can remain as comrades even if our opinions differ, I won't hold it against you."

"… It certainly does not seem so, however. For one, you are still refusing to employ my name."

"Sigh… You already told me how you view me, I explained to you how I felt, and that's the end of the line. You don't need to apologize, for real. We're already comrades. Unless, of course," a finger slowly raises to the intersection of both brows, an eye twitches as lips and cheeks regress inward, "that's not the real motive behind your inquiries," he says, forwarding a squinted gaze my way.

"What? I am being honest, there is no hidden meaning to my request. You must have seen how Ayamine and Tamase were all day today. If you once more show your usual cheer during the training, even if you do not hand over your forgiveness instantly, the morale of the squad will certainly improve. Please, Takeru, you truly cannot welcome my words?"

Finally fully returning my gaze, a slight pressure is inflicted onto his bottom lip. Eyes that remain on mine, nowhere else, fixation strong enough to elicit a gulp, a shiver on me. And a sigh, long and extended, lips that do not close as his shoulders drop, as he veils his sight and hits the wall.

"If I said yes and accepted to be your fellow, is that all you'd want me to be for you?"

"Huh? Uh, I, well- Wait, what you asking of me?"

"If you're only pressing due to your duty, to feeling indebted to an apology, please stop. There's no need, that's what I'm trying say. If you're trying to convince me to be your fellow, I'm also gonna have to ask you to stop. Don't try to recruit me into the IRG, because I'm telling the Instructor on you if you insist."

"Wh- I am doing nothing of the sort. You're deserving of the word, you were bequeathed a blade, were you not? Thus, if your records were cleared, and you welcomed the notion… I could vouch for you, so that it is made clear you're a rightful fellow."

A brow twitches, slow does he inhale as he observes my features. For a moment, then another, in silence. "Why? I can be your comrade without the need for me to follow the same code you do, right?" He tells, slow and dismissive, shrugging as he looks away.

Lips purse, something burns the underside of my ears, the twister in my gut ravishes me again. "Yet, that was only… because of my own misunderstandings. If there is truly no stain on your person and you cherish that woman so dearly, would you truly… not welcome the proposition?"

"Sigh… Why are you insisting so much?" He asks, clutching his face as Tsukuyomi did during the… ahem… ordeal with the misunderstanding.

" Gulp… I shall admit that I admire you. Both your skill and knowledge, the composure you usually display, and I welcome your lighthearted attitude. I've let my inner turmoil blind me, because I… do envy your aptitude and desired to one day reach your level." To stand by your side in equal footing, to one day best you in a sparring. Until, one day, somehow, that feeling became… wanting to you as my partner in my style, to share with you my growth. As shameful as it is to admit, even beyond my basest urges which would have me stare at his physique… to find someone who would approach me willingly, shares my style, and displays such resolve is truly nothing but a blessing. "All I desire is… for us to be on good terms, for you to be my fellow. There is no hidden meaning to my words, Takeru. Would you truly not welcome my proposition?"

"Of what?"

"Of becoming my fellow."

"Just that?"

"Huh?"

"Just fellows? Not… anything else?"

"Eh? W-What- Would you… desire something more with me?"

"Would you? I mean, it is weird that you're not giving an inch here despite already apologizing and all. I ain't dumb, Mitsurugi," he says, low, as he steps forward and locks his sight on mine. "Is a fellow all you want me to be for you?"

"Ugh, well, I- Cough . I mean… I only-"

"If you only want a fellow," he shrugs, turning away and departing, "I'm sure there's plenty of people waiting for you in the IRG."

"W-Wait, Takeru!" I reach out as he takes a step towards the stairs, as he grips onto the railing. The coldness of his hand gives me pause, yet he does not pull away. His fingers give a gentle squeeze as he looks back, in silence, waiting. "Assuming I were to extend such a proposition your way, what-" I gulp, returning the smallest grip onto his hold, "what would your answer be?"

"… And if your duty clashed with me being close, what would you do? Discard me away? Ask for me to remain close yet keeping your distance to avoid friction?" He asks, slightly frowning as his hand limply slips from my grasp.

"Why are those the only options? I… am only a Tozama, if you must know. That is why, well," I give another small bow, hands joining, "your fellowship matters to me, which is why I grew so upset… at the thought of you turning your back onto our teachings. I admit, it was petty of me. My apologies."

"It's cool, stop bowing," he sighs, shrugs, then turns away, starting to descend the stairs. "We're still comrades, so don't feel like I'm screening you out or anything, okay? Well, see you-"

"Takeru, please," hurriedly skipping a few steps, again reaching his side in a small rest of the stairs.

His brows cross as he waits. "I need to report to the XO, Mitsurugi. Today was a busy day, and I haven't heard from her since morning. So if we're done here-"

"You are not allowing me to answer," I state, groaning as my arms fold. "If I- If such a proposition went your way, would you consider becoming my fellow?"

"Again, just that?"

"I… Cough… I admit I do- wouldn't mind being something more, i-if you so desired and we were compatible as partners in service. Would you be wishing to test my character to ensure I shan't betray your trust, then so be it. If it brings you any respite, you are free to request what you will to see that I truly mean my words of support, my fellow," I affirm with a nod, returning the intensity, the lock of our eyes onto one another. "You did… desire to foster fellowship with me, according to your words during yesterday's bout, correct?"

"… No."

"Huh? However, I thought you, well, said you wished to share with me what you had with… that person."

Sighing once again, slouching against the wall, almost as if desiring to melt into it, he looks up while licking his lips. Stealing a gaze at me, then at the ground, finally folding his arms and shaking his head, Takeru's complexion tightens once more. "Exactly, that's what I meant. But not how you're taking it."

"Then, how did you mean? Sparring partners, mutual retainers, perhaps?" He stares at me, narrowing his sight before heaving a sigh with a dejected sway of his head. "What- What is it with that reaction?"

"I know you're kind of oblivious but this is too much, even for you. And that's coming from me, of all people."

"Then, what did you mean? If you refuse to be my fellow, and would desire something more then, what else could you want? Are you implying that… you were saying such words with-"

"Yeah, dammit, I meant it romantically, you stupid idiot," he frowns, fumes, hits the walls.

"I-I see… Wait, what?! Y-You were looking at me in such a way?"

Not looking away he returns a nod, posture sinking as I fumble syllables out of my lips. "Sigh… I thought we could get along, and maybe be something more for each other… Just that, a stupid hopeful feeling, is all," again, hunching over, as if tilting over the edge of canyon, about to fall into bottomless nothingness.

"Is that so?" I suppose, that gives another layer to how supportive he always was towards me. Even to worry about my back during the CCSE, to try and make amends between us while I- Wait a moment… "Takeru, you- you did mean those words with… well… the desire for us to be together?"

"Siiigh…" He nods, not lifting his eyes, posture, or anything at all.

"Then, well," folding my arms, gulping once more, my insides are scorching, "does that equal you shared such a bond with… that person as well?"

"Hm? Yeah, a long time ago…"

"Pardon?"

But- But Tsukuyomi said there wasn't anything of the sort between you two… that she was like a second mother for you.

Yet, the dejection, the contraction of his lips, of his eyelids… W-Were you truly in love with-

"And since it was a bad experience for me," he straightens up, inhaling sharply, both hands tend and care at his face, hewing frozen composure into his features, "I don't think we should interact with each other any more than necessary."

"… What? A bad experience? Yet, weren't you, well, in love with-"

"In the end… they chose their duty over me. When the coin landed, our priorities were in opposing sides. So, please," he bows down swiftly, as formal and proper as everybody else has done since as far as I can recall, "could you keep your distance from me, Mitsurugi?"

"… I can comprehend the reticence you explain, however, the judgment you cast is most unfair. You yourself hold onto your resolve with an iron grip, what had you refusing to support that person?"

A collapsing smile raises, almost silent chuckling leaves his lips. In a mixture of hilarity and sadness he continues to lightly laugh, slightly shaking his head as he does. "I tried, you know. But it's hard, to try and help someone who puts their duty before their own person."

"… All of us, at one point, will lose our individuality. The burdens that on our shoulders rest, all the people that we must support from our position cannot be ignored. I believe you should be praising that person's resolve, even if their absence was grievous for you, Takeru. Isn't the example she bestowed you with her life something you honor to this very day?"

"Yeah, it is… And I hate it."

"Excuse me?"

"I hate it, always acting so self-righteously, never telling me anything, taking it all on her own despite me being right there to lend a shoulder," he hits the wall, again, and again, all the more strongly the more his features tighten, the more he bites onto his lips, the more contorting surfaces near his eyes. "Love is a two-player game, Mitsurugi. And while one can break a relationship if the fire dies down, it has to be clear and decisive. I don't… wanna be strung along anymore by people that only claim to want to have me close, only to focus on their duties full time later."

"What? However, if such is their desire, would it not be in your interest to support them, isn't it?"

"I'm not judging," he counters, ceasing his assault on the wall, heaving another sigh, relaxing. "If that's the kind of life they wanted to lead, then just… tell me, and that's it. We could have ended things on good terms if it wasn't gonna work out on her end. I just… I don't wanna get my hopes up again only to be bitch slapped by reality a third time. So no, I don't think I should become your fellow or anything more than what we are now."

"What- Why are you- Wait, a third time? H-How many relationships have you been in?!"

"… Does it even matter? Let's just-"

"No, wait a moment! I know not what burdens fell onto your prior… lovers?" hesitation claims my voice, causing a stutter, a localized quake to assail me. Takeru dares to simply shrug, avoiding my eyes. Mmgh… "However, I wouldn't do such cruel an act on you. I mean it when I say I want you as my fellow, Takeru. And if you'd desire something else… w-we can debate on the matter, in private," I nod his way, compacting my body, a gentle quiver on my knees as he stares, lukewarm feathers ascending from there, embers swirling in my stomach. D-Do not stare at me so intently in utter silence…

Yet, one of his eyes twitches. "Then, let's say you and I start dating."

"… Huh? Wait, are you being serious about this?"

"What, you aren't?"

"Eh?! I, uh, ahem… So, you were saying?"

"Let's say that we get together, and you're then called to serve, to act on your duty because of the blade," he whispers, petrification claiming his person, except for the eye that remains softly twitching. "What happens then?"

"… You could come with me, if such a scenario were to happen."

"What if that's forbidden?"

"Why would it be? If- Well, assuming you'd honestly forward such a notion-"

"Meiya," he tells, loud, echoing into me as he smiles, bright as the clear sky, as he always had been, "I ain't dumb. I can tell which House our blades belong to, and who you serve. If she required your services, do you really think a relationship with a no-name baseborn like me would be accepted by the IRG?"

"W-Well, no, it would not come easily… However, that is only conjecture. Furthermore, do not reach the wrong conclusion, please. I only resemble that person physically, there is no… no bond between us…"

"Meiya, please," chuckling, Takeru shrugs. "I won't say a thing, I know you… serve the sun which illuminates the Empire. I can tell, after the whole mess with the blade, the General coming to the base, and your strong resolve. And I ain't holding anything against you."

"… Is that so. Then…" idling a hand on my hair, shallow is my breathing, compact becomes my posture, yet I now cannot flee his stare, "are you afraid of the consequences that come with being near my person? You should not, I shall endeavor to mend what mine own folly-"

"Meiya," another step closer, the smiling sky fills my view, "don't change the subject, please. You say you want me to be your fellow, to stay by you. Then, what happens if you're called to serve? What happens if my own code clashes with yours?"

"What? Say no nonsense, you were given a blade. Certainly we can reach an agreement?" I propose, holding his gaze, feeling the tail end of his breathing caressing my chin.

"But you will support the notion to fulfill your oath, correct?" He insists, clouds to the sky, a cold gust onto my skin.

"But of course, how could I not?"

"… Then, that's all I needed to hear," closing his eyes, Takeru turns away, descends the stairs in quite the haste. And for a moment, I can only stare as he departs.

Only when I lose sight of him do my feet finally react. "H-Hey, wait! Takeru, you cannot simply end the conversation in such manner!"

A few MP pass us by, daring to glare his way before I forward a stare of my own. Once I confirm there are no onlookers, I stomp towards the snail's pace he endows at the moment.

"Takeru, please, is this truly such an impossibility for you?" I ask, grasping at his shoulder.

He stops, barely moving his head to see me. "We've gone over this already…"

"Any predicament of yours is also mine, as my fellow that you are. Even if you… wouldn't request such a bond with me, I am obliged to aid your woes. Please, talk to me about what has you this preoccupied. Allow me to aid you, even if only as an apology."

"Sigh…"

"Please, speak to me…" Look at me again, please let me in, Takeru… Don't remain silent, please. Look my way, I beg of you. " Why do you believe you'd be forsaken were you to become my fellow? Is it because of whoever bequeathed you with your sword?"

"You didn't hear, did you."

"Huh? What are-"

He stares, for a moment, before he lightly laughs. "You're too similar to her, Meiya. And I… don't think I could stand by you, as simply a fellow."

"… P-Pardon? Are you truly saying that-"

"Because it was hell, those days."

The severity of the tone, the slamming of a tidal wave upon the shore, the tension which claims his features is enough to make me step away. The gritting of his teeth, the scorching in his glare, is just like it was during the downpour when we were ambushed by the cousins.

"I simply kept moving forward while waiting for any signal, anything at all. She might have been trying to lead by example, show me her resolve through her acts, but there are some things that need to be said. All I asked… was for a single word, that never came. So even if she still held feelings for me, all I can say is that our relation was doomed from the start."

Sharply sighing through clenched teeth, the fiery fury loosens and vanishes. Takeru shakes his head, coughing, straightening back up, once more back to his usual features. And yet, the sting of a blizzard still resides in his gaze.

"It was either one thing or the other, she either gave up on me or kept me close. I kinda just tried to do what I could, to support her from my position, with the only thing I could do of worth, but she never reached back."

"… And did you try to approach her?"

"I did at first… until I realized she wasn't gonna reply. I've already lost much, and I don't want to get any stupid ideas in my head. If you would rather surrender your individuality to the system to accomplish your duties as they did, then no, I can't be your fellow. Can you still be my comrade, even if we disagree on this end?" He asks, in such a low voice, with such a slow, meager nod towards me, posture aiming down as he waits.

"I wouldn't scorn you for choosing your own private life over the duties that come with accepting a blue blade, Takeru," I nod, a minute smile raises in him as he takes a few shallow breaths in quick succession. Gulping slowly, treading my hair, I take a step forward. "However, that does not equal such a scenario will come to be. I know not what duties might have been on that person's shoulders… but I wouldn't forsake a fellow in such manner. Even if your… memories of those days are truly painful, that does not mean I-"

"You can choose one or the other, there is no middle ground in these matters, Mitsurugi," he retorts, shaking his head again, shrugging. "You either stick with your partner through hell and high tide or you don't. And if you're no longer compatible, then the relation will break on its own. And I already went through that, so I know… what the answer's gonna be if I try and remain close to you."

"Spout no balderdash, Takeru. What, you're telling me you can see the future?" I shrug my lips, folding my arms.

He gazes into me, nowhere else, as he idles a hand on his hair. "You've a duty to see through, don't you?"

"Yes, and what has that to do with… whatever it is you're proposing as of now?"

"Then, what if that gets denied, if you're told you cannot be with anyone?"

"Mmgh… Why must you go to the extremes? I am telling you that I wouldn't-"

WHAM!

An impact upon the wall, storm into the sky. "Then, why didn't she say anything?"

"Huh? How am I supposed to-"

POW!

"Why did she simply leave without word?"

SLAM!

"Why remain silent for so long, why leave me hanging?"

THWACK!

"After the Disaster of all things, why didn't she reach out a single time?!"

"C-Calm down, you'll hurt yourself!" I plead, blocking the following strike upon the wall. Sighing as he douses himself, staring at the crumpled, ravaged poster that he eviscerated as he would a building during training, the violence itself echoes, rumbles still in his quivering fists. "Why are you this adusted, Takeru? What… What did this person do to you?" To splinter his composure in such manner, just whatever did that woman do to his heart? To leave imprinted such markings, for them to still remain open to this very day… I doubt Mother sowed such emotions in him so… Who is it about?

A sigh overstays its welcome, thunders reign up above. "… I can't remember."

"Huh? Then, are the recollections hurting you?" Tsukuyomi did make a case to warn me of the erratic memories he might be seeing, after all. "Would you desire my aid to search for that person, see if they still live?" Reaching a resolution on the matter may allow his feelings to finally heal, even if… perhaps he would end up desiring to return to that someone's side.

"Sigh… No, it's fine," once again, a hand brushes me away as the other tends to his brows and eyes. "No one but myself can help with this matter…" he says, once again releasing a heavy sigh. "And regardless of the motives behind her actions, even when I can comprehend the weight that was thrust upon her shoulders and the necessity to answer to the call… in a personal level, I will never forgive her for what she did." Eyes that blaze, burn my own as he returns my stare. I can only step back, cold chains restricting, stiffening my movements.

"… What on the Heavens has you this upset? Do you… hate that person, and by extension, the nobility?"

He chuckles, shrugging, smiling weakly. "If I could give into resentment, things would be easier for me. But no, I don't hate her. I cannot. I get the motives, but there's something… No, nothing. Forget it."

"Why? You may talk with me, if it would alleviate your suffering ever so slightly. I shan't divulge a thing, I swear. You've made yourself clear to me, and I will not betray your trust again, Takeru."

"Please don't, Mitsurugi. The ripples are bad enough already, and I should just shut my damn mouth," he grumbles, pinching his nose again. "We don't mix, that's all. Let's keep things calm, okay?"

"… Are you saying any and all nobles would act as that person did? I for one am not-"

"It ain't fair to judge, I know," he appeases, waving down, sighing again. "But I cannot forgive her silence above everything, more considering… who should have joined us shortly after," he tells, oh, somberly, as the clouds twist and collapse onto themselves, as it seemed his ankles would soon follow. "And… that makes me believe we shouldn't interact anymore, Mitsurugi. I appreciate you trying to make amends, but simply remaining as comrades should be enough. There's no point in trying to bridge this gap…" he whispers, turning back and attempting to leave.

Which I don't allow, chasing after his shadow, placing myself in front of his path, the unsteady walking. "Of course there's meaning to try and understand each other, Takeru. Even beyond the morale of the squadron as a whole, I desire to aid you. I know not what imprinted such consternation into your mind, but, please, allow me to show you I am indeed sorry."

After all, Mother herself looked after you! Tsukuyomi seemed so beyond herself with happiness at the prospect of you regaining your memories. With how many fellows we've lost to the war, with how little people have ever treated me as a person, without fear or formality molding their postures and attitude into patterns I've come to know as the palm of my hand… If you truly desired such of me, if you'd forgive my misgivings and extend such a proposition… How could I ever think of bringing pain to your person? Even now, after all I've done, you still… welcome a talk with me with such honesty.

"… And what of the ripples that come with that decision?" He asks, still glacial, ailing, eyes closed. "You ever stopped to think who is gonna be made responsible for giving me the blessing to join the fellowship?"

"Ah… H-However-"

"Do you know what this means, Meiya? To force her hand to have to accept me into the fellowship, you wanna place more burdens on her shoulders?"

"Never! Yet if your profiles are mended and your memory ever returns then-"

"Then, what happens when fingers start getting pointed? You forgot I killed people in the CCSE? What of her image, her standing?" He demands, dark signs covering the alcove where once only brightness resided, a tense posture as he steps back. "Me accepting your idea comes with lots of problems, for both Her Highness and the XO."

He tries and move past me, my hand seeks his, grips tight, restrains his movement. Takeru again does not let go, again squeezes slightly. Still holding his fingers, I look back into his eyes, getting closer.

"But if you would desire to be one of us… I can aid you, give my support to your person so that no such issues can athwart you from your past. With your service in all these special missions, the XO can grant credence to your character and aptitude. While I admit certain… conservative sectors of the fellowship will be opposed to the likes of you, the fact of the matter is you were given a Minaru Kamui and do hold our teachings to heart. If… If, as an apology for my folly, I would offer you my complete support for you to become one of us again… What would your answer be, Takeru?"

…

"If I… have no choice but to stay, if I have no choice but to return to who I once was… Then that will place me in a position where I am not certain I'll be happy."

"… What? Why?" I seek his gaze, find only a mound of eternal gray.

"I already told you, there's no middle ground in certain things. And while I do wanna clear up the mess of the databases, I don't think me going back to who I used to be is a good call."

"… What of the feelings of all those who await your return? Certainly, someone must be anxiously awaiting news of you!"

"And what of my feelings?" He asks, clutching my hand.

"Huh?"

"What of my life? You'd rather have me again live in the shadows forever?"

"Wh- What are you-"

"… Her Highness cannot face any more setbacks, Mitsurugi. To entangle her with the likes of me will only serve to diminish her image. And I already give enough problems to XO Kouzuki, " he sighs, lets go and moves away, slowly so.

"You cannot know until you try, you should remain steadfast on your resolve to see your goals through to the very end, Takeru."

Glaring my way, forcing a step back, he inhales sharply, pulls back the storm at the last second. "I know what will come if I try and repeat my mistakes, what issues I'll bring to your fellowship if I try and accept to be one of you," at the tail end of the sudden eruption, only a cloak of sorrow falls to his features, like ashes raining down, as he winces and grips his forehead, massaging it. "The vows I shared… were broken anyways…" Takeru shakes his head, walking away.

"However… still, I could at least aid you with your situation. Once you regain your citizenship, if you then recall what was of you before-"

"You ever stopped to think why I lost my memories?" He asks, low, as his stride subsides, allowing me to catch up.

"Well, I suppose you suffered an accident?"

"Then, why did no one look for me? Why is my data missing?"

Pursing my lips, I step forward, almost colliding into him. "Do you believe it to have been deliberate, then? Would you desire aid in that matter?"

"What if I told you," he slowly says, smiling yet wincing, "my presence could be a detriment to whoever remembers me?"

"Excuse me? Do you- Wait, you know?!"

"That's why, please, stop it. It's better not to get our hopes up, to chase after something that will never be," he affirms, still endowing the ashen smile, again aiming for the next set of stairs. He does not stop as I call out and give chase.

"Urgh! Can you please be clear, Takeru? Who are you speaking of? Why are you refusing under false assumptions?"

And more importantly, do you remember? Do you believe your presence could play against the fellowship? If he was to be one of us despite his humble origins, if you truly were worthy of a Minaru Kamui, if you're attempting to protect Sister by remaining isolated, then how could I possibly turn a blind eye after all my misses thus far?!

Stomping to catch up before he reaches the elevator, ignition coming to my lungs, I cannot cleanse my features of tension. "Takeru, please. What is causing you to refuse my aid so adamantly?"

"… Is it that hard to get? I got left behind."

"By whoever gave you the blade, I assume? Is- Is that so…" Never did I think I'd see such vanishing dejection imprinted into his features, enough to swallow any and all words, any and all light from his eyes. "However, that does not equal-"

"When duty calls, those of noble blood will always answer. And while I would stand close in support, I… don't know if I can take that again, to be discarded. That's all, I am just acting as I think it's best to make the most of my time. I appreciate the gesture, really, I do. But I don't think we'd work together, as fellows or anything else. And going back to who I was will only serve to give false hopes and unwanted problems to whoever still remembers me. They… They don't need me, they never did."

"I see… So you would refuse me, despite my honesty, despite being given a blade," despite being trained by Mother… You would turn your back on us, when I… when I wouldn't mind… when I am here, offering myself to you?! "Why? Why would you be so stubborn?"

"Heh, look who's talking," he smiles back as he presses the button, calling the elevator.

"Do not jest! I am honestly offering you my support, truly I am," I state, getting closer, seeking his eyes.

"… And what of those who would use that against the fellowship? Not everyone is as noble as you, Meiya. When it was time for actions and not words… both of them threw me away."

"… Both of them?" I ask, a brow twitches.

"You see… I know it ain't fair. To put all the blame, all the responsibility on their shoulders," he tells, slowly placing both hands behind his head once more. "To accept your help, to maybe be stupid enough to fall for you… would be to call upon those same issues, to force a painful decision onto people I only wanna help."

"Huh? Wait, do you remember someone from your past? Wait, in that case-"

"The thing is, you see, things didn't work out then, probably won't work out now."

"Urgh! Why? Can you be clear for once?"

He looks back, staring. Slowly, he reveals a smile. "Because I was blessed with true, pure love when I was little. So I know that you're right, when you're truly set on your road… even if the whole Group would stand in opposition… things would work out somehow. But here… Sigh… The burdens they carry are different, and knowing what's ahead for me it would not be fair on them, to force the matter."

"… So you do recall something. Is this about… who you spoke during the end of the sim battle?" I ask, licking my lips to vanquish the quiver as my feet edge closer.

"Shooting stars are forever fated to burn down, Meiya. Getting closer to one means you'll get burned, too. So, if you truly care, please don't make this harder on me. I already know it's better for me to remain alone, so just… I dunno, I don't know anymore," with a sigh, he turns around towards the door that slides open.

"Wh- Wait, please! I'm only- Is there truly is no way for you to welcome my words, Takeru?"

"… Go and ask 1st Lt Tsukuyomi if darkest fire could ever reside near the midnight sun, see what she answers."

"Huh? Wait, that wording-" N-No, there is no way… D-Does he know? "Takeru, what does that-"

"Go and ask her, tell her whatever you want about our little discussion. Just remember, that the answers that you seek are not always the ones you wanna hear. I already… know that well enough. And once you get your answer, stick to following the 1st Lt advice, okay?" With nothing but a slow, dejected wave of a hand he says as he walks into the elevator.

"Very well, so I shall do. However… At the least, tell me why. Why do you believe you cannot be my fellow?"

"… Because the blue fire already erased its sweetness. Because the purple one won't ever have that sweetness."

"Huh?"

"And as of now…" he chuckles, throwing himself onto the wall, smiling as he looks up, "I have seven little bunnies to look after. Sigh… Later, Mitsurugi," he waves, closing his eyes.

The doors slide close, only the chime echoes for a moment.

Before I inhale sharply and turn on my heels, constrict both throat and fingers as I begin rushing towards Tsukuyomi's room.

He recalled something, something which is bringing Takeru much anguish. Something tied to his lost data and memories, that he believes could hamper Sister's and the XO's standing. And what he mentioned just now… sweetness. Isn't that… how Tsukuyomi described Mother's gaze? Blue and Purple fire… He cannot… There is no way in which he knows, right?

He still welcomed a talk, he requested my aid right now! I know not what this is about, but I shall try regardless. Not only for the squadron, but, well.

Lips twist, gaze sinks, steps slow down. I sigh, feeling my heartbeats rising to the base of my neck.

"Worry not, Takeru. I shall clear whatever concerns you now harbor. And then, we can… continue this talk about your fellowship at a latter point."

… Assuming he agreed to my proposition, of course. T-To be fellow guards, that is. Although, I wonder, who were those who you loved? Who could have been the one that still has your heart captive? Going by his wording and concerns… Someone with much responsibility… I-It couldn't be Tsukuyomi, could it? The cousins, perhaps?

No! Focus, myself! For now, there is only one thing to do. Report this to Tsukuyomi, so that she can extend official aid to both Takeru and the XO. And with a stomp of my heels, I resume my march.

Steering in the Undercurrents

Chapter 94:

Steering in the Undercurrents

---

December 6th. Right before 8 PM.

(Barracks. Mana's Room.)

[Mana]

---

"Pacifying her took me many minutes, which is why I could not receive your call until so late an hour," Maya admits, the delayed spaces in between words lending credence to the telling. For the ice cage to be cracking in such manner, she must be truly exhausted as of now.

"I see… Is Her Highness still, well, adusted at the state of affairs?"

Considering I could not convince Kouzuki to arrange another call it would not be odd for her to remain upset at this turn of events. I did an utmost effort to relay that Takeru had started to recall certain matters and was welcoming of the cousins' presence, and that the ESPer is actually looking after him to douse any worries that might have lingered in her mind, yet Yuuhi-sama remained most cold and cutting, ending our conversation while employing one-word answers. My insistence so that she remains steadfast, due to what the cousins reported and how… how it would seem you truly do recall everything now, only helped so much if Maya's tone is any indication.

"Sigh… Not openly, at least," she relents, I cannot help but to share the groaning in concern. "Everything points to Kouzuki taking your words seriously enough that the approval for the UN to join in the evacuation efforts should already have arrived at their HC. That has alleviated Yuuhi-sama's concerns, albeit not diminished her desire to speak once more with… him," her voice fades, a strong exhalation can I hear through the speakers, hurried steps and a slow closing door. "On that regard, do you have anything else to report on his condition?"

"No, today was a most calm day, truth be told. His performance at early morning was… astounding to say the least, if the cousins' words are to be believed. He was kept busy in some sort of special assignment once again until the late afternoon, yet his interactions with both Mion and Shion have been pleasant according to them."

… There's also the fact that he was not present in the detention barracks but instead came from the underground, but that is a detail that will only serve to overburden Yuuhi-sama's already toilsome state so I shall omit it for the time being. And if his warning is indeed correct, more considering what he told Meiya-sama moments ago then, ensuring Yuuhi-sama remains undisturbed is a priority for us. Sigh… If only you would grant us an honest talk, Takeru. If only…

"I see," Maya says, the drop in tension of rapids reaching low and stable ground. "Was there anything worth mentioning today?"

"As a matter of fact, yes," even if only to give some respite to Yuuhi-sama's heart. "It would seem that Takeru's welcoming attitude towards Meiya-sama has not diminished, only changed due to, well, whatever it is he is recalling."

"Is that so? Was she able to hold a conversation with him?"

"If only for some brief moments, it seems. Meiya-sama did confirm his memories seem to be gradually returning, as he now seems rather troubled about their disagreements of late. She aimed to apologize over her folly, yet he was not dismissive or aggressive. Even said it was not necessary despite insisting on keeping his distance from her. I believe this newfound disquiet he feels is caused due to her resemblance to Yohime-sama."

Even if he probably is only aiming to not entangle Meiya-sama into his own woes. Still, for him to refer to his own person as darkest fire once again… It's confusing. If such is the path to be taken, why remain employing such cryptic words? Tilting the chair back to the ground, a hand covers and spreads all over my nape.

"And now that he's regaining fragments of his past, the confusion Takeru now feels is understandable," Maya repeats a sigh, voice fading, diminishing as the vanishing light of an afterglow.

Resting against the wood, slowly biting onto the takoyaki and enjoying the light burning of the spices, I can only share the silent dejection.

It is one very concerning matter to know he believes the, ahem, vows he and Yuuhi-sama exchanged were broken, although his fury at being left behind is not without warrant. If he has recalled it all, then… then perhaps he's once more dejected at what was done during those days, or at how the aftermath was resolved in his absence. Perhaps, believing Yuuhi-sama wouldn't welcome his return, thinking we only desire him as a shadow. And being more than clear that he is aware that, should his prior identity be restored, Yuuhi-sama will be placed in quite the burdensome position. Thus, he tries to remain useful to us from within the UN? Is he then gauging Kouzuki's response to his current standing to see whether she's worth his trust? Sigh… Predicting Takeru's moves has been hard since he was a child, I doubt I could attempt to do so as of now.

… Even if I admit I am concerned on this matter of the 'three mistakes' he desires to avoid. However, Meiya-sama did say that, while Takeru regressed into his shell once more during their talk, he mentioned that he did not wish to repeat a certain error a third time. That he had already been in more than one relationship.

If Yuuhi-sama was one, who was the second mistake? I can hazard a guess… but reporting such words is bound to invigorate already voracious blazes. Not to mention, ruin Maya's evening. While I believe the words to not imply what Meiya-sama believed, I know how they will be taken. Sigh… Always leaving me to clean up the mischief of your actions… If only you'd smile and prepare me a nice drink as you always used to.

Tilting my chair backwards, ever so slightly so that I do not repeat a fall, I look upwards as my lips twist for a moment. "However, not all are bad news."

"Hm? Did he mention anything positive?" Maya inquires, alert, restoring her usual tone.

"It seems Takeru is aware that… his situation could place Her Highness in jeopardy, and thus, believes he should remain as he is now. While this reticence is of course a concern, I think that the fact he is taking Yuuhi-sama's standing into account instead of openly rejecting our helping hand as before is a clear sign in our favor. In due time, I'm certain he'll see we do not hoist ill intentions towards him."

"I see… Is that so? That is, indeed, good to hear. Sigh…"

Oh, Maya. Why can you not be open with me?

"In any case," she coughs, regaining the habitual edge, "how is it that he expressed such views? Did Meiya-sama inquire into his situation or were the cousins who did so?"

"Due to desiring his forgiveness after lashing out during yesterday's bout, Meiya-sama's pressure spurred such a counterargument from his lips on their own, of how his position could bring issues to Her Highness' standing. As far as she told me, their talk started with-"

Maya groans every so often, asking me to repeat certain words as the light scribbling of a pen reaches my ears from the other side of the line. I slowly finish my meal during the telling of the report I received, avoiding certain taxing topics as I do.

Still, perhaps once the dust settles he can explain his motives for acting in such an enigmatic way. I comprehend Takeru's desire to not bring issues to either Her Highness or Alt IV, however, to refuse to approach us and instead rely on hidden messages… The shadow I knew would not dally nor hesitate in addressing an issue, even when chained by the lightning.

It either means there is an enemy within the base, which I doubt, or he cannot risk approaching us openly. Perhaps… because requesting our open aid could place them both at risk, cause Kouzuki to delve into his motives until he either acquiesces to her inquiries or she forces the answers out of him. If Takeru so desired, his identity could now be cleared… yet Yuuhi-sama would indeed be placed in quite the difficult position if she tried to restore Takeru to his rightful place. If those snakes still roam our soil, then his presence could work against Kouzuki… or perhaps, Kouzuki could work to his favor. I admit, if he stays here and cooperates with us in the investigations, we could ensure they're removed from the nation.

Unless, of course, he preferred to handle that matter on his own hands to avoid burdens and friction to come to the UN.

… And yet, as Maya resumes her piling inquiries on his complexion and words, I cannot help but to wonder on Meiya-sama's questions as I rest a hand onto the wood, bite onto the last takoyaki ball and feel the scorching spread within my lips.

Why bring her to me? To ensure she doesn't get closer to you? To have her become the shadow you believe you can no longer be? I do admit her rather intense fixation onto you is concerning, and perhaps you noticed it too. Yet, to react with those adusted words…

Still, there is one matter in which I also desire answers. Where and how was he inflicted such scars on his person. Meiya-sama also inquired about those, and I doubt me playing dumb did much to assuage her concerns. It truly resembles being under the Hida Dojo's waterfall late at night, to be on the receiving end of her doubtful stare.

Yet, I still know not what to make of said scars. Raiho-sama claims Maya inflicted those grievous wounds upon him before the day he regained consciousness, whereas Maya would in no way do such a thing, not even in her worst days during the invasion. And it was from that day onward, wasn't it? That you changed, that you started blazing dark. That you stopped smiling at all, started referring to us by rank, calling Yuuhi-sama as Her Highness as well…

"Was there anything else worth mentioning from her words or his affairs?" Maya asks, breaking my focus.

"Ahem… Only that it seems Takeru is showing some reticence towards welcoming Meiya-sama's words, as it would seem his ideas do not match with hers."

"Well… Someone such as him would have indeed a hard time seeing eye to eye with a frontal a warrior as Meiya-sama," she shares the sigh, probably the slow nod as well. "Still, he is not showing signs of exhaustion or anything of the sort?"

"No, not openly at the very least," I relent, she groans softly.

I slowly aim for a bottle, drinking a mouthful of refreshment. While I'd like to inquire again, doing so would elicit yet another abrasive retort from Maya, more so after the last encounter she had with Raiho-sama during his talk with Yuuhi-sama.

So I simply shake my head, roll my shoulders. "Either way, Takeru seems to be faring well at the moment. By the by, Maya, what of the request the XO forwarded to me yesterday?"

A sharp breath in, subtle groaning comes up. "Let's just say our Lady is not at all pleased with the notion of sending him to the evacuation efforts so shortly after his awakening."

"Well, that's understandable. I doubt she'd refuse, however?"

"Indeed, she did not," she admits, slow and fading. "Yuuhi-sama already forwarded the permission so that both Mion and Shion can join the efforts, your squadron as well should it be deemed necessary by the XO."

"Sigh… Is that so? I suppose, I should be hearing shortly about the matter then. Was there anything you were wishing to relay?" I ask, taking a small tissue to cleanse my lips while closing the small box in which my meal came.

"No, nothing else…"

"May I ask what has you showing such tiredness, Maya?"

"Well… These days have been exhausting, is all. Between my duties in Kitanomaru, my attempts to keep matters quiet while Tsuhi delves into the archives, and pacifying Yuuhi-sama's mood so that the meetings can proceed smoothly, I've been left with less free time than I desired. Worry not, I am faring well enough."

"Is the arrangement of the databases proving to be complex? If so, perhaps one of the cousins could-"

"There is no need for you to concern yourself over this, Mana," she states, a bit louder, brandishing an iron wall even if only as a show. "The standard data banks are no issue, me and Tsuhi have mostly dealt with them already. The complex task comes… well…"

"Whenever Yuuhi-sama desires to reinstate Takeru as he should be, correct?"

"Sigh… Indeed. Ikaruga-sama has been insisting on meeting with her, due to some proposal to bolster the castle's defenses she already rejected beforehand and to debate on the approval for the testings the XO proposed, yet finding excuses to delay the matter has been growing harder every day…" she relents, slowly splintered in image of a rock in a desert by dusk.

"In that case, do not let me hold you any longer. Please do rest well, Maya."

"Sigh… I still must ensure Yuuhi-sama is doing so before me, or have Tsuhi do so. Regardless, this report was more than welcomed, Mana. Stay strong, and if anything happens do not hesitate to contact me."

"Likewise. Good night, Maya," I sigh as she simply gives her thanks and cuts the call, shrugging as I tilt back the chair. "As hurried as usual, huh. However, her distress is understandable. I cannot imagine what might happen if his identity or the issues of the databases were to come to light. Perhaps not even due to whatever Ikaruga is seeking with this pressure, but with how the Diet will react. After all… they did not hesitate when demanding Meiya-sama to be handed over to the UN as a political gesture… Pah."

Sighing once again, returning the chair to the floor, slumping onto my desk and playing with my hair, I can only close my eyes and enjoy the silence, the slight burning prickling at my inner lips.

If only we could find a method with which to resolve these issues without risks… Takeru is aware of the situation and is why he insisted to both me, the cousins, and Meiya-sama to remain still for the moment. While it would seem you truly almost lost your temper under her questioning, the words you employed… Darkest fire which will never reside near the midnight sun…

Meiya-sama did seem to have withheld something, as she did reiterate that question. How truthful could it be that he had made those two mistakes, avoiding eye contact as she did so as well. Sigh…

"However, if you think such is the role you must play then, keeping Meiya-sama away from you might indeed be for the best. It does seem contradictory," a hand traverses my hair as I stand, sighing as I remove my gloves, the pieces of my dress, "if you desire to remain hidden, why not approach us and return to Yuuhi-sama's side? If you do not wish to repeat those mistakes, why then refer to yourself as the fire once more? Sigh… Just what are you thinking about, Takeru?"

I only hope you're being treated fairly by Kouzuki, that she is not warping your ideas into believing you must remain away to keep us safe. With some luck, this evacuation will proceed smoothly and we can arrange a call between you and Yuuhi-sama afterwards.

… And please stop sending such arduous tasks my way, Takeru. Do you have any idea how hard it was to placate Meiya-sama's incessant inquiries? I shall be asking you to repay these efforts tenfold.

Removing my undershirt, folding it all together and placing the uniform into the locker, I sigh as I endow my night attire and flick the switch off. And yet, I simply sit over the sheets, allow the silence, the minute shiver to wash over me as I throw my back onto the bed.

"You better remain safe… and not do anything odd during the evacuation. If not for us, at least for Yuuhi-sama's own composure…"

… However, it is a concern. If he refuses the notion to return as he once was, desiring to remain hidden due to the threats that in wait lie, what is his plan then? If the scars time etched unto his heart are still open, if the adusted wrath yet resides in you, why are you keeping quiet? Waiting, for what exactly?

The only time when he did something of the sort, when he distanced from everybody else while speaking in riddles… when neither me, Maya, Yuuhi-sama, Raiho-sama, nor any of his comrades could tell what was going on in his head…

Embracing my own arms as I sink my feet under the sheets, I hide my face into the pillow, turn myself into a cocoon. Because for every stumbling he faced, for every battle he braved through, there was one time, one accursed time when he stalwartly refused any and all aid.

That accursed August 5th, that accursed sortie you kept secret from everyone except a few.

---

Same Day. Half an hour or so earlier.

(Cylinder's Room.)

[Takeru]

---

"… And thanks to the brave man, Crimson Raiding Hood and her granny were saved from the big mean wolf. They then enjoyed the sweet treats she was bringing to her grandma, sharing a pleasant dinner. The end," I slowly help both ends of the book to meet, resting it on my lap afterwards. "So, what do you think of the story?" Looking her way, the frozen expression doesn't change in the slightest. Sigh…

"… Um, Takeru-san," Kasumi edges closer, leaning to whisper, "how did the old lady survive? Wasn't she eaten by the wolf?"

"Well, yeah, but…"

Pressure on my arm, a soft groaning follows. "Wolf didn't chew… so she was safe…" Sumika says under her breath, subtly shaking. "To eat you have to bite… not to just swallow…"

"Yeah, that is true, Sumika," slowly saying the words, resting her head onto me again does not dispel the shaking nor the enforced grip on my arm. "But she was fine in the end, so that's what matters. They all could-"

"No… You'll get eaten, there's no survival."

"S-Sumika, calm down. It's okay, there's-"

"No, no, you'll get chewed, you'll be eaten…"

"C-Come on, please, I'm right here. There's nothing to fea-"

Suddenly, she wraps her hands around me, gripping at my back. Again repeating the same things over and over, just like during last loop. Thrashing into me like an incoming wave, water knocking me below and forcing me to choke, losing stable footing and falling. Ears ring, my back burns as she claws, and grips, and pulls, and hurts the more and more her screams turn to shrieks, shrieks turn to wailing.

"I-It's alright… I'm here, no one will harm you," I barely manage to say as an arm covers her back, halts her outbreak for a second before she begins to retaliate into my chest. Enduring her pincer-like raking on my back, biting back the pain, I caress her hair, rub the back of her head, keep my hold light, all to no avail.

"It looks like… she isn't collapsing," Kasumi says, from a safe distance, wincing a bit. "Should I call the Professor?"

"N-No… Give me a sec here," trying to sit straight again, keeping the wild whirlwind at bay somehow, I lean onto her shoulder as I hug her with both arms. "Say Sumika, do you like the moon?"

A whiff, a small stutter in her breathing. A second in which the outbreak ceased.

"Did you know that people can be connected through the moon? If you both look at it, your gazes will link under the same sky. Right?"

"The moon… gazing at it…" she whispers, the automatic impact delivery of both arms and legs ceases, leaving only a gentle shaking on her shape as it sinks and limps onto my arms, spreading over her like wings of shielding a pigeon from a storm.

"Yeah. By looking at it when its full, no matter how far away we are, we'll always be connected through the moon… Isn't that right?"

Slowly, so slowly, the pressure on my back comes undone, the tide pulls back. Fading away, the wails turn to pleads, pleads to whispers, whispers to stitched syllables until her head collapses onto me.

So I keep on rustling her hair, swaying her ever so slightly, humming to her ear. "It's okay, don't be scared… You're not alone anymore, no one will harm you."

"Takeru-chan… Don't leave me, don't go, don't go…" a hushed voice, a scarred slurring of the words which entangle into an unintelligible plea. Drowning in a droplet for real, curling up into fetal position as I shift her body to better hold the full weight that falls on me. "You'll get hurt- No, don't go away… Please don't- I'll fight for you, so don't-"

"Shh, shh… There, there, it's alright, Sumika. Close your eyes, listen to my heartbeat. I am here, and I won't be going anywhere any time soon. Don't worry, we're safe here…"

I send a look to Kasumi, who nods and goes to put the cables in place, prep up the pod. It took a while, a long one, until the episode subsided, until the shallow breaths and whispered pleas ceased on their own. Once Kasumi confirmed it was fine to make the shift to Safe Mode, we slowly got Sumika off me and placed her in the pod, whirring coming to life afterwards along erratic Christmas-like lights shining.

Resting a hand on the glass as I sigh, knees quiver, ankles try and betray me for a sec as a jolt envelops my legs. None of the books are doing anything for her, the games ain't working either. At this rate…

A small tug on my arm, a soft groaning. "Do not be so distraught, Takeru-san. You're still making much progress."

You think? I am not so sure about it myself, to be honest.

" Yes, you are. I could see the memory more clearly this time, the living room you were sitting in, the same small version of yourself I saw in the dreamscape, and the silhouette of your father in his attire of the IRG. Please, don't lose heart, " she tells with a nod, giving me a smile.

Uuh… You're so sweet, my little angel… What would I do without support?

" T-Takeru-san, stop. That's embarrassing…"

Huh? Oh, wait. Kasumi, are you reading my mind again?

" Eh? Ah!" She flinches, letting go and taking a step back, giving a fast, minute bow. "My apologies, I did not notice. I wasn't doing it on purp-"

"It's cool, I know," I smile back, petting her head as her bunny ears flap a few times. "So you think she's progressing?"

"Yes, as I said, I could see the memory far more clearly this time. I believe we're on the right track," she nods, stealing a gaze at Sumika, walking closer to the pod. "After all, her reaction was again one of fear and she did react to both your words during the reading and to that mention of the moon. By the way," her bunny ears flap as she tilts her head, "what was that about?"

"… A silly parallel, nothing more."

"A parallel of what?"

"Sigh… Of an old, broken promise, nothing more."

When I thought it was romantic to part ways by using the stars as a metaphor. That even if we were far, far away, so long as our gazes were seeking the other across space we would never be truly alone.

… Little did I know, the damage those stupid words would end up causing. But hey, what's a more iconic duo than me and fucking things up through naivete? If things will just fall apart… simply say farewell and that's it. Take the loss, stop forcing people to be chained to a mistake. Sigh…

"U-Um…" another slow pull on my sleeve, weaker, softer, like a frail breeze that can barely caress the leaves. Kasumi tries and return my gaze, she recoils back, fading to the ground as her lips fold inwards. "Why are you… so worried now? What is making you feel so much pain?"

"Huh? I'm fine, Kasumi."

"Don't lie," the ears flap again, a small cross her brows form as she stares for a sec. "Your aura is growing dim, foggy, and all blue… like it was in the middle of the dream. Is this… something about your life in this world?"

"Hahaha, no, no, it ain't about that," I shrug, chuckling as I play with her hair again, try and lift the seriousness over her features. "It's nothing but the last mistake I made… as the final curtain was about to fall down. Nothing else, nothing more. Ain't worth talking about it." Much less with you, of all people.

"I… I see…"

"… Well, anyways, I'll leave Sumika in your care. Are you sure she didn't improve much at all today?"

"Yes, she remained screaming kill and wanting to spend her time training to murder the BETA. She didn't show any hints of emotion, much less react as she did while you read us the books," she affirms, limply dropping the hold over my sleeve, taking a step away.

"What did you feel on her heart? Just fear?"

"Hmm…" she closes her eyes, moving her bunny ears up and down for a while. "It was all messy. But fear was the strongest emotion governing her thoughts, yes."

"I see… Well, don't take it too hard on yourself, either. It is already late, so make sure you don't stay up late writing the report, okay?" I pet her head, she relents a nod, lips pursing as her bunny ears flap for a while.

"I won't. You too, Takeru-san. Don't stay up too late helping the Professor."

"Heh, easier said than done. Anyways, I'll go give her my report so don't push yourself tonight. See you tomorrow," I wave back, going towards the creepy hallway.

Kasumi returns the wave, slowly turning towards the pod, simply standing still as she gazes at it.

With the heavy echo of my footsteps, I traverse the dark and creepy hallway, rolling my shoulders, a few lines of pain searing as I do. Sigh… Still, not all is bad news. If Sumika is reacting somehow, that'll be a deterrent to keep the XO from doing anything stupid. Also, as an unexpected surprise, Kasumi couldn't scan my mind as I thought of our farewells. The emotions were too intense, too deep probably. So if it isn't some surface level pondering, she can only see the shift in my aura, huh.

"… Good to know, good to know indeed."

---

Some minutes before.

(Yuuko's Office.)

[Yuuko]

---

… The support for the Sakhalin frontline seems to be already arranged, the flights for the coming test of the XM3 are already prepared for a trial run tomorrow morning, and the Valkyries are also ready for both this run and the evac efforts.

Quickly clicking away to another diagram, I rub an eye at the report. Isumi is still finding issues to adapt Shirogane's moves to their trainings, huh. There's also the fact Yashiro reported Hayase and Munakata, but more predominantly the former, have been attempting to see his sim runs at night. Well, not like I didn't expect the connection to be drawn, but it's still bothersome. He'll handle it well enough if she ever tries to approach him, surely.

… And yet, none of the results gained today do anything to the plans he presented yesterday. Sigh… While Takeru did perform better than expected, a mere show against other pilots won't be enough to gain an agreement for the XG line. Not to mention, the reports from Yokosuka show no progress on locating the stray BETA that are supposedly roaming the mainland.

The Diet cannot have that issue be brought to light, neither the UN.

It instead could be used to forward an aggressive proposition to evacuate Japan, to have another Gwangju. If the pressure is inflicted, the issues revealed, then the coup proceeds as I imagine, the Empire will have little excuses left to employ.

With the instability of the nation taken as fact, support for Alt IV might dwindle, deadlines and requests enforced onto me.

A sigh extends and reaches the hands that loom over the keys as my eyes remain locked onto a particular report. Mitsuko-nee confirmed that we do have the agreement to sortie for the evacuation, along another little matter.

How the HC is again inquiring into Takeru's standing and situation. Not only that, but the Security Council is demanding, demanding answers for the request for a mission. The two little accidents didn't do much to distract them, in the end.

Throwing myself against the seat and closing my eyes, a hand tends to my temple as I slowly spin. Another sigh hollows me out, coldness at the tip of my toes, a shiver that crawls up.

Without the XG, Sadogashima won't be a success.

If the Empire is destabilized, no one in their right mind would think of granting me even a bolt of the XGs. And not to mention, further requests over the safety of the base would be placed onto the demands under 'concerns of another uprising'.

Sight blurs, merely placing my heel on the floor to propel the spinning causes contraction, pain into my ankle. A soft ringing echoes in my ears as I slump into a hand, into the seat.

… Should I try and convince him to fully support me, then? Takeru should know what we're up against, yet still refuses to go through the motions. It's true, it will be difficult to safeguard his position yet… yet if these readings on the 00 Unit do not lie then, once I figure out how to properly-

Knocking on the door, makes me flinch and try to stand straight. Only to feel binding pain on my lower legs, paralyzed and stiff. Groaning as I rub them for a moment, brushing my hair for another, I unlock the door and slowly stand.

He slides into the office, dodging the papers and books, and not a single mote of emotion remains on his face as I remain watching him while I fiddle with the coffee machine.

"So, how did it go?" Takeru asks, hands in his pockets while pacing closer to the desk. Straight to business without any attempts at the usual idle talk, not unwelcomed but still bothersome.

"Ahem… The numbers seem to indicate there was some stress put onto the 00 Unit," I note, licking my lips, hearing a low sound as I try and stand straight.

Once our mugs are filled, I hand him his and then go back to my desk. There is something… odd about his complexion. Takeru has been in an ill mood since his little nap, yet I expected more signs to show up in his face after what seemed to be another overload. There's also how he did not contact me at all today, while it seems he arranged the matters of his consoles and weapons back at his office.

The warm bitterness meets my lips, yet it does not burn. Unlike the cups he offers when I wake up, brewed to almost perfection. And while the line of lukewarmness ignites my posture to its usual, the caress within my lips aiding my relaxation… the same does not happen in him. If anything, he seems to be sinking more and more, resting both arms on his legs, minimal movements to propel the coffee to his lips. Concerned over something grave, something that he can't stop mulling about?

Closing my programs and then the notebook, I rest the cup on the wood. Entwining my fingers to rest my chin onto them, I lean forward and stare. "What happened, Takeru ?"

Shrugging as he scratches the back of his head, he slowly begins giving me the report. Small breaks, pauses to drink and look away, to settle on a word. He does not show any hints, while I simply remain watching and listening, finishing my drink before he does.

"… And after that episode, we could safely make the shift to Safe Mode. We connected her to the pod shortly after."

"Is that so… I see, I see…"

"Anything odd on your end?"

"Oh, no, it's not that. I'm simply surprised, is all. I had the 00 Unit do some intensive training today, and anger was all I could get out of it," rolling my eyes, I spin away. "Its ODL was replenished fully before you arrived, so to see it depleting so fast… is a good sign," I smirk and nod back at him, resting my still interlocked fingers onto my stomach. "If she is struggling, it means the emotions are true, deep ones. And if it did not devolve into wrath, then it is trying to assimilate the memories. The readings on its support systems do indicate a more dramatic exertion, more akin to a full panic attack, so I suppose you're doing a decent enough job at this, Takeru," I assert with a nod.

He barely reacts, merely returns the nod. "Good to know, I guess. So, anything else you'd like to share?"

"Hm? Of course, there's much to talk about. First things first, thanks for the show of might earlier, you really helped my case," I chuckle, folding my arms.

"You know, you could have told me I was gonna pilot the XM3 again today," he complains, eyes narrowing as he goes for a final sip.

"Can't do that. You need to be in the dark, to avoid links to be formed. Also, while I appreciate you being serious, try and not demolish your squadmates so savagely from on."

"Sigh… We need them to be better, so I will aim to have them improve for real from now on. If the Instructor has a problem with my moves then-"

"I've got your back on that, don't worry. Just don't be so decisive, walk by them instead of ahead of them. Sounds good to you?" I ask, smiling. He sighs, shrugging as he rests the mug onto the table. "Good. Now then, I already received the approval to deploy the younger Tsukuyomis to the relief efforts along you six."

"Huh… Quite faster than expected."

"Well, I guess Her Purpleness doesn't want her dear stepbrother getting hurt, huh," I remark, giving him a sideglance.

And he doesn't even flinch. "So, did they agree with the petition?"

"Yes, easy enough. Takamura also agreed, so we're all covered on that front as well," I nod, walking up and aiming for his mug. Yet as he raises it to hand it over I do not pull to take it, nor do I let his eyes escape from mine. Remaining looming over him, tilting my back just a tiny bit, until I see the dead stare reflected back at me in his eyes. "Will this be enough to show you my commitment to your ideas?"

He does not blink nor twitch, he simply gives a subtle upwards nod. "For now, yes, it shall suffice, XO."

"Sigh… For the last time, it's Yuuko," can't help but to shrug my lips and look away, leave the mugs as always before I crash into my seat, into another harsh spin. "Now then, could you tell me what the daily argument with Mitsurugi was about?"

One of his brows twitches, he crosses his arms and faces away from me. "Don't make it sound like some expected segment of a show or something."

"Then, what was it about?"

"She just wanted to apologize, is all. I had to drive her away when she started pressing for answers of my standing and junk. Nothing you should worry about, XO."

"Yuuko," I remind, narrowing my eyes. "Still, the readings today…" quickly tapping the right buttons, smiling at what the screen returns, "do indicate a more gentle absorption rate. Couldn't you use this to your advantage to get Mitsurugi to resemble the one you favor the most?"

"… First, leaks don't work that way and you know it," he groans, glaring and glacial. "Second, I just don't want to confuse anyone anymore. This world's Meiya is… too different to the one from my world, so reaching a simple agreement to coexist should be enough," he says, then slowly rests onto the sofa, closing his eyes.

"Hmm, is that so. Do you know why she dashed to 1st Lt Tsukuyomi's room as soon as you got into the elevator?"

"Sigh… I told her we should stay away from each other, to not cause any issues. Meiya probably is still going to insist on me becoming her fellow, though," he shrugs, rolling his eyes.

"So you believe that avenue to not be worth pursuing then?"

"Is that what you'd like me to do? Return to the IRG?"

"… I did not say anything of the sort. I'm merely suggesting to gain her support to have you regain your citizenship. Clearing that issue is something we both desire to be resolved swiftly, correct?"

He nods, again fiddling with his hair. "Yeah, but there's little point in getting closer as things stand now. Plus, you should know what I mean with the fellow stuff, Yuuko."

"I know, I know. I was only probing to see if you thought it was worth a shot, nothing else," I rest my hands onto the seat, slowing down the spinning then edging closer to the desk. "So then, does that equal you've chosen to remain here?"

"… Did you remember the poem?" he asks, again somber, again cold.

So I idle a finger on my chin, lightly pressing onto my inner cheek. "No, I haven't. However, I did see… figments of other times. You thrashing about to hand me some souvenirs of some sort, I believe. By the by, why were you so aggressive back then?" I lean forward, staring.

He turns away, shrugging his lips. "I've told you enough about that world."

Hmm… World. Singular.

Despite all the loops he should have undergone, he refers to that result as a singular experience. Why is that? Why show such reticence to gain my support? I believe, everything points to us becoming allies in that possible branch. While the concern over worsening the ripples of causality is fair and all, aren't I his greatest ally to mend said collateral damage?

… Why are you still refusing to look back into my eyes, Takeru ? What fears are plaguing your mind? Well, if you won't come to me… let me go to you, hehe.

"In any case," I clear my throat, rolling my shoulders, "allow me to inform you of my preliminary conclusions regarding your reports on Operation 21st and Iceberg. There are some details I want some clarification on," nodding his way, the graphs I worked on flash towards the monitors in the wall, I stand and signal him to come closer.

And for a moment, as I tell my opinions and queries, he returns to his usual loose posture, the open and forward chest facing out, eyes that do not flee, hands and arms that remain relaxed and quiet as do his lips. Battered as a desert, yet quiet by nighttime.

"… So, if you do believe we need the extra manpower, is there no way we could safely attain the IRG's support?"

"You do know they won't deploy in time anyways," he repines, slightly frowning. "The IRG will always sortie last, to be the 'saviors' of the day. And that's what they do best, really. If you want the G-Elements of the hive, saving the Takemikazuchis for then is the key."

"Why? I assume you took part in some hive raid in a Type-00?"

"… Simply believe me when I say that, so long as we keep a stable supply line, the Takemikazuchis will be enough of a backup plan if the third blast fires and you still want the spoils," he tells, low, standing straight and stiff.

"I see… Yet, for that to happen, we need both the XGs and the support of the Empire. Was your performance on the XM3 trials similar to this morning's bout?"

"No, because now I do remember my best moves and I didn't freak out," he nods back, then sighs and looks away, again scratching the back of his head and neck. "But I get what you're asking, and no, I don't think we'll make do with a simple live show."

"So we'll need to… arrange a proper show of might?"

"If you see no other solution," a sudden breath in, eyes that expand and seek no other target, Takeru takes a step closer, "make sure no unneeded casualties happen."

"Worry not, nothing of the sort will happen, to Marimo or anyone else. So, well, we'd have to-"

"Release the BETA, yes. The yanks accept nothing but facts, and sadly that's what is gonna take for the XGs to come to you. By the way, what did you have in mind to have us graduate in time?"

"You already know," I simply state, his expression tightens, so I then take a step closer, "in the board we face, there is only a handful of solutions that will grant Alt IV the stability it requires to bear fruit. And before anything," patting his shoulder, the premature release of words halts and his lips remain sealed, "your warnings do seem to apply to this world as well."

"… Then, you're going through with the coup?" he inquires, never blinking.

"The only reason I am aiding with the relief efforts is because your situation with Her Highness requires us to stay in her good graces. There are other sparks that could cause a downwards spiral into chaos, and a predicable accident would be preferred to unhinged confusion. Still," I lean closer, he twitches and tries, dares to escape until by my grip his shoulder is kept in check, "if you deem it such an issue, we could test the waters by having you regain your citizenship."

"… You mean to scout the enemies that will try and strike at you through me?"

"And whatever idiots have a problem with the cadet that opened the pigeon's cage," I smile, circling over him, tracing his neck with my fingertips while I stand behind. "There are many issues I need clarity on, and you could help in those matters. It appeases your dear Yuuhi, works to give us intel on the landscape we face, and will ensure none of our future moves meet with failure. So, would that seem agreeable to you, Takeru ?" resting onto his backside, treading his hair, I whisper the query.

And he remains still, saying nothing. Lowering his shoulders as a sigh leaves, he shakes me off slowly. "Is that your answer then?"

"What of yours?" I walk into his sight, again brushing my fingers against his arm.

"… I already told you we cannot bring any more problems to Her Highness," he asserts, stepping away from grasping distance, almost stumbling over his own feet.

"Hmm, is that so. Certainly you won't-"

"I know we need to take measures that bring change, yes, even if it means clashing with those who support Alt V. But my past will bring problems to-"

"I am enough to shield you, Takeru. And you should know that."

"Yeah, and what of Yuuhi? What do you think will happen if she having a baseborn stepbrother is revealed?"

Taking step closer, and another, until he meets the sofa and cannot escape anymore, I tilt my back until our eyes are at the same height, until there is a twitch in his otherwise immutable features. "Why would such a thing reach the light? I can deal with those issues."

"And bring further burdens upon yourself?"

"You're worth the cost, and the intel we'll gain doubly so. Isn't that why you asked me to think about the little poem?"

"I wasn't- That's not what I meant, and you know it," he edges away, sighing, deflating. Sinking further, all the signs that lurked in threat just below the surface remaining as such, for some reason.

"… Are you still upset?"

"Huh? About what?"

"Oh, come on. You were clearly avoiding me during the meeting at morning, and now you're again taking on the same posture. Out with it, what is it with you?" stepping closer to him, hands on my hips, I stare.

Yet he raises a brow, squints his eyes. "I've no clue what you're on about now."

"So you're not upset we kissed yesterday?"

"Wh- Mmgh… Sigh. Bothered, yeah. Did you get what you wanted out of it?" he clicks his tongue, turning away, folding his arms. Eyes remain squinted, lips contorted as if facing an incoming downpour. Displeased, much.

"No, since I can't recall what the poem was yet. Still, all in due time. For the moment, ensuring your safety should be our priority. So Takeru, what is your answer to my proposed idea?"

"… Are you going to give me your answer, then?"

"Will you stay by me? If yes, you already know my answer," I smile back, giggling a bit at the minute shock that sends him into a few steps back. "Why are you fleeing, Takeru? It's just us two in the room…"

"Exactly. Can you please stop fucking around and start being serious with me?"

"I'm not fucking with you. Not yet, at least," chuckling as I tap my lips, I sit on the sofa he usually uses. "I am being completely open and honest. So, could you grace me with your reply?" I ask, throwing myself back onto the cushioning, his upside-down figure glaring at me.

"Sigh… Why are you being like this?"

"Just trying to lighten the mood a bit, you're way too stiff and formal. And I do mean what I say before, just so you know."

Slowly walking closer, as slow as a falling leaf, the ashen complexion is all that fills my gaze, the same burnt apprehension he displayed yesterday, the reticence to grow closer or move away. "Yuuko, what is it that you're truly after with this act?"

"… What? It's not an act, however."

"Yeah, right," he shrugs, rolling his eyes. "You of all people being so nice and open, get real. Come on, let's be honest with each other. What do you really want from me?"

"… Is this about that odd matter you mentioned yesterday?" I ask, sitting straight again. He nods, silently watching me. "Then, why not enlighten me on the matter? Help me understand, and I will repay your efforts.

"… You do not do charity, XO. And I know that as soon as I run out of uses, this useless jester will end discar-"

"You're no jester," raising my voice, gripping the sofa, glaring in full, I remain staring as his features do not thaw. "I've told you that you'll be my right hand already, if you remain by me. I assumed this to be in alignment with your wishes?"

"And yet, you still are not telling me the truth," he relents, hunching over a bit.

"… What are you on about now? I told you already, I want to… know what I researched in that world, to quickly put both XGs in working condition and perhaps gain some insight into what has you this preoccupied. Surely," I stand, smile back as I pace closer, "you desire me as your ally?"

"And that's what doesn't make sense, either," he notes, nodding as his arms fold, as he faces away again. "Why would you entangle yourself with me when you're so close to reaching your goals? Discarding me after the 00 Unit is tuned would be in your best interests, after all."

"Do you think it could work without you-"

"Yeah, it totally can. Also, Sumika did try to get me off the Valkyries once," he says, lips regressing, hands shuffling about his arms, straightening and loosening his uniform time and again. "And anyways… you didn't even believe in me by the end of things."

"I am not those versions of myself, remember that well," again leaning closer, lashing out in poison, I poke at his neck. He coils unto himself, but again does not flee neither my touch nor my gaze. "What are you scared of?"

"Are you sure you didn't realize that already?" he inquires, leaning a bit closer, tone and posture turning to stone yet still craving the medusa.

"… I am not the one looping over time-space, there are signs and warnings only you can deliver to me," I admit, the finger traveling up to his chin. "So, tell me already what's in your mind. And no, I won't betray the trust you placed on me. I've no intention to let ruin befall your home world permanently, we are mending the ripples."

A moment of silence, of quietness.

Where his expression grows all the more frozen, yet cracks surface in the dry ice.

Through the white blindness of the mist, a swirling black lurks.

Those pupils, those dilated and crossed pupils that remain locked onto me, not letting me look away, sharing the freezing into my own limbs, leaving that finger at the tip of his jaw.

"Besides the work on the ML-Engine," he begins, slow, barely even moving the lips, "which I'm sure you can recall subconsciously while toying with the XGs, there's only defeat in those worlds waiting for us. And yet, you still insist… despite me asking you to stop, you still insist. So Yuuko," he smiles, showing me his teeth, clenched and compact, as a hand raises to return the poking to my neck, "why don't you stop stalling and tell me straight up… that you want to know how you truly came up with the Nucleus' theory?"

"What… Wait, how did-"

"Oh, no, no, no," a gentle grasp, barbed wings covering my neck, pulling me closer to those two black holes that are now twitching, "no running away, Yuuko. Come on, now. What's up?" he asks, still smiling, sight still crossed, the light hold over my neck reaching my nape, pressing my sides.

"… Takeru, let me go."

"I refuse."

"Wh- It's an order."

He dares, dares to chuckle. "I don't take orders from an equal, Yuuko," he so calmly says, leaning closer. "You want us to work in unison?" thumbs find my chin, a slow circling on my nape, a gradual yet binding massage. "You wanna know so badly what happened in those worlds? Or do you wanna actually recall what my world's Yuuko inherited before everything went to hell?"

"What… Wait, wasn't the little thing that doesn't add up how you could have inherited memories before the conduit was formed?"

That's what I thought he was getting at. That the surge of his identity in this world was not an accident but that he himself was the one living in here since the moment of his birth. If so, what forces sent his data to this world as a unified entity? And what ramifications does that have for his world and the ripples of the conductor? That's what I thought he was getting at, what he wanted to truly mend even at the cost of his erasure. Yet…

Coughing, I try to squirm away. His lock readjusts, not letting me leave, not impeding my breathing, always massaging in a slow rocking while his eyes still remain on mine. "I thought you were concerned over how your existence was assimilated into this timeline. Do you believe the Nucleus' theory to be tied to this matter?"

"You do, and that's what matters," he chuckles, fingers lowering to the base of my neck, continuing their work through the fabric. "You're telling me you did not notice this little thing that should never have been there in the first place?"

"… Gulp. I admit I was curious, but didn't… really think much of- Ah! Mmh… Takeru, stop, not so hard…"

"So you don't mind if it's gentle?"

"Wh- Mmgh… I didn't know you were into this kind of play," I chuckle, smirking and raising a brow, teasing.

Yet, his expression and motions do not falter a tiny bit. "It ain't my fault you people refuse to take a fucking break."

"Oh, we can take a fucking break, if that's what you'd like."

"… Is that what you really want from me?"

"What?"

"Do you really want that from me?" his hands stop, he blinks a few times, saying nothing. "Because you're gonna remember all the awful stuff you went through under Alt V if I give in and stop holding back, you know? You really don't want to recall that Christmas, for real."

"… Memory leaks cannot affect-"

"The XM3's test of last loop begs to differ," he says, finally releasing my neck, stepping back enough that he meets the wall. "Don't underestimate the flow of memories, even if it only manifests as subconscious trauma. It almost cost me my life during the trials last time."

"I see…" licking my lips, running a hand over the warmth imprinted in my neck, moving it and hearing nothing crack, nothing pulling at it in pain from my back, I simply sigh. "So you believe the Nucleus' theory comes from… the worlds in which you fell in love with another me?"

He relents a nod, closing his eyes, placing both arms behind his head. "Yeah, it's from that world."

Hmm, singular. Again. "Then, how do I recall it? What will allow me to-"

"I already told you how to recall that, how and why things might have happened," he says, low, again brushing down his uniform, running a finger over a brow. "And again, it might only come with problems. Don't blame me if you start having nightmares or we call Alt V over our heads earlier."

"So the poem is tied to that theory?" And your thirst for affections as well?

His lips shrug as he looks my way, saying nothing, before a leg crosses over the other as he turns away. "Yeah…"

… Wait a moment. His warning about the memory leaks, the reticence to grow closer upon my teasing, the mention of the poem, the importance he gives to it. Is the catalyst- Ugh… What the- Why is-

Colors.

Swirling and mixing, exploding and contracting. A kaleidoscope rotating onto itself. Dizzy and unfocused, I can no longer feel my limbs. Only a ringing in my ears, a soft pain behind my eyes.

It's cold, all of a sudden. Something… Someone pats my shoulder, wipes my eye, clears my sight.

A relaxed and goofy smile that shrugs at me. "Don't worry, I'm gonna go back to being my idiot self. I can shift gears real quick."

" And that's completely fine. The last thing I need is you trying to understand all of this, anyways…" pressure and pain at the pit of my throat, trying to shut down a coal oven, burning. What is even-

The touch disappears, the smile too. "Yeah, I know. Just make sure not to get any nasty hangovers from now on, I won't be there to catch your fall."

" Shush, you. If that's all… just be on your way."

" Yeah, I'll do just that…"

Those eyes move away, downwards some sort of ramp. There is no salute, instead a gentle and apathetic wave of a hand meets my gaze, burns it. Raising a small smile that cracks and wavers, much akin to a leaf dangling down into a bonfire.

"… Farewell, Yuuko."

And then he turns around, and simply leaves. Saying nothing else, never turning back, never looking back.

" I see… So you won't even give me one final 'See you later', huh…"

"K-Kgh… Cough ! Cough !"

C-Can't breathe… What's this freezing feeling all over my back?

It pikes, and rakes, and hurts. As if I were kneeling over grains of rice for hours on end, my ankles again fall prey to paralysis.

"H-Hey, what's up?!" Takeru calls out, the hasty approach halts as I raise a hand and look away.

Massaging my neck while supporting myself onto the desk, a few deep breaths manage to subdue the coughing attack. And yet, the snow cloak is not lifting itself off me. On the contrary, it's creeping higher and higher.

What was that? A memory? So vividly? However… The ramp was-wasn't it supposed to-

Running a hand over my face, burying my nails over it, the lone figure by the ramp is shrouded, fading.

…

"A-Are you okay, Yuuko?" Takeru calls out, consternation raiding his prior mask into the ground. "Did you see anything… painful?"

"… What exactly do you believe could I have seen?"

"Well, no idea… You never really told me what was of you in Sendai, and…" scratching his head, he again looks away.

Again, that same face. That same dried leaf, last and lonely leaf falling into the snow, fated to be buried and forever forgotten.

"I'm fine, it was just a… momentary shock, nothing else. A freezing feeling of… resignation, you could say. Clean that expression of your face, I am alright."

"Sigh… I knew this was a bad idea, we really should stay away from each other," he shakes his head, pinching his nose and endowing a grave expression, which does not fit his features at all. "Let's stop talking abo-"

"There's nothing you should concern yourself with, Takeru. It was… similar to prior dejections I've felt, is all. The frustration I feel at the setbacks might be responsible for this, stop drowning in a droplet already," I scold, straightening my uniform, holding his gaze until he nods. " Cough… Now, regarding your prior question, let me take a wild guess," I sigh, leaning back onto my desk, caressing the underside of an ear, swallowing a coughing, "did it happen before the sortie for Iceberg?"

Takeru remains frozen, still, compacting his posture as he watches me silently. Until he finally deigns a nod.

"And the, ahem, intensity of the emotions is what you're most concerned with, correct?"

"Not like that wasn't a given from the start," he shrugs, I frown and he recoils a bit, facing away as if looking at the distant sky… for some reason, it just looks like that.

"Sigh… I assume, a similar reminiscence could happen to others you interact with, so that's why you've chosen to remain silent and cold," he nods, I fold my arms. "Still, while I… suppose I could try and take your warning seriously, I truly had no idea the Nucleus' theory was the result from those worlds."

"It's the only place it can come from," he relents, shaking his head. And again, singular.

"Then, what does this have to do with our plans thus far? I admit I am… more than curious about this phenomenon, however, if it could impair our working relationship or the tuning then… I shall default to your judgment. Why is this a threat, if the effect of the links only grows when around you and we already know of the Nucleus' theory?"

Looking my way, and nowhere else, Takeru slowly steps closer as if thrashing against barbed wires. "… Simple enough. Answer me this. What are your plans for the next 00 unit?"

"Excuse me?"

"Can you answer the question, Yuuko, XO, or whatever mode you're in now?" he insists, ashes rekindling behind his eyes.

"… Was my research taken from me in those worlds?"

"No, you should know people think Alt IV is a con, a laundering scheme," he frowns, rolling his eyes. "But that won't be what happens here, nor was it what happened last loop. And even beyond the coup, the war won't truly end shortly after. So choosing your allies in the Empire will dictate what paths are available to you, what compromises you'll be asked to relinquish."

"And you don't want to support those who once preyed upon us after Alt V was enacted, hmm. Still, surely you can see and understand the progress that the tech has? As well as the structure that was required for it to flourish? I do need to show results about my research."

"And you think a second tuning could come to be with ease? I certainly ain't on board with leaving that tech in the hands of the same pigs that ruined the worlds I looped in, with the chance of them doing… experiments with the possible candidates."

"Morality is only a binding chain, Takeru. I appreciate your concern, but these are matters only I will handle."

"… Then, answer me something else," still frowning, the ice begins to burn from within the cracks, becoming truly upset, "would you be okay with going as far as Alt III went with the ESPers?"

"… I thought you did not know that- Oh, wait, did you recall something?" stepping closer only empowers the thorns that raise, the sting of the ice as he steps back, posture compact and alert.

"Yeah, plenty. Both the giant machines with water, the fucking meds… and what happens when an ESPer overloads," tightly veiling his sight, he punches a bookshelf, biting his lips as his hand reddens. "Is that what you want to bring about? What will be of Sumika after our missions?" Takeru asks, stepping closer, his sight once more crossing behind the molten veil of pure white that is rage.

"Siiigh… If we are to be equals, this talk was going to happen eventually, I suppose," I walk up to my seat, spin on it as the cushioning welcomes my back, he approaches the desk once I lean onto the wood. "Tell me, Takeru. Do you know who Von Braun is?"

"Hmm… I think he was a famous researcher or something?"

"Yes, technically. You see, Von Braun was actually not very smart when he was young. He couldn't do math to save his life, was beyond salvation on the matter."

"… What's with that smile?"

"Oh, nothing, nothing. Just saying. Anyways, the man had a dream. To build rockets and send them into space, as far as they'd go. Odd that you don't know of him, if you were studying to make jets. Did he not exist in your world?"

"I am very good at ignoring information that doesn't catch my attention. I focus on one thing at a time and everything else can be damned. Also, I suck at history so, meh," he shrugs, closing an eye, before reinstating solemnity to reign over the ice. "So, what has this to do with our talk?"

"Well, that he worked hard on surpassing his limitations to see through his dreams. One could say he was obsessed with the idea."

"… A result of the causal pull, huh," he notes with a slow nod.

I smile back, fiddling with my hair. "Exactly. Regardless of causality, he was determined to see his objective to fruition. So, how do you think Von Braun managed to acquire a position to work on rockets and the funding to do so?"

"… I mean, with the space race that happened back home, I suppose he was recruited for something crazy like the Apollo that landed on the moon, right?"

"Well, as far as the general population is concerned, yes, that is the case. Von Braun's beginnings occur before that time, however. As part of the Third Reich's researchers."

"Wh- What?! The guy was with the Nazi?!"

"Yeah, because he wanted to make rockets and the only avenue for his dream was through the military applications said rockets could possess. Why, do you feel like commenting on the matter?"

"… Why are you bringing this up? Some sort of… allegory?"

"No, nothing of the sort. However, after the war ended, Von Braun joined the allies' research, the multi-stage rocket development to be precise," I tap a button in my PC, the diagrams appear in the wall monitors.

"Wait, is that… a Gekishin?" he asks, gaping.

"Its prototype. Do you know who invented the Jump Unit System you're abusing all the time?" smiling at the contortion of his features, I cannot help but to chuckle. "And that is the smallest of his contributions to humanity. Did I ever show you the images of our first picture of the BETA in Mars?"

"Yeah, back when I arrived the first time. Was that guy involved in that too?"

"Of course. Keep this to yourself, but Von Braun was one of the reasons the Daedalus Project was able to be fruitful in the first place. Oh, wait, you don't know what-"

"The thing that found the planet the Migrant Fleet will depart to, if shit hits the fan," he tells, waving a hand while still looking at the old diagrams shown in the monitors, showered in the incoming brightness. "So I guess you're trying to say that, so long as you get to see your objectives realized, you won't hesitate on anything you have to do?"

"… I suppose you know that better than I do, in all honesty. If you told me a few months ago I would place my crew in danger and consider lending a hand in destabilizing the government, I would have shot the messenger right on the spot. And yet, this is the hand we're dealt with and there's little to do," I rest my chin onto a hand, returning his stare as the monitors return to their habitual idle graphs. He says nothing, simply tensing his features, scowling behind the veil, howling within. "If you're displeased, I suppose you could… return to your home world once we're done working together."

"… There is no home for me to go back to."

"What? No home? Wait, what are you talking about?"

"Yuuko, you know I can't go back home without ripples coming after me. It's either erasure or remaining here, forever."

"So you're… saying you'd rather die than to remain working with me?" raising from my seat, taking in a deep breath yet still leaving crumpled, crushed papers behind, I slowly, gradually approach him again.

He remains immutable, still residing behind the veil of neutrality. "I want to make the future smile, can't do that if the stupid warmongers get your research to play with."

"We have to do what we must, and hesitating on our objectives will give us no spoils. Even if some dealings are made with the Devil, Alt IV must see success."

"So you wanna be Von Braun 2.0?" he asks, stepping away, facing away as if repulsed.

"If it saves our world? Yes. Are you saying the outcome of this Ouka mission you've spoken was truly not satisfactory for humanity?"

"There is a catch in your logic, Yuuko," he chuckles, sight once again crossing yet not going back to normal. "If the Axis had won WWII, the man would have continued making rockets for crazy warmongers, rockets that would have delivered nuclear winter to the world if it meant to see his dreams come to fruition. And that reminds me of the Babylon Disaster, a whole lot," still frowning a bit, his lips shift while he idles a hand on his hair, looking away. "Is that how you wanna go? Having your developments be remembered as harbingers of destruction, Holy Mother ?"

Grabbing the neck of his uniform, pulling, bending, hearing something tear, by the grip Takeru comes closer, still endowing in frozen displeasure. "Then, enlighten me. What do you expect me to do? You're certainly… not going to threaten me with leaving my side again, are you?"

"If this is the road you wanna follow, then yes. I ain't working for you after the tuning is done, if this world truly knows no hope then feel free to burn in it. I ain't adding fuel to the fire."

"Heh, so you wanna die with a clear conscience? Is that it?" I expected better… Didn't you say you worked with me? That you understood? And yet, his expression doesn't change. He dares, dares to remain scowling. "Do you think I enjoy this state of affairs? Everyone in the chain gets a say, everyone has to be appeased. Isn't that why you desired to have me remain strong?"

"And what the fuck does it matter if you align yourself with people that will send us to hell anyways? Is asking you to be responsible over your creations that hard an ask?" wincing, the leaf again falls. Only this time, there is barely no sound, only the scattering of the ashes into eternal formlessness. "If this research is the work of your life, then it's your responsibility to see that it is not misused. I mean, for real this time, can you imagine the chaos that would ensue if a raging 00 Unit gets hold of an XG? You wanna make this world into a real parody of Galaxy Wars?"

As I pull him closer, enough to see my reflection in his eyes, his features shuffle but do not entirely thaw. "I shall see that such an outcome does not come to pass, if you aid me in not losing power and warn me of who I should be careful of. Certainly, you ain't turning your back on me now, are you Takeru?"

"… And you will heed my words?"

"I am, you know."

"What if some idiot wants to do some… testings on Sumika?"

"You're free to shoot them in the face, if you so like. I do not… particularly enjoy the rampages she goes on, mind you. And no, I am not entirely pleased with the schematics for, well, the process of the 00 Unit's digitalization. Kagami was the perfect subject, but to employ the procedure to a living human… Sigh. I relent on that front, it might even make the tuning nigh impossible."

And cruelty does not truly bring forth better results, that much is certain. I suppose, if I was left to work and slave away for Alt V, my analogy of Von Braun might have done more harm than good to convey my point across. It did do its job, to show me he truly is concerned over myself and the future. As well as the oddity of the singular world where that was not the case. Knowing I probably worked for the G-Bombs that killed his comrades, and who knows whatever else he recalled, should have been enough to make Takeru repulsed at the notion of working with me.

And yet, here he is, still holding my gaze, a bit upset but seeming more scolding than anything else. A tiny ball of flowers defying the winter, refusing to remain buried.

"So, you will halt the ripples shortly, I assume," he says, still not pulling away.

"Indeed, once we deal with your citizenship. Do you have some sort of plan to avoid ruin to fall on us?"

"Yeah, and if you really think you need stability right now, we can accelerate things if you're okay with some risks."

"… You visiting the Capital, I assume?" I ask, pulling a bit more on his uniform, yet he nods all the same. "Sigh… Are you planning to threaten Sagiri or something?"

"You should not know, just in case. Reminder that you need to stay strong and firm after Kashgar falls."

"And reminder that you're a key piece of my plans. After all," smiling, leaning closer, "you're also helping me with the research. If I am the mother, that makes you the father of the 00 Unit's plans with your attempts at tuning. I cannot simply lose you, so there's no need to hold back. We're already deep in this together, so your safety matters as much as mine or the 00 Unit's. Are we clear, Takeru?"

Inhaling sharply, eyes crossing again, blazes return to clear and burn away the mist. Leaving only that clear ignition, the usual impulse that's a staple of his features. "Yeah, crystal. Don't worry, this dark armed dragon ain't doing anything stupid." Again with that wording… Why insist on naming himself after that? Considering what he has told me since waking up, and his concerns over my research… A dragon that needs no Heaven, huh. How did I not see it? " Cough… So, I suppose you will give me an answer now?"

"Hm? What, was that not enough? Do you want another kiss, perhaps?" chuckling I tap my lips, letting go of his uniform.

Takeru groans as he flattens his clothes, lips shaking for a tiny bit. "Then, you'll help me mitigate the effects of the coup? No secrets or anything?"

"No, none at all. Will you then tell me what have you been playing at since your little nap?"

"Once you recall the poem, yes. Feel free not to tell me everything until then, just to be sure."

"Huh… Fair enough. So, what now? Do you have a plan to share? I'm listening."

"If you still need the coup to happen… then there are a few things that need to be prepared to ensure it does not go wrong. While using me as bait will spark up a reaction, I cannot stress how much we gotta look after Yuuhi."

"Then, what's the big idea?" I go back to my seat, firing off my notebook again, a flurry of windows to note and cross-reference what he tells. "We assign you as her escort, have you remain in the Capital when the coup happens so that you and your 'fellows' bring the spoils to our port? Would that appease you?"

"Well… Yes and no," he sighs, folding his arms. "There is a simpler solution to all this. One that won't place you or Yuuhi in any danger, and works the best to gather intel so that nothing goes wrong."

"You certainly won't ask me to let you return to the IRG as a dead man, will you?"

"Of course not, chill out. So long as you help me, I am on your side."

"Hmm. Well, make that permanent and get used to it because you ain't leaving the UN."

"Sigh. Whatever."

"So, what would this idea of yours entail?"

"Oh, nothing too complicated," he shrugs with a smirk. "You send me to pay a visit to the snake's sushi bar."

Small Steps

Chapter 95:

Small Steps

---

December 7th. Around 9 AM.

(Amidst the ruins, near a portable Command Center.)

---

"You're certain there is nothing you'd like to report, XO?" the Instructor asks, tapping an arm with a finger as her lips shrug, oh, so tightly. The pressure that compacts her whole posture increases tenfold as a smirk greets the query.

"Oh, are you casting doubts on good old me, Marimo? How awful of you, just when I decide to pay you grunts a visit too," the scientist complains in falsehood while ruffling her hair and facing away. "Isn't that right, Yashiro?" she asks, causing the young assistant to sigh and glare in silence.

"Sigh… At least tell me the motives behind your presence," the poor Instructor repines, rubbing her forehead in small circles, futile attempts at dousing the headache that was already landing atop her scalp. "It has to do with Shirogane's reckless movement pattern of yesterday, right?"

"So what if it does?" she retaliates, unblinking, taking a step forward with vipers lending venom to her glare. "Would you happen to have a complain with my protegee's piloting, Sgt Jinguuji?"

Immediately stepping back, looking down and feeling the seizing caress of the cold gust upon her nape contrasting with the cloak of warmth incoming from the lithe amount of daylight of today, the Instructor gulps, slow and heavy, while taking in a deep, deep breath. The cold humidity mixed with the permeating scent of oil and fuel dries up her mouth even further, no amount of hustling of her tongue can allow a retort to form as her eyes once more meet the gorgonic menace that still glares. And so, for a few seconds, only the distant rumble of the machinery setting up the six TSFs for the coming mock battle practice can be heard in the small elevation near the mobile command post.

"… Why are you placing Shirogane in such risk, XO?" she finally asks, hands beginning to hoist a veil of sweat despite the chilly air of December. "Between the rumors already lurking in his shadow, why force him to show off in such manner? He could even injure himself again!"

"He won't," she dismisses, ruffling her hair as her eyes veer to the Gekishin marked with a six in the distance. Facing away from direct sunlight as she watches, the scientist can't help but to chuckle lightly.

"Yuuko, please," she insists, face contorting as if undergoing a sharp maneuver, boulders and spikes raining onto the pit of her stomach. "He already has enough to deal with, the same with the rest of the cadets. Hayase and Munakata came to request some advice and-"

"Not another word," the scientist warns, glaring back and eliciting a flinch, hoarse choking on the Instructor's throat. "Not here, anyways. Your concern is noted, Marimo. However, this odd overprotective strike is not necessary. Plus, didn't you want to see your cadets flourish into decent pilots?" she asks, tapping her chin.

"That's true, however… Such patters are too dangerous, there is-"

"Then," she pats her friend's shoulder, smiling as she whispers, "it's up to you to find a way to teach them all to polish this doctrine, isn't it? Certainly, you will agree that we need more Reapers for the STF?"

"… Not like this," she says, holding the glare, a breath and a gurgling mixture of acids and poison in her gut. "I did not train them to become killing machines or kamikazes. XO, please, reconsider whatever you're doing now."

"And lose whatever spoils we could gain through Shirogane's eccentric patterns?"

"Is that worth more than possibly losing all of our new recruits to these aggressive methods? I… I am not going to train them to become cannon balls, Yuuko," she states, clamping her lips, drying them as her knees shake and quiver, become dust under the petrifying stare.

"… Sometimes, a board breaker is what we need, don't you agree?" the scientist asks, relenting a sigh, standing aside and gazing at the six machines that are being outfitted with their pylons and weapons of choice. "Letting the cadets explore their limits in a controlled scenario is what will allow them to flourish. And you, Marimo, are their baton. Feel free to be as abrasive and hurtful as you deem fit when they make mistakes from now on, but I want them to iron out the kinks of these ideas Shirogane has."

"Do you… truly need such aggression in your troop, Yuuko?" she asks, a hand gradually trying to close but being unable to, instead it tugs at her uniform. The edge of a knife, of cold steel rustles her nape and hair as the wind blows again, the shiver and scowl do not come from either the temperature or the strong odor of the machines nearby.

"… The threat of violence is sometimes more effective than violence itself," the scientist says, closing her eyes and folding her arms, a single finger tracing an edge of her neck. "Even if it comes with unwanted attention onto his person, having my protegee display such skill is a show of might I require of him at the moment, and will need of him in the future. Not only from Shirogane, but from all of my subordinates."

" Gulp… However, they barely have had-"

"Then, give them hell once again, Reaper. Forge them into the best pilots you can make, use Shirogane as the fire upon which their frame shall be measured against. If they can't even match his performance in a Gekishin while using Fubukis, I am not certain I have a use for the other five," she shrugs, tilting her head back and forth as she walks towards the mobile command post.

"Wait a moment, you-"

"After all," her steps stop, lips regress as a hand pinches and presses and grips at her neck, "he won't be always here to lend them a hand."

"Wh-What does that even mean?"

"Oh, nothing much. I mean, Shirogane is my protegee, so I have…" a small smile, a gentle slither of the tip of her tongue over the rim of her lips, "other uses for him besides being fodder for the STF. So, make the most out of his presence, Sgt Jinguuji. I am expecting a good show today!" she chuckles and turns around, entering the command post.

The poor Instructor simply groans while her lips coil and twist, the chilly breeze aiding not a single bit with the overall contraction she now feels. It is quite fair to affirm a part of her desired to march after her friend, but Jinguuji knew no answers would she obtain from such a course of action. Instead, a sigh hollows the bog of venoms she was brewing in her stomach as she gazes at the six machines that now stand on opposite sides of the city at the ready, the support vehicles already retreating from the ruins that will soon turn into a battlefield.

A few beeps reach her ears, the confirmations are accepted and she thus walks into the command post, groaning as she sees the scientist took the main seat and was spinning on it again. Only green lights return her checks, affirmations coming from all six cadets. The Instructor still can't help but to note the odd paleness of the soldier's face, as if he were now showered in bright moonlight. Soft pink clouds resting under his eyelids, and a rather large spot in one cheek would indicate he is not in top form despite the numbers from his suit telling otherwise.

Licking her lips as she goes through the motions, something pulls at her elbows. Shivering as if touching water, barely meeting at the surface without sinking, she turns around towards the scientist that was in the midst of a joke which made young Yashiro pout and flap her ears, strongly enough that she might have taken off before the TSFs did.

"That is not true, Professor," she repines.

"Really? Because I think it is more likely, you do hate carrots after all."

"Um, XO?" Jinguuji asks, breaking the sparks which tied both gazes.

"Hm? What's up?"

"Sigh… Again with the lax wording…"

"Come on, now. Don't start, Marimo. So, what is it?"

"… About Shirogane's condition, he seems to be rather exhausted. The tone of his skin is rather pale, and he wasn't as chipper as always this morning either. Considering the exertion of his maneuvers yesterday-"

"Don't worry, I'm telling you," she waves, shrugging. "He's going to be fine, even if he knows no chill."

"… Huh? Wait, that word… Yuuko, why are-"

"I think it's more likely that Yashiro will eat her carrots than Shirogane making a mistake, for real."

"That is not true, Takeru-san does tend to push himself too hard for his trainings," young Yashiro notes, fingers tightly interlocking as the bunny ears flap a few times. "And I am eating my vegetables…"

"Only one or two a day, though," she counters, smiling a bit. Yashiro groans back, earning a chuckle from the scientist. "Anyways," she turns towards her friend, giving a nod, "there truly is nothing to fear, Marimo. I had a thorough talk with him to ensure he practices his patterns in moderation. Takeru won't be a detriment to your training course, and if he ever is feel free to guide him and the others towards the most proper path to make the most out of his tendencies."

"… Understood. However, well…" lips contract again, arms lightly fold, eyes veer down. Ice, motes of ice poke at her body that rustles and coils unto itself.

"What is it?"

"… No, nothing. I'll begin the final checks," she says, nodding and turning around.

Still, there was something, a small bug crawling up, slowly, so slowly up her backside that almost spurred hands and lips to move. The odd wordings, the fact that she'd joke of the matter, be present in the training of all things, and even refer to him by name.

While observing his projection in the monitors, Jinguuji couldn't help but to sigh a bit. "I only hope you gained her interest for good motives, Shirogane. Please, please don't force me to reprimand you any further."

A few calls meet with final affirmations, the all green signal flashes through all pop-ups. The echo of the vehicles approaching their position meant the city was now deserted, thus with one final inhalation she presses the comms.

"CP to all units, the mission will begin in T minus One. The objective is total annihilation. Cadets, remain in standby."

"Copy that," all of them reply.

And so, sitting down by her friend's side, Jinguuji simply stared at the number as it went down and down, before the small beep flared to life and the mock battle began in proper form.

Only to be followed by two gasps and shrieks, coming from Sakaki and Jinguuji herself as the Fubuki marked as Zero-One propelled itself off the ground, as the soldier normally would.

"What… What was…"

"Fuhuhu… It seems we are going to be seeing quite the fascinating spectacle," the scientist says, leaning back comfortably, crossing her legs.

"Yuuko, what did you do?!"

"I dunno," she shrugs again as she rolls her eyes. "Enjoy the show, Marimo. And pay attention at the control logs while you're at it, okay?" she then commands, losing the tease and nodding.

The poor Instructor can only allow herself a groan before further beeping takes her sight back to the screens. Lips grow loose and fall apart at the speed with which three of the dots were moving, as if bouncing off every landing.

"04, I've located 02. She's to your Eleven," Sakaki warns, one eye closing on its own upon the exertion of a boost.

"Copy that. Currently engaging 03," Ayamine squeezes through clenched teeth, also adapting to the adusted impulse which threatens with fusing her back into the seat.

Though, 'engaging' would be a too forgiving a word to employ. The afterimage that Ayamine's Fubuki had become followed upon the directives issued by the soldier, and even when faltering on the timings the thunder pattern of the zigzags kept the radars at bay, the auto-aim system not granting any advantages to Yoroi, whose panicked yells grew in intensity with every passing second.

Retreating upon the desert twister which swallowed everything in its stride, Yoroi cursed under her breath as Ayamine rebounds off a building towards her flanks, almost delivering a shell to her engines and ending her participation in the fight. So minimal were the seconds when the opposing frame came into view, so delayed was the update of the radars, and so scared Yoroi had become when she realized the shock countermeasures were not working on her rival's stride. As she gulped hard and an eye twitched when a sweat bead fell down her brow, the incoming rumbling from behind forces her veins to surface in her skin.

Collapsing into the open ground with scattered motes of paint all over, Mitsurugi's Fubuki stalls a reaction until it can stand again. Short and shallow are her breaths, as the time delay between the jumps and gliding of her rivals thus far. As dry ice forced its way down her throat when a barrel met her stare, Yoroi's covering fire deterred Sakaki from delivering a killing blow, forced to backboost. Still, the paint rounds didn't even graze or share the same air as the frame, and thus Yoroi's lips shrugged more and more just as her hands choked the living daylights out of the controls.

"What in the Heavens is going on here?" Mitsurugi repines, allowing herself a second to breath in.

"02, how are you holding up?" Yoroi asks, keeping an eye on the radar and another on her surroundings.

"… I know not how I managed to elude my chaser, truth be told. 05, have you located 06's whereabouts?" she inquires as she switches her already tattered shield for a rifle.

And then, silence.

For quite a few seconds it extends.

And equal to the Instructor's is their groaning at the delay for the answer, only that they are not either sinking in cold nor frowning a bit. Sadly, poor Jinguuji had to deal with the unhinged laughter of the scientist at the results she was seeing, and at the out of tune song she, her assistant and her friend were made to hear.

A beep comes up in both Yoroi's and Mitsurugi's radar, a hostile approaching from their Six. Immediately after, almost in perfect sync, their chasers blast away in threat. Fireworks spread over the city, staining it in multicolored layers upon layers of paint. Whether they are fighting for their lives or painting an abstract representation of an aneurysm, I know not.

And yet, the modest and compact pace the two were endowing in, the contention of a scarecrow undaunted in the eye of a storm begins to show cracks in each step, in each jump.

Erratic like thunders exchanged between clouds, the frames of their rivals blurred in sight, inched closer and closer. In the second where their hands twitched, halted their pull on the controls upon a break in the clouds, a moment of respite as the Fubukis retreated after quite a push, a small beeping comes up in their ears.

And this time, their fears and shock is indeed equal to the poor Instructor's, exploding like a little toad being fed a cigarette.

For a small shape was taking reign of the skies, as if attempting to high five the sun.

Only for it to start to sink, to fall into a slicing stance towards the two battered Fubukis.

Despite not taking as much altitude as possible, the battering bolt fires itself off towards its mark. Along a song, a shrieking voice that knows no pace nor tune as the soldier throws himself deep into the danger zone, towards the raised barrels that greet his aggro.

"06, be careful! You could-"

"Don't worry, 01. I've got this!"

BOOM!

"… Oops?"

"Ahahaha!" the scientist hits her thigh over and over, the manic laugh turning into coughing and hacking, to the point that young Yashiro rubs her back in an attempt to douse the episode.

"Siiigh… XO, what is the meaning of this?" the Instructor asks, complexion contracting all the more as the signs on-screen display the soldier did not care a single bit about being hit in midair.

" Cough. Haha, sigh… Didn't think he'd actually persevere and complete the maneuver with one arm less," she nods slowly at the projected progression of the battle, at the last moments of the duo before the notification shows the deed has been done. Small it may be yet that smile is very much satisfied, you'd understand.

"Yuuko, what is going on? Their patterns, their inputs… It's as if Sakaki and Ayamine had suddenly become Shirogane's pupils. I demand an answer!"

"Oh, nothing much. The formal documentation will reach your hands…" she looks away, groaning subtly as she fiddles with her hair amidst a slow spin, "shortly, I guess. In any case, you oversee the return to the base. I'll take the data from the mock battle. Yashiro," she orders, and the small bunny goes to do her thing to the control panel.

The Instructor moves aside to let the assistant do her job, rubbing her temple. "XO, what is- Why are you-"

"All in due time, Marimo," she says, chuckling a bit as she extends both arms upwards as if praising the sun. "Don't you think it would be amazing if all our pilots could one day pilot with this dexterity, regardless of the aggression in their stances?"

"I cannot fight against these results, no. However, they almost crashed several times. To say nothing of Shirogane's recklessness at the last assault," she comments with a slight frown, shaking her head. "And their bracing countermeasures were not working at all, if they exert their craft and a limb breaks off-"

"That is why we're testing this, isn't it? To ensure no such thing comes to pass."

"Wait, testing? Yuuko, you can't use the cadets for such purposes! High Command will-"

"HC is not, and will not be, notified. This little matter is tied to my research, do you understand?" she asks, raising her chin, the fangs dripping petrifying venoms.

"Mmgh… Is this why you brought Shirogane here? The result of his special assignments? Do you… plan to keep sending them to suicide missions with this doctrine?"

"… In normal circumstances, a stress test would be coming up in the timeline, yes," she notes, arms folding as do her lips. Yet, her head tilts, a light scratching, tickling poke in the back of her neck which compulses legs to meet. "However, this particular card does not seem to desire to go along my every command…" she complains, shooting a look at the screens, at the small square labeled Zero-Six, as lips and legs compact upon one another, as a pair of feathers brush both sides of her neck.

"… What?" yet, the poor Instructor was left as lost as a penguin in a desert, eyes and brows narrowing a bit.

"Anyways, you have a battle to end. I'll be waiting back at the hangar. Yashiro, let's go," she then turns around, and departs with as much haste as she arrived.

Jinguuji remains staring at the backside that shrinks in the distance, simply standing as her every thread went limp. Looking back at the screens, the common channel was open at the time. With a gentle push she starts the connection, sounds once more thriving through the speakers.

"Stop dallying! How did you achieve such performance?" Mitsurugi demands, hitting her control panel and again almost sending her cockpit off the machine.

"You could say our tactics were more so fish ticated," the soldier says, moving both brows up and down.

"I'm asking for details, Takeru."

"Come on, now. Don't get so crabby, Mitsurugi. I sea what you mean, but that's just how we roll now. Though, I didn't expect us to start whaling on you guys so hard."

"Stop spouting nonsense and answer me!"

"Oho, didn't think you'd catch the drift, Meiya-kun. I knew I raised you well," he nods a few times, causing groans and much pressure to come to Mitsurugi's hands.

"Awawa, I didn't even see you approach me…" Tamase barely whispers, folding herself into a small loaf. "Were you all taking part in some secret mission as well?"

"Sadly, silent we must remain," Ayamine retorts, in unneeded solemnity. Before giving out a small smile and a chuckle, hitting her forehead with the back of a hand in slow motion. "However, it was dolphin etily a surprise to be sure, that we managed to move with such fin esse."

"Can you two cease this tomfoolery for once?" Mitsurugi repines once more, blazing.

"Yeah, bring out the pun gun, why don't you," he shrugs, faking a miffed expression with ballooning cheeks.

"But Takeru, how did Chizuru-san and Kei-san get so nimble?! I couldn't even lock onto your frames!" Yoroi repines, slumping forward as her expression falls.

"Well, we kinda sharked the rules a bit," Ayamine says, shrugging with one eye closed.

"Oh, but if you want any tips, let minnow," he follows up, giving a wink to the projections. Despite the lifting tailwind it gives to Yoroi and Tamase, the gesture only elicits further embers from Mitsurugi's eyes as she pinches her nose, as hard as she would shake his neck in demands for answers.

"Ignore these two idiots," Sakaki says, then sighs. "I suppose we'll hear a formal explanation once we're back at the hangar."

"Cadets, the mock battle has ended. Return to the starting positions," Jinguuji sighs after issuing the order, brows crossing at the chained fish puns the soldier exchanges with Ayamine to the piling frustrations of Sakaki and Mitsurugi. "Siiigh… At least you still have your good spirits, Shirogane. I wonder just… how much of an effect you actually have in these matters. To have Yuuko refuse a proper test in live combat… Just what is going on here? And if she's in a good mood, why are you still referring to her as 'XO'?"

Allowing herself a moment to drink some water, the incoming reports from the mechanics as the TSFs were brought back into the support vehicles reach her ears along the coordination with the rest of the team. For some moments, feeble moments, she can simply sit down and rest, review the footage as the mobile command post returns to base.

---

Around half an hour later.

( Hangar .)

[ Meiya ]

"Takeru, please, tell me!"

"Can't you just wait a moment until the Instructor gets back, Mitsurugi?" he says, taking a step back and facing away, once more insisting on employing my surname.

"But, but! Come on, just a little hint!" Yoroi joins in my plead, groaning as she stares. Tamase soon imitates her, Takeru's complexion softens ever so slightly yet once more looks away.

Takeru always possessed talent, that much is true, however yesterday and today he was an even more fierce adversary than usual. It's reminiscent of the time when he ceased holding back in basic, as if this were always his truest skill.

At first, I thought it was merely the difference of employing the Mugen Kidou into his patterns, but the maneuvers employed, the sheer speed at which his machine bent and twisted at impossible angles all the while never losing momentum under constant suppression fire… It was akin to the haziness of a perfect scenario envisioned in a dream, a fantasy of what next generation technology could bring about.

Perhaps, is he remembering his training to join the Guard? The aggressive stance does remind me a bit of my bout with Tsukuyomi, despite the far more ruthless approach.

And yet, even in front of reiterated queries all he and the other two do is remain silent and dodge our gazes as they did to our bullets.

"Takeru, even so, are you alright? You do look a bit pale. Are you not exerting yourself?"

And yet again, his gazes flees me. "Thanks, but it's fine. I need to get back on my groove ASAP. That's all there is to it," he simply says, sighing. "My apologies if my more… aggressive methods have upset you, though," swiftly bowing down, he remains in position for a second.

W-What is wrong with him? I don't like it, I don't like how he looks and sounds. Even less that he is once more placing a wall between us. Tsukuyomi might have dodged the issue yet… yet certainly, you would not deny me a handshake as of now, right? You would… stop using my surname once I-

"Squad, assemble!" the Instructor commands, the impact of her steps reaching my ears.

We all get in line, only to find a quite wrathful expression in her, as she hasn't been in many moons. It is similar to the contortion she showed me during the CCSE's evaluation that night, the displeasure evident in the compact arms folded over her body. In striking opposition is the XO, whose hands lie in her coat's pockets and her smile is relaxed, her stride slower and no disturbances affect her breathing at first glance. Equally calm is Yashiro, who walks behind the XO.

"Well then, normally I would give you an assessment of the battle, however…" the Instructor gazes at Takeru, lips twisting, "it would seem the recklessness has infested this squadron. Never thought it'd be displeased with a decisive a victory, much less one where Sakaki and Ayamine worked in unison, yet I must say this. Shirogane, what were you thinking when performing that sky dive?"

"That it was really cool. Also effective to deal with the enemy by making myself bait. My diversion would have allowed my squadmates to nullify their threat, more so if they were the lifeline of the enemy's forces," he states, sober as he nods back, standing straight and returning the glare in perfect composure.

For some reason, one of the Instructor's brows twitches. "However, there is no denying that you could have injured yourself or your comrades with the maneuver. Your argument is solid, but do endeavor to look for… other solutions for next time."

"Ma'am, yes, Ma'am!"

"Now then, I am sure you three have as many questions as I," she says with a sigh, looking in mine and the other's direction. "You fought admirably against impossible odds and the unknown threat, do not let this hamper your efforts," she nods, holding our gaze. "Well, that shall be all from me."

As she slides aside, the Professor coughs and steps towards us, with a clearly gleeful smirk in her features. "So, girls, what did you think of your rivals' performance today?"

Saluting her as I step forward, I nod and look upwards. "It was simply exquisite. Their movements were so fast my radar had quite the trouble in keeping track of them. I already knew cadet Shirogane was skilled, but today he was completely overwhelming. To say nothing of his partners' display, which was equally astounding," I salute and step back, giving a minute nod to the other three. Sakaki and Ayamine return a faint smile, Takeru however remains looking forward… with one of his brows permanently docked downwards.

The XO chuckles a bit once everyone said their piece, pacing in front of us slowly as she delivers the explanation behind the sudden improvement. This new OS, the XM3, to think this was another of Takeru's missions… You're amazing. I can clearly see why Tsukuyomi would desire to regain your fellowship. And yet, you still won't look my way, won't utter my name except in jest. Tsukuyomi suggested me to remain steadfast and not breach your wish for peace, however…

Coughing, she ruffles her hair."So, I suppose that's all? Well, that's the basic gist of things."

"XO, why was I not notified of this at all?"

"Come on, Marimo. All's well that end's well. Anyways," coughing once more, her expression tightens slightly despite the smile never waning, "Shirogane will be the exclusive user of the OS since it's a patent of the UN for now. Thanks for proving the adaption to it wasn't solely related to his preferences," she says, giggling as she nods.

Takeru remains looking down, eyes narrowed. He does not like this arrangement. For some reason, the gaze he sends towards the Professor seems to further ignite her chuckling.

"XO, you shouldn't pick favorites," the Instructor counters, pacing into her sight, standing in front of us as she gestures our way. "I'm sure all the squad would benefit from this OS, even if they do not employ such aggressive patterns. I know their recent numbers are not pleasing, however, maybe this is the motivational push they so badly need. Did you not desire to aid them improve?" she asks, holding the Professor's stone-cold stare. Only by looking at her do I realize, her knees are slightly shaking.

To hear the Instructor defend us like this, when we have been giving her such problems… It brings heat into my stomach, tension to my legs as if preparing myself for our prior running drills. We have to step up, I cannot disappoint her too. All she has done for us thus far, another person might have already given up the squad. And yet, here she stands in front of the Professor. For our sake.

The XO shrugs, once more toying with her hair as she looks away. "Marimo, that is nice and all, but some of them don't want to stay on the UN, if a birdie wasn't wrong. Actually, I think some of them see this organization as badly as the Americans," she states, giving us all her focus, the imposing glare which solidifies my arms onto my sides. "Why would I expose my most newest OS to people who just want to jump ship first chance they get? Also, since their first mock battle, they started getting worse results and he has bested their efforts time and again after coming back. That's proof enough for me," she crosses her arms, facing away.

Looking down is all I can afford. Deny the words would be a lie for me, yet my thoughts… well, they are not as black and white as they used to be, no. It is true I will place my people first and foremost, for a servant is what I am, yet I believe not all of the UN's crew are equal to those traitors who abandoned our olden capital. And yet, my throat and lips constrict, the words simply do not come. I… I have to-

"E-Excuse me, XO," Sakaki takes a step forward, despite her shaking fists she bows down for a moment. "I know our attitude and results leave much to be desired, that is true. However, at the least I do not wish to jump ship," she states, posture firm and undaunted.

Eh?! Sakaki, when did she- But I thought she was planning to return to the IJA?

Coughing at the lack of an answer, the cold stare the XO forwards, Sakaki clears her throat. "I wish to do what I can and learn all the UN has to offer me, and am willing to stay under UN command until I've fulfilled my role here and proven with my results that I am worth the resources you poured on me. There are many," her eyes veer back, towards him, "lessons I've apprehended here which are key for my growth, I believe many more are still waiting for me. So please, would you reconsider giving us all the authorization to use the XM3 in our trainings?" she bows deeply to the unflinching Professor, a slight tremor assaulting her knees and hands.

"Huh… And? What about the rest? You sure you want to mingle with foreigners? Won't you end up corrupted by 'The American Way'?" smirking a bit, this time she spoke coldly, sending poison at us along the dismissive gaze.

I understand why she thinks that. We did discriminate Takeru, her special protegee, when he arrived and after the CCSE. And yet, it would seem he's been working more than any of us all this time.

What if he was helping with this OS until late night and as soon as he woke up when I was intruding on his room?

What if he still was pulling allnighters after he was given his punishment?

What if the reason behind his recent hesitation is due to exhaustion due to both the punishment and the extra duties he is tasked with?

After all, to recruit someone who brings as much trouble as Takeru, that he himself is aware enough of it to request me not to get closer, would mean the XO would then request equal or greater compensation for the cost of safeguarding him from the-

…

… Oh. I never even… gave a thought to that. What is the cost he has to pay for the XO to shield him from the IRG? The inquiries over his profiles, if taken to court… could obviously place him in quite the conundrum. But it also could be a detriment to the XO. Then, what has she asked of him?

… Hasn't he been away since he returned from the CCSE? I do not clearly recall what was that Ayamine said when we returned, about how she found him in the hallways, however testing this OS must not have been easy. The same for those odd simulators we once used.

… And yet, he now is barely looking up. Only gazing with a displeased cork of his brows at the Professor as the Instructor steps in front of Sakaki, debating once more in our favor.

… What is the cost asked of you? Is that why Tsukuyomi advised me not to approach you? Just… Just what manner of tasks are you being made to shoulder? What has she requested out of you and why would you not accept our aid?

However, if there is anything I can do… to even alleviate his burdens ever so slightly, when in reality it is only another benefit for myself to train with said new OS, what has me remaining silent? Didn't I call myself his fellow, request a handshake of him? Isn't it time I show Takeru some concrete support?

Sighing, I step forward. The small debate between the Instructor and the Professor ceases, their gazes lock onto me. A swift bow I give, remaining in position by Sakaki's side. "XO, I do know we have showed you quite shameful a side of ourselves in the past. I admit, I was most foolish at times towards both the crew at large and your protegee in particular. Regrettably, I cannot do anything to change the opinion you have of me as of now. But I assure you, I desire nothing more than to keep training here, to remain in the UN until I proved my worth to you all and repay the chances you've bequeathed me with. If it would align with your designs, I'd gladly volunteer to join in the testings of this XM3 OS."

And anyways, I am nothing yet. I've let my pride blind my moves at times, I am not Her Highness' shadow yet. The Heavens have blessed me to have one such as Takeru by my side, to possess squadmates as forgiving as mine, and an Instructor that would not scorn me for my reiterated follies. I shan't deny it, I do hoist doubts about the UN at large, but I believe that at the least I can trust in the people I've seen working every day, in the Instructor, and in my squadmates. Certainly, when it is time for action and not words, we'll see eye to eye.

"I-I… I also would like to train with it, if you allowed," Tamase wavers in her steps forward, never does she look up yet still comes by me and gives a bow. "I never had plans to leave the UN, I do w-want to do my part on mending our relations from here, like Papa does. Please XO, grant us the permission to train with this OS," she says, almost shouting, as her sight tightly closes, her entire posture compressing itself as if she were facing the downpour of a frozen waterfall upon her person.

Yoroi slowly walks up to Sakaki's side, clutching an elbow. "I don't know how good I could get or if my results would be of use to you, XO, but I wish to improve and be as good as I can. I also don't want to leave the UN, I like this place a lot. Perhaps my results are not up to par with everyone else, but I wish to repay the kindness and patience you all had with me," she slowly says, hunching ever so slightly before bowing down. "Please, let us train like Takeru."

And for a moment, there was only silence. Until a slow, almost imperceptible sound repeated itself. Chuckling, drowned and subdued. Peeking up from my bowing position, I find the woman staring down at us with her fingers idling on her chin, and the largest smirk I have seen in her features thus far. Chuckling, so much.

"Well, what do you know? Looks like some of you learned a good lesson," she says, lightly chuckling as she gestures for us to raise. Before she looks over to the side, bumping a hand onto her chin. "Ayamine, what about you?"

She had remained still, as expressionless as always. And now, gazing at the Professor, then at Takeru, her brows lower and cross as tension comes to her jaw. "… Why was a Cadet involved in the development of an OS?" she asks, quiet, coldly.

"I'm sure you remember the simulators, right? He showed potential, so I enlisted his help for the project. Should I take your answer as a no?" she asks, taking a step closer, further dryness do I swallow upon the minute contortion in her features which do not lose their smile.

Ayamine doesn't flinch, she slightly narrows her eyes at the Professor. "Yes, I do want to train with it. However, why are you pushing him to do so much stuff? Shirogane is only a cadet. Isn't being overworked like this why he fainted in the first place, too? XO, this could be considered a case of abuse of power, in my opinion," her tone grew lower than usual, showing a glint in her eyes which only appears when debating with Sakaki. Even the forwardness of her posture and expression is sturdier than usual, as perhaps the steel of our machines when they ready to cross strikes.

"Ayamine, come on. Don't be-"

"Shush, Shirogane," she scolds, despite not losing the smile. "Who would have said it, Ayamine. You're that worried about the American?" she says, arching a brow as two fingertips raise to restrict her nostrils when looking his way. Takeru grimaces, shaking his head and sighing, oh, so heavily.

"He's my squadmate," Ayamine retorts, giving him a nod, glaring her way. "And I don't think it's healthy for him to be overworked in this manner, under the guise of his punishment."

In front of the defiance, the smile grows instead. It spreads, the glimmer in her eyes growing as incoming dawn as the chuckling resumes. Not only Ayamine, but all of us gape slightly and exchange gazes. Except Takeru, who facepalms.

"Hmm… Well, thanks to all that work we now possess this OS," she concludes, shrugging. "So, if you're so worried about Shirogane's situation, you all better start pulling your own weight so that he can stop babysitting you all. I will not tolerate lacking results in the XM3's trainings, and will adjust my judgment based on your results. Of course, this will also have an effect on your final score when you earn your commission. Do you still accept to join in?" she asks, smiling again.

"Yes, ma'am!" all of us answer, sharing one good round of looks and a nod afterwards.

"Well, color me surprised. Fine, you can keep training with the OS, just make sure you don't cause Shirogane any issues during the runs, since you seem to be so concerned with his situation. Of course," she taps her lips, the smile grows and her teeth shine at us, "you can also repay him by sending some affections his way."

…

W-What did she just-

" Yuuko !" Takeru and the Instructor shout in unison, making the XO frown. Did he just use her name again?

But why did she suggest such a thing? C-Certainly she isn't implying what I believe she- No, no, no, no! Don't stare at his chest, don't stare at his face, don't think about the-

" Listen well Meiya-sama. The, ahem, milk you were speaking of is actually-"

No! I-I wouldn't- Aaah! Focus, myself! I must not lose composure, even if Takeru is indeed quite attract- No! He isn't! Gah… W-Why can't I tear my eyes from him? If only he cut his hair again… T-Then, I suppose, I could see him regaining his charm.

…

Not again, myself! Focus! Within the warrior-

While the Instructor admonishes the XO, he simply sighs and shakes his head, rolls his eyes while messing with his hair. And our eyes meet, for only a moment, a brief moment where I smile and nod.

And yet he looks away, his lips cascading as do his shoulders.

Why? Why won't you look my way? What must I do to regain your trust? Surely, it is not too late?

"In no way should you suggest such things, XO."

"Oh, come on. Lay off me, will you?" she shrugs, rolling her eyes and facing away from the boiling monstrosity the Instructor had become. "Well, since all of you seem to be telling the truth, I'll allow you to use the XM3 from now on. Marimo, I'll send the docs to your mail after the crew installs the OS on their Fubukis. You may proceed with the schedule as planned for the moment, I'll notify you what to do for simulator practice at a latter time. If you have any doubts, ask Shirogane. That's all. Have fun with it!" she says with a smile, waving at us. And with that, she turns around and goes her way. Yashiro looks at Takeru, nodding his way and sharing a small wave before she also departs.

With a heavy sigh, the Instructor looses all tension and heat, what but ice cracking under direct sunlight. "Fine, just leave without answering anything. Squad, you may go get changed. Shirogane, I assume you will be available for the afternoon lecture?"

"Yes, ma'am. Would you like me to explain the XM3's quirks during it?"

"It would be appreciated, yes. Well… This shall be all. Dismissed!"

"Salute!"

She nods our way, also departing from the hangar. Yet, her feet drag on the floor, almost leaving marks in the slowness of her pace. It is as if she had fifteen tons of iron falling upon her head at this very moment.

"… I wonder if she is feeling well."

"Well, anyone would be left drained after a one-on-one discussion with the Professor," Sakaki reasons while tapping her glasses, sighing as she loosens her posture. "Anyways, let's not dally around. Let's go get changed," she orders as a finger traces a circle in midair.

We leave the hangar, the stagnant and heavy air of morning vanished from our backside. Despite the glares which follow our steps, everybody is as relaxed and radiant as they were before the mock battle with Tsukuyomi. Despite the downcast eyes of Tamase and the self-hugging of Yoroi, there is no lingering clouds nor fog in between us. It truly… is a blessing.

"But really, do you think we could also move in that manner?" Yoroi asks, stealing glances and enforcing the one-armed hug she gives herself.

"Of course, if we could with no prior practice you can too," Ayamine nods with a smile.

"Yeah, it's all in getting used to the sensitivity of the stick, really," Takeru asserts while rubbing his cheek, and the rather comical hand-shaped red mark he has in it.

"Shirogane-kun, how did you even do those movements?" Sakaki asks, standing close to him, arms almost touching. "I did try to hustle, but those repeated changes in direction, and the bounces off the buildings too were out of my reach."

"I was just doing my usual. Remember Ayamine's advice and move just a bit faster, other than that you just gotta get used to the new controls," he smiles, nodding.

"So, would it be fair to say we all could replicate these results after some practice?" I ask, edging closer to his other side.

Yet, he steps away, bumping into Sakaki. "… Yeah, I think."

"… Takeru, are you alright? Maybe you should take it easy for today?" brushing my hair, I look at him. But he avoids my gaze once more. Why? W-What did I do?

"I'm fine, really. Don't worry about me, Mitsurugi."

I cannot do that. I can't just look away when my fellow is so clearly pained.

"But Shirogane-san, those jumps were amazing! Your slashes were so quick too! I couldn't even hit you once…" Tamase looks down again, playing with her hair.

"Don't be so down, Tama. You had a clear disadvantage and still forced me to go into full boost to avoid your shots. Be a bit more proud."

Why do you beam at her and not me? Tamase looks down for a moment, then gives him a nod and thanks for his fair compliment.

"Special-kun, you sure you okay?" Ayamine asks, still endowing in firm seriousness as if about to start a bout.

"Yeah, don't worry 'bout it. I've got this."

"… Last time you said that your Gekishin lost an arm, though," she retorts with a smirk.

"Wh- That doesn't count," he complains, folding his arms.

"Really, you do know no moderation," Sakaki remarks with a smile, elbowing him a bit. "But at least it seems you are not as invincible as you look."

"Save that for the time when you actually beat me, though. An arm less and all, I still got the job done," he notes, puffing his well-defined chest out with a smile which rivals today's fair weather.

Ayamine returns a cocky smile at him as she lightly punches his shoulder. "Challenge accepted, Special-kun."

"Copy that, Ayamine. Your bravery shall not be forgotten, grasshopper," he gives her a half hearted salute, making Tamase and Yoroi laugh out loud.

Why do you smile at her like that? Why do you make jokes with her and not me? Why won't you look my way for even a second?

… Are you still upset?

"Um… Takeru? Do you think you could give us some pointers about the XM3?"

"Hm? I guess… What did you wanna ask? Just keep it simple, I'll go over stuff in the classroom," he says, nodding my way. The smile does not fade, his sight does not veer away, remains fully focused onto me.

… So he didn't want apologies or worry, he aimed to clear the air with his usual quips. I see, now looking at Tamase and Yoroi their postures lost the restriction of wires that had them clamped upon themselves. I admit, I don't really get his jokes or humor so the notion flew over my head. I suppose Ayamine is more perceptive than I gave her credit for, I didn't think she would try and join his efforts. But in any case, you look so, so much better like that Takeru.

He starts giving us a summarized explanation of the XM3, tending to our individual queries without monopolizing any one of us. That being said, the small delay in his words, and that odd swollen cheek more than anything, are a sign of concern. And if the XO thought it necessary to test our character, to show her displeasure at our conduct… Are you still perhaps repaying your 'debt' over her protection?

Is there anything I could do to help? You just wait, Takeru. I do have to repay you for all you've done and are doing for me, my fellow.

Eventually, we reach the changing rooms and he gives us his parting words. While the other four debate on the feeling of piloting with this new OS, I begin removing the suit while tuning them out.

I do wonder why you were so down, Takeru. Someone so useful to the XO, she wouldn't want him out of her grasp. He even warned me, and Tsukuyomi seemed rather distressed upon my following queries. But before that, I need to stop being a burden on my fellow's shoulders.

I am certain that, once we can debate openly again, we shall agree in our views. Certainly, if you hoist such concerns over Her Highness, we must have the same opinions and desires. After all… if Mother taught you herself…

… Could you perhaps one day tell me of her, even if only a meager memory? How do I measure up against her? What of those… lovers you said you had? Do I look lacking in comparison?

Placing my suit in the locker, I take out my uniform. Sitting down to put my pants on, my feet gets stuck as I try and simply force it down. The same happens as I attempt to hurry and squeeze my ponytail through the small hole of the tank top. Finishing before the others are even halfway out of their suits, and again reassuring them I won't try and talk with him of delicate matters, I exit the room.

Takeru is nowhere to be found, there is no light visible under the door of the men's changing room. So hiding my hands on my trouser's pockets, I pace towards the PX. Licking my lips, recalling our bout, it all simply eludes me. The small smile, the fleeting gazes, that swirl in my stomach every time he employs my surname, that sensation of being dredged up in muck and vile as we were amidst the CCSE's worst day. Being unable to move, to do anything other than look down and bite on my lips.

Or on the contrary, the light buzzing in my ears, a current of warm water running across my back and sides, a pleasant and blossoming tension in my chest as if I were running under sunlight that follows whenever he does look my way, or as I cannot help but to stare at him. Or to foolishly recall… certain thoughts…

"Sigh… Try as I might, I cannot escape it. I… I am smitten with him, aren't I?"

This bubbling frustration upon his negatives, this fixation upon his features, his kind gestures… When did I start seeing him covered in such a radiant halo?

Would it ever be permitted for one such as me to… to fall in love? N-No, how do I know this is love in the first place?

…

I mean… I still don't know if he'll accept being my fellow or if he'd favor to go back to the Guard. But then, what can I even-

No, don't think like that! He's my fellow! Lovers or not, I have been blessed to walk the same path as him.

Steps wane, stop cold. I look at the ceiling, different images flashing through my mind. The surprised, perhaps scared, expression he showed me when we met that night, the usual smile as he chains jokes, the crumbling straw wall when I shunned him off, raw fire and thunders mixing together as he roared under the rain in the CCSE, the rather apathetic look of these days which wouldn't even flinch when surrounded by thorns or blades. With my eyes half closed, I bring my hands to the back of my head as I resume my walk and sigh.

Who is the real Takeru? And, is this love or passion what I'm feeling? How do I know I'm not being superficial right now? What do I like about him?

Hmm…

I admire his skill and dedication to his training, despite being so adept he continues to hone himself further. Also, never has he not offered a hand back to us, a rope to reach the height he now resides in.

I very much like his informal way of speaking to me. It's relaxing, and I enjoy his company much. While his humor is lost on me, I certainly can appreciate the effect it has in our squad.

I also favor him for being always so kind. He's always looking after us, even when we treated him badly. Not to mention how he helped us during the CCSE.

I also… cannot negate that I am physically attracted to him. Even if I have it under control, I do find myself staring at his chest or face from time to time. Luckily he hasn't noticed it. But what if he did… and was just keeping quiet…

H-He did grew flustered upon my, um, demands for 'milk'. I wonder, do you… How do you see me? To your palate and judgment, how do I measure up against Mother or those you favored?

But… But more than anything, I like his smile. Not just the way he talks, albeit odd it is welcoming and truthful, but the way he looks at me… or used to look, anyways. The minute way in which his eyelids contracted, the small smile that always raised, the full focus which he bestowed, the open posture and words he forwarded. Sigh… I do miss that, more than I thought.

Takeru's attitude could be considered rude, that is true, but I much prefer him to all the other formal people I've met which either freeze or return empty pleasantries my way. To be honest, no one but my retainers has ever clashed opinions with me. And while of course I have the Instructor and my squadmates now, none of them has posed such a challenge as Takeru has.

Looking through the windows as I reach the ground floor, at the clouds which try and seal the sunlight away, I can only wonder. Wonder what it is that makes his vision different than mine, whatever it is that has his gaze and thoughts captivated to such extent.

Maybe I'm being selfish, maybe I'm being shallow. But… Is it so wrong to want to have one thing in my life all for myself?

Takeru has been nothing but a great help to me, and he's always being especially nice to me. Even when I confronted him about his blade and got suspicious. Even during the CCSE when I was being cold to him, he still worried about me and gave me those massages. Even now, after my shameful behavior after the mock battle despite how he is, perhaps, suffering from whatever recollections he is having of his past.

Now's my time to repay all these favors, all the goodwill my fellow has given me.

Even if he doesn't love me back, even if he doesn't come to the Guard with me, I want Takeru to grace me with that radiant a smile again. And perhaps, if he deems me worthy, if I prove to him I am not a 'mistake' to be repeated…

"… M-Maybe we could be something more for each other."

… Even if, I admit, I would like you to openly accept my aid. More so if the XO is pushing insurmountable burdens upon you as of now. At the very least, to aid you reclaim your past is what I desire. If only so that no false claims fall on you. Maybe then, perhaps, we'll be able to talk about Mother, about whatever those odd shadows that mire your eyes actually are.

Wavering

Chapter 96:

Wavering

---

December 7th. Some minutes past 5 PM.

(In the staircase leading to the rooftop.)

[Mikoto]

---

Rubbing my arms, each step echoes a bit more in the loneliness of the place. There's no light illuminating these stairs, a few ponds of dust settling in the corners of the steps. The silence makes me circle my neck, makes the crack I hear all the more evident. Even cracking my knuckles seems like a rude noise.

Sigh… I barely kept up with Takeru's lesson. Barely managed to keep up taking notes and asking questions, barely understood the implications of his words. So now we don't have to worry about stumbling over, but there is another layer of responsibility to treat the craft with care so as to not damage the joints unnecessarily. Inertia and lag seem to be greatly diminished, yet these combo actions are what worries me the most. Everyone gets to further enhance their strengths with the supposed accumulation of data that allows the OS to predict and preemptively respond to our thoughts and moves, to generate foundational patterns that will streamline our piloting and reduce wasted time, yet that's only if the pilot can bring out valuable data.

Takeru did say that the XM3 is not autopilot. Even if it is fitted with his data by default, if we do not try and access said maneuvers the OS won't respond. And rookies that only try and imitate what has already been done… end up being nothing but cattle on the side.

Sigh…

The doorknob meets with coldness to the touch, the door creaks a bit as I open it. A gust greets me as I step outside, the sky that was clear as I came up here now lays fully buried under graying clouds. Heh, as always. I get out, it starts to rain. Sigh… Oh?

"Hm? Is that you, Mikoto-san?"

"Tae-san! It's been so long!" closing the door, I walk up to her. "What a coincidence, seeing you here. We haven't really crossed paths in the hallways since you got commissioned."

"Eh? Ah, yeah…" she chuckles, cracking a bit. Tae-san scratches her head as her hair flutters in the air when the wind blows. "Last time we saw each other was during your first sim run, right?"

Despite the chilly embrace and the full lock of gray up above, we edge closer to the fence and look at the training grounds, catching up on random stuff we saw on TV or how our squadmates are holding up.

"So Akane-san is still as amazing as always, huh."

"Yes, even if she has met a fair wall as of now. Takahara is still as brazen as always too, sadly."

"Haha, nice to hear you're all doing well in your new squad. We're… kind of holding up, despite some trouble."

"Oh, is it because of that Shirogane guy?" she asks, brows furrowing as her shoulders sink in.

"No. Well, kind of. Takeru hasn't done anything wrong but… well, people don't take kindly to him in the hallways. Thankfully, nothing has happened yet, but it is worrying."

"I see, so he's not some sort of brute?"

"Not outside of battle, no. I think he's really kind, honestly. Thanks to him, our trainings are more or less going smoothly as of now," I smile back, nodding a bit. "By the way, how has training been for you guys?"

"Uuh… Same as always." she says, sounding as like toads croaking under the moon, frail and fleeting. "It sure it tough to keep up with the others, more so with my superiors. It's as if there was a barrier," she looks up, eyelids and lips gradually collapsing as a hand grasps and pulls at the fence, "a barrier that I can't overcome no matter how much thought and time I put into my training."

"… Yeah. You know, sometimes… when I look at how good the others are getting now that we're piloting," my eyes also seek any thread of light, yet only find the never-changing gray of swirling clouds, a slow rustling of cold wind as the sole answer to my call, "I wonder why I was chosen to be on the Surface Pilot Academy. When you think about it, it's like we're pigeons trying to fly along eagles."

"Ahaha… It feels like that sometimes. Oh sorry, I didn't mean to get so down," she immediately bows down, pulling at her hair a bit.

"It's fine, I feel like that from time to time, too. At least you're already commissioned, so you can show your worth to the UN."

Her eyes again seek the clouds, leaning onto the fence, nose poking outwards as her fingers grip at it. Tae-san then sighs, slowly, as a single hand lets go and limply slides to her side. "I don't know…"

"I mean, you're able to properly fight now, yes? Even then, earning your stripes is proof you must be doing something right."

"… Sometimes I don't really know anymore. Sometimes I feel as if I didn't really deserve to be here."

"Why? Didn't Akane-san say you're her favorite partner when we trained? Is there, um, something giving you trouble in your new squad?"

She averts her eyes, her lips curving and twisting. "Yeah. There's a new course we're taking that's… hard or arduous doesn't begin to explain it," expression tightens, falls apart before she shakes her head. "Whenever we practice, I'm always on the lower end of the scores. And since a few days ago, no one has given me any pointers or anything… I think," she wraps and constricts both arms around herself, crawling ivies biting into her flesh, "they're giving up on me."

"… Is it that big of a gap?"

"It's not about skill or finesse, I guess. Akane and the others are catching up truly fast, but when it's time to fight I can never score even a draw against our superiors. Haha, I guess I just don't have it in me." Stopping to take a deep breath, putting her hands in her pockets and continuing to look up, like a pigeon after it got hit by a rock, knowing it will never soar those clouds. "I don't really know if… if I'm actually helping, if I'm worth my rations. Maybe, you know, it would be better if a more experienced soldier were in my place. I'm sure the Captain and the 1st Lts think so."

"… I can see what you mean. Not everybody can be an elite pilot, after all."

"Yeah… Siiigh…"

Without nothing else to say, we simply look up at the clouds that refuse us a mere speck of sunlight before it all goes dark again for the day. The grip on the fence doesn't lift but it wavers, lips quiver as she hunches over a little bit. Words get stuck in my throat, jumbled together as if there were an ant army marching through it. A slow feeling, the shock of a splash of cold water but constant, makes me sigh too, hunch over a bit.

I always got along well with Tae-san, mostly due to how simple we were. Us and Kashiwagi-san used to hang out a lot back when we all were Cadets. Asakura-san and Chizuru-san were always being strict on our roles and duties, Kei-san didn't listen at all, Takahara-san was always challenging Akane-san to one up Chizuru-san, Meiya-san was so cold back then too, and Miki-san was even more reserved.

That's why I get how she feels. How it is to walk behind prodigies like them all, to live in the shadow they cast.

What I know best are medical topics and survival in the wild. When I enlisted, I was sure they were going to be train me to become a military doctor or something. The letter for admission to the Surface Pilot Academy was a shock, even more when I read where I ended up assigned to.

Chizuru-san has a keen eye for keeping us in check and can plan ahead with hawkeye precision, Kei-san is great in CQC and can adapt on the fly to almost any situation, Meiya-san's skill with a blade is off the charts and her pool of knowledge seems to simply know no end, and Miki-san is a great sniper and an even better comrade to work with. And then there's Takeru, who can do anything and is even a great asset to the XO herself. And in the last spot…

There's me, the mediocre one of the team.

Since I didn't knew as much as Chizuru-san or Meiya-san, they often cut me off quickly. They still do, from time to time, even when all I want is to clear the air or get back on track of the conversation. I know they apologized a few times but, somehow, I'm still reluctant to talk openly with them.

And all of them are important people to boot. One related to the Prime Minister, another to the nobility, the other to the Undersecretary and the last one to the infamous General Ayamine. All that's left is for Takeru to also be some sort of illegitimate son of a noble for jackpot. In comparison, I'm just a normal girl. I don't really have a bigger purpose to fight more than to earn my living… since I can't recall when was the last time I talked with Dad, when did he answer even one of my letters or anything…

Even Dad thinks his job is more important than me, why would anyone else care? There's nothing to gain, I can't really… contribute anything to the training or any conversation… All I can do is heal them after they fight, and only superficial injuries at that. I thought I was making some progress, finding my niche, but no matter how much I reach out the clouds will always elude me, it seems.

… Looks like I'll always be a one-winged bird, mom. Only able to trudge on in the soil, only dreaming of what it is to truly fly beneath the sun.

"Sorry, I didn't mean to bring your mood down," she apologizes, enforcing the grip on the fence.

"It's okay, I also… feel the same."

"Are the others excelling in their trainings?"

"Ahaha, yeah, they are. All of them were amazing, really. Oh, Chizuru-san and Kei-san finally worked together today. Can you believe it?"

"Huh?! Really?! You're not pulling my leg, are you?"

"I wish I were, they didn't give me any windows to try and trade shots. It was… crushing, today's defeat." Both in the battlefield and in the classroom. All of them had questions and clarifications, understanding of those complex terms Takeru elaborated on.

And then, there was me trying to scribble it all down, make tables and keep things tidy.

"… You know, seeing Chizuru-san and the rest improve so much got me thinking," I whisper, tugging at my elbows. "… What if I just don't belong here? What if everything I've done until now was just a fluke?"

What if one day I can't take the screams anymore? What if I freeze like today in real battle? What if my lack of results ends up getting someone killed? Outside of survival in the wild or patching injuries… there is nothing I can do for my squad.

"But you're still not that far behind them, right?"

"Sigh… For now. Is Akane-san not helping you train?"

"I… don't want to hold her back," she says, shrugging with a dry chuckle. "That's why I'm staying awake at night, reviewing my notes and all. But I'm sure everyone notices I'm barely keeping up… so at least I don't wanna ruin their runs, you know?"

"Yeah, I get what you mean… I've tried suggesting some tactics to Chizuru-san or Meiya-san, but you can imagine how that went."

Really, if not for Takeru, I don't know if we'd still be called a squad. Thanks the Heavens Kei-san is no longer provoking Chizuru-san, and that Meiya-san seems to be regaining her habitual composure, but I know that all it takes is a spark.

"Haha… I suppose we can just march on and hope for the best," she suggests, the low and lost tone betraying the words spoken. Shrugging, shivering as another gust surrounds us, she rubs her arms. "Brr… It's getting really cold. I think I'll be going back inside. Are you coming with?"

"… No, I feel like staying for a while longer. Send my regards to Akane-san and the rest, though."

"I will, I will. Well, maybe we'll cross in the hallways soon. Until later, Mikoto-san," Tae-san waves at me, finally smiling. I return the gesture and she hurries back to the stairs, despite how her posture is still aiming down and not because of the cold.

So I turn around and look up, up to the darkening clouds. The almost uniform gray sheet that covers the sky as the afterglow already retreats for the day. The lights of the base's perimeter come to life, the trackfield gains illumination as well. Looking down at it, I notice there's someone there… going by the shape of the hair that must be Meiya-san.

Even at this hour, she's still training. Maybe because it's getting colder so she rather do it now instead of later at night?

"… And here I am, unable to lift a finger. Siiigh…"

As stagnant as the clouds, gray and unchanging. All I can really do is remain behind the others anyways, so I guess it fits me well enough. Another month of Dad not responding my letters, and this time there was no plushy either. Maybe he only wanted me out of the house…

Sigh… Don't even have the energy to go sit on a tree and rest, or to try and climb somewhere. If it had been earlier I could have paid the hill a visit, but time simply flew me by as I checked my notes.

"… I wonder if there is anything I can really do to be of use, even with a single wing."

---

A few hours later.

(Simulator Room.)

---

Resting against the rails, arms dangling to the air without tune or reason, I eye sideways the monitors that are now turned off despite the thrashing of the sims. Apparently, these testings are to be some super top secret matter. The Instructor justified herself by saying she doesn't want to have Takeru showing off and eliciting an aggressive response from some soldiers, even a few stares still clung to us as we proceeded with the runs.

A buzzing in my ears continues to echo, to drill deeper every second. It's as if I had roots growing inwards, crushing and clawing at the back of my head. Uuh… I barely could keep up with Kei-san, the added impulse was truly something out of this world. And yet, the system didn't feel as natural as before. The sensitivity aside, some turns and moves weren't mine. It was as if the TSF was piloting me instead. Even if Takeru said that with time our own data would gain hold in the system, the worst of it all is… without those insane dodges I wouldn't have made it to the end of the drill.

I passed the training because Takeru's imprinted patterns saved my neck. If it had been my own moves, I would have failed. Once my own patterns take hold and his are erased, replaced by my own style, once the way in which my machine stands and aims changes… Will I start losing performance? Wouldn't it be better than to simply roll out the TSF without me in it?

Hehe… In the end, an empty machine mimicking him is better than me…

"Hey Mikoto, what's up?" Takeru calls out, coming up the stairs towards me while fiddling with his headband. "Feeling down?"

Lifting myself off the rails, choking them and taking a deep breath, I return the smile. "What? I'm not down, I was just lost in thought about the training."

"Really? Well, how's it going for you?" he asks, stopping by my side.

We then rest a little while chatting, doing small talk of our trainings. Apparently, the system will still retain his insane dodging skills but I still have to think and learn the patterns to trigger and improve them, mold them to my own convenience. I wonder if someone like me could reach such a level of aptitude…

"But I wish everybody could be as positive as you Mikoto," he shrugs, ruffling his hair as an eye closes. "If only the others could try stuff out as sincerely as you do."

"Ahaha, what are you saying? They're all better than me… Positivity won't make my piloting better."

"Uh, that's not true? Not giving up in front of a challenge is key to improving. And I do think you're better in some stuff," he nods, facing me frontally, openly, not blinking for a second.

"Me? Better? At what?"

"You never shy away from a challenge, and you try things out without any preconceptions. That's really important for growing as a pilot, or in any job really, that you're always looking for new ways to do stuff."

"I think you're giving me too much credit. I'm nothing special."

I'm not you. I'm doing my best just to keep up. I try many things because I do nothing right, because I need to know to adapt to whatever I'm needed to do to remain useful. Just that, nothing else. A parrot can repeat and learn many words, but it will never properly be able to hold a real conversation.

"Hey, that's not true," he looks straight at me like a hawk gazing over prey, but he smiles warmly as usual. "You're doing well, Mikoto. Sure, there is much you can improve on but you should be more proud. Not everybody could adapt as fast to the XM3 as you seem to."

"… It's easy to fight when your data is there to save my neck, you know," I sigh, facing away, interlocking my fingers.

"Well, yeah, I guess," he admits, saying nothing for a moment.

The permanent buzz of the sims remains as the sole company in the void vastness of the sim room, I can't help but to again rest on the rails and let my hands sway.

"But you did save our backs many times during the drills, remember?" he comments, the welcoming chirp of morning echoing.

"That was no fluke, that was your awareness at its peak," Takeru is staring as I look up, with a radiant confidence in his gaze. Without any tension or trying to flee my eyes, breathing relaxed as well.

"That was… Takeru, do you really think I'm that good?"

"Yeah. You can get better, but I think you're doing fine so far. We're being trained in one of the harshest courses possible, Mikoto. And now we're treading unknown ground with the OS. So, yeah, if you ain't crashing you're doing fine."

"… That's a pretty low bar, if you ask me."

"Do you wanna guess how many times I crashed myself attempting the sharp dodges and aerial charges you guys are all forcing out of the OS now?"

"Eh? Well… Someone like you probably got it right immediately. I mean, you were cruising the sim practice since the start," I shrug, tapping an ear.

"… Our hands and feet combined wouldn't be enough," he whispers, closing both eyes as he shakes his head.

"Oh… Was, um, during your special missions?"

"Huh? Oh, right… Yeah," he nods, scratching his head as he looks away, "the XO pushed me to my limits when starting the work on the XM3, you see. And back then, I failed and crashed far more times than I can remember as of now."

"But it only took you a few weeks in the end… You're a genius, it seems…"

"… A genius in tenacity, maybe."

"Huh? Tenacity?"

"Yeah. I guess being a stubborn bastard is my best quality, I just… don't know how to give up, for better or worse."

"How can not surrendering be a bad thing, though? If you're always doing your best, I believe that is worth much praise." More with the spectacular results you bring about. Compared to that, my efforts are just a dime a dozen. If we were tables, you'd be serving a banquet while I'd have a stumped leg under a cat's sharpening claws.

"Well, not knowing when to quit it is dangerous, you know," he simply says, shrugging, arms falling as he looks at the sims. "But I am here because I keep moving forward, despite the unending pile of failures I cause. And with enough time, you'll also be able to bring about a better performance, Mikoto," he nods back, smiling again.

"… I see. Well, sorry for the weird question. Say, there was this new dish in the PX-"

"Is everything alright, Mikoto?" he asks, holding my gaze.

"Ahaha, yeah, I'm fine. So anyways, about that dish. It was so spicy! I felt as if my tongue was going to just dry off and fall," I clasp my cheeks with my palms, remembering the taste as I narrow my eyes.

"… You sure everything's fine? You don't need to fake it with me."

"Fake it? Haha, what are you talking about? That dish was really-"

"Mikoto," Takeru crosses his arms, expression clouding over as he edges closer, our elbows almost touching, "anything troubling you?"

"… Was it that obvious?" in a low tone, I ask while looking down.

"Well… While you usually go into weird tangents, you tend to scratch your left ear whenever you're nervous or bothered."

Huh? I… do what? He noticed something like that? Wait, was he looking at me so much? When? Why?

Ugh… Dammit, now I don't know what to say!

"So, I can lend you an ear if you want," he suggests as he fiddles with his hair, stealing glances my way.

I gulp, making circles on my legs for a little while. Toying with the fin add-on in our wrists, lips quivering as if I had just had ginger tea, I tap two fingers and look his way, seeing he is still gazing and waiting.

"Say Takeru… Do you really think I'm a good pilot?"

"Again, yeah, I do," an immediate reply, an even faster nod.

"… You don't think, like, that I don't belong?"

"… Why do you think that?" he asks, brows lowering as his tone. His stare on me remains, the kindling of the sun on my body at dawn when camping.

A hand raises to my ear, only to poke its underside before tracing my chin as I again flee his eyes. "Well, I'm sure you know. Everybody in our squad is someone special, and then there's me. And I am not the best at anything."

"Your midrange shooting is awesome, what are you talking about?"

"Yeah, but yours is better. And your maneuvering is also better, Kei-san and Meiya-san are also better at CQC, Chizuru-san has more tactical knowledge and Miki-san is the best sniper. What do I have?"

Nothing.

Nothing at all.

Why am I even asking him this? To force him to lie? To force reassurance out of Takeru?

Heavens forgive me, I'm such a piece of shit. Seeking pity as the sole reason for others to bear my presence.

Siiigh… Maybe I should really call it quits and request a transfer to another training course or something.

"Haha, sorry. I totally ruined your mood, right? I'm like a crow tainting your morning with its cries, aren't I?"

He's been doing great, even despite the accident and all the rumors, and here I am showering him with my problems. I'm sure Takeru has a lot of problems, real ones, to deal with already. Who am I to bother him even more with my issues? I never helped him in anything… I didn't even stand up for him when Chizuru-san and Meiya-san turned their back on him before the CCSE. And under the rain, I ran away.

I ran like a coward, without looking back for a single second.

I abandoned him to his misery. And the same afterwards, what did I do to repay his goodwill?

Nothing.

Nothing at all.

… Not like someone like me could do anything of worth for a genius like Takeru.

Hahaha… In the end, I should just shut up. It's not like anyone cares about what I think anyways. Not even my parents had time for me, why would anyone else? I can't contribute anything of worth, have nothing to offer… I should be grateful to have a roof and meals every day instead of venting at other people.

"Speaking of birds…" Takeru slowly says, ruffling his hair.

I look at him, he had his gaze lost into the ceiling, his lips curving inwards, the hand on his head caressing his hair slowly but with some strength in it. Soft, the nibbling on his bottom lip. Tight, the breath he holds hostage. Narrow, the eyes full of… sorrow? Why is he wincing in such way? D-Did I say something wrong?

He lets out a sigh, long and heavy, and then fully closes his eyes. "Do you know of a bird called the jian, Mikoto?"

"… Huh? W-What?"

"It's also known as the bird who shares its wings," Takeru tells as if to a toddler by bed, repeating words I haven't heard in a long time. "It only has one eye and one wing, so unless both the male and the female work as one they won't ever fly. Individually, they're incomplete. But together they can do what by themselves would be impossible."

"… Where did you heard of it?"

"Where?" He opens his eyes, curving his brows downwards. Staring at me, fully, before his lips shrug and he again scratches his head. "Someone… I liked a lot told me about it once. Back at my old base, I mean."

"… I see."

Of course it's a coincidence. There's no way Takeru ever met my Mom. And I never had anyone special to say those words to. Well, not like the jian is something only Mom knew about.

"But it is a sad tale, that bird," I sigh, hugging my arms. "If it never finds anyone to share anything with it, it will forever only dream of the sky." And with nothing to give, no one would desire to give the battered bird a chance.

"Thing is, I think most of us in the military are like that bird," he ascertains, nodding to the air, looking up as he winces again. "You say you can't do anything well enough, that the others are better than you, but do you think any of us could fly without the silent work of our mechanics?"

"No, but what I meant was-"

"And do you think we could do our best without the chefs doing magic with the synthetic stuff we get as ingredients?"

"But that isn't-"

"Yes, it is." Eyes ablaze, he returned my gaze. "No one can protect its life alone, we can't fly by ourselves. So, what's wrong in you being our tailwind?"

"Tail… wind? Me?"

"Yeah, you keep our backs safe, you give us the space and peace of mind we so much need. I'm sure the rest feel the same way about you, Mikoto. All of us are, in a way, reliant on the rest. No one can be a one man army, not now, not ever."

"… But wouldn't it be better if a more skilled soldier was watching your back?"

"I mean… Yeah, but you also could be fighting with better soldiers in front of you. And, anyways, I at the least wouldn't trade you for anyone."

"Huh?! You… Why?" He's messing with me, I'm sure. Why am I getting so-

"I doubt I could get along so well with anyone else, you're the only one who truly gets my bad jokes." Not a single hint of joking in his voice… "Sure, if we had a bunch of vets with us things would be less daunting, but even so I really rather have you on my team. There's just this feeling when you just sync up so well with someone, you can't replicate that anywhere else. And I feel safe with you behind me, so I wouldn't trade you for anyone else."

"… But why? Why me? I can't measure up to the others, and I don't shine anywhere, don't really contribute to the tactics' discussion…" looking down, I sigh again.

A strong pat on a shoulder, a smile welcomes me as I raise my sight back. "Well, for one, you have a better outlook."

"Outlook?"

"Yeah. Sakaki has the pressure of the leader on her shoulders, and Meiya too in a way. So, they don't know what it is to look at a squad from the rear. Tama can do that too, but she isn't as quick on her feet like you. You can support us from any position, be it the rear, the midfield or the frontlines, and you're always aware of what's around you despite how you might seem to be always out of it. You're terribly attentive to the micro-side of the battlefield."

"… Huh? Really? You really think so?"

"Yeah. These drills with swapped positions are proof of that, you know? The others are having trouble but you're adapting just fine, right?" he suggests, nodding again.

"… One of the perks of being a jack of all trades, I guess." And master of none at all.

"Come on, don't be like that, please," the tender crack in his voice stabs my gut, enhances the buzz in my ears. "Mikoto, hey," patting my shoulder again, leaving his hand there, he waits but… but I can't look up, "how many times have you saved someone's back in the sim runs?"

"… I don't know. And that's all I can do, in the end."

"Hey, that's really important, you know. We can move forward because we know you're behind us. You are also braver than most, since you're the only one that actually tried to follow me and my dumb moves. The fact that you realized my dodges are triggering is because you are attempting them, to also break them into your own style. You're doing great for a first run, for real," he says with a small chuckle, winking at me when I look up as he steps back.

"… But in the end, I don't really shine. All I can do is remain behind someone and watch their backs. If you ever needed me…" I hang my head, hiding my hands behind my back.

"I'm sure the rest also think they're at fault now that they're trying out the XM3, to train like this is a great jump from what we were doing. And you all were already trying hard to get out of your first slump, too. Don't be so down, Mikoto."

"But when I'm needed, I end up coming up short. I'm sure you could find someone as good as me anywhere else," turning away, resting onto the rails again, I sigh and nibble at my lips, gripping at my elbows. "In the end, we'll end up shuffling through many squads. We're all just pieces in a board, when you think about it. When one of us goes down, you'll have to move on and find another partner."

And someday that will happen. And that's why me and Tae-san are so scared of our own shortcomings. Because, unlike elite soldiers like you, we're replaceable, expendable. No one would notice if we disappeared one day, no one will weep for our deaths. I bet Dad won't even notice there's no more letters arriving at his office, he might… even be happy I stopped sending them, might not even learn I died until who knows when.

"Mikoto, please," slowly coming to my side, he again pats my shoulder. "That doesn't mean your efforts are any less valuable, right? Sure, work is like that but right now you're with us, and we do appreciate you being here."

"… But if I ever fail, you'll have to move on and keep climbing the ladder, even if using my head as a stepping stone. That's how things work, no one will remember the losers."

"… So you're saying that if I drop dead or end up in a wheelchair for the rest of my life, you'll just forget about me? Dude, that's real cold." He squints his eyes, puffing his cheeks a bit.

"It's not that! It's just…" Ah, why am I saying such cruel things to him when Takeru is only trying to cheer me up? Ugh… "I mean, everybody is expecting great things from me since I'm here, and I don't… I don't know if I am up to par with their expectations." I inhale slowly and bring my hands together, I look upwards as I sigh. "I don't want to disappoint the rest or the Instructor, but I know I'm not that good. And we're not allowed to fail, not in the battlefield. So, well, maybe it would be better if someone else were here in my place. That's what I think sometimes."

"I see…"

Then, silence around us.

Gulping is hard, looking up is impossible.

Here he was, trying to lend me an ear, a hand.

And here I am, venting and bitching at the only person that has tried to listen to me in… I don't even remember anymore.

Sigh… I really deserve it. I'm the worst, to ruin his night with my problems.

"… Then, the solution is simple," he says, smiling again as he nods a few times.

"Huh? Really? What is the solution?" He always seems to have the right words, somehow. What is this solution?

"Simple. Make love to your fears."

"… Huh?"

"You will fail, you know."

"What?"

"We all do. Making mistakes is a part of the learning process. I know tests and evaluations punish you for screwing up, but that is an integral part of the curve. If you don't try it out, you'll never know what you're doing wrong. So, while I get the 'Do or Die' mentality we need as soldiers, taking stuff in with such apprehension ain't the right call, Mikoto."

"But… But I'm always the one that-"

"And yet, here you are," he chuckles, looking straight into my eyes, far more bright than the overhead lights. "Despite the hellish basic course, the shit of the CCSE, and all that has come since then, you're still holding up nicely enough."

"… It won't be the same once we get commissioned, coming up short then would make it obvious I was just winging it the whole time. I don't… I don't know if I-"

"People will die Mikoto," he winces, and his face lost all sunshine. Dusk was coming in his complexion as he gazes up, as he hits the rails. "I assure you, if you could somehow go back in time a thousand times, you will never find a way to save everyone. It's a cruel thing, yeah, but people will die. Not because of your lack of skill or not, but because that's just war."

"B-But I-"

"Do you think the Instructor didn't lose comrades? Does that make her a 'failure?"

"N-No! I'm not saying that, someone like her is capable of saving many lives, I'm sure. But, well…"

Takeru's face does not thaw the almost predatory glint, the aggressive clenching of both fists and jaw. He takes a deep breath through his nose and ruffles his hair again, slowly weaving strands in between his fingers.

"It doesn't matter how good or bad you are. People will die, that's a fact. And if you survived, that's enough. If you ever want to stop fighting, that's enough too. The results might say you're a coward, that you failed in protecting what was dear to you…" he again closes his eyes, folding his arms, "but shit is going to hit the fan eventually. So, instead of worrying about what you can do, of what might be, try to do what you can."

"… Is there really something I can do to make a difference here? It doesn't look like it, you're all so much better."

"See what you do best and try to do it better, try to find a new angle to complement it, and try to make peace with your fears. If you prepare yourself mentally it will make the pain easier to manage. Sure, there's some stuff… no one wants to prepare for," he bit his lips for a second, sighing afterwards. "But it's better to learn to live with that pain, to carry it with you, than to bottle it up or to look away from it. Trust me, you don't want to do that."

"… Did something of the sort happen to you?"

"Yeah. Remember how I told you guys I learned most stuff I know from my old squad? Well, wanna hear something crazy? When I started out, I was a total wimp. An absolute zero that couldn't even run a klick."

"Huh?! No way, get out of here."

"For real, I was a disaster. Couldn't even hold a rifle straight, and I got throw to the moon and slashed in half in CQC practice all the damn time," he nods, puffing his chest for some reason. "But even though I was a mediocre piece of shit that only knew how to complain, I had people that were- are dear to me lending me a hand to stand up every time I thought of laying down and giving up. So," he looks back at me, the small yet honest smile, the complexion unfaltering as a recently washed TSF, the bright gleam in his eyes which would put even dawnbreak to shame, "if I could become this good, you also can reach a future you that makes you proud. Small steps, Mikoto."

"… You're not lying?" He shakes his head, lips pluck a bit. "And, um, how did you deal with your… situation? I mean, your prior squad… well…"

"… I won't say that's easy. Persevering when the sky falls on you and the sea collapses below is torture at times, yeah. But above everything, there was always something I wanted to do. Don't you have a dream, even if it seems like a fantasy, that you'd like to see through?" he asks, holding my gaze until I nod. "Well, then you simply have to calm down, halt the gears of thought, and rest. Once you're well rested and without those bad ideas spoiling your head, then you think on what you really can do well and how to polish your rough sides. So long as you maintain a clear head most of the times, things will be a bit easier to manage even if life likes to sucker punch your fucking kidney outta nowhere."

"Pfft… Don't be silly."

"But doesn't it feel like that at times?"

"Well, yeah, I guess. Sigh… So I just gotta think things calmly, huh."

"Yeah, for real. You say you're not useful or something, but really, review the footage of the trainings when you've got the time. See for yourself what you do for the pacing of the team," he nods with a smirk, I can't help but to return the gesture. "In time, I guess you'll learn to handle your own bad strokes. But, one day, if you do make even a small effort to keep that side in check, you'll realize you're no longer getting paralyzed in front of what you once feared so much. And then…" he chuckles a bit as he looks at nowhere in particular, raising a finger-gun at the ceiling. "And then it will be time to fuck whatever it is that scared you as hard as you feared it. Sadly, facing that stuff head on is the only way to deal with it. And that, is a fight you have to play on your own, Mikoto. No matter what I say or do, if you don't see what little good things you do it won't matter. So, uh, well, if you ever want to train or test anything my ears are always open," he nods again, as welcoming as he was in the first day. Without any scorn or arrogance, simply offering his hand.

… Thanks.

"But what if I can't face these… bad thoughts?"

"You can. Just that it'll be different than how I did it. Some people pump themselves out in battle, others hold tightly to their duty or religion, others dedicate themselves to an activity, others write bad novels. The important thing is, you find a way to deal with whatever it is that scares you. And for that, you must chill, Mikoto!" he says with a grand gesture, pointing the finger-gun at my forehead. "Once you're calm and collected, then you think about what you can do. No guilt or self-loathing involved, you hear me? You despair after you die," he says, low, as he leans a bit closer. I nod by reflex to my own reflection in those eyes, that remain on mine and nowhere else, to that smile, small and slow, which makes my lips again quiver a bit.

… Was it always so simple? All I had to do… was give me enough time to think things through? All this time I didn't do any introspection on my results, I just kept on marching onward without much thought other than blaming myself for not being as good as the rest, and trying to compensate for that. I never thought my weakness could be my strength, or that I should be open about my fears. The Instructor was so firm about us having to be resolute and driven as soldiers ever since we arrived under her care, I always thought speaking of my insecurities would make the others look down on me, save for Miki-san.

"… Thanks a lot, Takeru. I… still don't know what I want to do regarding my place in our team, but I think I'll try being a bit more open with the gang for starters."

"Good to hear. And really, don't be so down on yourself. Why don't you try letting the rest fight without you for once? See for yourself what they do without you."

"Oh, to actually let them fight as a flight? I wonder if the Instructor will let us do that."

"Don't worry, I'll go bother her later for you," he says with a smug grin, holding a chuckle.

"Hahaha, you'll get punished if you do."

"Don't sweat it, worst case I bug the XO instead."

"Come on, don't be silly. Your punishment is gonna get worse if you do that."

"Ah, what's a few more days in the cell? Anything they throw at me is nothing after so many nights of cold showers," Takeru then puffs his chests, ruffling his hair with one hand.

"Heh, don't be an idiot."

"Squad, assemble!" the Instructor calls, so we share a look.

He shrugs with an eye closed as he moves, so we go to her summon as the ones practicing exit the sims.

… Thanks a lot Takeru. Really. You say I'm always looking after the rest, but even in that you're better than me. But you're right, I have to try to move past this doubts that plague me, before it's too late.

So even if it is mortifying, I suppose I first have to get in the right mindset. To not despair until I die, and make the most of my present. I suppose, what he said does ring true then. We're all like the jian, tending to the blank points of our comrades. I have to be brave for them, just like how they're brave for me. That's how we started feeling like a squad after the CCSE, when we started working together under the same goal.

So, little by little… I'll try and offer my grain of sand, wherever it is it finds its place. And one day, one day I'll be enough to repay this kindness, to properly stand by and protect you, Takeru. To lend you this little wing I am, for whatever little reassurance I can give.

---

A/N: I know this chap kind of kills the pacing of the issues Keru and Yuuko are dealing with, but since there hasn't been anything for Mikoto thus far in the story I decided that giving her a chapter was long due. Also works for the incoming end of the arc, which is closing in before ten or so chaps if I stop splitting them.

I haven't had time to reply to reviews, so thanks to all those commenting. And while shipping is one thing I won't confirm or deny, I'd wait until the end of this arc before waving a white flag for Meiya. The hints are already placed to figure out the new twist of this section, so hopefully it lands well despite the, um, graphic nature of the incoming mess.

Anyways, I won't be replying to reviews for a while but thanks a lot for leaving them. I think the pacing of these last chapters will clash with the last, uh, twenty-something but the gas has to e stepped on at some point.

As always, thank you all for reading. Stay safe.

Zuoriel

Anchor

Chapter 97:

Anchor

---

December 8th. Near 1 PM.

(Briefing Room N° 4.)

[ Chizuru ]

---

"… And that is all," the Instructor concludes, resting the report on the nearest desk and facing towards us, casting a shadow over the projected images on the wall. "Any questions?"

Gulping slowly, exhaling with even more delay, I try and step forward. Only to drag my feet on the ground, almost recoiling away from the locked stare that seems to glimmer in the low light available in the room. "Instructor, ma'am, are we to operate on our own in the field?"

A minute contortion in her eyes, that veer towards the other three lined up besides us, she coughs and faces towards them. "No, we shall have you cadets divided in pairs. Each one will be accompanied by one of the Royal Guards here, to both prevent any unnecessary struggles from occurring and support you cadets in case of emergency."

"Instructor, how will the chain of command work then?" Mitsurugi asks, keeping her posture bolted in perfect composure, her face and eyes upwards.

"I shall oversee the operation myself, 1st Takamura and both 2nd Lts Tsukuyomi shall remain assigned as temporary support for UN crew," she says, taking a second to nod their way. "Of course, we all shall be relying on their expertise but the final say will be in my hands, no matter how dire the situation becomes. Are we clear?" she inquires, facing ever forward as if to bathe in sunlight. Her eyes, the mark of the scythe, remain on Mitsurugi's, who relents a nod along the expected answer despite the clear twisting in her lips.

… It isn't as if I couldn't understand, for my own insides are enduring cruel nails being hammered in at the words we're receiving. A volcano of the Southern Yatsugatake Mountains may erupt soon, so both the Diet and the Shogunate requested UN aid, in consonance with the speech Her Highness had done a few days prior. And for some reason, we have been chosen for the task. I suppose, a low effort to not decline the request, a meager commitment to avoid sending actual soldiers in case of emergency. Since the MDF is busy rebuilding the defense lines after the last attack from Niigata they don't have the hands required for the evacuation, so I guess deploying us to this unexpected request is merely an attempt at parley. Who knows what transpired behind curtains to have the Empire openly forward this plea.

So, sharing a look with Mitsurugi, I lightly shrug and sigh, she imitates the gesture with a light scrunching for only a passing second. While the Instructor proceeds to describe the topography, warning us not to fly too high just in case, the marks of the terrain is all I can see. The desolate barren land of the wilderness in which these civilians willingly have chosen to remain behind.

I do welcome the chance to prove my worth, and by aiding my people too, but it does feel wrong to have the UN meddling in our domestic affairs. I know the MDF doesn't have the people nor the time to perform an evacuation over such a large lot of land, but still, it's the people's land, their homes and villages.

Must we truly coerce the civilians away from their own property, for the sake of some possible future BETA incursion? If such a thing as a concern, a true one, then the UN authorities would have demanded a thorough evacuation beforehand at some point since the invasion was halted in 1999. The eruption seems to be more of an excuse for an agenda of today instead of a concern of those in power to safeguard our people.

And yet, the diagrams shown nor the cracks evident in both the Instructor's and the guards' slow gestures tell no lies. To leave the civilians at the elements' mercy in such precarious conditions in the literal middle of the wilderness, with the risk of an eruption as well, would be equal to abandoning them to their luck.

… However, will their lives truly be better in the slums, in the already overflowed shelters? What do we even do if they refuse?

… Drag them by force, point a barrel to their temple?

Feeling my breath clogging at the end of my throat, I steal a glance at the others. Mitsurugi also seeks my gaze, with the same conflict swirling in her eyes as if a perfect mirror she had turned into. We both tighten our lips, acknowledging the reflection. Tamase is doing her best to remain standing in attention as her knees threaten with betrayal, not to mention and the unnatural, statue-like straightness she's endowing. Yoroi is the opposite of her though, unable to cast away the clouds which mire her face and rain down on her posture. Ayamine retains her usual unreadable face, but she is strangely focused on the speech. Our eyes cross, she returns a slow but firm nod as if taking in air to endure the rocking of the cockpit.

… Shirogane-kun, however, was clearly not paying much attention. His skin is paling again, which is understandable for how brutally he bested us during our last training moments before. Yet there is no sway of his head, no threads keeping him standing nor crushing pressure in his features like with the rest. Lacking any signs, he's the only one in the room that's still calm. An easy flow of breaths, a relaxed albeit tired posture. Well, compared to what he suffered in Yukon such a mission may not be as-

"You will all sortie with real armaments," the Instructor tells, eliciting a drowned gasp on me and the other four.

We never used real weaponry yet. Watching her as she paces in front of the projected image, there is no hesitation in her eyes or steps as she switches the displayed images.

"You will carry with you Block C weaponry, which consists of a Type-74 Blade and a Type-92 MPS Armor. Your TSFs are already being worked on for this operation and the crew are already preparing the Type-87 Maintenance Trailer and Support Vehicles. There is at least fifty people working at this very moment to ensure this mission meets success, you know?" she says, looking at us one at a time while folding her arms. The unblinking stare sends a shiver to slither down my spine. "I believe I've already taught you of how much it costs to deploy a TSF, even to something as simple as a mock battle near the base. I suppose, it is now time for you to see the other costs of an operation."

The Instructor hastily clicks something on the laptop she had by her desk, the slideshow of images fades to a simple white. We share some gazes, I see the three guards nodding slowly in agreement to the notion. Shirogane-kun simply idles a hand on his hair while looking away, uninterested, absent.

The Instructor clears her throat before hitting a key, a new image replaces the blinding blankness. This time, however, the projector shows the cameras on the hangars. Mechanics fine-tuning the joints, part of the crew mounting the Jump Units carefully into the cargo. The image changes to Yoroi's TSF being brought into its trailer with both shoulders moved to the front. Another click, more personnel outfitting the other support vehicles with tools, machinery and supplies, as well as a few of them being loaded with the weaponry we will use during the mission.

She clears her throat, nodding our way and again scouting our eyes. "As you can see, the mission has already started. We pilots are nothing more than the hammer that puts the nail in its intended place. Make sure not to forget what you're seeing now when you're in the field, cadets, regardless of what setbacks you may encounter."

"Yes, ma'am!"

But of course, this is yet another reason a surface pilot has to contribute to the success of any mission it takes part of, to not waste the work of all the people that made it possible for the TSFs to fly. It does feel kind of surreal, seeing foreigners and Japanese technicians working alongside each other so normally, so coordinated. The other four are also wide eyed at the images we were shown, seeming to bring back luster to their expressions and postures. Except Shirogane-kun, that is now rubbing the gap between his brows as he sighs, low.

"All of these people are doing their damnedest effort for both the Japanese people that need help and for you to be able to complete your first sortie without problems. It is rare for cadets to be sent on official missions, do not let this chance pass you by," the Instructor tells, raising voice and chest, offering an ember to us. We all return a nod, she reveals a smile for but a second. "Now then, I'll announce the formations so that we can get that out of the way. Team A will be Sakaki and Tamase with 2nd Lt Mion Tsukuyomi, Team B will be Yoroi and Ayamine with 2nd Lt Shion Tsukuyomi, and finally Team C will be Mitsurugi and Shirogane with 1st Lt Takamura."

Huh? Again?! Pressing my lips upon the scythe's glint, I merely eye sideways. Mitsurugi also seems taken aback, seeking his gaze as all the others in the room. Yet, Shirogane-kun remains calm without a speck of tension or anything.

"Sgt, may I inquire on the reasoning behind the arrangement?" Takamura slowly asks, eyes ever so slightly narrowed.

"HC settled on this setup, according to compatibility," she answers in perfect poker, yet still allows a sigh. "I did try and change one particular team, but any and all issues will have to be taken to the XO in person. And frankly, it is not worth getting hung up about. I shall rely on you, members of the IRG, to guide the cadets should an unexpected setback appear," she says, staring as her arms fold again, the creeping glint of the scythe again making a xylophone out of my spine.

Takamura relents a nod, a small shift in her posture as if bracing. Both Tsukuyomis give a silent nod in acknowledgment, as does Mitsurugi. However, despite the Reaper's shadow cast over his features, despite the odd retraction of the two Tsukuyomis as they seek his eyes, that enhances when he taps his brows as if they were fleeing heat, despite the lingering eyes and sinking posture of Mitsurugi that seeks even a slight gesture, Shirogane-kun shows not a single ripple in the fold of his poker. Nothing but a calm nod in silence does the surrounding stares get out of him, also a raising brow as the extension of quietness delays its departure.

The Instructor again clears her throat, shutting off the projector and turning the lights on. With furrowed brows but a long sigh, she faces us once more. "I will be in charge of the CP during this mission to coordinate both our tasks and what reports we receive from the other squadrons deployed. Twenty four hours is all we have at our disposal to evacuate all the civilians safely without risk of getting caught on the eruption. The rest of the briefing will be done in situ once we reach our destination. The departure shall be at 2000 hours, I expect you all present in the usual hangar one full hour beforehand. You're free until then, make sure to prepare and rest accordingly. Understood? Good, well then… Dismissed!"

"Salute!

The Instructor returns the gesture, then picks up the laptop and folders she had, shuffling them under an arm. "I know it is a hard ask at the moment but, don't let your thoughts delve too much on the matter, squad. You have plenty of time to platicate and rest before the sortie, use it wisely. Shirogane, are you still on a special assignment?"

"Sadly, yes," he says with a shrug. "Gotta make up now for the time I'll be off base. On that note, I'll be taking my leave. Guys," he looks our way, giving a thumbs up, "take it easy, okay? Everything will be just fine."

"I hope so," I manage to say before sighing softly, Mitsurugi mimics me while the other three can't even return a nod in their stiffness.

"Well, listen to the Instructor and chill out while you got the time."

"Well said," the Instructor nods. "By the by, Shirogane, are you certain you cannot be excused for the day? I could try and-"

"It's fine, for real," he waves erratically. "Do not worry, there are no physically taxing tasks on my tab today. Anyways, I really should be going," he salutes again, nodding. "Later, guys. Oh, and I suppose we'll be working together again, 1st Lt," he says with a smile, glancing at Takamura.

Who slowly turns away, brushing her hair as both eyes and lips narrow. "I suppose so, yes."

Shirogane-kun raises a brow, but quickly waves our way as he leaves. Both red guards salute us before following after his shadow, stalking his every step. It is admirable, how composed he remains under the ever vigilant gaze of two Shinpan. They are the ones who seem the most disturbed by the arrangement, and Shirogane-kun's stoic mask when they're around.

"Well, the clock is tickling. Squad, I shall be seeing you at the hangar," the Instructor orders, then leaves after giving us all a nod, a firm and delving gaze. Takamura mimics the gesture, deigning a smile this time before taking her leave.

"I suppose we should be going to the PX," I say as I look around, meeting almost paralyzed nods and soldered lips.

Departing the room, for a moment only our footsteps on the bare metal accompany the automatic walking. It does little to ease the tugging of strings on my neck and stomach, forcing two fingers to try and calm the stings in my forehead.

"So," slowing down my pace, I look back, "what are your thoughts on this?"

"Hauu… W-We're going on m-m-mission…" Tamase starts swirling left and right with whirlwinds instead of eyes, the gentle quiver evolving to a full-blown earthquake. Not that I blame her, though.

"When Her Highness made that conference, I never thought something like this would truly happen," Yoroi says, low, dragging sole and sight in the tiles. "A volcano erupting… I hope everything goes right," she then tightly clasps both hands together, wincing a bit.

Ayamine pats her shoulder, giving a nod despite the extra tension of the fingers on Yoroi's shoulder, of her own tensing brows. "Don't worry, we'll complete the assigned task without issues. The Instructor will be there to support us, not to mention the guards as well."

"Ayamine is right," I follow, tapping my glasses as we take a turn. "Overworrying will accomplish nothing, such concerns will only make you blank out in the field."

"However, we have to put to practice most of what we've learned thus far," Mitsurugi notes, slowly letting a hand swim into her ponytail, also failing to bring forth the habitual shine to her veneer. "It is a great duty, to be chosen to lend a helping hand to our people. All I hope is that no altercations occur due to our uniform," she then sighs, closing her eyes. The others mimic the gesture, slowing down.

"Squad," stopping my steps, inhaling sharp as I look back, "let's not waste this chance we have been given. I do understand your… concerns over the UN taking part in the evacuation, but that is not something we as cadets should mull over. The truth of the matter is, those people do need a helping hand. Let it be us who extend it to them!"

"Yes!" Tamase and Yoroi cracked, Ayamine as usual barely squeezed it out yet nodded without breaking eye contact, Mitsurugi almost stuttered, almost didn't follow through.

And so, without much as another word, we resume our walk to the PX, eventually lining up.

Sigh… As if we didn't have enough in our plate, an official sortie. To an evac call, with the UN meddling in it as well. And with Mitsurugi and Shirogane-kun assigned together, to boot. I know she said she would try and make amends, yet he has kept his fair distance from her thus far.

I still wonder if he's truly alright. During sim training this morning, one of his cheeks was reddened again and he seemed almost about to doze off. Those eyebags are growing more, as well as his silences. Sigh… And all I can do is heed his pointers to not give him trouble during the runs.

… It is amazing, how he pilots in such dexterity. Now that we caught a glimpse of the XM3, his patterns now take on a completely different light. It's hard to believe we are again on course to completing Level C despite our slump.

I reach the end of the line, receiving my meal but not seeing Mst Sgt Kyozuka today. So I merely walk to our table, minding my steps and looking down, away from the crows which drill their unblinking knives into my nape. The warmth of the miso gives some relief to my lips, synth it may be but at least the broth retains some of the traditional taste as opposed to the prepackaged food dad used to leave stocked back home. The others come and sit, yet only the background chatter accompanies our lunch.

Halting the ascent of the chopsticks to my lips, slowing down the munching on a ball of rice, the desolate map returns to my eyes. The red dots, the estimated number of people, the conditions in which they must be enduring at this very moment. It is enough to make these small grains ricochet off my throat and land with as much violence as Shirogane-kun's acrobatics into my stomach. Sipping some more miso, I can't help but to release a sigh.

And I haven't yet repaid him for saving me during the CCSE. He supports my idea to shuffle our positions, continues to give me and the rest pointers on our runs. And all the while, I've done nothing for him. I just handed him some notes the day before the HSST Accident, some drabbles he obviously didn't need.

That day… I saw for the first time with my own eyes how much we do need the UN, their meddling notwithstanding. If not for that experimental weapon, this base would be no more. Who knows what kind of repercussions that would have had? UN it may be, but that terrorist attack was also aimed at the sovereignty and stability of our nation. We were never told what was up with that, and the news made no mention of the incident either. At least the Professor isn't having Tamase perform some top secret testings like with Shirogane-kun, her already wobbling shape would be far more bruised than it is as of now, almost mechanically eating in utter silence.

… Nobody can protect its life alone, I thought I had apprehended that teaching a long time ago. However, the same logic applies to nations, I guess. In this day and age, there is probably no nation that can be self-sufficient to the point of not needing the rest of the world. Even America would suffer if they couldn't do business with anyone anymore, if suddenly the rest of the world ended up swallowed by the ocean or something.

That's when I realized, as Tamase told us her story, how little I was doing for my squad. Always quarreling with Ayamine, barely listening to Mitsurugi's and Yoroi's advice, not doing anything for the man that saved my life. Then, when I started to look around me, to properly pay attention, I noticed a lot of little things, odd yet interesting.

The mechanics of our TSFs talking about how much they miss their families. The MP saying how they miss their regional cooking. Some of the pilots that are also in the sim room have given us advice from time to time, especially as of late. But they all agree in one thing.

"You're lucky you still can fight to protect your homeland."

I never had tried to actually listen to any of them, the notion to request such was the farthest in my mind. Now, however, their resilient strength is more than apparent. They're still fighting to someday go back home and rebuild their nation, or to give someone else that chance. For them, every grain of dirt in the planet is worth fighting for, because they don't want anyone else going through what they have. I know everybody isn't like that, but when you look around closely you can find decent people here. I just never bothered to.

And thanks to that little change in this scenery, in those tells I now see amidst the tired or bored gestures in the soldiers around, I can understand what Dad said, about us needing to strengthen our international bonds. I still don't agree with everything he said last time we talked but I concede on that point, by its lonesome the Empire has no future.

Taking one strong munch of rice, another of sip of miso, I extend an exhalation while crossing a leg, idling the tip of my chopsticks on the rim of my small bowl. To one day stand by Shirogane-kun, to relay to others what he and the Instructor have, I need to learn more. The real strength of the UN, the real scope of their operations, of the possibilities that in this organization lie. By learning all I can here, from all the contrasting points of view that are available here, I'm certain that I'll grow so much more than if I solely remained in the IJA. And if I can forge some bonds with the crew here, it will make a great difference when I eventually go back to the Imperial forces.

… But even so, before I get all fired up about the future, there is quite the daunting obstacle to overcome. And I've no idea how to breach the silence no one has dared to lift… Sigh…

"… You think Special-kun will be fine?" Ayamine's question makes me flinch. The others stiffen in their seats, she merely eyes us one at a time with the tip of her chopsticks stuck within her lips.

"Takeru… isn't so weak as if to let some meager concerns plague his mind," Mitsurugi affirms, resting her chopsticks on the tray. "I do not believe the XO would place him in any taxing duties if she herself devised our formation. He merely needs some rest this afternoon, is all," she nods, to herself most likely, despite the almost crossing brows and shrunken lips.

"Shirogane-san did look like he was in need of more sleep today," Tamase notes, eyes still on the table, while resting her cup on the already empty tray. "Do you think his extra tutoring last night overburdened him?"

"That can be it," Yoroi chimes in, then gulps all her remaining miso before sighing. "I do not like his skin tone at all, and the lethargy of his movements does mean he barely slept well."

"… Wanna call up the Instructor?" Ayamine suggests, tilting her head.

"Do you want another punishment to fall on us, right at this time?" I ask, she lowers her gaze and slowly, dejectedly shakes her head. "Shirogane-kun said he would manage, and this is no training drill. Let us trust in him, as he has with us, alright? Also, Mitsurugi, please try and intercede if you see Shirogane-kun pushing himself during the mission. I'd like to believe he wouldn't try anything but, well…"

"Say no more, Sakaki. I shall ensure Takeru does not bring further pains to himself. Furthermore, 1st Lt Takamura shall be alongside us. Such disquiet is unwarranted," she affirms, trying to lift her posture while folding her arms as always. A smile fails to meet its quota, her eyes veer away. "I do relent that perhaps placing us together was not wise, considering our recent arguments, however I shall endeavor to not be a burden."

"… I see. Do you think you could, uh, try and talk to the people yourself? I don't think it'd do him any good to receive any strong worded opinions from the civilians."

"Of course, leave it to me," she replies, yet the hold of her hands in the fold increases a bit, enough to bend her sleeves.

"Still, Shirogane-san does not look good… It's odd that he'd be so quiet, unfazed in the briefing too," Tamase notes while slowly toying with her tags.

"You think the Guards are harassing him?" Ayamine shoots, bouncing both chopsticks with only her lips. Mitsurugi's brows twitch yet she remains silent.

"Kei-san, why would they do that? Didn't they say they were tasked by the Professor herself to make sure Takeru didn't run into trouble?"

"Yoroi, think it well," I say, finding a finger doing circles. "Anyone in his position would be thrown off by the constant surveillance of the IRG stacked on top of whatever his special assignments are. I think we can all agree from where the petrification in his posture comes from, right? The pressure is getting to him, he is also human," the words simply leave me, the excuse blurts out. So I shrug and lean on the table, picking at my cuticles. I also have been under pressure… and I ran away, abandoned him without ever looking back.

… And instead, he came back for us. Am I going to sit by again, just because I don't know what to do? Even if he says he's fine, is there truly nothing we can do to ease his burdens just a little?

"I do not think those two wish Takeru any harm," Mitsurugi starts, words slurring and almost colliding, looking away as she fiddles with her hair, "but I do concede that his complexion is most concerning."

"It's still odd. Special-kun was hurt by them and he still doesn't look back to good health, while they stalk his every move. Something's up here," Ayamine counters, rests the chopsticks in her bowl and slumps her chin on a hand, lips twisting in.

"It might also be related to his punishment, we cannot start assuming anything," I remind, finishing a few circles as I nod. "In any case, we have to do our best to not burden him anymore, starting now. If we keep advancing at this pace, we'll reach Level B shortly. With only the final drills of Level A left, our final test is looming closer," I tell, entwining my fingers. They all tense up in attention, seeming to have forgotten how to inhale. "I know we are all aware of this from when we started basic, but the Instructor is a fierce opponent. I've no idea who her partner might be, but our last mock battle will be a great factor in our final score to decide where we're being sent to once we graduate. And the best way to ensure that comes to pass is by applying what we now know in this coming task."

They all nod in agreement. It's… such a shame. Now that we kind of started working well together, it won't take long for us to be separated. Who knows where we'll end up once we earn our wings? Akane and the rest got to remain in the base, so maybe we'll receive the same treatment. More so with the special tests of the OS, but the XO did say our coming results could and would change her approval. I bet she was hinting at this coming sortie to the evac efforts, to test our character in a high-stress situation. To see whether we have what it takes or not to be worth her consideration.

I believe it's a given that Shirogane-kun will remain here, under the XO's wing. I don't know… if I have what it takes to be chosen as his equal, if I'll ever be able to repay my debts with him. So the least I can do as of now, as their Squad Leader, is guide them all to the best score we can achieve in what little time we have left together.

"Well, let's not get all gloomy about it," I say, smiling while standing, grabbing the tray. "We have a few hours of free time, so let's make the most out of them. I think we should all go for a check-up in the medbay just in case, maybe also get some small talk with the staff there."

They all nod back, cleansing the air around the table. Our steps as we leave are lighter, faster, as if propelled by what faint daylight filters through the glass. Despite the silence that still remains, there is no gap in the formation, no one purposefully walking behind the rest.

… Our first sortie, huh. At least it came at a rather good time, with us all starting to coordinate. I can only hope to be up to par with whatever it is I can aid with on the field. And that… this first mission doesn't end up being our last. An eruption, huh… Despite earthquakes and the like being more than common, despite the indigenous tectonic activity the Empire suffers from, to be faced with dealing with the issue, to perhaps end up face to face with the lava…

Gulp… Let us hope it does not come to that, anything but that is preferable.

---

Same Day. A few minutes past 6 PM.

( Hallway, B19F .)

---

Step after step, the heels shave a bit against the floor. Two fingers massage her temple, the scientist allows herself a sigh. Closing her eyes away from the rebounding shine of the bare metal in the hallways, she delays her stride, her strokes on her forehead while groaning to herself.

" The preliminary reports from the crew of Yokosuka are not auspicious, there are no trails to follow after the BETA that are supposedly in the mainland. At the very least, my sources did confirm the area to evacuate is a safe one. So long as Takeru can keep Mitsurugi in check, I believe nothing will get out of control," she reasons, curling a strand of hair.

Pausing to take out her ID and swipe it at a lock, letting her almost closing eye be scanned, the second of wait the mechanism puts her through is enough to cause brows to almost collide, further groans as her arms softly cross. The following steps are not instantaneous, more akin to someone trying to gain stable footing on shifting sands.

Pinching her nose, she stops for a moment and takes in a sharp breath.

" All the testings we did today met with the same dead ends, albeit in more radical ways. I did not expect such wrath from the 00 Unit, for a real berserk overload two days in a row. Sigh… Now if only I could gain a quick answer to my counter-proposal for Operation 21st, then I could devise a proper path forward after this little sidequest Takeru so badly wants us to take," she repines, fingertips waving to and fro on her scalp as she slowly walks, gaze lost upwards. "Actually… What was he doing all this time?"

Taking out her PDA, she quickly shuffles through bloat mails but does not find the sought name with ease. Lips pluck, eyes narrow, taps gain haste and a bit of impulse, and yet the deep dive into her inbox returns unsatisfactory results, a light kindling to her features and a propelling stomp to her stride.

"Why hasn't he reported anything yet? Yashiro too, for that matter," she wonders as she stuffs the little machine in her lab coat's pocket. Deciding that arriving to the office faster would be better, she sighs and speeds up once more. " Not to mention, I haven't been able to find a single lead on this supposed sushi bar. Not the prior owner of the establishment, what was it used for, nor who did he refer with 'snake', even if I have a hunch on who was he talking about."

The wall of dry ice the soldier had mounted that day after his suggestion, the blazing inquiries she forwarded to try and wrestle any slip of info out of his lips, the ceasefire he suggested until the evac efforts were completed only brings further pressure onto her steps and lips, a strong sigh escapes through her nose. After all, many are the checks and reports she has to go through just to ensure the coming sortie of the cadets can truly be successful, you'd understand. So that it does not become a premature spark.

Turning around the corner, seeing the elevator was not resting on this floor made her eyes squint a bit, wondering where her soldier could be at the moment. The remaining distance between herself and the office was sliced in half harder every passing second, much to the wailing cries of her heels against the pristine floor.

Upon approaching the sliding door and setting foot in her dwelling, a flinch spawns on her person as her nostrils catch a mixture in the air. A second later she opens her eyes, and finds herself on a different place than she expected to be in. A vast open area near the entrance, all the books and encyclopedias lined up neatly against the wall, no stray papers nor stacks daring to try and kiss the ceiling, and a formation of folders by the wall she had seen once before.

And sitting on the usual sofa, typing in a laptop there he was, barely raising a hand in salutation.

She blinks, once and twice, before firmly entering the room, approaching the sofa. "… Takeru, when did you rearrange the room?"

"Hm?" he looks her way, raising a brow before resting his back onto the sofa. And giving her a small smile. "Why, goodnight and hello to you too, Vice Commander. How you doing? "

"Sigh… Yes, yes, hello. What did you do here? I do not recall requesting a cleanup."

"The usual? I simply tied everything up again, since I had to file the reports anyways."

"What reports?"

"You know, all the papers about the coming mission, the checks on the databases for the equipment used, stuff like that," he says, nodding while rubbing an eye.

"Wh- You already did that? But you're not allowed to- Oh, right, your ID," she catches herself, rubbing her forehead again.

"Are you feeling well, Vice Commander ? You look paler than Kasumi," he asks with a stare, slowly standing up. "Dinner is already there on the desk, by the way," he points to where usually babel towers of papers are, their reign resigned to order and a tray with chicken a la creme.

The minute contortion of a frown clears itself away as the smell reaches her nose, tongue tracing the back of her teeth and swallowing the small excess saliva thus spawned by the food. "Huh… How did you know I was arriving, though?"

"Kasumi. Also, my schedule for the sortie," he notes, doing a circle with his neck and cracking something which brings forth a small moan. "We did need one last talk before I leave, and I thought you could use the quality food today of all days, is all."

"… That is appreciated, Takeru," she smiles, nodding as she walks up to the desk, slowly sitting and basking in the scent. Before touching it however, she again stares at her soldier. "So, why did you not notify me you'd be here?"

"Uh, I tried?" He again raises a brow, shrugging. "I came here as soon as I could after training, but no one was here and you weren't answering your comms. Thought you were busy with some negotiations like last night, and Kasumi was also away then, so I was about to leave to my place when I noticed you left the office open… and took the chance to spare you the need of overseeing all the incoming reports of this sortie. I've already checked the databases, the reports are in the usual place ready to be filed or shelved, and there were no issues whatsoever during the prep work thus far," he reports, standing in attention.

She nods back, taking a bite off the chicken, licking her lips as she nods twice with a gradually enlarging smile. "Good… Very good."

"… The dinner or the report?"

"Yes," she chuckles at his groans, taking small bites off the mushrooms. "So, I assume you filed all the requested papers already?"

"Yeah. Had to let the calls come in through the voicemail to avoid inquiries, but I already sent the right papers to most offices through 2nd Lt Pyatkh."

"And you told her what regarding you doing such?"

"Punishment, you had readied everything beforehand and left me as the paper delivery boy for the afternoon," he tells with a smile, shrugging again.

"Good enough, I suppose. Did any important calls come in while I was away?" she asks, stacking mushrooms on top of the small chicken slices, before joining them with a large spoonful of rice, all of it softly melting together as her legs do under the taste.

"No, the office was calm today, mostly."

"… I see." Makes sense, since I was personally dealing with most stuff anyways. She clears her throat, the tip of her tongue tracing her lips, daring her to resume eating, but she rests her fork atop a cloth for a moment. Instead, she stares at the small redness in one of his cheeks. "Did you already attempt another tuning?"

"Yeah… Kasumi came back a while ago, lent me a hand in finishing the work here. So once we confirmed the ODL was replenished, we gave it another spin but…" he looks down, creaks down, crumbles down along a sigh, the slow descent of a dry leaf towards eternal stillness.

"Don't take it so hard, Takeru," she reassures, giving a nod. "If the 00 Unit is endowing in such aggressive reactions even when around you, it equals she is beginning to parse the emotions she inherited from Kagami. She's beginning to properly react to the recollections instead of freezing under them," she asserts before filling her lips with more rice, causing a ballooning in her cheeks.

"I know, I know… It still ain't nice to see her go mad like that, screaming bloody murder to the four winds," he barely says, not lifting his gaze. "By the way, do you already have an answer for my proposal to link my memories of her little self to her current psyche?"

The spoon halts, the tongue scouts the metallic shape. Slowly removing it, going for a spin, she sighs, short, and shakes her head. "No, I don't. Let me get some more readings on her current state, to ensure no recoil falls onto you or Yashiro. By the by, where is she?"

"In the cylinder room, watching over Sumika while reading some books. Don't worry, we already filed the results of the tuning, too," he tells, scratching an ear as he nods despite not entirely lifting his eyes, the shine within them. "So, do you have any results from the tests Motoko-san has been doing with whatever the headband is supposed to be doing?" he asks, poking the thing as he sits down and begins to close the programs in the laptop.

"Oh… Yes," wiping her lips as she nods, coughing softly the scientist gains a small smile. "The good news is that your consciousness isn't going anywhere. These last nights we could track your brainwaves with ease through the headband. Don't worry, you're not going to slip into another world suddenly in your sleep," she tells, breathing easing up and resting fully onto the seat.

"I see… For now that ain't a concern, I guess," he says, returning the nod before he closes the laptop.

After all, this was a thorn, a chain that had prevented the scientist from fully setting her mind at ease. If the Nucleus the soldier now is had become stronger through his experiences, and considering all the possible links and leaks that pull at him and are being pulled towards the anomaly, it is quite fair to affirm she did indeed fear, felt her inhalations turn up cold at the thought of him getting teleported elsewhere amidst his sleep would his radiation levels become too low again.

Throwing himself onto the sofa, placing both hands behind his head, he looks at her, almost chuckling as he finds her with a hand on a balloon for a cheek, stuffing herself with the food as the Shogun would with strawberries. She flinches as she notices his lingering stare, wiping her lips and narrowing eyes and brows his way in silent retaliation. He, however, can't help but to smile. "So why do you think this is different than last loop, with me being a stronger anomaly now? Not gonna lie, that was a concern I had, of slipping again without enough radiation in me. Any ideas?"

"Well, maybe someone is still thinking about you in their dreams?" she suggests, resting a cheek on a palm, returning the small smile.

"Do you have to tease me like this?" his lips twist and narrow along a groan, she returns a drowned chuckle.

"Oh, I'm not teasing you, however," the scientist retorts, playfully tapping her chin with the tip of the spoon.

"Sigh. By the way, I know it might take a while but, how are you going to stabilize the Nucleus?"

Resting the utensils and dropping the teasing, she nods as she interlocks her fingers, tightly. "I still need more time, I can't risk anything going wrong here."

He leans forward, unblinking fixation he returns onto her eyes. "Even so, if that characteristic of my existence cannot be reversed, it would be for the better to play to that assumption. Even if the conductor can be neutered, I am already a strengthened Nucleus, capable of bringing forth sudden changes if high emotions happens near me. We can't rule out the possibility that this will play against us, too. If so, I still think erasing-"

She slams the desk, enough to make the utensils flutter and displace what few folders he had left for her. With a vicious glare that could splinter a cockpit open, venom slithers within those pressed lips. "No, because as I told you, our lives are entwined, Takeru. You vanishing from this world could, and most certainly will, have dire consequences for the psyche of Her Highness and her devotees, you'd understand."

"Better to deal with a certainty than to fight against the unknown," he reasons before taking a slow sip of what cold coffee remained in his cup.

"You are worth the cost. Plus I am trying to fix the memory loss problem, but without actual data I can't make any promises," she relents, going for a sharp spin to loosen the raking, the tearing in her nape. "And remember that I can't guarantee that the machine will work, it only has a 40% probability of success. If, for whatever reason, there's an error when we're using it, you might end up subjected to causality's whims again," she tells, slow, slower is her breathing when meeting his eyes in the full cloak of new moon. "I rather we tread the one road that guarantees both of our goals to be completed, despite the inherent risks. I believe our wishes coincided in this matter, Takeru?"

"… Fine, I won't press for now. But you do have an idea, right?"

"I do, and it's quite simple," she resumes a playful smile, grasping her chin as her heels stop the spinning. "Since we can't keep kicking the ball forward for much longer, we just need to anchor the magnet to this world. To give you an unwavering reason to stay here, a motive so strong that it will remain always in your subconscious or that it makes you accept you're no longer going to another world. You did told me that in your firsts loops you stopped dreaming about your world once you got together with one of the girls from your squad, right?"

"Yes, that's true. But don't you have anything a bit more… I dunno, conclusive?" he requests while scratching his head, narrowing both brows.

She simply shrugs and takes another bite of chicken. "No, not without using the 00 Unit to help you regulate your own data," she tells, flatly. Only to smirk, wipe the excess cream that drips off her lips with a fast swipe of her tongue. "Why, would you not possess enough incentives to remain here, mmh? Do I really have to put on the santa suit to convince you to-"

"N-No! Dammit, stop bringing that up," he flares up, harder than his Jump Units.

"Oh, why so bothered? I'm only trying to help you establish a stable link in this world?" she says, the edges of her lips curving, a gentle glimmer in her eyes as dawnbreak which washes over her soldier.

Who inhales sharply, folding arms and compacting his already petrified posture. "Come on, get real. I told you already, that night isn't-"

"But that doesn't erase the issue at hand. You need an anchor, and Kagami is not yet ready to liberate you from the conductor. If you'd like me to go along your ideas, I need a certainty that you will remain here, to make the cost of the arrangement worth it for me. So," smiling back, slithering over the wood, bumping a hand on her chin, "why not let me be it? Unless you prefer your dear Yuuhi to become the anchor, that is."

"You know what my identity could cause for Yuuhi, she doesn't need someone like me by her shadow," he spits out, poison and blight as he veils his sight, hits a thigh.

"Then, who else could be your anchor? Kagami is not ready, you don't want to mix up your squadmates with your prior lovers, and Her Purpleness is a no go too. Who's left, Yashiro?"

"You leave the bunny out of this," he threatens, bursting into a glare. "Kasumi already had enough with the mind dive."

"So then, who will be the stabilizing anchor you so desperately need, Takeru?" she asks, staring as she finishes her plate, yet he simply looks down and compacts his features into silence. "… Let me remind you, I need you to finish the tuning. Not to mention, in proper form for the missions to come, coup or not."

"What of all the problems me being here causes? If you won't let me handle stuff on my own, it's only a detriment to keep an anomalous Nucleus in this world," he shakes his head, finishing his drink and resting the mug.

The ashen retraction in his features is replicated in the scientist's, and no caress of coffee can cleanse her complexion. "You're too important to lose, Takeru. If and when it's time, you shall be escorted to the Capital by our men. There is nothing to be gained by exposing you to any threats in such an open manner." Much less to a place Yoroi brought up, that my scouts can find no trustworthy intel on. Even if you were to confirm my suspicions… I cannot risk your life in such manner, no matter how precious Her Purpleness is for you.

"Same goes for entangling yourself with my problems," he shoots out, standing to leave the mug in its proper place.

As he does, she stands behind him, fingertips tracing his arm and shoulder. "We're already entangled, sorry to notify you."

He looks back, seeing himself in the reflection of violet, taking into the lunar scent which surrounds the lab coat. "It's not too late yet, not with the spoils you're about to reap. We can't risk a repeat of what happened in my home world to happen here."

"I said, you're staying in this world. I wouldn't be proposing such a thing if I were not certain of the inherent risks."

"Then let me tackle the sparks, Yuuko."

"Only if you allow me to be your anchor."

"If you want the intel from that world, we can debate that after-"

She taps his lips, slowly shaking her head and edging closer, causing him to softly collide against the furniture. "I want to attain the certainty of your safety, that is all I desire, Takeru. Will you let me be your anchor?"

"Yuuhi will notice, you know? And the whole 'not confusing people' also applies to you. If it's just a temporary patch, it won't work out," he squeezes himself away from her, hair flowing down as he looks at the ceiling while licking his lips, still sensing her perfume. "I am thankful for… you trying to help me in this way, but there's no need to force yourself to being the anchor."

"… Why would it be forcing?"

"Sigh… Then, what of the idea I forwarded? If you want me to be your spearhead, which I don't oppose by the way, we are going to have to deal with that sooner or later," he affirms, speaking the truth and nothing but the truth, fully returning her gaze. "I won't find Sagiri on the news when I return from the evac efforts, will I Yuuko?"

"… No, you will not."

"So your answer is positive then?"

"… We shall continue this conversation once you're back from the evacuation and I've reviewed the affairs of this one sushi bar, thoroughly," she affirms, yet groans and holds her fingers a bit harder at the lack of a retort on his end. So the scientist clears her throat, playing with some hair. "Let me tell you something good though, we got the approval for the XM3's test. It will be done next Wednesday. I plan on letting you all graduate after it, if your performance during this sortie and the trials is satisfactory enough," she nods back at him with a smile.

He returns the gesture, easing his breathing. "Got it. Well, if you don't need anything else I'll be going for my rations before meeting at the hangar with the rest," he tells, standing in attention. "Goodbye, Vice Commander ."

"Excuse me?" she quietly inquires, gaze narrowing to endure the binding of chains, to slice the clouds in twain.

"What?" he raises a brow, blinking fast at the sudden threat of an early eruption.

"It's 'See you later', not 'Goodbye'. Also, Yuuko," she scolds, lips shrugging.

"Yes, yes, my bad, Yuuko," the soldier relents as he fiddles with his hair, looking away.

"Hmm… Well, make sure not to get in any danger while out in the field, you hear me, Takeru?"

"Sigh. Yes, I know. I've no plans to let this mission repeat its take of my first loops," he nods back, meeting a pleased smile on the scientist. "Well, gotta be on my way. Later, Yuuko," he says, gently waving instead of reiterating the salute.

And with the slow raise of a hand to return the wave, she smiles. "Yes, see you later."

Finishing her coffee, she spins in her desk while placing a hand over her full belly, smiling small yet pleased. For the moment, the scientist allows her eyes to close, her feet to propel her to spin, and relaxation to ease her breathing and thoughts. Almost in equal measure does the soldier's breaths relax as he steps firmly towards the elevator, towards the goals he hopes can be resolved for their shared interests. Similar is the small smile, the circling of the neck, the nostrils that seek that fragrance that no longer is nearby. As he gets inside the elevator and she boots up her computer, both look upwards, extending a prayer of protection towards the other, a sigh as they roll their shoulders. A wish so that all their preparations since their meeting can, finally, bear fruit amidst this harshest winter they are to face.

However, despite the advantage they play with, the sailing of this tide won't be smooth for either Not if the rumbling under the soil manages to surface once again. Not if the soldier ends up meeting certain people that will be left behind on sentry duty.

… Devotees that will recognize his face and name, that were branded by the freezing fire of the shadow he once used to be, the remnants he left behind.

Distortion

Chapter 98:

Distortion

---

December 9th. A few minutes over 2 PM.

(Old Settlement. Near Mt. Tengen.)

[ Takeru ]

---

"Please, I beseech you! Do not take my land from me!"

The old lady laid again on the ground, kneeling in front of Meiya, begging to let her stay here. Takamura could not bear to look and avoided the scene by closing her eyes tightly. Only a sigh I can take, facing away from the sad spectacle.

Up above, just like back then, a mostly unchallenged blue greets the view, the calm silence of the area only disturbed by the occasional light gust, maybe some small rolling dirt down the elevations. Taking in the scent of the coldness, of what little grass remains in defiance of the winter that's almost knocking on our doorstep, Meiya's apologies and reiterated pleas for the woman to raise are met with increasing begging, fingernails raking at the dirt.

Sigh…

Thankfully, everything so far has gone good. The people did make more of a ruckus than what I remembered at first, but when they saw Meiya and she asked them, albeit reluctantly, if they were willing to leave the people accepted immediately. Going white as a ghost, some even unable to speak or meet her eyes, despite how they were oozing bloody murder when I issued the call to request to speak with them. No setbacks for now, no soldiers having to drag the people to the relief vehicles or anything, for us or the other teams. One good thing, fucking finally.

This time, however…

"CP to all units," The Instructor's face appears on my view. She again informs us that the volcano seems to be close to erupting, recommending us to hurry.

Believe me, NotMarimo-chan. If I could hit the speed up button, it would be broken already. Not only to get past the unnecessary begging of the old lady and Meiya's poor attempts at doing what she should be doing, but to get away from this place as well.

I thought I was over that, I really did. But when I felt the first tremor shake the ground, as my feet almost slipped away, those damn sounds started to crawl back from within my skull.

The electric shock waves, the tearing wires. Asphalt breaking, glass shattering, the fall of the lightpost.

I thought I was over it, that after coming to terms with everything by the hill I was really steeled over. Guess some shadows will always live by me, huh. So, I completely understand how the old lady feels now more than ever. This tiny village is her whole world, a treasure that cannot be found anywhere else in the entire expansion of existence.

"1st Lt Takamura, how is your end?" the Instructor asks from her corner in my vision.

Looking her way, Takamura took some steps away from the 'argument' and is now coiling and choking a strand of hair. "We're still negotiating with some of the civilians," she answers, dull and composed.

A momentary squinting of her eyes, the Instructor returns a subtle nod. "I see. Please do hurry, we do not know for sure when the eruption will happen. CP, over and out."

Takamura sighs, slightly dropping her shoulders yet not moving one inch. I scratch my head, mess with my hair as I take a look towards the giant stone. Tapping my visor to start scanning the area, nothing out of the ordinary comes out at first. Of course, the fissures on the rock aren't showing up. Yet. Hmm… I might have to do some sonar scanning, walking over the nearby area to reveal any fissures that may be there. Hopefully they are, if not waiting will be the only option we'll have left.

The old lady retreats into her house, shortly after the small chimney starts to act up. With slow steps as if dragging an iron ball on both feet, Meiya slouches towards us.

"She does not desire to be removed from this village," she states, eyes locked on the ground.

"And yet, we cannot simply do as such," Takamura retorts in the same submerged, almost cavernous voice that cannot raise to the surface. "Cadet Mitsurugi, do you truly believe she would not welcome the notion to depart on her own will?" she asks with a glance at the house, a little cloud smoke coming out of its chimney now.

"She stated her terms quite clearly," she counters, arms folding, face clouding over. "You two must have heard the declaration as well, surely. If she is to perish here, she shan't escape. I am aware our orders are to retrieve all civilians to safety, however…"

"But you have no intention of ever taking her away, do you?" I conclude, passing over the reluctance both are displaying. Meiya shoots a blazing glare at me, wordlessly accusing with the further squinting of her face and posture.

"Cadet Shirogane, what would you propose then?" Even Takamura seems to have been offended by my words a bit, returning the same pleasantry as Meiya.

"I'll go have a talk with her and see if we can make a truce," I simply say, not flinching away from their attempts at intimidation.

The words strike the chord, causing a shriek in their faces and further fire into their eyes. Meiya, in particular and as expected, blasts towards me as an arrow shot by Miki.

"Do not be foolish! You were witness to her wailing pleas, what words do you think can be employed to convince her?"

"Huh, then what are you getting at, Mitsurugi?" I ask, taking a step forward, raising the ante.

"What?"

"You say words are useless, wasted on this woman. Then, is force all that's left?"

"Wh- Don't you dare! Did you not hear what she-"

"First, you're gonna lower your voice. Go scream at the mountains if you're pissy, but you ain't blowing the fuse on me," another step forward, a frown I return into the fire which recedes a bit. "Second, you're the one that's already giving up. If words are useless, then on our orders we will have to take this person out of here through force. And sorry, I ain't up for that shit."

"Neither am I," she immediately replies, again folding her arms. "However, she made her terms clear. What could we say to her to change her stance?"

"I've an idea, that's better than standing around hoping she'll change her mind. Old people are really stubborn, so I don't think simply waiting will do anything for us as it is."

"Takeru, do not be foolish. Cease on this obstinacy at once."

"Have some faith in me, will you? I'll just try once, and in the meanwhile you two can think of a way to solve this if my idea doesn't work."

"Cadet Shirogane, I do not think it wise someone such as you should attempt said course of action," Takamura says, gazing, no, glaring my way as her lips purse. "Your actions will only bring us further setbacks. As the leader of Team C, I order you to stand back and remain in standby."

"I refuse."

"W-What?!"

"I don't take stupid orders. If and when the Instructor calls, I'm reporting you two are twiddling your thumbs."

"You… You do realize this is insubordination?" she threatens, messing with her hair.

"You do realize your actions are tantamount with treason to the UN, 1st Lt? To do nothing and wait, to try and grant her wish in this manner will only be to our detriment."

"I will not repeat my words. You will stand back," not dousing the impulse, she then raises the bet, the flames.

"Then, what do we do when the Instructor calls back for a report? Lie and get our own records dirty? Sorry but I don't have a bunk in the IRG to go back to, you know?"

"Takeru, there is no need for such pungency. Let us wait some moments, she may have a change of heart if-"

"I don't deal in hypotheticals, Mitsurugi. Also, if her resolve was strong enough to remain here until now, I think she was saying those words for real. She is willing to stand her boots and die here if it comes down to it."

"… Then, whatever do you believe you could say to convince her otherwise?" Takamura inquires, casting a sideglance my way.

"Nothing much, I'll offer her a truce. If she says no, I pull back and we notify the Instructor of it."

"Why? You heard her voice, did you not?" Meiya asks, lips starting to shake. "What is it, some moments of wait?"

"… And if she doesn't change her mind? What are we doing? Wait out the eruption?"

"It would certainly be better than forcing an old woman away from her home," Takamura replies, wincing as if smelling rot. "It is our duty to ensure this mission is resolved, peacefully so. Cadet Shirogane, this is my last warning. Return to your Gekishin and remain on standby."

"… Or what? You do realize our conversation is getting recorded by our suits, right? You, a Royal Guard under a mission for the UN, is currently threatening me, a UN cadet, to disobey my orders with Mitsurugi as your accomplice. You do know what's gonna happen to you, to your dear railgun project the second I tell the XO of this, right?"

"Wh- What… What are you saying?! Are you… threatening me?" blazing eyes gain further impulse, further tension to her compact and defiant posture.

"No, I'm merely trying to use common sense here," I shrug, sighing. "Even if I don't say it, you should know the recordings will be scanned. And don't give me that bullshit about how she could change her mind, if we do nothing we're gonna be sitting here when the lava starts coming out of the mountains."

Both of them darken, covered by the smoke of their blazing. Takamura faces away, crossing and pressing her arms, needles knitting her lips inwards. Meiya relents a sigh but also doesn't return my gaze fully. Just as that prior experience, a stalagmite standing in proud freezing.

Sadly, this is a very personal matter for me so I ain't gonna back down no matter how much these two pout about it. This is, in a way, an apology for what I did to the old lady last loop. For how I betrayed her without trying to think of a way to solve the problem without harming her and the other people. And as a thanks, for the goodwill she spread in the shelter while I was locked up in my first loop after the fact. Now I think I can see why the coup did not happen in my first loops, since someone told a different tale, a tale of two young idiots placing their lives and machines on the line for a single old lady and her tiny village.

… That must have struck something in you, right Doc? That's why you didn't act up.

In the end, I will never know if my actions then went against Sensei's plans or not. While now, after all that has happened, I do tend to assume the worst out of her all the time, maybe the coup wasn't tied back to her entirely.

But right here, right now, that is not the case. Even if the XO would desire to spark up the uprising, this is a card I can play against her. Luckily, Kasumi cannot scan my mind's deepest thoughts… But I won't get another chance to get more time, to convince Yuuko to neuter the ripples before it's light's out. It won't be the same as first loop, no, but I can only play to my outs. Because if this doesn't work, then… then it will come to blood again. And all the ripples that will be spread.

So I slowly fold my own arms, meeting their eyes one at a time. "We're just going to be debating here on what to do, on whether it's right or not to insist. And going by her words and your stances, that sounds like a waste of time. So what's the difference between me trying to speak with her just once and me remaining here? At least we get confirmation on her posture, and that words will be useless."

"Do try to not make this harder on us, cadet," Takamura says, whipping out the acid, the full frown. "When she approached us at first, clear it was that she hoisted strong rejection towards you due to the colors you're garbed in. What could you possibly have to say for her to not start screaming at you as soon as she sees you? Please, you should know how we Japanese see those like you," the calm yet mired tone, flowing easily into a bog. The purse in her lips and brows, what flames still remain in her gaze.

"… I didn't think you saw me as a dirty American as well, 1st Lt Takamura. Thought we had gotten along while we worked together."

"This and that are unrelated. Also, you've showed… certain colors in your canvas that reveal unpleasant aspects to your person, cadet," she affirms, not loosening the sailor knot that constricts her posture.

"Heh, is that so? So you too, huh…"

"Please, let us not fall to animosity," Meiya asks, standing in between us. "Takeru, please, would some hours of wait be such a hard ask?" she holds my gaze, lowering her chin, waiting.

"And what happens when nothing happens?"

"I, well, we could…"

"Lie to the Instructor? Jump into the lava? Abandon the old lady?" Both of them frown, I shrug. "If you don't want to see it come to that, then start thinking about how to solve this if my idea fails. In the meantime-"

"You will do nothing of the sort," Takamu- No, the Fudai dares to threaten, to raise her voice. "You will return to your TSF, that's an order."

"… If you force me back to my Gekishin, I am contacting the Instructor. And you can say goodbye to your railgun, while we're at it." Not like we should let you take it, considering what signs you're showing right now, Royal Guard.

"You think such insubordination will be left unpunished?"

"Compared to your threats and refusal to comply with UN code? Is letting me talk with the woman one single time that hard an ask? Oh, but if you wanna take it to our superiors, come on," lowering my back, eyes meet at the same height as I flash a smirk. "Come on, flip the coin. Call the Instructor, see what happens."

"Why are you going this far, cadet?"

"Because I ain't leaving things to chance. We are retrieving this woman to safety, and that's all."

Gritting teeth, she takes a, quite, noticeable gulp. "You are not to take her by force, am I clear?"

"I never said anything about doing that, you are the one who will lead us to that outcome by waiting pointlessly. But enough is enough, I'll be rolling my dice. You two think on something if this doesn't work," I say, nodding back to the Fudai as I turn away.

But an extended hand prevents me from advancing more. Meiya places herself in front of me, the chilly gust hitting my face along the snow motes her frozen imposition drills into my gaze. "Takeru, please desist. Not only you are causing unnecessary friction in the team, you are ignoring the matter at hand. You've heard her plea, there is little words will be able to do."

"… Are you surrendering to employing force, then?" I ask, narrowing my eyes.

As expected, her own imitate mine for a second before she takes in some air. "Surely you know how it feels, to be all alone in the world.

To lose everything you held dear, be left with only scraps. Please, give her some time. I'll talk with her again in a few hours, and will take responsibility for what may transpire," she bows down shortly, then remains watching, waiting.

To lose everything. I know that better than anyone in this fucking world, thank you very much. And I am not willing to have you getting hurt or worse this time around. You've no idea all that's riding on this operation, not that you should, but still.

… I know I shouldn't.

I know you're not her, that to lash out against you for something you haven't done is wrong.

But it pisses me off… so, so badly. Again putting your ideals atop a pedestal, honoring them to the bitter end. Your vows and duty be damned so long as you get to see your little wishes to fruition, without any concern over those who live by you. Again surrendering to the tantalizing carrot, of being useful to your nation.

Sorry honey, but you ain't charging into the lava or the Superior today.

You ain't gonna do no heroic speeches nor place yourself in danger over something that can be solved easily.

Your 'resolve' is gonna have to take a step back, because I ain't letting it ruin our… No, my efforts.

… Sigh. My world's Meiya would have understood, we would have been able to platicate about this, what to do. You're not going to back down, though. Not even if it means calling curtains, after all the Empire is what you truly love the most. Just like your sister, the greater good matters more to you than anything, anyone else.

A deep breath, a step forward. Diving straight ahead into the blizzard of those eyes, not looking away.

"Move aside, Mitsurugi."

"I will not."

"Will it come to blows, then?"

"Wh- Have her feelings not touched your heart?! Is the result of the mission all that matters to you?" she questions, with that begging look. That squinted and pained gaze, that hides behind the veil of ice. Probably wishing I would agree with her, that I would nod and desist.

I do understand you, and want to protect her feelings. And I would usually do my best to support your ideas, since we usually agree. I do not like that look on your eyes after all, even if you're not my Meiya and never will be.

But not today. This… This is something I want to do. Not because of a mission, not because of the danger. Because I need to prove to myself that I can make a difference, that things can be different. In other times, yeah, I would have simply called the Instructor and get this resolved immediately. Not today, not only because of the looming threats but for what I aim to do. And to teach you that no ideal is worth marriage, seeking the perfection you envision within your mind with no compromises brings about only two things.

Doom to yourself or betrayal from others. Usually both.

"Stop being so obnoxious and let me go talk with her," I sharpen my gaze, she holds it unflinching. Resolute as always, my dear.

"… Why? Why must you insist so much?"

"I have my reasons. So, please move away."

"I refuse. Not unless you tell us what you're planning to do. If you have an idea let us discuss it first, then we can try to reach out to her together."

"… No."

"Excuse me? Why are you refusing my aid?" she asks, pursing her lips, clenching both hands and cheeks.

"Because I plan to talk about some… personal stuff that I don't want either of you to hear, to try and reach a compromise with the old lady."

"And, beg your pardon," the Fudai asks, walking into my sight as her own narrows, "why would you be so reticent to revealing what these matters entail?"

"Personal stuff is personal, are you deaf or stupid?"

"Wh- How dare you! Have you no shame?!"

Slowly looking at her, opening my eyes wide, my sight gets distorted a bit, seeing her face overlap on the sides as a small chime beeps in my ears. Tapping my brows as I inhale slowly, blinking, my eyes fix back up as I step towards the yellow and black. "If you have an idea on how to solve this, I'm all ears," I propose, she again recoils and tightens her expression, intimidation. But in the end, she says nothing. "Yeah, that's it. You've got nothing, so shut up and start thinking. And if you try and pick a fight again, I'm calling the Instructor for real," I say, in joke since that's not my goal here, and walk away.

Only to feel a grip on my arm, a pull keeping my feet in place. And purple fire meeting my eyes. "Takeru, stop it. What are you trying to accomplish? To pressure her in this manner until she-"

"To ensure tomorrow never becomes yesterday, that's my goal."

"… What does that even mean?"

"Exactly what I said," I shrug her off, returning the gaze as I fiddle with my hair. "So if your only plan is doing nothing until the lava comes, then do me a solid and start thinking on something better."

"… However-"

"Cadet Mitsurugi," the Fudai pats Meiya's shoulder, shaking her head, "move aside and let cadet Shirogane go have a talk with the woman." She then looks my way, endowing in embers too. "I am certain that you won't try anything violent, but if you see she reacts poorly back off immediately. You get one chance, that's all. And if you bring us any issues, I will be reporting your insubordination, Shirogane."

"As I will be towards your actions, Royal Guard."

"Please, cease this at once!" Meiya stares blades at both of us, sighing as she rubs her forehead. "We shouldn't be accusing each other in such way. I only… I do not wish to remove her from this place, it is literally all she has. The hope to live with her sons, to welcome them back to the house that saw them grow. I… I only desire to safeguard her."

"… All three of us do, certainly," the Fudai comments, lingering acids as she throws a slithering glare my way.

"Sadly, as things stand, we don't have much choice. And I rather not suffer more punishments just because you two don't wanna stain your honor," I shrug, ignoring the pointless bark of the Fudai.

After all, Meiya wasn't sent to the detention barracks with me. I was the only one punished for what happened back then. She and Takamura have their noble blood as protection, but me? The second an accident happens that's more burdens on Yuuko's plate. You can parrot about your ideals all you want because you'll never suffer the consequences of your actions, you can stay on your ebony tower prattling about honor and whatnot while our people burn and starve. Always putting the cart in front of the horse, then whipping at it because it's not fast enough.

Sorry honey, but I can't let your inner demons send you into a mistake. You ain't jumping into the lava today, no matter how strong your 'resolve' is.

"And don't worry," raising a hand back, I smile at 'em, "I have no intentions of sparking a fight. So you better stop moping about and get to thinking on how to reach a compromise before the lava comes to say hello," facing away from the frowns, a sigh escapes as my arm falls down.

I slowly approach the house, looking at it well. A deep breath as my steps wane, letting the air go as I stand by the door, licking my dry lips. You still offered us some food and tea that night, complaining about why we were sent here. Your words of thankfulness were probably what convinced Marimo-chan not to whip my ass back then, despite Sensei's protection. To my side, the wood has some stains, raked like the small table me and Miki sat by in the area of her dojo where the kitties came to visit. Darkened, with moisture sticking to it and evident at first glance. No wonder this will collapse in just a few hours with the aftershocks in the ground.

… And that outcome has to be prevented. Neither Meiya nor Takamura should get injured today, or that will have horrible consequences.

I knock the door twice and wait, a slight shiver on the back of my head. After a short while I knock twice again.

And wait, as the clouds above float out of sight.

Until some quiet footsteps come closer, and the creaking disturbs the air in the slow opening of the wooden door.

"What now? Oh… You," the old lady grimaces as she sees me.

"Good afternoon, ma'am," I start with a bow, talking slow, loud enough to be heard but not sound intimidating. "Could I perhaps speak with you for a second?"

"I have nothing to say to someone like you."

"Then, could you simply listen to what I have to say?"

"… What do ya want? You going ta tell me I gotta go with you because it's dangerous to be 'ere?" the venom obvious in her every word, her posture remains seeking the wooden frame as a shield.

Taking a breath, steeling myself to not fuck it up, I not look away and simply nod shortly. "This place is precious to you, isn't it?"

"… Of course it is. What? Got something to say?"

"I can understand how you feel. My home is… gone too, and I'll never be able to go back there." Her stiffness diminished, I see her eyes slightly losing the edge they were displaying, the fingers no longer gripping at the door. "Not just the land, the people as well. It's all gone, forever. So I think I can understand why you do not wish to leave. To stay here is your own personal war, isn't it?"

"… Yes, this is my fight. If you got that, then why do you not leave me alone?"

"Because if you die, then so does this town."

"If it gets destroyed, then I might as well be dead! I rather die here, in the house I built with my husband!" she points a finger at me, her eyes overflowing with layer upon layer of the same lava that will soon consume this place.

But short of flinching or running away, I smile back. "Who said anything about letting the town get destroyed?" Heh, I got her.

Eyes widen momentarily, then she remains scanning my face for a few seconds in a more somber glare. "What do you mean? If the volcano erupts, my town will be destroyed."

"That's only if the lava gets here. I do have an idea to prevent that outcome, and would like to hear your opinion and thoughts on it as the last member of the village. Could we perhaps talk inside? If you refuse after hearing it, I will leave you alone and won't insist on you leaving this place. How does that sound? Could you hear me out, for just a moment?" I slowly say, giving another bow at the end.

The woman closes her eyes for a few seconds, I see her hands tremble a bit. She finally opens her eyes, returning my gaze without shadows of doubts in her eyes as she lets the door go. "Fine. I'll hear ya out, soldier. But ya better not try anything in here."

"I won't, ma'am. Of that you can be sure," I nod back, smiling a bit.

She gives a nod, moving back and retreating into the house. I follow after, closing the door behind me.

"Cadet Shirogane, what are you planning to-" I turn off my comms, and the pop-up request to return to the common channel.

This is my mission. And I can't let them hear some of this stuff, no matter what. Pretty sure they won't be stupid enough to disturb me now, after all I did get the chance to talk this out. Unless Takamura, for some reason, decides to be a bitch. She has been rather cold today, despite me remaining cool in what help I gave. Heh… Guess this is a ripple of the mock battle, can't be helped.

Focusing back on the now, I take a look around. The inside is really worn down, the elements' impact visible in the walls, small little markings in the ceiling too. The heating is still working well, thankfully. The old lady opens the window to let the daylight to seep in then slowly walks towards a small wooden table, with six wooden chairs around it and the modesty of the place.

"So, soldier. What is this plan ya were talkin' about?" she asks, sending a direct gaze at me.

I sit on the table in front of her, entwining my fingers. "It's simple. I want to block the entrance to the valley. That way, even if the volcano erupts, the lava won't reach this place and the village won't be destroyed."

"And how do ya plan to do that?" she presses, narrowing her eyes.

"By using the giant boulder over there. I heard that it was some sort of protector of this region, right? Then, I think it would be fitting for the guardian to be the one who saves the town," I tell with a smile.

After a sec of shock, her features enlarge as a watermelon showered in wine. "How did ya know that? You ain't from 'ere!"

"Well, the UN does have a large amount of information about stuff. Someone told me to be careful about the regional deities, that's all." Bullshit, is is necessary. "But what do you think? Would you allow me to break off the guardian from the mountain to close the valley?"

She closes her eyes, groaning a bit. Rubbing her chin in slow motion, she extends the silence as the incoming light fades to a cloud. I let out some air through my teeth as I await her answer, peeking out the window and seeing the other two at the distance, huddled together.

She clears her throat, hand still in her chin. "But then, does that mean you won't take me away?"

"I fear we would still have to," I relent with a sigh. "This is something of a truce, a compromise. I can try to protect your town from the lava, so that you can have somewhere to return once things settle down."

"Pah! Liar! Things won't get better, it's been always the same thing with-"

"Things will get better. I assure you of that. Sooner than you think."

"… How can ya be so sure, soldier? The war has only gone from bad to worse," she affirms, drilling her gaze into mine along the extra wrinkles added by the slight frown.

"Trust me on this one, things will get better. Important people out there are taking the steps to ensure yesterday does not become tomorrow. Did you happen to hear the speech Her Highness made a few days ago?"

"Aye, I did. It was a soothing day, to hear the Lady's voice again," she says, clutching her chest softly with both hands as if in prayer.

Seeing the old generation treat you with such divine reverence will never not be weird, Yuuhi. Imagine if I told them you like to choke on strawberry muffins with no restrain whatsoever. Heh, I wonder if there is anything left of you in the Shogun…

Sigh… No, don't be an idiot. Not now, you've got shit to do.

"I mean, not to point out the obvious but, surely, you understand why that person is here with me?" I say, low, waving my brows up a few times as I lean forward. "For someone of her station to be present in the field, I think you can guess the reason."

And again, surprise floods her face like kitties hearing thunders or fireworks. "Are ya saying… the war is going to end soon?"

"… No, the war won't end. But it will get better for us, soon."

"Then, why do ya need me to leave my home?"

"Well… Did you hear the news of Niigata?"

Grimacing, she nods. "Aye, heard the monsters came again. Many soldiers died and a city was hurt."

"Yeah. That's why we were sent to help you as well. Even without the volcano, your life is in danger. So, if us soldiers know you're somewhere safe, we can be a bit more reckless and daring. Because when someone is behind is, we cannot fail. But that… will soon be over, this place will be safe once more. When that time comes, you can return here and nobody should stop you."

"And how are ya sure it's gonna be like that?"

"Well, you can ask 'her' to allow you to return here. I doubt anyone could refuse her words."

Thank God you two are so similar. Though, I do wonder why nobody notices their different hair color. If someone threw a bucket of blue paint on top of Yuuhi, we wouldn't be able to tell them apart until they spoke up probably. She could pass as Meiya without anyone noticing, and the same in reverse. Imagine if they swapped placed and I had to deal with Yuuhi being in the squad instead of Meiya…

Yeah, no, I better shut up. Different or not, I rather deal with Meiya than with you.

"… Do you think the Lady would grant me this selfish wish?" she asks, cracking away.

"If I can be honest with you, she does wish to grant it. To the point that she won't leave this place without you."

I mean, worst case scenario, I can… ask Mana for some help, I guess. I think that I could somehow make the old lady return here after we triumph in Sadogashima. Without the BETA and if there's no more risk of a volcano erupting, if she wishes to return to her land… then that's her choice. Sure, it is selfish, but it would be worse to simply keep her alive in the cramped slums. This world is different, I can't simply assume the tiles will fall as well as they did without me trying in my first loops. Sigh… Mana is gonna ask me quite the retribution for this 'favor', though. Or she's gonna snap at me.

"Eh? Why do ya mean? Why won't she leave? Someone like her… Someone as the Lady should pay no heed to these old bones," again, slumping in that prayer pose, in deep lament as if reprimanded over a sin.

Swallowing the sigh as I lean back, a hand messes with my hair for a sec. "She values every single person here in this Empire much. In a way, I am also extending this request for her sake," I admit with a nod. "This is nothing more than me attempting to find peace between your wish to keep this land's memory safe and safeguarding you from any danger. Of course, I am not saying this to dissuade you or anything. I'm certain that you have a very good reason to remain here." I know she does. And in a way, we're the same. We're fighting to honor those who no longer are, in our own ways.

"Soldier, does the Lady really not wish to leave? Couldn't you convince her somehow? I can face my own death on my land, but to bring harm to one such as her…

… I think I would have an easier time stopping the lava with my bare hands than convincing Meiya to leave you, for real.

"Surely you can tell that she won't back down on her resolve no matter what," for better and worse, that's who she is in this world. "She wishes to protect you and your village, above anything else. But that's besides the point," clearing my throat and leaning forward, I stare straight ahead. "Tell me, as the last member of the village, would you allow me to use the guardian to block the valley? Even if it still meant you would have to leave?"

She again rubs her chin, extending the silence. The incoming light does little against the clouds in her face, the sheet of lukewarmness the old stove spreads in this tiny home cannot prevent the shaking from surfacing in her wrists and features.

"Soldier, have you made a deal like this for all the other peasants?"

"No, I haven't."

"Then, why do ya worry about an old lady like me? Why can't you just leave? If it were the Lady, I could understand. But why do ya worry so much?"

"… Because I'm still hoping."

"Huh? Hoping for what?"

"For a different solution, to not have to resort to abandoning people or employing force to get what I want. I'd like to believe in that, if nothing else."

It'd be far easier, to simply report to the Instructor for real and call out both Meiya and Takamura on their bullshit. It'd be far easier to send assassins to get rid of Sagiri, to give word to the Pickles to beware of Yuuko if she proved to be against me.

… It'd be so easy to focus on all the shit I've gone through, to stop giving a damn about anyone else, to call forth that ruin and use it to choke an agreement out of the Vice Commander.

Maybe I am no longer fit to be a soldier, since I am putting my own selfish interests ahead of the current mission instead of simply following orders. Maybe they were right, and the shadows do fit me better. But, if nothing else-

"I'd like to stop the endless suffering this war has brought, and I can't do that by forcing more pain onto others. Those methods will catch up to me in due time, and cruelty is not necessary to obtain results. And even if it is a selfish request, to allow you to return here in due time, the chain pulls on both sides. The system can ask the people to endure and resign their treasures, but only for so long."

And I rather die again than let the disaster Meiya and Ikaruga brought about after the Babylon Disaster, just to safeguard 'muh traditions and soul'. My world is proof enough that end was avoidable, not that I can bring that up against anyone here, sure, but I know we can make things better than they currently are. If only our armies would cooperate instead of being pricks with one another.

Looking out the window, remembering Sagiri's words, my hands clench, I thought he was an idiot, that it was irresponsible to have done what he did with the BETA breathing on our necks, and even more stupid after Iceberg. But he was only trying to save what he thought was his land in one last desperate gambit. Sure, I still don't forgive him for killing Chizuru's dad, but he was just… trying to save his home last loop, to try and get as many people off the Empire before the GOC arrived to swallow us all. Just like me, simply struggling to try and save those dear to him.

And now, I can see we really are not that different. We both were simply fighting against history as it was meant to be. Even when the 'correct' path would be to forsake others to death, to create 'the perfect scenario', we'd still stand our ground and defy fate. Be it for an entire nation or the memory of a single person.

The old lady groans, rustling both hands together and sending gazes at me, not meeting my eyes. "But why insist? Taking the guardian off the mountain won't be easy, soldier."

"But it's not impossible."

"Ya don't need to put yourself or the Lady in danger for these old bones."

"That's what a soldier has to do, it's our job to protect the people."

"Pah… From the way some of the young'uns I've received, that's a rarity nowadays."

"Heh… Someone once told me something similar," smiling at my interlocking fingers, I edge closer to the table.

"Oh? That ya soldiers are not helping? Did somethin' happen today?"

"No, it was… a long time ago, back when I first enlisted. Someone said to me what we pilots receive the name 'Eishi' more due to the meaning our actions were supposed to take than to what duties we actually perform. And yeah, I can see where you come from and why you'd not believe my words easily…"

More considering the end results of all of my loops. Either face destruction and ruin, or leave all the hives and 00 Unit tech in the hands of the same assholes that hesitated not in choosing the easy solution for their own lawn, without bothering to look around. A life by the knife, with no escape from the edge. And even when we'll never truly outrun violence as an answer-

"I don't think it's a bad thing to honor the implication in our title, to be guardians above warriors. Because while I can't save the world, I can try to help those who are near me. To try and ensure our future does remain smiling. I think that those little sparks of kindness mean a lot, especially with how dark everything looks as of now."

Even the smallest light will trounce the eternal night. I know that very well, since Yuuko, the one from my world, was always there to remind me of that both last loop and after the disasters hit everyone.

"And what if ya get in trouble for trying to help? What if ya get hurt while striking the guardian down?"

"It's better to take that risk on my own hands than to either abandon you to die or surrendering to remove you by force. Sure, I might not be able to do much, but this meager effort is within my possibilities, if you accept my deal. I know that I cannot help you in your own fight, and that if you leave you really might not be able to come back, but I am willing try and protect your town and the memories that lie in it."

The old lady remains looking at me, expressionless, for quite the long while. And yet, my eyes are maybe not what she truly is seeing, that gaze seems as lost as if casting a wide glance over to the horizon buried in between blue waves and azure skies, lost in the depths of reminiscence.

"… Thanks, soldier. It's good to hear such young people be so kind despite the war. There may still be hope for us," she closes her eyes and clutches her hands together, letting a small, hollow sigh out.

"Of course there is, Ma'am. So, well…"

"Soldier, could you try to convince the Lady to leave with you?"

"Believe me, she won't."

"… Are ya sure? Have ya tried to talk with her?"

"She's very stubborn, I'll have you know. Once she sets her mind on something, no one can change her ways, no matter… what you have to say about it. So, I know it isn't fair to say it, but she won't leave without you."

"I see. But I also cannot leave. My sons and grandchildren are out there, fighting for the Empire. I cannot leave the town until they come back," she states, giving a light hit to the wood, nodding once but sharp.

I know they're already dead, but I can now understand her. No one could simply accept a beloved one is gone so easily. Just like how despite the power plant blowing up I still was shocked when Maya-san confirmed that both Meiya and Tsukuyomi-san were truly dead. Just as I refused the thought of the guys being all dead after the fall of Yokohama. And like when I lost it, as your heartbeats slipped off my fingers.

"Are they in the Empire?" I ask, low. Let's go along, I can't just shut the talk down even if I already know they're dead.

"No, my sons were sent away. They still… haven't returned. None of them. My grandchildren are still here, but they haven't come to visit in a long time."

… I don't recall her talking about her grandchildren during my first loops, though.

"I mean, if you'd like, we could try to locate them. You could then go with your grandchildren until things settle down here."

… Oh shit. The bitter smile, the watering eyes… They're dead too, aren't they?

"… I would like to, but no one can tell me where they are."

"… Sorry, I shouldn't have asked," I bow, biting my lips. I just had to. No, you could not do it without harming her, you had to screw it up.

"Don't apologize, soldier. Your words, the look in your eyes sort of reminded me of them. It has been… long since any visits came to talk and not shout at me to leave," she tells, wearily, before slowly standing up, walking towards the other end of the place. "Let me show you why I can't leave yet."

I also get up and slowly get closer, she opens a drawer and takes out a small black box that glimmers at the sunlight that seeps nearby. Signed with the logo of the IJA, and a small lock she slowly undoes with some effort and a sharp clicking noise.

"This is… all I've got back. When the first arrived, my husband… couldn't take it," she says, barely audible as her shoulders hunch over. I grimace by reflex as what was inside meets my eyes. "My two sons died on the same day from what I was told. This is the paper the soldiers brought back to us then."

A KIA document along a unit patch. The death date was on June, 1997. However, what leaves me unable to speak, tongue regressing backwards, is not the date or any other little detail in the IJA's parchment. But their last name.

Fukuha.

The image of a man appears in my mind. A slim dude, with short, brown hair and dark magenta eyes bearing a rather weird grin while wearing the dark uniform of the Guard. The worried scuttle to deliver reports, the almost manic expressions as things seemed to be about to require a delay, and the usual scolding and deadpanning upon my puns or songs.

I see… So she was that relative you spoke of.

The old lady subtly shakes for a sec, a lone tear running away from her eyes. Tightly holding the papers, she takes in a good breath of air.

"How could a mother ever accept her sons are dead with some meager paper? I know that they probably died, but my heart just cannot accept that… The same for my grandchildren."

She takes another paper from the box. Another KIA document and another patch of the IJA. Rokuro Fukuha was his name, but the image on the document is not that of my fellow, even if he does look familiar.

"I'm sorry, for making you remember this. It's alright, I understand your stance. We can go talk with the Lady if you still want to."

"Thanks soldier… Thanks for listening. It has been a long time since I had anyone to talk to. Ever since he died, nobody ever came here. Except the soldiers that tried to take me away, that is," she tells with a final sigh while taking the last paper from the box, holding it tight, close, closer. The more closer that little scrap got to her, the more her features contorted and caved in, dampness dwelling in between her soldered eyelids. "I could attend to Rokuro's funeral, at least I could bury him. But… But… Those damn Americans! They killed him with that awful bomb!"

…

Of course, the G-Bombs. I never really thought about it, but for the loved ones of those who were murdered by the G-Bombs it must have been a devastating news. Their sons, daughters, lovers, relatives or whatever they were, they didn't die to the monsters, they were murdered by America. Of course people would despise them, of course they would reject them.

But, of course, that's what she thinks. The reality is, perhaps, worse than that. After all, if not for my insistence to sortie, maybe he'd still be alive. My crew died not because of the G-Bombs, but because I refused to back down from what was obviously a dead end… trying to make even a slight change, to maybe finally reach the Valkyries, was it?

And they followed me, despite knowing the risks. And that got them killed, left the old lady alone. And the families of my other squadmates as well.

… Sigh. I guess, shooting stars truly are fated to simply crash and burn. Should better make sure they don't hurt anyone on their way down, right?

I inhale deeply to calm a rising prickling feeling on my throat, this vacuum that expands on my stomach. "Sorry."

"Please, don't apologize… Seeing you sort of reminded me of him. Musou was just like you, soldier. He also wished to help people despite knowing he wasn't that strong. I was so proud of him when he came back once, wearing such a fine dress of black."

"Was he accepted into the IRG?"

"Aye, seems like his hard work paid off," she tells with a smile, looking at the small picture she attached to the KIA report. "Despite his duty, he still did his best to come visit. Like you are, he was very stubborn on getting me to leave to the Capital, but I always refused. And yet…" taking in air, wiping her eyes, the shaky hands slowly rests the papers back, burying them in the lock of the box.

"… Please, don't take it so hard, ma'am. Remember him with a smile instead, I'm sure he must have done much good while he was here."

"Heh, I wonder… The last visits he paid me, Musou looked so beyond himself. Always with his face all scrunched up, not meeting my eyes…"

"… Still, his fellows must have valued him much. Especially in those days, that composure and concern were lifesavers, for real."

"Huh? How do you…"

"I mean, you make it sound as if he was a real trooper. If he was a commoner that remained in the IRG, I'm sure he must have been a great help, right?"

"… Aye, I suppose."

"Sigh… I know it's easy to say, but please don't let his memory turn to poison, ma'am. Don't let the cruelty of the war ruin what good things you still have."

"I wish it were that easy, soldier… This may be somethin' I'll never be able to bury."

"… Even so," licking over my lips, feeling cold goosebumps on my back, a finger raises to massage the lower side of an ear, "even if you may be unable to bury them, either in body or mind, at the very least recall the good things along the bad. Don't let them slip off your fingers, I'm certain he'd want you to remain smiling when thinking of him. Sure, it might hollow your stomach and choke your throat, but there are some snapshots in time that… are truly not worth losing to the resentment of reality."

"Snapshots?"

"Oh, right. You know cameras, right? Well, aren't there any little moments you recall, precious moments about your sons or grandchildren? Things that… you know, ain't worth forgetting despite the pain? How they grew here, some moments where you read them a book, taught them to write or something along those lines?"

"… Aye," she smiles, looking to the windows. "It was in days like this one, with some light but when it got too cold, that Rokuro and Musou would remain sitting here, bathing in the sunlight. Simply sitting together as they learned their first hiraganas or kanjis, drinking tea during the cold afternoon as we listened in the latest songs in the radio," her head flutters a bit, both hands again joining in prayer, moving to face the sun as if to raise her heart to it. "We waited any letter from my sons, enjoying the quietness as they studied. Nothing more, just that…"

"I see… Then, please, remember them like that. The war has already taking much from you, so please don't give up in this fight, at the very least. I'm sure they'd be happier that way, even if you… truly cannot ever bury those shadows. Losing your beloved ones is… something harsh to move on from, especially when," nibbling at my bottom lip, I close my eyes and sigh through my teeth, "they became casualties of unnecessary cruelty."

Even when sometimes you just gotta grin and bear it, even when there are some that can smile and continue onward without as much as a mote showing up, to have your family suffer at the same hands of the system they were trying to protect…

… is truly enough to make anyone go mad. She's far stronger than me, to silently honor their lives in this town and still be willing to listen to my words despite my uniform. Sigh… All I really know to do is either shut down or burn everything around me, it'll never not surprise me how composed others can be at these things. Maybe I'm still weak deep down, despite everything.

"Sigh… Aye, maybe. Thanks, soldier. It is very rare for young'uns to be so patient."

"It's alright, really." It was my own stupidity that took your grandson from you. Please, don't thank me. "I'll be waiting outside, if you wish to speak with us."

"Wait… Soldier, I have one last question for you." She cleans her eyes, flattening her clothes when facing me again. "Soldier, can we trust in the UN? They won't betray us like the Americans?"

Her gaze turned harsh, piercing. For many, the UN and the US are the same here. And considering what happened last time… I am sure people didn't react well to the news of Sadogashima being nuked by a G-Bomb.

"There are people that I don't agree with, but most of them are here trying to earnestly lend a helping hand. At the very least, they're not the same as the Americans that broke protocol during the invasion."

"… I see. If the Lady is collaborating with them, I suppose I can trust your words, soldier. Please, help the Lady in these harsh times. I'm sure my grandchildren will be with you in your fights, even if you're with the UN," giving a nod and a smile, she closes the window. "Soldier, could you tell me your name?"

"I'm Takeru Shirogane, ma'am."

"I see. Thank you, Shirogane. For listening and being kind, it is rare for soldiers to be like this. I wish I could also have gone to fight back then, I envy this generation of women so much. Sigh…" Her gaze wanders away like a leaf dancing on the high wind as she sets the small box back into the drawer. At the very least, even if she refuses my offer, I think letting the words out helped her, just a little.

Not enough to make amends for my fuckups in the Swordbreakers, but well, not like atonement is an option available for me at this point.

"Well, I'll return to my unit. Please, think about what I told you. We shall be waiting," I bow to her, standing in attention.

"Aye, give me some time to think. I'll go talk with the Lady one more time later."

"… Thanks. Then, I shall be goi-"

A cold gust hits the back of my head, the door is blasted open brusquely. Enough to make the frame screech, enough to make me flinch away. Takamura enters the house, looks at me, and erupts as hard as the volcano is about to.

"Cadet Shirogane, why were you not responding?!"

"Apologies, 1st Lieutenant. I was talking with-"

"That is no excuse to cut your comms! Do you have any idea-"

"Please, Royal Guard. The soldier was merely indulging me. Do not shout at him," the old lady requests with another reticent bow, again shrinking in apprehension as if seeing an anointed sage or something.

Which helps chill down the Fudai's temper tantrum, a finger running through her hair as she nods. "I see, is that so? My apologies for raising my voice, I did not meant to frighten you. In any case, you will have to accompany us, lady."

… Uuh, Takamura? You're kind of ruining all I was doing? "1st Lt, I think-"

"Silence, cadet."

"What's this about? The soldier said you'd respect my final answer," she says, trying to stand her ground, not as fiery as she was in front of me.

However, the Fudai sighs and gives a bow. "Forgive me, but we have just received word that the BETA are advancing in this direction. We are required to sortie to battle, yet cannot leave you alone."

… Wait, what?

"You're pulling my leg, aren't you?" I had to have heard that wrong.

However, the quivering within her eyes says it all. "Sgt Jinguuji reported a moment ago that the IJA scouts partaking in the relief efforts contacted her with a request for air. It would seem BETA from Sadogashima are again advancing towards the shore, but the group will surface in a path coming to this direction. Apparently, the Oceanic Defense Line is already engaging them as we speak."

"Huh?! Wait, they're that close?!" You have got to be shitting me! What the fuck is going on here?!

"Sadly, it seems to be the case," Takamura winces in imitation, shaking her head. "We've been ordered to take all civilians to Komoro Base and remain in standby in case we are required to fight. However," she looks towards the old lady, giving another bow, "while I comprehend your stance, I must insist. Please, could you agree to evacuate under our care?"

"… Could I speak with the Lady one last time? And would you give me some moments to… take some items with me?" she asks, not meeting our eyes, fading in between the strands of what little light come through the opened door frame.

"But of course, ma'am. Shirogane, let's go back and prepare to depart."

"O-Oh… Yeah, got it."

Shit, everyone isn't ready to fight the BETA. If… If the Laser-Class get too close… No, even without that, they don't got the XM3 nor any experience so far. If things are as dire as Takamura made them sound then-

They're sending us as meat shields, aren't they?

To buy time for the IRG to haul their asses once the numbers are thinned down.

Anyways, why are the BETA surfacing now of all times?! This didn't happen ever before. Shit, shit, shit, shi-

"Soldier," the old lady calls out, softly. "Please be careful, Japan needs young'uns like you alive for the days to come," giving a nod, she raises a smile to me.

For someone who lost her sons and grandchildren to the war, someone who must harbor so much resentment towards the UN to give me these words… despite how it was my own fixation what sent my squad into an impossible fight…

Clamping my lips, I salute her back and return the nod. "Thank you, ma'am. And don't worry, we will be alright." I will make sure of it. No one dies today. I won't fucking allow it. Slowly turning around, following after Takamura, we exit the house.

"Takeru, what did she say?" Meiya slowly comes towards us, wonderment sprouting in her eyes as she sees the old lady coming out as well.

"She wants to talk with you one last time. Make it count, Meiya." I raise a fist at her pairing it with a smile. She nods, the steel of her inner resolve glimmering against the sunlight all the more with each step she takes to meet the old lady.

Once we got a fair distance from them, I slow down my pace, resting one hand on my Geki's legs. Dammit, my eyes… My throat constricted onto itself, I feel an acid whiff coming out of my stomach. Why now? They ain't ready, we don't even have the XM3 with us. I get Yuuko can't risk her special units out of her grasp, but damn… Of all the times when shit could hit the fan.

"Whatever is the matter, Shirogane?" Takamura asks, low, as her steps edge closer and closer from behind.

"Nothing, just… I was not expecting any BETA today," I say, shaking my head as I return myself upright.

And find a squinted glare, further venoms lurking in. "Huh, you do not say."

"… Something up, 1st Lt?"

"Oh, no, I was merely wondering from where your rather adusted insubordination stemmed from. I did not wish to lend credence to the rumors, yet it would seem they had hit the mark."

"… So that's what this is about, eh. Got any problems with me you'd like to sort out?"

"Hmm…" she walks, circling over me in slow motion, never letting my eyes go, "you seemed quite opposed to the notion of granting the old lady's desire, quite insistent on having her leave to the shelters."

"Anyone would want to save her life."

"… I wonder. Living and being kept alive are not one and the same," she spits out, stomping short as she faces me, folding both arms. "Your own attitude against me and Mitsurugi was far too confrontational as well."

"Your fault for trying to break UN protocol."

"I did not attempt to do nothing of the sort!"

"To have kept waiting would have done nothing for us, and to have lied to the Instructor would have been equal to breaking our oath. To lie in such manners to the UN is equal to treason, you should know that."

"Yes, yes, I do, indeed. And yet, one cannot deny the audacity of your words," she smiles, cracked, as she twirls a strand on a finger. "To even dare to mention my project in your threats, it would seem you were set from the beginning to have us retrieve all peasants to the shelters, regardless of their desires."

"… Think whatever you want, but that's not what I tried to do."

"Huh, is that so. Could you kindly tell me what you spoke of with the old lady, why you silenced your comms?"

"I refuse," I state, resting onto the Gekishin as I fold my arms.

"Hmm, is that so," gaze narrows even more, she again paces around. "Quite curious, indeed. Almost as much as your posture."

"Huh? What?" Can't help but to blink a few times, yet the dead seriousness hewn into her features does not thaw.

"You're shielding your backside, as you did during our prior discussion. Rather curious if you ask me," she nods to herself, tapping her forearm.

"Uh… What are we talking about here? What's wrong with how I stand?"

"Oh, nothing much. It's simply… odd, one could say. To have someone who basically would push to have any and all civilians forced into the shelters, who would so easily fall to threats upon his comrades at the minimal disagreement, and even go as far as show such pungent animosity in his features… Perhaps, asking you the motives behind the silencing of your comms is unnecessary. Perhaps those markings engraved on your back are explanation enough," she erupts into another frown as a gust propels her hair to flutter, covering the blaze in a layer of frost.

"Wait, what? How do you even know of my scars?" I leave the Geki, getting closer.

She immediately retreats in equal number of steps, compacting her posture. "You seem rather riled up about the matter coming to light. I wonder why that could be."

"What are you getting at?"

"Remind me something. You also came from Yukon, did you not Shirogane?"

"… Yeah?" What is she getting at? Why is she- Oh… "Oh, so that's what you're playing at, huh…"

"Why the adusted expression, cadet?" she asks, taking another step back, shielding her abdomen with both arms.

"Them's fighting words, Fudai. Keep up this bullshit, and you'll regret it. I can, and will, take it to the authorities if you try anything," I glare, also folding my arms.

The wind blows, coldness sticking to my face. She scans me, a hand taming the waves of her hair in the air. Lips compress, eyes are set alight, she holds her breath hostage for a sec.

"Why would you be growing so defensive? Can you not clarify where and how were you inflicted such 'scars'?"

Clicking my tongue, spitting away, I shake my head. "That's none of your business. If you try and say anything, know that I will be raising claims of defamation on your head."

"Huh, and you believe to have the support to issue such a challenge?"

"And what has you thinking you can spew bullshit and get away with it, huh? You think your noble blood excuses you to act like an ass whenever you want?"

"Already falling to insults, huh," she cast a sideglance, scoffing.

"Only because you insulted me first, equaling me to those bastards. I ain't gonna repeat myself, Takamura. You dare to point fingers at me, and I'm taking this to the XO," I step closer, tapping my brows. For a second, her figure grows hazy, overlapped onto itself, before a deep breath restores my sight. "The second you put me in the same bag as those extremists is the second we become enemies. Think whatever the hell you want about me, Royal Guard. But I ain't letting you use my issues to bring problems to the XO."

She holds my gaze, in equal sturdiness, without blinking. Deigning an upwards nod, she faces away. "Very well, for the time being I shan't bring this up. However, you are aware of… the meaning behind such markings being engraved in-"

"We're being recorded, for fuck's sake. Can you use your fucking brain and shut up?" I shake my head, massaging my temple.

Kgh… Fuck, sight's going double again. Grabbing my stomach to keep the void at bay, air enters me through open lips time and again. Simply thinking about those motherfuckers is enough to bring the hold, the caress of cold hands all over me.

"I am aware, however… If I am not mistaken, you were inflicted-"

"One more word. You say one more word and it comes to blows right fucking now," I glare, stepping closer to the hazy shape, colliding into it in a light tackle.

"Ugh! H-Hey, what are you-"

Leaning closer to whisper, to properly see her face, the venom simply seeps out. "You dare to equal me to those terrorists, to bring more burdens to the XO, and I'll report your treason to the UN. Open those pretty little lips of yours, and the railgun gets canned."

"… So were you inflicted those scars during-"

"What the hell does it matter to you? You already cast your judgment on me. Heh, what did I expect of a noble," walking away, I tap my head controls and activate the pulley from my Gekishin. I expected more, from you, from Meiya to actually keep my secrets as such.

Godfuckingdammitall, if she really opens her mouth we're gonna lose the railgun. Yuuko can't simply let her stay in the base if this discussion reaches the light, and I might be left with no choice but to face erasure if she claims I'm an Allegiance agent. Heh, putting me in the same bag as those bastards… Guess that is all what people will ever see in me, nothing but a violent element, a burning shadow, a dark dragon. Sigh… Fuck this shit.

"Shirogane, wait," she calls out as I grip the end of the pulley. Looking back, she slowly steps closer, arms folded. "If you are not… in league with them, what has you reacting so negatively today?"

"… I already told you, saving these people matters to me. Because I only ever manage to leave ruins and debris wherever I go. For you, living in the slums with no direction might be a fate worse than death, perhaps you'd rather die in honor doing something for the greater good. But, you know," looking up at the clouds that block the sun from view as the wind howls again, as the chimney is turned off, I can only sigh, "someone has to remain behind. Be it to tell the memories of this place, the recipes of food, or just to teach kids how to write or to read them some books. Maybe that old lady will be something like that, maybe her words of goodwill for what kindness we extended will give some hope to the other people in the shelter, you never know."

"… All of us would desire to safeguard our people, yet you immediately resorted to threats," she accuses, again glaring in fire.

"Would either of you have listened otherwise? No, you would not have. That's all."

"I… see… However, well, regarding your scars… Did you suffer them in-"

"Those bastards took something away from me, yeah."

A beep echoes in my ears, flat and unchanging.

The soft rustling of the clothes that limply fall off my fingers burn at my skin, force the suit to tighten in response.

The added weight that presses onto my legs, forcing me to almost kneel, bending my ankles and burying needles into my feet.

And that touch, that touch that seeks and fails to reach my cheek.

"I will never be able to forgive them. And if you dare to accuse me of being part of that cult," I glare back finding her figure blurry, distorted, overlapping, until I tap my brows, "I will do anything and everything in my power to make of that your last mistake."

"Ah, eh, m-my apologies, I, well, jumped to-"

"Shut it, I don't wanna hear your corporate and empty words of apology. And don't bring my scars up, or I will have to notify the XO. I don't need more setbacks, thank you very much. So long as you don't throw shit my way, everything's cool. Still, thanks for telling me how you really see me, Royal Guard. "

Triggering the pulley and reaching the cockpit, I enter and quickly make the Geki stand again, facing towards the entrance to the valley and walking towards it in slow motion.

"Cadet Shirogane, what are you doing? Komoro Base is not-"

"I made a promise to the old lady, to seal the valley in exchange for her agreeing to evacuate. So don't get in the way, Fudai."

"Sigh… Please, I am apologizing. Your situation was simply too odd to-"

"Shut up, I'm busy," flipping the switch on, the sonar scan begins to do its thing, the green circles echoing from my center, all the more when I step and cause waves.

"However, how will you even-"

"I'll break the large boulder there off the cliff and seal the entrance, so that even if there is an eruption this village remains safe."

"D-Do not be ridiculous!" her words gain haste, her small dot in my radar gets a bit closer. "There is no feasible way in which a TSF could perform such a feat."

"Yes, there is, 1st Lt," sighing as I roll my neck, I tell her the plan me and Meiya came up with who knows how many loops ago. "So, considering I've my fuel tanks near full capacity, I should be able to do it."

"Your Gekishin does not have the maneuverability to properly evade the rock slide you'll cause, even if the strike is certain. Still, I suppose it is a small compromise to make, to ensure this hamlet remains intact," she softly says, sighing heavily. "Remain gathering sonar data, I shall perform the strike with my Takemikazuchi."

"Sigh… Whatever."

"… Please, leave the pungency behind. If you truly hoist no links to those people, then cleanse your speech of this animosity. Others will assume worse about your character than me, and you… did not show such glares during our dinners or work."

"All the good that did, you still are accusing me over nothing," I click my tongue, resting onto the seat.

"Sigh… Then please regain your usual composure, Shirogane. We… We will be marching against the BETA, after all. Surely you remember what the Incident-"

"No need to ask, I know full well what mess we're in. So hurry it up if you're lending me a hand, those bastards won't wait until you're done with the fake apologies," I throw, pulling the controls and making the Geki move once again. She sighs, cutting the connection and walking to her yellow giant.

… One problem after the other, what the fuck. Can the guys really stand up against the BETA? How many will there be? Will we have any aerial support? Missiles or tanks? Shit… What is going on here? Why is this different again? There's no way there were leaks due to the 00 Unit, right?

… If that's the case and this is the first offensive, the base is fucked. We don't even have the XG to use as bait for the BETA…

A small beep, a few fractures appear in the scanned area. Smaller than what I thought, but to be fair we are attempting this way earlier than during my last loops. In the distance, Meiya is guiding the old lady to her Fubuki as the Takemikazuchi approaches me and the data link shares our data together.

Sigh… Just one time. Give me one good roll, causality. Not today, don't force my hand into a set path again.

"Shirogane, do you copy?"

"… Loud and clear, 1st Lt. So, what do you think?"

"Hmm…" her eyes narrow slightly, before corking a brow, "I shan't say it is impossible, but I doubt a single unit could truly cause a fall of the boulder."

Well, the cracks are way smaller than before since there hasn't been as many quakes, and no eruption too. "You think it's a no go, then?"

"Sigh… If you gave your word, we cannot simply back down. Give me a moment," she seems to fiddle with her controls, shortly after a few numbers and graphs zoom into my view. "I believe this maneuver would allow us to strike down this guardian, yet it will require you to match my Type-00's movements to almost perfection. Do you think to be able to do so?"

"… I mean, not to brag or anything, but pretty sure I can," and as the sole user of the XM3 in the squad, thanks to Yuuko giving me the agreement so long as I was careful in case of emergency, these numbers are nothing I can't produce as I am now.

"Huh, is that so," she gives a small smile. "Well, start the preliminary checks on your unit, and share the intel once you're done. I shall take point on the left, and you strike at the right side."

"Copy that. Also, uh, my Gekishin has some modifications to its OS, 1st Lt. The XO will have to check the logs to ensure the shared data remains in UN hands."

"Oh, really? Wait, is this about that special training you six performed some nights ago?"

"Yes, yes, I can't tell you anything else but don't be shocked at the output of my machine. Also… thanks for lending a hand."

"It is nothing," she sighs, shoulders dropping, "think of it as an apology for my insensitive words before. Now then," she links her unit, passing me her numbers. I do the same, her eyes turn into balloons as she gapes. "Wh-What the- How is this even…"

… I tend to forget how awesome the XM3 actually is to the people in this world, huh.

"Those numbers work for you, 1st Lt?" I ask, tapping my brows.

"Ahem… Indeed," she coughs again, brushing her hair. "Alright, cadet Shirogane, start to heat up your Jump Units. We engage the maneuver in T minus One."

"Copy that."

For now, this ceasefire shall suffice. If we both make it out alive, then I'll see how to deal with you once we're back at the base.

… Kinda hard to believe, that this really might be one of our last talks. Just, please, don't let this be a repeat of the defense of the base…

Sighing through clenched teeth while gripping the controls, the numbers shave closer to zero. Releasing all the fire into a crushing stomp, melting my back into the seat, both the Geki and the yellow beetle blast away, up towards the cliff.

Goodbye

A/N: Sorry if th e last chapter came out a bit more messy than you'd expect, I couldn't really bring myself to place as much effort into it to polish the edginess away . Maybe it's just burnout, but this feels like an appropriate time to take the plunge.

I'm done with this story.

A few interactions have soured this franchise for me, some recent bad decisions from the company as well, and I honestly kind of feel alienated. From both being outright asked a 'Why are you even here' some time ago to simply not vibing with the overall focus most give to the BETA war in the franchise, and I'm kind of indifferent towards that side of the canon myself, to be honest.

Problem is, whenever I think of something that motivates me to write, it clashes against the mold of the BETAverse. Most importantly, it clashes against some core characters and teachings of the setting. And I'm tired of adapting to the mold of canon, it has taken the joy out of writing to try and justify why the plot happens without ruining characters or the setting.

Doing a light reread of Unlimited, the coup and other key moments from Alternative a few days ago, I saw why so many readers were rightfully criticizing my writing of Yuuko, how it doesn't fit her persona to act as she does since chapter 85 on, and how that also applies to the rest of the story at large, how the AU elements I added, Smolkeru and his relation with Yuuhi as well as his daughter being the narrator, stick out and feel out of place.

But when sitting down, seeing the comments about how Yui was OOC, which also applies to Meiya and Yuuko, and thinking if I wanted to change the direction to portray them more faithfully to canon, my answer was no. I don't want to make this story adapt to this mold.

So Reversal doesn't feel like it belongs in the Muv-Luv universe to me anymore, and I rather take the story and characters where I want them to go despite it clashing against the setting that inspired me to take the pen, or keyboard I guess. The bugging feeling that had been telling me to slice this in half proved to be correct, that's why I'm dropping the fic. It doesn't feel right to continue writing these characters that made nest in my head under these names and scenarios, in a setting I can't portray well enough. Now that I could sit down calmly and reread parts of the trilogy, I can see that all those critiques I received near chapter 69 were spot on and I was indeed throwing a hissy fit over my plot not working in the world of Muv-Luv. I simply couldn't capture the feel of the trilogy and its cast, and to continue bashing my head against the textwalls won't make anything better.

So no deleting chapters, no more rewriting, no tagging abandoned or removing comments, let's simply say goodbye. To all those who have silently followed up to this point, to those who stuck since the beginning, to any and all who left a comment, there are only a few things left to tell you.

Thank you for reading and being there, our interactions made the pandemic so much better to deal with for me. Special thanks to both Dash9 and That One Harsh Guest, whose critiques helped me improve my English a lot.

So keep staying safe, y'all.

Goodbye

Zuoriel